Global Encyclopedia of Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, Transgender, and Queer (LGBTQ) History Editorial Board

EDITOR IN CHIEF
Howard Chiang
Assistant Professor, Department of History, University of California, Davis

ASSOCIATE EDITORS
Anjali Arondekar
Associate Professor, Department of Feminist Studies, University of California, Santa Cruz

Marc Epprecht
Professor, Department of Global Development Studies, Queen's University, Kingston, Canada

Jennifer Evans
Professor, Department of History, Carleton University, Ottawa, Canada

Ross G. Forman
Associate Professor, Department of English and Comparative Literary Studies, University of Warwick, United Kingdom

Hanadi Al-Samman
Associate Professor, Department of Middle Eastern and South Asian Languages and Cultures, University of Virginia, Charlottesville

Emily Skidmore
Associate Professor, Department of History, Texas Tech University, Lubbock

Zeb Tortorici
Associate Professor of Spanish and Portuguese Languages and Literatures, New York University
Table of Contents

Preface xxv

Introduction xxix

List of Contributors xxxv

Thematic Outline liii

A

ACT UP 1
The founding, achievements, international impact, and demise of this important AIDS activist group.
Sidebar: ACT UP in Europe

Activism in Africa South of the Sahara 8
The history and current state of LGBTQI activism in Africa, including challenges and victories.

Adoption and Surrogacy in Europe 16
The availability and legal rights surrounding the issues of adoption and surrogacy for European LGBT persons.

Adoption, Fostering, and Surrogacy (International) 20
The legal and social challenges LGBTQ adults face to access intercountry adoption and surrogacy, as well as challenges LGBTQ youth face when rejected from their families.

Aestheticism and Decadence, Nineteenth-Century 26
The important figures and works of these interrelated cultural movements that explored queer and erotic themes around the end of the nineteenth century.

African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights 35
The role of this human rights organization in advocating for LGBTQ individuals in Africa.
Sidebar: The Commission Condemns Violence and Discrimination against LGBTQ Persons

Afropop Music 38
A type of popular music on the African continent, and the ways LGBT artists are using it both to resist social oppression and promote tolerance.

AIDS Memorial Quilt—The NAMES Project 40
The development and cultural impact of this famous memorial to those who have died from AIDS.
Al-Akharun (2006; Seba al-Herz) 44
Saudi Arabian novel narrated by a disabled Shi‘a woman struggling to reconcile her religious faith with her nonnormative sexual identity.

alQaws 48
Palestinian organization that promotes queer acceptance combined with advocacy against Israeli pinkwashing.

Amer, Ghada (1963–) 51
Egyptian artist whose work challenges conventional representations of women, particularly in its depictions of same-sex desire.

AnāHiya Anti (2000; Elham Mansour) 55
One of the first novels published in the Middle East to represent lesbianism in a way that is not heteronormative.

Antes que Anochezca (1992; Reinaldo Arenas) 59
Autobiography of Cuban exile and one of Latin America’s most original voices that details the author’s life as a political and sexual dissident.

Anthropology in Africa South of the Sahara 61
Historical and contemporary anthropological perspectives on nonnormative sexualities in Africa.

Sidebar: E. E. Evans-Pritchard (1902–1973)

Anti-Gender Movement in Europe 69
Conservative campaigns against so-called “gender ideology” or “gender theory.”

Anti-Racist Activism in Europe 71
The intersection between anti-racism and LGBT activism throughout the continent.

Anti-Semitism and Zionism 75
The relationship between anti-Semitism and largely male homosexuality in Europe and its influence on Zionism and the State of Israel.

Anti-Semitism in Europe 80
Jews and homosexuals as cultural “others” in Europe.

Antisodomy and Buggery Trials 83
The legal prosecution of same-sex sexual activity, mostly between men, throughout history.

Archives in Africa 91
The challenges of archival research on nonnormative sexualities in Africa.
Archives in Asia 95
What legal records, religious sources, scientific texts, and other archival material reveal about nonnormative genders and sexualities in Asia.

Archives in Australia and New Zealand 102
Description and management of LGBTQI archives in Australia and New Zealand.

Archives in Europe 103
The history of gay and lesbian archives in western and eastern Europe.

Archives in Latin America 106
The major archives containing LGBT materials in various Central and South American countries, including the challenges of researching this topic in this region.

Archives in North America 113
The history of the development of community-and university-based LGBTQ archives in the United States and Canada.

Argentina’s Gender Identity Law 118
A groundbreaking law allowing transgender people the right to officially change their gender identity without third-party intervention.

The Art of Identity in India 123
The expression of queer identity in contemporary Indian art in a society that criminalized same-sex sexual expression.

The Art of Queering Asian Mythology 127
An examination of LGBTQ-themed artwork through the lens of Asian mythology.
Sidebar: Sunil Gupta (1953–)

Asexuality 134
The range of definitions that can apply to this sexual identity from the perspective of asexual communities, scientific research, and queer and feminist theory.

Asia Pacific Transgender Network 142
Coordinating body for organizations serving trans individuals in the Asia Pacific region.

Asrar ‘Ailiyyah (2013; Hany Fawzy) 148
The first Egyptian film to focus primarily on homosexuality.

Aswat 152
A Palestinian nongovernmental organization for women with nonnormative sexualities, with a focus on the group’s publications Haqi an a’eesh an akhtar an akun (2007) and Waqfet banāt (2010).
Athletes, Trans and Intersex 156
Examples of trans and intersex athletes through history, and the obstacles to competition they have experienced.

Athletes, Trans and Intersex, in Asia 159
The complexities of sex segregation, testing, and verification in sports, including the cases of noteworthy Asian trans and intersex athletes.
Sidebar: Pinki Pramanik (1986–)

Australia and New Zealand 165
The history of the struggle for Australasian LGBTI rights, as well as the increased political and cultural impact of this community from the late twentieth century onward.

ʿAwdat al-Almani ʾilā Rushdīh (2006; Rashid al-Daif) 177
Representations of homosexuality and the narrator’s struggles with shifting notions of gender and sexuality in this novelized biography.

B

El Baile de los 41 183
A 1901 scandal in which a raid of a party in Mexico City revealed cross-dressing men in attendance, and its subsequent impact on Mexican culture.

Bakla 187
A term used in the Philippines for an effeminate man or a homosexual.

Barbin, Herculine (1838–1868) 190
One of the most famous hermaphrodites of the nineteenth century, and the scholarly debate inspired by her life.

Bareed Mista3jil: True Stories (2009) 192
A collection of autobiographical narratives written by Lebanese lesbians and one trans man.

Bars and Cabarets in Europe 196
The development of drinking establishments throughout Europe that specifically serve gay and lesbian customers.
Sidebar: Eldorado

Bars, Working-Class, in Mexico 199
Notable establishments in various Mexican cities where classes mix in a sexually diverse environment.

Bathhouse Raids, Toronto (1981) 202
Police crackdown on Toronto's gay bathhouses and the ensuing mobilization of LGBTQ activism in response.

Bayrūt ’75 (1975; Ghâda al-Sammān) 207
Arabic novel in which homosexuality is depicted as a by-product of national violence and class inequity. BDSM (Bondage and Discipline, Dominance and Submission, Sadism and Masochism) 210
The LGBTQ expression of these alternative sexual practices.

Benga, François “Féral” (1906–1957) 218
Senegalese cabaret dancer whose sensuality was perceived as a symbol of homoeroticism in both Paris and the United States in the 1930s.

El Beso de la Mujer Araña (1976; Manuel Puig) 220
Argentine novel that upends normative storytelling and normative sexuality while giving marginal subjectivities a voice.

Bhutan 222
The status of the LGBT community in Bhutan.

Sidebar: Lhak-Sam, Bhutan’s Network for HIV-Positive People

Biological Essentialism 224
The assumption that human behavior is caused by an immutable biological trait despite evidence of sociocultural factors, discussed here as it relates to sexual orientation.

Black Freedom Movement and Sexuality 230
LGBTQ participation in the movement to secure human rights for African Americans in the 1960s and 1970s.

Blackmail 236
The use of blackmail by and against those engaging in same-sex acts from the fourteenth century to contemporary times.

The Body Politic 239

Bom-Crioulo (1895; Adolfo Ferreira Caminha) 243
A naturalist novel dealing with race, homosexuality, and crime in Rio de Janeiro.

Bookstores 247
The history of LGBTQ+-themed bookstores, including their unique role as activist centers and community spaces.

Sidebar: Gay’s the Word Bookshop
Boston Marriage and Women's Romantic Friendships 254
Long-term, financially independent relationships between women in the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries.

Botswana 259
A historical and contemporary look at LGBTQ issues in this southern African nation.

Boys Love (Yaoi) Manga 262
A media genre that originated in Japan depicting male-male romantic and sexual relationships, initially created by females for a female audience.

Brokeback Mountain 268

The Bubble (2006; Eytan Fox) 270
Israeli film portraying a complex romantic relationship between an Israeli man and a Palestinian man in Tel Aviv.

Butt Magazine 275
A post-pornographic fanzine for gay hipsters.

C

Cabaret Theater in Latin America and the Caribbean 279
The use of cabaret as political statement by Latin American and Caribbean LGBT artists.
Sidebar: Jesusa Rodríguez (1955–)

Cabo Verde 284
The status of the LGBT community, both historically and into modern times, on this island nation off the west coast of Africa.

Cameroon 287
The current state of the LGBTQ population in this Central African nation, including the influence of religion, politics, and activism.

Camp 290
An elusive term, often used to describe a particular mode of behavior or way of being in the gay community that is associated with flamboyancy, affectation, vulgarity, and effeminacy.

Canadian Criminal Code Reform (1969) 295
Changes to Canada’s criminal code in 1969 that included the partial decriminalization of certain homosexual acts.
Cape Town 299
The South African port city known as the Gay Capital of Africa.

Carnival and Sexuality in Brazil 302
The intersections and contradictions of Carnival and queer expression.

Cavafy, C. P. (1863–1933) 305
Greek poet whose homoerotic works made him a queer icon.

Central American Solidarity Movement 310
LGBTQ participation in this transnational movement that was active from the mid-1970s to the early 1990s.
Sidebar: Victoria Mercado Brigade

Chechnya, Detention Camps in 315
The imprisonment of men in the Russian republic of Chechnya for alleged homosexuality.

Chevalier d’Éon or Mademoiselle Beaumont (1728–1810) 318
The colorful life of the famous eighteenth-century French cross-dresser.

Christianity in Africa: Anglican 319
The position of the Anglican Communion in Africa on sexual minorities.

Christianity in Africa: LGBT Friendly 324
Christian churches and ministries in Africa that specifically cater to the LGBT community.
Sidebar: Desmond Tutu (1931–)

Christianity in Africa: Pentecostal and Charismatic 326
The impact of these influential religious expressions on LGBTQ issues in Africa.

Christianity in Africa: Roman Catholicism 330
The position of the Roman Catholic Church in Africa on sexual minorities.

Cinema, African (Anglophone) 332
Representations of same-sex desire in English-language films made in Africa or by directors of African descent.
Sidebar: Nollywood
Sidebar: Rafiki (2018; Wanuri Kahiu)

Cinema, African (Francophone) 343
LGBT representation in French-language African films.
Sidebar: Karmen Geï (2001; Joseph Gaï Ramaka)

Cinema, Latin American (Early Twentieth Century) 347
The influence of the Latin American film industry and film spectatorship on identity formation through the mid-twentieth century.

Cinema, Latin American (Late Twentieth and Twenty-First Centuries) 351
Six films from the late twentieth century and twenty-first century that illustrate the trajectory of LGBTQ themes and characters in Latin American cinema.

Cisgender or Cis 357
A term used to describe people whose gender identity is congruent with the sex/gender assigned to them at birth, or non-transgender.

Classical Studies 364
The ways in which scholars from the Middle Ages to modern times used examples from Greek and Roman antiquity to advance the study of queer desire.

Clitoris 367
The medical and cultural view of this female sexual organ, its role in sexual pleasure, the ways it can be modified, and its relation to intersex and trans bodies.

The Closet 372
The development of the concept of this term for homosexuals who have not publicly identified with their sexuality and its application in various cultures.

Cold War and Sexuality in Latin America 379
The methods by which both leftist and rightist governments in Latin American countries addressed the perceived threat posed by nonnormative sexualities during this era of heightened geopolitical tension.

Colonialism in Africa South of the Sahara 384
The impact of colonialism on the development of laws and cultural attitudes toward same-sex practices in Africa.

Combahee River Collective 390
Black lesbian feminist organization formed in Boston in 1974.

Coming-Out/Coming-In Discourses in the Middle East 394
The Western pride narrative and its alternative for Middle Eastern LGBT individuals.

Comité d'Urgence Anti-répression Homosexuelle (CUARH) 397
An umbrella activist organization of gay and lesbian groups operating in France between 1979 and 1986.

Communism and Queers in Europe 399
The treatment of LGBTQ individuals under European leftist regimes from the late nineteenth century through the dissolution of the Soviet Union in 1991.

Compton's Cafeteria Riot (1966) 403
The first collective protest action by transgender people to lead to structural change in the ability of trans people to interact with law and society.

Confessional Manuals in Colonial Latin America 406
Confessional manuals as religious guides used by priests to teach indigenous peoples the meaning of “sin” in relation to bodily desires and lustful thoughts.

Conquest and Sodomy in Latin America 415
The Spaniards' use of the charge of sodomy against the indigenous populations of the New World as justification for conquest.

Conversion Therapy in China 418
The use of medical, psychological, and psychiatric treatment to “convert” LGBTQ individuals to heterosexuals in China.

Côte d'Ivoire 422
A historical and contemporary look at sexual and gender minorities in this West African nation.
Sidebar: Woubi Chéri (1998; Philip Brooks, Laurent Bocahut)

Cross-Dressing in the West 424
European and American scholarly discourse on cross-dressing from the late nineteenth century to contemporary times.

Cruising and Cruising Grounds 428
A historical and contemporary look at the spaces and behaviors that facilitate clandestine public sexual encounters in gay and lesbian culture.

The Cuban Revolution and Homosexuality 432
The Castro regime’s policy toward and treatment of homosexuals.
Sidebar: Sexilio and Migration
Sidebar: Fresa y Chocolate (1993; Tomás Gutiérrez Alea and Juan Carlos Tabío)

D

Darnell v. Lloyd (1975) 439
The first federal court decision in favor of a constitutional claim to a birth certificate sex-designation change in the absence of a statute contemplating such changes.

Daughters of Bilitis 443
The first women's organization in the United States to directly address issues of female same-sex sexuality and gender.

Defense of Marriage Act (1996) 447
The passing and overturning of the US federal law essentially banning same-sex marriage.

Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders (DSM) 452
The history of the classification of nonnormative sexual behaviors and identities in the diagnostic manual of the American Psychiatric Association.

Diasporas, Queer 457
Ways of critically thinking about the queer diaspora and how it is unique from other types of diasporas.

Digital Cultures in Latin America 461
The Latin American LGBTQ community's use of the internet and digital tools to create community, promote dialogue, and advocate for LGBTQ rights.
Sidebar: Walter Mercado: Queer Digital Icon

Dissidence in Singapore 468
The ways in which queer activists navigate the authoritarian laws of the city-state of Singapore, particularly through performance art.
Sidebar: Hong Lim Park: A Center of LGBT Dissidence

Al-Dizil (1994; Thani al-Suwaidi) 474
A transgender Arabic novella.

Drag, Asian 478
The various forms of Asian drag, their reception in Asia and elsewhere, and their cultural impact.
Sidebar: Asifa Lahore

Dyketactics! 483
Radical activist organization of lesbians of all colors, active in Philadelphia in the 1970s.

Ecology and Environmental Issues and Activism 487
The intersection between LGBTQ and environmental activism.

Egymásra Nézve (1982; Károly Makk) 492
The first and only movie made in communist east-central Europe to deal centrally with the topic of lesbianism.
Einayim Pkuhot (2009; Haim Tabakman) 495
 Israeli film depicting a homosexual relationship within the ultra-Orthodox Haredi Jewish community.

Elbe, Lili (1882–1931) 500
One of the first people to undergo surgical sexual transition, in 1930 and 1931, and how this example complicates assumptions about the concept of “transgender.”

Erauso, Catalina de (1592–1650) 502
A noblewoman who escaped life in a Spanish convent to live as a man and a soldier in the New World during the sixteenth century, popularly known as La Monja Alférez (The Lieutenant Nun).

Ethiopia 505
The history and current status of the LGBTI community in this East African nation.

Ethnopornography 507
An interpretation of indigenous intimate activities in which such activities are framed according to Western sexual categories.

Ethnopsychiatry 510
The systemic psychological study of “non-Western” peoples, particularly as it relates to Africans and homosexuality.

Sidebar: Frantz Fanon (1925–1961)

Eunuchs 514
The role of the castrated male in various cultures throughout history.

Eurovision Song Contest 522
The popularity of this Europe-based, international singing competition and its unofficial status as a queer institution.

F

Family Law in Asia 527
The legacy of colonialism on laws governing marriage, property, and families in Asian countries, and its impact on Asian LGBTQ individuals.

Female Husband 532
Eighteenth- and nineteenth-century term used to refer to an individual assigned female at birth who posed as a husband to a woman.

Feminism, African 534
The ways African feminists have intersected with queer theory and activism.
Femmes and Butches 538
An identification of lesbian use of masculinity (butch) and femininity (femme) to shape sexual desire, gender identity, and community.

Film Festivals 543
A historical and contemporary look at festivals devoted to LGBTQ-themed films.
Sidebar: Frameline: The World’s First LGBTQ Film Festival
Sidebar: BFI Flare: London’s First LGBTQ Film Festival

Fin de Siècle Sexuality 550
A positivist approach to the study of sexuality in Latin America in the fin de siècle period (c. 1880–1920) in which practices determined to be deviant were subject to reform in the name of national progress.
Sidebar: Invertido and Pederasta

Fire (1996; Deepa Mehta) 556
The first mainstream film in India to portray homosexual love.

Florentine Codex and Nahua Sexuality 559
What can and cannot be known of Nahua sexuality in central Mexico around the time of the Spanish conquest, particularly through the Florentine Codex compiled by the Franciscan friar Bernardino de Sahagún.

Fortune and Men’s Eyes 563
The 1967 play and 1971 film adaptation that highlighted both the injustice of Canada’s prison system and its treatment of homosexuals.

Foucault, Influence of 566
The role of the influential French thinker Michel Foucault in the development of queer history.

Frente de Liberación Homosexual 570
The first organization of gay men in Argentina, active from 1971 to 1976.

Friendship Societies in Europe 573
Social clubs for gay men and lesbians that proliferated in Europe during the first half of the twentieth century.

FTMInternational 575
The largest and oldest organization serving female-to-male transgender communities and their allies, established in 1986.
Sidebar: Lou Sullivan (1951–1991)
Gangs and Street Kids in Africa 579
The emergence and practices of homosexual gangs and street-connected cultures, as well as their relationship with new forms of homophobia and/or occult beliefs.

Gay European Tourism Association 581
An organization designed to help European businesses promote LGBTQ-friendly travel. The Gay International and Mideast

LGBTQI Organizations 583
The critique by Columbia University professor Joseph A. Massad of LGBTQI rights organizations in the Middle East as agents of Western organizations in support of a greater colonialist strategy.

Gay Latino Alliance (GALA) 587
The first prominent gay Latino organization in the United States, active between 1975 and 1983.

Gay Liberation Front 590
An international network of gay rights organizations active in the 1970s, which represented a shift to a more militant approach.

Gender, Flexible Systems, in Africa 594
Expressions of gender fluidity in traditional African cultures and how the imposition of binary Western gender categories has affected modern African attitudes toward LGBTQ persons.
Sidebar: Njinga (r. 1624–1663)

Gendered Violence and Feminicide in Latin America 599
The cultural, social, and economic forces behind violence against women in Latin America, including trans women.

Gentrification in Europe 606
The impact of gentrification on queer communities, focusing on the examples of the Punavuori and Kallio districts in Helsinki, Finland.

Ghana 612
The history and current status of sexual minorities in this West African country.

Ghilman 615
A term for a type of male slave or servant during the era of Islamic caliphates, sometimes depicted as the homosexual "beloved" in classical Arabic literature.
Graffiti and Graphic Art 618
The history and current use of these artistic media in queer public expressions.

The first heterogeneous autonomous selfdeclared lesbian of color group in contemporary France, founded in 1999.

Grupo de Trabalho Homossexual and LES 625
Two prominent LGBTQ advocacy organizations in Portugal.

Grupo Gay da Bahia 628
Brazilian organization for LGBTTQI activism.

Hajar al-Dahik (1990; Hoda Barakat) 631
One of the first novels in Arabic to have a gay protagonist.

Halat Shaghaf (1998; Nihad Sirees) 635
A Syrian novel that includes the story of a collective of women who offer an alternative to normative heterosexuality during the 1930s in Aleppo.

Harlem Renaissance 638
The queer side of the social and cultural movement centered in the black neighborhood of Harlem in the 1920s and 1930s.

Hate Crime Law and Policy in the United States 644
The development of US laws against crimes that target persons because of their particular status group, with a focus on legislation protecting LGBTQ persons.

Helem 651
The first official LGBTQ+ rights organization in the Middle East.

Hemispheric Institute Digital Video Library 651
Description of the online archive of videos documenting the artistic expression of social and political life in the Americas, with a particular focus on its queer content.

Hena Maysara (2007; Khaled Youssef) 657
Egyptian film that shocked many with its depiction of a lesbian encounter.

Higher Education and LGBTQ+ Communities in the United States 661
The relationship between US institutions of higher learning and their LGBTQ+ students and staff, both historically and in the twenty-first century.
Hijras 666
A fluid term used on the Indian subcontinent to reference iconic figures of sexual and gendered difference.

Historical Sexes 671
Counting the sexes and the invention of gender in history.

HIV/AIDS 677
Myths and conspiracy theories about the origin of AIDS, as well as efforts to raise awareness.

HIV/AIDS in Africa 687
The status of HIV/AIDS prevention strategies and activism in Africa as they relate to LGBTQ communities, with a particular focus on South Africa, Malawi, and Uganda.
Sidebar: Most-at-Risk Populations (MARPs)
Sidebar: Zackie Achmat and the Treatment Action Campaign

HIV/AIDS in Egyptian Cinema 704
The various ways in which Egyptian film has dealt with the topic of HIV/AIDS and how these reflect Middle Eastern cultural views of the disease.

HIV/AIDS in Europe 708
The responses to the AIDS epidemic and the impact of gay activism in various European communities.

HIV/AIDS in Latin America and the Caribbean 716
The social and government response to the HIV/AIDS epidemic in this region, including the close relationship between AIDS-related activism and LGBT activism.

AIDS Activist HIV/AIDS in South and Southeast Asia 726
The interplay of national governments, HIV management programs/NGOs, and at-risk populations in South and Southeast Asia.

HIV/AIDS in the United States 734
The history of the HIV/AIDS epidemic, its impact on the American LGBTQ community, and activist response.

Homoerotic Poetry of Abū Nuwās 743
Homoerotic works by the ninth-century Arabic poet.

Homoeroticism in the Plays of Ibn Daniyal 747
Three farces by the thirteenth-century Egyptian court poet generally recognized as the first major writer in Arab culture to create works centrally concerned with homoerotic themes.

Homonationalism in Africa 750
A particular form of gay advocacy that frames gay rights in nationalistic terms that privilege American and European expressions over those of the Middle East and the Global South, particularly Africa.

Homosexual Acts in Shariʿa 755
Perspectives on same-sex sexual activity in Islamic sacred texts.

Human Rights 759
The struggle for recognition of LGBTQ rights from a transnational perspective.

Human Rights and Activism in Latin America 767
The geopolitical context that defines the relationship between LGBT activism and human rights in Latin America in the twentieth century.

Human Rights and Queer Arab Refugees 775
The challenges queer Arab refugees face post–Arab Spring.

Human Rights Campaign 781
The largest LGBTQ organization in the United States as of 2017.

Human Rights in Asia 784
The history and current state of LGBTQ rights in South Asia, East Asia, and Southeast Asia.

Human Rights in Europe 789
Important cases decided by the European Court of Human Rights and the European Court of Justice related to LGBTQ issues.

Sidebar: The European Parliament

Sidebar: The Holocaust and LGBT Victims

I

Luv U But (2012–2014; Fadia Abboud) 801
Australian web TV series showing how culture, family, and honor affect gays and lesbians in religious families in the Arab diaspora.

Imarat Yaʿkubian (2002; Alaa al-Aswany) 805
Egyptian novel that features a gay character.

Imperialism and Colonialism 809
The regulation and expression of same-sex sexual dynamics, particularly in terms of the effects of Western imperialism during the nineteenth century.
Inquisition, Criminal Courts, and Sexuality in Colonial Latin America 818
The role the Spanish and Portuguese Inquisitions played in defining and policing sexuality in the New World, particularly with regard to same-sex acts and desires.

Institut für Sexualwissenschaft 823
Pioneering institute for sexual research founded by the famous German sexologist Magnus Hirschfeld.

Internet in Africa 827
The role of websites and social media in the lives of African LGBTQ individuals.

Internet Queer Sites in the Middle East 831
Descriptions of various current and defunct websites and blogs dealing with LGBTQI issues in the Middle East.
Sidebar: Excerpt from A Gay Girl in Damascus Blogm

Intersex Identities 836
An umbrella term to describe those whose anatomical, chromosomal, and hormonal deviations result in sex-atypical development.

Involuntary Servitude and Same-Sex Sexuality in Africa 840
Examples of same-sex sexual practices in involuntary servitude in African history.

ISIS Gay Trials 844
The atrocities committed against gay men by those affiliated with the jihadist group known as the Islamic State of Iraq and Syria.

Iskandariyya ... Leh? (1979; Youssef Chahine) 847
Egyptian movie that includes a subplot of a same-sex encounter between an Egyptian and a British soldier.

Islam in Africa South of the Sahara 851
The status of those with nonnormative sexual identities in African Muslim communities.

J

Jamaica Forum for Lesbians, All-Sexuals and Gays (J-FLAG) 857
LGBT advocacy organization based in Jamaica.

Jannāt wa-Iblīs (1992; Nawal El Saadawi) 858
Depiction of lesbianism and female subversive-ness in this modern Arabic novel.

Jotería Studies 863
An academic field evolving at the intersection of Chicanx, Latinx, queer of color, and transgender studies.

K

Kathoey 869
A complex Thai term most commonly used to refer to male-bodied individuals who express a feminine gender and seek relations with heterosexually identified male partners.

Kenya 874
A historical and contemporary look at LGBTQ issues in this East African nation.

Khookha McQueer (1987–) 878
Tunisian genderqueer digital artist and performer.

Kinsey Scale 881
A metric for describing the spectrum of human sexuality across a seven-point scale, developed by sex researcher Alfred C. Kinsey in 1940.

Kinship in Europe 885
Family models used by LGBTQI persons in Europe.

L

Lambda Legal Defense and Education Fund 891
The first organization in the United States established to protect and advance the civil rights of LGBT and HIV-positive persons.

Language 894
The use and study of specialized terminology by LGBTQ+ communities throughout the world.

Sidebar: Moffie

Language in Africa 903
Terms used to describe nonnormative sexualities in Africa, which are complicated by Western hegemony.

Sidebar: Hungochani Sidebar: Kuchu

Language in Europe 909
The development and use of queer-specific words and phrases by the LGBTQ communities of Europe.

Language in Latin America 913
Stigmatized terms for nonnormative gender and sexual identities in Latin America, and how the LGBTQ community is resignifying them.
Lavender Menace 919
An informal lesbian feminist collective formed in New York City in 1969 to advocate for lesbians within the women's liberation movement.

Lavender Scare 922
A Cold War campaign targeting gay people in the US government for reasons of national security that paralleled the anti-Communist campaign known as the Second Red Scare.

Lesbanese (2008; Alissar Gazal) 925
Short documentary spotlighting the struggle of the women of Lebanon and their burgeoning sexual identities. Lesbian Feminist Encuentros of Latin America and the Caribbean 928
The development and early years of lesbian feminist organizing in Latin America via encuentros, or conferences, starting in 1987.

Lesbian Herstory Archives 932
The oldest, largest historical collection of lesbian material in the world.

Lesbian Lands, Women’s Lands, and Separatist Communes 934
The development of communities by and for the exclusive use of women for the exploration of sexual identity and feminist politics in the United States.

Lesbian Mothering and Adoption in Latin America 938
The status of lesbian-headed families in Latin America against the backdrop of the greater LGBTQI movement in the region.

The Lesbian Music Movement 942
The development, heyday, and decline of a grassroots movement to create and showcase music made by lesbian artists for women-only audiences.

Literary Discourses in the Ottoman Middle East (1500–1900) 948
Homosexual elements in the literature of this Islamic empire.

Sidebar: No Past, No Present, No Future (1973; Yulisa Amadu Maddy)
Sidebar: One Day I Will Write about This Place (2011; Binyavanga Wainaina)

Literature, African (Francophone) 964
French-language African literature that features gender variance and same-sex sexuality.
Sidebar: Le Devoir de Violence (1968; Yambo Ouologuem)
Sidebar: Femme Nue, Femme Noire (2003; Calixthe Beyala)
Literature, Caribbean (Anglophone and Creole) 971
The work of English- and Creole-speaking queer Caribbean authors to increase visibility of nonnormative sexualities in the region.

Literature, Caribbean (Francophone) 976
The work of Francophone queer Caribbean authors to increase visibility of nonnormative sexualities in the region.

Madame Satã (1900–1976) 981
The colorful life of the Brazilian street hustler and drag performer of early twentieth-century Rio de Janeiro.

Mädchen in Uniform (1931; Leontine Sagan) 983
Weimar German film that was one of the first to portray lesbianism on-screen.

Maghreb 985
The historical and modern European perceptions of the geographic region of North Africa as an exotic land steeped in homoeroticism.
Sidebar: Tangier

Malaysia 990
The status of LGBTQ rights in this Southeast Asian country, including major Malaysian literary and cinematic works on LGBTQ themes.

Marches on Washington 993
The series of national marches on the US capital by the LGBTQ community between 1979 and 2017.

Marriage Migration in Asia 997
The migration of LGBTQ persons for reasons of marriage between Asian countries.

Marriage, Same-Sex, in Latin America 1001
The history of the struggle to legalize same-sex marriage in the countries of Argentina, Brazil, Colombia, Mexico, and Uruguay.

Marriage, Same-Sex, in Taiwan 1004
The path to LGBT marriage equality in Taiwan, which became the first Asian country to recognize this right in 2017.

Marriage, Universal, in Europe 1008
The legal and political landscape influencing recognition of same-sex couples, either in marriage or state-recognized partnerships.
Sidebar: Pacte Civil de Solidarité (PACS)

Marriage, Woman-Woman, in Africa 1014
Institutionalized same-sex relationships between women in various African cultures.

Masculinity in Iranian Cinema 1018
Portrayals of luti, shahid, fokoli, and other masculine archetypes from the Pahlavi era to contemporary times.

Mattachine Society 1023
The first major homosexual political organization in the United States.

Medicine, Complementary and Alternative 1026
The history of queer engagement in medical practices beyond conventional Western medicine.

Meem 1030
Activist and support group for queer women and trans people in Lebanon from 2007 to 2014.

Metelkova Mesto (Slovenia) 1033
A center for artistic subculture and queer life in Ljubljana.

Mexican Revolution and Sexuality 1035
The impact of the 1910 revolution on Mexican gender norms.

Migrant Queer Communities, US 1039
The cultural perceptions of, and challenges facing, queer migrants to the United States historically and in the twenty-first century.

Migration to Europe 1045
The history of, reasons for, and challenges to LGBT migration to Europe. Militarism and Sexualities in the

Asia-Pacific Region 1054
The policies of various countries in Asia regarding the inclusion of LGBT individuals in their armed forces.

Military Law and Policy in the United States 1057
The evolution of military law and policy regarding LGBTI persons serving in the US armed forces.

Military/Navy in the United Kingdom 1066
The history of discrimination against LGBTQ peoples in the British armed forces and the fight for inclusion.

Sidebar: Merchant Navy

Mishima, Yukio (1925–1970) 1069
Internationally recognized Japanese writer whose body of work includes homosexually themed novels.

Misk al-Ghazal (1988; Hanan al-Shaykh) 1072

Moche Pottery 1076
The ceramic tradition of the Moche culture of the Central Andes between 200 and 900 CE, and debates about examples depicting “homosexual” acts.

Molly Houses 1080

Mongolia 1083
The state of LGBTQI rights in this landlocked East Asian country historically and in the twenty-first century.

Mozambique 1086
The history and current status of LGBTI persons in this East African country.

MSM (Men Who Have Sex with Men) in Asia 1089
An umbrella term used for men who have sex with men, regardless of whether they identify as “gay,” and its complex usage in Asia.

Mufākharat al-Jawārī wa-al-Ghilmān (al-Jāḥiẓ) 1092
Ninth-century CE work by the famous Abbasid polymath in which two characters debate the pleasures of sex with men versus sex with women.

Mukhannath 1095
A male person who displays feminine traits in the Islamic world during the era of the caliphates.

Museo Travesti del Perú 1097
An itinerant museum created by trans artist Giuseppe Campuzano that was the first to provide a comprehensive history of cross-dressing, queerness, and gender-bending in Peru.

Museums and Memorials 1101
Significant LGBTQ-related museums, collections, exhibitions, and memorials.
Muxes 1108
An indigenous “third gender” in a Mexican Zapotec community.

Namibia 1115
A historical and contemporary look at LGBTQ issues in this southern African nation.

Nationalism and Sexuality in Europe 1118
The impact of nationalism on nonnormative expressions of sexuality in Europe, from the French Revolution to the twenty-first century.
Sidebar: Federico García Lorca and the Spanish Civil War

Naz Foundation International 1128
A prominent LGBT and HIV/AIDS advocacy organization working primarily in South and Southeast Asia.
Sidebar: Humsafar Trust: India’s Oldest LGBT Organization

Neoliberalism in Africa 1132
The impact of neoliberal policies on the African LGBTQI rights movement.

Neoliberalism in Latin America 1138
The impact of neoliberal policies on Latin America’s LGBTI communities.

New Media in Asia 1142
The impact of digital technologies on LGBT populations in Asia.

The Nicaraguan Revolution 1147
LGBTI activism in Nicaragua from the 1960s to 1990, during the civil war and the Sandinista government that followed.

Nigeria 1150
The status of the LGBT community in this West African nation.

Nkoli, Simon (1957–1998) 1156
Prominent South African anti-apartheid, gay rights, and AIDS activist.

Nuzhat al-Albāb Fīmā Lā Yujad Fi Kitāb (Aḥmad ibn Yūsuf al-Tifāshī) 1157
Thirteenth-century Arabic manuscript that classifies various sexual behaviors, including both male and female same-sex practices.

O
Offences Against the Person Act (1861) 1161
The application of this British law to prosecute sodomy both in the United Kingdom and in its colonial holdings.

The Order of Chaeronea 1165
Secret society of homosexuals founded by George Cecil Ives in Great Britain in the early 1890s.

Orgasm and Orgasmology 1168
Cultural perceptions of and research on the orgasm, particularly as they relate to queer bodies.

Orientalism in Gay Pornography about the Middle East 1172
The manner in which Orientalism and pinkwashing influences gay pornography made in—and about—the Arab world.

Otaku Sexualities in Japan 1177
Debates around the queerness of fan enthusiasm for Japanese media, particularly manga and anime.

Ottoman and Persian Miniature Paintings 1181
Evidence of homoeroticism in the visual art of the Ottoman and Persian Empires.

Pacific Island and Pacific Island Diaspora Identities 1187
The historical and contemporary situation of transgender persons and same-sex practices in the Pacific Islands and in Pacific Island diasporas.

Sidebar: Ritualized Same-Sex Practices in Melanesia

Pakistan, “Queer” 1194
The use of the term queer in Pakistan, including related activist groups and the indigenous designation khwaja sira.

Parada do Orgulho LGBT de São Paulo, Brazil 1197
One of the world’s largest pride parades and its role in Brazilian LGBT politics.

Parenting Rights in North America 1199
The history and current status of LGBTQ rights pertaining to adoption, surrogacy, fostering, and custody in Canada and the United States.

Pasolini’s Cinematic Adaptation of A Thousand and One Nights 1204
The misrepresentation of women, homosexuals, and Middle Eastern culture in the first Western movie adaptation of A Thousand and One Nights, produced in 1974.
Penis 1213
The cultural weight of the penis in defining masculinity, its role in sexual pleasure, the ways it can be modified, and its relation to intersex and trans bodies.

People Like Us (PLU) 1221
An early LGB organization in Singapore, established in 1993.

Performance Artists in Latin America 1223
An overview of important queer performers, with a particular focus on those in Brazil, Chile, Argentina, Peru, Puerto Rico, and Mexico.

Phone Apps 1228
The cultural impact of dating apps aimed at LGBTQ individuals.

Photography in Europe 1233
The development of this visual medium as an expression of queer sexuality.

Pinhua Baojian (1849; Sen Chen) 1236
Chinese novel depicting homoerotic relations between members of the literati and the female impersonators of kunqu opera.

Pink Triangle 1238
The Nazi label for gay prisoners of the Third Reich, which was repurposed as a symbol of gay pride in the early 1970s, first in Germany and then the United States.

Pinkwashing 1244
The practice of championing gay rights as a way to distract attention from discrimination against other groups.

Poets in Latin America 1248
The works of four major twentieth-century poets from Argentina, Mexico, and Chile that include queer elements.

Popular Music and Queer Identities 1254
The ubiquity of queerness in Western popular music.

Pornography 1260
The depiction of nonnormative sex acts in written and visual forms throughout history.

Pornography in Asia 1268
The queering of pornography produced in Asia, with a focus on film and digital media.

Sidebar: A Queer Reading of the Chinese Soft-Core Film Sex and Zen II (1996)
Sidebar: Lezhin: South Korean Webtoons for Mature Audiences
Pornoterrorismo and Post-Porn 1273
An artistic and political practice active throughout Latin America that aims to liberate and empower sexuality through the subversive resignification of pornographic images.

Pride Demonstrations in Europe 1278
A historical and contemporary look at pride events held around Europe.
Sidebar: Attacks on Pride Demonstrations in Moscow

Pride Parades and Marches 1281
The functions, proliferation, globalization, and commodification of parades and events staged by LGBTQ persons.

Psychoanalysis in Argentina 1287
The development of Argentina as a center of psychoanalysis in Latin America.

Psychopathia Sexualis (1886; Richard von Krafft-Ebing) 1291
Influential reference work on sexual pathology that classified homosexuality as a pathological aberration and a symptom of hereditary degeneracy.

Puerto Ricans in the Diaspora 1294
The cultural production and activism of queer Puerto Ricans living in major US cities and their continued connection with the island.

Pulp Fiction, Gay and Lesbian 1300
The publication of cheap paperback novels dealing with gay and lesbian characters, often in sensationalistic ways, starting in 1950.

Q

QT v. Hong Kong Immigration Department (2017) 1307
Landmark court case in which a British citizen in a same-sex partnership successfully sued for the right to join her partner in Hong Kong under a spousal visa.

Queen Boat Trials (2001–2002) 1308
The arrest and subsequent trials of fifty-two Egyptian men for alleged homosexual acts, and the coverage of the case in Egyptian and Western media.

Queer Domesticity in Europe 1312
The establishment of alternative households by LGBTQI persons in Europe.

Queer in Latin America 1315
The theoretical differences between the North American term queer and its application in Latin America.
Queer Names and Identity Politics in the Arab World 1317
Various terms used for same-sex sexuality in Arabic, and their implications for sexual identities.

Queer Themes in Italian Neorealist Cinema 1321
The depiction of queer characters in movies produced in Italy in the post–World War II period until the early 1950s.

Queer Theorists 1323
The scholars defining and debating the diverse field known as queer studies.

Queer Theory, African 1333
The emerging field of study that encompasses an expanded understanding of LGBTI persons in Africa.

R

Rape, Corrective, in Africa 1341
The use of rape to “cure” women with nonnormative sexual identities in Africa.

Refugees and Asylum in Africa 1342
The unique challenges faced by African LGBTQI individuals forced to migrate in response to persecution in their countries of origin.

Refugees and Immigration Policies 1346
The history and current policies regarding LGBT refugees and asylum seekers.

Religion and Same-Sex Behaviors: Christianity 1353
The theology on, and practice of, same-sex acts in Christian traditions, both historically and in modern times.

Religion and Same-Sex Behaviors: Islam 1363
The historical and modern perspective on same-sex behaviors, both culturally and legally, in Islam.

Religion and Same-Sex Behaviors: Judaism 1370
Perspectives on homosexual behavior and gender variance in Jewish traditions.

Rescalvo, Sònia (1946–1991) 1377
Transsexual whose murder at the hands of neo-Nazis spurred trans activism and reforms against hate crimes in Barcelona, Spain.

Resorts 1379
The development and culture of various resorts around the world that cater particularly to an LGBTQ+ clientele.

Sidebar: Houseboys at Resorts

Rituals and Same-Sex and Trans Experience 1383
The complex concept of “ritual” and its expressions in various LGBTQ+ communities globally.

Roopbaan 1390
Bangladesh’s first gay magazine in Bengali, published in 2014.

Sidebar: Hijras in Bangladesh

Rüling, Anna (1880–1953) 1392
Lesbian journalist who was one of the first German women to write about and speak on behalf of lesbians.

Rural Queer Communities, US 1393
The experience of LGBTQ individuals in rural US communities, both historically and in modern times.

Rural Queerness 1396
Scholarly debate regarding the state of queer individuals in rural spaces globally, including depictions in movies and literature.

Russian Gay Propaganda Law 1400
Law passed in 2013 that makes it illegal to promote nontraditional sexual relations among minors in the Russian Federation.

S

Sacred Band of Thebes 1405
An ancient Greek battalion supposedly consisting of pairs of male lovers and their beloveds.

Samoan Fa’afafine 1408
Samoans who are biologically male but whose gendered behaviors are significantly more feminine than is normative for men in Samoan culture.

Sappho, Nineteenth-Century Rediscovery of 1410
The association of the ancient Greek poet with lesbian desire in the nineteenth century, with a particular focus on the Sappho-inspired work Long Ago by Michael Field.

Scandals in Europe 1412
Major scandals involving same-sex relationships within European government in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries.
Scouting 1415
The controversies around the policies of the Boy Scouts, Girl Scouts, and related organizations regarding sex and gender identity, with a focus on North America and Europe.

Section 377 and Section 377A 1419
The history of, and efforts to overturn, British colonial penal codes against same-sex sexual activity in both Britain and its former colonial holdings.

Section 377 in South Asia 1424
The impact of this British colonial code used to prosecute same-sex sexual practices specifically in South Asia.

Senegal 1428
A historical and contemporary look at LGBTQ issues in this West African nation.

Sex Reassignment Surgery in Asia 1430
The popularity and availability of this surgical procedure in various Asian countries.
Sidebar: Jianshun Xie: The "First" Chinese Transsexual

Sex Reassignment Surgery in Iran 1434
The religious rationale that allows Iranians to undergo sex-change operations in a country where same-sex sexual behavior is illegal.

Sex Tourism in Asia 1437
The status and impact of LGBT tourism to Asia.

Sex Tourism in Latin America and the Caribbean 1443
The state of queer sex work in various countries in Latin America and the Caribbean, as well as of organizations that support queer sex workers.

Sex Tourism in the Middle East 1452
The ways in which Orientalism has influenced the sex tourism industry, with a particular focus on the countries of Lebanon, Israel, and Morocco.

Sex Work in Asia 1455
Terminology and gender in studies of “queer and trans sex work” in Asia.

Sex Work/Sex Tourism/Sex Trafficking in Africa 1462
Africa, particularly North Africa, as a destination for European sex tourism, and Europe as a hub for the sex trafficking of Africans, with a particular focus on gay sex workers.
Sidebar: The Quiet Violence of Dreams (2001; K. Sello Duiker)

Sexology in Asia 1465
The study of sexual science and its impact on queer subjectivities in the Asian context.

Sexperts and Sex Education in the West 1473
The impact of sex research, advice, and education on perceptions of nonnormative sexualities, both historically and in the twenty-first century.

Sexual Revolution in Europe 1478
The impact on the LGBTQ community of the mid-twentieth-century shift of European attitudes about sex and greater sexual freedoms.

Sexual Revolution in the United States 1483
The impact on the LGBTQ community of the mid-twentieth-century shift of American attitudes about sex and greater sexual freedoms.

Sharaf (1997; Sun‘allah Ibrahim) 1486
Novel that connects homosexuality with globalization to suggest that both entail a loss of honor for the average Egyptian man.

Shifting Sexual Norms in Nineteenth-Century Iran 1491
The change in Iranian society from cultural acceptance of sexual relationships between grown men and adolescent boys to the delegitimization of this practice.

Sins against Nature in Colonial Latin America 1494
The colonial prosecution of crimes grouped together under the term sodomy in Latin America from the fifteenth to the nineteenth centuries.

Sidebar: Juana Aguilar: Hermaphroditism and Colonial Courts

Situational Homosexuality 1501
A term used to describe same-sex sexual activity that occurs under specific circumstances rather than as part of a homosexual lifestyle.

Slavery and Sodomy in Brazil 1507
Same-sex relations between slaves and their masters or free men in colonial Brazil.

Sodomy Laws in the United States 1512
The history of US laws against sodomy and the legal battle to decriminalize it.

Sidebar: The Sodomy Case against Nicholas Sension

Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz (1648–1695) 1518
Iconic nun, poet, and scholar, known as the Mexican “Tenth Muse,” who manifested same-sex desires in her writings.

South Africa 1522
A historical and contemporary look at LGBTQ issues in Africa’s southernmost nation.
Sidebar: Bev Ditsie (1971–)

Sidebar: Inxeba (2017; John Trengove)

Southern Comfort Conference 1531
The largest convention for trans and gender nonconforming persons and their families in the United States.

Spectra Project 1534
US-based charity supporting LGBTQ refugees in Turkey.

Sports and Sexuality in Latin America 1536
The culture of sports and masculinity in Latin America and its impact on LGBTQ athletes.

Sports, Women in, Africa 1542
The challenges faced by African female athletes, particularly lesbian and queer athletes.

Sidebar: Caster Semenya (1991–)

Stone Butch Blues (1993; Leslie Feinberg) 1546
Novel about an American lesbian's transition to a trans man.

Stonewall Riots, International Effects of 1548
The global impact of the 1969 riots at the Stonewall Inn, which marked a symbolic turning point in gay rights activism.

Strange Fruit 1555
An ethnically diverse queer collective that became the main hub of queer-of-color activism in the Netherlands during its years of activity from 1989 to 2002.

Sufi Treatment of Same-Sex Relations in Poetry and Prose 1556
Homoerotic expressions in the literature of Islamic mysticism.

Landmark court case that paved the way for legal recognition of “third gender” identity and broadened the rights and protections of Nepal’s LGBTQ community.

T

tatiana de la tierra (1961–2012) 1567
Colombian writer integral to the creation of the 1990s Latina lesbian magazines esto no tiene nombre and conmoción.

Thai K-Pop 1570
The impact of this popular music genre on queer Thai identity.
Theater, Queer 1573
The history and current state of gay, lesbian, and queer theater, focusing on the United Kingdom and the United States.

Third Genders 1581
An umbrella term for individuals in diverse cultures who fall outside of traditional, primarily Western, gender binaries of “male” and “female.”

Thomas/Thomaisne Hall Court Case (1629) 1589
The case against an English indentured servant accused of violating gender norms in the Colony of Virginia in the early seventeenth century.

A Thousand and One Nights 1592
The impact of the French and English versions of this collection of tales on Western views of Eastern sexuality, particularly the 1885–1886 edition by Richard Francis Burton.
Sidebar: Same-Sex Relations in Arabic Versions of the Nights

Tibet 1597
The status of the LGBTQ community in this Central Asian autonomous region, including the impact of Chinese rule.

Tom of Finland (1920–1991) 1601
Finnish artist whose work portrayed strong, masculine gay men.

Tongzhi 1603
The development and usage of the Chinese word tongzhi, an umbrella term for people with nonnormative genders and sexualities in Hong Kong, Taiwan, and China.

Tongzhi Literature, Taiwan 1609
A genre of Chinese-language literature featuring homosexuality that flourished in Taiwan starting in the 1960s.

Trans Issues in Africa 1614
The state of trans people in several different African countries as well as the work of activists to advance trans rights.
Sidebar: Signs of Progress for Trans Individuals in Africa
Sidebar: Key Dates in Trans Activism in Uganda

Transfeminism 1619
The intersections of feminism and trans activism.

Transgender Identity in Iranian Cinema 1623
Examines the portrayals of female-to-male (FTM) and male-to-female (MTF) cross-dressing and transsexuality in Iranian cinema.

Transgender Muslims 1627
Descriptions of the various categories of transgendered peoples and their status in Islamic societies. Transgender Organizations in Mainland

China, Hong Kong, and Taiwan 1630
The most significant transgender organizations to emerge in these areas since the 1990s.

Contemporary Iran 1634
The status and cultural depictions of transgendered persons in Iran, with a focus on the period after the Islamic Revolution of 1979.

Transvestites/Transsexuals 1640
The Euro-American development of labels for those who choose to dress in the clothing of the opposite gender and those who feel they are in the wrong body for their gender.

Travel/Travelogues on the Middle East 1644
The promotion of the Middle East as an exotic destination for gay Western travelers.

Travesti and Trans Activism in Latin America and the Caribbean 1649
The groups advocating for the rights of travesti and trans persons and the various forms activism takes in the region.

Sidebar: El Teje

Treason and Queerness 1658
The belief that homosexuality makes public servants more likely to engage in treason, including famous cases in Europe and the United States.

Tuqas al-Isharat wa-al-Tahawwulat (1994; Sa’dallah Wannous) 1663
A modern Syrian play set in nineteenth-century Damascus that includes the first overt and serious dramatization of homosexuality in Arab theater.

Turkish Baths 1667
The history of this Ottoman cultural tradition and its renaissance as a queer space in modern times.

Two-Spirit 1669
A term used by North American Indigenous peoples to refer to nonnormative sexual or gender identities.
Ubuntu 1677
A dominant philosophy in traditional African communities that holds the inalienable rights of the individual as central, and how this philosophy is being used to advocate for LGBTQI rights.

Uganda 1681
A historical and contemporary look at the LGBTQ community in this East African nation.

Sidebar: Kabaka Mwanga (1866–1901)

The Ugly Law (1961–1965; Denmark) 1687
A law intended to crack down on male prostitution in Copenhagen, which was successfully challenged by Danish gay rights advocates.

Urban Queerness 1688
The role that urban milieus play in the production of queer culture, identity formation, and modes of socialization.

El Vampiro de la Colonia Roma (1979; Luis Zapata) 1695
Novella that was one of the first in Mexican literature to feature a gay protagonist.

Vargas, Chavela (1919–2012) 1698
Iconic Latin American singer who queered Mexican musical genres.

Vietnam War 1701
American, Australian, and Vietnamese LGBT participation in the war and their impact on gay liberation movements in those countries.

Vietnam War, LGBTQ+ Veterans 1708
The postwar experiences of those who fought in this war from the United States, Australia, and New Zealand.

Von Mahlsdorf, Charlotte (1928–2002) 1710
Famous German transvestite.

W–Z

W v. Registrar of Marriages (2013) 1713
Landmark court case granting transgendered persons the right to marry in Hong Kong.

Waria 1717
The historical and contemporary position of male-to-female transgender subjects in Indonesia.

“We Demand” Protest (1971) 1720
The first major public demonstration by the Canadian gay and lesbian liberation movement, including an explanation of the ten demands made by the protesters.

The Well of Loneliness (1928; Radclyffe Hall) 1724
A novel about a sexual invert, which was subject to obscenity charges upon publication.

Wilde in Sinophone Culture 1727
The importance of Oscar Wilde in general to Chinese culture and to its LGBT community in particular.

Wilde Trials, International Significance of 1731
The trials of Irish-born writer Oscar Wilde for “gross indecency” in 1895 and their impact both in England and the world.

Witchcraft/Occult in Africa 1735
The practice of demonizing African LGBTQ individuals by associating same-sex practices with witchcraft and the occult.

The Wolfenden Report 1739
Influential report published in Great Britain in 1957 recommending that homosexual behavior between consenting adults no longer be considered a criminal offense.

Zheng He (1371–1433) 1743
Famed admiral and explorer in China’s Ming dynasty who was also a eunuch.

Zhongxing Phenomenon 1745
A popular movement of gender ambiguity among women in postmillennial East Asian Chinese-speaking societies in China, Hong Kong, and Taiwan.

Zimbabwe 1750
The history and current status of LGBTQ individuals in this landlocked southern African nation.

Zuqaq al-Midaq (1947; Naguib Mahfouz) 1753
Egyptian novel that employs a judgmental colonialist gaze in its portrayal of a character who engages in same-sex sexual activity.

Geographic Index 1759
Subject Index 1763
Preface

To say that compiling an encyclopedia of lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender, and queer history on a global scale is a daunting task is an understatement. First, of course, there is the sheer extent of coverage. The Encyclopedia of Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, and Transgender History in America (published by Charles Scribner's Sons in 2004) filled 3 volumes, with 545 entries on one country, albeit one with a very developed queer history. This new Global Encyclopedia of Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, Transgender, and Queer (LGBTQ) History, in contrast, has nearly 450 entries and sidebars that deal with issues on every continent except Antarctica. Nearly 70 countries have substantial coverage in the set; in addition, the editors have demonstrated their commitment to highlighting places with a less developed historiography, such as Africa and Asia, by including more country-specific entries in those regions.

Topical entries, in contrast to the country-specific entries, span the globe: for example, Europe-focused entries include “Gentrification in Europe” and “Sexual Revolution in Europe”; North America has entries on “ACT UP” and “Bathhouse Raids, Toronto (1981)”; readers can find entries on “Cabaret Theater in Latin America and the Caribbean” and “Carnival and Sexuality in Brazil” as part of coverage on Latin America and the Caribbean; on the Middle East, “Coming-Out/Coming-In Discourses in the Middle East” and “Human Rights and Queer Arab Refugees”; on Asia, “Conversion Therapy in China” and “Gay Marriage in Taiwan”; on Africa, separate entries on anglophone and francophone literature and four separate entries on different versions of Christianity in Africa. Topical entries range from quite specific—individuals, films, publications, organizations, court cases—to very broad: for example, “HIV/AIDS,” “Human Rights,” “Imperialism and Colonialism,” “Pornography,” “Queer Theorists,” and “Sex Tourism.” Some of these topics have an overview entry and then separate entries with a geographical focus, highlighting both the general and place-specific aspects of the topic.

A global encyclopedia must reach not only across time and place, but also attend to gender balance and sensitivity to racial/ethnic, class, regional, urban/rural, and other categorical distinctions within societies. Some attempts to think globally about same-sex sexuality have tended to construct a model based on men's experiences. That is definitely not the case here. We find entries focused specifically on women, such as “Boston Marriage and Women’s Romantic Friendships,” “Female Husband,” and “Femmes and Butches.” General entries include information on women and trans people as well as men. “Penis” is matched by “Clitoris,” and both of those entries also illustrate careful attention to racial/ethnic dimensions and trans and intersex bodies, as well as displaying an admirable global and historical reach.

The editors devised a number of strategies for attaining global coverage. They sought out authors for entries on topics specific to a time and place, such as “Florentine Codex and Nahua Sexualities” and “Queen Boat Trials,” to name just two examples. They included some topics that are transnational by definition, such as “FTMInternational,” “Diasporas, Queer,” and “Refugees and Immigration Policies.” They asked authors to consider the global implications of topics such as “Asexuality,” “BDSM,” “Blackmail,” “Cisgender or Cis,” “Phone Apps,” “Urban Queerness,” and “Situational Homosexuality.” It is with such general categories, not focused on a specific time and place, that the biggest challenge of thinking globally arises. Such entries demand knowledge of different societies and debates in the literature, certainly, but sensitivity to the application of concepts developed in one context to another is also required. Can we, for example, talk of “situational homosexuality” in societies without the concept of homosexuality? What does “cisgender” mean in societies without the kind of binary gender system that gave rise to the concept?

As those questions suggest, in addition to the issue of the massive scope of a global history, there are the problems of inclusion and terminology. Who and what belongs in the categories of lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender, and queer history? What do we do about times and places where those concepts, much less terms, did not exist? All historians confront the dilemma of categorizing people who lived in societies without conceptual distinctions between heterosexuality and homosexuality, but the problems are multiplied on a global scale. The editors’ and authors’ sensitivity to this issue is evident in the careful employment of the terminology utilized by specific groups of people in particular historical and geographical contexts. It is also evident in the inclusion of an entry on “MSM (Men Having Sex with Men) in Asia” and in the use of MSM for individuals who would not claim a non-heterosexual identity. The commitment to using the terms and understandings rooted in different cultures is also clear from entries on specific terms, such as tongzhi, bakla, and especially terms referring to transgender people, including hijras, kathoey, mukhannath, muxes, Two-Spirit, and waria.

So compiling a global history is admittedly challenging, but it is also important, and not just to expand the geographical scope of what we know about same-sex sexuality. It is important also because a global perspective provides key insights on a number of fronts. First of all, it undermines a whiggish view of progress—the notion that history is a story of inevitable improvement—that all too often clings to lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender, and queer history. It can be hard to shake the sense that we have moved from the bad old days to the much better present (albeit with some ups and downs), and it is seemingly even harder to shake the idea that it is the West that has taken the lead on all fronts, shining a torch to light the way for other less enlightened societies. The wide variety of ways that societies, both in the past and around the world, have conceptualized and dealt with people with same-sex desires and/or non-normative gender is important in undermining those notions. The complex ways that societies conceptualize and categorize and deal with diverse sexualities and genders makes clear that there is no simple story of progress to be told.
This more complicated history also makes clear how socially constructed sexuality and gender are. What we can see by looking across time and place is how varied the possibilities are for thinking about both gender constructions and same-sex sexual desires, behaviors, and identities. The variety of third-gender identities recognized in various societies challenge the notion that there are two genders linked to two kinds of biological bodies. Instead we see a variety of bodies, including intersexed and surgically or otherwise changed, multiple genders, and both recognized and secret gender-crossing. In addition, we see how complicated the relationship between sexual desires, behaviors, and identities can be. The very term “same-sex sexuality,” while an attempt to apply to cultures with different understandings, calls attention to the fact that what is “same” and what is “sexual” is not fixed. A global perspective shows us that not all acts that, from a modern Western perspective, are considered sexual would be seen that way by the people involved. And sometimes they would not be seen as “same-sex,” since what was defining was not two genitally-alike bodies but rather difference in age, gender, or other factors. Age-differentiated interactions and relationships show us that the concept of “children” is socially constructed, with some societies considering quite young people sexual beings with their own desires and subjectivities. And gender-differentiated relationships between two people with genitally-alike bodies in a wide variety of contexts undermine any notion of a fixed relationship between sex, gender, and sexual identity.

A global history introduces such a wide variety of identities that we can no longer think in a binary way about “heterosexuality” and “homosexuality.” This is not only a question of the different terms that societies use to describe people with same-sex desires. In a variety of places across time and around the globe, same-sex and different-sex behaviors and relationships are considered utterly compatible. Sometimes this was because compulsory heterosexuality ensured that almost all women would marry and bear children, so it mattered little what they did with their hearts and bodies. In some places, men who fulfilled the responsibility to their family and nation to father heirs could also take male lovers. Not only can we see that “bisexuality” existed before it was named as a concept, but that societies organize love, desire, intimacy, and reproduction in a wide variety of ways.

Finally, at the same time that this encyclopedia decenters a modern Western concept of lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender, and queer history, it also documents the impact of the creation of the category “homosexual” by European sexologists in the late nineteenth century, in the context of European imperial expansion, and its subsequent spread around the globe. The concept of “homosexuality” encompassed both men and women, while throughout much of time and in many places male and female same-sex sexuality were considered separate and discrete phenomena. In addition, homosexuality took on an association with the West, fostering the idea that same-sex sexual behavior was imported from abroad, despite existing indigenous forms of behavior and identity. A global perspective allows us to see not only the complex consequences of European sexology, but the ways that imperial and other global encounters played a formative role in the very construction of the concepts of homosexuality and heterosexuality.

The entries in the Global Encyclopedia of Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, Transgender, and Queer (LGBTQ) History, then, not only provide access to an incredible range of information about countries, people, institutions, representations, organizations, movements, events, and concepts. They also expand a vision of queer life based on one or another part of our world. An expansive view of global history, like a map of the world with Africa rather than North America at the center, decenters what is familiar, opening our eyes to the wide variety of ways gender and sexuality play out across time and place.

Leila J. Rupp
Distinguished Professor, Department of Feminist Studies
University of California, Santa Barbara Introduction

The Global Encyclopedia of Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, Transgender, and Queer History (GELGBTQH) is the product of two years of focused labor by hundreds of researchers and editors. The ambitious three-volume set, composed of nearly 450 commissioned articles and sidebars, reflects how the field of lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender, and queer (LGBTQ) studies has engaged with social campaigns for equality, freedom, justice, and liberation worldwide since the 1970s. Work on GELGBTQH began in the autumn of 2016 with the appointment of the editor in chief (Howard Chiang) and the editorial board, which brought together scholars in African studies (Marc Epprecht), American studies (Emily Skidmore), Asian studies (Anjali Arondekar), European studies (Jennifer Evans), Latin American studies (Zeb Tortorici), Middle Eastern studies (Hanadi Al-Samman), and global/transnational studies (Ross G. Forman). Although there is no specific associate editor appointed for Australia, New Zealand, and the Pacific Islands, the board made united efforts to include entries about or materials on these areas of the world.

That queer experience can be located across diverse regional, national, and global contexts and at different points in time is perhaps the most ordinary feature of human existence. The editors were thus tasked with adding intellectual rigor, political color, cultural vibrancy, and social relevance to this seemingly mundane observation. Initially conceived as a global companion to Scribner’s Encyclopedia of Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, and Transgender History in America (2004), GELGBTQH quickly became a different kind of intellectual pursuit. While interest in the historical experience of gender and sexual minorities remains the same, the question of how to translate that impetus into a reference guide meaningful on a planetary scale necessitated a rethinking of the key terms captured in the new title. In this rethinking, the conceptual polarity between rigidity and elasticity marks a recurring theme in the way that the editors maneuvered the interest of the different stakeholders for whom LGBTQ historical knowledge matters most.

To begin with, the concept of the global, like the concept of queer, contains a history of its own. A rigid view of the global might date its origin to a specific time period, typically referring to sometime in the post–World War II era (but some scholars go as far back as the fifteenth century if not earlier); a more flexible approach, on the other hand, might forego the task of temporal designation altogether and focus instead on the different ways globalization has manifested historically—sometimes in waves and cycles—across time and place. Similarly, some might cling to the stance that the transformation of “queer” from a derogatory term to a politically affirmative category is a relatively recent phenomenon (and thus not always applicable to the pre-Stonewall era or outside certain Western contexts). Others, on the contrary, might construe it as a flexible framework within which it is possible and heuristically valuable to grasp variations of social non-conformity—especially with respect to gender and sexuality—in both the past and the present.
While “queer” has come to be understood as an umbrella concept, terms such as lesbian, gay, bisexual, and transgender are employed in this encyclopedia to denote the interrelated histories of same-sex desire and gender variance. A rigid essentialist view would consider these terms as transhistorical and transcultural in nature and thus operate on the premise that LGBTQ historical knowledge is primarily concerned with finding actors and events in the past that match our current definitions of LGBTQ. In contrast, a constructive view would emphasize the definitional malleability and historicity of these terms and thus resist projecting them unconditionally onto the experience of gender and sexual minorities in distinct times and locations. The entries contained in this encyclopedia are mostly situated on a continuum between these two theoretical positions.

_GELGBTQH_ also presents an opportunity to rethink the role that the very workings of encyclopedia and history play in our retrieval of information about the human past. Researchers and students tend to think of an encyclopedia as a comprehensive repertory of information on a given branch of knowledge. In this sense, like encyclopedia, historical narration is static, because it only captures, synthesizes, and presents materials that reflect the current limits of human interpretation. Yet it is also possible to approach encyclopedias, like history, as a malleable epistemic flashpoint that draws attention to what remains unknown. If both encyclopedias and historical research satisfy the desire for human knowledge, LGBTQ studies has taught us—if nothing else—the importance of recognizing the unfamiliar and the otherwise. In this sense LGBTQ studies is as much a political project as an intellectual commitment; likewise, _GELGBTQH_ is as much a history about the future as an encyclopedia about what is yet to be known.

By bridging global history and LGBTQ history, _GELGBTQH_ responds to an interesting paradox—a nuanced friction between these two fields of historical inquiry. Yet before difference there was sameness. Having emerged out of significant historiographical precedents (world history and women’s history, to be more precise), both global history and LGBTQ history came of age in the 1980s. This was the time when historians became increasingly attuned to the importance of discourse, power, and representation under the influence of postmodernist and poststructuralist theory. The work of Michel Foucault played an important role in this regard, and the rise of global history and LGBTQ history thus shared some important intellectual genealogies. While global historians became growingly suspicious of the world historical approach to narrate the human past in terms of “civilization” units or “West-vs.-non-West” bifurcations, LGBTQ historians advocated the use of marginalized “sexuality”—and not just heteronormative “gender”—as a useful category of historical analysis.

Despite these similarities, global history and LGBTQ history have by and large envisioned a very different kind of agenda respectively. So, when global historians diverged from world historians by stressing the importance of routes, avenues of circulation and exchange, and the connectivity between regions, peoples, materials, and ideas, LGBTQ historians parted company with early feminist historians by foregrounding difference, diversity, and multiplicity—ways of characterizing experience that cohere around social cleavages. It might be said that these parallel social and intellectual trends present notable obstacles for global history and LGBTQ history to bear on one another. GELGBTQH, however, raises a number of possible strategies to overcome this deadlock.

First, by involving specialists of different world regions, the board aimed for an even geographical spread in developing the list of entries. This accounts for the fact that queer history in certain regions—such as Europe and North America—have received more considerable scholarly attention than in the other regions represented by the board. Even within the European list, associate editor Jennifer Evans worked with a broadened notion of what constitutes European history. She attentively included entries on Russia, eastern Europe, and southern Europe in addition to the typical focus on Germany and England, two countries that have dominated the spotlight in the European history of sexuality. Moreover, the European list includes thematic entries that provide a pan-European or translocal perspective so as to debunk the importance of the nation-state as the central paradigm. Wherever possible, European entries explicitly integrated discussions of race and ethnicity, whether with respect to the politics of Whiteness or casting light on the construction of Europe’s various Others.

Second, the board gave particular analytical breadth and depth to issues surrounding colonialism and imperialism. This emphasis in consideration is intended to reflect the centrality of these issues to the making of the modern world. From a global viewpoint, the impact of colonialism and imperialism has been uneven depending on where one looks. Therefore, different area editors came up with distinct ways to engage with these themes. As suggested previously, the reach of European empires tends to translate into intersectional, racial, and ethnic politics within the borders of European countries. This kind of political controversy and contention also plays a crucial role in the coverage of North America, another region with a mature LGBTQ historiography. But for the North American list, an additional take on the question of sovereignty and how it affects the lives of LGBTQ individuals centers on the legacy of settler colonialism. Associate editor Emily Skidmore therefore endeavored to include the experiences of indigenous peoples, in addition to those of people of color, immigrants, women, and transgender individuals, and how they have organized and challenged the legal constraints in the United States and Canada.

In the history of Latin America and the Caribbean, colonization by early imperial giants such as Spain and Portugal (and incorporation into their empires) predates the expansion of Western powers and Japan into Africa and Asia. Whereas the former took place from the fifteenth to the early nineteenth centuries, the latter spanned the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. This begins to point to the way that even the word colonialism connotes different historical formations and denotes varying consequences over time and place. Taking into account the historicity of colonialism in the Latin American context, several entries in the list compiled by associate editor Zeb Tortorici discuss the methodological complexities of accessing indigenous Mesoamerican or Andean concepts of the body and desire in the precolonial and colonial pasts. They demonstrate how these complexities have made their way into the twenty-first century, highlighting the region’s unique relationship to North America and Europe in particular. Many entries on this list aim to be macrohistorical in content and scope, though they do so typically by focusing on a few locales, specific movements, and examples that are illustrative of broader themes throughout the region.

Thirdly, while colonialism must constitute a sustained object of critical investigation in queer history, it also enables the board to raise important questions about how and why we are studying gender and sexual diversity—in colonial contexts or otherwise—especially for regions where LGBTQ topics have received less systematic examination. For instance, studies of queer Africa south of the Sahara were dominated by white scholars until the early 2000s. Since then, the growing contribution of black African scholars and activists have remedied certain biases in the field driven by linguistic competence, geographical specialization, and epistemological preference. In formulating the African list, associate editor Marc Epprecht therefore explicitly sought ways to promote a form of scholarly “decolonization,” by nominating as many qualified black African contributors to the encyclopedia as possible, and by pressing them, if they relied too heavily on colonial sources in their research, to look for (or at least problematize) those sources with African voices. This approach decenters rhetorical and epistemic arguments that tend to emanate from the Global North.

The list for the Middle Eastern region, also an under-developed but growing area in queer history, similarly takes the issues of colonialism and imperialism to the very apparatus of scholarly knowledge production. Chief among the methodological challenges in capturing this region in all its complexity comes from the common perception that Western LGBTQ concepts and relevant practices such as “coming out” are foreign imports not comparable to or palatable in Middle Eastern contexts. At the same time, given the region’s complicated entanglement with Europe and the United States, it is not surprising that the Middle East has served as a touchstone in the development of several major theoretical neologisms in the field of queer studies, at once nuanced and contested, such as homonationalism and pinkwashing. Both of these concepts call attention to the ways in which discourses of queer liberation tend to camouflage underlying structures of political oppression (e.g., Israeli-Palestinian conflict or global Islamophobia) and to reinforce certain cultural and ethnic boundaries through the perils of economic (or “neoliberal”) practices. Addressing these challenges while aiming to undo Western centrism, associate editor Hanadi Al-Samman incorporates diasporic publics and a diverse literary, textual, and cultural canon to document queer experience within the contested political climate of the Middle East.

In modern global history, the rise of Japan since the late nineteenth century and the rise of China since the late twentieth century provide the exception to the rule whereby scholars have readily equated imperialism with “the West.” The history of the Asian continent testifies to the uneven impact of colonialism and imperialism. Whereas countries such as China and Thailand were never colonized by a single regime, the Japanese empire ruled many parts of East and Southeast Asia at its zenith and competed successfully with Western powers through the end of World War II. Meanwhile, the majority of Asian countries, including most notably India, had indeed been dominated by a colonial power (European or otherwise) since the age of industrial capitalism. This domination has significantly altered the very nature and dynamics of interaction among various polities within Asia during the era of decolonization and beyond, contributing to, for instance, the recoding of homoerotic sensibility through inter-racial and trans-ethnic understandings. Accordingly, associate editor Anjali Arondekar has put together a list that registers the plurality of colonialism and its aftermath, pushing back against not just a monolithic “West,” however broadly construed, but also the various kinds of hegemony generated from regional centers in Asia that layer over queer linguistic, cultural, social, and political experience.

Last but not least, the board aimed for transnational coverage by thematizing the body and pleasure—analytical angles that are central but conceptually autonomous from LGBTQ concerns. Assuming the principal responsibility to globalize the scope of the encyclopedia, associate editor Ross G. Forman came up with a distinct list of entries that demonstrate how the uses of pleasure and its interpretation are deeply contingent and contextual. By situating the eroticized body and sexual pleasure in cross-cultural contexts, these entries provide crucial insight into the significance of the lack of consensus over what constitutes sex organs, erogenous zones, and pleasure and pain, as well as the interaction between the body corporeal and the body social, political, and cultural.

This global thematization was accompanied by several editorial tactics to move away from a Western-centric paradigm of queering global history. For instance, the board paid particular attention to global religions—especially Islam, Christianity, Judaism, but also Hinduism, Buddhism, and others—in planning and executing the entries. Complementary to the deliberate effort to reach out to native and non-white contributors, the editors also tried to ensure coverage of scholarship published in languages other than English. A related challenge was to cover global queerness in the age of the internet and new media. Acknowledging the import of this new millennial challenge to the productive tension between global connectivity and cleavages, the board devoted editorial energy to addressing questions of power, community, cultural exchange, the relationship between queer identities and literacy, and access to sex and sociality in an era when many of the world’s poorest regions still lag behind in technology.

Yet precisely because the transnational/global list differs from the other lists that tend to lean toward an “area studies” model (a debatable interpretation), the board quickly recognized two problems. One involves bumping against the limit of current LGBTQ historical scholarship. For a variety of reasons (including the ones mentioned above), some topics had been well-studied, while others sent the editors searching for appropriate authors and then those authors for appropriate material. Another remains an enduring debate within the field of world/transnational history. Given the paramount obsession with imperialism among historians, it is often difficult to draw a clear line between “global” connections and “imperial” dominance. A closer look at LGBTQ experience reveals why such a distinction—or the friction between global history and LGBTQ history for that matter—can and should never find a straight-forward solution in a concerted effort to challenge the status quo.

Acknowledgements

A project of this magnitude would not have been possible without the dedicated effort and perseverance of many people. First, I want to thank Hélène Potter for having the courage and vision to launch this project. Her successors in the Cengage editorial department, Jessica Bomarito and Julie Pitlock, were pleasant to work with. The Development Editor, Rebecca Parks, also deserves exceptional mentioning in light of her hard work, patience, and wise counsel on overcoming both major and minor hindrances throughout the editorial process. Though I do not know them personally, I want to thank the copyeditors for their brilliant work for making a difficult subject comprehensible and accessible.

My gratitude also goes to Marc Stein for introducing me to Hélène; Georges Azzi, John Cho, Matthew Ellis, Dredge Kang, Karma Nachar, Matthew Sommer, Susan Stryker, and James Welker for stepping in to help with particular subjects; and Leila J. Rupp for writing an illuminating preface for the encyclopedia. The associate editors all made this work possible: Anjali Arondekar, Marc Epprecht, Jennifer Evans, Ross G. Forman, Hanadi Al-Samman, Emily Skidmore, and Zeb Tortorici. Their tremendous commitment, dedication, hard labor, patience, and high standards have been truly inspiring, and ultimately, it is they who convinced me that not only is this project feasible, but also collaboration and solidarity would be the most significant model for doing global queer history in the future.

In the last two years, I often joke with friends and colleagues that there is something extraordinarily queer about this project: that it is edited by a native Taiwanese. As it is well known, Taiwan is an island whose international recognition as a sovereign state has been increasingly threatened by the People’s Republic of China. It is thus somewhat ironic—or fitting perhaps—that the editor in chief of an encyclopedia about global LGBTQ history is born somewhere without an official nation-state status. This might be the queerest thing about this work after all. Grateful for their support and encouragement, I dedicate this encyclopedia to my mother and father, both of whom deeply love Taiwan (though perhaps for different reasons due to their family background) and, hopefully from this point onward, will love me not for who I am but for who I have become.
Howard Chiang
Editor in Chief
List of Contributors

Mostafa Abedinifard
Assistant Professor without Review of Persian Literary Culture and Civilization, Department of Asian Studies, University of British Columbia, Canada
TRANSGENDERED SUBJECTIVITIES IN CONTEMPORARY IRAN

Anima Adjepong
Assistant Professor of Sociology, Simmons College, Boston, MA
SPORTS, WOMEN IN, AFRICA

Iván Eusebio Aguirre Darancou
Assistant Professor, Hispanic Studies, University of California, Riverside BARS, WORKING-CLASS, IN MEXICO

Henni Alava
Postdoctoral researcher in Development and International Cooperation, University of Jyväskylä, Finland
CHRISTIANITY IN AFRICA: ROMAN CATHOLICISM

Hend F. Alawadhi
Assistant Professor, College of Architecture, Kuwait University
HIV/AIDS IN EGYPTIAN CINEMA

Michael Allan
Associate Professor and Petrone Faculty Scholar, Department of Comparative Literature, University of Oregon
ISKANDARIYYA ... LEH? (1979; YOUSSEF CHAHINE)

Walaa Alqaisiya
Independent scholar, United Kingdom
ALQAWS

Lorena Alvarado
Assistant Professor, Global Arts, University of California, Merced
VARGAS, CHAVELA (1919–2012)

Eddy Francisco Alvarez Jr.
Assistant Professor, Women, Gender, and Sexuality Studies, Portland State University, Portland, OR
JOTERÍA STUDIES

Francesca Romana Ammaturo
Lecturer in Sociology and Human Rights, University of Roehampton, United Kingdom

PRIDE PARADES AND MARCHES

Kuukuwa Andam
PhD candidate, Queen’s University, Canada
AFROPOP MUSIC
GHANA
INVOLUNTARY SERVITUDE AND SAME-SEX SEXUALITY IN AFRICA

Jedidiah Anderson
Visiting Assistant Professor of Arabic, Furman University, Greenville, SC
THE GAY INTERNATIONAL AND MIDEAST LGBTQI ORGANIZATIONS
INTERNET QUEER SITES IN THE MIDDLE EAST
ORIENTALISM IN GAY PORNOGRAPHY ABOUT THE MIDDLE EAST
PINKWASHING
SEX TOURISM IN THE MIDDLE EAST

Grant Andrews
Stellenbosch University, Stellenbosch, South Africa
MOFFIE (SIDEBAR)

Martine Antle
Professor, School of Languages and Cultures, University of Sydney, Australia
AMER GHADA (1963–)

Jennifer Ash
PhD candidate, University of Illinois at Chicago
BLACK FREEDOM MOVEMENT AND SEXUALITY

Jacinthe A. Assaad
Independent scholar, Cairo, Egypt
ASRAR 'AILIYYAH (2013; HANY FAWZY)

Pablo Assumpção Barros Costa
Associate Professor of Dance and Performance, Federal University of Ceará, Brazil
CARNIVAL AND SEXUALITY IN BRAZIL

Erin Aylward
PhD candidate, University of Toronto, Canada
ACTIVISM IN AFRICA SOUTH OF THE SAHARA

Unoma Azuah
English Department, Illinois Institute of Art, Chicago
NIGERIA

Paola Bacchetta
Professor, Department of Gender and Women's Studies, University of California, Berkeley DYKETACTICS!
GROUPE DU 6 NOVEMBRE: LESBIENNES ISSUES DU COLONIALISME, DE L'ESCLAVAGE ET DE L'IMMIGRATION

Simone C. Bacchini
Subject Librarian, Arts and Humanities, The British Library, United Kingdom LANGUAGE

Sivan Balslev
Lecturer, Department of Islamic and Middle Eastern Studies, Hebrew University of Jerusalem, Israel
SHIFTING SEXUAL NORMS IN NINETEENTH-CENTURY IRAN

Brandon Balzer Carr
PhD candidate, Psychology Department, University of California, Santa Cruz BIOLOGICAL ESSENTIALISM

Hongwei Bao
Assistant Professor in Media Studies, University of Nottingham, United Kingdom
CONVERSION THERAPY IN CHINA

Alba Barbé i Serra
Research Group on Social Control and Exclusion/Catalan Anthropology Institute, University of Barcelona
CHEVALIER D'ÉON OR MADEMOISELLE BEAUMONT (1728–1810)
CROSS-DRESSING IN THE WEST

Cynthia Barounis
Lecturer in Women, Gender, and Sexuality Studies, Washington University in St. Louis
BROKEBACK MOUNTAIN

Kaveh Bassiri
PhD candidate, University of Arkansas, Fayetteville
MASCULINITY IN IRANIAN CINEMA
TRANSGENDER IDENTITY IN IRANIAN CINEMA

Srimati Basu
Professor, Department of Gender and Women's Studies, University of Kentucky, Lexington FAMILY LAW IN ASIA

Katie Batza
Assistant Professor of Women, Gender, & Sexuality Studies, University of Kansas
SEXUAL REVOLUTION IN THE UNITED STATES

Heike Bauer
Senior Lecturer, English Literature and Gender Studies, Birkbeck University of London, United Kingdom
INSTITUT FÜR SEXUALWISSENSCHAFT

Genny Beemyn
Director, The Stonewall Center, University of Massachusetts Amherst
HIGHER EDUCATION AND LGBTQ+ COMMUNITIES IN THE UNITED STATES

Agatha Beins
Associate Professor and Director of the Master's Program, Department of Multicultural Women's and Gender Studies, Texas Woman's University, Denton
LAVENDER MENACE

Pablo Ben
Associate Professor, Department of History, San Diego State University, CA
ARCHIVES IN LATIN AMERICA
FRENTE DE LIBERACIÓN HOMOSEXUAL

Jane Bennett
Associate Professor, School of African and Gender Studies, Anthropology and Linguistics, University of Cape Town, South Africa
FEMINISM, AFRICAN

Niko Besnier
Professor of Cultural Anthropology, University of Amsterdam, Netherlands
PACIFIC ISLAND AND PACIFIC ISLAND DIASPORA IDENTITIES RITUALIZED SAME-SEX PRACTICES IN MELANESIA (SIDEBAR)

Deevia Bhana
South African Research Chair (SARChI), University of KwaZulu-Natal, South Africa
RAPE, CORRECTIVE, IN AFRICA

Sayan Bhattacharya
PhD candidate, University of Minnesota, Minneapolis
MSM (MEN WHO HAVE SEX WITH MEN) IN ASIA
Natasha Bissonauth
Visiting Assistant Professor of Writing, Haverford College, Haverford, PA

SUNIL GUPTA (1953–) (SIDEBAR)

Barbara Bompani

Reader in Africa and International Development and Director, Centre of African Studies, School of Social and Political Science, University of Edinburgh, Scotland
CHRISTIANITY IN AFRICA: PENTECOSTAL AND CHARISMATIC

Joseph Allen Boone

Professor of English, Comparative Literature, and Gender Studies, University of Southern California, Los Angeles
OTTOMAN AND PERSIAN MINIATURE PAINTINGS

César Braga-Pinto

Professor of Brazilian, Lusophone African, and Comparative Literature, Chair, Department of Spanish and Portuguese, Northwestern University, Evanston, IL
BOM-CRIOULO (1895; ADOLFO FERREIRA CAMINHA)

Nicholas Bromfield

Lecturer, University of Sydney, Australia
VIETNAM WAR

Christophe Broqua

Centre national de la recherche scientifique, France
CÔTE D’IVOIRE

Andrew J. Brown

Assistant Professor of Performance Art, Fairhaven College of Interdisciplinary Studies, Western Washington University, Bellingham
FTMINTERNATIONAL
GAY LIBERATION FRONT
NO PAST, NO PRESENT, NO FUTURE (1973; YULISA AMADU MADDY) (SIDEBAR)

Kathleen Brown

David Boies Professor of History and Faculty Affiliate, Alice Paul Center for Research on Gender, Sexuality, and Women, University of Pennsylvania
THOMAS/THOMASINE HALL COURT CASE (1629)

Sarah Bull

Wellcome Research Fellow in Medical Humanities, Department of History and Philosophy of Science, University of Cambridge, United Kingdom
A THOUSAND AND ONE NIGHTS

Tara Burk
Lecturer, Department of Women’s and Gender Studies, Rutgers University, The State University of New Jersey
GRAFFITI AND GRAPHIC ART

Anne Marie E. Butler
PhD candidate, State University of New York at Buffalo
KHOOKHA MCQUEER (1987–)

Tristan Cabello
Assistant Program Director and Senior Lecturer, Master of Liberal Arts Program, Johns Hopkins University, Washington, DC
GAY LATINO ALLIANCE (GALA)

Amalia Cabezas
Associate Professor, University of California, Riverside
SEX TOURISM IN LATIN AMERICA AND THE CARIBBEAN

Dan Callwood
Research Associate, School of History, University of Strathclyde, United Kingdom
COMITÉ D'URGENCE ANTI-RÉPRESSION HOMOSEXUELLE (CUARH)

Gabriela Cano
Professor, Center for Sociological Studies, El Colegio de Mexico, Mexico City
MEXICAN REVOLUTION AND SEXUALITY

Marvin Carlson
Sidney E. Cohn Distinguished Professor of Theatre and Performance, Comparative Literature and Middle Eastern Studies, The Graduate Center, The City University of New York
HOMOEROTICISM IN THE PLAYS OF IBN DANIYAL

Erin G. Carlston
Professor of English, The University of Auckland, New Zealand
TREASON AND QUEERNESS

Marcelo Carosi
PhD candidate, New York University
NEOLIBERALISM IN LATIN AMERICA

António Fernando Cascais
Assistant Professor, School of Social and Human Sciences, Department of Communication Sciences, New University of Lisbon, Portugal

GRUPO DE TRABALHO HOMOSSEXUAL AND LES Nisrine Chaer Independent scholar, Netherlands
MEEM

Meghna Chandra
PhD candidate, University of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia
HIV/AIDS IN SOUTH AND SOUTHEAST ASIA

Hsin-Chieh Chang
Assistant Professor, Institute of Health Behaviors and Community Sciences, National Taiwan University
MARRIAGE MIGRATION IN ASIA

Stewart Chang
Professor, William S. Boyd School of Law, University of Nevada, Las Vegas
SECTION 377 AND SECTION 377A

Gilbert Chen
PhD candidate, Washington University, St. Louis, MO
ZHENG HE (1371–1433)

Pui Kei Eleanor Cheung
Researcher, Asian Institute of Social Research, Hong Kong SEX REASSIGNMENT SURGERY IN ASIA

Ta-wei Chi
Associate Professor, Taiwanese Literature, National Chengchi University, Taiwan
TONGZHI LITERATURE, TAIWAN

Howard Chiang
Assistant Professor, Department of History, University of California, Davis
ARCHIVES IN ASIA
JIANSHUN XIE: THE “FIRST” CHINESE TRANSSEXUAL (SIDEBAR)

Ezra Chitando
Professor, Department of Religious Studies, University of Zimbabwe
ANTHROPOLOGY IN AFRICA SOUTH OF THE SAHARA
UBUNTU
Mark Clement
Independent scholar, Vietnam
IMPERIALISM AND COLONIALISM

H. G. Cocks
Associate Professor, Department of History, University of Nottingham, United Kingdom
BLACKMAIL

Gerard Coll-Planas
Director of the Centre for Interdisciplinary Gender Studies, University of Vic—Central University of Catalonia, Spain
RESCALVO, SÓNIA (1946–1991)

Ayo A. Coly
Associate Professor, Comparative Literature and African Studies, Dartmouth College, Hanover, NH
LITERATURE, AFRICAN (FRANCOPHONE)

Rachel Corbman
PhD candidate, Women's, Gender, and Sexuality Studies, Stony Brook University, Stony Brook, NY
ARCHIVES IN NORTH AMERICA
LESBIAN HERSTORY ARCHIVES
STONE BUTCH BLUES (1993; LESLIE FEINBERG)

Benjamin A. Cowan
Associate Professor, Department of History, University of California, San Diego
COLD WAR AND SEXUALITY IN LATIN AMERICA

Jason B. Crawford
Instructor, Department of Humanities, Champlain College, Canada
FORTUNE AND MEN’S EYES

Ronald Cummings
Assistant Professor, Faculty of Humanities, Brock University, Canada
LITERATURE, CARIBBEAN (ANGLOPHONE AND CREOLE)

Salvatore D’Angelo
Visiting Lecturer in Sociology, Susquehanna University, Selinsgrove, PA
HATE CRIME LAW AND POLICY IN THE UNITED STATES

Rohit K. Dasgupta
Lecturer, Institute for Media and Creative Industries, Loughborough University, United Kingdom
MALAYSIA
RURAL QUEERNESS

Sharyn Graham Davies
Associate Professor, School of Social Sciences and Public Policy, Auckland University of Technology, New Zealand
WARIA

María Ximena Dávila
Researcher, Center for the Study of Law, Justice and Society, Dejusticia, Colombia
HUMAN RIGHTS AND ACTIVISM IN LATIN AMERICA

Scott de Groot
Postdoctoral Fellow, University of Winnipeg, Canada
BATHHOUSE RAIDS, TORONTO (1981)
MATTACHINE SOCIETY
TWO-SPRIT

Scott De Orio
Postdoctoral Fellow, Gender and Sexuality Studies Program, Northwestern University, Evanston, IL
THE CLOSET

Chelsea Del Rio
Assistant Professor of History, Social Science Department, LaGuardia Community College, Queens, NY, and Governing Board Member, Committee on Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual & Transgender History
FEMMES AND BUTCHES

Paul R. Deslandes
Associate Professor, Department of History, University of Vermont, Burlington
PORNOGRAPHY
SITUATIONAL HOMOSEXUALITY

Gary C. Devilles
Assistant Professor, Department of Filipino, Ateneo de Manila University Loyola Schools, Philippines
BAKLA

Jordi Díez
Professor of Political Science, University of Guelph, Canada
MARRIAGE, SAME-SEX, IN LATIN AMERICA
Héctor Domínguez Ruvalcaba
Professor, Department of Spanish and Portuguese, University of Texas at Austin
QUEER IN LATIN AMERICA

Lisa Downing
Professor of French Discourses of Sexuality, University of Birmingham, United Kingdom
DIAGNOSTIC AND STATISTICAL MANUAL OF MENTAL DISORDERS (DSM)

Gregg Drinkwater
PhD candidate, University of Colorado, Boulder
RELIGION AND SAME-SEX BEHAVIORS: JUDAISM

Donna Drucker
Senior Advisor, English as the Language of Instruction, Language Resource Centre, Technische Universität Darmstadt, Germany
KINSEY SCALE

Bruce E. Drushel
Professor, Media and Culture, Department of Media, Journalism, and Film, Miami University, Oxford, OH
HIV/AIDS

Karma Dupchen
LGBT Bhutan, Thimphu, Bhutan
BHUTAN
LHAK-SAM, BHUTAN'S NETWORK FOR HIV-POSITIVE PEOPLE (SIDEBAR)

Vicki Eaklor
Professor of History (retired), Alfred University, Alfred, NY
HUMAN RIGHTS CAMPAIGN

Peter Edelberg
External Lecturer, Saxo Institute, University of Copenhagen, Denmark
THE UGLY LAW (1961–1965; DENMARK)

Franz X. Eder
Professor, Department of Economic and Social History, University of Vienna, Austria
PSYCHOPATHIA SEXUALIS (1886; RICHARD VON KRAFFT-EBING)

Iain Edwards
Independent researcher, South Africa
INXEBA (2017; JOHN TRENGOVE) (SIDEBAR)
Matthew J. Edwards
Associate Professor of Spanish, University of Missouri, Kansas City
EL BESO DE LA MUJER ARAÑA (1976; MANUEL PUIG)

Austin Eklund
PhD candidate, University at Albany, State University of New York
DEFENSE OF MARRIAGE ACT (1996)
SOUTHERN COMFORT CONFERENCE
WALTER MERCADO: QUEER DIGITAL ICON (SIDEBAR)

Richard J. Ellis
Mark O. Hatfield Professor of Politics, Willamette University, Salem, OR SCOUTING

Fatima El-Tayeb
Professor of Literature and Ethnic Studies, University of California, San Diego
STRANGE FRUIT

Lukas Engelmann
Chancellor's Fellow, Science, Technology, and Innovation Studies, University of Edinburgh, Scotland
HIV/AIDS IN EUROPE

Marc Epprecht
Professor, Department of Global Development Studies, Queen's University, Canada
COLONIALISM IN AFRICA SOUTH OF THE SAHARA
ETHIOPIA
GANGS AND STREET KIDS IN AFRICA
HUNGOCHANI (SIDEBAR)
IN VOLUNTARY SERVITUDE AND SAME-SEX SEXUALITY IN AFRICA
NJINGA (R. 1624–1663) (SIDEBAR)

John Nguyet Erni
Fung Hon Chu Endowed Chair of Humanics and Head of the Department of Humanities and Creative Writing, Hong Kong Baptist University
W V. REGISTRAR OF MARRIAGES (2013)

Jorge Estrada
Visiting Assistant Professor, Women's and Gender Studies Department, State University of New York, Oneonta
JOTERÍA STUDIES

Jennifer Evans
Professor, Department of History, Carleton University, Canada
PHOTOGRAPHY IN EUROPE

Christopher Ewing
Assistant Professor, Department of History, Virginia Commonwealth University, Richmond ACT UP IN EUROPE (SIDEBAR)
ANTI-RACIST ACTIVISM IN EUROPE
ARCHIVES IN EUROPE
ATTACKS ON PRIDE DEMONSTRATIONS IN MOSCOW (SIDEBAR)
PRIDE DEMONSTRATIONS IN EUROPE
VON MAHLSDORF, CHARLOTTE (1928–2002)

Nicole Fares
Independent scholar, Alpharetta, GA
COMBAHEE RIVER COLLECTIVE
COMING-OUT/COMING-IN DISCOURSES IN THE MIDDLE EAST

HOMOSEXUAL ACTS IN SHARI’A
HUMAN RIGHTS AND QUEER ARAB REFUGEES
I LUV U BUT (2012–2014; FADIA ABOUOU)
LESBANESE (2008; ALISSAR GAZAL)
TRAVEL/TRAVELOGUES ON THE MIDDLE EAST

Stephen Farrier
Reader in Theatre and Performance, Royal Central School of Speech and Drama, University of London, United Kingdom THEATER, QUEER

David William Foster
Regents’ Professor of Spanish and Women and Gender Studies, Arizona State University, Tempe POETS IN LATIN AMERICA

Timothy Frasca
Research Project Manager, HIV Center for Clinical and Behavioral Studies, New York State Psychiatric Institute and Columbia University
HIV/AIDS IN LATIN AMERICA AND THE CARIBBEAN

Jane Freeland
Teaching Associate, Department of History, University of Sheffield, United Kingdom
COMMUNISM AND QUEERS IN EUROPE
Andrea Friedman
Professor, Departments of History and Women, Gender, and Sexuality Studies, Washington University in St. Louis
LAVENDER SCARE

Elisabeth Jay Friedman
Chair and Professor, Politics Department, University of San Francisco, CA
DIGITAL CULTURES IN LATIN AMERICA

Stuart Frost
Head of Interpretation, British Museum, London, United Kingdom
MUSEUMS AND MEMORIALS

Kaciano Gadelha
Postdoctoral Fellow, Graduate Program in Arts, Federal University of Ceará, Brazil
GRUPO GAY DA BAHIA

Marcia M. Gallo
Associate Professor, Department of History, University of Nevada, Las Vegas
DAUGHTERS OF BILITIS

Flor de María Gamboa Solís
Professor–Investigator, Universidad Michoacana de San Nicolás de Hidalgo, Mexico
LESBIAN MOTHERING AND ADOPTION IN LATIN AMERICA

Germán Garrido
Assistant Professor, Borough of Manhattan Community College, NY
ARGENTINA’S GENDER IDENTITY LAW

Rui Garrido
PhD candidate, ISCTE–University Institute of Lisbon (ISCTE-IUL), Portugal, and Researcher, Center for International Studies, University Institute of Lisbon (CEIIUL), Portugal
MOZAMBIQUE

Claudia Sofía Garriga-López
Assistant Professor of Queer and Trans Latinx Studies, California State University, Chico
TRANSFEMINISM

Johannes Lukas Gartner
Director of Programs, Humanity in Action, Germany
MIGRATION TO EUROPE

Alicia Gaspar de Alba
Professor, Department of Chicana/o Studies, University of California, Los Angeles
SOR JUANA INÉS DE LA CRUZ (1648–1695)

Patrizia Gentile
Associate Professor, Carleton University, Canada
"WE DEMAND" PROTEST (1971)

Dina Georgis
Associate Professor, Women and Gender Studies Institute, University of Toronto, Canada
ANÀ HIYA ANTİ (2000; ELHAM MANSOUR)

Mark Gevisser
Independent scholar, South Africa
REFUGEES AND IMMIGRATION POLICIES

Toorjo Ghose
Associate Professor, School of Social Policy and Practice, University of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia
HIV/AIDS IN SOUTH AND SOUTHEAST ASIA

Geoffrey J. Giles
Emeritus Associate Professor, Department of History, University of Florida, Gainesville
SCANDALS IN EUROPE

Mwangi Githahu
Journalist, South Africa
RAFIKI (2018; WANURI KAHIU) (SIDEBAR)

Richard Godbeer
Director, Humanities Research Center and Professor of History, Virginia Commonwealth University, Richmond
THE SODOMY CASE AGAINST NICHOLAS SENSION (SIDEBAR)

Jonathan Goldberg
Arts and Sciences Distinguished Professor of English Emeritus, Emory University, Atlanta, GA
CONQUEST AND SODOMY IN LATIN AMERICA

María Mercedes Gómez
Assistant Professor, Department of Criminology, Saint Mary’s University, Canada, and Founding Member, Red Latinoamericana de Académicas/os del Derecho (Red Atlas)
HUMAN RIGHTS AND ACTIVISM IN LATIN AMERICA
Billy Gong
PhD candidate, University of Hong Kong, China
QT V. HONG KONG IMMIGRATION DEPARTMENT (2017)

James N. Green
Director, Brazil Initiative and Carlos Manuel de Céspedes Chair of Latin American History, Brown University, Providence, RI
MADAME SATĀ (1900–1976)

Nathaniel Greenberg
Assistant Professor of Arabic, George Mason University, Fairfax, VA
IMARAT YA ‘KUBIAN (2002; ALAA AL-ASWANY)

Sophia Greene
Independent scholar, Indianapolis, IN
SUNIL BABU PANT AND OTHERS V. NEPAL GOVERNMENT (2007)

Craig Griffiths
Lecturer in Modern History, Manchester Metropolitan University, United Kingdom
STONEWALL RIOTS, INTERNATIONAL EFFECTS OF

Lucinda Grinnell
Part-time faculty, Women's and Gender Studies, Montgomery College, Rockville, MD LESBIAN FEMINIST ENCUENTROS OF LATIN AMERICA AND THE CARIBBEAN

Georgina Guzmán
Assistant Professor of English, California State University Channel Islands, Camarillo, CA
GENDERED VIOLENCE AND FEMINICIDE IN LATIN AMERICA

Samar Habib
Research Associate, School of Oriental and African Studies, University of London, United Kingdom
ASWAT
BAREED MISTA3JIL: TRUE STORIES (2009)
NUZHAT AL-ALBĀB FĪMĀ LĀ YUJAD FĪ KITĀB (AḤMAD IBN YŪSUF AL-TIFĀSHĪ)
QUEER NAMES AND IDENTITY POLITICS IN THE ARAB WORLD

Chelsea E. Hall
PhD candidate, Harvard University
TIBET

Jaakko Hämeen-Anttila
Professor of Arabic and Islamic Studies, University of Edinburgh, United Kingdom
GHILMAN
SAME-SEX RELATIONS IN ARABIC VERSIONS OF THE NIGHTS (SIDEBAR)

Hanan Hammad
Associate Professor and Director of Middle East Studies, Texas Christian University, Fort Worth
SHARAF (1997; SUN'ALLAH IBRAHIM)

Kifah Hanna
Associate Professor of Language and Culture Studies, Trinity College, Hartford, CT
BAYRŪT '75 (1975; GHĀDA AL-SAMMĀN)
HAJAR AL-DAHIK (1990; HODA BARAKAT)

Stan Hawkins
Professor in Popular Musicology, University of Oslo, Norway
POPULAR MUSIC AND QUEER IDENTITIES

Dan Healey
Professor of Modern Russian History and Director, Russian and East European Studies Centre, University of Oxford, United Kingdom
RUSSIAN GAY PROPAGANDA LAW

Kadin Henningsen
PhD candidate, University of Illinois
CISGENDER OR CIS

Dag Henrichsen
Department of History, University of Basel, Switzerland
NAMIBIA

Rainer Herrn
Lecturer and Researcher, Institute for the History of Medicine and Ethics in Medicine, Berlin University Hospital Charité, Germany, and Associate, Magnus Hirschfeld Society, Germany
ELBE, LILI (1882–1931)
TRANSVESTITES/TRANSSEXUALS

Neville Hoad
Associate Professor of English, University of Texas at Austin
THE QUIET VIOLENCE OF DREAMS (2001; K. SELLO DUIKER) (SIDEBAR)

Emily K. Hobson
Assistant Professor of History and Gender, Race, and Identity, University of Nevada, Reno

CENTRAL AMERICAN SOLIDARITY MOVEMENT
THE NICARAGUAN REVOLUTION
VICTORIA MERCADO BRIGADE (SIDEBAR)

Jacqueline Holler
Associate Professor, Department of History/Women's and Gender Studies Programs, University of Northern British Columbia, Canada
INQUISITION, CRIMINAL COURTS, AND SEXUALITY IN COLONIAL LATIN AMERICA

Michael J. Horswell
Professor of Spanish and Latin American Literature, Florida Atlantic University, Boca Raton
THIRD GENDERS

Adnan Hossain
Research Fellow in Social and Cultural Anthropology, VU University Amsterdam, Netherlands, and Affiliated Researcher, Amsterdam Research Centre for Gender and Sexuality, University of Amsterdam, Netherlands
ROOPBAAN
HIJRAS IN BANGLADESH (SIDEBAR)

Ingrid Hotz-Davies
Professor for English Literature and Gender Studies, University of Tübingen, Germany CAMP

Amory H. W. Hui
Independent scholar, Hong Kong
TONGZHI

Candy Hurtado
PhD candidate, Florida Atlantic University, Boca Raton
CONFESSIONAL MANUALS IN COLONIAL LATIN AMERICA

William Maynard Hutchins
Department of Philosophy and Religion, Appalachian State University, Boone, NC
AL-DIZIL (1994; THANI AL-SUWAID) MUFĀKHIRAT AL-JAWĀRĪ WA-AL-GHILMĀN (AL-JĀḤIZ)

Jan Simon Hutta
Assistant Professor, Institute of Geography, University of Bayreuth, Germany
PARADA DO ORGULHO LGBT DE SÃO PAULO, BRAZIL
Z'étoile Imma
Assistant Professor, English and Africana Studies, Tulane University, New Orleans, LA
BEV DITSIE (1971–) (SIDEBAR)
NKOLI, SIMON (1957–1998)

Robert MCKee Irwin
Professor of Spanish, University of California, Davis
EL BAILE DE LOS 41

Sureshi M. Jayawardene
Assistant Professor, Department of Africana Studies, San Diego State University, San Diego, CA
KUCHU (SIDEBAR)
LANGUAGE IN AFRICA

Régine Michelle Jean-Charles
Associate Professor of French, Boston College, Boston, MA
LITERATURE, CARIBBEAN (FRANCOPHONE)

Hoching Jiang
PhD candidate, American University, Washington, DC
MARRIAGE, SAME-SEX, IN TAIWAN

Adrian Jjuuko
Executive Director, Human Rights Awareness and Promotion Forum (HRAPF)–Kampala, Uganda, and LLD Candidate, Centre For Human Rights, University of Pretoria
KABAKA MWANGA (1866–1901) (SIDEBAR)
UGANDA

Tiffany Fawn Jones
Professor of African History, California State University, San Bernardino
ETHNOPSYCHIATRY

Rebecca Joubin
Associate Professor, Arab Studies, Davidson College, Davidson, NC
ZUQAQ AL-MIDAQ (1947; NAGUIB MAHFOUZ)

George H. Junne Jr.
Professor, Africana Studies Program, University of Northern Colorado, Greeley
EUNUCHS

Cristel M. Jusino Díaz
Assistant Director of Student Affairs, Graduate School of Arts and Science, New York University
JESUSA RODRÍGUEZ (1955–) (SIDEBAR)
PUERTO RICANS IN THE DIASPORA

J. Miguel Kanai
Lecturer in Human Geography, University of Sheffield, United Kingdom
URBAN QUEERNESS

Melinda D. Kane
Associate Professor, Department of Sociology, East Carolina University, Greenville, NC
SODOMY LAWS IN THE UNITED STATES

Dredge Byung’chu Kang
Faculty, Department of Anthropology, University of California, San Diego
ASIA PACIFIC TRANSGENDER NETWORK
KATHOYE
THAI K-POP

Shuchi Karim
Researcher, Gender and Diversity Centre, Radboud University, Netherlands
SEX TOURISM IN ASIA

Richard A. Kaye
Associate Professor, Hunter College, The City University of New York
AESTHETICISM AND DECADENCE, NINETEENTH-CENTURY

Séagh Kehoe
PhD candidate, University of Nottingham, United Kingdom TIBET

Amanda Kennedy
Assistant Professor, Department of Criminal Justice and Sociology, Curry College, Milton, MA
PENIS

Faris A. Khan
Assistant Professor, Department of Anthropology, State University of New York, Potsdam
PAKISTAN, “QUEER”

Kareem Khubchandani
Assistant Professor, Department of Drama and Dance and the Program in Women’s, Gender, and Sexuality Studies, Tufts University, Medford, MA
ASIFA LAHORE (SIDEBAR)
DRAG, ASIAN

Irvin Kinnes
Research Associate, Centre of Criminology, University of Cape Town, South Africa
GANGS AND STREET KIDS IN AFRICA

Gary Kinsman
Professor Emeritus of Sociology, Laurentian University, Canada
CANADIAN CRIMINAL CODE REFORM (1969)

Guillain Koko
Human rights lawyer and social justice activist, Safe Space for LGBTI refugees program at Church World Service (CWS), South Africa
REFUGEES AND ASYLUM IN AFRICA

Alexander Kondakov
Postdoctoral researcher, Aleksanteri Institute, University of Helsinki, Finland
CHECHNYA, DETENTION CAMPS IN

Mzilikazi Koné
Lecturer, University of California, Riverside
SEX TOURISM IN LATIN AMERICA AND THE CARIBBEAN

Travis S. K. Kong
Associate Professor, Department of Sociology, University of Hong Kong
TONGZHI

Alireza Korangy
President, Societas Philologica Persica, New York, NY
SEX REASSIGNMENT SURGERY IN IRAN

Sophia Koutsoyannis
Teacher, Marianopolis College, Canada
SLAVERY AND SODOMY IN BRAZIL

Kel Kroehle
PhD candidate, University of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia
HIV/AIDS IN SOUTH AND SOUTHEAST ASIA

Roman Kuhar
Professor, Department of Sociology, University of Ljubljana, Slovenia
ANTI-GENDER MOVEMENT IN EUROPE
METELKOVA MESTO (SLOVENIA)
Rushaan Kumar
Assistant Professor of Feminist and Gender Studies, Colorado College, Colorado Springs
ATHLETES, TRANS AND INTERSEX, IN ASIA
PINKI PRAMANIK (1986–) (SIDEBAR)

David Kuria Mbote
Independent researcher, Nairobi, Kenya
KENYA

Anita Kurimay
Assistant Professor of History, Bryn Mawr College, Bryn Mawr, PA
EGYMÁSRA NÉZVE (1982; KÁROLY MAKK)

James Kwateng-Yeboah
PhD candidate, Queen’s University, Canada
FRANTZ FANON (1925–1961) (SIDEBAR)

Lawrence La Fountain-Stokes
Associate Professor of American Culture and Romance Languages and Literatures, University of Michigan, Ann Arbor
LANGUAGE IN LATIN AMERICA

Sky H. L. Lau
Demonstrator, Department of Sociology, University of Hong Kong
TONGZHI

David D. Leitao
Professor and Chair, Classics Department, San Francisco State University, CA
SACRED BAND OF THEBES

Uli Lenart
Bookseller, Gay’s the Word Bookshop, United Kingdom
GAY’S THE WORD BOOKSHOP (SIDEBAR)

Kirsten Leng
Assistant Professor, Women, Gender, Sexuality Studies, University of Massachusetts Amherst
RÜLING, ANNA (1880–1953)

Brian Lewis
Professor of History, McGill University, Canada
OFFENCES AGAINST THE PERSON ACT (1861)
THE ORDER OF CHAERONEA
THE WOLFENDEN REPORT

Eva Cheuk-Yin Li
Graduate teaching assistant, King’s College London, United Kingdom

ZHONGXING PHENOMENON

Xavier Livermon
Assistant Professor, African and African Diaspora Studies Department, The University of Texas at Austin

ARCHIVES IN AFRICA

Meghan Lundrigan
PhD candidate, Carleton University, Canada

AIDS MEMORIAL QUILT—THE NAMES PROJECT
BARBIN, HERCULINE (1838–1868)

J. Daniel Luther
PhD candidate, School of Languages, Cultures and Linguistics, SOAS University of London, United Kingdom

DISSIDENCE IN SINGAPORE
HONG LIM PARK: A CENTER OF LGBT DISSIDENCE (SIDEBAR)

Frida Lyonga
PhD Fellow, University of Basel, Switzerland

CAMEROON

Mehammed Amadeus Mack
Assistant Professor of French Studies, Smith College, Northampton, MA

HOMONATIONALISM IN AFRICA
MAGHREB
SEX WORK/SEX TOURISM/SEX TRAFFICKING IN AFRICA
TANGIER (SIDEBAR)

Vera Mackie
Senior Professor of Asian Studies, University of Wollongong, Australia

MILITARISM AND SEXUALITIES IN THE ASIA-PACIFIC REGION

Yesenia Madrigal García
Psychologist, Universidad Michoacana de San Nicolás de Hidalgo, Mexico

LESBIAN MOTHERING AND ADOPTION IN LATIN AMERICA

Leida (LK) Mae
Graduate Teaching Assistant, Women, Gender and Sexuality Studies, University of Oregon
BDSM (BONDAGE AND DISCIPLINE, DOMINANCE AND SUBMISSION, SADISM AND MASOCHISM)

Miral Mahgoub al-Tahawy
Associate Professor of Modern Arabic Literature, School of International Letters and Cultures, Arizona State University, Tempe
HENA MAYSARA (2007; KHALED YOUSSEF)

Nadeem Mahomed
Postdoctoral Fellow, University of Cape Town, South Africa
RELIGION AND SAME-SEX BEHAVIORS: ISLAM

Hilary Malatino
Assistant Professor, Department of Women’s, Gender, and Sexuality Studies and Philosophy, Pennsylvania State University
INTERSEX IDENTITIES

Martin F. Manalansan IV
Associate Professor of Anthropology and Asian American Studies, University of Illinois, Urbana-Champaign
MIGRANT QUEER COMMUNITIES, US

Kevin Markwell
Professor, School of Business and Tourism, Southern Cross University, Australia
GAY EUROPEAN TOURISM ASSOCIATION

Zethu Matebeni
Senior Researcher, Institute for Humanities in Africa, University of Cape Town, South Africa
CAPE TOWN
QUEER THEORY, AFRICAN

Pauline Mateveke
Lecturer, University of Zimbabwe
ZIMBABWE

Mark Mathuray
Senior Lecturer, Royal Holloway, University of London, United Kingdom LITERATURE, AFRICAN (ANGLOPHONE)

Steven Maynard
Assistant Professor, Department of History, Queen’s University, Canada
FOUCAULT, INFLUENCE OF Mandisa Mbali
Senior Lecturer, Department of Historical Studies, University of Cape Town, South Africa
HIV/AIDS IN AFRICA
ZACKIE ACHMAT AND THE TREATMENT ACTION CAMPAIGN (SIDEBAR)

Aminata Cécile Mbaye
Assistant Professor, Department of Romance Literatures and Comparative Studies, University of Bayreuth, Germany
KARMEN GEÏ (2001; JOSEPH GAÏ RAMAKA) (SIDEBAR)
SENEGAL

Babacar M'baye
Associate Professor of Pan-African Literature and Culture, Kent State University, Kent, OH
BENGA, FRANÇOIS “FÉRAL” (1906–1957)

John McAllister
Senior Lecturer (retired), Department of English, University of Botswana
BOTSWANA

Sam McBean
Senior Lecturer in Gender, Sexuality, and Contemporary Culture, Queen Mary University of London, United Kingdom
ORGASM AND ORGASMOLOGY

Shaka McGlotten
Associate Professor of Media Studies, Purchase College, State University of New York
PHONE APPS

Dominic McGoldrick
Professor of International Human Rights Law, University of Nottingham, United Kingdom
HUMAN RIGHTS

Jodie Medd
Associate Professor, Department of English Language and Literature, Carleton University, Canada
THE WELL OF LONELINESS (1928; RADCLYFFE HALL)

Mariela Méndez
Associate Professor, Latin American, Latino, and Iberian Studies, and Women, Gender, and Sexuality Studies, University of Richmond, Richmond, VA
EL TEJE (SIDEBAR)

Thérèse Migraine-George
Professor of Romance Languages and Literatures and Women's, Gender, and Sexuality Studies, University of Cincinnati

WOUBI CHÉRI (1998; PHILIP BROOKS, LAURENT BOCAHUT) (SIDEBAR)

Francisco Miguel
Master, Department of Social Anthropology, Universidade de Brasília, Brazil
CABO VERDE

Florian G. Mildenberger
Professor, Institute for the History of Medicine, Robert Bosch Foundation, Germany
MEDICINE, COMPLEMENTARY AND ALTERNATIVE

Alfredo Mirandé
Distinguished Professor of Sociology and Ethnic Studies, University of California, Riverside
MUXES

Gregory Mitchell
Associate Professor, Program in Women's, Gender, and Sexuality Studies, Williams College, Williamstown, MA
CABARET THEATER IN LATIN AMERICA AND THE CARIBBEAN
CRUISING AND CRUISING GROUNDS
SPORTS AND SEXUALITY IN LATIN AMERICA

Navaneetha Mokkil
Assistant Professor, Center for Women's Studies, Jawaharlal Nehru University, India
PORNOGRAPHY IN ASIA
A QUEER READING OF THE CHINESE SOFT-CORE FILM SEX AND ZEN II (1996) (SIDEBAR)
LEZHIN: SOUTH KOREAN WEBTOONS FOR MATURE AUDIENCES (SIDEBAR)

Alison M. Moore
Senior Lecturer in Modern European History, Western Sydney University, Australia
HISTORICAL SEXES

Melina Alice Moore
PhD candidate, Graduate Center, City University of New York
QUEER THEORISTS

Bonnie J. Morris
Lecturer, Department of History, University of California, Berkeley
BOOKSTORES
THE LESBIAN MUSIC MOVEMENT

Thabo Msibi
Associate Professor, Curriculum and Education Studies, University of KwaZulu-Natal, South Africa
SOUTH AFRICA

Alan Msosa
Research Affiliate, Centre on Law and Social Transformation, University of Bergen, Norway
INTERNET IN AFRICA
MOST-AT-RISK POPULATIONS (MARPS) (SIDEBAR)

Stephen O. Murray
El Instituto Obregón, San Francisco, CA
E. E. EVANS-PRITCHARD (1902–1973) (SIDEBAR)

Kati Mustola
Researcher, University of Helsinki, Finland
TOM OF FINLAND (1920–1991)

Robert Myers
Professor, Department of English, American University of Beirut, New York, NY
TUQUS AL-ISHARAT WA-AL-TAHAWWULAT (1994; SA’DALLAH WANNOUS)

Subhi Nahas
Founder, Spectra Project
SPECTRA PROJECT

Catherine Jean Nash
Professor of Geography, Brock University, Canada
THE BODY POLITIC

Shad Naved
Assistant Professor, School of Letters, Ambedkar University Delhi, India
TRANSGENDER MUSLIMS

Sibongile Ndashe
Executive Director, Initiative for Strategic Litigation in Africa, South Africa
AFRICAN COMMISSION ON HUMAN AND PEOPLES’ RIGHTS

Basile Ndjio
Associate Professor of Anthropology, University of Douala, Cameroon
WITCHCRAFT/OCCULT IN AFRICA

Hassan J. Ndzovu
Senior Lecturer in Religious Studies, Moi University, Kenya
ISLAM IN AFRICA SOUTH OF THE SAHARA

W. Jake Newsome
Jack, Joseph and Morton Mandel Center for Advanced Holocaust Studies, United States Holocaust Memorial Museum
PINK TRIANGLE

Juliana Makuchi Nfah-Abbenyi
Distinguished Professor, Department of English, North Carolina State University, Raleigh
FEMME NUE, FEMME NOIRE (2003; CALIXTHE BEYALA) (SIDEBAR)

Rictor Norton
Independent scholar, London, United Kingdom
MOLLY HOUSES

Alexandra Novitskaya
PhD candidate, Stony Brook University, Stony Brook, NY
ANTISODOMY AND BUGGERY TRIALS
OTAKU SEXUALITIES IN JAPAN

Ofer Nordheimer Nur
Teaching Fellow, Department of General and Interdisciplinary Studies and the Gender and Women's Studies Program, Tel Aviv University, Israel
ANTI-SEMITISM IN EUROPE

S. N. Nyeck
Senior Research Fellow, Canterbury Christ Church University, United Kingdom, and Research Fellow, University of Amsterdam, Netherlands
NEOLIBERALISM IN AFRICA

Jorge Olivares
Allen Family Professor of Latin American Literature, Colby College, Waterville, ME
ANTES QUE ANOCHEZCA (1992; REINALDO ARENAS)

Anthony Oluoch
Programme Manager, Pan Africa ILGA
ACTIVISM IN AFRICA SOUTH OF THE SAHARA

Taiwo Adetunji Osinubi
Associate Professor of African Literatures, Department of English and Writing Studies, University of Western Ontario, Canada
CINEMA, AFRICAN (ANGLOPHONE)
LE DEVOIR DE VIOLENCE (1968; YAMBO OULOGUEM) (SIDEBAR)
NOLLYWOOD (SIDEBAR)
ONE DAY I WILL WRITE ABOUT THIS PLACE (2011; BINYAVANGA WAINAINA) (SIDEBAR)

Seth Palmer
Predoctoral Fellow, Carter G. Woodson Institute, University of Virginia, Charlottesville
RITUALS AND SAME-SEX AND TRANS EXPERIENCE

Shivaji K. Panikkar
Professor, School of Culture and Creative Expressions, Bharat Ratna Dr B.R. Ambedkar University, Delhi, India
THE ART OF IDENTITY IN INDIA

Dimitris Papanikolaou
Associate Professor in Modern Greek, University of Oxford, United Kingdom
CAVAFY, C. P. (1863–1933)

Sarah Parker
Lecturer in English, Loughborough University, United Kingdom
SAPPHO, NINETEENTH-CENTURY REDISCOVERY OF

Alpesh Kantilal Patel
Associate Professor, Contemporary Art and Theory, Florida International University, Miami
THE ART OF QUEERING ASIAN MYTHOLOGY

Geeta Patel
Associate Professor, Middle Eastern and South Asian Languages and Cultures and Women, Gender, and Sexuality, University of Virginia, Charlottesville
FIRE (1996; DEEPA MEHTA)

David Paternotte
Senior Lecturer in Sociology, Université libre de Bruxelles, Belgium
ANTI-GENDER MOVEMENT IN EUROPE

Kent W. Peacock
PhD candidate, Florida State University, Tallahassee
RURAL QUEER COMMUNITIES, US

Yaron Peleg
Kennedy Leigh Reader in Modern Hebrew Studies, University of Cambridge, United Kingdom
ANTI-SEMITISM AND ZIONISM

Lee M. Penyak
Professor Emeritus, University of Scranton, PA, and Director of Study Abroad, Diether H. Haenicke Institute for Global Education, Western Michigan University, Kalamazoo
SINS AGAINST NATURE IN COLONIAL LATIN AMERICA

Massimo Perinelli
Assistant Professor Emeritus, Historical Institute, Department of North American History, University of Cologne, Germany
QUEER THEMES IN ITALIAN NEOREALIST CINEMA

Michael F. Pettinger
Adjunct Instructor, New York University
RELIGION AND SAME-SEX BEHAVIORS: CHRISTIANITY

Svanur Pétursson
Adjunct Lecturer, Rutgers University, Newark, NJ
SEXUAL REVOLUTION IN EUROPE

Lindsay Parks Pieper
Assistant Professor of Sport Management, University of Lynchburg, Lynchburg, VA ATHLETES, TRANS AND INTERSEX

Joseph M. Pierce
Assistant Professor, Department of Hispanic Languages and Literature, Stony Brook University, Stony Brook, NY
FIN DE SIÈCLE SEXUALITY
INVERTIDO AND PEDERASTA (SIDEBAR)

Mariano Ben Plotkin
Senior Researcher, Centro de Investigaciones Sociales (CIS, CONICETIDES), Argentina, and Professor of History, Universidad Nacional de Tres de Febrero, Argentina
PSYCHOANALYSIS IN ARGENTINA

Ralph J. Poole
Professor, Department of English and American Studies, University of Salzburg, Austria
EUROVISION SONG CONTEST
TURKISH BATHS

Antonio Prieto-Stambaugh
Professor, Department of Theater, Universidad Veracruzana, Mexico
PERFORMANCE ARTISTS IN LATIN AMERICA

Ela Przybylo
Ruth Wynn Woodward Postdoctoral Fellow, Gender, Sexuality, and Women's Studies, Simon Fraser University, Canada
ASEXUALITY

Caroline Radesky
PhD candidate, University of Iowa
HARLEM RENAISSANCE

George Baylon Radics
Lecturer, Department of Sociology, National University of Singapore
HUMAN RIGHTS IN ASIA

Kumud Rana
PhD candidate, University of Glasgow, United Kingdom
SEXOLOGY IN ASIA

David Rayside
Professor Emeritus of Political Science and Sexual Diversity Studies, University of Toronto, Canada
PARENTING RIGHTS IN NORTH AMERICA

Gayatri Reddy
Associate Professor, Gender and Women’s Studies, Anthropology, and Global Asian Studies, University of Illinois, Chicago
HIJRAS

Peter Rehberg
Affiliated Fellow, ICI Berlin—Institute for Cultural Inquiry
BUTT MAGAZINE

Ragan Rhyne
Independent scholar, Brooklyn, NY
BFI FLARE: LONDON’S FIRST LGBTQ FILM FESTIVAL (SIDEBAR)
FILM FESTIVALS
FRAMELINE: THE WORLD’S FIRST LGBTQ FILM FESTIVAL (SIDEBAR)

Niall Richardson
Senior Lecturer, Media and Film, School of Media, Film and Music, University of Sussex, United Kingdom
MÄDCHEN IN UNIFORM (1931; LEONTINE SAGAN)

Noah Riseman
Associate Professor in History, Australian Catholic University, Australia
VIETNAM WAR, LGBTQ+ VETERANS
Greg Robinson
Professor of History, University of Quebec, Montreal, Canada
Wilde Trials, International Significance of

Leticia Robles-Moreno
Visiting Assistant Professor, Department of Theatre and Dance, Muhlenberg College, Allentown, PA
Hemispheric Institute Digital Video Library

Juana Marí Rodríguez
Professor, Department of Ethnic Studies, University of California, Berkeley
Tatiana de la Tierra (1961–2012)

Sarah B. Rodriguez
Senior Lecturer, Global Health Studies Program, and Lecturer, Department of Medical Education, Northwestern University, Evanston, IL
Clitoris

Danielle Roper
Provost’s Postdoctoral Scholar, Department of Romance Languages and Literatures, University of Chicago
Jamaica Forum for Lesbians, All-Sexuals and Gays (JFLAG)
Museo Travesti del Perú

Katrina C. Rose
Independent scholar, Moline, IL
Compton’s Cafeteria Riot (1966)
Darnell V. Lloyd (1975)

Farhang Rouhani
Professor of Geography, University of Mary Washington, Fredericksburg, VA
Diasporas, Queer

Everett K. Rowson
Professor, Middle Eastern and Islamic Studies, New York University Mukhannath

Dan Royles
Assistant Professor of History, Florida International University, Miami
HIV/AIDS in the United States

Ana Lúcia Sá
Assistant Professor, Department of Political Science and Public Policy (ESPP), Center for International Studies, University Institute of Lisbon (CEI-IUL), Portugal

MOZAMBIQUE

Hanadi Al-Samman
Associate Professor of Arabic Language and Literature, University of Virginia, Charlottesville
ISIS GAY TRIALS
PASOLINI'S CINEMATIC ADAPTATION OF A THOUSAND AND ONE NIGHTS

Jordan Sanderson
Department of Sociology and Anthropology, Susquehanna University, Selinsgrove, PA
LAMBDA LEGAL DEFENSE AND EDUCATION FUND

Johanna M. Schmidt
Senior Lecturer, University of Waikato, New Zealand
SAMOAN FA’AFĀFINE

Paul A. Schroeder Rodríguez
Professor of Spanish, Amherst College, Amherst, MA
FRESA Y CHOCOLATE (1993; TOMÁS GUTIÉRREZ ALEA AND JUAN CARLOS TABÍO) (SIDEBAR)

Tammy S. Schultz
Professor of Strategic Studies, US Marine Corps War College, Quantico, VA
MILITARY LAW AND POLICY IN THE UNITED STATES

Katherine Schweighofer
Visiting Assistant Professor of Women's, Gender and Sexuality Studies, Dickinson College, Carlisle, PA
LESBIAN LANDS, WOMEN’S LANDS, AND SEPARATIST COMMUNES

Ali-Asghar Seyed-Gohrab
Associate Professor, University of Leiden, Netherlands
SUFI TREATMENT OF SAME-SEX RELATIONS IN POETRY AND PROSE

Svati P. Shah
Associate Professor, Women's, Gender and Sexuality Studies, University of Massachusetts Amherst, and Research Associate, African Centre for Migration and Society, University of Witwatersrand
SEX WORK IN ASIA

Nishant Shahani
Associate Professor, Women's, Gender, and Sexuality Studies Program, Department of English, Washington State University, Pullman
SECTION 377 IN SOUTH ASIA

Jocelyn Sharlet
Associate Professor of Comparative Literature, University of California, Davis
HOMOEROTIC POETRY OF ABŪ NUWĀS

Yaron Shemer
Associate Professor of Israel Cultural Studies, Department of Asian Studies, University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill
EINAYIM PRUHOT (2009; HAIM TABAKMAN)

M.W. Shores
University of Colorado, Boulder
MISHIMA, YUKIO (1925–1970)

Pete Sigal
Professor, Department of History, Duke University, Durham, NC
ETHNOPORNORAPHY
FLORENTINE CODEX AND NAHAU SEXUALITY

Kemal Silay
Professor, School of Global and International Studies, Indiana University, Bloomington
LITERARY DISCOURSES IN THE OTTOMAN MIDDLE EAST (1500–1900)

Joseli Maria Silva
Professor of Human Geography, State University of Ponta Grossa, Brazil
GRUPO GAY DA BAHIA

Pawan Singh
New Generation Network Scholar, Contemporary History, Deakin University and the Australia India Institute, University of Melbourne, Australia
THE HUMSAFAR TRUST: INDIA’S OLDEST LGBT ORGANIZATION (SIDEBAR)
NAZ FOUNDATION INTERNATIONAL

Nadine Sinno
Assistant Professor of Arabic, Department of Foreign Languages and Literatures, Virginia Tech University, Blacksburg
‘AWDAT AL-ALMANI ILĀ RUSHDIH (2006; RASHID AL-DAIF)
JANNĀT WA-IBLĪS (1992; NAWAL EL SAADAWI)
MISK AL-GHAZAL (1988; HANAN AL-SHAYKH)

Emily Skidmore
Associate Professor, Department of History, Texas Tech University, Lubbock
FEMALE HUSBAND

Brice D. Smith
Independent scholar, Wauwatosa, WI
LOU SULLIVAN (1951–1991) (SIDEBAR)

Nadine Smith
Executive Director, Equality Florida, Saint Petersburg
MARCHES ON WASHINGTON

Michael Smyth
Associate Professor in Sociology, Susquehanna University, Selinsgrove, PA
HATE CRIME LAW AND POLICY IN THE UNITED STATES
LAMBDA LEGAL DEFENSE AND EDUCATION FUND

Che Sokol
PhD candidate, University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill
AL-AKHARUN (2006; SEBA AL-HERZ)

Mariela Solana
Assistant Professor of Cultural Practices, Institute of Initial Studies, Universidad Nacional
Arturo Jauretche, Argentina
PORNOTERRORISMO AND POST-PORN

Antu Sorainen
Researcher, University of Helsinki, Finland
GENTRIFICATION IN EUROPE
KINSHIP IN EUROPE
QUEER DOMESTICITY IN EUROPE

Michael Stambolis-Ruhstorfer
Assistant Professor, American and Gender Studies, University of Bordeaux Montaigne, France
ADOPTION AND SURROGACY IN EUROPE
ADOPTION, FOSTERING, AND SURROGACY (INTERNATIONAL)
MARRIAGE, UNIVERSAL, IN EUROPE
PACTE CIVIL DE SOLIDARITÉ (PACS) (SIDEBAR)

Jo Stanley
Honorary Research Fellow, Maritime Historical Studies Centre, University of Hull, United Kingdom
LANGUAGE IN EUROPE
MERCHANT NAVY (SIDEBAR)
MILITARY/NAVY IN THE UNITED KINGDOM

Charles St-Georges
Assistant Professor of Spanish, Denison University, Granville, OH
CINEMA, LATIN AMERICAN (EARLY TWENTIETH CENTURY)

Samhita Sunya
Assistant Professor of Cinema, Department of Middle Eastern & South Asian Languages & Cultures, University of Virginia
THE BUBBLE (2006; EYTAN FOX)

Amanda Lock Swarr
Associate Professor, Department of Gender, Women and Sexuality Studies, University of Washington, Seattle
CASTER SEMENYA (1991–) (SIDEBAR)

Getnet Tadele
Professor, Department of Sociology, Addis Ababa University, Ethiopia
ETHIOPIA

Steph Tai
Associate Professor, University of Wisconsin Law School, Madison
DARNELL V. LLOYD (1975)

Michael Thomas Taylor
Independent scholar, Berlin, Germany
TRANSVESTITES/TRANSEXUALS

Alexie Tcheuyap
Professor and Chair, Department of French, University of Toronto, Canada
CINEMA, AFRICAN (FRANCOPHONE)

David Tenorio
Assistant Professor of Spanish, University of Pittsburgh, PA
THE CUBAN REVOLUTION AND HOMOSEXUALITY
SEXILIO AND MIGRATION (SIDEBAR)

Liesl Theron
Cofounder, Gender DynamiX, South Africa
TRANS ISSUES IN AFRICA

Kate Thomas
Chair and Professor of English, Bryn Mawr College, Bryn Mawr, PA
BOSTON MARRIAGE AND WOMEN’S ROMANTIC FRIENDSHIPS

Annette F. Timm
Associate Professor, Department of History, University of Calgary, Canada
ELBE, LILI (1882–1931)

Robert Deam Tobin
Professor, Language, Literature, and Culture, Clark University, Worcester, MA
CLASSICAL STUDIES

Amy Tooth Murphy
Lecturer in Oral History, Department of History, Royal Holloway, University of London, United Kingdom
PULP FICTION, GAY AND LESBIAN

Zeb Tortorici
Associate Professor, Department of Spanish and Portuguese Languages and Literatures, New York University
CONFESSIONAL MANUALS IN COLONIAL LATIN AMERICA
SINS AGAINST NATURE IN COLONIAL LATIN AMERICA

Otgonbaatar Tsedendemberel
Former executive director, LGBT Centre, Mongolia
MONGOLIA

Andrew D. Turner
Postdoctoral Associate in the Art of the Ancient Americas, Department of Ancient Art, Yale University Art Gallery, New Haven, CT
MOCHE POTTERY

Keja L. Valens
Professor of English, Salem State University, Salem, MA
TRAVESTI AND TRANS ACTIVISM IN LATIN AMERICA AND THE CARIBBEAN

Geraldine Van Bueren
Professor of International Human Rights Law, Queen Mary University of London; Barrister (Middle Temple); Queen’s Counsel (Honoris Causa), and Visiting Fellow, Kellogg College, Oxford
THE EUROPEAN PARLIAMENT (SIDEBAR)
THE HOLOCAUST AND LGBT VICTIMS (SIDEBAR)
HUMAN RIGHTS IN EUROPE
Adriaan van Klinken
Associate Professor of Religion and African Studies, School of Philosophy, Religion, and History of Science, University of Leeds, United Kingdom
CHRISTIANITY IN AFRICA: LGBT FRIENDLY
DESMOND TUTU (1931–) (SIDEBAR)

Sherry Velasco
Professor of Spanish and Gender Studies, Department of Latin American and Iberian Cultures, Department of Gender and Sexuality Studies, University of Southern California, Los Angeles
ERAUSO, CATALINA DE (1592–1650)

Vinodh Venkatesh
Associate Professor, Foreign Languages and Literatures, Virginia Tech University, Blacksburg
CINEMA, LATIN AMERICAN (LATE TWENTIETH AND TWENTY-FIRST CENTURIES)

Giovanni Vitiello
Professor of Chinese Language and Literature, Department of Asian, African, and Mediterranean Studies, University of Naples “L'Orientale,” Italy
PINHUA BAOJIAN (1849; CHEN SEN)

Hermann W. von Hesse
PhD candidate, University of Wisconsin–Madison
GENDER, FLEXIBLE SYSTEMS, IN AFRICA

Oskaras Vorobjovas-Pinta
Lecturer, University of Tasmania, Australia
HOUSEBOYS AT RESORTS (SIDEBAR)
RESORTS

Heather Vrana
Assistant Professor, Department of History, University of Florida, Gainesville
EL VAMPIRO DE LA COLONIA ROMA (1979; LUIS ZAPATA)

Andrew Wackerfuss
Adjunct Professor, Georgetown University, Washington, DC
FEDERICO GARCÍA LORCA AND THE SPANISH CIVIL WAR (SIDEBAR)
NATIONALISM AND SEXUALITY IN EUROPE

Anna E. Ward
Independent scholar, Sacramento, CA
SEXPERTS AND SEX EDUCATION IN THE WEST
Kevin Ward
Associate Professor in African Religious Studies, University of Leeds, United Kingdom
CHRISTIANITY IN AFRICA: ANGLICAN

Max Weiss
Associate Professor of History and Near Eastern Studies, Princeton University, Princeton, NJ
HALAT SHAGHAF (1998; NIHAD SIREES)

James Welker
Associate Professor, Department of Cross-Cultural Studies, Kanagawa University, Japan
BOYS LOVE (YAOI) MANGA

Clayton J. Whisnant
Professor, Department of History, Wofford College, Spartanburg, SC
BARS AND CABARETS IN EUROPE
ELDORADO (SIDEBAR)
FRIENDSHIP SOCIETIES IN EUROPE

Lauran Whitworth
Visiting Assistant Professor, Women, Gender, and Sexuality Studies, St. Mary's College of Maryland, St. Mary's City
ECOLOGY AND ENVIRONMENTAL ISSUES AND ACTIVISM

Saskia E. Wieringa
Professor of Gender and Women's Same-Sex Relations, Amsterdam Institute for Social Science Research, University of Amsterdam, Netherlands
MARRIAGE, WOMAN-WOMAN, IN AFRICA

Graham Willett
Honorary Fellow, School of Historical and Philosophical Studies, University of Melbourne, Australia
ARCHIVES IN AUSTRALIA AND NEW ZEALAND
AUSTRALIA AND NEW ZEALAND

Di Wu
PhD candidate, University of Warwick, United Kingdom
WILDE IN SINOPHONE CULTURE

Farren Yero
PhD candidate, Duke University, Durham, NC
JUANA AGUILAR: HERMAPHRODITISM AND COLONIAL COURTS (SIDEBAR)
Yang Yu
PhD candidate, Temple University, Philadelphia, PA
TRANSGENDER ORGANIZATIONS IN MAINLAND CHINA, HONG KONG, AND TAIWAN

Lindsay Zafir
Department of History, Yale University
ACT UP

Tarek Zeidan
Helem activist, Harvard University
HELEM

Yi Zhang
Assistant Professor, Department of Gender and Women’s Studies, University of Kentucky, Lexington
FAMILY LAW IN ASIA

Jamie J. Zhao
PhD candidate, University of Warwick, United Kingdom
NEW MEDIA IN ASIA

Jun Zubillaga-Pow
Faculty Fellow, Humanities, Arts, and Social Sciences, Singapore University of Technology and Design
PEOPLE LIKE US (PLU)

Eileen Zurbriggen
Professor, Psychology Department, University of California, Santa Cruz
BIOLOGICAL ESSENTIALISM
Thematic Outline

This outline provides a general overview of the conceptual structure of the Global Encyclopedia of Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, Transgender, and Queer (LGBTQ) History. The outline is organized under twenty-one major categories, which are further split into eleven subcategories. The entries are listed alphabetically within each category or subcategory. For ease of reference, the same entry may be listed under multiple categories.

ARCHIVES

Archives in Africa

Archives in Asia

Archives in Australia and New Zealand

Archives in Europe

Archives in Latin America

Archives in North America

Hemispheric Institute Digital Video Library

Lesbian Herstory Archives

ARTS AND POPULAR CULTURE: FILM, TELEVISION, AND THEATER

Asrar ‘Ailiyyah (2013; Hany Fawzy)

Brokeback Mountain

The Bubble (2006; Eytan Fox)

Cinema, African (Anglophone)

Cinema, African (Francophone)

Cinema, Latin American (Early Twentieth Century)

Cinema, Latin American (Late Twentieth and Twenty-First Centuries)

Einayim Pkuhot (2009; Haim Tabakman)
Film Festivals

_Fire_ (1996; Deepa Mehta)

Fortune and Men’s Eyes

_Egymásra Nézve_ (1982; Károly Makk)

_Hena Maysara_ (2007; Khaled Youssef)

HIV/AIDS in Egyptian Cinema

Homoeroticism in the Plays of Ibn Daniyal

*I Luv U But_ (2012–2014; Fadia Abboud)

_Iskandariyya ... Leh?_ (1979; Youssef Chahine)

_Lesbanese_ (2008; Alissar Gazal)

_Mädchen in Uniform_ (1931; Leontine Sagan)

Masculinity in Iranian Cinema

Pasolini’s Cinematic Adaptation of _A Thousand and One Nights_

Queer Themes in Italian Neorealist Cinema

Theater, Queer

Transgender Identity in Iranian Cinema

_Tuqus al-Isharat wa-al-Tahawwulat_ (1994; Sa’dallah Wannous)

ARTS AND POPULAR CULTURE: LITERARY WORKS AND MOVEMENTS

Aestheticism and Decadence, Nineteenth-Century

_Al-Akharun_ (2006; Seba al-Herz)

_Aná Hiya Anti_ (2000; Elham Mansour)

_Antes que Anochezca_ (1992; Reinaldo Arenas)

_‘Awdat al-Almani ilá Rushdih_ (2006; Rashid al-Daif)
Bareed Mista3jil: True Stories (2009)
Bayrūt ’75 (1975; Ghāda al-Sammān)
El Beso de la Mujer Araña (1976; Manuel Puig)
Bom-Crioulo (1895; Adolfo Ferreira Caminha)
Boys Love (Yaoi) Manga
Brokeback Mountain
Cavafy, C. P. (1863–1933)
Al-Dizil (1994; Thani al-Suwaidi)
Hajar al-Dahik (1990; Hoda Barakat)
Halat Shaghaf (1998; Nihad Sirees)
Harlem Renaissance
Homoerotic Poetry of Abū Nuwās
Imarat Ya’kubian (2002; Alaa al-Aswany)
Jannát wālblīs (1992; Nawal El Saadawi)
Literary Discourses in the Ottoman Middle East (1500–1900)
Literature, African (Anglophone)
Literature, African (Francophone)
Literature, Caribbean (Anglophone and Creole)
Literature, Caribbean (Francophone)
Mishima, Yukio (1925–1970)
Misk al-Ghazal (1988; Hanan al-Shaykh)
Mufākharat al-Jawārī wa-al-Ghilmān (al-Jā⊠i⊠) Nuzhat al-Albāb F:mā Lā Yujad F: Kitāb (A⊠mad ibn
Yūsuf al-Tifāshī

Pinhua Baojian (1849; Sen Chen)

Poets in Latin America

Pulp Fiction, Gay and Lesbian

Sappho, Nineteenth-Century Rediscovery of

Sharaf (1997; Sun‘allah Ibrahim)

Stone Butch Blues (1993; Leslie Feinberg)

Sufi Treatment of Same-Sex Relations in Poetry and Prose

A Thousand and One Nights

Tongzhi Literature, Taiwan

El Vampiro de la Colonia Roma (1979; Luis Zapata)

The Well of Loneliness (1928; Radclyffe Hall)

Zuqaq al-Midaq (1947; Naguib Mahfouz)

ARTS AND POPULAR CULTURE: MUSIC

Afropop Music

Eurovision Song Contest

Harlem Renaissance

The Lesbian Music Movement

Popular Music and Queer Identities

Thai K-Pop

Vargas, Chavela (1919–2012)

ARTS AND POPULAR CULTURE: PERFORMANCE ART AND PORNOGRAPHY
Benga, François “Féral” (1906–1957)

Cabaret Theater in Latin America and the Caribbean

Drag, Asian

Harlem Renaissance

Madame Sat â (1900–1976)

Museo Travesti del Perú

Orientalism in Gay Pornography about the Middle East

Performance Artists in Latin America

Pornography

Pornography in Asia

Pornoterrorismo and Post-Porn

ARTS AND POPULAR CULTURE: VISUAL ART

Aestheticism and Decadence, Nineteenth-Century

Amer, Ghada (1963–)

The Art of Identity in India

The Art of Queering Asian Mythology

Boys Love (Yaoi) Manga

Graffiti and Graphic Art

Khookha McQueer (1987–)

Moche Pottery

Ottoman and Persian Miniature Paintings

Photography in Europe

Tom of Finland (1920–1991)
BIOGRAPHICAL PROFILES

Amer, Ghada (1963–)

Barbin, Herculine (1838–1868)

Benga, François “Féral” (1906–1957)

Cavafy, C. P. (1863–1933)

Chevalier d’Éon or Mademoiselle Beaumont (1728–1810)

Elbe, Lili (1882–1931)

Erauso, Catalina de (1592–1650)

Khookha McQueer (1987–)

Madame Satã (1900–1976)

Mishima, Yukio (1925–1970)

Nkoli, Simon (1957–1998)

Rescalvo, Sònia (1946–1991)

Rüling, Anna (1880–1953)

Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz (1648–1695)

tatiana de la tierra (1961–2012)

Tom of Finland (1920–1991)

Vargas, Chavela (1919–2012)

Von Mahlsdorf, Charlotte (1928–2002)

Zheng He (1371–1433)

CONCEPTS: THE BODY

Clitoris

Intersex Identities
Orgasm and Orgasmology

Penis

Sex Reassignment Surgery in Asia

Sex Reassignment Surgery in Iran

CONCEPTS: CULTURAL AND SOCIAL

BDSM (Bondage and Discipline, Dominance and Submission, Sadism and Masochism)

Camp

The Closet

Coming-Out/Coming-In Discourses in the Middle East

Cross-Dressing in the West

Rural Queerness

Situational Homosexuality

Urban Queerness

CONCEPTS: GENDER AND SEXUAL IDENTITY

Asexuality

Biological Essentialism

Cisgender or Cis

Femmes and Butches

Gender, Flexible Systems, in Africa

Historical Sexes

Intersex Identities

Third Genders

Transvestites/Transsexuals
CONCEPTS: POLITICAL

Colonialism in Africa South of the Sahara
Communism and Queers in Europe
Fin de Siècle Sexuality
Imperialism and Colonialism
Nationalism and Sexuality in Europe
Neoliberalism in Africa
Neoliberalism in Latin America
Pinkwashing
Treason and Queerness

EDUCATION, DISCIPLINES, AND THEORY

Anthropology in Africa South of the Sahara Classical Studies
Ethnopornography
Ethnopsychiatry
Feminism, African
Fin de Siècle Sexuality
Foucault, Influence of Higher Education and LGBTQ+ Communities in the United States
Jotería Studies
Psichopathia Sexualis (1886; Richard von Krafft-Ebing)
Queer Theorists
Queer Theory, African
Sexology in Asia
Sexperts and Sex Education in the West

Ubuntu

EVENTS, DEMONSTRATIONS, AND MEMORIALS

AIDS Memorial Quilt—The NAMES Project

Carnival and Sexuality in Brazil

Compton's Cafeteria Riot (1966)

Marches on Washington

Museums and Memorials

Parada do Orgulho LGBT de São Paulo, Brazil

Pink Triangle

Pride Demonstrations in Europe

Pride Parades and Marches

Southern Comfort Conference

Stonewall Riots, International Effects of

“We Demand” Protest (1971)

GEOGRAPHICAL PROFILES

Australia and New Zealand

Bhutan

Botswana

Cabo Verde

Cameroon

Cape Town

Côte d'Ivoire
Ethiopia
Ghana
Kenya
Maghreb
Malaysia
Metelkova Mesto (Slovenia)
Mongolia
Mozambique
Namibia
Nigeria
Senegal
South Africa
Tibet
Uganda
Zimbabwe

INSTITUTIONS

Bookstores

Hemispheric Institute Digital Video Library

Higher Education and LGBTQ+ Communities in the United States

Institut für Sexualwissenschaft

Lesbian Herstory Archives

Lesbian Lands, Women’s Lands, and Separatist Communes

Museums and Memorials
LANGUAGE AND TERMS

Bakla
Florentine Codex and Nahua Sexuality
Ghilman
Hijras
Kathoey
Language
Language in Africa
Language in Europe
Language in Latin America
MSM (Men Who Have Sex with Men) in Asia
Mukhannath
Queer in Latin America
Queer Names and Identity Politics in the Arab World
Pakistan, “Queer”
Tongzhi
Two-Spirit
Waria

LEGISLATION, LEGAL CASES, AND GOVERNMENT REPORTS

Antisodomy and Buggery Trials
Argentina’s Gender Identity Law
Canadian Criminal Code Reform (1969)
Darnell v. Lloyd (1975)
Defense of Marriage Act (1996)
Family Law in Asia
Hate Crime Law and Policy in the United States
Homosexual Acts in Shari’a
Inquisition, Criminal Courts, and Sexuality in Colonial Latin America
ISIS Gay Trials
Lavender Scare
Military Law and Policy in the United States
Offences Against the Person Act (1861)
QT v. Hong Kong Immigration Department (2017)
Queen Boat Trials (2001–2002)
Refugees and Immigration Policies
Russian Gay Propaganda Law
Section 377 and Section 377A
Section 377 in South Asia
Sins against Nature in Colonial Latin America
Sodomy Laws in the United States
Thomas/Thomasine Hall Court Case (1629)
The Ugly Law (1961–1965; Denmark)
W v. Registrar of Marriages (2013)
Wilde Trials, International Significance of MARRIAGE, FAMILY, AND INTIMATE RELATIONSHIPS

Adoption and Surrogacy in Europe

Adoption, Fostering, and Surrogacy (International)

Boston Marriage and Women's Romantic Friendships

Defense of Marriage Act (1996)

Family Law in Asia

Female Husband

Kinship in Europe

Lesbian Mothering and Adoption in Latin America

Marriage Migration in Asia

Marriage, Same-Sex, in Latin America

Marriage, Same-Sex, in Taiwan

Marriage, Universal, in Europe

Marriage, Woman-Woman, in Africa

Parenting Rights in North America

QT v. Hong Kong Immigration Department (2017)

Queer Domesticity in Europe

W v. Registrar of Marriages (2013)

MEDIA, INTERNET, AND TECHNOLOGY

The Body Politic

Butt Magazine

Digital Cultures in Latin America
Internet in Africa
Internet Queer Sites in the Middle East
New Media in Asia
Otaku Sexualities in Japan
Phone Apps
Roopbaan

MEDICINE, PSYCHOLOGY, AND PATHOLOGY

Conversion Therapy in China

Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders (DSM)

Ethnopsychiatry

HIV/AIDS

HIV/AIDS in Africa

HIV/AIDS in Egyptian Cinema

HIV/AIDS in Europe

HIV/AIDS in Latin America and the Caribbean

HIV/AIDS in South and Southeast Asia

HIV/AIDS in the United States

Kinsey Scale

Medicine, Complementary and Alternative

Psychoanalysis in Argentina

Psychopathia Sexualis (1886; Richard von Krafft-Ebing)

Sex Reassignment Surgery in Asia

Sex Reassignment Surgery in Iran
MILITARY AND CONFLICT

Cold War and Sexuality in Latin America
Conquest and Sodomy in Latin America
The Cuban Revolution and Homosexuality
Erauso, Catalina de (1592–1650)
Mexican Revolution and Sexuality
Militarism and Sexualities in the Asia-Pacific Region
Military Law and Policy in the United States
Military/Navy in the United Kingdom
The Nicaraguan Revolution
Sacred Band of Thebes
Vietnam War
Vietnam War, LGBTQ+ Veterans
Zheng He (1371–1433)

ORGANIZATIONS AND SOCIETIES

ACT UP
African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights alQaws
Asia Pacific Transgender Network
Aswat
Combahee River Collective
Comité d’Urgence Anti-répression Homosexuelle (CUARH)
Daughters of Bilitis
Dyketactics!
Frente de Liberación Homosexual

Friendship Societies in Europe

FTMInternational

The Gay International and Mideast LGBTQI Organizations

Gay Latino Alliance (GALA)

Gay Liberation Front

Groupe du 6 Novembre: Lesbiennes Issues du Colonialisme, de l'Esclavage et de l'Immigration

Grupo de Trabalho Homossexual and LES

Grupo Gay da Bahia

Helem

Human Rights Campaign

Jamaica Forum for Lesbians, All-Sexuals and Gays (J-FLAG)

Lambda Legal Defense and Education Fund

Mattachine Society

Meem

Molly Houses

Naz Foundation International

The Order of Chaeronea

People Like Us (PLU)

Scouting

Spectra Project

Strange Fruit

Transgender Organizations in Mainland China, Hong Kong, and Taiwan
PEOPLE GROUPS

Diasporas, Queer
Eunuchs
Gangs and Street Kids in Africa
Hijras
Migrant Queer Communities, US
Muxes
Pacific Island and Pacific Island Diaspora Identities
Puerto Ricans in the Diaspora
Rural Queer Communities, US
Samoan Fa‘afafine
Transgender Muslims
Transgendered Subjectivities in Contemporary Iran

RELIGION AND RITUAL

Christianity in Africa: Anglican
Christianity in Africa: LGBT Friendly
Christianity in Africa: Pentecostal and Charismatic
Christianity in Africa: Roman Catholicism
Confessional Manuals in Colonial Latin America
Homosexual Acts in Shari‘a
Inquisition, Criminal Courts, and Sexuality in Colonial Latin America
Islam in Africa South of the Sahara
Religion and Same-Sex Behaviors: Christianity
Religion and Same-Sex Behaviors: Islam
Religion and Same-Sex Behaviors: Judaism
Rituals and Same-Sex and Trans Experience
Sufi Treatment of Same-Sex Relations in Poetry and Prose
Transgender Muslims
Witchcraft/Occult in Africa

RIGHTS AND ACTIVISM

Activism in Africa South of the Sahara
Anti-Racist Activism in Europe
Black Freedom Movement and Sexuality
Central American Solidarity Movement
Dissidence in Singapore
Ecology and Environmental Issues and Activism
Human Rights
Human Rights and Activism in Latin America
Human Rights and Queer Arab Refugees
Human Rights in Asia
Human Rights in Europe
Lavender Menace
Lesbian Feminist Encuentros of Latin America and the Caribbean
Parenting Rights in North America
Trans Issues in Africa
Transfeminism

Travesti and Trans Activism in Latin America and the Caribbean

SOCIAL AND CULTURAL TRENDS

Gentrification in Europe

Sexual Revolution in Europe

Sexual Revolution in the United States

Shifting Sexual Norms in Nineteenth-Century Iran

Wilde in Sinophone Culture

Zhongxing Phenomenon

SOCIAL ISSUES: DISCRIMINATION, PERSECUTION, AND VIOLENCE

Anti-Gender Movement in Europe

Anti-Semitism and Zionism

Anti-Semitism in Europe

El Baile de los 41

Bathhouse Raids, Toronto (1981)

Blackmail

Chechnya, Detention Camps in

The Gay International and Mideast LGBTQI Organizations

Gendered Violence and Feminicide in Latin America

Homonationalism in Africa

Lavender Menace

Lavender Scare
Orientalism in Gay Pornography about the Middle East

Pink Triangle

Pinkwashing

Rape, Corrective, in Africa

Russian Gay Propaganda Law

Scandals in Europe

Trans Issues in Africa

SOCIAL ISSUES: MIGRATION, REFUGEES, AND ASYLUM

Diasporas, Queer

Human Rights and Queer Arab Refugees

Migration to Europe

Pacific Island and Pacific Island Diaspora Identities Refugees and Asylum in Africa

Refugees and Immigration Policies

SOCIAL ISSUES: SEX WORK AND SLAVERY

Involuntary Servitude and Same-Sex Sexuality in Africa Sex Tourism in Asia

Sex Tourism in the Middle East Sex Work in Asia

Sex Work/Sex Tourism/Sex Trafficking in Africa

Slavery and Sodomy in Brazil

SPORTS, LEISURE, AND TRAVEL

Athletes, Trans and Intersex

Athletes, Trans and Intersex, in Asia

Bars and Cabarets in Europe

Bars, Working-Class, in Mexico
Cruising and Cruising Grounds

Gay European Tourism Association

Molly Houses

Resorts

Sex Tourism in Asia

Sex Tourism in Latin America and the Caribbean

Sex Tourism in the Middle East

Sex Work/Sex Tourism/Sex Trafficking in Africa

Sports and Sexuality in Latin America

Sports, Women in, Africa

Turkish Baths

Travel/Travelogues on the Middle East
Act Up

LINDSAY ZAFIR
Department of History
Yale University

The founding, achievements, international impact, and demise of this important AIDS activist group.

The AIDS Coalition to Unleash Power (ACT UP) was formed in March 1987, six years after the first cases of AIDS were identified in gay men in the United States. According to the statement read at the beginning of every Monday night membership meeting, ACT UP was “a diverse, non-partisan group of individuals united in anger and committed to direct action to end the AIDS crisis” (Crimp and Rolston 1990, 13). The group initially focused on getting “drugs into bodies,” putting pressure on government agencies and pharmaceutical companies to make AIDS treatments available more quickly and at more affordable prices. ACT UP soon expanded its agenda to include a broader set of issues, including gender inequities, access to affordable health care and housing, sex education, and clean-needle exchange programs (Cohen 1998). The organization drew national attention to the AIDS crisis, transforming the government’s response to the disease and driving the development of more effective medications.

In the mid-1990s, scientists discovered that a new class of medications, called protease inhibitors, could effectively keep the virus at bay in most people when used in combination with other antiretrovirals. The development of this new “drug cocktail,” called highly active antiretroviral therapy (HAART), was a credit to ACT UP’s work to pressure the government to produce more effective medications. But the cocktail was also prohibitively expensive for Americans without health insurance and most people living in the Global South, where the disease was now spreading at a rapid pace. Though the national movement declined during these years, the remaining branches of ACT UP turned their attention to the issue of inequitable treatment access, banding together with new groups in both the Global North and Global South to fight for affordable medications for everyone living with HIV/AIDS.

Origins

ACT UP was formed after a rousing speech by the writer and activist Larry Kramer at the Gay and Lesbian Community Center in New York City on 10 March 1987. Kramer asked two-thirds of the audience to stand: “At the rate we are going,” he argued, “you could be dead in less than five years,” a reference to the alarming rate at which gay men in New York...
City were dying of the disease (Kramer 1989, 128). He attacked the government’s response to the epidemic, particularly the slow approval process at the Food and Drug Administration (FDA), which held promising medications in limbo for years. But he also excoriated the gay community and existing AIDS service organizations for failing to mount a coordinated political campaign. He asked the audience, “Do we want to start a new organization devoted solely to political action?” (Kramer 1989, 135). Two days later, ACT UP was born.

Kramer’s speech provided the spark for ACT UP, but a number of direct-action AIDS organizations had already formed in New York, Chicago, and San Francisco, providing the basis for the group’s meteoric rise. Indeed, gay men and lesbians had become increasingly active in the wake of the 1986 US Supreme Court decision Bowers v. Hardwick, which upheld state sodomy laws criminalizing same-sex sexual activities. Already, the government had done little to address the AIDS crisis. As the political scientist Deborah B. Gould writes in Moving Politics (2009), many states were considering mandatory testing and quarantine laws, and just one week before the Bowers decision, the US Justice Department legalized employment discrimination against HIV-positive individuals. Now, the Supreme Court was attacking gay people’s privacy as well. Gay men and lesbians were angry that the nation seemed to care so little for their lives and were desperate for effective treatments. They had little to lose, and much to gain, in turning to militant direct action (Gould 2009; Wolfe 1997).

Culture and Organization

ACT UP took off quickly, attracting new members and sprouting over 100 new chapters across the country. The group had international influence too, as ACT UP chapters formed in cities such as Paris, London, Montreal, and Sydney. But the New York chapter remained the group’s largest and most influential. At its height, ACT UP–New York’s Monday night membership meetings could draw as many as 800 people each week (Smith and Siplon 2006). Many remember these meetings as the heart of the organization, providing a space to socialize, share news and information, and vote on upcoming actions or other items of business. Smaller numbers of members also met throughout the week in affinity groups, such as the Women’s Caucus, the Housing Committee, the Treatment and Data Committee (which pushed for new drug development), and the Majority Actions Committee (which advocated for people of color with AIDS). The affinity groups allowed the organization to remain dynamic, decentralized, and effective, as members could focus on the issues that mattered most to them and develop their own actions or campaigns. These groups also helped to glue the larger organization together by fostering “close-knit communities within communities” that sustained members through risky political actions and painful personal losses (Jim Eigo, quoted in Gould 2009, 191; see also Crimp and Rolston 1990).
ACT UP IN EUROPE

Following its founding in New York in 1987, ACT UP quickly internationalized, with chapters appearing in Canada, Australia, and Europe by the end of the decade. These chapters were developed, however, through informal connections rather than through the concerted effort of a centralized organization. Arguably one of the most successful European ACT UP organizations was ACT UP–Paris, but chapters founded in European countries other than France also had a lasting impact on queer politics.

ACT UP–Paris was founded in 1989 by Didier Lestrade (1958–), Luc Coulavin (1961–1994), and Pascal Loubet (1958–) as a political response to both HIV/AIDS and institutionalized AIDS organizations in France (Nakayama 2012). From 1987 to 1989 Lestrade traveled numerous times to New York and reported on ACT UP–New York in the gay magazine Gai Pied (literally, “gay foot,” but also a homophone for the French word for “wasp's nest,” referring to the magazine's intention to disrupt the status quo), as well as the daily newspaper Libération (Eleftheriadis 2014). Much like ACT UP–New York, which was established in part in reaction to the political impotence of the AIDS service organization Gay Men’s Health Crisis, ACT UP–Paris emerged from criticism of France’s largest AIDS organization, AIDES (a play on the French word for “help”). Founded in 1984 by activist Daniel Defert (1937–) after the death of his partner, philosopher and theorist Michel Foucault (1926–1984), AIDES was a general organization that avoided making links between HIV/AIDS and homosexuality (Broqua 2015). Instead, it sought to build ties with the socialist government of François Mitterrand, which had avoided making connections to gay rights organizations since its election in 1981 (Ernst 1997).

ACT UP–Paris did not limit its criticism to AIDES, but instead took on a wide range of opponents including government officials, pharmaceutical companies, and the Catholic Church. Borrowing slogans such as Silence = Death (translated into French as Silence = Mort) and strategies from its counterparts in the United States, ACT UP–Paris sought to emulate the drama and the anger that were at the center of ACT UP–New York. In addition to its members’ participating in marches and staging die-ins, ACT UP–Paris also made large visual statements, such as placing a giant pink condom over the Luxor Obelisk at the Place de la Concorde on World AIDS Day in 1993 (Ernst 1997). The organization’s activism in the early 1990s gained further international attention when the docudrama 120 battements par minute (2017; BPM [Beats per Minute]), directed by Robin Campillo (1962–), a former ACT UP–Paris activist, won the Grand Prix at the 2017 Cannes Film Festival (Wise 2018).

During the late 1990s, however, ACT UP became a locus of controversy surrounding the practice of “barebacking” (having penetrative sex without a condom) when writers Guillaume Dustan (1965–2005) and Érik Rémès (1964–) published novels that called into question the inevitability of safer sex practices (Rees-Roberts 2008). In response to the apparent increase in barebacking among same-sex–desiring men, ACT UP–Paris began targeting bars, clubs, and saunas that either encouraged or did not openly oppose barebacking (Castro and Girard 2015). In 2009, when AIDES hosted a series of workshops for same-sex–desiring men who engaged in barebacking, ACT UP renewed its criticism of the organization, calling the workshops a "political laboratory aiming at standardizing unsafe sex" (Castro and Girard 2015, 172).

ACT UP–London, founded in late 1988, adopted tactics similar to its counterparts in France and the United States for a specifically UK context. In 1989 ACT UP–London staged a demonstration at Pentonville Prison, catapulting condoms over the prison walls to protest prisoners’ lack of access to contraceptives (Wise 2018). Although ACT UP–London dwindled in the 1990s, it was revived in 2012 in the face of budget cuts to the National Health Service. After UK Independence Party leader Nigel Farage (1964–) stated in 2014 that HIV-positive people should be barred from entering the United Kingdom, ACT UP–London dumped half a metric ton of manure on his doorstep (Wise 2018).

Globally, some AIDS activists have sought to politicize HIV/AIDS in a manner similar to ACT UP, borrowing some of ACT UP’s tactics while remaining unaffiliated with the group. At the 1998 World AIDS Conference in Geneva, a group of activists primarily from ACT UP–Paris interrupted the opening ceremony, and one activist from an organization in Côte d’Ivoire took the floor to read a speech, leading some to criticize ACT UP–Paris for imposing its tactics on African activists. Nevertheless, the activities of such groups as Treatment Action Campaign (TAC) in South Africa, which gained visibility during the 2000 World AIDS Conference in Durban and uses tactics similar to ACT UP’s, highlight the diverse range of activist approaches across African countries (Broqua 2015). Since its founding in 1998, TAC has acquired a reputation as one of the world’s most important AIDS organizations, underscoring the ongoing, if indirect, global influence of ACT UP (Broqua 2015).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Eleftheriadis, Konstantinos. “Queer Activism and the Idea of Practicing Europe.” In Through membership meetings, affinity groups, informal gatherings, and militant actions, ACT UP built a vibrant and empowering community. Meetings were loud, angry, and emotional, as members would scream, cry, chant, and laugh together. They could also be long and agonizing, as members talked through issues or debated new courses of action (Smith and Siplon 2006). But most members were excited to participate in such a democratic organization, and they remember the meetings as thrilling: full of energy, love, and a deep sense of solidarity (Gould 2009; Hubbard 2012; France 2012). Meetings were also a regular cruising ground. As ACT UP–New York member Jean Carlomusto remembers, “men were having sex with men, the women were having sex with women, men and women were having sex with each other” (quoted in Brier 2009, 161; see also Cvetkovich 2003). In ACT UP, practicing safe sex became an important political act, demonstrating that it was still possible to embrace queer sexuality in the midst of a deadly epidemic and virulently homophobic culture. This embrace of queer sexuality set ACT UP apart from other AIDS organizations and helped to spawn new queer movements in the 1990s (Brier 2009; Gould 2009).
ACT UP Poster “SILENCE = DEATH.” This iconic poster was created before the founding of ACT UP, but the organization quickly adopted the image as its own. The poster used a common symbol of gay liberation at the time, an upward-facing pink triangle, transforming a symbol of oppression into one of resistance.

Actions

ACT UP's actions were remarkably successful, drawing media attention and new members, and quickly effecting national change. The group relied on direct action, taking to the streets in massive numbers and often risking arrest to put pressure on those in positions of power. Especially in New York, a number of members came out of the theater, art, and media worlds—and they used their skills to great effect, creating actions filled with street theater and eye-catching posters. One of the most memorable graphics associated with the organization was an upward-facing pink triangle above the text “SILENCE = DEATH.” The pink triangle, a common symbol of gay liberation, evoked the badges given to gay prisoners in the Holocaust but were turned upward to signify “solidarity and resistance” (ACT UP–New York 2017).

ACT UP staged its first demonstration on Wall Street on 24 March 1987. Arguing that there could be “no more business as usual,” the group targeted the slow drug approval process at the FDA and the profiteering of drug companies such as Burroughs Wellcome, which had just released the first and only AIDS treatment, AZT, at the astronomical price of $10,000 a year (AIDS Network 1987; Cohen 1998; Crimp and Rolston 1990). The demonstration attracted 250 people, 17 of whom were arrested, and produced an immediate response from the FDA. A few weeks after the action, the FDA promised to speed up the drug approval process (Crimp and Rolston 1990).

ACT UP gained national attention that October at the National March on Washington for Lesbian and Gay Rights, which featured the first viewing of the AIDS Memorial Quilt (Cohen 1998). (The quilt had been created earlier that year to remember those who had died of AIDS and to draw attention to the epidemic.) ACT UP members marched near the back, wearing SILENCE = DEATH shirts and holding AIDSGATE posters (Crimp and Rolston 1990). They also distributed leaflets urging those in attendance to take more militant action: “Before this Quilt grows any larger, turn your grief into anger” (quoted in Smith and Siplon 2006, 25). At the next ACT UP–New York meeting, the organization doubled in size (Crimp and Rolston 1990). Soon, over 100 chapters sprang up in cities across the country and around the world, each independently organized but committed to direct action to end the AIDS crisis (Smith and Siplon 2006).

This national movement came together the next October. Following the second viewing of the quilt on 11 October 1988, more than 1,500 activists convened in Rockville, Maryland, to “seize control of the FDA.” The protesters had a long list of demands, including a shorter drug approval process, access to clinical trials for all people with AIDS (because women and people of color were routinely excluded), an end to the use of double-blind placebo trials, insurance coverage for experimental drugs, and community involvement in decision-making. Activists had briefed the media in advance, ensuring sympathetic national news coverage (Crimp and Rolston 1990). And, like many of ACT UP’s actions, the theatrical tactics were made for the cameras. Protesters wearing white lab coats and blood-stained gloves plastered the FDA— which they renamed the Federal Death Administration— with posters featuring a bloody palm print and the text: “The government has blood on its hands. One AIDS death every half hour.” As workers looked on from within the building, the crowd chanted “Get to work,” “Guilty, guilty, guilty,” and “AZT is not enough; give us all the other stuff!” One group of protesters stormed the building, facing off with police in riot gear; another staged a die-in with mock tombstones. All in all, nearly 200 were arrested for civil disobedience. The action solidified ACT UP’s place as a serious player on the national stage (France 2012; Hubbard 2012; Crimp and Rolston 1990). Two weeks later, the FDA shortened its drug approval process, and within a year, the FDA and the National Institutes of Health (NIH) accepted a proposal from ACT UP’s Treatment and Data Committee for a “parallel track” program that would allow individuals excluded from clinical trials to access experimental drugs (Brier 2009, 166).
ACT UP commonly used civil disobedience to press for increased funding for AIDS research and treatment at the national, state, and local levels.

ACT UP kept up the pressure on federal agencies, scientific researchers, and pharmaceutical companies over the next couple of years. In September 1989, seven ACT UP members went back to Wall Street, sneaking onto the floor of the New York Stock Exchange to hang a “Sell Wellcome” banner urging traders to sell stock in Burroughs Wellcome, the company that manufactured the exorbitantly expensive AIDS medication AZT. An hour later, 1,500 members gathered outside demanding free AZT. ACT UP chapters in San Francisco and London staged simultaneous demonstrations. Four days later, Burroughs Wellcome dropped the price of AZT by 20 percent (Hubbard 2012; Crimp and Rolston 1990).

In May 1990, over 1,000 ACT UP members went to Bethesda, Maryland, to “storm the NIH.” Protesters drew attention to the dearth of scientific progress around the disease with chants such as “Ten years. A billion dollars. One drug. Big deal.” They also continued to push for clinical trials including women and people of color. A month later, ACT UP won another victory when the NIH formally included activists in an AIDS Clinical Trials Group meeting for the first time (Cohen 1998).

In March 1989 ACT UP's Women's Caucus began a four-year campaign to persuade the Centers for Disease Control (CDC) to change the definition of AIDS to include illnesses that most commonly affect women, such as cervical cancer. Women were routinely denied Social Security benefits because they did not meet the CDC’s criteria for AIDS, meaning—in the words of one ACT UP poster—that “Women don’t get AIDS. They just die from it.” In 1993 the CDC changed the definition of AIDS to include cervical cancer, as well as tuberculosis (a common illness among poor people with AIDS). The number of women diagnosed with the disease immediately increased by nearly 50 percent (Brier 2009; Hubbard 2012).

Despite these victories, the epidemic raged on, with over 120,000 deaths in the United States by the end of 1990 (amfAR 2011). On 23 January 1991 ACT UP–New York called a “Day of Desperation” protesting the government’s funding of the Gulf War over the AIDS epidemic. The night before, a handful of activists infiltrated CBS Evening News, interrupting the live broadcast with the message “AIDS is news. Fight AIDS, not Arabs.” The next morning, 800 activists gathered on Wall Street for a two-hour march to city hall and the federal office building, where they left empty coffins to represent those who had died of AIDS. At the same time, 2,000 marched in Harlem to demand more housing and social services for people living with AIDS. Later that day, 500 members occupied Grand Central Station at the height of rush hour, covering information booths in red tape and releasing a banner with the message “Money for AIDS, not for war!” Over 250 protesters were arrested for blocking traffic outside the station (Hubbard 2012; Carroll 2015).

Demise of the National Movement

The national AIDS activist movement began to decline after 1992. ACT UP had achieved tremendous victories. Because of the group’s protests, the FDA shortened the drug approval process, the NIH gave people with AIDS a seat at the table in developing clinical trials, drug companies reduced the cost of treatments, and the CDC expanded the definition of AIDS—to name only a few of ACT UP’s many achievements (Gould 2009; Epstein 1996). But activists began to lose hope that scientists would soon discover a cure that would save their lives. In 1993 the Concorde study—the longest and largest study of AZT to date—showed that there was no significant benefit to giving the drug to asymptomatic patients. Other clinical trials released at the Ninth International AIDS Conference that year were just as disappointing (Epstein 1996; Gould 2009).

Meanwhile, the number of people dying of AIDS continued to climb, nearly doubling between 1990 and 1993 (amfAR 2011). As ACT UP–New York member Dudley Saunders remembers, “We’d won all these battles, but the war—we were all still dying” (quoted in Gould 2009, 424). The group began to stage political funerals to highlight their desperation, anger, and grief over a decade into the crisis. Most significantly, in October 1992 ACT UP staged a national Ashes Action, at which members from across the country convened to dispose of the ashes of friends and lovers on the White House lawn (Gould 2009; Hubbard 2012; France 2012).
At the same time, the movement began to fracture. As early as 1990, the ACT UP chapter in San Francisco—followed by those in Chicago and Portland—split over the question of whether the group should focus on the development of effective treatments or on the racial, gender, and class inequities that prevented many women, poor people, and people of color from accessing adequate health care and housing. In New York, tensions between the Women's Caucus and the Treatment and Data Committee came to a head in 1992 when the women proposed a six-month moratorium on meetings with government officials, who continued to dismiss their concerns. Outraged, a number of treatment activists left to found the independent Treatment Action Group (TAG)—a devastating blow to the New York chapter. These splits occurred primarily along the lines of race, gender, and HIV status: the treatment activists were mostly (though not exclusively) white, gay, HIV-positive men, whereas many of the women and people of color in the group advocated for addressing broader issues (Epstein 1996; Gould 2009). Others remember these splits as primarily about class. The male treatment activists tended to come from middle-class and upper-middle-class backgrounds, giving them easier access to decision makers and less interest in broader questions of access and affordability (Gould 2009; Cvetkovich 2003).

On top of these fractures, activists were burnt out after years of intense political activity and the loss of so many friends and comrades. Many hoped that the 1992 US presidential electoral victory of Bill Clinton, who had promised to meet a number of ACT UP’s demands and provide a voice for gay men and lesbians, would allow them to take a step back from activism. Clinton’s promises proved unfulfilled, however, and ACT UP struggled to regain momentum in the years following his victory (Gould 2009). By the mid-1990s the national movement had collapsed. Still, some ACT UP chapters persisted, and in 1996, the group’s efforts to push for drug development paid off with the introduction of a new drug cocktail that made the disease a manageable condition for those who had access to it.

Global Treatment Access

Many of the broader questions ACT UP raised about drug access and affordability, however, remained unaddressed. While many HIV-positive Americans saw their health rebound rapidly after they began taking HAART, the epidemic increasingly affected populations that did not have access to quality health care, including over 30 million people living in Africa south of the Sahara. Indeed, the vast majority of people living with HIV/AIDS around the world—95 percent by one estimate—could not afford the new medications and would likely die of the disease (Smith and Siplon 2006).

Though ACT UP had largely declined by the mid-1990s, remaining branches such as ACT UP–New York and Philadelphia refocused their activism to fight inequitable treatment access in the United States and abroad. As longtime ACT UP–Philadelphia member Paul Davis recalled, “To remain relevant, we’ve really had to follow the AIDS epidemic. It’s not accurate to say we’ve gone somewhere else because things are all fixed here. But the corporate denial of medication to 25 million Africans resonates deeply with our members who have fought the same battles here” (quoted in Smith and Siplon 2006, 62). In 1999 a number of AIDS workers, activists, and organizations formed a new group to address global inequities in treatment access: the Health Global Access Project Coalition (Health GAP). A handful of former ACT UP members became involved with Health GAP, including Eric Sawyer, who had started ACT UP–New York's Global AIDS Action committee in the early 1990s. Under their influence, Health GAP quickly adopted ACT UP’s confrontational and media savvy tactics. One of its early campaigns targeted presidential candidate (and vice president) Al Gore, who had threatened trade sanctions against South Africa when the country announced that it planned to issue a compulsory license allowing it to manufacture cheaper, generic AIDS medications. Health GAP, along with ACT UP–New York and Philadelphia, infiltrated a series of Gore’s campaign events, where they knew they would receive heavy media coverage. As Gore spoke, activists blew whistles and held signs reading “AIDS drugs for Africa.” That June, they protested a fund-raising dinner held in Philadelphia, bringing along a large Gore marionette controlled by pharmaceutical companies. Next, they targeted the US trade representative (USTR) Charlene Barshefsky, including an action at the USTR office that October that drew over 700 people. The Clinton administration was so embarrassed by the campaign that they not only backed off the threatened trade sanctions but also increased funding to fight AIDS internationally (Smith and Siplon 2006).

Health GAP worked in tandem with a number of international organizations, including South Africa’s Treatment Action Campaign (TAC), which was founded in December 1998 to fight for affordable treatment for South Africans living with HIV/AIDS. When TAC was first formed, the group thought it would work alongside the South African government to fight the high cost of AIDS medications set by the pharmaceutical companies. Though TAC successfully battled the pharmaceutical industry to reduce the cost of a variety of AIDS medications, like ACT UP before it, the organization also had to address its own government’s willful neglect of the exploding epidemic (Geffen 2010; Nattrass 2007). In 1999, under the leadership of President Thabo Mbeki and his health minister, Manto Tshabalala-Msimang, the South African government began to deny that HIV caused AIDS. Even worse, the government failed to distribute antiretrovirals at public hospitals and clinics, arguing that the medications were not only costly but also dangerous.

TAC launched a multifaceted campaign to combat Mbeki’s denialism and expand access to treatment in South Africa. The group borrowed from ACT UP’s arsenal, staging several large, eye-catching demonstrations and, in 2003, launching a civil disobedience campaign called Dying for Treatment that “included demonstrations, invasions of police stations and government buildings (in order to spark arrests), disruption of speeches and heckling of the Health Minister, and even the laying of a culpable homicide charge against her and the Minister for Trade and Industry Alec Erwin (for failing to prevent the 600 AIDS deaths estimated to be taking place each day)” (Nattrass 2007, 114; Geffen 2010).
But TAC also drew on a wider range of tactics, pursuing successful legal action against the government and developing a grassroots treatment literacy program that countered the misinformation coming from Mbeki and Tshabalala-Msimang. Like ACT UP members, TAC volunteers quickly became experts on the science of HIV and AIDS. In its early days, the organization relied on the extensive knowledge that the TAG had developed, flying TAG members to South Africa to train TAC volunteers (Geffen 2010). In addition, TAC pursued alliances with religious and labor organizations, international scientists, and nongovernmental organizations like Médecins Sans Frontières (Doctors without Borders) to create a broad movement within South Africa and around the world (Geffen 2010; Nattrass 2007).

TAC’s multifaceted strategy paid off. In 2002 the Constitutional Court of South Africa ruled in favor of TAC, arguing that the government had a constitutional obligation to provide treatment to HIV-positive pregnant women to prevent mother-to-child transmission of the disease. And, in 2003, the government announced that it would implement a treatment program at public hospitals and clinics. Still, the fight continued, as the government moved slowly to implement a treatment plan and continued to undercut the program by promoting alternative treatments for the disease (Geffen 2010; Smith and Siplon 2006; Nattrass 2007).

Though the national movement that ACT UP created largely dwindled in the early 1990s, the organization has had a lasting influence on the global AIDS crisis. Former members and newer activists have drawn inspiration from ACT UP’s early battles with the government and pharmaceutical industry to continue the fight for equitable treatment access and quality health care into the twenty-first century.

SEE ALSO AIDS Memorial Quilt—The NAMES Project; HIV/AIDS; HIV/AIDS in Africa; HIV/AIDS in the United States; South Africa

BIBLIOGRAPHY

FILMOGRAPHY

Campillo, Robin, dir. 120 battements par minute [BPM [Beats per Minute]]. 2017. Documentary.

As with any region, the history of LGBTQI activism in sub-Saharan Africa has varied widely across country, region, and time. During the first two decades of the twenty-first century, the majority of international media attention on LGBTQI activism in sub-Saharan Africa has focused on the hostile sociopolitical climates that many LGBTQI activists face. However, the contexts facing LGBTQI activists across the region are varied; while moral panics, state-sponsored homophobias, and state repression significantly limit the rights of LGBTQI persons and activists at certain times and in certain countries, LGBTQI activists have also attained substantive gains in a number of national and regional forums. Although this entry uses the initialism LGBTQI, it should be noted that queer (Q) identities and theorizing continue to be seen as a predominantly Western concept in many parts of sub-Saharan Africa and that the concept or identity of “queer” is infrequently used by local activists.

Overview of Activism from the 1950s to the 1990s

The development of LGBTQI movements (or, more commonly, movements advocating for gay and lesbian rights) in sub-Saharan Africa dates back to at least the 1950s in South Africa, as has been most comprehensively documented in Defiant Desire: Gay and Lesbian Lives in South Africa (Gevisser and Cameron 1994). Following the police raid of a private home in Johannesburg in 1966, and the subsequent arrest of ten white men on charges of “masquerading as women” and, in one case, “indecent assault on a minor” (Gevisser and Cameron 1994, 30), a number of predominantly white, middle/upper-class gay men and lesbians mobilized against police harassment of adults engaging in consensual same-sex relations. However, this initial mobilizing did not result in the development of a long-term movement and certainly did not speak to the needs or concerns of South Africa’s black and Indian LGBTQI citizens, whose human rights were routinely violated as people of color in apartheid South Africa (Epprecht 2013).
The divergence between the anti-racism and anti-ho-mophobia movements in South Africa was profoundly challenged in the late 1980s, when a member of the African National Congress (ANC; the leading antiapartheid political organization), Simon Nkoli (1957–1998), came out as gay to fellow ANC comrades in prison. Around this same time, leaders of the ANC, in response to pressure from a London journalist, confirmed the ANC's commitment to remove “all forms of discrimination and oppression in a liberated South Africa,” a commitment that included “the protection of gay rights” (Thatchell 2005, 145). During the transition to democracy, activists succeeded in ensuring that sexual minorities were included in the equality clause of the 1996 constitution, making South Africa the first country in the world with constitutional protections from discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation and gender identity.

The late 1980s and 1990s also saw the development of LGBTQI organizing in several other countries, including the founding of such groups as Gays and Lesbians of Zimbabwe (1990), the Rainbow Project of the feminist organization Sister Namibia (1996), Ishtar MSM (1997; a Kenyan organization that originally served male sex workers and later expanded to include men who have sex with men [MSM] and transgender women), and Lesbians, Gays, and Bisexuals of Botswana (1998). The 1990s also featured some of the first instances of state-sponsored homophobia, particularly in southern Africa. Zimbabwe’s then president Robert Mugabe (1924–) first publicly decried homosexuals as “worse than dogs and pigs” in 1995 upon having learned about Gays and Lesbians of Zimbabwe at a book fair (Shoko 2010). Mugabe and, later, Namibia’s then president Sam Nujoma (1929–) decried homosexuality in a number of public speeches as an unnatural, Western imposition.

In addition to advocacy for legal rights such as constitutional protections or an end to police harassment, activism in this era also centered on health rights and needs, particularly related to HIV/AIDS. Before the end of apartheid, Gay Activists of South Africa was recognized by the minister of health as the official mouthpiece of the gay community, with which the National AIDS Advisory Group liaised. This was mainly a result of the group’s nonmilitant strategy. However, the most noteworthy and successful HIV/AIDS initiative in South Africa is almost undoubtedly the Treatment Action Campaign (TAC). This activist organization was founded in 1998 following the preventable death of Nkoli, who, along with most HIV-positive South Africans, was unable to afford antiretroviral therapy. Among other victories, TAC assisted the South African government in its successful legal case against the pharmaceutical industry regarding the development of generic (and, therefore, less cost-prohibitive) antiretroviral medications; TAC also successfully pressured the South African government to develop its HIV & AIDS and STI Strategic Plan for South Africa (2007–2011), which included significantly more funding than past government plans (Heywood 2009). Yet, even as HIV/AIDS was largely considered a gay man’s disease in North America during the early years of the epidemic, the possibility of male-to-male transmission of the virus was largely neglected during the first two decades of research and interventions for HIV in sub-Saharan Africa (Epprecht 2013).
Activism in the Twenty-First Century

Eventually, and partially in response to concerted efforts by LGBTQI and MSM organizations across the region, some HIV/AIDS international organizations (for example, the Joint United Nations Programme on HIV/AIDS and the Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria) integrated a stronger MSM focus into research and programming. These efforts emerged in partial response to the demands of local activists and provided resources that, to a certain extent, helped sustain and expand the work of local MSM and LGBTQI organizations (Altman et al. 2012). Local LGBTQI organizations have also proliferated across many parts of sub-Saharan Africa in the twenty-first century. In 2017 Pan Africa ILGA estimated that there were at least 250 LGBTQI organizations spread across approximately forty countries in Africa. Certain countries with more exposure and/or backlash to LGBTQI issues (for example, Uganda, Kenya, Nigeria, and South Africa) tend to get more funding for programs and have the largest numbers of organizations. While some other countries, such as Chad or Djibouti, may not have any LGBTQI organizations at all, and in others, such as Ethiopia, individuals have to resort to online activism through social media, the majority of sub-Saharan African countries are home to discreet or hidden LGBTQI organizations.

Trans, gender-nonconforming, and intersex organizations have also become more visible in sub-Saharan Africa in the twenty-first century. For example, Gender DynamiX was formed in 2005 in Cape Town, South Africa, and has played a vital role in advancing advocacy, community building, and regional networks focused on the particular health needs and concerns of trans and gender-nonconforming people. Since then, trans advocacy organizations such as Trans* Research, Education, Advocacy and Training in Zimbabwe and Transgender Education and Advocacy in Kenya have emerged. In South Africa, Intersex South Africa has been active since 2008 as a successor to the Intersex Society of South Africa (founded in 2000). In addition to raising awareness and developing support groups for intersex persons, these organizations advocate for an end to the nonconsensual and unnecessary surgeries that are often performed on intersex babies (Klein 2009).

Continental and regional networks have also emerged and gained momentum, particularly from 2010 onward. Among others, these include the African Human Rights Coalition, the Coalition of African Lesbians, Africagay Contre le Sida, African Men for Sexual Health and Rights, and Pan Africa ILGA. These regional networks work with various target groups and tackle a broad range of LGBTQI issues. Relatedly, international nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) focused on LGBTQI rights have also expanded their programming and relationships in sub-Saharan Africa in the twenty-first century. Among others, some of the most visible organizations include ARC International; COC Nederland; Hivos; the International Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, Trans and Intersex Association (ILGA); and OutRight Action International (formerly the International Gay and Lesbian Human Rights Demonstrators March in Support of Uganda’s Anti-Homosexuality Act, Passed in 2014. The signs held by these marchers reflect the pervasive homophobic belief that homosexuality is a Western import and not native to Africa. Had the act not been nullified on procedural grounds, it would have expanded the criminalization of same-sex relations and would have penalized individuals, companies, and nongovernmental organizations who support LGBTQI rights.

Political Backlash in the Twenty-First Century

The twenty-first century also marked a shift in how a number of African states have engaged with LGBTQI issues, with state leaders and governments employing a variety of approaches. First, political actors in certain countries (particularly quasi-democratic countries) have used inflammatory rhetoric to denounce homosexuality and to condone violence toward LGBTQI individuals. Among other examples, this includes the stated intentions of Yahya Jammeh (1965–), the former president of the Gambia, to behead homosexuals and Mugabe’s rhetoric against gays and lesbians in Zimbabwe.

In addition to placing LGBTQI individuals at increased risk of state-sponsored and extrajudicial violence/discrimination, antihomosexual animus on the part of certain state leaders has also resulted in the introduction or expansion of legislation criminalizing same-sex relations. This includes Nigeria’s enactment in 2014 of the Same Sex Marriage (Prohibition) Act, which not only criminalized same-sex marriage but also outlawed the creation of or participation in “gay clubs, societies, and organizations” and banned cohabitation or public shows of affection for same-sex couples. Perhaps most notoriously, the parliament of Uganda in 2014 passed the Anti-Homosexuality Act, which, had it not been ruled invalid on procedural grounds by the nation’s constitutional court, would have expanded the criminalization of same-sex relations and would have penalized individuals, companies, and NGOs who support LGBTQI rights. Additionally, Malawi amended its penal code in 2011 to extend the criminalization of same-sex relations to women and in 2015 to ban same-sex marriage, and Burundi enacted legislation criminalizing same-sex relations in 2009.

Not all state governments have condoned or fanned anti-LGBTQI sentiment within their countries. But in light of the generally high levels of anti-LGBTQI public opinion in most parts of sub-Saharan Africa, political leaders may not be in a position to publicly demonstrate their support for LGBTQI rights. In such instances, some politicians have supported LGBTQI populations in discreet ways that would avoid provoking public ire. For example, Festus Mogae (1939–), the former president of Botswana, claimed that he gave police secret instructions to not harass LGBTQI individuals during his presidency (1998–2008) but that he did not believe it possible to take a visibly supportive role while he was in office (Epprecht 2013). In 2016 Ghanaian activists expressed outrage when opposition politicians in Scotland refused to meet with the state leader, then president John Dramani Mahama (1958–), on account of Ghana’s ongoing criminalization of male same-sex relations; Mahama had, in fact, been very supportive of LGBTQI rights in discreet but meaningful ways.

Countries in the Global North, perhaps most notably the United States during Barack Obama’s second presidential term (2013–2017), also became more vocal about human rights violations facing LGBTQI persons in sub-Saharan Africa. Countries such as the Netherlands and Sweden had provided overseas development assistance and diplomatic capital to support LGBTQI activism in the twenty-first century. In contrast, the diplomatic engagement of the United Kingdom and the United States was more reactive and emerged particularly in response to a series of gruesome human rights violations late in the first decade of the twenty-first century and early in the second, including the murder of a prominent Ugandan LGBTQI activist, David Kato, in 2011. As is discussed in greater detail below, the optics and impacts of northern countries’ diplomatic relations have not always been well thought out or welcomed by local activists, who have sometimes faced heightened backlash as a result of northern interventions.

Accomplishments in the Twenty-First Century

In spite of the many challenges faced by LGBTQI activists in sub-Saharan Africa, some significant progress was made toward equality and nondiscrimination for LGBTQI individuals in the first part of the twenty-first century.
The South African Civil Union Act of 2006  The road to same-sex marriage in South Africa came through the landmark 2005 ruling of the nation's constitutional court in Minister of Home Affairs and Another v. Fourie and Another. In this particular case, the court declared that the common-law definition of marriage is inconsistent with the Constitution of South Africa and invalid to the extent that it does not permit same-sex couples’ enjoyment of the status and the benefits coupled with the responsibilities it accords to heterosexual couples. Following this decision, the parliament of South Africa passed the Civil Union Act, which came into operation on 30 November 2006. The act acknowledges that the family law dispensation as it existed after the commencement of the constitution did not provide for same-sex couples to enjoy the status and benefits that marriage accords opposite-sex couples. This act made South Africa the first and, as of 2017, the only country in Africa to recognize same-sex marriage.

MSM and HIV  As with the earlier era of LGBTQI organizing, health and HIV-focused interventions have remained an important area of LGBTQI organizing, with some notable successes. First, a number of countries’ national HIV prevention strategies include provisions to ensure that MSM are included in programming as an at-risk population. For example, Malawi’s National HIV Prevention Strategy for 2015–2020 includes measures to facilitate access to education and resources for men who have sex with men. In Kenya, after years of persistent attempts by activists from LGBTQI organizations to have MSM included among the most-at-risk populations, the National AIDS Control Council included MSM in the Kenya National HIV/AIDS Strategic Plan 2009/10–2013 (now referred to as the Kenya AIDS Strategic Framework). This effectively means that the Ministry of Health has acknowledged the existence of this population and has committed to running MSM-specific programming. Indeed, even in Zimbabwe, where political homophobia was first pioneered in sub-Saharan Africa, the National HIV and AIDS Strategic Plan for 2011–2015 recognized MSM as a key population. In addition to providing vital health services and information to at-risk populations, the inclusion of MSM within these strategic plans may also facilitate activists’ subsequent pushing for legal reforms.

Registration of LGBTQI Organizations  In many sub-Saharan countries, organizations working on LGBTQI issues do so under vague organizational names with no explicit connection to LGBTQI identities in order to avoid provoking excessive scrutiny. Others have sought to register organizations whose names include explicit references to LGBTQI identities and have, on occasion, encountered barriers in formally registering their organization as a result. In 2012 Lesbians, Gays, and Bisexuals of Botswana filed an application for registration as an NGO, which the Department of Civil and National Registration rejected on the basis that the Constitution of Botswana does not recognize homosexuals and that the objectives of the organization are contrary to the Societies Act. Following a rejected appeal, the case was filed in 2013 before the High Court of Botswana, which declared that the decision was unconstitutional. This decision was then appealed by the attorney general. In a landmark ruling issued in 2016, the Botswana Court of Appeal declared that human rights are universal and are enjoyed by every member of the society irrespective of the person’s gender or sexual orientation. It also declared that, although provisions of the nation’s penal code limit same-sex sexual activities, they do not extend to criminalizing LGBTQI people themselves. The court’s decision focused on the right to freedom of association, which is protected by Section 13 of Botswana’s constitution and by international human rights instruments.

In Kenya, Eric Gitari sought to register an NGO with the nation’s Non-governmental Organizations Coordination Board to address the violence and human rights abuses suffered by LGBTQI people. The organization he sought to register had the name National Gay and Lesbian Human Rights Commission. The NGO board quoted Sections 162, 163, and 165 of the Kenyan penal code as the basis for rejecting the name as unacceptable. These penal code sections criminalize “carnal knowledge ... against the order of nature.” After several failed attempts to register the organization, Gitari commenced litigation proceedings on the grounds that his constitutional rights to freedom of association and freedom from discrimination had been violated. In 2015 the High Court of Kenya held that the Constitution of Kenya does grant every person the right to form an association of any kind. It held that, regardless of the NGO board’s views toward LGBTQI people, it has a duty as a state entity to act in accordance with the constitution. These two legal victories enabled the organizations in question to register as domestic NGOs and have provided an encouraging precedent for other LGBTQI organizations in the region.

African Commission on Human and Peoples’ Rights

Established by the African Charter on Human and Peoples’ Rights in 1987, the eleven-member African Commission on Human and Peoples’ Rights (ACHPR) serves the functions of protecting and promoting human and peoples’ rights and interpreting the African Charter. The ACHPR sometimes invites states, national liberation movements, specialized institutions, national human rights institutions, NGOs, or individuals to take part in its sessions. The commissioners’ engagement on LGBTQI issues arose following years of intense activist intervention.

In May 2014, at the commission’s 55th Ordinary Session, held in Luanda, Angola, the ACHPR adopted a resolution on protection from violence and other human rights violations against persons on the basis of their real or perceived sexual orientation or gender identity. The adoption of this resolution was a momentous occasion in African LGBTQI activism insofar as it marked the first time that a Pan-African body recognized the existence of and the violence faced by persons of different sexual orientations and gender identities. The resolution strongly urged states to end all acts of violence and abuse, whether committed by state or nonstate actors, targeting persons on the basis of their imputed or real sexual orientation or gender identities.

In 2015, following the adoption of the resolution, the Coalition of African Lesbians (CAL) was granted observer status at the ACHPR, an objective that CAL had sought since it first submitted a (rejected) application in 2008, in part to raise awareness and visibility about the existence of African lesbians. Prior to 2015, the commission had rejected several other applications from CAL. In an intensely hostile session that year, Lawrence Mute, a commissioner from Kenya, reminded the other commissioners that “100 years ago, women didn’t have rights. We have a responsibility based on our mandate to protect the vulnerable” (quoted in Sekyiamah 2015).

Trans and Intersex In 2004 South African legislation that enabled trans persons to apply for the legal adjustment of one’s gender identity came into effect. More recently, a landmark 2014 court ruling in Kenya held that Audrey Mbugua, a prominent trans woman and activist, had the right to have her name changed on her official academic records. While this ruling pertained solely to the change of name in official documents and did not include changing an individual’s legal gender, this litigation provided a strategic opening for advocacy for the full realization of the rights of transgender people in Kenya. In South Africa, the intersex activist Sally Gross championed legislation that, in 2006, clarified that the constitution's equality clause’s definition of sex includes intersex and therefore extends constitutional protection against discrimination on the basis of sex characteristics.

Other Legal Reforms Notwithstanding some of the harsh legal reforms that certain countries have implemented, some countries have modified criminal codes and legislations in ways that have advanced the rights of LGBTQI persons. Significantly, Cabo Verde and Mozambique adopted new penal codes in 2004 and 2015, respectively, that removed previous provisions dating back to Portuguese colonial rule that had criminalized same-sex sexual acts as “vices against nature.” Similarly, the parliament of Seychelles voted to decriminalize same-sex sexual acts in 2016. Additionally, a range of countries have introduced provisions that protect LGBTQI persons from workplace discrimination. Such antidiscrimination measures originated with South Africa’s Employment Equity Act (1998) and Labour Relations Act (1995), which contain provisions protecting employees from unfair discrimination in the workplace based on sexual orientation and other grounds.

In 2010 an amendment to Botswana’s Employment Act was passed, adding sexual orientation and health status (including HIV/AIDS status) as prohibited grounds for discrimination. Even though both male and female same-sex activities are prohibited in the Botswana penal code, the termination of contracts of employment on the grounds of sexual orientation is prohibited. This provides the activists in the country a good legislative and litigation path on which they can pursue the reform of laws criminalizing same-sex conduct. The 2008 Labor Code of Cabo Verde—a country in which same-sex conduct is not criminalized—explicitly imposes sanctions on employers who dismiss employees based on their sexual orientation. Mauritius, Mozambique, and Seychelles have also introduced laws protecting LGBTQI individuals from discrimination at their workplaces based on their sexual orientation.
Issues and Debates in Sub-Saharan African LGBTQI Activism

Imbalances in LGBTQI Organizing As has been the case in most other regions, power imbalances, prejudices, and changing donor agendas have meant that certain LGBTQI identities (namely, gay/bisexual men and MSM) have tended to receive more attention, programming, and publicity than have other members of the region’s LGBTQI communities. For example, in her research with Kenyan activists, Kaitlin Dearham (2013) noted how three factors contributed to women’s underrepresentation within queer Kenyan spaces: (1) the reproduction of gender hierarchies and biases within LGBTQI organizations; (2) the greater difficulties women face in being open about their sexuality (for example, economic marginalization and pressures to marry and have children); and (3) LGBTQI organizations’ and donors’ emphasis on MSM and HIV/AIDS.

Trans advocacy has often received far less visibility or recognition within mainstream LGBTQI and/or MSM organizations. The limited visibility of trans advocacy has been compounded by an underemphasis on trans organizing on the part of LGBTQI scholars, who have tended to emphasize same-sex intimacies rather than issues of gender identity and expression (see, e.g., Theron 2013). Intersex activism in sub-Saharan Africa has been even less visible within or integrated into broader LGBTQI organizing across the region, even though intersex persons face substantive rights violations in the region. For example, reports of systematic intersex-specific infanticide have been documented in South Africa and Uganda (ILGA and ARC International 2017).

Poverty and the Inadequacy of Legislative Change for LGBTQI Rights Whereas LGBTQI activists in advanced industrialized democracies have generally limited their advocacy agenda to pressing for legislative changes (e.g., decriminalizing same-sex relations, legalizing changes to gender identity markers, legalizing same-sex marriage), a narrow, legislative-focused advocacy strategy has proven to be entirely inadequate in the context of sub-Saharan Africa, for several interrelated reasons. First, the majority of violence targeting LGBTQI individuals in sub-Saharan Africa occurs at the hands of family, friends, or other civilians rather than at the hands of law enforcement officials. Decriminalizing same-sex relations can certainly assist in protecting the rights of LGBTQI persons and should lead to a decrease in police harassment, blackmailing, and the incarceration of LGBTQI persons. As public opinion research in South Africa has suggested, however, legislative changes may have a negligible effect on overall public opinion (which, in the context of South Africa, remains overwhelmingly hostile to homosexuality in spite of legislative advancements in this country since 1996; see de Vos 2015). In such a climate, extrajudicial violence targeting LGBTQI persons has remained extraordinarily high, particularly for LGBTQI persons with multiple, intersecting marginalized identities. Black lesbians and black trans individuals from lower-income townships, in particular, continue to face extraordinary rates of violence and murder (Currier and Cruz 2014). Some organizations have countered this general trend by developing campaigns focused on changing public opinion through community-based awareness-raising activities and through building coalitions with religious leaders, women’s movements, disability movements, and unions, among others. Some important accomplishments have been made in this regard, not the least of which include Archbishop Desmond Tutu’s remarks in 2013 that he “would not worship a homophobic God.” Nevertheless, the overall climate facing many LGBTQI communities in sub-Saharan Africa remains hostile, in particular for those LGBTQI individuals facing multiple and intersecting forms of discrimination on the basis of race, class, income, ability, or gender, for example.

Relatedly, legislative change alone is unlikely to address the pervasive impacts of poverty on LGBTQI persons in sub-Saharan Africa. For many LGBTQI persons in sub-Saharan Africa, poverty contributes to a downward spiral of human rights violations: LGBTQI persons living in poverty face a disproportionate risk of violence or persecution (see, e.g., Dearham 2013), and they may encounter greater difficulty in accessing necessary medical services. At the same time, being LGBTQI also puts an individual at greater risk of experiencing poverty (for example, on account of being disowned by family, being discriminated against when looking for a job, and/or being fired when one’s sexuality, gender identity, or intersex status becomes known to a current employer). Advocacy that focuses solely on civil and political rights is unlikely to address or reverse the impacts of these negative spirals.

LGBTQI Activism as “Un-African” and North-South Power Dynamics The perception that LGBTQI identities—and, in particular, queer intimacies—are “un-African” remains one of the most consistent challenges that LGBTQI activists face across sub-Saharan Africa. This claim, which is frequently leveled by political and religious leaders, has been disproven by historians’ rigorous documentation of how queer intimacies emerged before and in response to colonialism among various cultures across the continent (see, e.g., Epprecht 2001; 2014; Moodie, Ndatsh, and Sibuy 1988). As Marc Epprecht (2013) observed, however, the mere existence of such historical precedents has not proven to be a particularly effective tool with which to convince those who decry homosexuality as un-African otherwise.

Furthermore, and as with other non-Western regions, local activists also engage in ongoing debates about whether the specific Western categories of “L, G, B, T, Q, and I” should be used in a region with a much greater range of endogenous forms of sexual diversity, gender identities, gender expressions, and sex characteristics. In this context, the tension lies not with whether diverse sexual and gender identities are “African” but, rather, with how these should be conceptualized and/or translated domestically and internationally (see Currier and Cruz 2014; O’Mara 2013; Theron 2013). Certain scholars (e.g., Massad 2002; Hoad 2007) have similarly criticized international NGOs that promote LGBTQI rights for doing so in a manner that exports Western models of gay rights without questioning how and/or whether these may or may not conform to local realities.

The fact that local LGBTQI organizing is often financially supported by international NGOs and/or by foreign countries has certainly compounded the challenge of being perceived as un-African and has contributed to the perception that such activists are simply importing Western values for financial profit (Currier 2012). Funding considerations, therefore, place many local LGBTQI organizations in an uncomfortable situation: such organizations rely on foreign funding to deliver vital programming and services; however, these organizations also risk being seen as co-opted if their acceptance of foreign funding or the tenor of their organizational priorities is perceived to reflect too strong of a connection to foreign LGBTQI organizing. Moreover, as Liesl Theron, John McAllister, and Mariam Armisen (2016) elaborate on, a reliance on foreign donor funding often influences local NGOs’ agendas, with the result that the legal and policy-focused activities valued by funders (for example, training initiatives, writing shadow reports for United Nations or regional human rights processes, and documenting rights violations) may be privileged over activities with greater importance to local LGBTQI communities.

These North-South tensions have generally been further exacerbated when donor countries have threatened to take coercive measures such as cutting development assistance to countries that violate LGBTQI human rights. For example, in 2011, when then British prime minister David Cameron (1966–) threatened that the United Kingdom would cut aid to countries that persecuted LGBTQI persons, a group of over fifty organizations across Africa signed a joint statement cautioning that “the decision to cut aid disregards the role of the LGBTI and broader social justice movement on the continent and creates the real risk of a serious backlash against LGBTI people” (“Statement of African Social Justice Activists” 2011).

A related phenomenon, well known to scholars and activists who study social movements across the Global South, is the challenge of “NGOization.” This term refers to the pressures faced by local social movements/organizing to professionalize (for example, to demonstrate competency in managing budgets and conducting monitoring and evaluation) in order to secure external funding (Alvarez 1998). Yet, by professionalizing, social movements and grassroots organizers must take on more bureaucratic work and may also feel more obliged to deliver on donor-determined activities and outcomes, rather than prioritizing the needs and demands of local LGBTQI persons. Theron, McAllister, and Armisen (2016) demonstrate how these pressures to professionalize have contributed to individualistic organizational structures that overemphasize particular individuals’ roles and disincentivize grassroots movement-building. Furthermore, the roles and responsibilities of a professionalized NGO staff often require a level of education and formal training that many LGBTQI community members are unable to attain—in part because of discrimination in the education sector on the basis of their sexual orientation, gender identity, or sex characteristics.
Gift Trapence, Director of the Centre for the Development of People (CEDEP), in 2011. CEDEP is a nongovernmental organization established in 2005 to address the needs of sexual minorities in Malawi. Due to CEDEP’s efforts, Malawian president Joyce Banda suspended laws criminalizing homosexuality in 2012.

Ways Forward

Since the early 1990s, organizations serving and advocating on behalf of LGBTQI communities have proliferated across sub-Saharan Africa. Since their formation, a number of significant victories have been won, including constitutional reforms in South Africa, the explicit inclusion of men who have sex with men in national HIV/AIDS strategies, and securing the right to legally register as an LGBTQI organization. However, these victories have been accompanied by a number of challenges, not least of which include donor pressures, power inequalities within LGBTQI communities, and an overemphasis on legislative/legal reform. The dire need to address the effects of trauma and intolerance on LGBTQI communities, as exemplified through activists’ and individuals’ high rates of substance abuse, mental health concerns, burnout, suicide, and dysfunctional relationships (Theron, McAllister, and Armisen 2016), has also resurfaced during these first decades.

It is encouraging, as exemplified in Theron, McAllister, and Armisen's 2016 article, that there is a growing acknowledgment of the need to practice critical reflection and to interrogate the power dynamics within LGBTQI communities, as well as between organizations, the communities they serve, and donors. The possibility for a new generation of more self-critical organizations and donors exists, as does the possibility to expand LGBTQI activism to include more inclusive, creative, grassroots-relevant, and healing-centered organizing.
BIBLIOGRAPHY

Adoption and Surrogacy in Europe

MICHAEL STAMBOLIS-RUHSTORFER
Assistant Professor, American and Gender Studies
University of Bordeaux Montaigne, France

The availability and legal rights surrounding the issues of adoption and surrogacy for European LGBT persons.

Same-sex couples and individual LGBT people have been creating families and raising their children with and without official legal or administrative recognition for many decades. Thanks to increasingly positive social acceptance and their efforts to push European countries to give them equal access to techniques and laws enjoyed by heterosexuals—with varying degrees of success depending on the context—they have pursued evolving pathways to parenthood over time.

Previously, LGBT people most frequently became parents through heterosexual relationships before publicly revealing their sexual or gender identity. Since the 1980s, many have created “intentional families” through joint adoption; assisted reproductive technology (ART), such as donor insemination; and surrogacy (Moore and Stambolis-Ruhstorfer 2013). Some also pursue nonmedically assisted insemination and coparenting arrangements in which lesbian and gay couples or individuals have children together. Unlike in heterosexual relationships where family law usually automatically recognizes parental ties between children and parents, in many countries it recognizes only biological parents in same-sex couples — the mother in a lesbian couple who carries the child or the father in a gay couple whose sperm is used in a surrogacy arrangement, for instance—or the adoptive parent in the case of single adoption. For this reason, second-parent adoption is a crucial way for the other, not automatically legally recognized parent to guarantee their parental rights and secure their families more generally.

Yet, all of these different pathways to parenting for LGBT people vary significantly both across and within European countries. They also depend on legislation and jurisprudence relative to administrative, social service, bioethical, family, and international law. In addition to this legal complexity, case-by-case decision-making by judges and social services creates uncertainty and vulnerability for many European LGBT families (Mezey 2015). To overcome prohibitions, same-sex couples and LGBT people with sufficient financial resources often travel to international destinations within and beyond Europe to access services such as ART and surrogacy. International adoption, however, has decreased since the 1990s and has become especially difficult for sexual and gender minorities.
Legal Recognition of Adoption, Surrogacy, and Assisted Reproduction in Europe for different and same-sex couples (as of 2017)

Notes: Overall score is sum of forms of access to parenthood for same-sex couples/single LGBT people.

Variation across Time, Countries, and Pathways

ART for lesbians, surrogacy for gay men, and adoption for same-sex couples is unevenly available across Europe. This variation is related to, but distinct from, legal recognition of same-sex marriage and registered partnerships. Indeed, same-sex parenting tends to be more controversial than same-sex relationships in Europe. Portugal and Belgium, for example, legalized same-sex marriage several years before legalizing same-sex adoption. In general, these pathways to parenting have become available only in the last few decades.
ART for lesbians, either as individuals or as couples, is the most widely available pathway to parenting in Europe (27 out of 47 Council of Europe countries). Surrogacy is the least available. Only 12 European countries allow the practice, 8 of which do not restrict it to heterosexuals. Among European countries that allow joint adoption (17) and second-parent adoption (20), almost all are European Union (EU) member states. In contrast, half the countries permitting surrogacy and 37 percent permitting ART are outside the EU. Thus, although there is generally a more tolerant legal climate for LGBT parenting in the EU, there is still both strong resistance within and tolerance outside the EU. For instance, in 2017 France continued to ban surrogacy within its borders and limit ART to heterosexual couples but permit same-sex adoption. At the same time, Belarus does not explicitly prohibit either ART or surrogacy but does prohibit adoption for same-sex couples. Some countries, such as Russia and Ukraine, where ART and surrogate have been relatively unregulated, are considering measures to exclude LGBT people.

Assisted Reproductive Technology and Surrogacy

While ART is relatively accessible to single women and/or lesbian couples in Europe, surrogacy is controversial and limited. Surrogacy raises ethical questions about the potential for exploitation of surrogate mothers and requires more involved forms of gamete donation fertilization than do either artificial insemination or in vitro fertilization. To deal with bioethical issues related in part to reproduction, the Council of Europe’s Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Dignity of the Human Being with Regard to the Application of Biology and Medicine (entered into force in 1999)—also called the Oviedo Convention—sets a minimum, self-regulated standard for signatory countries. It takes no definitive stance on prohibitions over surrogacy or ART. Individual European countries must therefore make policies to deal with surrogacy contracts, commercial regulation of ART and surrogate services, and children’s access to the identity of surrogate and gamete donors. Although these questions affect all potential parents seeking these services, lawmakers often use heteronormative assumptions to guide their decision-making and therefore exclude LGBT people.

European Court of Human Rights

As with other fights for gender and sexual justice in Council of Europe countries, LGBT people have taken their claims to the European Court of Human Rights (ECHR) where they invoke Articles 8 and 14 of the European Convention on Human Rights (Wintemute 2015). They argue that these articles guarantee their private and family lives and shield them from discrimination on the basis of sexual and gender identity. Initially the ECHR was not receptive to these arguments and said states were justified in limiting pathways to parenting to heterosexual people or different-sex couples. Since the beginning of the twenty-first century, that jurisprudence has shifted toward increasing recognition of LGBT
In the case of Karner v. Austria (2003), the court laid the framework for the principle that rights granted to unmarried different-sex couples should also extend to unmarried same-sex couples. In theory, this means that in places such as Andorra, Austria, Liechtenstein, Portugal, and Romania, where second-parent adoption is possible for unmarried couples, same-sex couples should also have that right. Local adoption authorities and courts, however, do not necessarily apply this principle. In a later ruling in the case of X and Others v. Austria (2013), the court made this principle explicit when it found that Austria violated Articles 8 and 14 of the convention by allowing partners in different-sex—but not same-sex—couples to adopt one another’s children. In so doing, the judges overruled Kerkhoven v. Netherlands (1992), which found that contrary to an unmarried man in a heterosexual relationship, the unmarried nonbiological mother in a lesbian relationship had no right to parental authority over her child conceived through donor insemination and carried by her partner. In addition, X and Others v. Austria made it clear that countries were not within their margin of appreciation (i.e., leeway that countries may exercise over certain areas of law) in discriminating between same-sex and different-sex unmarried couples over adoption. In theory, these decisions should also apply to access to ART where it is made available to unmarried different-sex couples, such as France and Italy (Wintemute 2015). In practice, these countries have denied lesbian couples such access.

This case law is limited, however, because of its narrow focus on the marital status of couples. Indeed, whereas countries are now in violation of the convention if they prevent unmarried same-sex—but not different-sex—couples from adopting, the ECHR finds no discrimination if married and unmarried couples are treated differently. Specifically, in Gas and Dubois v. France (2012), the court ruled that France could deny second-parent adoption to unmarried same-sex couples because it also denied that possibility to unmarried different-sex couples. Yet, at the time, only different-sex couples could marry and therefore adopt in France. Thus, in the court’s judgment, countries may limit adoption to married couples even if they prevent same-sex couples from marrying. Since 2013, same-sex couples can marry in France and indeed must do so in order to adopt, either jointly or each other’s children. Elsewhere, however, in the absence of universal same-sex marriage and the restriction of adoption to married couples, many European countries can continue to prevent same-sex couples from adopting without violating the convention.

The ECHR has also dealt with the issue of discrimination against individual LGBT people on matters of adoption by singles and custody after divorce. For example, in France, where singles can adopt, some local social service agencies would grant applications only to ostensibly heterosexual people. After initially finding that such discrimination was justifiable—in Fretté v. France (2002)—the court eventually determined in E. B. v. France (2008) that this violated Articles 8 and 14 of the convention. In Mouta v. Portugal (1999) and P. V. v. Spain (2010), the court ruled that gender identity and sexual orientation cannot justify a refusal of custody, visitation, or parental authority. Taken together, these rulings also suggest that single lesbians must have access to ART when it is available to single heterosexual women. Yet, as with all ECHR decisions, countries unevenly apply the letter or logic of its rulings, if at all.

On the issue of surrogacy, the ECHR has examined whether countries that ban the practice must nevertheless recognize the ties between intentional parents and their children born through surrogacy abroad. In Mennesson v. France (2014), the court found that France, which had refused to recognize the French citizenship of two children born to an American surrogate mother and French father, had violated their rights. Despite this decision, France and other countries opposed to surrogacy have failed to consistently apply the ruling.

Attitudes

Like laws, public opinion on parenting by same-sex couples and LGBT people varies significantly across European countries (Takács, Szalma, and Bartus 2016). In many European contexts people are more favorable of same-sex relationships than parenting. Indeed, a 2003 survey of respondents in twenty-five European countries found that 53 percent favored legalizing marriage, whereas 38 percent favored legalizing adoption (EOS Gallup Europe 2003). People in northern and western European countries, with the notable exceptions of France, Italy, Germany, and Portugal, tend to be more accepting of adoption than in other parts of Europe. Although trends have since shifted toward more acceptance, especially in places where it is or has recently become legal, LGBT parenting continues to incite resistance.

Resistance and Backlash

Those opposing the full citizenship of LGBT people in Europe have used parenting by same-sex couples to stoke resistance. Indeed, many European antigay organizations have fought against laws recognizing same-sex marriage and domestic partnerships by arguing that such laws would make it easier for same-sex couples to adopt (Kuhar and Paternotte 2017). In some cases they draw on malicious stereotypes conflating homosexuality and pedophilia. Despite the scientific consensus to the contrary (Adams and Light 2015; Bos and van Balen 2008; Goldberg 2010; Moore and Stambolis-Ruhstorfer 2013), they also claim that children raised by same-sex couples fare less well than those raised by married heterosexual couples. Some organizations, such as the International Children’s Rights Institute and the European Centre for Law and Justice, have gone so far as to use the argument of human rights against LGBT people. They have attempted to use international law, including the European Convention on Human Rights and the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child, to argue that countries have a legal obligation to ensure that children be raised by a mother and father. Furthermore, such groups oppose surrogacy in general and ART for lesbians—as well as anonymous gamete donation—suggesting that children have a right to know their genetic origins.

SEE ALSO Adoption, Fostering, and Surrogacy (International); Family Law in Asia; Human Rights in Europe; Kinship in Europe; Lesbian Mothering and Adoption in Latin America; Marriage, Universal, in Europe; Parenting Rights in North America

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Adoption, Fostering, and Surrogacy (International)

MICHAEL STAMBOLIS-RUHSTORFER
Assistant Professor, American and Gender Studies
University of Bordeaux Montaigne, France

The legal and social challenges LGBTQ adults face to access intercountry adoption and surrogacy, as well as challenges LGBTQ youth face when rejected from their families.

This entry addresses issues that emerge when LGBTQ people cross national borders in order to create families via adoption or surrogacy. Specifically, it details the general process of intercountry adoption and the ways in which international and local authorities (most of whom explicitly or implicitly limit adoption to heterosexuals, cisgender people, and different-sex couples) take into account the sexual and gender identity of prospective parents. It further explains the political and social stakes around international surrogacy, a service some gay men use to have children. Finally, it also discusses how LGBTQ youth are more likely to be rejected by their families and thus be in need of emergency shelter, fostering, and adoption in different national contexts.

Intercountry Adoption by LGBTQ Persons

Intercountry adoption is the process whereby single people or couples in one country (the receiving country) adopt a child born in a different country (the country of origin or sending country). The complex process involves establishing formal parental ties between the child and the adoptive parent or parents in both countries, organizing the relinquishing of parental rights of the birth parents where applicable, and arranging immigration. Although it has often been portrayed as a way to provide families to orphans or children in impoverished or war-torn countries whose biological parents do not have the means to care for them, intercountry adoption is politically, ethically, and emotionally fraught. In the wake of World War II, wealthy nations in the Global North, especially the United States, saw intercountry adoption as a way to respond to humanitarian crises, but it eventually evolved into a way for parents from those countries to find alternatives to local adoption. Today, intercountry adoption is part of the global reproductive marketplace, which also includes surrogacy, to which parents with financial and cultural resources turn to create their families (Hofmann and Moreno 2016; Twine [2011] 2015). For these reasons, it is at the intersection of geopolitical problems and delicate family situations where questions around the best interests of the child, global inequality, discrimination, and neoliberal marketization of access to parenting animate actors on all sides (Breuning 2013; Efrat et al.
Indeed, even if it can bring parents and children together in a positive way, because of racial and economic inequality between families within and across receiving countries and countries of origin, intercountry adoption can also be problematic.

Within this broad context, concerns around the sexual orientation of potential parents in intercountry adoption became increasingly politicized just as LGBTQ parents were becoming more visible. As described in the following sections, authorities in the late twentieth century sought to better regulate intercountry adoption in order to avoid abuses and fraud, such as human trafficking. At the same time, the LGBTQ movement was organizing to protect queer families and, in many countries, to demand equal access to adoption and reproductive techniques. Rather than make intercountry adoption more open, policy makers in most countries of origin have responded by making heterosexuality a requirement for potential parents. Examples of countries with current explicit bans prohibiting adoption by LGBTQ individuals include Cameroon, China, Egypt, Ghana, India, Kenya, Kyrgyzstan, Madagascar, Marshall Islands, Panama, Paraguay, Russia, Togo, and Vietnam.

In addition to these explicit barriers, at the beginning of the twenty-first century, despite demand from hopeful parents, intercountry adoption has decreased somewhat as countries of origin have sent fewer children abroad. Factors that explain this decline include growing economic prosperity in major sending countries, including Russia, China, and India, as well as increased suspicion by parents and adoption authorities about the potential for human rights abuses generated by the demand for intercountry adoptions and brought to light through different scandals. Whether the decrease in intercountry adoption is temporary or not (Breuning 2013), the resulting increase in competition among prospective parents makes it even less likely that authorities in countries of origin will choose LGBTQ parents over straight, cisgender parents when making adoption decisions.

This situation makes it extremely challenging—and in many cases almost impossible—for single LGBTQ people and same-sex couples to adopt children from other countries (Brodzinsky and Pertman 2012). They face a range of legal barriers embedded within the multiple and overlapping jurisdictions, including the local or national law of their own countries and adoptee countries of origin, as well as international conventions, if the countries are signatories to them (Dambach 2011; Mertus 2011). They must be screened and approved as eligible to adopt in all of these jurisdictions. In theory, prospective parents could therefore adopt if they live in countries that permit LGBTQ individuals or same-sex couples to adopt and are found eligible in sending countries. In practice, the dearth of sending countries open to LGBTQ adoption means they have very few opportunities for intercountry adoption. In the hope that it will increase their chances, some potential parents turn to expensive private adoption agencies to navigate these legal complexities.

International Law
International legal frameworks that regulate intercountry adoption are technically neutral on LGBTQ parenting, but they were written in a context of more or less implicit heteronormative assumptions about suitable categories of parents (Dambach 2011). The first major text, the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child (UNCRC) of 1989, puts in place the principle that intercountry adoption should only be a last recourse if possible placement in adoptive or foster families is not possible in a child’s country of origin. All members of the United Nations are party to this treaty except the United States, which never ratified it. The UNCRC sets out broad codes relative to children’s rights.

In order to specifically reinforce guidelines and counter fraud on intercountry adoption, policy makers later established the Hague Convention on the Protection of Children and Co-operation in Respect of Intercountry Adoption of 1993. More than ninety-six countries had ratified it as of 2017, including the United States, and had created mandated systems in their adoption proceedings, such as a “central authority” in each country that monitors compliance. The preamble to the Hague Convention states: “intercountry adoptions [shall be] made in the best interests of the child and with respect for his or her fundamental rights, and to prevent the abduction, the sale of, or traffic in children,” and “each State should take, as a matter of priority, appropriate measures to enable the child to remain in the care of his or her family of origin.” In the original drafting, some countries sought to explicitly include language limiting intercountry adoption to married heterosexual couples. Even though this language was not ultimately included in the final draft, analysis of committee discussions reveals a consensus that LGBTQ people and same-sex couples ought to be excluded from intercountry adoption (Dambach 2011). Because laws and procedures in sending and receiving countries typically eliminated them from the pool of eligible parents anyway, specifying their exclusion in the convention was not considered necessary.

Today, advocates on both sides of LGBTQ adoption debates use the language of the UNCRC and the Hague Convention, especially the idea of the best interests of the child, to put pressure on their countries to lift or enact LGBTQ adoption bans. Opponents of LGBTQ adoption argue that these conventions guarantee a child’s right to be raised by a heterosexual couple. They say that signatory countries that allow such adoptions are in violation. Those in favor argue that categorical exclusions of LGBTQ people from adoption violate the ideals behind the language of the conventions because parental sexual and gender identity are arbitrary characteristics; they cannot determine suitability as a parent. Excluding LGBTQ people, they argue, prevents potential excellent parents from adopting and thus goes against the best interests of children.

National Laws and Their Impact

Each country determines whether local or foreign LGBTQ individuals and/or same-sex couples are eligible to adopt, as well as the number of children in need of placement. Countries vary widely in their stances, some of which are not codified in law but implemented in practice and can change from one internal jurisdiction to another, making generalization difficult. Moreover, since most adoption procedures involve decision-making on a case-by-case basis in a context of relative legal uncertainty about LGBTQ adoption, it is impossible to predict with certainty whether sexual orientation and gender identity will constitute a barrier or not, even in jurisdictions that are relatively open.

Little research systematically compares sending countries that allow foreign LGBTQ people and/or same-sex couples to adopt their children (see Dambach 2011 for an overview by international region). Given this situation, potential parents spend significant resources carefully looking for countries or jurisdictions—usually with the help of specialized adoption agencies—that have a high demand for adoptive parents and that also permit adoption by single people or that do not explicitly ban adoption by LGBTQ individuals or same-sex couples. These include parts of the United States, Brazil, Colombia, Mexico, and South Africa. Although adoption by same-sex couples and individuals is permitted in other locations, such as some countries in Europe, few children there are eligible for adoption.

Relationship status has an impact on the likelihood of adoption. Same-sex couples—especially those who are married in their home countries and thus cannot hide their relationships—are ineligible to adopt children from most countries because they ban adoption by same-sex couples. In contrast, single LGBTQ people are technically eligible to adopt in countries where adoption by single people is not prohibited. However, legislation in many of these places either explicitly or implicitly limits adoption to cisgender and heterosexual people. In these situations, LGBTQ individuals can choose not to disclose their sexual or gender identity, sometimes with the help of adoption professionals who do not include that information in their paperwork (Brodzinsky 2015). By doing so, however, they risk being found out by adoption agencies or authorities in sending countries that conduct thorough background checks to thwart such practices. This strategy also raises a number of other issues. They include ethical questions about violating local law, the impact of going “back into the closet” on parents and children, and the way fear of disclosure can make it more difficult for adoptive parents to adequately deal with problems that arise during and after adoption proceedings (Brodzinsky and Goldberg 2017).

Some countries are relatively open to LGBTQ intercountry adoption. Technically, countries that allow their own LGBTQ citizens to adopt are also open to intercountry adoption of their children by LGBTQ people from abroad. However, most of these countries, primarily in Europe and North America, receive rather than send adoptees. Only South Africa and the United States, which is both a sending and receiving country, have explicit legislation allowing intercountry adoption of their children by nonheterosexual people. Recently, there has been some openness in intracountry adoptions among several countries that have been among the top sending countries. In 2015 Colombia’s Constitutional Court lifted a ban on adoption by same-sex couples, thus making adoption possible for local couples and those abroad. Several Mexican states allow adoption by married same-sex couples. In Brazil, case law in several states has been favorable to adoption by LGBTQ individuals and couples. There is evidence that LGBTQ singles have adopted children from a number of countries despite official prohibitions, including Haiti, the Philippines, and Vietnam, but usually by not disclosing their sexual and gender identities.

In contrast, most major sending countries have reinforced discrimination against LGBTQ intercountry adoption over time. For example, in 2007 China enacted regulations limiting adoptions to married heterosexual couples. Previously, singles could petition to adopt but only if they signed a statement declaring their heterosexuality. This decision was explicitly a reaction to the growing legalization of adoption by LGBTQ people in places such as the Netherlands. Similarly, Guatemala requires that all single adoption petitioners sign a declaration of heterosexuality, and single men are especially subject to scrutiny. Ethiopia excludes same-sex couples and LGBTQ individuals, though the latter have been approved in some rare cases. South Korea and Ukraine have been among the largest sending countries, but both limit adoption to married couples and neither permits same-sex marriage. Before 2014, many single LGBTQ people successfully adopted Russian children. That year, along with a rising tide of anti-LGBTQ legislation, Russia passed a law explicitly banning international same-sex couples, as well as single people in countries permitting same-sex marriage, from adopting Russian children.

Queer Parenting and Transracial Adoption

The parenting qualities of LGBTQ people and same-sex couples have always been at the center of debates about whether or not they should be allowed to adopt and have access to reproductive technology. Whether raising adopted children or those conceived through assisted reproductive technology, surrogacy, or other means, research finds that parents in same-sex relationships have children who achieve the same range of positive and negative outcomes as children raised by comparable heterosexual couples (Manning et al. 2014; Moore and Stambolis-Ruhstorfer 2013). Adopted children face a variety of social and psychological specificities related to the circumstances that led to their adoption. LGBTQ parents who adopt thus deal with the same kinds of parenting challenges as their heterosexual and cisgender peers.

Yet local and intercountry adoption is organized as a marketplace where prospective parents compete with one another to adopt, while children compete with one another to be adopted. In places with few eligible children needing adoption, authorities may more easily exclude LGBTQ people, despite their similar qualities as parents. In places where there are more children needing placement than parents willing to adopt, such as the United States (Raleigh 2016), authorities may, on the contrary, seek out LGBTQ people. Indeed, research suggests that LGBTQ people are more interested in adopting than heterosexuals (Brodzinsky and Pertman 2012). In the United States, in particular, many adoption and fostering authorities have encouraged adoption by gays and lesbians because of their willingness to adopt older children, children with special needs, and children who are racial and ethnic minorities. However, this seemingly progressive inclusion has been premised on a neoliberal structuring of adoption where people with means—typically construed to be white—adopt children removed from working-class and poor families of color both in the United States and in the Global South (Briggs 2012; Rothman 2005).

In addition to the socioeconomic and geopolitical conditions that create a need for it, transracial adoption creates a number of specific issues that adoptive parents must address. These include understanding discrimination, forging identity, explaining origins, and ensuring safety and well-being in racist societies. Compared to heterosexuals, gays and lesbians confront these situations more often because they have higher rates of transracial adoption. They are also more likely to be in interracial romantic relationships (Farr and Patterson 2009; Steinbugler 2012).

Some research suggests that LGBTQ people’s experiences of marginalization make them better equipped to deal with transracial adoption than white heterosexual parents (Ausbrooks and Russell 2011). For example, recent research on intercountry adoption—much of which is interracial—finds that lesbian couples, on average, maintained contact with birth parents after adoption proceedings at higher rates than heterosexual couples (Brodzinsky and Goldberg 2017). This suggests that they may be more willing to confront issues around race and inequality and the role they play in their adoptive children’s lives. Don Romesburg—a white middle-class gay man and professor of women’s and gender studies who adopted a black girl with his partner—describes the importance of creating a “queer transracial family” that acknowledges and works to overcome the systems of domination that contribute to the need for transracial and intercountry adoption by contesting “colorblindness, homonormativity, and the consumerist, privatized family” (Romesburg 2014, 1).

Surrogacy

In addition to adoption, LGBTQ individuals and same-sex couples—just like heterosexual people and different-sex couples who struggle with fertility issues—also pursue pathways to parenting that allow them to be biologically related to their children. For single women and lesbian couples, this typically means artificial and in-vitro fertilization. For gay men who have the means to afford it, surrogacy is an option. Although both practices can involve crossing international borders—as when lesbians living in countries that restrict medically assisted reproduction to heterosexuals travel to fertility clinics abroad, for example—surrogacy is legal in fewer places, thus driving gay men to the international marketplace. In addition, the biological, ethical, and financial stakes around surrogacy are higher (Twine [2011] 2015). Indeed, given the power imbalances across gender, racial, class, and global political lines between intentional parents and women practicing surrogacy, it is more susceptible to international scrutiny and criticism. Critics worry that the marketization of women’s reproduction will lead to their exploitation. Hostility toward surrogacy can be especially strong when those seeking surrogacy are gay men, because people are more suspicious of their desire to become fathers (Mamo 2007).

Surrogacy is not specifically regulated under any international treaties or organizations, though efforts to restrict or ban it have been gaining momentum (see, for example, a 2015 motion for a European Parliament resolution decrying it as a violation of the “human dignity” of women). In the absence of an international framework, countries have implemented legislation on both the legality of surrogacy within their borders and how to recognize—or not—the children born to their citizens via surrogacy abroad. Some countries, such as Australia and the United Kingdom, allow noncommercial surrogacy, which means that women can volunteer but not profit from being surrogates. Most intentional parents turn to countries that permit commercial surrogacy. India, Ukraine, and Russia, which used to be key destinations for future fathers, all now have explicit bans prohibiting gay men from seeking surrogacy in their countries. Other destinations, such as Mexico and, especially, the United States, have thus emerged as the primary destination for wealthy gay men. Indeed, the United States has gained a global reputation as one of the more welcoming countries to gay men seeking the services of American surrogates. In most cases, gay men usually turn to specialized surrogacy agencies that put them in contact with potential surrogates and organize the medical aspects (egg donation in the case of gestational surrogacy, in-vitro fertilization, prenatal care, delivery, and postnatal care). The agencies also help gay men navigate the extremely complex process of establishing legal proof of parenthood. Fathers from abroad must then also manage to convince the embassies of their own countries to recognize their paternity and provide travel documents, allowing parents to return home with their children born via surrogacy.

Research reveals that gay fathers usually establish varying degrees of lasting connections with surrogates so that their children can know about and maintain contact with them (Côté et al. 2018). Despite the financial aspect of the relation between these men and the women who carry their children, gay fathers and surrogates invest emotionally in these relationships, which often continue after the children are born. Maintaining these ties can be complicated by distance. Evidence from the United States suggests that some fathers make an effort to organize visits in which they spend time with their children and their surrogates, many of whom are married and have children of their own.

LGBTQ Youth, Fostering, and Homelessness

Sexual and gender identity also play an important role in the family experiences of LGBTQ youth. They are more likely than their heterosexual and cisgender peers to face bullying in schools, rejection from their families, and discrimination in social services. Although overlooked for decades, research on the experiences of LGBTQ youth in the child welfare system, both in the United States and in other countries, shows that they confront challenges and disparities, including isolation, discrimination, maltreatment, and instability (McCormick et al. 2017). Many of these issues are related to both anti-LGBTQ attitudes among foster families and welfare systems unwilling or unable to recognize the LGBTQ youth in their care. When placed with accepting foster families, young LGBTQ people have better outcomes. Recruiting, educating, and training foster families is therefore crucial for creating an affirming environment for them (McCormick et al. 2016). Most LGBTQ youth are also resilient and resourceful themselves. They navigate a relatively unwelcoming system by organizing with one another and turning toward other LGBTQ people for solidarity and support.

Despite advances in formal rights in many contexts, LGBTQ youth—especially minors whom the welfare system has failed and young adults rejected by their families and social support systems—are some of the most vulnerable people. For example, in the United States, studies have found that over 40 percent of homeless youth are LGBTQ (Choi et al. 2015). Internationally, LGBTQ associations have organized to try to meet the needs of the youngest members of their communities in these desperate situations. Examples of organizations include the Pride Shelter Trust (South Africa), the Albert Kennedy Trust (United Kingdom), Le Refuge (France), and the network of LGBT Centers and True Colors Fund (United States). To combat LGBTQ youth homelessness, these groups, which vary in scope and scale, establish emergency shelters, set up longer-term transitional housing, run professional training, and strive to create a sense of community and acceptance. Along with other social movement organizations, they also fight against the social conditions that contribute to the vulnerability of the young people they serve in the first place. Many LGBTQ people volunteer time and resources to make these efforts successful. They understand that the LGBTQ community can act as a kind of extended family to those who have been failed by their families of origin and governments.

SEE ALSO Adoption and Surrogacy in Europe; Family Law in Asia; Lesbian Mothering and Adoption in Latin America; Parenting Rights in North America

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Mertus, Jennifer B. “Barriers, Hurdles, and Discrimination: The Current Status of LGBT

Aestheticism and Decadence, Nineteenth-Century

RICHARD A. KAYE
Associate Professor, Hunter College
The City University of New York

The important figures and works of these interrelated cultural movements that explored queer and erotic themes around the end of the nineteenth century.

Aestheticism and decadence were two interrelated but also distinct cultural movements at the end of the nineteenth century throughout Britain, elsewhere in Europe (particularly France), and to an extent in the United States. Aestheticism—sometimes described by scholars as an “art-for-art’s-sake” aesthetic program—sought to elevate aesthetic works above social and political agendas. That impulse was intensified in the decadent movement’s rejection of conventional Victorian ethical and social boundaries, thereby allowing artistic works to entertain dissident, “immoral,” or antisocial erotic themes, motifs, and scenarios. In the diverse writings of Algernon Charles Swinburne, Walter Pater, Oscar Wilde, Olive Schreiner, John Addington Symonds, Simeon Solomon, Aubrey Beardsley, and Vernon Lee, aestheticism and decadence became modes of exploring daring subject matter related to the erotic life and of experimenting with new formal strategies that are recognizably “queer.” Elsewhere in Europe and the United States, too, aesthetes insisted that artworks had a self-sufficient life, while decadents imagined lives and scenarios open to scandalously insubordinate social behavior, new sexual identities, and behavior deemed immoral and outrageous.

Among those new stylistic modes in the era known as the fin de siècle were a fascination with exquisite surfaces, tantalizing sexual ambiguities, subconscious states, anthropomorphized nature, and useless artifice. In highly coded ways, many British, European, and American writers and artists affiliated with the aestheticist and decadent enterprises endorsed same-sex erotics as a viable option, particularly between men. That these writers and artists sought to accomplish this in a nineteenth-century environment increasingly hostile to homosexual relations through legislation (and the categories of medical science) made their endeavors especially audacious. What certain streams of science were deeming an illness—homosexuality and other forms of nonnormative behavior—were embraced by decadent artists as glorious aberrations from late Victorian sexual norms. Thus, Arthur Symons, in his essay “The Decadent Movement in Literature,” first published in Harper's New Monthly Magazine in 1893, referred to decadence as a “beautiful and interesting disease” (859). Because Symons was writing at a historical moment when homosexuality was being viewed by many medical authorities as a disease (as opposed to a sin), it is possible to see his comment as glamorizing dissident erotic behavior. That Symons later revised his essay, retitling it “The Symbolist Movement in Literature” (1899), indicates that in the ensuing six years decadence had come to accrue disreputable associations. (Symbolism was a literary and artistic movement throughout Europe that, much like aestheticism, aimed to resist the aesthetics of realism in order to reinvigorate art with mystery, opacity, and strangeness.)

Samuel Taylor Coleridge (1772–1834) and Thomas Carlyle (1795–1881) were partly responsible for introducing an early iteration of the doctrine of aestheticism to Britain, followed by William Morris (1834–1896) and John Ruskin (1819–1900), two important precursors of late Victorian aestheticism. A socialist, Morris rejected the increasingly prevailing economic values of industrialization in order to promote the virtues of craftsmanship and simple, elegant design. Although by no means an aesthete, Ruskin nonetheless sought to make a kind of religion of art, bringing the intensity of Christian religious doctrine to a new enthusiasm for shared communal and national aspirations in the creation of art and architecture. At the same time, both Morris and Ruskin viewed aesthetic ventures as accruing value to the degree that they fostered a wider moral and social vision, an earnest endeavor that would have troubled Pater, who considered the aesthetic realm to be largely independent of ethical and social imperatives. It was Pater who came to have the most powerful foundational effect on aestheticism and its unruly offspring, decadence.

Walter Pater: The Godfather of British Aestheticism

Throughout his fiction and criticism, Walter Pater (1839–1894) repeatedly suggested that the artist must be open to many new influences and sensations. His novel Marius the Epicurean (1885) has as its central protagonist a young ascetic Roman of the second century CE who embraces differing philosophical systems. Throughout his criticism, Pater applauded the culture of ancient Greece, as well as that of the Renaissance, implicitly promoting these moments in Western civilization as appealing alternatives to the enervated and rigid social and ethical ethos of Victorian Britain. In his controversial conclusion to The Renaissance (1873; which probably cost him an academic promotion at Oxford University), Pater, a lifelong bachelor, insisted on the key role of the senses and “perception” in an individual’s response to works of art as opposed to a universally agreed-upon objective criteria. According to Pater, one must embrace the insurgent energies of a given artistic work—and one must accept that all appreciation of art is subjective and entirely dependent on individual responses (as opposed to objective criteria). Incendiary as the conclusion was, Pater’s most influential piece of writing was the chapter of The Renaissance devoted to the Italian artist Leonardo da Vinci’s (1452–1519) La Gioconda (more famously known as the Mona Lisa), which Pater described in rapturous terms.

Pater’s aesthetic philosophy harbored implications for same-sex desire given that it was a program that frequently insisted on the value of dissenting from common prejudices in order to cultivate individual self-enhancement. Thus, Pater’s program conceivably could allow for the possibility of escaping the rigidities of Victorian strictures against, for example, same-sex erotics. In his conclusion to The Renaissance, he insisted that individuals should go about “curiously testing new opinions and courting new impressions,” among them “any stirring of the senses, strange dyes, strange flowers, and curious odours, or the work of the artist’s hands, or the face of one’s friend” (quoted in Desmarais and Baldick 2012, 26). This sentence’s strikingly disparate list, with its doubling down on the word strange as a positive pursuit, along with its slip into an injunction to appreciate the face of a friend, could be read as an invitation to same-sex amours. The volume was denounced by many Victorian writers for its supposed sanctioning of immoral art and living, a view articulated in the English novelist George Eliot’s (1819–1880) dismissal of The Renaissance as “quite poisonous,” a remark that designated Pater as a philosopher of unsavory influence on disciples, a seemingly innocent aesthete but in fact a decadent master (Eliot 1980, 92).

Aestheticism denoted a total belief in the value of the aesthetic realm. “We spend our days, each one of us, in looking for the secret of life,” Wilde once remarked. “Well, the secret of life is in art” (1908, 156). The word decadence, meanwhile, is derived from the medieval Latin word decadentia (itself derived from de, meaning “down” or “apart,” and cadere, meaning “to fall”), a rubric that has been used to characterize civilizations that have fallen from a glorious apex to excess, decay, and decline. Throughout the nineteenth century in Britain and the United States, the phrase denoted physical degeneracy, moral decline, and sexual deviance, much of which was associated with the fall of ancient Rome. At the same time, many men and women embraced the term decadence as a way of describing a creative way of exploring and expressing different sexualities, male and female homosexuality chief among them. For aestheticist and decadent writers, the sinister influence that Eliot detected in Pater was the positive effect of a person or work of art on an individual.

Although he is frequently associated with the decadent movement, the poet Algernon Charles Swinburne (1837–1909) is more a flamboyant, neoromantic precursor to decadence. Swinburne’s themes—cannibalism, lesbianism, sadomasochism, and theism, among others—were often conveyed in highly technical poetic diction that gave him a reputation as a risk-courting, difficult poet who was eager to scandalize. Part of his importance for the decadent movement lay in his provocative assertion that no subject should be off-limits for the artist, an argument that would rouse many aesthetes and decadents. Inspired by Swinburne’s example, the new decadent movement was fueled by small magazines such as the Yellow Book, the Savoy, and the Artist and Journal of Home Culture, all of which often published coded homoerotic fiction, poetry, and essays. Even a mainstream, popular magazine such as Punch, which often parodied the decadent movement in cartoons and articles, helped bring decadence to the attention of a larger British reading public.
Symonds, the Homoerotics of Greek and Renaissance Civilizations, and Queer Autobiography

Another writer linked to the cause of aestheticism was the English critic John Addington Symonds (1840–1893), who wrote passionately about Greek culture and of the art of the Renaissance. His essay "A Problem in Greek Ethics" (1883) explored same-sex relations in ancient Greece as an admirable, everyday feature of Hellenic life. Symonds's argument was remarkable in examining male homosexual relations not so much as a psychological problem—increasingly standard in late Victorian scientific and medical discussions of same-sex erotic desire in what came to be known as “sexology”—but as a positive cultural force. For Symonds, Western civilization itself was based on idealized social conditions that promoted idealized male same-sex relations, although he was careful to note in the “Greek Ethics” essay that in the male hierarchy of ancient Greece erotic affection between women was difficult to detect and held in lesser regard. His works examining Italian Renaissance civilization, among them The Renaissance in Italy (1875–1886) and a biography of the artist Michelangelo, valorized the culture and society of the Renaissance, even referencing the “sinfulness, treason ... enormous vices, and intolerable mischief of the Renaissance” as the sources for its achievement. Thus, in evoking what he called the “decadence of Italy,” Symonds claimed that the Italian political thinker Niccolò Machiavelli (1469–1527) saw the country’s “regeneration” as resting on the “very vices which he indicated as the cause of national degeneracy” ([1875–1886] 1935, 2:417).

Even more daringly, Symonds wrote the most forceful, detailed, and moving account of homosexuality of the Victorian era, an autobiography that was first published in part in 1984 and not in its entirety until 2016. These memoirs represented an extensive account of Symonds’s often tormented—but also fulsomely satiated—experience as a married man and father who had a secret life as the lover of men. With its tales of homosexual relations between teachers and students at Harrow, where Symonds had been a student, and its recollections of love affairs with Italian men, the autobiography doubtless could not have been published during Symonds's lifetime. Unlike Wilde, the cautious Symonds was never ensnared in a public scandal. For him, aestheticism and decadence represented less an irresponsible or dissolute example than the possibility for a covert embrace of homosexual love. At the same time, he forged connections between aestheticism and those physicians and scientists seeking to dispense with an older, religious and moral comprehension of same-sex desire. With the pioneering sexologist Havelock Ellis (1859–1939), he pseudonymously collaborated on Sexual Inversion (1897), an attempt at a tolerant, science-based investigation of various forms of nonnormative sexualities.

Oscar Wilde at the Risky Frontiers of Queer Aestheticism and Decadence
The most internationally celebrated figure representing the conjoined causes of aestheticism and decadence in late nineteenth-century Britain was Oscar Wilde (1854–1900), an Irish-born writer who had studied under Pater at Oxford. Famous as a dandy and wit even before he had published any significant piece of writing, Wilde wrote in several literary genres: the theater, fiction, poetry, fairy tales, and criticism. In a sign of future conflict among aesthetes and decadents, Wilde insisted that his key influences were French writers affiliated with symbolism and decadence, among them Charles Baudelaire (1821–1867), Stéphane Mallarmé (1842–1898), and Joris-Karl Huysmans (1848–1907, whose 1884 novel À rebours (Against the Grain [1926])—the story of a dissolute, sickly aristocrat—was one of Wilde’s favorite books.

Wilde also admired Japanese art and design, as is evident in the luxurious opening pages of The Picture of Dorian Gray (1890), in which Basil Hallward’s bachelor studio contains “tussore-silk curtains that were stretched in front of the huge window, producing a kind of momentary Japanese effect, and making him think of those pallid, jade-faced painters of Tokyo who, through the medium of an art that is necessarily immobile, seek to convey the sense of swiftness and motion” (2007, 5). Elsewhere he quipped that Japan had become sheer Orientalist fantasy: “The whole of Japan is a pure invention. There is no such country, there are no such people…. If you desire to see a Japanese effect, you will not behave like a tourist and go to Tokio. On the contrary, you will stay at home and steep yourself in the works of certain Japanese artists” (1970, 65). As editor of Woman’s World magazine, which published articles on home design, decor, and other issues of interest to its largely female readership, Wilde gave serious attention to the Victorian home as a sphere of aesthetic innovation and female achievement.

At a personal level, the domestic realm was not unfamiliar to Wilde. Despite his reputation today as a dauntless “gay” writer and queer icon, in his early thirties Wilde was a middle-class husband and the father of two young sons. In his writing he almost always referenced homosexuality indirectly, covertly, or ambiguously. Many of his clever witticisms were coded barbs directed at the limitations of heterosexual marriage (“How marriage ruins a man! It’s as demoralizing as cigarettes, and far more expensive”) or waggish appreciations of masculine physical perfection (“There is something tragic about the enormous number of young men there are in England at the present moment who start life with perfect profiles, and end by adopting some useful profession”).

With similar cagey indirection and fascination with male beauty, Wilde’s only novel, The Picture of Dorian Gray, focuses on a physically stunning, supernaturally ageless young man who transfixes both men and women in London society but whose own sexuality seems indeterminate, just as Dorian’s alleged crimes toward the end of the novel are vague. Although Dorian Gray’s opening scenes depict two men who seem to compete for the attention of Dorian—in Victorian terms, indulging in an “unnatural” vice of sodomy, as several contemporary reviewers detected—the novel increasingly turns on a supernatural plot, and none of these male relations comes to fruition. At the same time, one may see in the character of Lord Henry a perfect example of the aesthete, just as Henry's disciple, Dorian, exemplifies aestheticism's transformation into a more personally and socially destructive decadence. Arguably one of Wilde's boldest explorations of homosexuality was his short story "The Portrait of Mr. W. H." (1889), which freely speculated that the sonnets of the English playwright and poet William Shakespeare (1564–1616) were addressed to a male lover, an adolescent boy actor.

In Wilde’s play Salome (1893), originally written in French and initially banned from the London stage, several forms of nonnormative or perverse desire are flamboyantly on display: Herod's lust for his stepdaughter, the princess Salome; Salome's erotic obsession with John the Baptist (which takes on a necrophilic tinge when she lustily demands—and then kisses—his severed head); and a pageboy's yearning for a male Syrian soldier. In his 1987 biography of Wilde, Richard Ellmann notes that the play's merry-go-round of illicit desires includes John the Baptist's devotion to Jesus. At the center of Wilde's play is the "Dance of the Seven Veils"—a striptease that Salome performs before her ogling stepfather. Because of its stylized saturation in aberrations of orthodox sexuality, over time Wilde's play has come to stand as an inherently “queer” work. Its popularity was considerably augmented in 1905 when the celebrated German composer Richard Strauss (1864–1949) adapted it as an opera. The play was the subject of a 1923 film starring the Russian dancer Alla Nazimova (1879–1945), with costumes and sets based on Aubrey Beardsley's illustrations. The dazzling allure of Salome, with its spotlighting of a femme fatale, came to appeal to many actresses and singers. Furthermore, Wilde's "daughter of Sodom" suggested that the sexual dissidence driving the aestheticist and decadent enterprises might have implications for women of artistically and socially rebellious inclinations.

Women Writers and the Aestheticist and Decadent Coteries

A number of British women writers sought to enter the male-dominated precincts of aestheticism and decadence. This was no easy task given that much in the way of aestheticist and decadent rhetoric valorized a Hellenic civilization in which eroticized male-male relations dominated and women held a subsidiary social position. Many decadent male writers were fascinated by women only to the extent that they could be worshipped as femmes fatales, exquisite corpses, doomed actresses, or tragic lovers. Furthermore, many British women writers were committed, like their mid-Victorian predecessors, to the three-decker novel made famous by the Brontës, George Eliot, and other Victorian women novelists, whereas male aesthetes and decadents increasingly were turning to the short story and short novels such as Wilde's Dorian Gray as an ideal literary mode.
A number of fin-de-siècle women writers, however, did thrive with short fiction and drew on that form to explore same-sex or ambiguous, sexualities. One of the most successful of these was the English writer Vernon Lee, whose real name was Violet Paget (1856–1935). A lesbian and a follower of Pater and Wilde, a friend of the American writer Henry James (1843–1916), and a contributor to the Yellow Book, Lee's critical writings revived an interest not only in the Italian Renaissance but in eighteenth-century literature, art, and music. Her fiction often explored supernatural themes related to ghosts and spiritual possession, while her short story “Lady Tal” (1896) depicted a Henry James–like novelist, the fussy aesthete Jervase Marion, whose feminized name marks him as a queer figure and who acts as the muse to an aristocratic woman writer, a relationship that unexpectedly stirs his long-repressed emotions. (James was so outraged by Lee's portrait of him that he broke off his friendship with her.) The English writer Victoria Cross, a pseudonym for Annie Sophie Cory (1868–1952), depicted a male narrator of enigmatic sexual preferences in her tale “Theodora: A Fragment” (1895). The story's heroine dons the narrator's Turkish attire, while the narrator's album of pictures includes his painting of a young Sikh male with a “lovely face” and “beautiful hair,” as well as a painting of a “handsome” Persian woman (Cross [1895] 1993, 26, 28). The “delicious intimacy” that the narrator declares as binding him and Theodora hints at the experimental excitement of an intimate relationship that thrives on bisexual desires, cross-dressing, and Eastern erotic fantasies (11).

One remarkable critique of male-defined decadence was Charlotte Mew's (1869–1928) short story “A White Night” (1903)—possibly a response to Joseph Conrad's (1857–1924) novel of masculine colonialist adventure, Heart of Darkness (1899)—in which a group of late Victorian travelers journey to Spain, where they inadvertently witness the ritualistic killing of a woman, an event that seems to titillate the male narrator. The writer Ada Leverson (1862–1933), a close friend of Wilde (she alone offered him sanctuary when he was released from prison), wrote several works of fiction celebrated as witty comedies of manners. Yet she also offered fictional critiques of Wildean decadence—for example, in her story “Suggestion” (1895), whose narrator is described by another character as “that intolerable, effeminate boy” (Showalter, 38) and who is depicted as a sexually manipulative prig. Ella D’Arcy (1857–1937), a frequent contributor to the Yellow Book, was the author of short stories whose psychological realism earned her comparisons to James. As noted, female aesthetes shared their male colleagues' fascination with the “Orient,” evident in the American writer Kate Chopin’s (1850–1904) “An Egyptian Cigarette” (1900) in which an architect, a traveler in the Orient, introduces a woman friend to the hallucinogenic pleasures of exotic smoking. Other aesthetically oriented women writers explored colonial concerns, although not always from enlightened perspectives. Ouida, a pseudonym of Maria Louise Ramé (1839–1908), the author of some forty novels, published the best-selling Under Two Flags (1867), set in French Algeria and a work that gave sympathetic attention to the French colonialists, the socalled pieds noirs.

A number of women writers of aestheticist and decadent leanings were skeptical of the possibility for progress in the area of female social equality. Whereas so-called New Woman texts such as Sarah Grand’s (1854–1943) The Heavenly Twins (1893) and Grant Allen’s (1848–1899) The Woman Who Did (1895) forthrightly criticized a sexual double standard and welcomed a new era of erotic freedom and choice, the work of female aesthetes often stressed the impediments to a full liberation from Victorian moral and social shackles. The paradigmatic example of this conflicted view of erotic utopianism is the South African writer Olive Schreiner (1855–1920), whose lyrical The Story of an African Farm (1883) presented what some literary critics view as the first avowedly feminist heroine in English-language literature, Lyndall. Yet, in a reflection of the gloomy protocols of decadent fiction that won the novel Wilde’s admiration but with a deterministic logic that adhered to the “scientific” tendencies of literary naturalism, Lyndall spirals downward. She rejects an offer of marriage to pursue a university education while demanding parity with men. Ultimately, she abandons her studies and is stymied in all her aspirations, dying young in the novel’s concluding pages.

Aestheticism and Decadence in Europe and the United States

Outside Britain, aestheticism and decadence included important theorists, writers, artists, and followers, particularly in the United States, France, Italy, and Germany. The aesthetic program took much of its force from the German philosophical tradition as articulated by Johann Wolfgang von Goethe (1749–1832), Friedrich Schiller (1759–1805), and Friedrich Wilhelm Joseph von Schelling (1775–1854), all of whom stressed art’s sovereignty over mundane reality. The German philosopher Immanuel Kant (1724–1804) maintained that works of art exist in a separate, inviolable sphere; can be judged only by highly educated, superior minds; must be distinguished from moral goodness and pleasure; and have no utility, what Kant famously described as “purposiveness without purpose.” That works of art might be lacking in utility could be seen as an endorsement not only of an aesthetics of artifice and frivolity but also of alternative, nonprocreative forms of erotic behavior.

In France, especially, aestheticism was entangled with nonnormative erotics. Thus, one of the earliest manifestos of the art-for-art’s-sake movement was Théophile Gautier’s (1811–1872) novel Mademoiselle de Maupin (1835), the preface to which endorsed creative endeavors without social or moral purpose and which derided critics seeing art as harboring an ethical dimension as philistines. For Gautier, aesthetic works could only be damaged by moral commitments. That the novel itself is a comic narrative of a young man who comes to question his sexual identity upon falling in love with his male page (who in fact is a young woman disguised as a boy) helped to forge a link between aestheticism and male same-sex erotics. Among aestheticism’s advocates in France were Madame de Staël (1766–1817), an admirer of German romanticist aesthetics and an advocate of what she called passionate “enthusiasm,” which she distinguished from mindless fanaticism and which she saw as tied to a love of beauty, declaring with a combination of spiritual ardor and aesthetic passion that “enthusiasm signifies God in us” (1813, 3:388).

In the United States, Ralph Waldo Emerson (1803–1882) provided some intellectual support to the idea that works of art had their own justification for existing, a notion encapsulated in these pithily precise lines from Emerson’s poem “The Rhodora” (1834): “That if eyes were made for seeing / Then beauty is its own excuse for being” (Emerson, 10). The American writer with the greatest influence on decadent aesthetics and attitudes was the Boston-born Edgar Allan Poe (1809–1849). Poe’s dark romanticist writing ranged from poems such as “The Raven” (1845), a supernatural narrative of a splendid, talking bird that visits a tormented lover, to his novel The Fall of the House of Usher (1839), set, like so many classic gothic texts, in a mysterious house and concerned with the spiritual and moral decay of a New England family. Poe’s disreputable personal life (he married his thirteen-year-old cousin) and early demise (he died at the age of forty after having been found wandering incoherently in the streets of Baltimore) gave him iconic status as a dissolute, death-bound young artist. The aestheticist movement in the United States was enhanced by the early fiction of Henry James, who sometimes depicted male artists whose devotion to their craft is linked to their bonds with other men, often bachelors, as in James’s first novel, Roderick Hudson (1875), which detailed a youthful sculptor’s apprenticeship under an older male connoisseur’s tutelage.

Poe’s erotically charged gothic sensibility had a greater impact in relatively libertine France than in a nineteenth-century United States greatly given over to Puritan values. The French poet Charles Baudelaire translated Poe’s work and helped disseminate the American author’s work in literary Paris. Other French decadent writers, such as Paul Bourget (1852–1935), Stéphane Mallarmé, Auguste Villiers de L’Isle-Adam (1838–1889), and Joris-Karl Huysmans, variously rebelled against the positivist assumptions of realism and the science-based claims of literary naturalism as they sought to extend the conventional boundaries of aesthetics. Bourget offered a definition of the decadent style as the independence of the parts from the whole, a formulation that could be seen as stressing erotic dissidence from norms and conventions. Arthur Rimbaud (1854–1891) and Paul Verlaine (1844–1896), poets and lovers who met early deaths, helped to define French decadence as a homosexual literary and personal adventure, one that flouted bourgeois conventions.

The influential German philosopher Arthur Schopenhauer (1788–1860), beloved of the aestheticist movement and widely read in France, advocated for the renunciation of all the passions in favor of a life devoted to the pursuit of art. One can see a version of this idea in Huysmans’s novel À rebours (1884), the hero of which experiments with new erotic sensations (an affair with an acrobat, a ventriloquist, and a near-erotic encounter with a young male ruffian) but becomes increasingly chaste and hermetic. This strain of proud self-denial and sexual abstinence militates against the commonplace view of decadent men as driven by carnal debauchery. In fact, many decadent characters in French fiction retreat from the social world, seeing it as vulgar, constricting, and bourgeois, and embracing the role of bachelor.

Other writers explored erotic extremism and the upending of traditional gender fixities. The French novelist Octave Mirbeau’s (1848–1917) novel Le jardin des supplices ([1899; Torture Garden [1931]]) offered a surreal depiction of a dominatrix who oversees a series of endless degradations of her male lovers. In much of French decadent writing there are outsized antiheroines with insatiable sexual appetites. One of the most successful French decadent writers was the woman novelist Rachilde, pen name of Marguerite Vallette-Eymery (1860–1953), whose novel Monsieur Vénus (1884) concerned a dominatrix noblewoman, Raoule, who gradually transforms her working-class lover, Jacques, into her mistress by emptying him of all his “masculine” traits. Wilde not only admired contemporary French writers but won their devotion. Mallarmé praised The Picture of Dorian Gray for its central conceit of a mutating painting. Mirbeau, meanwhile, not only lavished praise on Dorian Gray but also publicly defended Wilde during his prosecution and imprisonment in Britain.

Wilde's Fall and the Exposure of Aestheticism and Decadence as Queer Criminal Practice

Although Wilde’s writing created controversy among his contemporaries, it was only when the playwright elected to take the father of his lover Lord Alfred Douglas (1870–1945) to court for slander did Wilde’s fortunes and reputation implode. In a series of three 1895 trials that ended in Wilde’s conviction for the crime of “gross indecency,” Wilde was exposed as the lover of men, some of them young male prostitutes, who testified on the prosecution’s behalf. For much of Wilde’s testimony the courtroom laughed at Wilde’s acerbic responses to the prosecutor Edward Carson—until Carson asked Wilde if he had kissed a certain young man. Wilde’s reply—“Oh, dear no; he was a peculiarly plain boy”—by most accounts changed the course of the trial. Wilde was convicted and imprisoned for nearly two years of hard labor. It was in prison that he wrote De Profundis, a shattering, damning account of his lover Douglas that was posthumously published in 1905. Released from jail, Wilde ended his days in bitter, impoverished exile in Paris. His narrative poem The Ballad of Reading Gaol (1898) recounted memorably his experience in that prison, including this declaration:

Yet each man kills the thing he loves
By each let this be heard.
Some do it with a bitter look,
Some with a flattering word.
“The coward does it with a kiss,
The brave man with a sword!”

(WILDE 2009, 16)

These lines represented at once a shattering self-revelation, bitter wisdom, a decadent’s lament, and an ambiguous disclosure of doomed homosexual love.

Wilde’s public fall from grace cast a long, destructive shadow over the aestheticist and decadent movements. Most of the playwright’s contemporaries had been unsympathetic and even hostile toward him amid his legal troubles. Henry James, whose private life included numerous emotionally close relationships with men, decried Wilde as an “unclean beast” and declined to defend him when the playwright was enmeshed in scandal. Likewise, the American novelist Willa Cather (1873–1947), whose personal life, according to some biographers, included several intense emotional and erotic relationships with women, endorsed Wilde’s prosecution.

There were, however, some notable exceptions to the opprobrium that hailed down on Wilde. The playwright George Bernard Shaw (1856–1950) rallied to his fellow playwright’s defense, although he worried that his support would cause Wilde more harm given Shaw’s own reputation as an Irish-born provocateur. The American writer Stephen Crane (1871–1900) reportedly was appalled by the willingness of his literary colleagues to denigrate Wilde even as Crane himself claimed to be repelled by the playwright’s sexuality. “He abominated all the capacities of Oscar Wilde,” observed an early biographer of Crane, “but when that grand fakir was on trial at last, refused to allow exaggerations to be sent to his newspaper and turned loudly on a group of gossips in a club with, ‘Why do you sit and lie about the poor devil when he’s done for?’” (Beer 1924, 161).

Aesthetes, Decadents, and the Visual Arts

Perhaps the most important figure to establish the critical terms for the aestheticist movement’s valorizing of Greek art and culture was Johann Joachim Winckelmann (1717–1768), often considered the “father of art history.” Winckelmann argued for the foundational greatness of Hellenic and Roman civilizations, seeing them as pinnacles of Western achievement. His own experience as a young man of same-sex erotic leanings who was forced to live in a Germany hostile to such relations, only to find himself fortunate to live a relatively open life in a more accommodating Rome, helped to shape his conception of art history as a series of rises and falls. The pinnacle of Western civilization, for Winckelmann, was Hellenic and Roman art, especially sculptures of male youths. (He described the Apollo Belvedere as “the highest ideal of art among the works of antiquity that have escaped its destruction” [quoted in Potts 1994, 61].) Inspired by Winckelmann’s ideas, nineteenth-century aesthetes such as Pater (who devoted a chapter to Winckelmann in The Renaissance) maintained an intense devotion to ancient Western civilizations, finding in classical relations between men a model of same-sex erotic passion. The English painter Henry Tuke (1858–1929), while generally eschewing classical subject matter, depicted everyday scenes of youthful nude male bathers that evoked Greek and Roman sculpture.

With his devotion to Hellenic classicism, the hugely popular academic painter Frederic Leighton (1830–1896) (Queen Victoria was an admirer) frequently explored female and male homoerotic themes in his paintings, as in his Garden of Hesperides (1892), which depicted a trio of entangled sleeping females, and Daedalus and Icarus (c. 1869), a work that highlighted a weathered elderly Daedalus attaching feathers to his classically beautiful, nude young son. (Although well received by the Royal Academy, which exhibited the painting, the London Times fretted that Icarus resembled “more a maiden than a youth” [Barlow 2017, 38].) Another artist associated with the aestheticist and decadent movements was the Anglo-Jewish painter Simeon Solomon (1840–1905), a sometime-member of the Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood of artists and writers that included Leighton, Edward Coley Burne-Jones (1833–1898), Dante Gabriel Rossetti (1828–1882), Lawrence Alma-Tadema (1836–1912), and Christina Rossetti (1830–1894), most of whom celebrated Renaissance pictorial and literary ideals and whose works sometimes depicted both male and female homoerotic themes. In his painting Sappho and Erinna in a Garden at Mytilene
Solomon explored the intensities of lesbian eros, while his illustration “The Bride, the Bridegroom, and Sad Love” (c. 1865) focused on the poignant dilemma of a triangular romantic relationship in which a groom embraces his bride even as he grasps the hand of an androgynous male figure, a daring display of homoeroticism for the period. Solomon penned illustrations for Swinburne’s pornographic novel Lesbia Brandon (1859–1868), a work that dealt with themes of homosexuality, sadomasochism, and transsexualism. As was the case with Wilde, Solomon’s unruly personal life exposed him to legal prosecution; he was arrested for public lewdness in London and Paris. The painter Burne-Jones, a sometime supporter of Solomon’s work, fretted that Solomon’s imbroglios would draw scorn on the Pre-Raphaelite program.

Other artists affiliated with aestheticism and decadence avoided classical subject matter and sought inspiration in Asian art and design. The most noteworthy figure in Britain to take up the twinned mantles of these two movements in the visual arts with little regard for Greek or Roman models was Aubrey Beardsley (1872–1898), celebrated for his strikingly original black-and-white illustrations much influenced by Japanese woodcuts. Often depicting grotesque and erotic subjects, Beardsley’s images for Wilde’s Salome and Thomas Malory’s (c. 1405–1471) medieval Le Morte d’Arthur, fomented dismay among social puritans for their unorthodox stylized method and sexually mischievous motifs. Privately, Beardsley drew pornographic illustrations depicting men with huge phalluses and women in lecherous poses. In 1895 the English critic Harry Quilter derided the artist for the androgynous quality of his figures, which Quilter described as “grotesques, in which the types of manhood and womanhood are, as it were, mingled together, and result in a monstrous sexless amalgam, miserable, morbid, dreary, and unnatural” (765). Beardsley’s death from tuberculosis at the age of twenty-five, along with the early demises of English decadent writers such as Ernest Dowson (1867–1900), contributed to the idea that decadent artists were sickly, doomed, or self-destructive. Not all artists associated with the aestheticist movement died young, of course. The English artist and designer Charles Ricketts (1866–1931) was a versatile book illustrator (he illustrated works by Wilde) and theater designer (he designed the sets for a 1906 production of Wilde’s Salome), while his longtime lover Charles Haslewood Shannon (1863–1937) was a successful painter and lithographer. Forging a link between the burgeoning aestheticist and Socialist movements, the English artist Walter Crane (1845–1915) designed several iconic Socialist posters. He was, as well, one of the most influential children’s book illustrators of his generation.
In France, the Goncourt brothers, celebrated literary siblings, insisted that painting had no other purpose than to bring pleasure to the eye and the senses and “not to aim to much beyond the rejuvenation of the optic nerve” (Goncourt and Goncourt 1859–1875, 2:211; translation by Richard A. Kaye). French painters such as Odilon Redon (1840–1916), Gustave Moreau (1826–1898), and Pierre Puvis de Chavannes (1824–1898) were drawn to the depiction of mysterious counterworlds and reveled in classical subjects, androgynous nudes, and Christian arcana. Popular decadent subjects included Salome, the biblical character popularized by the French novelist Gustave Flaubert (1821–1880), Mallarmé, and Wilde; and Saint Sebastian, the young third-century Roman soldier condemned to an execution by arrows for announcing his Christianity. Sebastian was frequently depicted as a Christian Adonis by Renaissance artists, and this, along with his confession of a dangerous secret, helped determine his status as a widespread turn-of-the-century homoerotic icon. The French composer most wedded to aestheticism and decadence, Claude Debussy (1862–1918), in addition to adapting musical scores based on the poems of Baudelaire and Verlaine, created a 1911 orchestral work, The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian, written by the Italian writer Gabriele D’Annunzio (1863–1938) and starring the Russian dancer Ida Rubinstein (1885–1960), a performance denounced by the Catholic Church for featuring a Jewish woman in the role of a Christian saint. (The production was attended by the French homosexual writers Marcel Proust and Jean Cocteau.)
Critics sometimes link the American painter James McNeill Whistler (1834–1903) to the history of aestheticism, in part because of his numerous portraits of writers and artists affiliated with the aestheticist movement and also because the magazine Punch satirized Whistler along with Wilde as unrepentant, self-preening dandies. Less celebrated was the art photography of the Massachusetts-based F. Holland Day (1864–1933), a member of the so-called pictorialist coterie of photographers at the turn of the century, who sought to imbue photography with classical, Christian, and Renaissance themes. Day’s images often drew on homoerotic scenarios, as in his photographs of Saint Sebastian based on working-class models or his controversial depictions of himself posed as Jesus on the cross. One of his more extraordinary achievements as an art photographer lay in his burnished portraits of African Americans, whom he sometimes depicted in historically anachronistic African garb as a way of exalting his subjects’ cultural legacy. As brilliantly original as Day’s photography was, the impact of American aestheticism is more apparent in the realm of interior design, innovative architecture, and consumer culture. Whistler’s 1876 Peacock Room, for example, exploited a popular emblem of aestheticism for the interior of a Kensington town house in London, a masterpiece of Anglo-Japanese design.

The Backlash against Aestheticism and Decadence

Well before Wilde’s and Solomon’s skirmishes with the law, there were those who detected an unsavory dissident sexual politics at the core of the aestheticist and decadent movements. The Hungarian-born writer Max Nordau’s (1849–1923) diatribe Degeneration (1892) attacked aesthetes and decadents as fomenting a diseased civilization throughout Europe. Shaw wrote a lengthy critical attack on Nordau’s argument, but Degeneration became a best seller across Europe and helped solidify a critique of aestheticism and decadence as jointly corrupting artistic social forces.

A number of women writers detected a misogynistic streak in the dandies and bachelors affiliated with the aestheticist and decadent movements. In an 1899 article in Cosmopolitan magazine titled “The Woman Question,” Olive Schreiner mocked the male aesthete as that “curled darling, scented and languid, with his drawl, his delicate apparel, his devotion to the rarity and variety of his viands” (192). The theme of women detached from or horrified by the implications of art-for-art’s-sake values is dramatized in much of Henry James’s fiction. James’s novel The Portrait of a Lady included a blistering portrait of a pernicious aesthete, Gilbert Osmond, who traps his wife Isabel Archer in a sadistic, loveless marriage. In James’s short story “The Author of Beltraffio” (1884), narrated by an acolyte, aestheticism must be sequestered from female readers, who can only misconstrue its aims as immoral. The narrator’s homoerotic, sycophantic relation to a famous novelist, Mark Ambient, along with the tale’s shattering ending—in which a child is literally and metaphorically sacrificed to the art-for-art’s-sake cause—represents a rebuke to aestheticism as fomenting decadence. (James claimed that he had conjured up the story after hearing an “air-borne rumor” revealing that John Addington Symonds's wife refused to read her husband's writings.

Other objections to aestheticism and decadence came from the homosexually oriented English visionary Edward Carpenter (1844–1929), who rejected the two entwined movements as beholden to educated, urban elites, at the same time that Carpenter—an advocate of rural life and simplicity in all things, as well as an avid nudist—argued that the “homogenic attachment” was an entirely natural, universal form of erotic feeling that merited both social acceptance and legal protection.

It was the Irish poet William Butler Yeats (1865–1939) who influentially offered a retrospective judgment concerning the aestheticist and decadent movements, labeling their adherents members of the “tragic generation.” Certainly, Wilde's ignominious fate as the unjustly persecuted lover of men had some of the pathos of the last act of a tragedy. What Yeats could not see, however, was the far-reaching generative possibilities in the erotic dissidence and queer artistry promoted by both aesthetes and decadents, whose claims on the attention of contemporary readers and audiences show no sign of waning.

SEE ALSO Classical Studies; Fin de Siècle Sexuality; Sappho, Nineteenth-Century Rediscovery of; Wilde Trials, International Significance of

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Weintraub, Stanley, ed. The Yellow Book: Quintessence of the Nineties. Garden City, NY:

Officially inaugurated on 2 November 1987, the African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights (ACHPR) is a quasi-judicial body that was established by the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights to “promote human and peoples' rights and ensure their protection in Africa,” according to Article 30 of the charter. Drafted by a committee of the Organisation of African Unity (which was later replaced by the African Union), the charter was considered so momentous a development in the recognition of individual rights on the continent that the date it took effect, 21 October 1986, was declared African Human Rights Day. The ACHPR is composed of eleven members who are nominated by state parties to the charter, although they serve independently and not as representatives of their countries. As part of its mission to “sensitise the population and disseminate information on human and peoples’ rights in Africa” (ACHPR 2017), the commission includes among its duties undertaking studies, organizing seminars and conferences, and serving as a mechanism for individuals to report on human rights violations and for escalating these complaints to state authorities.

Before 2006, the ACHPR had made only passing reference to the rights of LGBTQ individuals in Africa despite widespread discrimination against and persecution of the LGBTQ community throughout the continent. In May 2006, however, the ACHPR met with the International Gay and Lesbian Human Rights Commission (later renamed OutRight Action International), the Coalition of African Lesbians, Behind the Mask, and All-Africa Rights Initiative in Banjul, Gambia, for a workshop to investigate whether there could be cooperation between the groups to advance the then nascent LGBTQ movement. During the workshop, some activists became aware that Cameroon was under review and decided to prepare a shadow report listing some violations of human rights of LGBTQ persons in that country. The shadow report was submitted to the commissioners, and during the review process some of the commissioners referenced the shadow report and actively questioned representatives from Cameroon about the mistreatment of gay men. This initial success was an affirmative answer to the question of whether the ACHPR should partner with African LGBTQ advocacy organizations.

Formal Engagement
In 2006 the ACHPR had decided that the category “other status” in its listed grounds for discrimination could be broadly interpreted to include sexual orientation. In 2008 the Coalition of African Lesbians (CAL) applied for observer status with the commission. This application was supported by other LGBTQ groups and seen as part of a broader strategy to recognize LGBTQ individuals and groups who were advocating for human rights with the commission. Yet, even though other organizations that applied for observer status in 2008 saw their applications granted, there was no response to CAL’s application. After numerous inquiries on the status of the application, the ACHPR asked its secretariat to develop a position paper on the justiciability of LGBTQ rights under the African Charter on Human and Peoples’ Rights. There was also another position paper that was developed by civil society organizations, including LGBTQ advocacy organizations. Both papers reached the conclusion that LGBTQ people received protection under the charter. In 2010 the ACHPR requested a meeting with activists working on sexual orientation and gender identity and expression (SOGIE) in order to gather more information prior to making a decision.

THE COMMISSION CONDEMNS VIOLENCE AND DISCRIMINATION AGAINST LGBTQ PERSONS

The African Commission on Human and Peoples’ Rights passed Resolution 275 at its 55th Ordinary Session held in Luanda, Angola, from 28 April to 12 May 2014. Officially titled “Resolution on Protection against Violence and Other Human Rights Violations against Persons on the Basis of Their Real or Imputed Sexual Orientation or Gender Identity,” the resolution marked the first time that the commission publicly voiced support for LGBTQ rights.

Recalling that Article 2 of the African Charter on Human and Peoples’ Rights (the African Charter) prohibits discrimination of the individual on the basis of distinctions of any kind such as race, ethnic group, colour, sex, language, religion, political or any other opinion, national and social origin, fortune, birth or any status;

Further recalling that Article 3 of the African Charter entitles every individual to equal protection of the law;

Noting that Articles 4 and 5 of the African Charter entitle every individual to respect of their life and the integrity of their person, and prohibit torture and other cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment or punishment;

Alarmed that acts of violence, discrimination and other human rights violations continue to be committed on individuals in many parts of Africa because of their actual or imputed sexual orientation or gender identity;

Noting that such violence includes “corrective” rape, physical assaults, torture, murder, arbitrary arrests, detentions, extra-judicial killings and executions, forced disappearances, extortion and blackmail;

Further alarmed at the incidence of violence and human rights violations and abuses by State and non-state actors targeting human rights defenders and civil society organisations working on issues of sexual orientation or gender identity in Africa;

Deeply disturbed by the failure of law enforcement agencies to diligently investigate and prosecute perpetrators of violence and other human rights violations targeting persons on the basis of their imputed or real sexual orientation or gender identity;

1. Condemns the increasing incidence of violence and other human rights violations, including murder, rape, assault, arbitrary imprisonment and other forms of persecution of persons on the basis of their imputed or real sexual orientation or gender identity;

2. Specifically condemns the situation of systematic attacks by State and non-state actors against persons on the basis of their imputed or real sexual orientation or gender identity;

3. Calls on State Parties to ensure that human rights defenders work in an enabling environment that is free of stigma, reprisals or criminal prosecution as a result of their human rights protection activities, including the rights of sexual minorities; and

4. Strongly urges States to end all acts of violence and abuse, whether committed by State or non-state actors, including by enacting and effectively applying appropriate laws prohibiting and punishing all forms of violence including those targeting persons on the basis of their imputed or real sexual orientation or gender identities, ensuring proper investigation and diligent prosecution of perpetrators, and establishing judicial procedures responsive to the needs of victims.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

African Commission on Human and Peoples’ Rights website.
http://www.achpr.org/sessions/55th/resolutions/275

After the meeting the ACHPR wrote to CAL advising them that their application had been declined on the grounds that CAL did not deal with issues that are in the charter. In October 2010 SOGIE activists requested that other civil society organisations working with the ACHPR with observer status publicly denounce the commission’s decision. They also asked other civil society organizations to write to the commission and express their dissatisfaction with the decision.
In the aftermath of the decision and on the strength of the United Nations Human Rights Council’s SOGIE violence resolution (Resolution 17/19), activists decided to advocate for a similar resolution from the ACHPR on ending violence based on SOGIE. In 2012 the African Men for Sexual Health and Rights (AMShEr) and CAL prepared a report on the prevalence of SOGIE-based violence in Africa (AMSHeR and CAL 2013). In 2013 the report was presented during the nongovernmental organizations (NGO) forum that traditionally meets before the ordinary session of the ACHPR, and some of the commissioners participated and supported the advocacy. (The forum is a space that has been created for NGOs to discuss pertinent human rights issues on the continent and prepare for the sessions of the commission.) The resolution was adopted in 2014 (Resolution 275) and requires states to answer the following, which is one of eighteen “Indicative Questions to State Parties” for the preparation of biannual state reports: “Has the State taken measures to address acts of torture or ill-treatment of lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and intersex persons and also provide effective redress to such victims?”

Emboldened by this success, CAL in 2014 decided to apply for observer status again. The following year, after a tense and long public debate by the ACHPR, CAL was granted observer status, which enabled it to participate in the biannual commission sessions and the preceding NGO forum. A few months later, the executive council of the African Union requested that the ACHPR review its criteria for granting observer status and withdraw the observer status that had been granted to CAL. CAL and the Centre for Human Rights challenged this by seeking an advisory opinion from the African Court on Human and Peoples’ Rights on whether the African Union had the authority to request the reversal of the commission’s decisions. The advisory opinion was still pending at the court as of 2017, and CAL’s observer status had not been withdrawn.

Organizing on the Sidelines

Despite the ACHPR’s failure to engage fully with LGBTQ advocacy organizations, SOGIE activists continued to draft resolutions with other civil society organizations to present to the commission for possible adoption. The organizations present these resolutions under the auspices of the aforementioned NGO forum. Historically, the NGO forum would adopt draft resolutions and forward these to the ACHPR, and the commission would decide whether they wanted to adopt the resolutions.

In 2008 some civil society groups at the NGO forum objected to the inclusion of a draft resolution condemning violence and the culture of impunity with respect to SOGIE-based violence. The NGO forum steering committee suggested that the draft resolution should be put to a vote. Although the draft resolution narrowly passed, there was dissatisfaction among SOGIE activists that this particular draft had to be put to a vote because resolutions typically were adopted without a vote. The NGO forum invited the SOGIE activists to prepare panels for the following session in order to have a conversation about SOGIE with the rest of the civil society groups that attended the NGO forum. There was recognition that this was an issue that many groups had little information about, as it was not a human rights issue on which the NGO forum had previously engaged.

In 2009—with the support of the United Nations Development Programme—AMSHeR, CAL, the International Centre for the Legal Protection of Human Rights (Interights), and the Heartland Alliance's Global Initiative for Sexuality and Human Rights coordinated the panels. After that session the four organizations continued to coordinate SOGIE advocacy at the ACHPR. They hosted training sessions on advocacy that provided updates to current and emerging activists. They also conducted workshops on the African human rights systems to orient new activists to the various advocacy opportunities that existed at the commission.

Initially, the organizing primarily involved activists from southern Africa, but organizations from other parts of Africa soon joined. UHAI (East African Sexual Rights Initiative), an activist fund advocating for Africa’s sex workers and sexual and gender minorities with a focus on East Africa, facilitated the participation of activists from that region. The Heartland Alliance and AMSHeR facilitated the participation of activists from francophone Africa, as most of the activists were from anglophone Africa. Despite the obstacles it creates or are put in its way, the ACHPR is enabling the expansion of activism that promotes the rights, health, and dignity of sexual and gender minorities on the African continent.

SEE ALSO Activism in Africa South of the Sahara; Human Rights; Human Rights and Activism in Latin America; Human Rights and Queer Arab Refugees; Human Rights Campaign; Human Rights in Asia; Human Rights in Europe

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Afropop is a generic term for popular music generated in Africa. Afropop music was formed through the interaction of cultures before and after colonialism, and the different genres of Afropop music reflect the continent’s diversity. Nevertheless, Afropop songs share some common characteristics. Generally, Afropop songs use strong percussion, relaxed vocal timbre, rhythms and polyrhythms, and repetitive song structures. A close association of melody with linguistic contour is also common for this music genre. Afropop is less complex in structure than traditional African music because it was generated out of syncretization (i.e., the process of combining or attempting to combine characteristics of distinct musical genres).

Afropop is rooted in traditional African music and shaped by a shared colonial heritage. Afropop music draws inspiration from African American, Afro-Latin, Afro-Caribbean, European, and regional African music. Additional influences include Arabic/Islamic music and Western technology. Sean Barlow and Banning Eyre describe Afropop as “an endlessly creative conversation between instruments and players, singers and their fans, the village and the city, the living and their ancestors, between generations and changing attitudes, local roots and international pop culture” (1995, 7). Afropop’s varied influences makes it dynamic, and research frequently lags behind new developments in this genre (Manuel 1988), but increasing smartphone usage on the continent has created a larger international market for Afropop (Parke 2016). Modern styles of Afropop include azonto, coupé-décalé, and kwaito, while Afrobeat, kuduro, highlife, juju, Afro-reggae, soukous, makossa, zemenawi, chimurenga, and mbube are more classic forms.

Afropop Music as Resistance

Music can be used for political purposes, including influencing the behavior of others and giving a voice to opinions most people cannot express (Pratt 1990). Afropop music is viewed as being useful for several purposes beyond entertainment. The juju legend King Sunny Adé (1946–) commented that Afropop is a useful tool for education (Bergman 1985). Afropop music has served as a “source of moral sustenance” (Irele 1993, 71) in the midst of challenges encountered during colonialism and periods of political instability. Afropop singers have been known to engage in political conduct, with the most famous example being Fela Kuti (1938–1997), the father of Afrobeats. Kuti pushed societal boundaries and criticized Nigerian governments, resulting in incarceration and his mother’s death. It has been argued that Kuti is proof of Afropop’s revolutionary nature (Murphy 2007), whereas others assert that direct political commentary is rare in Afropop because double entendre is preferred (Cloonan 2006). Music is a helpful avenue for discussing issues relating to sexuality in Africa, because in most African societies there is a veil of silence pertaining to public discussions of sexual matters, and same-sex interactions often occur under this cloak of silence.

Despite most countries on the African continent criminalizing homosexuality and/or same-sex acts in some form, there are a few queer musicians that have come to the fore. The following is a discussion of some of the most famous and/or critically acclaimed queer Afropop singers, as well as artists who are challenging heteronormative standards. There is, additionally, a discussion of a few Afropop singers who have been vocal advocates for sexual minorities on the continent.

Nakhane Touré (1988–)

Nakhane Touré is a gay South African singer born Nakhane Mavuso. (Nakhane changed his surname Mavuso to Mahlakahlahaka after being adopted by his aunt and her husband. He subsequently changed his surname again to Touré, once he became a musician.) His adopted surname, Touré, pays homage to the Malian singer Ali Farka Touré (1939–2006). Nakhane Touré is a Christian and incorporates his sexuality and faith into his songs (Ncube 2015). His first album, Brave Confusion (2013), features songs such as “In the Dark Room,” which was inspired by Touré’s first gay club visit; the album has been described as both homoerotic and sociopolitical (Owen 2014). In 2017 Touré won an award at the Durban International Film Festival for his role in the South African film Inxeba (The wound), which explores Xhosa initiation rites and homosexuality. Touré received multiple death threats after playing this role (Blignaut 2017).

Titica (1986–)

Titica is an Angolan singer who performs kuduro songs, a fusion of African beats with rap and techno. Titica is trans and experienced abuse for failing to conform to heteronormative standards, including being beaten and stoned (Redvers 2012). Titica’s songs address issues that are not often discussed because of social mores. For example, in “Olha o boneco” (Look at the doll) from her 2012 album Chão (Floor), she advocates for LGBT rights, and she condemns sexual harassment in “Don’t Touch Me” from her 2015 album De última à primeira (From last to first). Titica was appointed as a goodwill ambassador for the Joint United Nations Programme on HIV/AIDS in 2013. In 2014 Titica starred in the award-winning I Love Kuduro documentary, produced by Coréon Dú, son of José Eduardo dos Santos, the former president of Angola.

[Image of Afropop Singer Nakhane Touré in 2017]

© MAARTEN DE BOER/GETTY IMAGES PORTRAIT

_Afropop Singer Nakhane Touré in 2017_. Touré is a South African singer who is both gay and a Christian. He incorporates his sexuality and his faith into his songs.

Art Attack

Art Attack is a Kenyan art and rap collective famous for producing an Afropop remake of Macklemore, Ryan Lewis, and Mary Lambert's 2012 hit “Same Love,” bearing the same name as the original. The 2016 video portrays the struggles of sexual minorities in Kenya and advocates for an end to “vilification,” leading to a backlash from Kenyan authorities. Notably, the Kenya Film Classification Board asked Google to block the video in Kenya for being “irresponsible,” a request Google refused (Klein 2016). Art Attack's “Same Love” video featured Noti Flow, a bisexual and Kenyan female rapper born Florence Kutoto. Noti Flow shares a kiss with Soila Cole, her rumored girlfriend, in the video; she subsequently reported receiving threats on social media (Ruyaga 2016). Additionally, “Same Love” featured the gay Kenyan gospel singer, writer, and activist Joji Baro, born George Barasa, who has been assaulted on multiple occasions because of his sexuality (Baro 2014), as well as the Tanzanian couple Lorenzo Cruz and Dayon Monson (a model).

Challenging Heteronormative Standards
Artists who are challenging heteronormative standards include the openly gay Angolan kuduro performer Edy Sex, who infuses his performances with a feminine flair (Afropop Worldwide 2012); the lesbian Namibian singer Shishani, who uses her songs to promote equality (Speaks 2013); and the lesbian Ugandan singer Shivan Pavin, who released “Back Off” on YouTube in 2016 despite being blackballed by producers and other singers because of her sexuality (Kuchu Times 2016). Afropop artists combating homophobia include Charly Boy (1951–), whose real name is Charles Oputa. He was nicknamed “Nigeria’s Boy George” for wearing androgynous clothing, makeup, and braids. In a 2017 interview, Oputa claimed that he created the Charly Boy persona “to shock timid, myopic, arrogantly ignorant, and ‘mongo-parkish’ [mentally colonized] Nigerians into being their authentic selves” (Olonilua 2017). Charly Boy has been vocal in his support for Nigeria’s sexual minorities (Oputa 2017). Similarly, the Ghanaian Afropop singers Efya (1987–) and Wanlov the Kubolor (1980–) have regularly condemned criminalization of same-sex acts in Ghana, as well as discrimination against LGBT individuals (Krejcova 2015).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Klein, Alyssa. “‘Same Love’ in Kenya: The Cover of Macklemore’s Gay Rights Anthem That

https://www.iol.co.za/entertainment/music/its-homoeroticcould-be-socio-political-1666403

The NAMES Project AIDS Memorial Quilt—often referred to simply as the AIDS Memorial Quilt—is an enormous quilt that serves as a memorial to celebrate the lives of those who have died of AIDS-related causes. It was conceptualized by the NAMES Project Foundation in 1987. Since its first display in October 1987, it has been seen by more than 18 million visitors (Literat and Balsamo 2014). As of 2016, it was the largest piece of community folk art in the world and weighed roughly 56 tons (DeLuca et al. 2007). More than 48,000 individual memorial panels—each measuring 3 by 6 feet—have been sewn together by friends, lovers, and family members of the deceased, and today the quilt serves as a powerful visual reminder of the AIDS pandemic (Literat and Balsamo 2014). Erin J. Rand and others have noted that the formal organization of the quilt intended to “counter the anonymity and secrecy that surrounded AIDS deaths by specifically naming—and by naming, providing a means for mourning—the dead” (Rand 2007, 659; Gambardella 2011).

The AIDS Memorial Quilt Archive also preserves the images and stories contained within the quilt. Today, the NAMES Project Foundation strives to effectively illustrate the enormity of the AIDS epidemic and increase the general public’s awareness of HIV/AIDS by providing a creative means for remembrance and healing. With the transformation of the New York branch of the NAMES Project into the International AIDS Prevention Initiative in 2004, the NAMES Foundation’s US and international chapters continue to assist others with HIV infection-prevention education, as well as raise funds for community-based AIDS service organizations.
The AIDS Memorial Quilt on Display at the National Mall in Washington, DC, in 2012. The quilt is the largest piece of community folk art in the world and serves as a powerful visual reminder of the AIDS pandemic. More than 48,000 individual memorial panels—each measuring 3 by 6 feet—have been sewn together by friends, lovers, and family members of those who died.

In addition to serving as an active reflection on the impact of the AIDS pandemic, the AIDS Memorial Quilt has shifted modes of active contemporary commemoration in the United States and around the world. Cleve Jones, founder of the project, notes, “The Quilt was and is an activist symbol—comforting, yes, but mortally troubling. If it raised a single question, it was, ‘What are you going to do about it?’ That was the challenge we laid at the national doorstep” (2007a, 591). Ioana Literat and Anne Balsamo reinforce this notion, noting, “The political and activist use of the AIDS Quilt must be understood as a direct response to the lack of visibility that plagued AIDS-affected communities (mostly gay men and intravenous drug users) in the 1980s” (2014, 139). Therefore, since the mid-1980s the quilt has served both documentary and performative purposes, increasing the visibility of the impact of the AIDS pandemic in contemporary society and providing a space for the enactment of that memory. Nonetheless, it has also garnered criticism for its place in history. As Kyra Pearson notes, when the California Senate passed legislation requiring public schools to adopt social science textbooks that teach about “sexual diversity” in 2006, the quilt came under attack in the media for its “obsolescence.” Critiques centered on its “attachment to white gay male lives and history” and its lack of representativeness, given the shifting global demographics of the AIDS pandemic and its disproportionate effects on African Americans in the US context (Pearson 2011, 280). Portrayals centered on the quilt as a relic and an “aging snapshot,” whatever the realities of its actual evolving composition (Pearson 2011, 281).

Quilts have a particular symbolic resonance. As folk art that can be produced by people without formal artistic training, “quilts possess a decidedly local, vernacular, and populist voice—one that is especially suited to commemorate personal loss” (Ott et al. 2011, 105–106). They have a long political history in American culture; the freedom quilts, for example, contained crucial markings for the Underground Railroad that helped slaves flee their plantation (Ott et al. 2011). Such resonances are crucial to the AIDS Memorial Quilt’s function to confront the political exclusion and to provide an alternative site of memory.

History of the Quilt

The origins of the quilt can be traced back to 1985, when it was conceived by Cleve Jones (1954–), a longtime gay rights activist based in San Francisco (NAMES Project Foundation 2018). Jones had helped to organize the candlelight march honoring Harvey Milk (1930–1978), who became the first openly gay elected official in the state of California with his election to San Francisco’s Board of Supervisors, and San Francisco mayor George Moscone (1929–1978), both of whom had been assassinated (Jones 2007b). While planning the 1985 march, Jones learned that more than 1,000 San Franciscans had died of AIDS (Literat and Balsamo 2014). He asked participants to write the names of friends, partners, and family members who had died of the disease on placards, and these placards were taped to the walls of the San Francisco Federal Building after the march. The result resembled a patchwork quilt (Jones 2007a).

Jones and friends made plans for a larger quilt. Their goal was to create a memorial for those who had died of AIDS, and to help people understand the impact of the disease (Jones 2007b). A little over a year later, Jones created his first panel for the AIDS Memorial Quilt in memory of his friend Martin Feldman. In 1987 Jones teamed up with Mike Smith and several others to formally organize the NAMES Project Foundation (Jones 2007a). People from all over the United States—particularly in the cities most affected by AIDS, including Atlanta, New York, Los Angeles, and San Francisco—sent panels to San Francisco to be included in the quilt. Sewing machines, equipment, and other materials were supplied by generous donors, and many volunteered tirelessly to help bring the quilt together (Jones 2007a).

The conceptualization, creation, display, and growth of the quilt—as well as its “provocative appearance on the Mall” in the late 1980s, “gave the project’s leadership the opportunity to denounce the country’s indifference to the AIDS epidemic and to rally for greater attention to research support” (Hawkins 1993, 758, 760). Indeed, as Rand notes, “by utilizing a symbol of American folk art and mythology—the patchwork quilt—the Quilt was able to encourage nationwide mourning, even if those being mourned continued to be reviled” (2007, 664). The construction and display of the quilt—and its inspiration for the design for the International AIDS Memorial Quilt and memorial quilts for other causes—has served as an essential visualization and vocalization of AIDS activism in the United States and the rest of the world (NAMES Project Netherlands Foundation 2018).

Descriptions of the Quilt

Individual quilt panels are typically very personalized and are created by the loved ones of someone who has died of AIDS-related causes. Each panel measures 3 feet by 6 feet—roughly the size of a human grave (Jones 2007a). When donated to the NAMES Project Foundation, the panels are grouped and assembled into eight-panel “blocks” measuring 12 feet by 12 feet. These blocks can be seen at local displays of the quilt.

Jones describes the techniques used in making the panels, as well as some of the materials used:

> There was every material from tweed to leather to silk, and of course ribbons and beads and glitter galore. And everything you could imagine was sewn onto fabric: locks of hair, record albums, souvenir postcards, a Barbie doll, whistles, crystals, a motorcycle jacket, a tuxedo, a shard of glass, foam rubber French fries, toy cars, a thimble, a cowboy hat, teddy bears, a pink Lacoste shirt, a Buddhist’s saffron robe, and even a padded jock strap. Notes were scribbled in corners; others were sewn in. Some panels held the ashes of the people they memorialized.

(Jones 2007a, 588)

Most panels are accompanied by letters, biographies, and photos, all of which speak to the experience of life in the age of AIDS, documenting the effects on those lost and those left behind (Jones 2007a). In the future, these “documentary” materials will be digitally photographed, contributing to the digitization of the quilt’s panels; when combined with the quilt’s panel images—currently displayed online—they will create a rich tapestry of information for future generations (NAMES Project Foundation 2018). The AIDS Memorial Quilt challenges the physicality of traditional monuments that are cast in stone or other permanent materials meant to withstand the passage of time. Kevin DeLuca and his colleagues interrogate the curious materiality of the AIDS quilt itself:

> So what do we make of the AIDS Memorial Quilt, a memorial made of the softest of materials—cloth, cotton? Well, first, that time already haunts the Quilt. The
As monument, memorial, archive, and active performance of mourning, the AIDS Memorial Quilt has called into question the ways in which communities can actively remember while moving toward the future.

The Quilt on Display and on Tour

The AIDS Memorial Quilt was displayed for the first time on the National Mall in Washington, DC, on 11 October 1987 ( NAMES Project Foundation 2018 ). Its display coincided with the Second National March on Washington for Lesbian and Gay Rights. The display included 1,920 panels and covered a space larger than a football field (Literat and Balsamo 2014). Roughly 500,000 people visited the quilt while it was on display that weekend ( Jones 2007a ).

Due to the overwhelming response to the quilt at its first display, a national tour was planned for spring 1988. By the end of the tour, the quilt’s size had tripled to include more than 6,000 panels ( NAMES Project Foundation 2018 ). The tour itself raised nearly $500,000 for hundreds of AIDS service organizations, and more than 9,000 volunteers from across the country helped the crew—of only seven people—move and display the quilt in each city ( Jones 2007a ). In October 1988, 8,288 panels were displayed on the Ellipse in front of the White House. Due to its sheer size and weight and the logistics required to transport the quilt, the last display of the entire AIDS Memorial Quilt was in October 1996, when the quilt covered the entire National Mall in Washington, DC (Literat and Balsamo 2014). The International AIDS Prevention Initiative and the Global AIDS Memorial Quilt took their first world tour in 2004 to 2005, stopping in Bangkok, Jamaica, Haiti, New York, Moscow, Berlin, Johannesburg, Port Elizabeth, Cape Town, and Melbourne before ending in Washington, DC ( NAMES Project Netherlands Foundation 2018 ).

The International AIDS Memorial Quilt

Today, the AIDS Memorial Quilt’s influence reaches beyond the borders of the United States, with independent quilt affiliates around the world. Since 2004 the former New York chapter has served as the International AIDS Prevention Initiative. The creation of an International AIDS Memorial Quilt began in 1998, when the NAMES Project Netherlands and the New York chapter of the NAMES Project collaborated to bring a global perspective to the memorialization of AIDS and HIV (NAMES Project Netherlands Foundation 2018). Countries that have contributed to the International AIDS Memorial Quilt include Argentina, Australia, Belgium, Canada, Cuba, the Dominican Republic, France, Germany, Guatemala, Haiti, Italy, Jamaica, Japan, Mexico, the Netherlands, the Philippines, Russia, South Africa, Spain, Thailand, Venezuela, Zambia, and Zimbabwe (NAMES Project Netherlands Foundation 2018).

In 1989 the quilt was nominated for a Nobel Peace Prize, demonstrating the impact the quilt has had on the global community as a memorial project and performance of mourning. It remains the largest community art project in the world, and the American quilt been the subject of countless books, films, scholarly papers, articles, and theatrical, artistic, and musical performances. Common Threads: Stories from the Quilt won the Academy Award for the best feature-length documentary film in 1989. The quilt has redefined the tradition of quilt-making in response to contemporary circumstances, as well as the process of memorialization in the United States (Blair and Michel 2007). Carole Blair and Neil Michel argue, “We believe the AIDS Memorial Quilt still has the potential to be more than ‘a museum piece.’ Whatever its fate in the years to come, though, we believe a part of its legacy will (and should) be as an important commemorative artwork in its own right” (2007, 620). A memorial, a tool for education, and a work of art, the quilt is a unique creation, an uncommon and uplifting response to the tragic loss of human life.

The Digital Quilt: The AIDS Memorial Quilt Archive

To archive and preserve the quilt, the panels have been professionally photographed by the NAMES Project Foundation. These photographs have created a permanent visual record of the quilt itself, as well as a compelling symbol of the scale and significance of the AIDS pandemic. The digital images are currently available online, making the quilt more available to the international public than ever before. The digitization and archiving process is an ongoing project as new panels are submitted continually, and it adds an international dimension to the memorial nature of the quilt itself. Other digital initiatives related to the AIDS Memorial Quilt include a collaboration between the NAMES Project Foundation and the University of Southern California’s public initiatives research team to create a tabletop browser, an interactive timeline, and a mobile web app for the Quilt 2012 commemorations (Literat and Balsamo 2014).

The next goal of the archive project is to analyze and catalog each panel of the quilt for visual and textual content (NAMES Project Foundation 2018). This information will be combined with the letters, biographies, and photos submitted by the panel makers into an accessible and globally available database. In that vein, Christopher Capozzola notes, "while the American symbolism and nationalist rhetoric of the Quilt served it well in the 1980s, it is now time to more explicitly and more effectively acknowledge the global implications of the AIDS epidemic” (2002, 97). Future ambitions of the archive project include collecting video interviews, stories, and testaments of panel makers. The archive project ensures that the quilt and those it remembers live on. The database and oral histories will chronicle the AIDS pandemic for generations to come.

SEE ALSO HIV/AIDS; HIV/AIDS in the United States; Museums and Memorials

BIBLIOGRAPHY

NAMES Project Netherlands Foundation. “International AIDS Memorial Quilt.” Accessed 12

Seba al-Herz (or Sabā Hirz), author of Al-Akharun (The Others), remains an enigma, her true identity a secret even as her only novel, published in Beirut in 2006, gains international popularity and recognition. Since its anonymous English translation was released in 2009, the author's identity has only become more mysterious. The only personal information about al-Herz given directly to the reader is two short lines on the back cover: “Seba al-Herz is the pseudonym of a twenty-six-year old Saudi woman from al-Qatif in Saudi Arabia. This is her first novel.” Everything else that the public can infer about this author comes from her book, written in first-person perspective by an unnamed young Shi’a woman attending university in al-Qatif. It is the protagonist-narrator's anonymity paralleling her own that contributes to a conflation of author and character, their lives intertwined in the public consciousness largely as a result of a morbid fascination with her character’s taboo existence. Al-Akharun is an introspective study in ambiguity, as its protagonist expresses and struggles with the aftermath of conflicting desires from her position of otherness. Not only is she a young woman in a strictly patriarchal and gender-segregated society, but al-Herz’s protagonist lives her life in the social and political margins as a result of her Shi’i minority religion, her isolating epileptic episodes, and her ambiguous sexual orientation and gender identity.
Religious Persecution

While al-Herz’s capricious protagonist grapples with understanding and defining her emotional and physical needs, her commitment to religion remains comparatively steadfast. As a student of both the sciences and Islamic jurisprudence in an all-women’s university, she actively participates in and even organizes the production and dissemination of politically dissident literature and joins her friends and colleagues in wearing open signs of Shi‘i resistance and protest. She constructs her semipublic persona by coordinating religious summer intensive courses, doing volunteer work, and writing for a magazine whose purpose is to share proper moral and cultural education with young people, all in line with Shi‘a ideology. Like the rest of her Shi‘a peers, she wears the traditional black shirt during the month of Muharram to commemorate the martyrdom of the Prophet’s grandson Husayn ibn ‘Ali, even though wearing black at this time is banned by the Sunni government to curb Shi‘a religious displays of mourning. This small resistance incurs regular fines for the one-third of students at the college who demonstrate their Shi‘a identities in the somewhat-public space of their private university.

Unlike the rest of the country, where Shi‘as compose only a small fraction of the population, the eastern provinces are predominantly Shi’ā, with the city of al-Qatif as the epicenter containing roughly 95 percent Shi’ā demographics. Even with this overwhelming local majority, Saudi Arabia’s Wahhabi government creates an atmosphere and reality of institutionalized sectarianism that is decidedly anti-Shi’ā. Wahhabi Islam is an exceptionally conservative sect of the Sunni branch; however, since Wahhabism now carries a negative connotation of extremism, many practitioners prefer to use the term muwahhidun, or those upholding the doctrine of tawhid (absolute monotheism) (“Wahhabis”).

When al-Akharun was released in 2006, anti-Shi’ā sentiment on the part of the Saudi government and Sunni populace had returned in full force after a short four-year period of hollow, rhetorical commitments to political reform (Jones 2005). While open discrimination against Shi’ā citizens was prohibited, Shi’ās in the eastern provinces found that government funds and programs were habitually routed to Sunni residents and that, while jobs in the thriving oil industry near the oasis city of al-Qatif were not particularly difficult to come by, promotion to management and other higher-paying, white-collar jobs were reserved for Sunni employees. The religious oppression of Shi’ās is traditionally so extreme that many practice their faith in taqiyya, or hidden from the ruling party. In fact, there are no current statistics as to the precise population demographics of Shi’ā Saudis; sources disagree, indicating that they could constitute anywhere from 10 to 15 percent of Saudi citizens (Jones 2005).

Ashura

Al-Herz points to the tension and frustrations caused by the kingdom’s failure to implement and enforce this intended reconciliation in her protagonist’s rebellious yet loyal adherence to observing the entirety of the Muharram month. In 2004, two years before al-Akharun’s publication, the Saudi government conceded to Shi’ā protest, granting the opportunity to practice Ashura, or the tenth and most important day of Muharram, as part of this attempt at political reform. While the reform inevitably failed, with the relationship between Saudi Sunnis and Shi’ās only becoming more strained as a result of the Iraq War, the freedom to practice Ashura has, as of 2017, not been officially revoked (Jones 2005). Ashura is important to Shi’ā practitioners as a very public spectacle and reenactment of Husayn’s martyrdom, marked by self-mortification and self-flagellation in a display of mourning and continuation of his legacy of fighting for justice over personal well-being. Understanding the complicated political history behind this religious ceremony of self-harm is key to reading al-Akharun and observing the ways in which the narrator navigates her many experiences of marginalization as a queer, disabled Shi’ā woman.

Censoring the religious practice of Muharram only strengthens the Shi’ā cause in al-Herz’s novel. The current oppression of Shi’ās harks back to the original violent split that separated Shi’ā from Sunni as a result of Husayn ibn ‘Ali’s violent murder. Living on the margins of society as a result of religious, political, and social persecution is, in many ways, a hallmark of the Saudi Shiʿa experience. As the narrator-protagonist says, “I have inherited a superabundance of weeping that goes back to an ancient era” (al-Herz [2006] 2009, 65). Thus, al-Herz links Shiʿa historical and contemporary religious identity through this theme of ostracization and the perpetual process of “othering,” both as resistance to governmental and religious authority—which are, in Saudi Arabia, one and the same—and as a means of illustrating the powerful community-building side effect of persecution.

Gender Segregation

Rigid social norms and expectations in Wahhabi-interpreted Qurʿanic scripture—and thus Islamic and political law—keep men and women apart. This gendered segregation, however, often has the unintended side effect of strengthening homosocial relationships and emotional bonds between friends of the same sex, even unintentionally establishing space for homosexual attraction and interaction. Al-Herz’s anonymous protagonist demonstrates both the limitations and the freedoms associated with this homosocially divided society. While she grows up with several brothers and a father at home, the narrator has only very limited contact with men in general, especially those unrelated to her. Additionally, in her particular case, she has little to no chance of being set up in an arranged marriage because of her epilepsy, a disease that runs in her family—also carrying with it the connotation of inbreeding (although this is never confirmed by the author or translator)—and that prevents her from being appropriate marriage material. Even though same-sex relationships and activity are prohibited in Saudi Arabia, the narrator is introduced to and explores the world of sapphic pleasure largely because she has very little access to men and many private opportunities to build intimate relationships with other women. However, the exploration of her sexuality is not a positive process of self-realization for several reasons, which include governmental censorship and restrictions, her ambiguous feelings and interpretations of gender and sexuality, and her struggle to reconcile these nonheteronormative emotions and actions with her faith.

Queerness under Islamic Law

An absolute monarchy, the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia recognizes only shariʿa (Islamic law) and the Qurʿan as both constitution and legislation, with religious authority the only power over the royal family (Vogel 2012). Under shariʿa, and in the Qurʿan, there are six hudud (prohibitions or boundaries) that have fixed, indisputable punishments, including zina (illicit sexual relations), for which the punishment is either 100 lashes or death by stoning (Dubber and Hörnle 2014). Homosexual relations fall within the scope of zina and are punished to the full extent of the law. However, these punishments are divvied up differently based on gender. Because queer female encounters do not involve penetration like those of their male counterparts, the traditional penalty is only the 100 lashes, not death by stoning. While this gendered differentiation may seem irrelevant or illogical in the domain of sexual deviance, there is a more telling underlying reason: in many cases, women are regarded as too weak and disenfranchised to even warrant stoning. Even though this punishment is extreme, it reveals an underestimation of women that many of the female characters in al-Akharun use to their advantage. Additionally, because spaces are gender-segregated—and women’s quarters are inherently private spaces—finding the four necessary, respected male witnesses to testify to these secret encounters can prove to be a challenge.

Because women are restricted from public view and interaction with unrelated men is largely prohibited, women are rarely questioned for spending time together alone, even behind closed doors and curtains. Although this forced privacy seems oppressive and prisonlike, it provides women—continually underestimated by a patriarchal society and government—the physical space for homosexual exploration and romance. Dai—the narrator’s lover, another young woman from her school and also an active participant in Shi’a programs and organizations—does not introduce the narrator to her first homosexual romantic and physical feelings, but she does expand the narrator’s knowledge and experience of a secret underworld of young Saudi lesbians. Throughout the duration of their relationship, they spend most of their time in their bedrooms, unquestioned even though their families are nearby. While the narrator’s bedroom is isolated because most of her family has left the home either through marriage or death, Dai’s bedroom shields and insulates their intimate moments from the world with heavy curtains, thick walls, and a one-way window looking out to the street. The narrator is still worried that she may be caught, which is always an underlying fear that propels her long, frequent periods of postcoital isolation. However, they remain relatively safe and secluded from watchful eyes, especially given their public religious devotion. After several months, Dai plans excursions to visit and spend time with a group of other queer or lesbian women. In this setting, the other women become witnesses to their romantic relationship, and Dai and the narrator to theirs. They can be open with one another about their identities in a space that is still private.

In addition to women’s physical spaces, the Saudi government also censors education and communication via the internet. When the narrator attempts to research almithliyya al-jinsiyya (homosexuality) and bisexuality, her limited search results have two effects, primarily grounded in language and culture of origin. When she searches in English, she feels detached and ostracized from the subject matter, as if it does not refer to her, her life, or her experiences. However, when she searches in Arabic, all she finds are restrictions, punishments, and confirmation of her “sin” in the eyes of God. Even though her attempts to learn more about herself only end up causing her more pain and emotional strife, the narrator continues to explore, using online chat rooms to try on different identities. Even though moral police monitor the chat rooms, she learns how to evade them by starting and responding to conversations only very late at night. Thus, the internet and other technological advances, such as texting, provide more spaces that blur the line between private and public and establish opportunities for sexual and social dissidence.

Sexual Ambiguity and Faith

Even though she has many opportunities to experiment with her nonheteronormative sexuality and keeps returning to these experiences, al-Akharun's narrator struggles to define or categorize herself under neat, precise labels. As a result of her illness and subsequent relegation to unmarried life, she does not fit into the categories of gender and sexuality that she once understood. She writes that "ever since I was a semi-boy and a sexless child, I have gotten used to the idea, never challenged, that children do not gain the qualities of their sex until after marriage, when the girls give birth to children and the boys go out to work" (al-Herz 2009, 65). So, when she is confronted with her own sexuality, especially a sexuality that is inherently against her religion in its interpretation by the Saudi state, she does not understand how it can exist outside this framework. Researching the terms homosexuality and bisexuality, the narrator feels detached and cannot connect with them. Allowing her girlfriend Dai to take off her clothes, the narrator watches herself in the mirror, transfixed by both her own body and by the desire in her lover's eyes that sends her into a "state of rapture" and gives her a "feeling of bliss" (12). The narrator genuinely feels romantic attraction and attachment to Dai and to other women in the novel. In fact, she describes her electric, erotic experiences with them passionately, almost as if spiritually overtaken or possessed. However, after her internet research and attempts to narrow down or consolidate her identity, she reaches "a state of estrangement" from her body and self, no longer able to look at herself in the mirror or take off her clothes, even when bathing (23).

Although she tries to form long-term romantic and emotional connections with her lovers, the narrator quickly loses interest in their predictability and, more importantly, in their attempts to make her predictable and to confine her to the role of girlfriend. At the same time, however, she cannot stand the idea that her lovers might leave her, stop wanting her, or stop loving her. She holds on tightly to these moments of bliss with them, grasping for certainty and a future together, until they inevitably sour. While this struggle is in part because of her faith and the difficult process of being confronted and trying to come to terms with nonnormative sexual desires while retaining her connection to God, her problems with relationships and commitment also come from her ambiguous yet very intense and acute feelings of simultaneous, all-consuming lust, adoration, and disgust for her lovers. As a result of her fear of a loss of independence and individuality, in addition to her refusal to be categorized as a "we" and belong to a group's ideology, the narrator even quits her responsibilities at the husayniyya (where the Shi'a student organization prepares Shi'a-specific religious ceremonies and articles for dissemination). She explains her frustrations both to her friends Aqil and Dai and in more detail to the reader in a rebellious,
It’s my right to have my own individual voice, and staying in the Husayniyya prevents me from even having the opportunity to offer my view of things. I hate being beholden to one particular line of thinking. I hate that my conduct has to show that I endorse and follow it! I hate being told that I would be offending and maybe even hating the Husayniyya if I wrote what I believe, and what I think is a personal right!

(AL-HERZ [2006] 2009, 124)

Later, after ending her violent, jealous, and dysfunctional relationship with Dai, the narrator begins dating Dareen, who attempts to help her come to terms with her homosexuality. However, even when she accepts that she is not inherently “defective, corrupt, [or] depraved,” the narrator asks “How did God create me? In what form did God create me?” insisting that she has had “homo sex,” but that she is not a “homo” (al-Herz [2006] 2009, 193). Just like in her religious ideology and personal relationships, her inability to choose and restrict herself to a particular shared identity causes her overwhelming and stifling fears and depression.

One of the most controversial aspects of this novel is the final chapter, in which the narrator’s anxiety and anguish conclude in a sex scene with her male friend Umar, through whom she is happily able to reconcile her sexuality with her faith, demanding commitment with him. While this ending appears to suggest that she needed a man to fulfill her life, undermining all of her homosexual relationships and nonnormative sexual thoughts and experiences, it also leaves her future, and thus her identity, ambiguous. She adamantly refuses to be identified as either homosexual or heterosexual, and all of her sexual experiences ultimately represent personal assessments, as she tests the boundaries of her own identity to prove this true individuality to herself.

 Queerness and Shi’ā Faith

The narrator associates love with pain: “Love is painful, and all the words paired with it are parallel states that do not intersect with it. Love and loss, love and flight, love and absence, love and sorrow” (al-Herz [2006] 2009, 192). Not only does she fear losing her independence to another, but her experiences with all of her relationships indicate an inevitability of loss, abandonment, and betrayal. From the death of her elder (and favorite) brother Hassan, to her parents’ and other siblings’ painful absences, and the epilepsy that prevents marriage opportunities, the narrator’s childhood and adolescence foreshadow the ephemeral nature of her future relationships. This sense of loss and isolation goes back to the “superabundance of weeping” that characterizes the Shi‘a experience (62).
Fundamentally, the narrator cannot accept love, community, or dependence on other people in any capacity. Even her closest physical and emotional relationships, with Dai and Dareen, are influenced by this history, as they perpetuate the cycle of violence with self-inflicted pain.

Recalling the Ashura ceremonies, in which Shi‘as participate in public ritualized self-harm to commemorate Husayn’s martyrdom, the narrator’s relationships are characterized by bondage, masochism, verbal slurs, and open obsessions about relationships with past lovers that doom her relationships from the start. The narrator’s interior struggle with her sexuality and religious faith also evokes this history as inherited mourning. Overcome with guilt and shame over her sinful thoughts and desires, the narrator enacts her own rituals for absolution. After giving in to her desires, she goes through periods of self-disgust, in which she avoids her lovers as punishment, harshly overwashes her body to cleanse herself, and lives in her brother’s old bedroom in order to avoid the place of her sin.
However, considering the history associated with Ashura and self-harm, these practices demonstrate more complexity than mere guilt and shame. Because they parallel her religious ceremonies, her sexuality—including both hetero- and nonheteronormative experiences—reinforces her religion rather than contradicting it. Ultimately, her queerness, or her ambiguous gender, sexual, and intellectual identities, is simultaneously a rebellion from and an enactment of her spirituality as she defies categorization, refusing to conform to any one gender norm or sexual orientation, and acting outside the expectations of different social and religious groups.

SEE ALSO Homosexual Acts in Shari‘a; Lesbianese (2008; Alissar Gazal); Misk al-Ghazal (1988; Hanan al-Shaykh)

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Dubber, Markus D., and Tatjana Hörnle, eds. The Oxford Handbook of Criminal Law. Oxford:
Oxford University Press, 2014.

Herz, Seba, al-. The Others. New York: Seven Stories Press, 2009. First published in Arabic in 2006.

Hirschmann, Nancy J. “Queer/Fear: Disability, Sexuality, and The Other.” Journal of Medical Humanities 34, no. 2 (June 2013): 139–147.

Jones, Toby. “Saudi Arabia’s Not So New Anti-Shi‘ism.” Middle East Report 37, 242 (Spring

alQaws

WALAA ALQAISIYA
Independent scholar
United Kingdom

Palestinian organization that promotes queer acceptance combined with advocacy against Israeli pinkwashing.

alQaws for Sexual and Gender Diversity in Palestinian Society (in Arabic, Lil-taʿaddudiyya jinsiyya wal-jindariyya fil mujtamaʿa al-filastini) is a queer grassroots movement that has worked since the late 1990s to build LGBTQ communities and promote new ideas about gender and sexual diversity across Palestine (alQaws 2018c).

Origins and Reorientation

alQaws, which is Arabic for “rainbow,” was first established in 2001 as a small service-oriented group within a larger Israeli organization, the Jerusalem Open House, that focused on tolerance for LGBTQ persons. Such collaboration ceased as the group gradually started to embrace the politics of what Walaa Alqaisiya (2018) has termed “decolonial queering.” In other words, the group underwent a process of queer reorientation (Ahmed 2006), growing increasingly critical of the Israeli approach, which treated LGBTQ advocacy as a “discrete site of oppression disconnected from Zionist settler colonialism” (Alqaisiya 2018, 29). This change occurred after the State of Israel began imposing harsher political conditions on Palestinians. For alQaws, the failure of the Oslo peace process in the late 1990s confirmed the inherent violence and brutality of the Israeli settler-colonial machine and revealed the inconceivability of any prospects for peace vis-à-vis its native Palestinian other. alQaws, therefore, posited a moment of “disorientations” (Ahmed 2006, 11), inscribing a move away from Israeli LGBTQ bodies because they did not allow queer Palestinian identities and political voices to be heard (Maikey 2014). This decision allowed alQaws to formulate a more expansive and politically effective self-definition. In 2007 alQaws officially separated from the Jerusalem Open House, marking the beginning of a queering praxis and complicating the exclusionary politics of gayness and the standard LGBTQ framework by becoming alQaws for Sexual and Gender Diversity in Palestinian Society (Alqaisiya 2018). In so doing, the group grounded its approach to issues of gender and sexuality in a sociopolitical context (Maikey and al-ʿAris 2011) that acknowledged and defied the colonial reality of Palestine.

Opposition to Israeli Pinkwashing
One of the most important aspects of alQaws's decolonial queer approach is its effort to engender new forms of resistance to the political campaigns that Israel uses to brand itself as pink-progressive, or what Palestinian queer activist groups and their international allies call pinkwashing. Israel’s pinkwashing campaigns started in 2002, when the Israeli Ministry of Foreign Affairs asked LGBTQ communities to take part in a video aimed at promoting Israel as a progressive country that was friendly to LGBTQ visitors and residents. The video was later distributed in San Francisco. In 2005 this campaign to “rebrand Israel” expanded, with millions of dollars invested in promoting Israel’s progressive gay image worldwide.

Israel’s deliberate use of this tactic produces a double effect. First, it promotes an image of Israel as a liberal gay haven. Second, it conceals Israel’s treatment of Palestinians, who are portrayed as backward and homophobic (Elias 2018). Pinkwashing reframes “the relationship between Israel and Palestine from ‘colonizer-colonized’ to one that distinguishes between those who are ‘modern and open,’ and those who are presented as ‘backward and homophobic’” (Alqaisiya, Hilal, and Maikey 2016, 131). This process of pinkwashing “simplifies and anesthetizes the fundamental violence on the basis of which [settler] colonialism thrives” (131).

In response to Israeli pinkwashing, alQaws and its queer transnational allies launched a campaign dubbed “pinkwatching,” which aimed to mobilize a global fight against Israel’s pinkwashing program. The goal of pinkwatching is to expose the colonial premise of Israeli pinkwashing and warn against efforts to “normalize Israeli occupation, settler colonialism, and apartheid” (Pinkwatching Israel 2018). For alQaws, the importance of pinkwatching lies in how it reveals the complex web of colonial, racist, Islamophobic, and homophobic elements that constitute the discourse and logic of pinkwashing and its supporters. The work of pinkwatching consists in creating a hub of activist analyses, press releases, and discussions that link gender and sexuality to the colonial reality of Palestine. For instance, pinkwatching efforts demonstrate how Israeli pinkwashing goes hand-in-hand with the propagation of political discourses that underpin support for masculinized, violent militarism and anti-Arab (that is, anti-Muslim) racism, which are the antithesis of “democracy,” “civility,” and “LGBT progress” (Pinkwatching Israel 2016; Maikey 2011). For alQaws and its supporters, pinkwatching reveals the colonial violence toward Palestinians that is condoned by those who blindly support “gay/modern” Israel and participate in Israel’s LGBTQ tourism industry.

Pinkwatching exposes how institutional or individual collaboration with and promotion of “gay Israel” permits the systematic and continued displacement, negation of rights, and denial of recognition of Palestine and Palestinians, including queer Palestinians. For these reasons, Palestinian queer activists call upon international LGBTQ communities and tourists to boycott Tel Aviv Pride events, Israeli LGBTQ film festivals, and gay tourism in Israel (alQaws 2018a, 2018b). With these calls to boycott, alQaws urges others to challenge events and collaborations that normalize the Israeli state and its LGBTQ organizations by failing to adhere to a politics of resistance and exposure of Israeli colonialism (PACBI 2011). In addition, alQaws warns LGBTQ groups and individuals against “promotion of a criminal and settler state” and seeks to work in tandem with “the 2005 Palestinian Call for Boycott Divestment and Sanctions (BDS)” (alQaws 2018a). Lynn Darwich and Haneen Maikey argue that queer expressions of solidarity with Palestine become significant only when the fight against pinkwashing is seen as part and parcel of “the larger [fight against the] colonial Zionist project … challenging its hidden notion of mainstream gay politics” (2014, 284). alQaws contends that transnational queer solidarity with Palestine should start with decolonization rather than reification of the international homogenization of LGBTQ rights discourse and mechanisms.

Rejection of Single-Issue Approaches to LGBTQ Activism

These hegemonic forces tend to enforce mainstream singleissue approaches to LGBTQ organizing that are detrimental to Palestinian queer activism. When international donors assign funding to organizations focusing solely on sexuality, they also participate in the (re)production of Palestine’s colonial reality (Maikey 2012). alQaws, therefore, complicates mainstream discourse and policies related to coming out, homophobia, pride, and visibility (Maikey and Shamali 2011) by proposing the abandonment of a single-issue approach to sexuality. alQaws urges activists to adopt an intersectional lens that pays attention to how diverse elements, including class, race, and gender, affect and contribute to the redefinition of LGBTQ identities. The group further opposes top-down mechanisms that impose predetermined models of gender and sexuality, arguing that such approaches to LGBTQ rights obliterate more fundamental political dynamics. Instead, alQaws favors a bottom-up approach that emphasizes the value of grassroots mobilization and community participation, and thus the wider and most pressing political and social needs of Palestinian society (alQaws 2014a). The repercussions of this approach also lie in how alQaws, by identifying connections between various forms of oppression and their perpetuation, provides a platform that stretches beyond LGBTQ communities and reaches out to the whole of Palestinian society (Alqaisiya, Hilal, and Maikey 2016).

At the local level, alQaws translates its politics into numerous activities that entail working across “historic Palestine,” meaning the geography of Palestine prior to Zionist colonization and border creation between what became known as the “State of Israel” and the “occupied Palestinian territories.” alQaws members pursue a range of activities reaching out to all Palestinians, thus defying the colonial fragmentation of Palestine (alQaws 2018a). alQaws strives to build a national LGBTQ Palestinian leadership that works toward “a decolonized Palestine” (alQaws 2018a), disavowing legal and socioeconomic categories that have been used to divide and displace Palestinians (i.e., West Bankers, Jerusalemites, Palestinian citizens of Israel, Gazans, refugees, etc.) and facilitate Israeli colonial control. For these reasons, while alQaws has established a physical presence across hub locations, such as Jerusalem, Haifa, and Ramallah, it also maintains a website (www.alkhat.org) that permits all Palestinians to access its national Listening and Information Line.

Other alQaws initiatives include professional training for civic organizations, advocacy, and youth groups; multimedia and artistic projects; and psychosocial support (alQaws 2018d). All these activities not only provide fundamental support to local communities but also enable the emergence of a Palestinian queer agency that aims to reach out to “youth, women, and transgender individuals, as well as [work] with civil society institutions/organizations and society at large” (alQaws 2018c). Local communities and the “society at large” are encouraged to come together for open and challenging discussions about the need to combat gender hierarchies and sexual norms of oppression within Palestine. alQaws promotes those discussions in order to challenge the power paradigms that constitute Israeli colonialism and are reproduced in the very vision for liberation that many Palestinians, including the Palestinian Authority, have come to uphold. In centering questions of gender and sexual diversity on Palestine, alQaws stresses the link between queerness and liberation, unfolding and practicing new ways to live and imagine anti-colonial queerness from Palestine to the United States and beyond (Maikey 2014).

SEE ALSO Aswat; The Gay International and Mideast LGBTQI Organizations; Helem; Meem; Pinkwashing

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Pinkwatching Israel. “Dance with Gay Soldiers in a Warzone—Boycott Tel Aviv Pride, May 2016.” 30 May 2016. https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=iViTeAw7bFo
Amer, Ghada (1963–)

MARTINE ANTLE
Professor, School of Languages and Cultures
University of Sydney, Australia

Egyptian artist whose work challenges conventional representations of women, particularly in its depictions of same-sex desire.

Ghada Amer’s art stems from ancestral techniques that women have practiced and passed on to each other for thousands of years. Sewing and embroidery bind this contemporary work to forgotten cultures of the past. Stretching from East to West, touching all the points of the globe, Amer’s stitches are the brushstrokes of thread paintings on canvas.

Product of Two Worlds

Amer’s art is the product of two cultural worlds. It inscribes itself in the middle ground between the East and the West and initiates a dialogue between these cultures that undoes all preconceptions and questions all foundational pillars of cultural and sexual identities. This intercultural approach to art is a testament to the vivacity of contemporary artistic production in a globalized world that, with Amer, a female artist of Egyptian origin, finds itself liberated from all geographical or cultural restraints. Amer refutes the idea that her work is framed from a queer perspective. Yet she does not privilege a fixed position in her art when it comes to gender, and she explores a diverse range of approaches that question normalcy and cultural hegemony, as well as representations of lesbian love. Her artistic strategy diverts conventional expectations of love between women and opens up a multiplicity of readings of same-sex desire. She also resolutely demystifies the clandestineness of lesbian love in art through the showcasing and constant destabilization of gender and sexuality. In doing so, she blurs the frontiers between sexual identities and embraces “otherness.” It is from this standpoint that one may read and frame her work from a queer perspective. Woman and her body, as it is affirmed in this context, can be understood only as a cultural hybrid in the making; the feminine pictorial characters in Amer’s work become the heir of a modernity that is henceforth confronted by contradictory and conflicting sexual ideologies of the East and the West. Her female pictorial women stand against normativity and sexual dominance.

However, it is neither in Egypt, Amer’s birthplace, nor in France, the place of her artistic education, that Amer’s work takes form. This original body of work, avant-garde and often provocative, was born elsewhere, in another cross-cultural space, that of Spanish Harlem, a favorite space of the artist, where she now works with her Persian collaborator, Reza Farkhondeh (1963–), with whom she signs certain works “RFGA.” According to Amer, “In Europe, it was difficult to paint. There was a negative attitude towards painting post-1970. I had gone to art school to learn painting, not to learn of the decline or the end of painting. Since I’ve been in the United States, I’ve been able to paint with needlework” (interview by Martine Antle, 2010).

Harlem—another space of cultural in-betweenness—is transformed into a fertile space for this artistic creation. The in-betweenness that Amer asserts both disrupts and undoes in one fell swoop the stereotype of the woman imprisoned under the yokes of the heteronormative pornographic press and Orientalist representations. Moreover, this liminal space confronts the tropes of imprisonment and objectification of women in the East as well as in the West. It is in this pictorial space, in the perpetual motion of the paintbrush, needle, and thread, that Amer’s new choreographic writing of the body is born. In Fifi—The Goodbye (2002), a work whose title identifies it as the representation of a departure, the feminine forms undo themselves, mingle with each other, come together, and take off toward a new state of being. This ludic artistic space evolves into a space of mediation and one that invites dialogue on queer identities and desire.

Amer engages numerous literary, artistic, and cultural traditions in her art. She revisits the universal themes of tales with her Alice in Wonderland (2003) and those of myths with Belles and the White Kiss (2006). The fluidity of the feminine figures in her Perfumed Garden (RFGA, 2005) makes use of a contrast with the sixteenth-century Arabic erotic manual Kitab al-rawd al-ʿatir fi nuzhat al-khatir (The Perfumed Garden [1886]) by Muhammad al-Nafzawi, in which the author attempts to enumerate and codify the modalities of the sexual spectrum. Amer’s The Turkish Bath (2006), in which the hairs and the threads in perpetual motion mingle with the contours of the bodies and fuse together, alludes to Jean-Auguste-Dominique Ingres's Turkish Bath (1862), in which the passive and immobile bodies of the odalisques remain fixed. The Purple Lady and the Princesses (RFGA, 2005) and The Big Black Kansas City Painting (RFGA, 2005), as waking dreams, evoke the ephemeral quality of woman and of pleasure and the spectral dimensions of representation. Like a palimpsest, these figures lead the spectator into a dynamic and disorienting relationship with the canvas.

Deconstructing Fairy Tales and Pornography

If Amer turns to fairy tales and to pornographic motifs again and again, it is only to deconstruct them as she invites the viewer to place them in new contexts. Fundamental questions constantly recur: How can women be taken out of the conceptual boxes that imprison them, both in the East and in the West? How can societal constraints on the female body be denounced for what they are? How can queer desire be represented? According to the premise of Amer’s pictorial universe, the first step is to make women visible and to free them from the stereotypical representations sensationalized by the media—the exploitation of their fetishized bodies in pornography in particular. In short, Amer “unveils” women, so to speak—unties them and frees them from the domestic enclosures to which they have so long been relegated. By unveiling women, she tears down the veil of societal control and lets the viewer glimpse or even experience a new language of desire and pleasure. To enter into Amer’s universe requires the viewer to maintain a lucid gaze on both the past and the present. For if, in Amer’s art, women’s bodies remain in the center of representation, and if corporeal language takes form via the pornographic model, these serve only to undo and dismantle the mechanisms of heterosexual power and framing that are imposed on women in order to free them and to reveal their new potentials.

The story of daily life that Amer tells begins simply, like in a fairy tale. The four works of the 1991 series titled Five Women at Work already reveal the essential aspects and the acuity of her vision. Women were busy with domestic work: cooking and ironing, for example (La femme qui repasse [The woman who irons], 1992). They have left their beauty secrets embroidered on kitchen rags (Conseils de beauté du mois d’Août: Vos jambres, votre corps, vos cheveux et vos ongles [Beauty tips for the month of August: Your legs, your body, your hair, and your nails], 1993). So these activities traditionally associated with women’s domestic roles are brought into the public realm of art, as Amer blurs distinctions between private and public space. It matters little in Amer’s universe whether women are represented in the act of performing housework, or if they are prisoners of Western harems. These two modes of representation of women fall back on one issue: women’s subordination and fantasies by European voyeurs and consumers throughout history. It is from this seemingly familiar feminist terrain that the artist weaves her radical challenge of gender. While dismantling the strategies of the Orientalist harem, Amer tears down another locus of objectification of women: the pornographic space. She deliberately denounces taboos and religiosity, destroying the cultural icons that obsessively codify the difference between the sexes and establish normative heterosexual rules and modalities of sexuality in contemporary societies.

The poses that she copies from pornographic magazines and that she reproduces ad infinitum progressively lose their form, and they disintegrate under the threads that she lets hang over the edge of the fabric. The form and poses of the bodies, while recognizable, are in fact in motion, in the direction of “otherness.” Here, her art takes form simultaneously from stereotypical motifs (pornographic forms and poses) and from the progressive deconstruction of these motifs. Amer’s challenging and bold research on sexuality culminates in her sculpture titled The Encyclopedia of Pleasure (2001), composed of fifty-seven embroidered boxes inspired by the erotic texts known as Jawamiʿ al-ladhdhah, by the medieval Arab writer ʿAli ibn Nasr al-Katib (c. late tenth century). Amer’s art is not simply a (re)production of pornographic or even erotic images or texts, as critics have suggested. It is rather a reflection on what constitutes sexuality, an invitation for the viewer to think about and critique the various definitions, strategies, and practices of sexuality and desire.

A New Feminine Body Cartography

The Encyclopedia of Pleasure (2001) by Ghada Amer. Amer embroidered translated selections from the earliest extant Arabic erotic work by tenth-century writer ʿAli ibn Nasr al-Katib on 57 canvas boxes for this work. She specifically chose the selections in which al-Katib defines women’s sexuality in an encyclopedic way, reflecting how women’s desire has been framed by men.

Through ironic imitation, reproduction, and derivation of pornographic and religious texts and models, Amer slowly deconstructs clichés associated with the Orientalist stereotypes of the odalisques and women’s sexuality and creates a new feminine body cartography, which is one of her key strategies. In her Private Room (1998) she embroiders all the words associated with women and the rhetoric of love throughout the Qur’an and renders them in French. In doing so, she also deconstructs the stereotypes associated with women in Islam. Moving away from the 1960s notions and ideologies of the European women’s liberation movement, which often implied in art little more than liberating women of their clothes in order to reveal their bodies and make them visible, Amer is concerned with undermining societal controls in order to free women from the veils that hide their identity. Her intercultural investigation denounces the multiple mechanisms of repression of women on a global scale. Their provocative poses and their mocking glances decry such labels as “erotic,” “sexual,” “pornographic,” “feminist,” “abstract,” and “figurative.” All suggestions of corporality slip away into some undefined space between color and cloth, between painting and sewing, in this “choreographic writing,” where forms fall away from colored threads and paint, juxtaposed or intermingled until a new stitch accentuates their different textures at the height of Amer's painterly embroidery. In her 2008 exhibition Love Has No End, an embroidered inscription first draws the viewer’s gaze to the center of a flowered landscape. It gives a nod to the final kiss that ends Hollywood films and which, for more than a century, has formed, modeled, and colonized Western imaginary to the point where people project themselves and identify with this final kiss and its promise of eternal heterosexual love. Yet, the work of Amer and her collaborator, Farkhondeh, resolutely puts an end to this promising and misleading message. The message “Love Ends” awakens the spectator by putting an end to the normative Hollywood myth. This artistic message references the end of love, signals finality, and also marks another point of departure from which to think and imagine queer desire without the restrictive and repetitive constraints of the mediated screen.

COURTESY CHEIM & REID, NEW YORK

Love Ends (2006) by Ghada Amer and Reza Farkhondeh. The embroidered message “Love Ends” on a watercolor background stands in contrast to the Hollywood myth of romantic love, signaling both the end of love as well a point of departure from which to think and imagine desire without the restrictive and repetitive constraints of the mediated screen.

Nonetheless, if the work of Amer and Farkhondeh deliberately turns its back on the empire of media, it is through the slow deconstruction of media clichés that they evoke new means of queer desire. It is in the evanescent moment of the almost spectral disappearance and appearance of commonplaces of humanity’s modernity (such as the fetishized heterosexual woman offering limitless pleasure), as well as in the interstices of form, color, and the fairy-tale artificiality of stickers, that the viewer can now interrogate new gender identities, their rhythms, their colors, their movements, and a new cartography of queer aesthetic episteme.

SEE ALSO The Art of Identity in India; The Art of Queering Asian Mythology; Graffiti and Graphic Art; Khookha McQueer (1987–); Ottoman and Persian Miniature Paintings; Tom of Finland (1920–1991)

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Anā Hiya Anti (2000; Elham Mansour)

DINA GEORGIS
Associate Professor, Women and Gender Studies Institute
University of Toronto, Canada

One of the first novels published in the Middle East to represent lesbianism in a way that is not hetero-normative.

Samar Habib (2005–2006) describes the novel Anā hiya anti (I Am You [2007]) by Elham Mansour as the first lesbian novel to come out of the Middle East. That is because until 2000, when the novel was first published, in Arabic, by the Beirut publisher Riad el-Rayyes, no other literary work from the Middle East had represented lesbian love in a way that was not disparaging, conservative, or guilty of reproducing heterosexist norms (al-Samman 2008). At the time, Mansour was already a published feminist novelist and scholar, and her motivation in writing Anā hiya anti was to open a Platonic mode of dialogue in the hopes of challenging and changing accepted social attitudes and beliefs about lesbians among Arabs (Habib 2005–2006).

According to Habib (2005–2006), who translated the novel into English in 2007, the book’s arrival was not greeted with glowing reviews. Many critics (according to Habib’s account of the novel’s literary reception in Arabic-language literary circles) commented on how poorly it is written and how it uses weak literary techniques. The book most certainly has literary weaknesses and flaws: the dialogue is stilted and contrived, and Mansour’s protagonists, lesbians who do not change or grow much over the course of the novel, are somewhat caricatured. They are also oddly stubborn and obsessive with their desires and express exaggerated emotions of both love and suffering that are hard to believe. Indeed, her protagonists do not always summon the empathy the author might want to effect in her readers. But as Habib insists, the value of this book is elsewhere, in its pedagogical potential. She refuses to evaluate it for its literary accomplishments or failures. Indeed, in Habib’s translated edition of the novel, she includes notes and exercises for students. This entry similarly evaluates it for what it does accomplish, especially in light of the dismissal or absence of representation of lesbianism in the contemporary Arab world.

Background on Arab and Middle Eastern Sexualities

The representation and practice of same-sex love has a rich history in medieval Arabic literature. It is important to account for this historical context before a discussion of the novel because it, along with European colonialism, left a complicated legacy in contemporary manifestations of Arab sexualities. The Arab medieval tradition depicts a range of homoerotic expression, from the Platonic concept of love to homoerotic sex (al-Samman 2008). Even though Islam poses constraints on same-sex love, Hanadi Al-Samman (2008) argues that the literature demonstrates that Arabic society also made space for homoerotic love. Notwithstanding the questionable practices of the ghilman system of the time wherein male slaves were used for sexual gratification, Al-Samman argues that it “offered an avenue to freely and scrupulously express homoerotic desires, and to legitimize the enactment of these desires albeit within the context of a ‘normative’ heterosexual society” (2008, 276–277). In this way, homosexuality was not a threat to heterosexuality but resided alongside it.

European colonial domination changed the naturalized expression of same-sex love into demeaning sexual hierarchies and binaries. Colonial domination, as Edward W. Said famously argued in Orientalism (1978), had not only an economic agenda but an intellectual/cultural one as well. Orientalism refers to the lens through which Europe imagined itself superior to the East, or the Orient as it was called, by constructing it as primitive and culturally backward. A significant feature of Orientalism was the discourse on sexuality that depicted Arabs and Islamic people as oversexed, promiscuous, and barbaric. Indeed, in depicting the East as “exotic” and deviant in literature, photography, and travelogues, Europe “rewrote” the history of Arab sexuality. The construction of deviant homosexuality played a significant role in the Orientalist sexual fantasies of the Middle East (Boone 2014). Not only did Orientalist thinking disparage and attack medieval Islam for its so-called debauchery, its discourses led to the criminalization of homosexuality through the imposition of colonial penal codes in the Arab world (and other nations that originated under British colonial control in South Asia and Africa). As can be expected, the criminalization of homosexuality via sodomy laws stifled same-sex expression and arguably left a lasting legacy of secrecy and containment in relation to same-sex practice. Joseph A. Massad (2007), however, views the silence surrounding same-sex relations in the Arab world less cynically and argues that Arab cultures have a long-standing practice of giving permission to and tolerating same-sex sexual relations as long as they remain unnamed. He takes issue with Western human rights discourse and the “Orientalist impulse” (2007, 161) behind initiatives that seek to “save” and “liberate” Arabs out of the closet and in so doing undermine traditional expression of same-sex love. Following Michel Foucault’s 1978 critique of modern Western sexuality, these interventions, Massad argues, are shaming in that they reduce Arab sexualities, depicting them as psychically repressed and socially oppressed. Worse, the human rights interventions of the Gay International, as he calls the LGBTQ nongovernmental organizations, are problematic not only because they make universal assumptions about same-sex practices, but also because the imposition of LGBTQ identities (an acronym that itself is a Western construction) and the pressures to come out and live openly expose LGBTQ individuals to hostility and jeopardize their safety. Whereas they were once treated with indifference, allowing for a degree of freedom, the increased visibility of homosexual activities in the region (by members of an affluent class that frequents clubs and bars) has now raised the ire of nation-states, jeopardizing the safety of LGBTQ individuals through juridical surveillance and punishment (Massad 2007; Awwad 2010). The effect is therefore not liberation, but ironically oppression.

Massad certainly raises important concerns. Missing in his analysis is the question of whether Arabs who were having same-sex relations felt satisfied doing so under the particular conditions that sanctioned them, even if no other way of expressing and living same-sex desire could be imagined. The advent of globalization, and the concomitant access to the internet and social media, has exposed the Global South to gay epistemologies, destabilizing traditional knowledge. As Al-Samman and Tarek El-Ariss insist, however, Arab and Middle Eastern sexualities should not be viewed as “exclusively symptomatic of imperialist and colonial agendas” (2013, 205), which is to say as simply subscribing to Western ideologies and terminology. Indeed, they suggest that sexualities in the region should be read beyond easy binaries of East/West and understood through a multiplicity of “layers, discourses, and cultural models within a diverse landscape where identities are not fixed or neatly associated with particular ideological models or traditional practices, but are often in a state of tension and uneasiness" (205). Understanding Arab and Middle Eastern sexualities through "moments of play, performance, contradiction, dissonance, and evanescence" (205) opens up the possibility of recognizing how Arabs, and in particular Arab women, are negotiating the traumatic legacies of Orientalism and the pressures of Western hegemony and gay imperialism.

The Novel's Plot and Its Meanings

Mansour’s novel begins with the turbulence of the civil war in Lebanon and two of her protagonists coming out of their hiding places. This is an apt metaphor for the importance of making the lives of lesbians known and exposed to the Arab world. When the novel was published in 2000, Meem, an organized group of queer women, lesbians, bisexuals, and transgender people founded in 2007, did not yet exist. And Helem, a human rights advocacy organization for the LGBTQ community in Lebanon, was founded in 2004, a few years after the publication of Anā hiya anti. To say that the novel was a bold and significant step toward opening up the topic of lesbianism and homosexuality is therefore not an understatement.

The story revolves around the intertwined lives of three female characters—Siham, Layal, and Mimi—all of whom in different ways have lesbian tendencies. The reader is first introduced to Siham’s life story. Although the narrator offers an objective account of her life, much of Siham’s story is told in the first person in lengthy quotations as she reflects on her past. Reaching for answers to make sense of her attraction to women, she recalls her isolation when girlfriends started to call her a tomboy. When she got her period, “a natural matter” (Mansour 2007, 3), as her mother explained, she felt it was anything but that. Siham, it would seem, had no framework or terminology through which to understand her experience. The inability to name her sexual inclinations caused her suffering. In her search for truth, she looks for explanations and attributes her lesbianism to a sexual assault incident by her father, only to refute it later in the novel. Perhaps to dissuade the reader from thinking that Siham was influenced by Western ideas, Mansour’s narrator explains that Siham noticed her inclinations toward the same sex at a young age, suggesting that her homosexuality cannot be explained as simply a political choice or an outcome of being exposed to Western gay epistemologies but rather as a desire that ran deeply in her and evolved over time. In this way, Mansour discourages the reader from making stereotypical assumptions that a cause must exist; but that is not to say that her sexuality is not influenced by ideological frameworks.

Indeed, after the narrator’s short introduction to Siham’s early years, the novel turns to her first sexual relationship with a young woman in Paris, Claire, a fellow student at the school Siham is sent to by her mother. It is in Paris and with Claire that Siham experiences both freedom and oppression. Siham is initially happy and exhilarated with Claire, but her relationship soon turns sour after her mother comes to visit, and Claire declares that she cannot “put up” with Siham’s secrecy and obedience to her mother (9). When Siham’s mother calls Claire on the phone, accusing her of being a “lesbian,” “dirty and diseased,” and “contaminating her daughter,” an upset and crying Claire roars at Siham: “Get away from me. You are a barbaric people.... Are you that backwards in Lebanon.... You should either stand up to your mother and defend your rights or get out of my life. Get out of our movement that fights for our rights” (15). Not only is the human rights discourse here used to shame and punish Siham, Claire’s Orientalist lens also forecloses any possibility that there are ways of imagining freedom beyond the logic of “coming out” that elevates the individual over family, community, and culture.

Siham is caught between a shaming Arab mother, whose description of lesbianism as dirty is no less complicit with an Orientalist viewpoint that depicts Arab homosexuality as deviant, and Claire’s shaming racist discourse that disregards how her so-called freedom was built on a history of manufacturing civilizational hierarchies and differences. Shunned for being too Arab and not “out” enough in France, in Lebanon Siham suffers because she refuses to be anything but a lesbian. Indeed, when she returns home and befriends, and subsequently falls in love with, Layal, an open-minded university professor, Siham rejects Layal’s persistent advice to try to socialize with young men, arguing that lesbianism may or may not be her nature and could be an outcome of the circumstances in her life. Mansour’s Siham embodies the tensions experienced by many Arab lesbians for whom neither a traditional Arab life nor a modern Western existence is possible or desired. Her sexuality, like the sexuality of many in the Global South, is entangled with the legacies of traditional practices, colonial violence, Western epistemology, and the present-day political and social realities of war and religious extremism. Mansour’s novel does not resolve these confusing entanglements with a stable identity but instead seems to map out the challenges faced by Siham and the other protagonists.

In Layal, who claims to have a boyfriend in Paris and is against marriage, Mansour depicts a woman who may not know or is unable to acknowledge her lesbian desires or fears. Unlike Siham, who is passionate and emotional, Layal is coolheaded. Her attitude toward lesbianism is entirely intellectual; however, Mansour offers hints that perhaps she is not a reliable narrator of her life. Though strong willed with a tough exterior, Layal is rendered helpless when the bombing and shelling erupts in Beirut. One gets the impression that her intellect is a shield that belies her dangerous desires. When asked her opinion on homosexuality by her infatuated next-door neighbor Mimi, her general position is that she is neither for it nor against it:

“These situations occur in nature and in society .... These relationships aren’t part of the norm, but they exist.”
After more prompting, Layal tells Mimi that she is against moral evaluation and does not view homosexuality as shameful or an illness, just a deviation from the norm that she accepts. In a later conversation with Siham, Layal provides an extended account of the Platonic concept of love as a manifestation of complementarity and completion from lack, via the opposite gender. But what underlies Layal’s rational words are unarticulated emotions. Although she finds Mimi “simple-minded” (152) and an annoying neighbor, she notices her beautiful body and seems to take pleasure in it. As a university professor, Layal is an independent woman who protects her time and has boundaries; yet as annoyed as she gets with Mimi, she accedes to her flirtations and spends time with her. In other words, Layal has some form of attraction to Mimi despite her insistence that she is not a lesbian. In Layal, Mansour is perhaps debunking the idea of political and philosophical orientation as an explanation for homosexuality. Indeed, perhaps the opposite is true with Layal; her intellect and rationalizations may arguably defend her from her lesbian inclinations and from a hostile society that would be in judgment of her. Her character, one might say, is in contrast to that of Siham, who has absolute clarity that she is a lesbian and can eloquently express her feelings and desires in poetry but is much less articulate in her conceptualizations of homosexuality.

In the contemporary Arab cultural context, secrecy defends people against homophobia. Mansour’s title, translated as “I am you,” suggests that the reader consider the theme of similarity. All three women similarly live with a secret, but in each it is articulated differently. In Layal, arguably, the secret lives inside herself. In Siham, the secret is primarily kept from her mother. And in Mimi, who is bisexual and a housewife with children, the secret has more cultural and class implications. Mimi, the reader learns, no longer enjoys sex with her husband; and upon meeting Layal she loses interest in her lover and neighbor, “the old hag.” Mimi’s lesbian proclivities for masculine women go unnoticed by her husband, even though they play out under his nose. It is often safe for women to have same-sex encounters without arousing too much concern, especially if they are not declaring a preference for women (al-Ghafari 2002–2003; Whitaker 2006). That is because, as Iman al-Ghafari points out, “erotic relations among women are devalued as a temporary substitute for the love of men, and are considered of no real threat to the dominant heterosexual system as long as they remain undercover, or in the closet” (2002–2003, 86).

Leading a double life, however, is not ideal for many (Whitaker 2006). Mimi wishes she were educated and independent like Layal. Mimi’s situation is not unlike that of many women who live normative lives in adherence to social expectations but subsequently fall into lesbian relationships, often in the absence of preconceived desires or identities. But also like Mimi, many are not satisfied with sustaining the illusion of normativity and would rather not live their homosexual lives in secret. Siham—who is younger, identifiably masculine, and decidedly not bisexual—suffers more. She represents the demographic of lesbians in the Arab world that would most benefit from a change in societal attitudes. Layal, and many others like her, refrain from exploring nascent desires in the absence of social acceptance and a discourse that would make it more possible.

Through these three characters, Mansour offers a palette of lesbian desire in the Arab world. In an interview with Habib (2005–2006), she states that her goal in the novel was to explain her Platonic concept of love, which in her analysis similarly affects heterosexuals and homosexuals in that people desire what they are not to complete themselves. For Mansour, the roots of desire are founded in gender—not biological sex. Whether one agrees philosophically with Mansour’s argument is not significant for the purposes of this entry. What the novel inadvertently accomplishes is an argument for desire that exceeds normative and oppressive expectations. In describing the difficult implications of secrecy, Mansour breaks the code of silence.

SEE ALSO Asrar ‘Ailiyyah (2013; Hany Fawzy); Bareed Mista3jil: True Stories (2009); Coming-Out/Coming-In Discourses in the Middle East; The Gay International and Mideast LGBTQI Organizations; Hena Maysara (2007; Khaled Youssef); Jannāt wa-Iblīs (1992; Nawal El Saadawi); Lesbianese (2008; Alissar Gazal); Orientalism in Gay Pornography about the Middle East

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Reinaldo Arenas (1943–1990), arguably the most important writer to come out of the Cuban Revolution, wrote his autobiography, Antes que anochezca (1992; Before Night Falls [1993]), shortly before his death in the United States. The autobiography brought greater international attention to Cuba's harsh treatment of gay men and others who engaged in same-sex sex.

Overview of Arenas's Life
Growing up in abject poverty in the eastern Cuban countryside, Arenas was a sensitive and precocious child whose family found him odd at an early age. He found solace delighting in the joys of nature; having sex with farm animals, girls, and boys; and composing endless songs and writing poetry on tree trunks. To escape the boredom of Holguín, the city to which his family moved when he was an adolescent, the teenaged Arenas briefly joined Fidel Castro’s guerrillas, who were fighting against the dictator Fulgencio Batista (president 1940–1944 and 1952–1959). After the triumph of the revolution in 1959, Arenas received a scholarship to attend a provincial polytechnic institute. In 1962 he moved to the capital and enrolled at the University of Havana, from which he was expelled, according to Arenas, because of his homosexuality and incipient dissident political views. Notwithstanding this setback, Arenas pursued his literary aspirations while working at the Biblioteca Nacional José Martí (José Martí National Library) and the Unión de Escritores y Artistas de Cuba (National Union of Cuban Writers and Artists). In 1967 his first novel, Celestino antes del alba (Singing from the Well [1987]), became the only one of his many books to be published in Cuba, despite resistance from ideologues who objected to its fantasy world and subtle homoeroticism.

By this time, Arenas had become disillusioned by what he considered the collapse of a hopeful revolutionary struggle in his country. He objected to the communist regime's political repression, institutionalized homophobia, and imposition of socialist realism, which enforced an ideological norm on cultural production. In the mid-1960s Arenas smuggled some of his manuscripts off the island, publishing them abroad in their original Spanish and in translations, angering Cuban authorities. Ostracized beginning in the late 1960s and more forcefully after the revolution's Stalinist turn in the early 1970s, Arenas defiantly carried on in Havana with his promiscuous gay life and his nonconformist writing. Because of the government's resolve to contain the dissident writer and sexual outlaw, Arenas was arrested on a trumped-up sex charge, for which he was convicted and incarcerated from December 1974 to January 1976. After his release from prison, he led a precarious and vagabond life in Havana, but he was internationally recognized as a major voice in Latin American letters. Managing to escape from Cuba during the Mariel boatlift, Arenas arrived in the United States in early May 1980. He established residence in New York City, where he lived until 7 December 1990, when, suffering from AIDS, he committed suicide.
The Writing of the Book and Its Structure and Content

Arenas began writing the story of his life in Lenin Park, a botanical garden on the outskirts of Havana, where he lived as a fugitive for six weeks in 1974. After this first version was confiscated when he was arrested, Arenas did not resume writing his autobiography until 1987, when he was living in exile and had been diagnosed with AIDS. If the title initially referred to the fact that Arenas had to write literally before nightfall, years later it referred to a metaphoric and more insidious nightfall—the inevitable darkness of death. Because of his frail health, Arenas dictated his autobiography and had a friend transcribe the cassettes for him. The typescript, part of the Reinaldo Arenas Papers at Princeton University’s Firestone Library, has been sealed until further notice at the author’s request to protect people he named in it from retaliation by the Cuban regime. The original Spanish version of the autobiography was published posthumously in Spain in 1992; the English translation was published one year later in the United States.

Unlike most of Arenas’s novels, which are structurally complex, Antes que anochezca follows a simple, linear narrative. After an introduction, which addresses the author’s suffering from AIDS and the book’s genesis, the autobiography proceeds chronologically in sixty-nine chapters, beginning with Arenas’s childhood and adolescence in eastern Cuba, continuing with his Havana years, and concluding with his exile in the United States. Arenas’s suicide letter closes the text. Written in New York and on the brink of death, Antes que anochezca captures Arenas’s commitment to writing, the joys and challenges of being a dissident gay writer, his nostalgia for his beloved country, his disappointment with life in exile, and his condemnation of the Castro regime.

By most accounts, Antes que anochezca is the first openly gay autobiography by a major Latin American writer who unabashedly wrote about his erotic life: his pansexuality as a child growing up in Cuba’s countryside; his promiscuous gay life in Havana, where he daily had sex with multiple male partners; and his sexually active—and conflicted—erotic life in the United States. Arenas had memorable adventures in his new country, but he felt increasingly dissatisfied with both the sexual reciprocity that seemed to be the norm among gay-identified men and the greater sexual distance between gay- and straight-identified men. Longing for the gender-differentiated sex of his Cuban years, Arenas waxed nostalgic about his sexual life on the island, where gay men normally were sexually penetrated by “real men” (Arenas 1993, 108). According to Arenas, despite the repressive measures imposed by the Cuban state or precisely because of them, same-sex sex was pervasive in Cuba, where Arenas had his most sexually fulfilling experiences. In the United States Arenas was able to have an active sexual life without fear of persecution, but the kind of sex accessible to him was largely unsatisfying.

Antes que anochezca begins by referring to Arenas’s AIDS diagnosis in 1987 and to a scene in a public toilet where a visibly ill Arenas, made to feel undesirable by other men, comes to the conclusion that death is his only option. Despite the reference to the syndrome in the opening lines of the introduction, where Arenas also writes about his struggles with the US health-care system and his determination not to die before completing a literary oeuvre on which he had been working for almost three decades, Arenas does not privilege AIDS as a sustained and overt theme in the body of Antes que anochezca. “I do not know what it is” ([1993, xvi]), says Arenas about AIDS, explaining his reticence about it in his literary works. Only occasionally mentioned, AIDS is undeniably present in the autobiography’s elegiac tone.

With his characteristically caustic humor, Arenas quipped that “the difference between the communist and capitalist systems is that, although both give you a kick in the ass, in the communist system you have to applaud, while in the capitalist system you can scream. And I came here to scream” ([1993, 288]). Arenas’s autobiography “screams” at the materialism and consumerism of US culture, to which the author felt other exiled Cubans too happily subscribed; at the non-Cuban Latin American exile community, primarily from countries with totalitarian regimes of the Right, that shunned him for being an exile from a totalitarian regime of the Left; at what he considered Castro-supporting organizations and institutions; and at the homophobia and anti-intellectualism of Cuban Americans. In 1988, inspired by the plebiscite in Chile that ended Augusto Pinochet’s dictatorship, Arenas took the lead in writing an open letter to Fidel Castro demanding a similar plebiscite. Although the letter failed in its goal, Arenas was proud of the fact that many prominent figures had signed it and that it had been widely disseminated in the international media. Arenas’s political activism was closely bound to his writing, which for him was his most lethal and effective weapon in the fight against Castro, whom he blamed for all his troubles: “There is only one person I hold accountable: Fidel Castro. The sufferings of exile, the pain of being banished from my country, the loneliness, and the diseases contracted in exile would probably never have happened if I had been able to enjoy freedom in my country” ([1993, 317]). Only death silenced Arenas, but Antes que anochezca and his vast literary production continue to scream for him, loudly expressing his views on justice, equality, and freedom.

Influence and Adaptations

Antes que anochezca and its translations, widely reviewed in both the mainstream and gay press, immediately received international acclaim and inspired writers, artists, choreographers, dramatists, filmmakers, and composers. In 2000, for instance, Julian Schnabel turned it into a film, Before Night Falls, for which Javier Bardem, the Spanish actor who played Arenas, was nominated for an Academy Award. In 2010 Cuban American composer Jorge Martín’s opera based on Arenas’s autobiography had its world premiere in Fort Worth, Texas. In Cuba, Antes que anochezca has been widely read, even though books critical of the regime are not published or made readily available to the public. In fact, Arenas has become entrenched in the Cuban literary imagination, appearing in the texts of admiring writers on the island. A case in point is Ronaldo Menéndez’s “Money,” a tale about political disaffection that prominently features Antes que anochezca and highlights its “value” in the Cuban literary marketplace. That the short story collection in which this homage to Arenas is included, El derecho al pataleo de los ahorcados (The right of the hanged to complain), was awarded the Casa de las Américas Prize for short fiction in 1997 is both significant and frustrating. This is so because, despite changes in Cuban society since the early 1990s, politically and institutionally the regime has not ceased to be totalitarian, continuing to subordinate cultural matters to official ideology.

SEE ALSO El Beso de la Mujer Araña (1976; Manuel Puig); Bom-Crioulo (1895; Adolfo Ferreira Caminha); The Cuban Revolution and Homosexuality; El Vampiro de la Colonia Roma (1979; Luis Zapata)

BIBLIOGRAPHY

FILMOGRAPHY

DISCOGRAPHY

compact discs.
Anthropology in Africa South of the Sahara

EZRA CHITANDO
Professor, Department of Religious Studies
University of Zimbabwe

Historical and contemporary anthropological perspectives on nonnormative sexualities in Africa.

The status of anthropology in the study and representation of Africa(ns) in general has generated considerable scholarly debate and controversy. Particularly among many African scholars across various disciplines, anthropology is challenged as a construction of the study of the Other in an unequal power symmetry. For example, Ugandan creative writer and social anthropologist Okot p’Bitek (1971) charged that (Western) social anthropologists were accomplices of Western dominance. There is a very strong strand that suggests that British and French (as well as American) anthropologists were in the service of the empire (Mafeje 2001). Therefore, many African scholars question the publications of these anthropologists, under the conviction that they were not neutral scholars motivated solely by the quest for knowledge. In turn, this suspicion about anthropology has limited the number of African scholars who have been actively involved in the discipline. However, some African anthropologists (as well as ethnographers, scholars of religion, and educators) have conducted research into the area of sexuality in order to present more contemporary perspectives. The writings of anthropologists and contemporary African scholars constitute the bulk of the material on same-sex relationships in the region.

One of the major arguments against the recognition of same-sex relationships in postcolonial Africa is that such relationships are “unAfrican.” This term is unpacked as meaning “not indigenous, not emerging from within Africa, and not having been present in Africa prior to the colonial encounter” (Chitando and Mateveke 2017). African political leaders such as Robert Mugabe of Zimbabwe, Yoweri Museveni of Uganda, and Sam Nujoma of Namibia have argued that “foreigners” and “outsiders” introduced same-sex relationships to Africans. They have taken up a decidedly counterhegemonic strategy as they feel that the West tends to dictate to Africans on various matters, including how to handle sexual diversity (Endong 2016).

In contrast, proponents of same-sex relationships in Africa and human rights defenders have sought to counter this stance by demonstrating the presence of same-sex relationships prior to the colonial encounter. In a real sense, therefore, the disciplines of anthropology and history have become “sites of struggle” (Ibrahim 2015, 267) in interpreting same-sex relationships in Africa (although the two disciplines have their own tensions and contradictions). The past is contested for its meaning and relevance to the present. For example, the nongovernmental organization Sexual Minorities Uganda (SMUG) maintains, “Historical and anthropological evidence shows that same sex relationships existed throughout Africa, including the territories that now make up Uganda, long before colonisation by European powers” (SMUG 2014, 7). Gabriel R. Du Plessis (2014) also refers to the role of historians and anthropologists (as well as sociologists) in challenging the notion that same-sex relationships are unAfrican.

Anthropological findings on same-sex relationships in Africa must be read against the backdrop of the influence of colonialism and missionary religions (particularly Christianity and Islam). Whereas African traditional religion (ATR) had more tolerant attitudes toward diverse sexualities, missionary religions were (are) more prescriptive. Anthropological literature on same-sex relationships in Africa have been appropriated to destabilize the fixation with heteronormativity that has been influenced by religion. Sylvia Tamale, one of the leading African scholars, clarifies the impact of missionary religions (“Messianic faiths,” in her parlance):

"A good example to illustrate how the Messianic faiths supplanted African cultural values pertaining to sexuality is seen in the labelling of same-sex relationships as deviant. Indeed, the strength and influence of hegemonic sexual discourse is demonstrated in the area of homoeroticism. In Africa, not only does the discourse construct same-sex erotic relationships as “unnatural,” but also as distinctly “unAfrican”—an import from decadent Western societies. Political religions and reinterpreted culture are the chief inscribers of same-sex sexuality as “unAfrican” and deploy it within the discourse of “sin.” Hence, Africans engaged in same-sex sexual practices as undeserving aping sinners."

(2014, 165)

The insistence on an exclusively heterosexual Africa (Epprecht 2008) has been challenged by appropriating anthropological literature. What must receive emphasis, however, is that the anthropological literature that has featured in debates on same-sex relationships in Africa comes from a period when heteronormativity was more pronounced. Consequently, the gaze of some of the anthropologists was principally on heterosexual relationships. In such instances, when references to same-sex relationships were made, they were mostly in passing. Furthermore, they were described in the context of their “deviance” from the “norm.” It must also be borne in mind that the anthropologists’ own sexual orientations and gender identities were a(n unacknowledged) factor in their descriptions of the sexuality in African societies (Kullick and Willson 1995). Effectively, however, two categories of anthropological approaches to same-sex relationships in Africa can be identified. In the first instance are those authors who described same-sex relationships in particular communities. The second group constitutes those anthropologists who denied that same-sex relationships were present in the African communities they were researching. An emerging group is less interested in what traditional societies may or may not have condoned, but focuses on contemporary cultures in relation to global trends and political economy.

© PITT RIVERS MUSEUM, UNIVERSITY OF OXFORD
Kuagbiaru, Zande informant for E. E. Evans-Pritchard, between 1927 and 1930. Kuagbiaru provided Evans-Pritchard with information on homosexual practices in the traditional Zande culture.

Anthropological Descriptions of Same-Sex Relationships in Africa

Against heteropatriarchal assumptions that sexual orientation and gender identities are fixed, studies on gender in Africa have highlighted that these are highly fluid and complex. Whereas heteropatriarchy assumes that leadership is the preserve of middle-aged heterosexual men, studies have shown that young men, women, queer, and other categories of leaders have emerged and continue to emerge across time. In many ways, this destabilized the views of European researchers who tended to hold normative views regarding sexual orientation and gender identity. One celebrated case is that of the Angolan queen Njinga (1583–1663), who ruled in the north of the country in the seventeenth century. An astute warrior queen, she outwitted her male competitors and had both male and female lovers. She continues to be celebrated in folk religion for her legendary military prowess (Heywood 2017). It was such complexities that greeted anthropologists who sought to make sense of African cultural realities and social life.

Appearing on the African scene after European traders and travelers who had offered intimate details about aspects of life (Epprecht 2013), such European anthropologists as E. E. Evans-Pritchard provided some details relating to sexual practices among different ethnic groups. Evans-Pritchard was immersed among the Azande in southern Sudan. In response to the unAfrican argument, he maintained that male and female homosexuality existed among the Azande prior to the arrival of Europeans. As expressed by Evans-Pritchard,

> It is beyond question that male homosexuality, or rather a sexual relationship between warriors and boys, was common in pre-European days among Azande.... There is no reason to suppose that it was introduced by Arabs as some have thought. All Azande I have known well enough to discuss this matter have asserted also that female homosexuality (lesbianism) was practiced in polygamous homes in the past and still (1930) is sometimes.

(1970, 1428–1429)

As the above citation confirms, Evans-Pritchard was convinced that both male and female same-sex relationships were present among the Azande. In an earlier article, he had drawn attention to “obscenities” found in different African societies, including boys’ initiation into adulthood and secret society where the initiates had to copulate with one another in order to demonstrate their capacity to do so with a woman (Evans-Pritchard 1929, 318). Similarly, a quarter of a century later, Victor Turner, who was studying the rites of passage of the Ndembu (in northern Zambia), drew attention to the liminality and ambiguity that characterized such rituals. In the liminal stage, the social conventions relating to gender and sexuality were eliminated and limitless possibilities emerged. According to Turner, the male senior official in charge of the ritual process would be regarded as the husband of the novices. He proceeded to indicate the changes in social roles that occurred during the liminal stage. According to Turner,

> Among the Ndembu a chief is called mwadi on the night before his installation ceremony, and he is treated “like a slave” by his people and reviled without being able to reply. In all these instances there is a marked element of passivity, of receptiveness, of “femininity.” The chief is “feminine” to his people, as an immediate prelude to assuming male authority over them. The novices are “feminine” to the instructors and shepherds. Some anthropologists have mentioned homosexual practices between senior men and novices during seclusion, among the West Central Bantu.

(1962, 152–153)

References to same-sex relationships were made by various other anthropologists in different parts of the continent. The emerging pattern is that some anthropologists were keen to draw attention to same-sex relationships and challenged the idea of exclusive heterosexuality in Africa. An overview of anthropological writings shows that researchers in different parts of the continent encountered evidence of same-sex relationships (Murray and Roscoe 1998). Proponents of same-sex relationships in Africa have drawn on this body of writing to challenge the notion that same-sex relationships did not exist in Africa prior to encounter with colonialism.

Edward Evan Evans-Pritchard was born in Crowborough, England, in 1902. Following undergraduate study of history at Oxford University, his graduate studies were supervised by the Africanist C. G. Seligman (1873–1940) at the London School of Economics, and he participated in the famed seminars of Bronisław Malinowski (1884–1942). He remains best known for explicating the logic of the Azande of southern Sudan (among whom he began fieldwork in 1926) regarding why bad things happen in his 1937 book, Witchcraft, Oracles, and Magic among the Azande. In 1930 he answered an administrative call to study the Nuer, producing another classic ethnography, The Nuer, in 1940, followed by books on Nuer religion and on Nuer marriage.

After World War II (1939–1945) service in Sudan and Libya (the Sanusi of Cyrenaica were the subject of a 1949 book), and converting to Roman Catholicism in 1944, Evans-Pritchard took up a position at All Souls College within Oxford University in 1946. He remained at that college until his retirement in 1970. He died in Oxford in 1973.

In his last decades, though he was writing a general, highly critical book on theories of “primitive” religion (1965), Evans-Pritchard returned to his field notes on the Azande. Not having shown any interest in sexology, he astonished many by publishing on (female and male) homosexuality among the Azande in a 1970 article in *American Anthropologist. It was not actually the case that he waited for decades, until he was near death, to write about boy-wives in the Azande court; he had written about the institutionalized role of boy-wives (pages to princes, attendants to warriors, with the man paying bride-price to the fathers of the boys in both cases) in a 1957 article in the specialist journal Zaire and in 1962–1963 published texts from men who had taken boy-wives. He also wrote about Nuer woman-woman marriage (with the female husband having the rights of a father to his wife’s children) in 1951.

Evans-Pritchard married Ioma Heaton Nicholls in 1939 and sired five children. His own homosexuality was apparently well known within the guild of English social anthropologists. Yet the only known published mention—one indicating that it was common knowledge—is in an article by Edmund Leach published in American Ethnologist (1989).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Stephen O. Murray
El Instituto Obregón
San Francisco, CA
Minimizing Same-Sex Relationships in Africa

Despite the presence of a sizable corpus of anthropological literature confirming the presence of same-sex relationships in Africa, other anthropologists either glossed over the same-sex relationships in the communities they studied or sought to explain them away. The most common explanation for male-male sexual relationships has been that they are due to the absence of women. In other instances, anthropologists made declarations to the effect that homosexuality was rare among indigenous communities. For example, Michael Gelfand (1979) asserted that homosexuality was rare among the Shona. It was always going to be unlikely that Gelfand would have encountered individuals who self-identified as homosexuals in communities where heterosexual marriage was an ideal to be fulfilled. As Marc Epprecht (1999) has argued, the moral prejudices of some of the anthropologists must be taken into account when analyzing their comments on the absence of same-sex relationships in Africa.

In other instances, anthropologists tended to play down or not go into detail about same-sex relationships they had observed in African societies. Although they may be criticized for not highlighting the same-sex relationships they encountered, it is also important to acknowledge that the next generations of scholars will critique contemporary researchers for not drawing attention to the issue(s) that will be of interest to them. For example, it would not be fair for a researcher in 2150 to criticize contemporary scholars researching African same-sex relationships for not making reference to the popularity of soccer/football. To say this is not to reject the critique of anthropologists, but to put it into its proper context. In other words, it is problematic to accuse earlier researchers of bias or minimization because they did not give a central place in their publications to the specific topic of interest to the current researcher. Same-sex relationships were not the core concern of such researchers as Evans-Pritchard and Turner. According to Till Förster,

> What connects Evans-Pritchard and Turner, despite the years that lie between them and all their other differences, is a common critical interest in these “natural” assumptions made by their Western contemporaries about the nature of “savage” thought. Besides this, both are interested in the same topics. At the beginning of these topics were magic, divination, and ritual, as well as theories on the nature of such ritual activity.

(2004, 246)

Furthermore, it is strategic to acknowledge that anthropological accounts emerge from societies that were almost always in transition. The idea that it is possible to retrieve some pristine African past is not based on reality. Thus, there is a high probability that the African communities that the anthropologists described were themselves already in contact with the outside world (Kahn-Fogel 2013). Again, to make this observation is not to suggest that same-sex relationships in Africa must have been influenced by outsiders. Every culture has its own internal dynamics, including mechanisms for enabling nonnormative practices to survive, or even thrive. Zambian theologian Chammah Kaunda argues that there is a high probability that although Ndembu homosexuality might have initially taken place in the liminal space, it soon moved into the larger society and became “part of the common experience upon which the community is founded” (2015, 33).

Ethnographies of Contemporary Struggle

An emerging field of study focuses on contemporary ways of being queer, including how sexual minorities and sexual rights activists really behave in specific contexts (as opposed to the generalized critique of them as avatars of Western cultural colonialism). Ryan Thoreson (2014), for example, spent a year embedded with the International Gay and Lesbian Human Rights Commission (since renamed OutRight Action International). He participated in the production of several important reports from Senegal, South Africa, and Uganda by the commission while observing and interviewing his colleagues. The result is a close and empathetic ethnography of an organization and the type of people that Joseph Massad (2007) famously excoriated as the “Gay International.” Ashley Currier (2012) also offers a close study of activists’ decision-making processes around when to use or to avoid visibility (outness) as a political strategy in gaining sexual rights in Namibia and South Africa. Turning the ethnographic gaze on the gazers, David A. B. Murray (2016) examines the immigration and refugee process in Canada (wherein Africans need to perform to certain stereotypes of Africanness and gayness in order to convince officials of their bona fides).
People, of course, do not stand still in some kind of ethnographic present, and indeed, African LGBTQI people are often quite oblivious to claims made about the cultures they hail from and look instead to new technologies, new discourses, and new ways of being. For several anthropologists it is these emerging cultures that fascinate. Melissa Hackman (2018), for example, examines the culture and internal politics of an “ex-gay” Pentecostal sect in Cape Town, whose mission is to “heal” gay men into heterosexuality. She elicits extremely personal insights from her subjects, in some cases letting them hang themselves with their own words, and in others allowing us to share the pain, confusion, and cruel optimism of the men seeking to convert their sexuality. The work of Thomas Hendricks (e.g., 2014, 2017) also offers an intimate window into the nuances of desire and identities in flux in relation to race, gender, and sexuality in contemporary Democratic Republic of the Congo.

Whereas anthropology as a field historically tended to otherize the objects of study, or to fix categories of normative and other, these researchers actively disrupt stereotypes and dualisms (like hetero- and homosexuality, Africa and the West, traditional and modern, male and female). Their work attests to people’s complexities, contradictions, uncertainties, and mutability over time.
Anthropological Literature on Same-Sex Relationships

While there is a sizable body of evidence of same-sex relationships among different African groups, there is no unanimity regarding its interpretation. Although the evidence may be sufficient to silence the extremist position that there were no same-sex relationships at all in Africa, it is not enough to lay the foundation for the (social/communal) acceptance of same-sex sexuality in contemporary Africa. This is due to the complexities of the major concepts that are in vogue at the time of writing (2018). Terms such as homosexuality, gay, LGBTQI, queer, and others are largely culture-specific. They are predominantly Western concepts that may not readily fit into other contexts, such as in Africa (Tamale 2011).

The dominance of Western scholars and concepts in studies on African sexualities emerges as a major challenge when interpreting anthropological literature on same-sex relationships in Africa. There is the concern that local realities are being forced to fit into a preexisting format. The phenomenon of the ‘yan daudu in northern Nigeria is a case in point. Although the emphasis has been on the homosexual identity of the ‘yan daudu, it is necessary to appreciate the challenges that come with such descriptions. This is principally because in the particular context of northern Nigeria, sexual orientation may not be the most important dimension (Sinikangas 2004). However, it remains important to acknowledge that the existence of such a phenomenon challenges the ideological position that insists that there is only one African sexuality and it is decidedly heterosexual.

There were some methodological issues that compromised the reliability of anthropological writings on same-sex sexuality in Africa. One of the major issues was and continues to be that the anthropologists were very much interested in the “bigger picture” or in building/testing explanatory frameworks. As a result, they were not too keen on focusing on individual behavior. Due to the complex nature of sexual relations, there should have been greater investment in terms of time spent cultivating friendships for the anthropologists to establish sexual patterns. African (and other) scholars studying same-sex sexuality have navigated this hurdle by spending more time with individuals and noting their behavior in different contexts. African researchers usually have the advantage of sharing the same language as the individuals whose sexuality they are researching. Anthropologists from outside the community have to contend with the challenge of language, and although they can utilize the services of local translators/research assistants, often these have their own agenda. This can have a negative impact on the results from the field.

Anthropological literature on same-sex relationships in Africa has also been contested on the basis that instances of same-sex sexuality do not immediately translate to social acceptance of same-sex relationships. Critics maintain that same-sex sexuality was associated with specific individuals (e.g., traditional healers), or that it was allowed in particular ritual settings. Here, the critique is directed not so much at anthropologists as at those who have sought to deploy their findings in support of the struggle for the rights of homosexuals in Africa. The argument is that traditional societies allowed homosexuality only in the performance/fulfilment of ritual processes. Many of these relationships would not be compatible with modern-day notions of human rights—for example, they might involve sex with “children.” In this regard, the occurrence of same-sex relationships in traditional African societies does not provide an adequate basis for contemporary struggle, although it does destabilize the notion of an exclusively heterosexual Africa.

The strategy of utilizing anthropological literature to promote the rights of homosexuals in Africa has been challenged on the basis that it reinforces the use of Western categories. Many activists tend to emphasize gay and lesbian identities at the expense of all other identities because in sub-Saharan Africa, there are more varied gender ideologies than in the West. Johanna Bond argues,

Within the region, many people refrain from identifying publicly as gay or lesbian because of the centrality of heterosexual marriage in child rearing and the perpetuation of kinship ties. They may, however, engage in same-sex sexual activity that is viewed as supplementary to traditional family roles. An exclusive focus on gay and lesbian identity fails to address the many ways in which gender expression and gender stereotypes enforce heteronormativity and prevent the public embrace of LGBTI identity within sub-Saharan Africa.

(2016, 69)

African Anthropologists and Same-Sex Relationships

Although research on same-sex relationships in Africa has been dominated by scholars from the West, there is a growing interest in the subject among African anthropologists and researchers from other disciplines. In some ways, these African scholars have been influenced by the publications of Western scholars, and they seek to build on, as well as respond to, the data on same-sex relationships in Africa by Western anthropologists. They have made use of valuable information on the phenomenon, locating it within the intricate religious, social, political, economic, and other factors that shape it.

Although anthropology is not popular among African scholars due to its association with colonialism, it has attracted some scholars who have contributed to the growing body of literature on same-sex relationships in the region. Stella Nyanzi, a medical anthropologist, has undertaken fieldwork in the Gambia and Uganda as part of her research into indigenous African sexuality. Nyanzi carried out an ethnographic study of same-sex–loving individuals in Uganda and presented valuable material on how they negotiate hostile contexts. Nyanzi concluded:

Local allies among national and religious leaders, mainstream organizations, friends and family highlight the availability of support accorded same-sex-loving individuals in the country. Uganda’s self-identified homosexual individuals variously assert their Africanness through multiple routes, including actively laying claims to their ethnic group belonging, membership to kinship structures, civic participation in democratic processes, national identity, social organizing of lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender, intersex and questioning-support groups, language and lexicon, visibility and voice in local communal activities, solidarity, adherence to and participation in cultural rituals.

(2013, 963)

Other African scholars who have researched same-sex relationships in Africa include anthropologists such as Serena Owusua Dankwa (2009), who carried out fieldwork on female same-sex intimacies in two urban centers in southern Ghana. Another anthropologist, Patrick Awondo (2010), has studied same-sex relationships in Cameroon. Similarly, anthropologist Nelson Muparamoto has undertaken a study on the impact of religion on same-sex-loving people in Zimbabwe. His findings challenge the dominant narrative of religion as always sponsoring homophobia. Muparamoto writes:

Significantly, gay and lesbian Christians are not just passive recipients of homophobic utterances in Christian circles. The observation challenges the misconceptions of a straightforward link between religion and homophobia. Some participants developed and drew on narratives that counter and challenge the mainstream church narratives that promote condemnation and criticism. For example, they drew on their understanding of God as creator of all human beings. Within a framework that acknowledges God’s creatorship, sexual orientation is an immutable attribute that people are born with, and one for which they cannot be blamed. Other counter-narratives are based on their answered prayers, as well as their ability to continue working for God in various capacities.

(2016, 154)
The research into same-sex relationships by African anthropologists is helping to clarify the phenomenon. African anthropologists have the advantage of being “cultural insiders,” and they have largely succeeded in describing the lived experiences of same-sex–loving individuals in Africa. Their descriptions have challenged the notion that “outsiders” were responsible for introducing homosexuality into Africa. Furthermore, African anthropologists have managed to avoid presenting exotic images of same-sex–loving individuals, instead describing them in the context of their other family and social relationships. This has gone a long way in depicting same-sex–loving individuals as indigenous Africans whose identity is not dependent on external sponsors.

The work of African anthropologists has been complemented by that of African researchers from other disciplines who have utilized anthropological approaches to collect data on same-sex relationships in Africa. These include practicing traditional healers such as Lindiwe P. Mkasi, who utilized her insider status to research same-sex relationships among women traditional healers in South Africa (2016). Mkasi (2013, 2016) has highlighted how some women traditional healers practice same-sex relationships under the guise of their profession. Other researchers, including theologians and scholars of religion, educators, and philosophers, have examined same-sex relationships in Africa. Building on the insights of anthropologists, historians, and others, they have contributed to removing the veil of secrecy surrounding same-sex relationships in Africa. Although more research is required, particularly in relation to the lives of same-sex–loving individuals in rural Africa, an appreciable body of literature has emerged. Furthermore, researchers from diverse disciplines have helped to challenge the myth of a homophobic Africa. They have provided more nuanced descriptions of same-sex relationships in Africa, acknowledging the challenges and highlighting the advances that have been made in accommodating same-sex–loving individuals.

SEE ALSO Colonialism in Africa South of the Sahara; Ethnopornography; Ethnopsychiatry; Gender, Flexible Systems, in Africa; Marriage, Woman-Woman, in Africa

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Currier, Ashley. Out in Africa: LGBT Organizing in Namibia and South Africa. Minneapolis:

and Care 15, no. 8 (2013): 952–967.

Anti-Gender Movement in Europe

ROMAN KUHAR
Professor, Department of Sociology
University of Ljubljana, Slovenia

DAVID PATERNOTTE
Senior Lecturer in Sociology
Université libre de Bruxelles, Belgium

Conservative campaigns against so-called “gender ideology” or “gender theory.”

Since 2013, Europe has experienced a new wave of campaigns against the rights of women and LGBTI people. Although such mobilizations had started earlier in countries such as Spain, Italy, Croatia, and Slovenia, 2013 appears as a turning point, with two events propelling the European conservative agenda. The first is the French mobilizations against same-sex marriage. Headed by the organization La Manif pour Tous (Demonstrations for Everyone), these mobilizations, which count among the most important and the largest ones in France since the mid-1980s, have been emulated across the continent. The second is the success of the constitutional referendum in Croatia in 2013 to define marriage as a “union of a man and a woman,” thereby barring same-sex marriage and fueling a wave of marriage referenda in the region. While this entry discusses this phenomenon in the European context, it is important to note that similar movements are occurring in other regions, including Latin America, Africa, and Australia.

Background on the Movement

These mobilizations regard gender as the ideological matrix of a set of abhorred ethical and social reforms, such as sexual and reproductive rights, same-sex marriage and adoption, new reproductive technologies, sex education, gender mainstreaming, and protection against gender violence. These anti-gender campaigns should not be regarded as a mere continuation of previous forms of opposition to the rights of women and LGBTI people, even when ancient institutions such as the Roman Catholic Church are involved. Instead, they mark a renewal of conservative activism in the region, with the adoption of a new discourse and a new repertoire of action. In brief, anti-gender campaigns should be regarded as a new strategy designed to face new challenges. Interestingly, the East-West divide does not offer a particularly useful analytical lens to understand these mobilizations, which mostly happen in European countries with, historically, a significant Catholic or Orthodox population. The parts of Europe under Russian influence experience a specific version of such campaigns, which are directly engineered from the Kremlin with the support of the Russian Orthodox Church.

Despite a wide variety of targets (abortion and reproductive rights, same-sex marriage, LGBTI parental rights, gender mainstreaming, gender violence, sex education, antidiscrimination policies, etc.), all these movements claim to combat what they call “gender ideology.” Sometimes called “gender theory” or “genderism,” it is presented as the matrix of the various policy reforms they oppose and should not be confused with gender studies or specific post-structural theories about gender. These movements not only share a common enemy but also display similar discourses and strategies and a distinctive style of action. Although national triggers vary, the modes of mobilization look alike across borders, allowing a specific type of mobilization to be identified: anti-gender movements.

The notion of “gender ideology” was invented in Catholic circles in the mid-1990s. Building on broader Catholic projects such as Pope John Paul II’s theology of the body (Garbagnoli 2016) or the new evangelization (Paternotte 2017), it not only puts Catholic theology into motion but also offers both an interpretative frame and a strategy of action. It should be read as a response to two United Nations (UN) conferences: the 1994 International Conference on Population and Development in Cairo and the 1995 World Conference on Women in Beijing, which mark the entrance of the notions of reproductive rights and gender into the UN vocabulary. Indeed, both steps were fiercely combated by the Catholic Church.

Following Dale O’Leary’s pioneering analysis (1997), the term gender ideology first appeared in Vatican circles as a frame to understand what had happened in Cairo and Beijing (Buss 1998; Case 2011). Gender was therefore understood not only as the social construction of sexes but also as a hidden plan mounted by radical feminists, LGBTI activists, and gender scholars. It became the “strategic tool” used by these minorities to establish a postgender society and seize power at the UN and more broadly.

Claims and Strategies

Numerous authors—among whom Tony Anatrella, Jutta Burggraf, Gabriele Kuby, Marguerite A. Peeters, and Michel Schooyans are the most prominent—have contributed to the elaboration of this body of thought, whose main claims have been put together in Lexicon: Ambiguous and Debatable Terms Regarding Family Life and Ethical Questions, published in 2003 by the Pontifical Council for the Family. They all claim that gender aims at an anthropological revolution, in which biological facts about men and women will be denied and the fluidity of gender will be promoted, threatening the family and the survival of humanity. They also see in “gender ideology” a covert totalitarian project, which is sometimes deemed more dangerous than Marxism. Finally, primarily in eastern Europe, “gender ideology” is depicted as a neocolonial project in which the decadent West would impose its gender delusion on the rest of the world (Graff and Korolczuk 2018).

"Gender ideology," however, was also designed from the start as a strategy of action. Reclaiming the theory of cultural hegemony developed by the Italian intellectual and politician Antonio Gramsci (1891–1937), it aims at propagating alternative ideas by using and subverting the notions it repudiates in order to contest the supposed cultural and political hegemony of “postmodern gender.” The Catholic Church has consequently reclaimed progressive notions such as gender or feminism to change their meaning, resignifying what liberal voices have been trying to articulate over the last decades. As mentioned above, the notion of “gender ideology” is part of a Catholic project. Furthermore, the Catholic Church has offered a space where intellectuals and activists could meet and exchange views and strategies, while also providing a powerful mobilization and diffusion network.

Contemporary mobilizations, however, cannot be reduced to a return of Catholicism in the public sphere but intersect nowadays with other political endeavors (Hark and Villa 2015). As noticed by Stefanie Mayer and Birgit Sauer (2017), “gender ideology” functions as an “empty signifier” that can tap into different fears and anxieties in specific contexts and therefore be shaped in different ways to fit into other political projects. As a result, anti-gender movements include a complex constellation of actors that goes far beyond specific religious affiliations. The intersections with contemporary right-wing populism are of crucial importance. As stressed by Eszter Kováts and Maari Põim (2015), the vague notion of “gender ideology” operates as a symbolic glue that makes cooperation between different actors possible despite their numerous differences. In this context, intersections with populist projects offer a springboard to anti-genderists, for instance by using common attacks against corrupt elites or claiming to defend the “innocent child.”

Anti-gender campaigns include a wide variety of actors, which allows this movement to conceal its Catholic origins in favor of the secular and more appealing image of “concerned citizens” or “concerned parents.” This movement presents itself as modern, young, and hip, and the demonstrations it organizes are reminiscent either of a family picnic or of a gay pride parade. It is also extremely present on the internet, and it promotes referenda as a means to be heard, invests in litigation, and develops “alternative” knowledge, based on false methodologies (Kuhar 2015), while not neglecting more traditional political lobbying. Using gender-specific color codes such as blue and pink and the imagery of a nuclear family, it creates a secularizing self-image that cannot be reduced to previous forms of resistance to gender and sexual equality. It also projects itself as a rational, moderate, and commonsensical actor, who raises its voice because things have simply “gone too far.” Often using a self-victimization strategy, it depicts itself as the true defender of oppressed people, of a majority that is silenced by powerful lobbies and elites, as well as the savior of national authenticity against international powers. In the second decade of the twenty-first century, anti-gender campaigns have undoubtedly contributed to a modernization, a professionalization, and a transnationalization of conservative activism in Europe.

SEE ALSO Human Rights in Europe; Nationalism and Sexuality in Europe; Pride Demonstrations in Europe; Religion and Same-Sex Behaviors: Christianity; Scandals in Europe

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Anti-racist activism and its relationship to LGBT organizing in Europe can be characterized principally by its heterogeneity. While anti-racism has often been seen as deeply entwined with sexual rights activism, mainstream LGBT rights groups have, since the late 1990s, come under critique for complicity in and perpetuation of anti-Muslim racism. At the same time, queer-of-color activist organizations, which began to form in western Europe on a larger scale in the 1980s, have developed creative strategies for challenging postcolonial and post-Holocaust legacies of racism and homophobia. Through performance, archives, and political organizing, queer Europeans of color have made claim to space in countries that often purport to be color blind. However, not only have queer-of-color groups and activists occasionally run into conflict with mainstream, largely white LGBT organizations, but they have sometimes also struggled to build coalitions while maintaining a movement that rejects the exclusionary effects of Euro-American liberalism.

Postwar Organizing, 1945–1962

Following World War II (1939–1945), anti-racist movements began to organize across western Europe. These movements sought to overcome the continent’s legacy of murderous nationalism and were grounded in western Europe’s ambiguous historical position as both the center of colonial power and a universal measure of progress (Lentin 2004). Germany adopted a policy of color blindness that removed the term Rasse (race) from official rhetoric, vacating the possibility for grassroots, anti-racist movements to organize despite the persistence of racist behaviors and policies (Chin and Fehrenbach 2009). France, by contrast, saw the establishment in 1949 of the Mouvement contre le Racisme et pour l’Amitié entre les Peuples (Movement against Racism and for Friendship between Peoples) by Jewish resistance groups troubled by the failures of denazification. The Ligue Internationale contre le Racisme et l’Antisémitisme (International League against Racism and Anti-Semitism) was reestablished in 1944 and focused on legal measures to combat anti-Semitism. These early movements emerged against the backdrop of international attention to anti-racism. Europe's commitment to antidiscrimination and the defense of human rights was concretized in the United Nations Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization’s first conference on race (held in 1949), which attempted to debunk the political legitimacy of biological race theories (Romeyn 2017). However, racialization of immigrants and people of color based on perceived differences in culture remained fully compatible with opposition to biological racism.

The 1950s and 1960s were widely experienced as a period of sexual conservatism across western Europe. Although possibilities existed for Europeans to explore diverse sexual desires in such cities as London, Paris, and Hamburg, Germany, social attitudes and the continued criminalization of male homosexuality made it difficult for postwar activists to develop political arguments based on sex. In this context of sexual conservatism and legal persecution, some homosexual men and women turned to anti-racism as a political strategy. In German-speaking countries, homosexual men and women argued both that they deserved the same protections as racial minorities around the world and that homosexuals ought to be antiracist, as they understood what it meant to be oppressed. However, other same-sex-desiring men understood their “homophile” identity as implicitly white, pointing to the plurality of opinions surrounding race and racism at this moment (Boovy 2016).
Postcolonial and Transatlantic Orientations, 1962–1989

In France, the Algerian war for independence between 1954 and 1962 and the following period of student unrest in the later 1960s brought about a different constellation of sexual and anti-racist politics. Postcolonial migration of Algerians triggered anxieties among the Far Right that Algerian men were inciting sexual deviance among white French students. The Front Homosexuel d’Action Révolutionaire (FHAR; Homosexual Front for Revolutionary Action), founded in 1971, repurposed these accusations to claim that French homosexuals were at the forefront of revolutionary action and that they, as an oppressed group, held a revolutionary bond with colonized Algerians (Shepard 2012).

Not only was this link between gay rights and antiracism postcolonial, but it was also transatlantic. Gay rights movements in western Europe were heavily influenced by the burgeoning postwar labor movement, which, by the 1960s, was often viewed as constitutive of a general transatlantic leftist movement. However, gay activists linked Marxist sentiments to race in different ways. Whereas the FHAR in France cast sexual relations with Algerian men as leftist political praxis, in West Germany, gay activists rarely saw Turkish guest workers as political subjects, despite many gay organizations’ purported commitment to labor. This was also true for the larger labor movement, as evidenced in 1973, when 3,000 Turkish workers at a Ford factory in Cologne went on strike to protest mass firings. Because of the “unorganized” nature of the strike and the use of nontraditional modes of resistance, including poetry readings and singing, many West German labor activists dismissed this moment as apolitical. It was only in the early years of the twenty-first century that queer activists of color situated this strike in its longer history of immigrant resistance (El-Tayeb 2011).

In addition to transatlantic Marxist leanings, the Black Panther Party, a US black militant group that drew inspiration from the writings of anti-colonial thinkers such as Frantz Fanon and Léopold Sédar Senghor, offered a popular model for gay rights and anti-racist activism in France, West Germany, and the United Kingdom. Black Panther Party leader Huey Newton’s 1970 “Declaration in Support of the Just Struggle of Homosexuals and Women,” which was widely translated and circulated among European left-wing gay rights groups in the early 1970s, encouraged further emulation.

The connections between anti-racism, gay rights activism, and feminism persisted through the following decades. By the late 1970s, many German feminists were already familiar with the work of the African American poet Audre Lorde. Through friendships with Afro-German women writers such as May Ayim, Helga Emde, and Ika Hügel-Marshall, Lorde helped organize an Afro-German movement to articulate the experiences of Afro-German women and to resist antiblack racism in West Germany (Michaels 2006). Lorde’s outspoken discussions of her lesbian identity and her criticisms of homophobia were often absent in the Afro-German women’s movement. Nevertheless, the leading role black
German lesbians have played in the Afro-German women's movement is undeniable. Lorde's impact was not limited to just West Germany, as her 1984 visit to the Netherlands led to the formation of the black lesbian group Sister Outsider in Amsterdam (Michaels 2006). That same year, emergent feminist and anti-racist immigrant organizing in France led to the founding of the Collectif Féministe contre le Racisme et l’Antisémitisme (Feminist Collective against Racism and Anti-Semitism), from which the Collectif Lesbien contre le Racisme et le Fascisme (Lesbian Collective against Racism and Fascism) emerged. Although they addressed xenophobic rather than antiblack racism, both collectives laid the groundwork for a similar joint critique of racism, misogyny, and homophobia in France (Bacchetta 2010).

The Multicultural State, 1989–2017

By the early 1990s, European governments had begun incorporating the rhetoric of anti-racism, a step some activists saw as an attempt to co-opt the anti-institutional movements of the 1980s. State-sponsored anti-racism often took the form of multiculturalism, an ideology based on the tolerance of different racial, ethnic, and national groups within the framework of the liberal nation-state. Already in the early 1980s the Dutch government had institutionalized multiculturalism through a series of laws and regulations intended to reform integration policies and improve the social and economic standing of immigrants in the Netherlands. In the United Kingdom, local initiatives that emerged in the 1980s and criticized institutionalized racism were adapted during the 1990s by municipal governments that preferred dealing with race-relations officers and sponsoring cultural initiatives (Lentin 2004). In Germany, where Muslim Turks represented the largest racialized group, the institutionalization of anti-racism had similarly ambivalent effects. While the European Network against Racism, established in 1997 as a result of the European Commission's Year against Racism, provided greater opportunities for minority participation, internal conflicts and unequal resource allocation meant that minority-run organizations continued to be marginalized within the network (Salazar 2008). Across the European Union, the institutionalization of anti-racism promoted an understanding of racial inequality that relies on cultural explanations and, as some argue, seeks to affirm cultural identities while largely ignoring economic and political contributors to marginalization (Lentin 2014).

In a striking reversal from the sexual conservatism of the 1950s or even the anxieties of the 1980s related to HIV/AIDS, some western European countries since the 1990s have attempted to incorporate certain “good” queer citizens while rejecting a supposedly homophobic and sexist Islam. In 1996 the city of Amsterdam published a survey of local high schools that claimed to show rampant homophobia among students with a Muslim background. This survey was followed by a 2003 report by Forum (Institute for Multicultural Development) that focused on same-sex-desiring immigrants to establish the same dichotomy between supposed Islamic repression and the need for queers of color to liberate themselves into a “Dutch” queer identity (El-Tayeb 2011). Scholars and activists alike have noted similar trends in countries with recent spikes in immigration, such as Spain and Ireland, which have coupled limited affirmation of certain LGBT citizens with increasingly restrictive immigration policies.

Criticism has also been extended to mainstream European gay rights activists and activist groups both for maintaining this dichotomy and for supporting increasingly restrictive immigration policies. Since the late 1990s, the Lesben- und Schwulenverband in Deutschland (Lesbian and Gay Federation in Germany) has pursued stronger hate crimes legislation, which some argue has stereotyped young Turkish men as the main perpetrators of homophobic attacks (Haritaworn 2015). In 2005 the organizers of the Dublin Lesbian and Gay Film Festival invited Michael McDowell, then serving as Ireland’s minister for justice, equality, and law reform, to deliver the opening address. The selection of McDowell, who had successfully pursued a referendum to restrict citizenship to descent in 2004, triggered protests by and heavy criticism from many anti-racist and queer activists (Mulhall 2011). In 2010 the queer theorist Judith Butler declined Berlin Pride’s Civil Courage Award, citing the event’s complicity with anti-Muslim racism, offering the prize instead to queer-of-color organizations GLADT, LesMigraS, SUSPECT, and ReachOut, all of which participated in Berlin’s alternative pride event. The following year, the queer Muslim organizations Safra Project and Imaan mobilized against London’s East End Gay Pride, organized by the right-wing English Defence League to march in neighborhoods racialized as Muslim. Although the event was canceled, it was quickly reorganized, this time by left-wing activists (Bacchetta, El-Tayeb, and Haritaworn 2015).

Queer Resistances, 1989–2017

This tension mandated new forms of queer activism that did not involve an artificial dichotomy between “good” LGBT (white) Europeans and “homophobic” (straight) Muslims and that articulated the experiences of queer people of color. One of the first European groups to do this was Strange Fruit, established in 1989 in the Netherlands by a dozen young LGBT people of color. Many of the founders were of Muslim Turkish or Moroccan descent, placing them at the intersection of two supposedly irreconcilable categories. Because Strange Fruit was formed with few resources, it was originally a workgroup of the Amsterdam branch of the European LGBT rights organization COC (Ontspannings-centrum [Center for Culture and Leisure]). Strange Fruit began some of its earliest work in the field of HIV/AIDS activism, using safer sex performances in clubs frequented by queer people of color to access groups heavily affected by HIV/AIDS yet often marginalized by the white gay scene. Changes to the management structure of COC during the 1990s and the perception that COC promoted a Eurocentric gay identity clashed with Strange Fruit’s deliberately nonhierarchical structures and attention to sexual identities rooted in diasporic cultures (El-Tayeb 2011). Following its split with COC, Strange Fruit reorganized as an official foundation and continued to serve as a hub for Dutch and European activists, feminists, AIDS educators, refugees, and queer people of color until 2002.

The 1990s saw similar forms of queer-of-color activism emerging in Germany. Salon Oriental, founded in the late 1980s by Sabuha Salaam and Fatma Souad, also engaged with spaces frequented by queer people of color, particularly the Berlin club SO36. Salon Oriental used a mixture of classic drag, physical comedy, parody, and pastiche to challenge racism and homophobia while building a multiethnic community (El-Tayeb 2011). Taking a direct-action approach, groups such as Kanak Attak, founded in 1997, and Karawane für die Rechte von Flüchtlingen und MigrantInnen (Caravan for the Rights of Refugees and Migrants), founded in 1998, made radical claims for the right of migrants to exist in Germany and Europe. Basing its political stance on the assertion that migrants and people of color did not have to justify their presence in Europe, Kanak Attak worked to make visible historical forms of migrant resistance in Germany. However, these challenges to postcolonial power structures resulted in unexpected tensions. Karawane’s argument that exploitation of the Global South was the reason for the presence of migrants in Europe was seen to reinforce the dichotomy between “us” and “them” that Kanak Attak was attempting to undermine (El-Tayeb 2011).

While anti-Muslim racism has been the primary focus of queer anti-racist activism on the continent, the United Kingdom’s history of postcolonial migration from the Caribbean and Africa south of the Sahara, as well as its history of anti-racist activism that often relied on blackness as an all-encompassing term for people of color, has required a different approach. In 2000 the queer photographer and activist Ajamu X and the filmmaker Topher Campbell founded the rukus! Federation as a black queer arts organization and archive. The archive, now held at the London Metropolitan Archives, was designed to challenge a lack of visibility that has historically made it possible to deny a black and gay experience, while showcasing the work of black LGBT artists in the United Kingdom (Flinn and Stevens 2009).

The turn to the extreme Right across Europe during the second decade of the twenty-first century required new forms of coalition building. In 2016, sixteen Berlin-based LGBTI groups with diverse political orientations formed an alliance against the radical Right parties. Queer anti-racist activism continues to take a transnational bent. Berlin’s alternative pride event in July 2017 was coupled with a Black Lives Matter protest. Two weeks later, No Man’s Art Gallery in Amsterdam exhibited black women activists’ work centering on human rights violations against LGBTI people and LGBTI counter-organizing in South Africa, which was heavily advertised by the Parisian organization Lesbiennes de Color. Protests at the G20 summit in Hamburg in July 2017 dramatically highlighted transnational alliances between queer, feminist, anti-racist, and anticapitalist groups. Nevertheless, divisions still exist, and local-level activism continues to be important, as immigration issues and rightwing populism take center stage in Europe.

SEE ALSO Anti-Semitism in Europe; Black Freedom Movement and Sexuality; Human Rights in Europe; Migration to Europe; Strange Fruit

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Michaels, Jennifer. “The Impact of Audre Lorde’s Politics and Poetics on Afro-German

Anti-Semitism and Zionism

YARON PELEG
Kennedy Leigh Reader in Modern Hebrew Studies
University of Cambridge, United Kingdom

The relationship between anti-Semitism and largely male homosexuality in Europe and its influence on Zionism and the State of Israel.

Although homosexuality, anti-Semitism, and Zionism (initially, the movement to establish a Jewish homeland in historical Palestine) are not inherently connected, the association between them lies in the emergence and development of European modernity, which tied them together. The history of modern anti-Semitism begins in Europe in the nineteenth century, when profound changes in the legal and civil status of Jews took place. With the spread of liberalism after the French Revolution (1789–1799) and in the wake of Napoleon’s campaigns, European society opened up to Jewish minorities, who were hitherto excluded from full participation in it. One by one, European societies began to admit Jews as equal members into the various nation-states that began to take shape on the Continent. Most of these Jews were of Ashkenazi background and settled in western, central, and eastern Europe; Sephardic Jews, who originated in Spain and Portugal, formed a small part of the European polity. In addition, Jews became key participants in European colonial expansion in other parts of the world. However, while there was an increasing willingness to include Jews as part of various national and imperial communities, the growing familiarity with them also bred a new kind of contempt. Unlike the former resentment of Jews in Europe, which was mostly religious in nature, the age of reason saw the development of a more “scientific” resentment—an antipathy based on alleged racial differences between Jews and Christian Europeans. Although elements of this “scientific” resentment differed across regions of Europe with Catholic, Protestant, and Orthodox versions of Christianity, its contours were similar.

Anti-Semitism, Homosexuality, and European Modernity

The new antagonism toward Jews was shaped by four major revolutions that came to define European modernity: the secular revolution, the national revolution, the scientific revolution, and the gender revolution. The development of all four in the nineteenth century gave rise to and formed what is now called anti-Semitism, a term that bears witness to its pseudoscientific basis. The secular revolution made the old religious antagonism toward Jews obsolete. The creation of the nation-state rebranded Jews as the ultimate Other. The scientific revolution provided a rational framework for identifying the Jewish
Other scientifically. The gendering of the European bourgeoisie and the creation of the nuclear family as a way to ensure the stability of the new national community was another defining argument in support of the so-called Jewish difference (Gilman 1995).

The scientific, national, and gender revolutions were also instrumental for developing homosexuality and sexual aberration more widely as scientific categories in Europe and Europe’s imperial possessions. It was the homogenizing process of creating national communities and especially the gendering and policing of these communities that first defined and then problematized “deviant” sexualities. And it was science that provided the empirical tools for identifying and then controlling these deviations from newly established norms. Thus, toward the end of the nineteenth century, both Jews and homosexuals found themselves increasingly isolated from the ethnie, the nation-state, as aberrant minorities whose difference became progressively more problematic in various ways and to various degrees, depending on time and location. Eugenics—which involved programs and actions to enhance the quality of a particular “race”—offered an additional “scientific” framework through which sexual minorities and the Jewish Other were linked as undesirable. Eugenics also placed renewed, secular emphasis on sex for the purposes of procreation, enhancing the rationale for the “deviance” of same-sex practices.

Yet, even if anti-Semitism and homosexuality were shaped by similar historical forces, the connection between them was not necessarily predetermined. What eventually linked them, albeit in a lopsided way, was the process of Othering to which both minorities were subjected by the modern nationalization of European society: while homosexuals were accused of being Jewish-like, Jewish men were often accused of being homosexual-like—that is, effeminate, blurring the boundaries of the gender binary.

Feminity, Misogyny, and Effeminacy

Although most of the focus during this period was on men, Jewish women were also accused of transgressing boundaries of womanliness. As Daniel Boyarin and colleagues explain, the manliness and self-promotion characterizing the “female sexual invert” featured in some stereotypes of the “Jewess.” At the same time, the “Jewess” was associated with excessive femininity, resulting in a paradox of hyperfemininity and hypofemininity. “In this we also see,” Boyarin and colleagues note, “as with the workings of misogyny, homophobia, and antisemitism more generally—that contradictions, far from incapacitating stereotypes, may actually energize and enable them” (Boyarin et al. 2003, 6).

The accusation of male “effeminacy” and the negative meaning it carried emanated from the ingrained prejudice against women, which was enshrined in the very shape of the new middle classes that formed the new nation-states. Within this class, under the doctrine of “separate spheres,” women were relegated to the domestic realm, while men were consigned to activity outside it, shaping the world and controlling it. The connection between homosexuality and femininity was based primarily on the simplistic reference to the sexual partners of both groups. Because homosexuals are men who are attracted to other men, they were considered womanlike, especially if they were the receptive partners in anal intercourse. Consequently, many people believed homosexual men were inferior to heterosexual men socially, politically, culturally, and morally.

The perceived connections between Jewishness and femininity were complex. There were various medieval stories about menstruating Jewish men, and the division of labor in traditional Jewish communities as well as the practical or procreative attitude toward sex in Judaism differed from certain Christian traditions, with their penchant for asceticism and sexual abstinence. These differences were confusing to non-Jews, who often regarded Jews as effeminate because of them. Jews themselves also had a tradition of "soft" masculinity that the subsequent development of the "muscle Jew" sought to counter (Boyarin 1997). Moreover, the minority status of Jews in Europe throughout history, which carried into the nineteenth century, rendered them weak, subordinate, and politically passive as a community, traits that were considered feminine as well, especially from the perspective of modern nationalism, and especially as it developed in eastern and central Europe.

This nexus of Jewish men, effeminacy, and homosexuality emerged publicly in slurs against Jews who were visible because of their prominent positions in the civil society and politics in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. Scholarship of the Dreyfus affair in France in the 1890s (in which a Jewish artillery officer was court-martialed on charges of treason) underscores the strong analogy between Jews and homosexuals that was operative at the time. Alfred Dreyfus (1859–1935) was convicted, in part, because of the ways in which the joint forces of anti-Semitism and homophobia were motivated against him. Love letters between two male military attachés were part of a secret dossier presented to the court that was used to frame Dreyfus. So powerful was the association between homosexuality and anti-Semitism that when writer Émile Zola turned the Dreyfus affair into fiction in his 1903 work Verité (Truth), he changed the crime with which the innocent Jewish protagonist is wrongly charged from treason to homosexual rape and murder (Carlston 2002). A few decades later, in another conflation of homosexuality and Jewishness, the satirical journal Le Charivari depicted Léon Blum (1872–1950), the Popular Front leader and prime minister of France from 1936 to 1937, as a “wandering Jew” in drag (Mosse 1996).

The partial conflation of Jewishness and homosexuality took place precisely at this juncture and can be exemplified by two contemporaneous revolutionary Jewish thinkers: Otto Weininger (1880–1903) and Magnus Hirschfeld (1868–1935). Weininger was the tortured writer of a mean philosophical treatise that combined misogyny and anti-Semitism in a pernicious concoction that was later appropriated by the Nazis. Hirschfeld pioneered the study of human sexuality and laid the foundations for queer political activism. Whereas the self-hatred and self-destruction of Weininger exemplified the tragic consequences of mixing misogyny and anti-Semitism, Hirschfeld exemplified the vision and inspiration that can come from these very issues.

Masculinity and Zionism

Yet it was the political ideology of Zionism that these tortuous connections affected most profoundly. The very idea of a Jewish politics outside of Europe was inspired by the obstacles these negative associations created for the civic acculturation of Jews into Europe. And while Zionism was never preferred by a majority of European Jews, their eventual near-extirmination during the Holocaust, coupled with the foundation of the state of Israel in 1948, solidified the legacy of these problematic connections, which continue to reverberate in Israel today.

The power and allure of Zionist ideology resided in its revolutionary interpretation of the problematic connections between anti-Semitism and homosexuality or effeminacy. Since the challenge of surmounting these connections in Europe seemed impossible, Zionists suggested establishing a country of their own outside of Europe, in Palestine. By imitating European non-Jewish (“gentile”) culture, especially the “manly” aspects of European nationalism—such as action, power, independence, and self-reliance—Zionists hoped to shake off connotations of passivity and effeminacy and to prove the masculinity of Jews on personal as well as communal levels. The establishment of a sovereign state would prove the enterprise, the boldness, the fortitude, and the agency of Jews, who would join other nations as equals on the world stage, declared Theodor Herzl (1860–1904), the founder of political Zionism (Boyarin 1997).

While a multitude of reasons contributed to the articulation and establishment of Zionism, the nagging sense of insult at being ridiculed as effeminate and, thus, inferior remained a key element in the Zionist psyche. It shaped the nature of Zionist ideology, of Zionist politics, and finally also of the Zionist state, Israel, whose popular militarism is perhaps the most enduring example of it. At first, the masculine revolution of Zionism was directed more at the physical development of Palestine—such as establishing new settlements and developing agriculture and industry—which gave rise to the image of the pioneer, the so-called New Jew or New Hebrew. The appellation “new” was inspired by European masculine models, whose ready adoption by Zionists prompted them to label those who remained behind in the European diaspora, “Old Jews.” This was also the birth of the Zionist “negation of exile,” which, ironically, labeled diasporic Judaism with many of the old anti-Semitic tropes (Boyarin 1997; Dekel 2011).

With the growth of the Yishuv, the prestate Jewish community in Palestine, the image of the pioneering farmer was eventually joined by another masculine model: the Jewish fighter or soldier. Originally, militarism was not part of mainstream Zionist ideology, whose founders did not foresee an armed opposition to their national aspirations. It was only later, with the growth of the Yishuv and the growing resistance of Palestinian Arabs to it, that the aggression inherent in the Zionist masculinization program found expression. By 1949, after a long and bloody war for independence, the image of the New Jew as a soldier assumed ever larger proportions as Israel’s armed conflict with its Arab neighbors persisted throughout the twentieth century and into the present.

The hypermasculinization of the New Jew in the Yishuv did not inspire a similar liberation of women. Although socialism, egalitarianism, and communalism played important roles in early Zionist ideology and praxis, as can be seen by the unique invention of the kibbutz, women did not benefit from these progressive ideologies commensurate with their promise. Despite the intention to revolutionize gender relations in the new Jewish society in the Yishuv, in practice, most pioneering women found themselves occupying roles they had hoped to escape in the old, patriarchal societies they left behind. For Jewish men, the Zionist revolution opened up a host of activities and professions that were closed to them in Europe; it had an equally significant impact on Jewish women by solidifying their lack of opportunity and mobility, even as women’s roles were evolving in postwar Europe and North America.

LGBTQ+ in the Yishuv and the State of Israel

But while the Zionist cult of masculinity inherited many problematic aspects of the European nationalism it mimicked, anxiety about homosexuality was not one of them.
Although the fear of being seen as effeminate and, thus, inferior was a powerful motivation for the founders of Zionism, associations of homosexuality played little role in the history of Zionism. Some of the reasons for this include the relatively minor role of homosexuality in Jewish history and law, the Spartan conditions in the Yishuv and, later, the state, and the social cohesion of the small and beleaguered Jewish community.

Since family life was of supreme importance to a precarious minority as the basis of stability and continuity, homosexuality did not play a visible role in Jewish history. As Hirschfeld himself noted during his 1932 visit to Palestine, Yishuv society was particularly unconducive to homosexual relationships, as the efforts of state building were all-consuming. Since Palestine also lacked an urban environment, it did not provide the space for visible queer subcultures to flourish. Lastly, the small size of the Jewish community in Palestine/Israel and its ethnic and ideological cohesion, which were strengthened by the many challenges it faced from inside and out, mollified attitudes toward sexual infractions and elided them.

For these reasons, the fight for gay and lesbian rights in Israel was relatively short and lacked drama. The legal process itself was brief and swift and initiated by the government itself rather than prompted by public pressures. It was stewarded by a center-left coalition that came to power in the early 1990s on a civic agenda strengthened by various peace initiatives that changed Israel profoundly. Religious legislators abstained from challenging it because they believed the matter had little relevance for their voters.

But if the legal process was swift, social acceptance of queer people has taken a longer time. Even today, many Jews from Orthodox or ultra-Orthodox backgrounds still leave or are forced to leave their communities if they come out and want to live openly as gay, lesbian, or trans; under rabbinical jurisdiction, they may lose the ability to see their children or families. And whereas Tel Aviv's status as a gay and lesbian center is well established, many Israelis continue to believe that the more religious city of Jerusalem should not visibly celebrate queerness. Jerusalem's gay pride parade has faced opposition from religious groups and Israeli Arabs. Meanwhile, the Zionist cult of masculinity has been deployed against Palestinians and Israeli Arabs by, for instance, positing the Arab male body as passive and effeminate or, conversely, as inappropriately masculine through an association with irrational violence and terrorism.

An important example of these complicated dynamics occurred in the late 1990s. The Israeli press and the Knesset (the Israeli parliament) engaged in intense debate about whether trans pop star Dana International (1972–) was fit to represent the country at the Eurovision song contest in 1998—a competition she eventually won. A right-wing religious party attempted to gain a court injunction to prevent her participation and threatened to bring down the government if she were allowed to sing for Israel (Solomon 2003). As Alisa Solomon notes, Dana International’s self-fashioning relied on a critique of the masculinizing and heterosexualizing project of Herzlian Zionism: where Jews went to Palestine to become “normalized” as men, Dana International went to Europe to turn from man into woman. She changed her original “priestly, Israeli” surname of Cohen into “the moniker of a rootless cosmopolitan” (International), and she challenged the right of Zionism to redeploy queerness for the purposes of what is often called homonationalism (Solomon 2003, 151).

Masculinity in the IDF and in the Orthodox Community

The decriminalization of homosexuality was followed by a vigorous cultural campaign to legitimize other aspects of gay life, in which the Israeli military played an important role. Because the Israel Defense Forces (IDF) is a venerable institution that is almost universally esteemed in Israel, military credentials became one of the surest ways for gay men to gain legitimacy, not only as worthy members of the besieged national community but also as men. If homosexuality feminizes, soldiering makes one manly, so went the argument that is still prevalent in Israel today. The country’s cinema was especially supportive of these associations, which it articulated extremely well in a string of popular films that featured handsome and brave gay soldiers, most notably Eytan Fox’s 2002 hit Yossi & Jagger. Unlike gays in the militaries of other countries, the service of gay men in the IDF has seldom been debated in Israel, where the intimate size of the national community, its perceived state of emergency, and the powerful ethnoreligious identity of its Jewish citizens has precluded such questions. Nevertheless, the IDF was initially more equivocal regarding trans men; Dana International, for instance, was rejected as unfit to do compulsory military service when she turned 18. (Its policies were changed in 2014 and are considered more progressive today.)

Thus, at end of the twentieth century, homosexuality and Jewishness met once again in ironically similar circumstances. At the dawn of Zionism, allegations of effeminacy prompted the establishment of a national movement to refute the charges, and one hundred years later, the spectacular success in creating muscular Jews was used similarly to legitimize homosexual (read: effeminate) Israelis. Unfortunately, what could have been a positive development was tainted by an old wrong—misogyny. The antipathy toward women that stimulated Zionism's masculinization program shaped the efforts to legitimize Israeli gay male life through military associations.

The depth and pervasiveness of the Jewish anxiety about masculinity, which contributed to the eventual centrality of the IDF in Israeli culture, has also affected Israeli women, who have been fighting hard for equality in the military since its establishment. At first, these efforts were a continuation of the attempts by pioneering women for gender parity in the movement. But although that fight was lost early on, it has revived in recent decades in the form of a campaign to allow women to serve in combat roles in the IDF. The precedence for women’s combat service was set in 1994 in a Supreme Court of Israel decision that opened all roles in the IDF to women. Since then, the number of women combatants has gradually risen, proving the enduring power of the masculine neurosis in Zionist history and adding another dimension to it: the masculinization of Israeli women. At the same time, in Israel's deeply conservative society, the service of women in combat roles is still regarded as masculine and therefore not entirely appropriate for real (read: feminine) women.

One sector of Israeli society that remains relatively impervious to the Zionist masculine allure is the Orthodox Jewish community. Preserving many of the religious traditions that were developed in the diaspora and that divide men and women into holy and profane, the Orthodox masculine ideals focus on religious study rather than on worldly affairs, which are largely carried out and supported by the work of Orthodox women. Consequently, Orthodox Jews reject homosexuality and transgenderism on old-fashioned religious grounds—a position more secular Israelis may see as homophobic and transphobic. The growth of Orthodox communities in Israel and the cultural pressures it brings with it are challenging the views on gender identity and sexuality held by both members of these communities and persons outside of them in multiple ways. For instance, members of some Orthodox groups may be becoming more “tolerant” of LGBTQ+ people, whereas some non-Orthodox people may be becoming more conservative in their beliefs about gender and sexuality, or in their acceptance of the public visibility of LGBTQ+ communities.
While the convergence of anti-Semitism, homosexuality, and misogyny more than a century ago played a meaningful part in the process that led to the establishment of a state, it is also responsible for some of the persistent problems of that state. The creation of new Jews under Zionism was greatly motivated by the masculine revolution of nineteenth-century Europe—a cultural revolution that led to the bloodiest period in Europe’s history. As an inheritor of this legacy, the state of Israel continues to pay its price and has not yet learned how to challenge it.

SEE ALSO Anti-Semitism in Europe; The Bubble (2006; Eytan Fox); Einayim Pkuhot (2009; Haim Tabakman); Nationalism and Sexuality in Europe; Religion and Same-Sex Behaviors: Judaism

BIBLIOGRAPHY

FILMOGRAPHY

Although Jews and same-sex behaviors have been around for millennia, “homosexuality” and “anti-Semitism” as concepts are quite new, and both terms were coined in roughly the same period. The term homosexuality was coined in 1869 and anti-Semitism in 1879. Both neologisms come from the German cultural space, and they proved to be long lasting, foundational, and at the core of Western modernity, its crises, and its self-understanding.

Historical Conjuncture of Jews and Homosexuals as “Others”

While the term anti-Semitism is relatively modern, hatred, suspicion, and exclusion of Jews has a very long history and has appeared with various degrees of intensity. It is a defining aspect of Christian Europe, culminating in an attempt at total genocide, the Holocaust, during World War II (1939–1945).

The most important transformation of this long hatred occurred during the nineteenth century when the age-old, premodern religious antagonism to Jews and Judaism changed its character into what is currently termed modern anti-Semitism. European nations opened up to Jews and other religiously stigmatized groups after the French Revolution (1789–1799) and the rise of liberalism, promising to admit them as equal members of society. This shift gave rise to the desire on the part of various minorities to assimilate into host societies; they wished to become equal citizens. It also gave rise to a host of anti-Semitic views and initiatives, now secularized in their outlook and motivation. Anti-Semites tried to account for what made Jews different and so detestable. They claimed that Jews are disloyal, arguing that because they did not belong to the nation, they could not be patriotic. They were convinced that there was something beyond their religion that made Jews difficult or impossible to assimilate and that their assimilation would cause harm to the nation. As of the mid-nineteenth century, this antagonism became extreme with the rise of modern race theory, which claimed that races existed and that these should not mix, as miscegenation would be fatal and cause the decline of nations and civilizations. More important than the impact of racial doctrine was the idea of a world conspiracy theory. This claimed, among other things, that Jews conspired to reach world domination by triggering a destructive world war. Throughout the nineteenth century, Jews became the quintessential Other of European nations.

Alongside Jews as outsiders arose the awareness of homosexuals as another outsider group—a second Other. As Jews were outside the nation, homosexuals—termed perverts, inverters, degenerates, pederasts, and so on—were outside normative life and outside the respectability of the rising bourgeois middle class. Many Jews and homosexuals wished to become respectable. Respectability demanded self-control and restraint of reckless impulses, purity, physical and mental health, and sexual moderation. From the 1860s onward, many societies became aware of homosexuals as discrete persons, in good part because of the rise of the field of sexology alongside medical science and because of the efforts of those who advocated equal civil rights and tolerance for sexual minorities. Medical discourse developed a stereotype for homosexuals, fixing them outside respectable society. Their abnormality, no longer deemed by these scientists as a sin before God, also went beyond individual sexual acts that could be shamed or punished by society. The homosexual was now a psychological makeup, a person, and an object of scientific inquiry that could be viewed as a distinct “third sex,” as promiscuous, as decadent, as spreading diseases, as female souls in male bodies, and so on. Many homosexual men chose suicide as a consequence of this condition. While lesbianism, unlike male homosexuality, was not criminalized, the social taboo of love between women and the pressures exercised on women to make them conform to heterosexual norms created difficult living conditions for lesbians and also led to suicide (Bauer 2015).

With the rise of urban, industrial, and increasingly secularized Europe, hateful images of Jews and homosexuals began to circulate. By smearing these Others, these new stereotypes served to help define what each of the various European nations wished to think of itself. National movements in Europe made both Jews and homosexuals their quintessential others, as opposed to contemporary Islamophobia in Europe, which is articulated in defense of a unified Christian European culture. In contemporary western Europe, neither gays nor Jews are still perceived to be a threat to state and society. In eastern Europe, however, this sense of threat is by and large still present.

Denial of Their Masculinity

One of the main problems both Jews and male homosexuals grappled with was a denial of their masculinity. As a result, many Jews and homosexuals aspired to this value and used various strategies to prove their manliness. Discussions of homosexual and Jew at the turn of the twentieth century involved a profound and pervasive anxiety about male performance and masculinity. Stereotypes came into their own with the modern age as part of a general quest for symbols, especially visual symbols (Mosse 1996). This included the masculine stereotype, as male beauty and virtue were now instrumental in symbolizing the nation. This stereotype was now strengthened by the existence of negative stereotypes of men (Jews or homosexuals) who not only failed to measure up to “real” masculinity but also projected the exact opposite of this true masculinity. Their misshapen bodies became a sign of degeneration, immorality, and weakness. With the rise of the European nationalist movements, in the context of bourgeois society, masculinity was idealized as the foundation of the nation and society. Masculinity symbolized the nation's spiritual and material vitality—its striving for moral purity. All those who diverted from the norms of bourgeois comportment and strict gender roles were considered abnormal or strangers. Sexual minorities as well as strangers were looked upon with suspicion, which was coupled at times with bitter hatred. Sexuality outside the heterosexual monogamous norm was viewed as dangerous to the health of society and the state. This was because it was also perceived as leading to depopulation. The secrecy that characterized "deviant" sexual behavior resembled a conspiracy, now seen as sowing confusion and promoting betrayal of the state.

The alleged femininity of the male Jewish body and its degeneracy in turn-of-the-century anti-Semitic discourse have been highlighted in research since the 1990s. Perhaps the most notorious and influential “scientific” and “philosophic” treatment of this subject is Otto Weininger’s Geschlecht und Charakter (1903; Sex and Character [1906]), published a few months before the Viennese author (himself a Jew) committed suicide at the age of twenty-three. In this profoundly misogynistic pseudoscientific treatise, Weininger claimed that Jews were purely materialistic, devoid of any spiritual or creative promise. For him, they were hysterical inferiors, lacking any personality. There is no dignity in women, and therefore Jews too have no dignity. Both have no potential for humor, only mockery. Judaism is saturated with femininity, he declared, echoing leading nineteenth-century German Jewish rabbis who prided Jewish men as committed to family values (Baader 2012). For Weininger, the Jew was unable to elevate himself from domestic commitment. Moreover, the Jewish man as woman, or no better than woman, was a sign and significer of the age. Max Nordau (1849–1923), the Hungarian Jewish physician who published the worldwide best-seller Entartung (1892; Degeneration [1895]), was the deputy of the Zionist leader Theodor Herzl (1860–1904). At the Second Zionist Congress in 1898, Nordau called on Jews to become “muscle Jews” instead of pale, thin-chested “coffeehouse Jews.” Zionism tried to defend Judaism against this stereotype by transforming Jews into a modern nation, with a territorial nation-state and with real men, capable of defending themselves. But, if in other national movements manliness was made to serve the nation and symbolize its virtues, for Herzl and Nordau, nationalism was an instrument in the search for manliness (Boyarin 1997).

Central Role of German-Speaking World in Europe

Coming to terms with homosexuality took place most importantly in Berlin and in the German-speaking world of central Europe. It was here that the jurist Karl Heinrich Ulrichs founded the modern Western tradition of gay rights activism by publishing numerous pamphlets between 1869 and 1879 that called for the abolition of the infamous Paragraph 175 criminalizing homosexual sex, claiming that homosexuals did not choose their fate but were simply born that way. Here too, the rise of homosexual cultural consciousness and homosexual subjectivity was entwined with considerations about Jewishness and Jews, the other minority desperate for recognition and inclusion. This involved two controversial, sometimes reviled Jewish men. One was the liberal sexologist Magnus Hirschfeld (1868–1935), founder in 1897 of the Wissenschaftlich-humanitäres Komitee (Scientific-Humanitarian Committee), which advocated the rights of sexual minorities. The other man was the controversial Jewish zoologist Benedict Friedlaender (1866–1908) who, together with Adolf Brand (1874–1945), founded in 1903 the Gemeinschaft der Eigenen (Society of the Self-Determined), which could be seen as the “right-wing” flank of the German homosexual movement.

Hirschfeld, both Jewish and homosexual, sexologist and social activist, had a straightforward approach to sex reform. He treated homosexuality as a “third sex,” an intermediate stage between masculine and feminine. As such, it was a natural and legitimate variant. While Hirschfeld promoted his third sex model of homosexuality, Friedlaender came up with a conception of a hypermasculine homosexuality involving manly desire purged of any stain of effeminizing difference. This difference he connected to a Jewish essence. Friedlaender considered erotic love between men as much higher and nobler than love toward women. For Friedlaender, the homosexual desire of men for other men was the pinnacle of manliness and virtue. He maintained that men are attracted to other men, an attraction that ranges from friendship to sexual contact. The Berlin homosexual movement that rose in the last decade of the nineteenth century was now split into two camps: the liberal camp that accepted and tolerated sexual and gender difference and the masculinist camp that stressed Aryan virility, celebrated male-male erotic attraction, and excluded Jews. Friedlaender (not unlike Weininger, a self-loathing Jew who also committed suicide) considered erotic ties between men as the foundation of male socialization and of civilization in general. Like Weininger, he distinguished between the female family sphere and the political, state-building sphere that was exclusively male. The latter sphere excluded the Jewish male, whose masculinity was so deficient that he could never amount to the lofty task of state building. State building was, instead, the domain of real men who erotically bonded with other men and gathered around the Männerheld, the hero of the men, the supervirile charismatic leader. Pitting one minority against another, even by a person who belongs to both groups, is a device of self-exoneration. A few years before taking his own life, Friedlaender founded a small association of men who promoted male-male love. One of Friedlaender’s followers, the German thinker Hans Blüher (1888–1955), summarized this Jewish deficiency succinctly: “With the Jews it is as follows: they suffer at one and the same time from a weakness in male-bonding and a hypertrophy of the family. They are submerged in the family and familial relations. Loyalty, unity, and bonding [the quintessential manly virtues] are no concern of the Jew” (quoted in Geller 2003, 105).

The scientific and cultural invention of the modern homosexual indeed indexed anxieties over Jewish racial or other difference. This pertained not only to men and the question of masculinity: the “Jewess” and the “sexual invert,” the predecessor of the “lesbian,” deviated from normalcy. Both shared an excess, both went beyond the bounds of female virtue and sexual propriety and respectability, too active in their desire, a peculiar transgression of womanliness. At the time, an invert was understood as someone whose psyche was the opposite of his or her biological sex—someone with a female psyche in a man’s body, or vice versa. Desiring women instead of men offered proof of this inversion. This lack of womanliness and a strong sense of self-promotion also featured in some stereotypes of Jewish women: Jewesses as pushy and unladylike, deceitful, and sexually voracious. As a failure, the Jewess was both too feminine and not enough of a woman (Boyarin, Itzkovitz, and Pellegrini 2003).

Conjunctures in the Contemporary Period

Beyond this historical conjuncture of homosexual and Jewish identities, subjectivities, and stereotypes as the quintessential Other that defined the modern European, there are other conjunctures with the present. The queer theoretician Eve Kosofsky Sedgwick (1990) equates the “epistemological distinctiveness” of gay and Jewish identities. Both are analogous in that the stigmatized individual has discretion over other people’s knowledge of their membership of the group—that is, they can hide their orientation or identity. The consequence of this structure is that both have the option of living in the closet. As opposed to people of color, for example, they can choose to hide and discreetly blend in. We see how at the core of queer theory, in one of its most profound moments, lies a homology to the Jewish experience: what coming out of the closet means. Jews, especially Jews who believed in assimilation, lived in closets, or in the words of [Hannah] Arendt: “As a child I did not know that I was Jewish.... The word ‘Jew’ was never mentioned at home when I was a child. I first met up with it through anti-Semitic remarks ... from children on the street. After that I was, so to speak, ‘enlightened.’”

(WOLIN 2001, 39)
The Jew, especially as immigrant, between nations, forced out of one role that no longer fits and into the role of a stranger, resembles the male homosexual in being indistinguishable from the urban crowd. Living in dosets is easier in sprawling, anonymous cities, a destination for immigrants from economically undeveloped areas (Jews) and suffocating social backgrounds where one could not hide effectively from prying eyes of hostile neighbors. European cultures often linked both Jews and homosexuals to the city—to the urban social and cultural landscape. And the anonymous big city, in the eyes of the respectable bourgeoisie, also presented “temptations” such as ballrooms, dance floors, cabarets, and red-light districts—all enabling illicit sexuality, away from social surveillance. These threatened to sap uprooted and restless individuals of their strength. Now, more than ever, sex needed to be under control, but so did immigrant neighborhoods. It was the poor and uncouth east European immigrant Jews in the poor districts of Vienna that shaped Adolf Hitler’s view of Jews around World War I as rootless, cosmopolitan city dwellers, ready and willing to parasitically sap the vitality of the nation. As a result of this stereotype, both Jews and homosexuals were afflicted by self-hatred, and the combination of homosexuality and Jewish self-hatred was now articulated in literature by both Jewish authors (such as Marcel Proust [1871–1922]) and others, notably James Joyce (1882–1941) and the Jewish protagonist of his masterwork Ulysses (1922), Leopold Bloom.

The ways in which the LGBTQ community in Israel expresses itself publicly and asserts itself politically somewhat continues the older tensions of being an Other, both Jewish and homosexual. Gay pride, the Tel Aviv and Jerusalem gay parades, the wish to be accepted by the military as manly men, the participation in new family structures, and the willingness to participate in what is termed “pinkwashing” (promoting Israel as a gay-friendly, liberal democracy with the intent to conceal human and civil rights abuses in the Palestinian occupied territories) all beg for a further critical analysis, taking into account the nexus of the older, historical homophobia and anti-Semitism.

SEE ALSO Anti-Semitism and Zionism; The Bubble (2006; Eytan Fox); The Closet; Einyim Pkuhot (2009; Haim Tabakman); Human Rights; Institut für Sexualwissenschaft; Nationalism and Sexuality in Europe; Pinkwashing; Urban Queerness

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Halper, Shaun Jacob. “Mordechai Langer (1894–1943) and the Birth of the Modern Jewish Homosexual.” PhD diss., University of California, Berkeley, 2013. https://escholarship.org/uc/item/5zz859g4

Throughout history, charges of sodomy have frequently been used either politically or for scapegoating. Formally defined as a “crime against nature,” sodomy was initially an umbrella term for various sexual transgressions policed by Christian law in Europe. These included both male-male and male-female anal intercourse, bestiality, masturbation, and even any sex outside of procreation (Wiesner-Hanks 2010, 45). Depending on the historical period and location, other sexual acts and sometimes even sexual positions were included in the definition of sodomy, but gradually it came to be interpreted primarily as male-male sexual acts.

In European societies, prohibitions on sodomy were rooted in ecclesiastical (church) law and date to the fourth century CE, when the Roman Empire became Christian and adopted the death penalty for male homosexuality from the Old Testament Book of Leviticus (Crompton 2003). In medieval Europe, sodomy was associated with heresy and Islam, both considered anti-Christian (Boswell 1981). A combination of sodomy and heresy charges served to discredit and destroy the Order of the Templars in 1307. They were used against subdeacon Arnaud de Verniolles (or Arnald de Vernhola), who was brought before the Inquisition in 1323 in France on charges of heresy. Arnaud’s case reveals the complicated negotiations around the definition of sodomy and its potential association with identity categories in medieval Europe. In surviving records of the case, he claimed sex between men was a mortal sin, but no more serious than fornication with a woman or with female prostitutes (Arnold 2001). But the sex he was practicing was probably intercrural (rubbing the penis between his partner’s legs) rather than penetrative, and he also stated that “if a man lay on top of another man as if he was a woman, or the said sin was committed through the rear,” it would be a much greater sin (quoted in Arnold 2001, 219).
Atherton, an unpopular Anglican bishop in a primarily Roman Catholic see, and his steward Childe were the second pair of men executed for sodomy under England's Buggery Act of 1534. Accusations of sodomy were sometimes leveled against religious minorities, with Catholics being targeted so that monastery lands could be confiscated.

Like sodomy, bougre was a name given in Middle French to a sect of heretics thought to have come from Bulgaria in the eleventh century; it then morphed into the English word bugger, meaning a person who penetrates someone's anus during sexual intercourse (OED Online 2018). Buggery, too, gradually came to mean primarily male-male sexual acts.

Antisodomy and Buggery Trials in Europe

In the aftermath of the Protestant Reformation, sodomy was brought under civil jurisdiction in most European societies. In England, Henry VIII (1491–1547) introduced the Buggery Act in 1534, which was originally intended to be a temporary measure. Despite being the first civil law of its kind, the Buggery Act relied on religious terminology, defining sodomy as the “detestable and abominable vice committed with mankind or beast,” and punished it with death (Statutes Project 2018). The motivation behind the Buggery Act was anti-Catholic, as Henry VIII sought to justify breaking away from the Catholic Church in order to secure his divorce and remarriage. Louis Crompton (2003) notes that under the Buggery Act charges of sodomy were used to prosecute Catholics, in particular clergy who had previously been immune to secular law, and to confiscate monastery lands. Henry's son introduced a new Buggery Act in 1548, but when Henry's Catholic daughter Mary I (1516–1558) became queen, she repealed it in 1553; after Henry's daughter Elizabeth I (1533–1603) took the throne, she passed a new version of the act in 1563 (Trumbach 2007).

The Elizabethan Buggery Act was rarely applied during the first century and a half of its existence, and when it was, most cases seem to have involved rape of prepubescent boys (Trumbach 2007). Indeed, as Harry G. Cocks (2003) observes, before the 1720s the Buggery Act was hardly enforced at all. Matt Cook (2003) writes about English "molly houses" (in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, usually taverns, pubs, or coffee-houses) that remained in business long enough to attract a steady patronage among men seeking sex with men or looking for social networks, despite periodic raids.

In 1828 the Buggery Act was replaced with the Offences Against the Person Act, whereas capital penalty for sodomy remained intact, to be abolished in the 1861 amendment. Throughout these changes, buggery was understood as anal penetration between men or between man and woman. Between 1806 and 1900, 8,921 men were charged with sodomy, gross indecency, or related misdemeanors in England and Wales (Cook et al. 2007). Most of them were imprisoned, yet between 1806 and 1861, of the 404 men sentenced to death, only fifty-five were executed, with the rest exiled to Australia or imprisoned (Cook et al. 2007). James Pratt and John Smith, two working-class men who had been reported to have committed buggery with each other by the landlord of the rooms they rented, were the last to be executed for sodomy in Britain, in 1835. In 1885 Member of Parliament Henry Labouchère proposed an amendment that would replace sodomy with “gross indecency,” broadly defined to include all forms of same-sex erotic activity between men, thus eliminating the burden of proof that an act of anal penetration had taken place. The outcome of his proposal, Section 11 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act of 1885, was soon used against Oscar Wilde (1854–1900), famous Irish author and playwright. In 1895 Wilde sued the Marquess of Queensberry for libel after he accused Wilde of "posing as Somdomite [sic]." Following three highly publicized trials, Wilde was found guilty of gross indecency and sentenced to two years of hard labor. Apart from ruining Wilde’s life and career, his trials resulted in greater visibility of homosexuality across Europe.

Some argue that the dramatic turn the Wilde scandal took not only made homosexuality a part of public discourse, but it also might have set back the liberalization of laws against same-sex acts for decades; such acts, previously tolerated as long as they took place in private, were now associated with a predatory behavior, provoking widespread conservative responses in Europe and North America (Hattersley 2006). Simultaneously, queer subcultures flourished in major European cities by the early twentieth century, bringing about not just new sexual identities but also new forms of social control. In the interwar period, the British police frequently arrested men for “cottaging” (cruising) in public urinals, sometimes resorting to entrapment (Houlbrook 2000). In 1927 Constable E. Hartford arrested schoolmaster and war hero Frank Champain for importuning (verbal propositioning) in London urinals. Champain was sentenced to three months of hard labor under the 1898 Vagrancy Act but appealed and had his conviction overturned. Matt Houlbrook (2000) notes that the police were eager to arrest cottaging men because they viewed them as an easy way to earn a promotion.

At the beginning of the Cold War, male homosexuality became policed even more harshly. While in 1938 there were 719 court cases involving gross indecency in England and Wales, the number was 2,504 in 1955 (Bauer and Cook 2012). In the 1950s police in the United Kingdom raided individuals' homes, seizing their diaries and address books, “snowballing” the pool of potential convicts (Cook et al. 2007). Among those convicted was mathematician Alan Turing (1912–1954), whose codebreaking work was instrumental to the Allies’ victory over Nazi Germany in World War II. After Turing was charged with gross indecency in 1952, his lawyer proposed chemical castration, or organotherapy, as a means to spare someone so gifted from imprisonment (Doan 2017). Turing killed himself in 1954. Laura Doan notes that from today's perspective, organotherapy is demonized, but “what is now termed 'chemical castration' held different meanings in 1952” (2017, 122). Doan cautions against making the past intelligible today at the expense of understanding historical actors' ways of being in the world, and historians therefore need to treat trials such as Turing’s and the punishments they meted out with circumspection. Sexual acts between consenting men over twenty-one in private were decriminalized in 1967 in England and Wales, but in some of British territories, such as the Isle of Man, homosexuality remained criminalized until 1992.

In late medieval and early modern Catholic Europe, sodomy came to be closely associated with heresy and witchcraft and was punished by burning at the stake. In France, “sodomites” were burned and their property confiscated. In the Italian cities Perugia, Bologna, and Ancona, a form of people’s militia was created in 1233 to ensure religious and sexual conformity, with particular attention to sodomy (Norton 2008). In fourteenth- and fifteenth-century Florence, adults convicted of sodomy were castrated, and youth publicly ostracized and fined (Norton 2008). In Spain and Sicily (under Spanish rule from the fifteenth through the eighteenth centuries), sodomy and bestiality were initially prosecuted by the Holy Inquisition, but in 1509 Ferdinand II of Aragon (1452–1516) placed sodomy under secular jurisdiction. Some historians believe that in Iberian societies sodomy was not widely prosecuted until the late fifteenth century, when the Inquisition focused on general prosecution of heresy and Jews, as well as crimes against royal authorities (Nesvig 2001). The “doubled” activity of the Holy Inquisition and secular courts resulted in 380 cases of sodomy in Valencia, 791 in Zaragoza, and 433 in Barcelona recorded between 1540 and 1700, as well as over one hundred executions in Madrid from the 1580s to the 1650s, and at least eighty-three public executions in Sicily between 1567 and 1640 (Tortorici 2012). In Portugal, sodomy was under the jurisdiction of the Inquisition, and between 1587 and 1794, four hundred individuals were charged with sodomy, with about thirty of them executed for their crimes (Tortorici 2012).

In Holland, a large-scale persecution of homosexual men took place in the eighteenth century, starting in 1730 in Utrecht (Crompton 2003). The Dutch Republic had been through a series of natural disasters in the preceding decades, and the men accused of sodomy became public scapegoats. In April 1730 the authorities began to arrest and interrogate men who had been using the ruins of Utrecht’s Dom Church as cruising grounds. Their confessions showed the existence of a widespread network of homosexual men in the republic, prompting a nationwide witch hunt in July of the same year. In Utrecht, around forty men were arrested and tried, and eighteen of them were executed by hanging or drowning. In other Dutch cities, the persecution of “sodomites” was used politically: for example, the mayor of Zuidhorn used the charges against his enemies, convicting and killing twenty-two men (Norton 2011). Overall, between 250 and 300 men were prosecuted in 1730, and more waves of persecution followed in 1764, 1776, and 1797 (Crompton 2003). The word Utrechtenant (resident of Utrecht) became a synonym for homosexual in the Dutch slang.

In Germany, secular legislation had a long and uneven germination period over several hundred years, with many Germanic law codes not considering same-sex relations a felony
The meaning of sodomy itself was unstable; Maria R. Boes (2002) notes that depending on time and place, it could include sex between Christians and Jews or Turks and Saracens or be used interchangeably with bestiality. However, when the Holy Roman Empire’s 1532 Constitutio Criminalis Carolina (criminal code) made same-sex activities, along with bestiality, punishable by death, the climate had changed (Boes 2002). In 1721 Catharina Margaretha Linck, a Prussian woman who presented herself as a man and married another woman, was convicted of sodomy and executed by beheading at the order of King Frederick William I (1688–1740), despite the prosecutors’ initial confusion about whether Linck’s use of a leather dildo on her partner constituted “sodomy” (Crompton 2003). Unlike Spain, Portugal, Italy, Belgium, and Holland, which dropped antisodomy laws following the example of France’s Napoleonic Code in the nineteenth century, Germany preserved prohibitions on sodomy in various jurisdictions until the mid-twentieth century.

Regarding all nonprocreative sex as sinful, the Russian Orthodox Church, however, did not follow Western Christian tradition in singling out sodomy. In pre-1700 Russia, male anal intercourse was considered sinful but was punished with a penance similar to that for heterosexual adultery, and nonpenetrative same-sex erotic activity was treated with even lesser severity (Healey 2001). Secular statutes banning sodomy in the military were introduced by Peter the Great (1672–1725) in 1716 in a move to imitate western European military laws (Healey 2001). In 1835 Nicholas I (1796–1855) extended the prohibition to all males in the Russian Empire, making sodomy an offense punished by exile to Siberia.

Yet, the relatively weak social position of the Russian Orthodox Church and the influence of the “high”/“low” class division in Imperial Russia resulted in a nonsystematic and selective enforcement of the antisodomy law. High-ranked individuals could bribe officials or use their connections to escape conviction, and people of lower social standing were affected disproportionately. Dan Healey reviews the 1882 story of Prince Obolenski from the provincial town of Uman, who became infatuated with Petr and Fedor Filonovskii, coachmen brothers. Obolenski convinced the Filonovskiis to leave their employer and join his staff, then provided the brothers with new phaetons and horses and rented for them a lavishly furnished flat where he could visit them. When the news of his and the Filonovskiis’ “debauchery” became public, the prince and the coachmen were taken to trial in Moscow. The trial’s outcome is unknown, yet there is a record of the prince’s sophisticated medical defense provided by forensic doctors (Healey 2001). According to Healey’s estimates (2001), from 1874 to 1904, 1,066 persons were indicted for sodomy, with 911 more indictments from 1905 to 1913. Only 5 percent of those prosecuted belonged to the upper classes. The number of convictions rose from 440 between 1874 and 1904 to 504 between 1905 and 1913, likely due to the period of social instability between the 1905 Revolution and World War I. With the exception of the pre-1700 punishment by the church for mutual masturbation between women, female same-sex activity was never subject to criminal law in Russia.
After the 1917 Bolshevik Revolution, male sodomy was decriminalized briefly from 1922 to 1933. By 1933, however, homosexuality did not fit in with the newly promoted ideal of Communist family values included in the process of social unification initiated by Soviet leader Joseph Stalin (1878–1953). To the Communist leadership, male homosexuality had come to be associated with foreign influences ranging from bourgeois lifestyle and espionage to fascist ideology, and as such was outlawed. Healey states that from 1933/1934 to 1993, between 60,000 and 250,000 men were convicted under Article 121, which defined muzhelozhstvo (male sodomy; literally, “lying down with men”) as a sexual crime punishable by up to five years of hard labor in prison. Most trials took place behind closed doors.

The Soviet antisodomy legislation was often used in targeting Stalin's political opponents and those considered enemies of the people, as well as social and intellectual nonconformists. Thus, between 1934 and 1937, Article 121 was used to prosecute “anti-Soviet” peasant poet Nikolai Klyuev (1884–1937); in 1944 (and again in 1959) it targeted famous singer Vadim Kozin (1903–1994) after he had fallen out of favor with the head of the secret police, Lavrentiy Beria (1899–1953); and in 1948 and 1974 sodomy charges were brought against Armenian film director Sergei Paradjanov (1924–1990), who was critical of Soviet cultural politics (Healey 2001, 2014; Makin 2010). Like most men convicted under Article 121, Paradjanov was subjected to torture and sexual violence in prison. Adi Kuntsman (2009) argues that mass mistreatment of homosexual men in Soviet gulags had lasting effects on homophobia in contemporary Russia. Arrests and sentencing of men under Article 121 continued after the Soviet Union's dissolution in 1991 until 1993, when Russian president Boris Yeltsin (1931–2007) repealed it, seeking admission to the Council of Europe (Essig 1999). Former Soviet republics Turkmenistan and Uzbekistan never decriminalized homosexuality.

In Scandinavia before the mid-nineteenth century, sodomy, often grouped together with bestiality, was regulated by the series of laws on “fornication against nature” and punished by death. Starting with Norway in 1842, Nordic societies replaced death penalties for sodomy with “modern” penal codes that punished it with a prison sentence. Finland was the last state to do so, in 1894. Unlike Great Britain and Russia, in Scandinavia women were also subject to sodomy prohibitions. Jens Rydström and Kati Mustola (2007) discuss the 1845 case of female sodomy in which the District Court of Helgeland, Norway, sentenced sixty-eight-year-old Simonette Vold to eighteen months of hard labor for engaging in sexual activities with her two female servants, who in turn received two weeks of bread-and-water diet and seclusion. The verdict was appealed, as Vold confessed only to imitating sex acts with the women. The case went up to the Supreme Court of Norway, which—given the evidence produced by witnesses, such as the description of the loose velvet dildo Vold was said to have used during sex—concluded that she was guilty of the “intercourse against nature.” The court upheld the servants’ punishment and reduced Vold’s sentence to a year of hard labor. Between 1879 and 1999, 8,801 men and 86 women were convicted for “unnatural fornication” and same-sex sexuality across Scandinavia, with the majority of convictions taking place in Denmark between 1935 and 1964 and involving sex with minors, homosexual sex work, age-of-consent violations, or sex in public (Rydström and Mustola 2007).

Prosecution of Sodomy in the Colonies

European colonial expansion brought antisodomy laws to the colonized lands of Africa, Asia, Australia, and the Americas. The Buggery Act of 1534 applied to the British colonies in North America and elsewhere, either inherited directly or used as a basis for local antisodomy legislation; twenty prosecutions are known to have taken place in the American colonies (Eskridge 2002). Around 1623 or 1624 a ship’s master, Richard Cornish, was hanged in Virginia for sodomy with the twenty-nine-year-old cabin boy William Couse (Norton 2008); William Plaine was executed in New Haven in 1646; the same year saw the execution of Jan Creoli, a black man from Manhattan (then the Dutch New Netherland colony), who had had sex with a ten-year-old black boy, who was also condemned to death (Katz 1992). Nicholas Sension of Windsor, Connecticut, was brought before the colony’s General Court on sodomy charges several times from the 1640s to 1677. Despite Sension’s well-known history of propositioning men for sex, offering to pay for sex, and assaulting male servants, the court did not formally charge him for decades, probably due to his high standing in the community (Bronski 2011). In 1677 Sension was convicted of attempted sodomy and sentenced to whipping, public shaming, and having his entire estate “placed in bond for his good behavior” (Bronski 2011, 10).

Following independence, most US states moved away from the death penalty for sodomy, yet between 1610 and 1900, every state had a criminal prohibition against “sodomy,” “carnal knowledge,” or the “infamous crime against nature,” punished by whipping, imprisonment, confiscation of property, and castration (Bronski 2011, 7; Norton 2008). However, until the late nineteenth century, the prosecution of sodomy was rare and usually involved sexual assault. In New York City, there were only twenty-two sodomy cases between 1796 and 1843, increasing first in the 1880s due to efforts to protect children from sexual exploitation and again in the early twentieth century as the public understanding of homosexuality changed from viewing it as an immoral activity to associating it with an immoral type of personality (Donovan 2016). In 1903 New York police charged sixteen men with sodomy following a bathhouse raid; according to surviving records, the subsequent trials resulted in three men being found guilty, one pleading guilty with a recommendation for leniency, and one mistrial—outcomes determined by the defendants’ social status (Donovan 2016). In subsequent years, during Prohibition and the Cold War, there was an increase in the state surveillance of same-sex desire, which frequently corresponded to the lines of social inequality. In the 1940s and 1950s the main targets of sodomy laws in New York City were Puerto Rican and African American men.
One key area of law involved the limits of the US Constitution’s protection of privacy. In the high-profile 1986 case Bowers v. Hardwick, the US Supreme Court upheld a Georgia law outlawing consensual oral and anal sodomy. Justice Byron White (1917–2002), who wrote the majority opinion, asserted there was no constitutional right for “homosexuals to engage in sodomy.” However, as Morris B. Kaplan notes, Justice Harry Blackmun's (1908–1999) dissent shifted the argument from “defining the scope of an individual right of privacy to articulating the grounds and limits of public enforcement of morality in a society committed to individual liberty and moral pluralism” (1997, 21). In 2003 the landmark case Lawrence v. Texas resulted in all remaining sodomy laws in the United States and its territories being declared unconstitutional.

In colonial Latin America, sodomy was often understood as pecado nefando (nefarious sin) or pecado contra natura (sin against nature) and was prosecuted by the Holy Office of the Inquisition and by secular courts. Unlike Brazil, where all sodomy cases were handled by the Portuguese Inquisition, in New Spain sodomy was persecuted by the Inquisition only if it was interpreted as heresy; yet, laypersons would often view all same-sex sexual acts as such heresy (Tortorici 2012). For instance, in 1621 a twenty-year-old mestiza woman named Augustina Ruiz confessed to her priest that she regularly masturbated to sacrilegious fantasies of having sex with the Virgin Mary and other saints. The priest denounced Ruiz to the Inquisition, which sentenced her to spend three years in a Mexico City convent (Tortorici 2012). The earliest known sodomy trial in colonial Mexico dates back to 1542, and all that is known about it is that it was prosecuted by Mexico’s Inquisition and involved sailors (Nesvig 2001). A century later, a huge scandal broke out in 1658 in Mexico City and Puebla, when over 120 alleged “sodomites” were arrested and interrogated, resulting in fourteen young men being burned to death (Nesvig 2001).

In keeping up with metropolitan Holland, same-sex erotic activity was prosecuted in the Dutch colonies. In 1644 in Batavia, the capital of Dutch East Indies (now Jakarta in Indonesia), following a complaint, a wealthy Dutch East India Company employee named Joost Schouten was caught forcing himself upon a young acquaintance. Schouten was arrested, charged, convicted of sodomy, and strangled. His case stands out in history because his high social status and wealth did not help him avoid capital punishment—perhaps because in the colonies sodomy was associated with local Asian traditions and therefore was viewed with an additional colonialist contempt (Murrell 2013). Yet, by the early eighteenth century the approach to sodomy in Dutch colonies had become more varied, and social status mattered again in who would face conviction and who would not. In 1716 at the Cape of Good Hope (now part of South Africa), ship’s master Pieter Berkman was accused of attempted sodomy by two ship’s boys, whose written confessions were used as evidence against him in trial. Berkman denied any sexual misconduct and was acquitted, while the boys were punished by whipping, withholding of wages, and banishment. According to Susie Newton-King (2002), Berkman’s high rank as a Dutch East India Company employee, and the fact that he had never succeeded in sodomizing his accusers, possibly mattered in his acquittal.

By contrast, in a sodomy trial that took place just one year later, five men of equally low social standing faced accusations of consensual sodomy; three were found guilty of the “full performance” and executed by drowning, one was charged with attempted sodomy and punished by severe whipping, and the last one was acquitted (Newton-King 2002). Fellow soldiers reported Adam Vigelaar, a soldier stationed in the Cape bastion, and his four lovers for having sex in the barracks, sometimes during daytime and in the presence of others. Such “flaunting” of Vigelaar's transgressive sexuality, the fact that the acts of anal penetration had been proven by eyewitness testimony, and his lack of social power as a mere soldier all contributed to the guilty verdict and death penalty for two out of his four lovers and himself (Newton-King 2002).

Likewise, transgressive male sexuality was policed at sea. Beginning in 1627, capital punishment for buggery was officially instituted in the British Navy. Barry Richard Burg (1995) argues that, at first, it would usually take more than just buggery itself to instigate prosecution at sea, as surviving seventeenth-century trial records testify. Of the six preserved cases of maritime sodomy trials reviewed by Burg, two involved repeat offenders, Robert Hewitt and Robert Stone, who must have disrupted the ship community by assaulting cabin boys; another one was possibly a revenge attempt by a victim of flogging upon his abuser, the ship minister Richard Kingston; another was the result of a power struggle when pirate Edmund Cook of the Trinity was accused of buggery by another crewman to discredit Cook from taking the ship’s command; another was prompted against Samuel Norman, a ship captain, by a complaint from the alleged victim’s father; and another was a result of a consensual interracial arrangement involving an English boy, John Durrant, and his Hindu lover, Abdul Rhyme. What might have incited Durrant’s captain to prosecute both Durrant and Rhyme, according to Burg, was not the sodomy itself but that Durrant, a white man, allowed a “heathen” to penetrate him (1995, 146). Even so, despite numerous sworn-on-the-Bible eyewitness testimonies provided by Durrant and Rhyme’s crewmates, the mariners were convicted but punished only by whipping and being put on a diet of bread and water—a far cry from the death penalty. Overall, between 1690 and 1900 there were at least 490 sodomy trials in the British Navy (LeJacq 2015).

Present Day

As of April 2018, seventy-four countries maintain laws against homosexuality. About half are former British colonies that carry legislative remnants of the British antisodomy law (Stuart 2018). In Singapore, “gross indecency” laws (Section 377A) are rarely enforced, while in India Section 377 of the criminal code proscribes voluntary “carnal intercourse against the order of nature with any man, woman, or animal,” punishing it by life imprisonment (Thomas 2016). Struck down in 2009 and reinstated in 2013, it was enforced widely until the Supreme Court ruled it could not be used to prosecute same-sex sexual activity in September 2018: in 2015 Indian police arrested 1,491 people under Section 377, including 207 minors and 16 women (Thomas 2016). When not enforced directly, Section 377 promoted homo- and transphobia and was used by police to harass LGBT Indians, especially hijras (third gender) and kothis (effeminate men), and as a justification for conversion therapy (Narrain and Bhan 2005). In Malaysia, Section 377B of the Penal Code punishes sodomy (sex acts between men) by whipping and up to twenty years in prison.

Worth noting is a series of highly publicized and controversial trials of Malaysian politician Anwar Ibrahim (1947–). Anwar was first charged with sodomizing his employees in 1998. Mahathir Mohamad (1925–), then the prime minister of Malaysia, was instrumental in bringing charges against Anwar, who had been previously seen as his anointed successor but had become his critic. The evidence against Anwar included his employees’ statements (later retracted) and DNA collected from the semen stains on his mattress. Despite Anwar's claims of innocence, he was found guilty and sentenced to nine years in prison. Carried out under constant government interference, the trial attracted international criticism, and Anwar was declared a “prisoner of conscience” by Amnesty International. In 2004 all charges against him were dropped, and Anwar was released and immediately became a leader of the national opposition. In 2008, when Anwar was about to challenge the governing coalition in the upcoming elections, his aide accused him of forced sodomizing, later changing the accusation to “homosexual conduct by persuasion.” Anwar’s response was that the complaint was completely fabricated and politically motivated. His second sodomy trial, which started in 2010, resulted in his acquittal in 2012, but then the acquittal was appealed and dropped in 2014, forcing Anwar to return to prison to serve a five-year sentence. In both the 1998 and 2010–2014 trials, Anwar's alleged homosexuality was used against him by his political enemies. Douglas E. Sanders (2009) suggests, however, that Anwar’s prosecutions do not represent the general pattern of Section 377B’s application in Malaysia, because it rarely targets consensual sexual acts taking place in private. In May 2018, after a change of government that brought Mahathir back to power as prime minister, Anwar was released from prison and pardoned. As of June 2018, Mahathir has pledged to hand over his position to Anwar in the future.

SEE ALSO Conquest and Sodomy in Latin America; Inquisition, Criminal Courts, and Sexuality in Colonial Latin America; Offences Against the Person Act (1861); Queen Boat Trials (2001–2002); Scandals in Europe; Section 377 and Section 377A; Section 377 in South Asia; Sodomy Laws in the United States; Treason and Queerness; Wilde Trials, International Significance of

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Arnold, John H. Inquisition and Power: Catharism and the Confessing Subject in Medieval

Archival research on the history of African same-sex sexuality is fraught with a number of challenges related not only to the constitution of the archive itself but also to the lack of standardization of terminology, practices, and identities. In the twenty-first century, research has shifted away from a heavy emphasis on public health studies to a more ethnographic focus on local communities, thus expanding our knowledge of diverse practices and identities and enriching the theoretical and analytic vocabulary that helps us understand local expressions in the African continent and also situate African expression in a broader global framework. New media and technologies have redressed the limited African participation in the production of archival texts, while also providing a more nuanced and expanded approach to the visual, aural, and performance-art data they contain. Indeed, the use of new media and technologies, with their emphasis on nonwritten expression, offers an alternative to the mostly written archive while developing the potential of African oral traditions to create and sustain meaningful ongoing dialogues around queer sexuality led by Africans themselves. New media and technologies have also sought to decenter the archival authority of academics and public health resources and center African agency and performance.

Missionary and Explorer Texts

The earliest texts that might be considered to constitute an archive are those by missionaries and explorers, dating, in greater proliferation, from the late nineteenth century. As a project driven by curiosity about African societies and embedded in colonialism, these early descriptions of African social practices are heavily shaped by emphases on either exoticizing African sexuality or demonstrating how “primitive” it is. Both sides of this binary create challenges for evaluating the value of these data and their effectiveness for constructing a history of queer African sexuality. Perhaps its greatest value is vindicationist; the few and scant references that exist in this literature are useful for challenging claims that same-sex sexuality was introduced by Arab or European foreigners, or that queer formations on the African continent are a relatively recent phenomenon. These accounts, in their focus on describing African societies to a Western audience, and in making their data useful to colonists, were not concerned with a systematic investigation of sexuality, if it figured as a topic of discussion at all. Embedded in these accounts is a construction of African societies as “close to nature,” and thus, from this perspective, African sexuality is oriented exclusively toward reproduction (Hoad 2007; Arnfred 2004; Epprecht 2008). The Christian backgrounds of these missionaries and explorers also shaped their interest in focusing on heterosexuality, and nonheterosexual practices and expressions—if they were remarked on at all—were dismissed as deviant or given little to no attention. Missionary and explorer accounts should not be overburdened with charges of bias, but the salient social constructs that animated their production, and their lack of a systematic method for recording and analyzing African social behavior, problematize their use for a historiography of African same-sex sexuality. Issues surrounding translation pose an additional challenge for the inclusion of these texts in an archive, because most of the literature on the history of same-sex sexualities is written in English and disseminated in a largely Anglophone world; texts produced in French and Portuguese are often ignored or even overlooked in favor of English texts. The result of this nearly English-only process of discursive production leads to the marginalization of non-Anglophone areas in ethnological synthesis and theory building, and it creates a discourse shaped by the values of the English-speaking world. Thus, drawing upon these data in an attempt to deduce queer-related terminologies and local forms of identity constructs would be a nearly impossible task at worst, or impacted by a number of significant limitations, at best.

Unfortunately, for the greater part of the twentieth century anthropologists’ and ethnographers’ references to same-sex sexuality did little to overcome the biases and lack of systematic research by missionaries and explorers (Epprecht 2006). Anthropological accounts that mentioned same-sex sexuality usually made only fleeting references as part of a broader survey of social practices and belief. With a few notable exceptions (Herskovits 1938; Evans-Pritchard 1970), sexuality as a topic in its own right, and certainly queer sexuality as a legitimate variant or a subject of systematic academic inquiry, did not figure into these ethnographic discussions. Driven by dominating disciplinary interests in subjects such as politics, religion, and economics, and influenced by a discourse that African sexuality was exclusively oriented toward reproduction, this archival literature missed opportunities to interrogate a history of terminologies and identities that fell outside the received categories that were the central concern in research projects. Sometimes it missed opportunities to illuminate practices altogether, as in the case of female-female practices that were dismissed as being nonsexual because no penis was involved (Arnfred 2004). Information communicated to anthropologists about expressions of same-sex sexuality were dismissed either as incidental or as temporary expressions of bisexuality (Epprecht 2006), and so this literature did little to uncover a history or establish the sociocultural significance of African queerness. More sustained discussions by anthropologists such as Melville Herskovits (1938), E. E. Evans-Pritchard (1970), and others offer fuller discussion of same-sex sexuality and experiences, but these studies do not place their discussions in a larger framework of sexuality, and they avoid more systematic interrogations into the history or the historical situatedness of these practices.

Several studies focused primarily on southern Africa have drawn upon missionary accounts and other written historical documents such as criminal court records to more explicitly construct a history of same-sex practices in Africa (Epprecht 2002, 2004). The greater research attention paid to same-sex expressions in southern Africa, and the more visible presence (and attendant stigmatization) they have had in a variety of colonial contexts in this region, have made these historiographic efforts compelling in their attempt to offer a historical dimension to local queer communities and identities. These attempts at historical reconstruction are also useful for illuminating a historical background and trajectory to both local terminologies and queer identities in the southern African region. Criminal court records, for example, seem most abundant and illustrative for the southern African region. They reflect the policing of African bodies as European social values came to displace local norms of identity and self-expression. As an archive, these records help illuminate gendered expressions that Europeans found offensive, but also reveal specific sexual practices. However, little attention has been given to carrying out similar types of historical studies elsewhere in Africa.

The notion of African sexuality as exclusively heterosexual is a long-standing construction that the archival research has been slow to resist (Hoad 2007; Johnson 2001; Kiama 1999; Lorway 2006; Epprecht 2004, 2006, 2008; Tamale 2007). While the historical and theoretical literature had regularly written against this, arguably it is only since the 1990s that the ethnographic literature has begun to deconstruct this notion in compelling and fact-based ways. These ethnographic accounts paved the way for same-sex sexuality to be seen as a valuable subject of inquiry in its own right, which not only refined our understanding of African sexuality more generally but also helped to deconstruct the myth of a heterosexual Africa in its more nuanced attention to gender, local specificity, and the cultural meanings attached to various practices and expressions. Increasingly, however, situated ethnographic studies have probed the local sociocultural formations around same-sex sexuality, elucidating local approaches to queer identity formation, social practices, and the extent to which local expressions of sexuality have been influenced by transnational flows (Teunis 1996, 2001; Tucker 2009; Donham 1998; Banks 2011, 2012; Dankwa 2009; Gaudio 2009). These studies rely on participant observations of queer social life and also draw on penetrating life histories of queer Africans.

Life History and Oral History

Life-history research has been an important part of oral history projects that seek to establish subjective understandings of African queer experience, as evidenced in a number of publications that focus on this medium (Gevisser and Cameron 1995; Watson 2010; Epprecht 1999). Oral histories are an important bridge between the archival literature produced by academics and researchers and what is being produced by new media and technologies. Oral histories offer an opportunity for Africans to construct their own narratives and provide useful autobiographical data that are crucial for opening up new modes of constructing the archive and the new forms this construction might take.

Given the earlier dismissal of erotic experiences between women as not constituting sex, it should not be surprising that examinations of same-sex sexuality in the archive have been dominated by a focus on men. This has largely been true for ethnographic accounts, with some notable exceptions (Morgan and Reid 2003; Dankwa 2009; Nkabinde 2008), and this is another area where life histories have played a key role in redressing the comparative silence around female-female sexuality. This archive has also begun to move beyond the gender binary of male/female to explore queer formations that exist in a locally or globally influenced trans framework. The ethnographic archive has also attempted a standardization of queer terminologies, practices, and identities, which enriches the ability to make comparisons across time and space and thus establish a broader historical framework and trajectory for understanding queerness on the African continent.

Public Health Data

A larger body of potentially useful archival data comes from the public health sector, in which the vulnerability of MSM (men who have sex with men but do not necessarily identify as gay) to sexually transmitted diseases is examined in relation to broader social and cultural factors. This literature provides the largest amount of data of same-sex sexuality outside the region of southern Africa, with a number of important studies on populations in West and East African countries (Allman et al. 2007; Attipoe 2004; Binagwaho et al. 2009; Henry et al. 2010; Niang et al. 2003; Sanders et al. 2007; Wade et al. 2005). This public health literature helps to establish an archive of contemporary expressions and individual experiences, though its quantitative data were compiled for research about the health challenges or vulnerability of queer Africans. Indeed, the quantitative focus of many of these studies is unique in the literature on queer Africans and helps to enrich the largely historical or ethnographic accounts of the archive. Yet, although this literature is important for documenting the existence of same-sex experiences, it does not match the expanse of the ethnographic literature in examining sociocultural specificities and cultural practices. With its focus on contemporary social dynamics, it does little to establish a history of same-sex practices on the continent, but it does provide insights and data for ethnological comparison. Dominated by a focus on quantitative data, the limited qualitative interviews that these studies offer do provide some useful information about the specific and local sociocultural dynamics of their research subjects, but a number of challenges arise when public health data are appropriated for developing arguments in the domains of sociology, anthropology, and history.

Stephen O. Murray and Will Roscoe’s Boy Wives/Female Husbands (1998) was a seminal comparative ethnographic survey that synthesized a wide range of archival literature to construct an argument about the long history of same-sex sexuality in Africa. In comparing data from north, west, east, and southern Africa, Murray and Roscoe aimed to dispel the notion that same-sex sexuality did not have a history on the African continent or that it was introduced by foreigners. Relying primarily on a range of missionary and explorer accounts, as well as earlier ethnographic accounts, historical court documents, and forensic analyses, among other written archives, they sought to create a history of queer experience in Africa. This volume, though seminal and useful in its ethnological emphasis, was nonetheless limited by the same shortcomings of the literature that it employed. From its ethnological perspective, however, it was useful in that it attempted to create a broad historiography and move toward illuminating broader theoretical concepts around issues of identity, group formation, and terminology. Ethnographic accounts, while not always discussing the history of the local terms they uncover, have paved an important path to engaging African-language vocabulary around queerness. This is seen by many as an important step toward establishing the autochthony of queer expressions in Africa.

Grassroots efforts on the African continent—such as GALA, an organization formed in 1997 to collect and preserve life stories from the queer African community, especially in South Africa—labor to situate themselves within national mainstream archives and discourses, not only by appropriating human rights discourse but also by inserting themselves in local social, cultural, and linguistic histories. GALA, which in 2007 changed its name to Gay and Lesbian Memory in Action, has the distinction of being the only archive on the African continent devoted to queer issues.

Trans Identities

Constructing a history of trans identities and practices from the archive is an even more challenging task. Practices of gender nonconformity, especially in relation to dress and socially scripted roles and practices, have figured into Europe's civilizing mission in Africa, as James Sweet's (1996) discussion of sanctions on male cross-dressing practices in Congo and Angola reveals. Emic terms such as kojobesia from Ghana (Banks 2012) and 'yan daudu from Nigeria (Gaudio 2009) disclose an archive of the intermediate space between practices and identities, as understood in local contexts. There are limitations to inscribing modern notions of trans identity on these ethnographic discussions and, given the lack of systematic investigation into trans as a category, to drawing upon these discussions to build a comparative framework. Thus, a reconstruction of trans history shares many of the same challenges one encounters when reconstructing the history of queer sexuality. Yet contemporary representations of trans Africans in film (see von Wallström 2016), social media (in particular Twitter and Tumblr), and print (see Morgan et al. 2010) provide new possibilities for archiving trans identities.

We also encounter the issue of subjectivity and personhood and the ways our contemporary understandings of trans personhood, and its intersections with sexuality, differ from the types of expressions in African contexts that we may be compelled to label as trans. William D. Banks’s (2012) discussion of traditional priests in Ghana, Nkunzi Zandile Nkabinde’s (2008) discussion of herself as a lesbian sangoma (a traditional healer), and Graeme Reid and Ruth Morgan’s (2003) broader discussion of the gendered and sexual self-understandings of traditional priests in South Africa reveals how possession by spirits different from the gender of the host priest provides a framework for understanding nonconforming gender practice as well as sexuality identities. Nevertheless, James Lorand Matory’s (1994) study of cross-dressing practices in Yoruba religion reveals that these trans-gendered understandings do not always correlate to a queer sexuality. For example, Nwando Achebe’s (2011) historical discussion of Ahebi Ugbabe, an Igbo woman famous in Nigeria’s colonial history for becoming a king, reveals the limitations of taking Western-based notions of trans identity and deploying them to make sense of local African realities.

Digital Platforms

New media and technologies have opened up the potential for Africans themselves to engage in the construction of an archive, thus decentering an archive constructed exclusively by journalists, academics, and public health researchers. Beyond generalized social media sites such as Facebook, Twitter, and Instagram, more specialized sites such as QZine, Behind the Mask, and Inkanyiso helped to establish a platform for ongoing and dynamic dialogue around issues of same-sex sexuality on the African continent. The immediacy and fluid nature of these electronic sources, their regular updating, and their accessibility and access to a wide range of participants helps to overcome some of the limitations of more academically oriented archives. New media and technologies have added a rich digital component to the written archive, expanding the possibilities for exploring African queer experiences while also overcoming some of the shortcomings of the currently constituted written archive. The digital nature provides a dynamism that the written archive struggles to keep up with, and the greater accessibility and wider reach helps to construct an archive more reflective of a diversity of experience, particularly those of women and trans people. Yet, the ease with which digital platforms can be produced and circulated also means that they can be just as easily abandoned, which is what happened with Behind the Mask, once a significant source of news and discussion of queer issues on the African continent. Digital platforms require people to maintain them, and financial sponsorship through advertising or other means to help pay for costs related to data management and staffing. As platforms become popular and their scope widens, management issues can become even more pressing, leading some to fold after a short time.

Digital platforms such as the West African–based Qzine, an arts and culture online magazine produced by and for queer Africans in Africa and the diaspora, have great potential to initiate and sustain dialogues among Africans around the history of same-sex practices. Michael Owunna, also from a West African perspective, represents another aspect of African agency in creating a digital platform for the dissemination of queer-related African artistic production. Photographers such as Eric Gyamfi, crazinisT artisT, and Zanele Muholi and artist collectives such as FAKA (which combines various visual and aural media into performance art presentations) have helped to expand the representational modes of African queerness and thus have the potential to open up new areas of inquiry and understanding. These digital, performative, and visual platforms provide a means for queer Africans to access a more symbolic realm and to use their engagements to help situate their sexuality within a historical background and trajectory. In drawing on local resources, and in explicitly seeking to interest local populations or perform in local venues, they help create and sustain a dialogue that has great potential for uncovering the autochthony of African same-sex sexuality.

SEE ALSO Anthropology in Africa South of the Sahara; Archives in Asia; Archives in Australia and New Zealand; Archives in Europe; Archives in Latin America; Archives in North America; Colonialism in Africa South of the Sahara; Internet in Africa; Literature, African (Anglophone); Literature, African (Francophone)

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Wade, Abdoulaye Sidibe, Coumba Toure Kane, Pape Amadou Niang Diallo, et al. “HIV

FILMOGRAPHY

What legal records, religious sources, scientific texts, and other archival material reveal about nonnormative genders and sexualities in Asia.

The study of nonnormative genders and sexualities in Asian history requires a more proactive approach than older fields of historical inquiry, especially since primary materials in this field tend not to be organized together in mainstream archives and library collections. In Europe and North America, LGBTQ archives typically developed alongside the growth of LGBTQ activism; in contrast, such social movements have a much shorter history in non-Western regions, such as Africa, Latin America, the Middle East, and Asia. When mining archival collections in these areas not specifically devoted to LGBTQ actors and topics, researchers often have to read against the grain and between the lines. Moreover, a common practice is for historians of queer Asia to build their own archives based on the materials they put together from various collections.

Legal Records

Legal records constitute perhaps the most important genre of archival sources on which historians have relied for this purpose, because these materials are readily available in central, local, and colonial government archives. As in most of the world, legal sources are especially useful for identifying cases of male sodomy charges and, to a lesser extent, certain types of gender transgressive behavior (e.g., cross-dressing). Indeed, sodomy trials throughout world history tend to neglect the spectrum of female same-sex acts altogether. The availability of criminal records, therefore, also means that in the existing scholarship on Asian sexuality, the treatment of lesbian history has been less sustained and more scattered than the history of male homosexuality. At the same time, given the routine reliance on legal sources in the field of queer history in general, this empirical emphasis allows Asia scholars to easily draw comparative insights from scholarship on other regions.

East Asia In places such as Japan and China, where the impact of Western imperialism was uneven, scholars have mined legislative and court records to map broad patterns of change over time in the regulation of male same-sex behavior. The landmark contribution of Gregory Pflugfelder (1999), for example, uncovers the evolving nature of written law regarding male-male sexual acts from Edo-era (1603–1868) to Meiji-era (1868–1912) Japan. By analyzing a wide range of legislation, Pflugfelder shows that lawmakers policed male same-sex desire in a more patchwork fashion during the Edo period, when a disciplinary paradigm of shudō (the “way of youths”) framed male-male sexuality as a “way” (dō) and dominated popular discourses. After the Meiji restoration, however, due to both the newly centralized political framework and the reformulated standards of official morality in Japan’s effort to modernize and Westernize, written law and official discourses assumed an unprecedented degree of uniformity. Pflugfelder calls the new paradigm that dictated the new centrally promulgated law codes civilizing because it construed male same-sex behavior—along with other nonprocreative erotic practices outside the parameters of state-sanctioned marriage—as a “barbarous” vice that threatened the “civilized” norm. For a period in the 1870s and 1880s, criminal codes, for the first time publicly promulgated, proscribed all forms of anal intercourse between men. Whereas the Edo-period disciplinary paradigm emphasized the aesthetic and ethical dimensions of same-sex desire, the Meiji-era civilizing paradigm introduced a nationwide apparatus of surveillance and punishment.

Similarly, Sinologists have combed through legal sources to investigate the origins of sodomy statutes in Qing dynasty China (1644–1912). In his groundbreaking work on late imperial Chinese legal history, Matthew Sommer (2000) utilizes county, provincial, and central archives to map a different kind of transformation in the state regulation of sexuality: from a paradigm centered on status performance to one centered on gender performance. The different registers of archival sources are important because they provide different clues, scales, and advantages for understanding how people’s sex lives were governed. Local archives have survived from very few parts of China, but the one that Sommer draws on extensively in his work—the Ba County archive in Sichuan Province—is a rare holding that is well-preserved. A concentrated look at one region lacks national representation, but these court cases provide valuable raw materials and other supporting documents emerging from a local magistrate’s first encounter with a case. In contrast, when a very serious crime, such as a homicide or a rape, reached Beijing, the format of the report typically takes the form of a memorial with precise conformity to protocol. Highly processed and housed in the central imperial archive, these memorials are normally the outcome of exhaustive investigation and cautiously prepared for the emperor himself. The major advantage of comparing the central archival materials against the local records is that the former provides a more comprehensive outlook that is normally missing in the latter. Although addressing archival sources in China specifically, this discussion can be generalized to apply to archival research in other regions.

Although male sodomy constitutes only one of the many areas Sommer investigates (other areas include the chastity cult and the criminalization of prostitution), his contribution on this particular topic carries wider significance for both Chinese studies and the global history of sexuality. Speaking to scholars of China, Sommer’s legal analysis refutes the long-standing belief that the Manchu conquest introduced a conservative state that suddenly reduced the sexual libertinism evident in the Ming dynasty (1368–1644). Previous scholars have made the biased claim that the Qing government enacted a new interest in prohibiting consensual sodomy when the foreign Manchu conquerors found sexual relations between men offensive (Meijer 1985; Ng 1989; Hinsch 1990). Yet, Sommer’s detailed investigation of the central and local archives reveals that it was not consensual sodomy, but homosexual rape that became the focus of Qing law. The watershed moment came with the establishment of a sub-statute in 1734 detailing the penalties for sodomy offenses. Contrary to earlier interpretations of this legislation as a new interest in sex between men, Sommer considers this instead as an assimilation of sodomy offenses to the previous heterosexual category of “illicit sexual intercourse” (jian). Specifically, through this new legislative construction, lawmakers aimed to remedy the imbalance in which homosexual rape was more severely penalized than heterosexual rape.

South and Southeast Asia If legal cases provide a useful window into the regulation of sexuality in East Asia, they have served as a popular source base for historians of South and Southeast Asia as well. This is particularly salient given the way the British Empire established antisodomy statutes throughout its colonial holdings around the world in the nineteenth century. The most widely studied example is Section 377 of the Indian Penal Code, because its first introduction through the colonial state formed the basis for its subsequent applications in various Asian and African countries. The most oft-cited illustration of Section 377’s mobilization in colonial India is the Allahabad case of Queen Empress v. Khairati (1884). This specific case has prompted scholars of South Asia to push the conventions and limits with which historical inquiries into sexuality gravitate toward the empirical seduction of colonial archives. In her innovative reading of the case, Anjali Arondekar (2009) highlights the paradoxical nature of the way the Khairati case works to magnify the colonial mobilization of Section 377. Due to the lack of evidentiary details concerning the place, time, and persons involved, the Khairati case was ultimately dismissed by the colonial judge. Yet this failed sodomy case repeatedly appeared as an exemplary narrative to illustrate the execution of Section 377 between 1885 and 1920. Arondekar poignantly asks, “How does a case that stumbles over critical issues of evidence, criminality, and legal codification become the colonial trace for crimes against nature?” (2009, 75–76).

The Khairati case and its place in the history of sodomy have enabled scholars to draw connections to the way other colonial sources mediate the relationship between sexuality and its historical understanding. Arondekar highlights the parallel example of colonial anthropology in the work of Richard Burton (1821–1890), the British scholar-explorer best known for his translation of A Thousand and One Nights. In the famous terminal essay on pederasty, Burton mentions a report submitted to the central government in Bombay detailing his observation of pederasty in Karachi, Sindh. But ever since, the contents and location of the report have remained a mystery. Interestingly, subsequent commentators continue to obsess over Burton's lost report, generating what Arondekar calls “a tale of archival losses” (2009, 28). The similarity between Burton’s missing report and the Khairati sodomy case lies in their shared archival status of loss and failure; precisely through their sustained absence, they promise to bring certain archival objects into existence. In both cases, “a missing record of sexuality promises the (impossible) success of colonial intelligence” (Arondekar 2009, 54). The colonial archive, in other words, should not be conceived merely as an organized collection of “factual” information waiting to be accessed and extracted by historians. Scholars such as Arondekar help us to rethink the formative nature of its relationship to the history of sexuality by questioning the convention of retrieval and, above all, the assumed warranty of archival repositories. The most important archival holding for historical research on British colonial India is the Asia, Pacific and Africa Collections (previously called the Oriental and India Office Collections) at the British Library in London.

Although the institutionalization of antisodomy statutes in the British Empire has been a focal point in historical debates over colonial sexuality, various parts of Asia implemented similar written laws put in place by other European regimes. Thus, other colonial archives have been instrumental to unearthing the consequences of these histories. One notable example is Spanish Manila. In the Hispanic colonial record, the earliest instance of a male-male sexual relationship in the Philippines involved a Chinese mandarin from Taiwan named Lousu, who was found guilty of the crime of sodomy and sentenced to death by the Spanish authorities in 1670. Protests from Manila’s Chinese community, the interest of Spanish authorities in Manila to maintain good diplomatic relations with Taiwan, and a petition from Zheng Jing (1642–1681), the “king” of Taiwan, eventually led to the suspension of Lousu’s sentence (Reyes 2012). A quick foray into the Spanish colonial archives will uncover documents referring not only to the Americas, Guam, Maluku, and Indonesia, but also to Thailand, Vietnam, Burma, China, Taiwan, Japan, India, other Pacific Islands, and even Tibet. Another example is the Dutch East India Company (VOC; Verenigde Oostindische Compagnie), whose courts of law conducted at least twenty trials that pronounced the death sentence for acts of sodomy in the Indonesia archipelago (Boomgaard 2012). The VOC archives are preserved largely at the Dutch National Archives (Nationaal Archief) at The Hague.

Religious Sources

The study of queer history through the lens of sodomy has certain limitations. As mentioned previously, queer women’s sexuality tends to be a blind spot in this approach. The fact that antisodomy statutes resulted from European imperial expansion in many parts of Asia already raises a question about the status of nonnormative genders and sexualities in the precolonial era. In order to move beyond these limitations of the colonial archive, scholars interested in the period before modern industrialization often take into consideration other types of evidence alongside a capacious conceptualization of what counts as “legal” sources. For example, two broad categories of Sanskrit literature—śāstra and kāvya--have been especially useful for grasping the proscription of undesirable sex acts (e.g., sex in the wrong places, sex with animals, and erotic practice performed by persons of the "third-nature/sex") in precolonial India (Vanita and Kidwai 2000; Ali 2012). The former constitutes the main textual foundation around which legal traditions in early India cohered; the latter refers to a literary style used by court poets to generate emotional effects. Rekhtī, a genre of Urdu feminist poetry, provides valuable but mediated insight into female homoeroticism in eighteenth- and nineteenth-century urban India (Vanita 2012). Shariʿa law in Muslim Southeast Asia is another poignant example of where law and religion intersect, and although its jurisprudence is a frequent reference for the prohibition of anal penetration, scholars have relied on medical, literary, and other Islamic texts to identify evidence of cross-gender practices and same-sex relations between women (Clarence-Smith 2012).

Relatedly, researchers have mined archival sources that document a variation of religious practice. Anthropologist Michael Peletz (2009) has studied the writings of early European explorers, colonial officials, missionaries, medical personnel, indigenous court attendants, and professional historians and anthropologists, including his own fieldwork in Malaysia since the 1970s, to develop the concept of “gender pluralism” to capture the diversity of gendered ways of being in Southeast Asia since the fifteenth century. One of Peletz’s most important examples concerns the highly esteemed transgender ritual specialists: male-bodied individuals who dressed in female attire when performing rituals associated with royal regalia, births, weddings, and key stages of agricultural cycles. In the early modern period, many Southeast Asian communities accorded these individuals enormous prestige and respect. The best-known are the bissu, a class of ritual specialists among the Bugis of South Sulawesi. Another example is the androgynous sida-sida, a pre-Islamic class of priests or courtiers in the Malay Peninsula. Sinologists, too, have looked at different religious and intellectual institutions to construct a comparably fluid gender spectrum in Chinese culture since the early period. By drawing on the three canonical traditions of China (Buddhist, Classicist/Confucian, and Taoist), Daniel Burton-Rose (2012), for instance, draws attention to a range of practices that he calls “gendered androgyny,” including examples of “nonmales” and “nonfemales” in the early Buddhist communities, the transcendence of gender boundaries in Tibetan Buddhism, the documentation of sex change in Classicist texts, and the pursuit of female generative power among male Inner Alchemists. Many of the sources that inform Burton-Rose’s research have been translated and published in English.

Other Published Sources

In addition to state archives, colonial records, missionary writings, indigenous manuscripts, and legal and religious sources, researchers have utilized other published sources available in specific collections and libraries.
Medical and Scientific Literature An important point of entry into the history of sexuality after Michel Foucault’s ([1990][1976]) seminal contribution to the field are sources related to medical science. Medical and scientific publications, alongside the correspondence of notable sexologists, can be consulted at such places as the New York Academy of Medicine, the Wellcome Library in London, the Kinsey Institute for Research in Sex, Gender, and Reproduction at Indiana University, and the personal papers of sexologists archived primarily at medical school libraries worldwide, from North America to Europe to Australia. The India-based sexologist Alyappin Padmanabha Pillay (1889–1957) served as the editor in chief of the International Journal of Sexology, copies of which can be accessed through the American Interlibrary Loan system and some of the archives mentioned previously. The journal includes significant discussions of homosexuality, transvestism, and other nonnormative expressions of gender and sexuality. Pillay and the journal have thus far been largely ignored by historians of sexual science, but their presence made Bombay the gateway for circulating sexual knowledge between sex experts and lay readers around the world in the mid-twentieth century (Ahlulwalia 2018). Pillay's correspondence with Western sexologists can be found in their respective archival collections. The work of other key figures, such as Agnes Smedley (1892–1950) and R. D. Karve (1882–1953), also positioned South Asia at the center of a global network of sexual science (Botre and Haynes 2018; Fuechtner 2018).

Historians of East Asia have analyzed the transmission of Western sexological ideas about homosexuality, eugenics, transgender practices, and sex education in Japan, Korea, and China since the late nineteenth century. Some scholars emphasize the importance of indigenous linguistic terms and conceptual categorizations for the reception of Western sexology (Kang 2009); other historians argue for a more abrupt epistemological rupture occasioned by the novel sexological paradigms (Dikötter 1995; Robertson 1998; Pflugfelder 1999; Früstück 2003; Chiang 2018). Paying particular attention to the historical conditions of knowledge appropriation and dissemination, critics have also examined the ways in which native writers translated foreign sexological texts to further their own political and cultural agendas (Suzuki 2006; 2015; Guo 2016; David 2018; Hsu 2018). Marie Stopes (1880–1958), Ellen Key (1849–1926), Margaret Sanger (1879–1966), Havelock Ellis (1859–1939), Sigmund Freud (1856–1939), Richard von Krafft-Ebing (1840–1902), Edward Carpenter (1844–1929), and Eugen Steinach (1861–1944) were some of the most popular sexologists whose writings found a ready audience at a time when the Japanese Empire acquired a growing military presence across the Asia Pacific. After World War II, both popular sexology and the medical profession continued to sustain focused discussions of gender and sexual variance (Henry 2017; Welker 2017; McLelland 2018). Sources informing these studies came to light largely through the effort of individual researchers who sought them out and brought them together from scattered collections across East Asia. Most of these archived sources have not been translated into English.

Periodicals and the Popular Press A related genre of sources comes from the periodical press. The historical differential here is that certain East Asian countries, such as China and Japan, have a longer history of the publishing industry than other places. Starting in the early twentieth century, the rise of journalism and the printing press fundamentally altered the character of popular discourse to the extent that magazines, newspapers, journals, tabloid readings, commerce-driven pamphlets, and other mass circulating texts commanded an important intermediary role between professional experts and a growing reading public. The discussion of deviant sexualities in these venues often constitutes a fulcrum of debate about the nature and existence of “civil society” in modern East Asia. Exceptional in Asia is a strong tradition in Japan of preserving and republishing printed materials, including runs of some magazines, such as Hentai shinri (1917–1926; Perverse psychology), which focuses on both criminal and sexual deviances. Some scholars have collected articles and reprinted them, such as the three-volume Senzenki dōsei kanren bunken shūsei (2006; Collection of sources related to homosexuality in the prewar period), which includes materials ranging from late nineteenth-century translations of Krafft-Ebing to newspaper, magazine, and research articles on male and female homosexuality in the 1920s and 1930s.

This trove of primary sources has been immensely valuable for the historical study of queer Asia. For Thailand, Tamara Loos (2012) has utilized the various published accounts (e.g., in Siam Repository and Siam Prophet) about the investigation of Prince Rakronnaret (1791–1848), the thirty-third child of Rama I and second son of the king’s consort, Noi Kaeo, to reconstruct the first legal case in Siam’s history that involved erotic relations between men. For Republican China, Tze-lan Sang (2003), Wenqing Kang (2009), Howard Chiang (2018), and Peter Carroll (2018) have uncovered media coverage unprecedented in scope of stories of male and female same-sex relations and gender transformations in the mainstream and tabloid newspapers. For colonial Korea and Taiwan, Eno Pei-jean Chen (2013) has drawn on press reports to explore the tension between the modernizing impulse of Japanese imperial citizenry and the abiding values of Confucianism as colonized subjects confronted new ideas about free love and same-sex desire. For colonial and postcolonial Singapore, Audrey Yue (2017) has consulted such national dailies as the Straits Times to analyze the changing configurations of transgender embodiment and visibility. For postwar Japan, Mark McLelland has called attention to the development of what he calls the “perverse press” (kasutori or low-grade/pulp), “a source unparalleled in English and probably in any other language in the world” for the study of minority sexualities (2005, 69; see also Ishida, McLelland, and Murakami 2005). Todd Henry (2013) has probed this genre in greater depth to offer a detailed account of the lives of danshō, which he translates as “cross-dressed male sex workers,” in early postwar Japan. In addition, McLelland has studied Japan’s first homophile publication, Adonis, which “predates the founding of America’s ONE and was longer-lived and able to be more graphic in its support for a homosexual subjectivity than its U.S. counterpart” (2005, 94). Adonis was published by the Adonis Organization from 1952 to 1962, totaling sixty-three issues in all. Like the sources in sexual science, accounts of gender nonconformity and queer sexualities in the popular press have been brought to light through the detective work of researchers who proactively looked for them in dispersed library holdings.

Efforts to Preserve the Heritage of Queer Asia

In the late twentieth century, political activism centered on LGBTQ rights began to develop in earnest in various subregions of Asia. Across this vast continent, noteworthy turning points constituted the backdrop for broader social and cultural change as the world prepared for a new millennium: the launch of the Đổi Mới reform policy in Vietnam in 1986; the lifting of martial law in Taiwan in 1987; the Marxist conspiracy arrests in Singapore in 1987; the June Democracy Movement in South Korea in 1987; the Tiananmen Square incident in mainland China in 1989; Akihito’s ascendance to the imperial throne in Japan in 1989; the beginning of economic liberalization under Prime Minister P. V. Narasimha Rao in India in 1991; the Black May protest in Thailand in 1992; and the postcolonial handover of Hong Kong in 1997, to name just a few. It was in this context that academic programs in the study of gender and sexuality began to flourish in East, Southeast, and South Asia. This was followed by conspicuous efforts to preserve the heritage and information related to queer Asian people and their past.

A pioneer program in this regard is the Center for the Study of Sexualities founded at the National Central University in Taoyuan, Taiwan, in 1995. Led by the activist feminist scholar Josephine Ho, this was perhaps the first public educational initiative to advocate for the rights of sexual minorities and the importance of educating the public about stigmatized genders and sexualities in East Asia. Since its inception, the center has collected over 1,000 Chinese publications, 10,000 English publications, and 20,000 media reports and clippings related to gender and sexuality. The center welcomes teachers, students, and scholars to consult the collection for research. In 2003, with a grant from Taiwan’s Ministry of Education, the center created a website in Chinese called Database for Core Education in Gender. Freely accessible, the website includes a wide range of materials to aid the teaching and researching of feminist/queer studies. In 1995 a similar research center, more oriented toward the social sciences, was established by the sociologist Suiming Pan in mainland China: the Institute for Research on Sexuality and Gender. The institute falls under the aegis of the School of Sociology and Population Studies at Renmin University of China in Beijing.

Similar digital archives have been established for the study of South Asian, Thai, and Korean queer histories and cultures. The South Asian American Digital Archive contains materials related to the history of the South Asian Lesbian and Gay Association, dating back to the mid-1990s. Established in 1986 in San Francisco, the nonprofit organization Trikone for LGBTQ people of South Asian descent published its own newsletter until 2014. Trikone targets people who trace their ethnicity to one of the following places: Afghanistan, Bangladesh, Bhutan, India, the Maldives, Myanmar (Burma), Nepal, Pakistan, Sri Lanka, and Tibet. A digital archive of past issues of Trikone magazine is available online. Funded by a grant from the British Library’s Endangered Library Programme, the Thai Rainbow Archive was developed in conjunction with the Thai Queer Resource Center (an initiative led by the scholar Peter Jackson) between 2004 and 2010. The Korea Queer Archive was established in 2002 by the Korean Sexual-Minority Culture and Rights Center (KSCRC) with the goal of collecting queer-related books and documents. In 2006 it started collecting visual materials as well. In the second half of 2008, the Korea Queer Archive applied for funding from the Beautiful Foundation and received it in January 2009 to become independent. From 2009 to 2013, it was maintained as a project of KSCRC. In 2014 it became affiliated with the nonprofit Beyond the Rainbow Foundation. As of 2018, there are over 8,000 items in the archive. Inspired by LGBTQ archives in the West, all of these collections have aimed to digitize and preserve materials related to the LGBTQ experience in an increasingly diversified Asia.

A unique catalog has existed for scholars of queer Japan since at least the early 2000s. At the time, the scholar Masami Yajima amassed an impressive collection of articles and publications, including partial and complete runs of magazines, related to homosexuality and transgenderism in postwar Japan. His graduate students later compiled them into a list and published it as an in-house research report titled List of Articles on the Social History of Transgenderism/Homosexual in Postwar Japan (Iseisou doseiai shoshi meroku) in 2004. Yajima’s collection became housed at his home institution, the Institute of Social Sciences at Chuo University in Tokyo, Japan. One of Yajima’s students later took the collection with her and moved it to Wako University, also in Tokyo. This particular archive has been instrumental to subsequent scholarly research on postwar Japanese queer culture and history.

Finally, the idea of the archive itself may well be under duress, given the shifting forms within which materials are being recorded and retained and the global trends toward digitization. Rather than rendering the process of archive making as something that happens in the past, digitalization provides new sets of rules around queer knowledge formation and, by extension, new ways of making the past meaningful to the present.

SEE ALSO [Archives in Africa]; [Archives in Australia and New Zealand]; [Archives in Europe]; [Archives in Latin America]; [Archives in North America]

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Database for Core Education in Gender. Center for the Study of Sexualities, National Central University, Taoyuan, Taiwan. http://sex.ncu.edu.tw/course/index.htm

Korea Queer Archive. http://www.queerarchive.org

Thai Rainbow Archive. http://thairainbowarchive.anu.edu.au

Archives in Australia and New Zealand

GRAHAM WILLETT
Honorary Fellow, School of Historical and Philosophical Studies
University of Melbourne, Australia

Description and management of LGBTQI archives in Australia and New Zealand.

Australia and New Zealand both have archives that collect and preserve materials related to the history of their LGBTQI communities. They have a great deal in common, reflecting the broader similarities in the two countries' histories, politics, and cultures. The Australian Lesbian and Gay Archives (ALGA) and the Lesbian and Gay Archives of New Zealand Te Pūranga Takatāpui o Aotearoa (LAGANZ) have their origins in the late 1970s, when they were established by activists concerned that the histories of the movements were being forgotten and the materials in which those histories were embedded were being lost. In New Zealand the need to protect and preserve such materials was driven home forcefully by a 1986 arson attack on the community center where the collection was held.

They were, and remain, independent community-based organizations where volunteers play an important part in administration and collection management. ALGA is registered under state law, and its affairs are managed by a committee elected at the annual general meeting of members. It is located in Melbourne, Australia’s second-largest city, because that is where Graham Carbery, its founder, happened to live. After the fire-bombing attack in 1986, LAGANZ’s ownership was vested in a trust that owns the collection, and an agreement was signed with the Alexander Turnbull Library (the New Zealand national library) in Wellington. The library houses the collection and provides support in the form of curators dedicated (part time) to managing it and making it accessible to researchers.

Both collections have a national focus and few restrictions on the type of materials preserved, which include movement and community newspapers, magazines and newsletters, badges, T-shirts, posters, ephemera, banners, photographs, newspaper clippings, scrapbooks, audiovisual material, and papers of individuals, organizations, and campaigns. Equally, both collections are much broader and more inclusive than their names might suggest, encompassing the diverse range of identities—including lesbian and gay, bisexual, queer, trans, and intersex—that have emerged in the decades since the archives' formations, and also materials relating to HIV/AIDS, indigenous sexualities, and subjects stretching back to the period prior to the emergence of contemporary identities. Their national significance is widely recognized and has been formally acknowledged.
The ALGA and LAGANZ collections far exceed those of the national (and in Australia, state) archives and libraries. Legal deposit requirements in both countries mean that copies of all published material ought to be provided by publishers to national and state libraries, but with small community publications this is not always adhered to, and even when it is, the larger institutions often do not have their finger on the pulse of developments. In 2000, after the publisher of many of Australia's LGBTQI community papers went bankrupt, replacement papers were reestablished independently in most states; the state libraries were unaware of this development, whereas ALGA knew about it and could initiate immediately the collection of the new titles. That said, the state and, in both countries, the national libraries, do have collections of LGBTQI books, periodicals, and personal papers, as do some university libraries. ALGA and LAGANZ see themselves as central players in a distributed network of collections. Court and police records are housed in the national and Australian state archives, though deposit practices have been patchy and extended periods of closure (up to 100 years) apply.

Like all community- and volunteer-based organizations, ALGA and LAGANZ face the challenge of generational renewal, though the changing composition of their management committees indicates some success in negotiating this challenge. The problem of the ever-expanding size of the collections is more of an issue for ALGA, which needs to negotiate its own premises, than for LAGANZ, which is housed in the national library. Ironically, the more the wider community becomes aware of the importance of queer history, the more demands are placed on the collections and their volunteers, stretching personnel resources. They face, too, the challenge of collecting and preserving digital materials.

While these collections are national in scope and unquestionably the most complete, there are smaller collections, too. In Australia, the Gay and Lesbian Archives of Western Australia (a continent’s distance away from Melbourne) maintains an on-again, off-again existence, though it is housed safely in the library of Murdoch University. The Sydney-based Pride History Group, while not an archive per se, has been collecting and preserving oral histories since 2003 and has a collection of well over one hundred interviews. The New Zealand website PrideNZ.com is a community website that preserves over seven hundred audio recordings of interviews and events. The Melbourne-based but nationally focused Women’s Liberation and Lesbian Feminist Archive is now housed with the University of Melbourne Archives. In Auckland, the Charlotte Museum collects and preserves artifacts of lesbian culture and history. In 2006 a project funded by the state library and the state museum to identify holdings in Victoria relevant to LGBT history published a report that revealed the scope of holdings in public, private, and community hands; it also was an important contribution to the methodology of identifying such materials (Davison 2006).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

For most of the twentieth century, Europe has been home to archives dedicated to preserving the history of same-sex-desiring and gender-nonconforming people. Although early initiatives ended with the Nazi rise to power in Germany in 1933 and the outbreak of World War II in 1939, individuals and activist groups began to rebuild archives and libraries after 1945. Many of these archives developed out of LGBTQ rights movements, which dramatically expanded in western Europe during the 1970s and 1980s and in former socialist countries in the 1990s. While in some countries these archives have faced ongoing homophobia and governmental neglect, in other locations archives have found success working with both state institutions and nongovernmental institutions. Nevertheless, questions remain about how to retain the political importance of these archives and represent diverse experiences while securing institutional and government support.

Early Archival Work

The first archives in Europe specifically dedicated to documenting the lives of same-sex-desiring and gender-nonconforming individuals were created during the early twentieth century. In 1912 Jacob Schorer (1866–1957) founded the Nederlandsch Wetenschappelijk Humanitair Komitee (NWHK; Dutch Scientific Humanitarian Committee) to work toward the legal and social equality of same-sex-desiring men and women. Part of Schorer’s campaign was educational, and with this goal he constructed a library consisting of eighteen hundred books, as well as periodicals, pertaining to the scientific and literary study of homosexuality (van der Wel 2011). In 1919 Magnus Hirschfeld (1868–1935), who founded the Wissenschaftlich-humanitäres Komitee (WhK; Scientific-Humanitarian Committee) in 1897, established a similar library at his Institut für Sexualwissenschaft (Institute for Sexual Science) in Berlin. By 1933 the Institut für Sexualwissenschaft had established a library of approximately forty thousand books, as well as an archive of scholarly, medical, and erotic texts (Dose and Herrn 2006).

Both of these libraries served important political and scholarly functions during the interwar period; however, both were relatively short-lived. Hirschfeld’s library was one of the first targets of the Nazi regime, destroyed in May 1933. Although Hirschfeld attempted to reestablish the institute in Paris, he was largely unsuccessful (Dose and Herrn 2006). In 1940, following the Nazi invasion of the Netherlands, Schorer dissolved his organization and destroyed his records and all correspondence. Shortly thereafter, the Germans confiscated his library (van der Wel 2011).

Reconstruction and Activism (1945–1990)

Neither the NWHK nor the WhK was successfully reestablished after World War II (1939–1945). Although they lent their names to several short-lived successor groups, some of their holdings were permanently lost. The period between 1945 and 1970 was marked by social and legal repression of homosexuality in most European countries, making it difficult to form organizations or develop permanent archival collections. Nevertheless, in the years immediately following World War II, initiatives were formed that would establish archives dedicated to the study of same-sex desire and gender nonconformity.

Jaap van Leeuwen (1892–1978), who in 1946 helped found the Dutch Cultuur en Ontspanningcentrum (COC; Center for Culture and Leisure), took on the task of recreating Schorer's library. Although van Leeuwen succeeded only partially, he also managed to develop a large private document collection before his death in 1978 (IHLIA LGBT Heritage 2018). Similarly, relative legal freedom in Scandinavia allowed for the formation of the Kredsen af 1948 (Circle of 1948), Denmark's first gay rights organization, which established independent branches in Sweden and Norway several years later. While no formal archive was established at that moment, the personal documents of its chairpersons and the organization's own files dating back to the 1960s formed the foundation for later archival work (Edelberg 2015).

With the swell of gay rights activism in the early 1970s came the establishment of further archives that were often affiliated with activist groups. Lesbian women led much of this work, which, some have argued, may have been a result of a general invisibility of same-sex–desiring women in the historical record (Leszkowicz 2017). Because of this trend, many of these archives were affiliated with both gay rights organizations and feminist organizations. In 1973 members of the women's group of Homosexuelle Aktion Westberlin (Homosexual Action West Berlin) founded the Spinnboden Lesbenarchiv und Bibliothek (Spinnboden Lesbian Archive and Library). Two years later, the Feminist Library in London was founded, which deliberately included in its collections materials on lesbian women (Brown 2011).

The simultaneous emergence of gay and lesbian studies initiatives prompted a group of students at the universities of Amsterdam and Utrecht in 1978 to establish Homodok, a documentation center dedicated to collecting academic works relating to homosexuality. As the group professionalized, Homodok expanded to include the archiving of personal documents and nonacademic publications, and it became home to both the Van Leeuwen Library and the COC library (van der Wel 2018).

Activist-driven lesbian archival work continued in the early 1980s. In 1982 both the Lesbian Archives Amsterdam and the Lesbian Archives Leeuwarden were created in the Netherlands (van der Wel 2011). The following year, the Centre des Archives, Recherches, Cultures lesbiennes (Center of Lesbian Archives, Research, and Cultures) was founded in Paris. Initially held in a private apartment, the archive was established by a group of volunteers to resist not only the invisibilization of same-sex-desiring women in the written record but also the depoliticization of the movement following the Socialist Party’s accession to power in 1981 (Archives, Recherches, Cultures Lesbiennes 2018). In 1983 STICHWORT, Archiv der Frauen und Lesbenwegung (STICHWORT, Archive of the Women’s and Lesbian Movement) was created in Vienna, and in 1984 the London Lesbian Archive was created (Brown 2011; Glasgow Women’s Library 2018).

Although the appearance of HIV/AIDS in western Europe forced many back into the closet, making it difficult for some archives to acquire personal documents, the 1980s nevertheless was an important decade in the expansion of LGBTQ archives (Edelberg 2015). In 1980 Kredsen af 1948, which by then had changed its name to Forbundet af 1948 (League of 1948), began the process of establishing an official archive, having just purchased a house in the center of Copenhagen. Central to creating the archive were the founder of Forbundet af 1948, Axel Axgil (1915–2011), and his partner Eigil Axgil (1922–1995), who together with a group of volunteers began the slow process of collecting personal collections from past chairpersons and others with interesting documents (Edelberg 2015). In 1983 the archive was opened for public use.

The following year, Andreas Sternweiler (1957–), Wolfgang Theis (1948–), and Manfred Baumgardt (1947–) convinced the director of the Berlin Museum to hold the exhibition El Dorado: Geschichte, Alltag und Kultur homosexueller Frauen und Männer (El Dorado: History, everyday life, and culture of homosexual women and men). The exhibit was developed in collaboration with a group of lesbian activists and drew approximately 40,000 visitors. Its success highlighted the need for a separate museum, which led to the foundation in 1985 of the Schwules Museum* (Gay museum) and accompanying archive in Berlin (Schwules Museum* 2018).

Initiatives in Eastern Europe (1987–2018)

Although formal LGBTQ archives were established in eastern Europe only after the collapse of Communist governments, the initiatives on which the Slovenian Lezbična Knjižnica (Lesbian Library and Archive) was predicated were already underway prior to 1989. In 1987 Društvo Študentski Kulturni–Lezbična Lilit (Student Cultural Association–Lesbian Lilith), the first lesbian group in Yugoslavia, was founded, and it established the Lezbična Knjižnica in 2001 (Brown 2011).
During the 1990s several other activist groups established archives in former socialist countries. In 1995 the first LGBTQ organization in Hungary, the Háttér Társaság (Background Society, commonly referred to in English as the Háttér Society) was created in Budapest; from the beginning it collected and archived documents primarily relating to LGBTQ life in Hungary, but it currently also holds documents in other languages, including English, German, and French. In 1999 the Labrisz Leszbikus Egyesület (Labrisz Lesbian Association) was established in Budapest; it collects documents on the lives of lesbian and bisexual women in Hungary. Late in the first decade of the twenty-first century, one of the founders of the association, Mária Takács (1973–), launched an oral history project to collect the life stories of lesbian women living under socialism, resulting in the 2009 documentary Eltitkolt éVek (Secret years), released in 2011 on DVD with subtitles in eleven languages (Nagy and Borgos 2017).

Other eastern European LGBTQ archives established in the 1990s have operated on less stable footing due in large part to financial constraints that have been exacerbated by anti-LGBTQ political and social attitudes. OLA-Archiwum (OLA–Archives Association) in Warsaw was founded in 1996 as an information center, library, and archive for and about lesbian women. Like many LGBTQ archives across Europe, it has depended on volunteer work; however, in contrast to institutions such as the Schwules Museum* and Homodok, the OLAArchiwum has struggled to remain open (Leszkowicz 2017). Following the 1993 decriminalization of homosexuality in Russia, scholars Elena Gusiatinskaya and Viktor Oboin created an LGBTQ archive in Moscow, located in Gusiatinskaya's apartment. In 2000 Oboin chose to donate his portion of the collection to Homodok because of lack of stable finances and location, while Gusiatinskaya chose to keep her collection in Moscow and has since digitized most of the archive (Leszkowicz 2017).

Artists in former socialist countries have also been integral to the work of recovering the lives of same-sex–desiring and gender-nonconforming people. In 2013 Russian American Jewish emigré artist Yevgeniy Fiks (1972–) exhibited a series of paintings titled Pleshkas of the Revolution, representing Soviet-era cruising cottages, and published a photo book, Moscow, showing gay cruising sites in that city. In 2015 Jaanus Samma (1982–) represented Estonia at the Venice Biennale with a research-based multimedia installation, Not Suitable for Work: A Chairman’s Tale, inspired by the life of Juhan Ojaste (1921–1990), a war hero and chairman of several collective farms who was sentenced to one and a half years of hard labor for homosexual acts in 1964. Also in 2015 Polish artist Karol Radziszewski (1980–) set up the Queer Archives Institute, dedicated to the collection, exhibition, and artistic interpretation of central and eastern European queer archives (Leszkowicz 2017).

Institutions and Alternatives

Since the 1990s many state-funded museums and archives have become increasingly interested in collecting materials related to LGBTQ themes. This has resulted in a wide range of collaborations, with some activist-driven archives donating their collections to state-funded institutions, and other state institutions developing their own initiatives to collect LGBTQ-related documents. One of these first initiatives began in Lyon in 1992 when the collector Michel Chomarat (1947–) donated a collection of ancient and modern texts and ephemera on homosexuality to the Bibliothèque municipale de Lyon (Municipal library of Lyon). In 2005 a municipal project was announced to create a gay and lesbian documentary center at the archive, involving a city-financed librarian post and the consolidation of LGBTQ-related documents into what is commonly called “Le Point G” (Bibliothèque municipale de Lyon 2018). In 1998 the library of l’Arxiu Nacional de Catalunya (National Archive of Catalonia) in Barcelona acquired a collection of books and magazines from the history of the Front d’Alliberament Gai de Catalunya (Gay Liberation Front Catalonia) and the Barcelona LGBTI center Casal Lambda. Between 2005 and 2006, the library cataloged a total of two thousand registers, making it one of the largest concentrations of documents relating to homosexuality in Spain (“La catalogació” 2007). In 2002, as a result of the initiative of queer researcher Tuula Juvonen, the government-funded Työväen Arkisto (Labor Archive) of the Social Democratic Party of Finland began collecting materials from Finnish LGBT organizations and private individuals. Työväen Arkisto expanded this work in 2005, collaborating with the LGBT rights organization Seksuaalinen Tasavertaisuus (Sexual Equality, or Seta) to collect LGBT oral histories (Taavetti 2016).

In addition, some formerly independent archives have chosen to donate their collections to nongovernmental or state-funded museums and archives, often due to a lack of financial resources. In 1995 the London Lesbian Archive moved to the Glasgow Women’s Library, an activist-driven archive founded in 1991 that has secured UK accreditation as well as funding from the Scottish government (Glasgow Women’s Library 2018). In 2007, due to a financial crisis, Forbundet af 1948 donated its archive to the Danish State Archives (Edelberg 2015). The following year, the activistled Irish Queer Archive, which developed out of the holdings of the National Gay and Lesbian Federation in the late 1970s, donated its collections to the National Library of Ireland (Madden 2013).

Although there has been debate about the impact of housing LGBTQ archives in non-LGBTQ spaces, the institutionalization of activist-driven initiatives has not always resulted in their depoliticization. In 2000 activists and artists Ajamu X and Topher Campbell launched the rukus! Federation in London to exhibit the work of black LGBT artists, who had often been marginalized in UK queer spaces. In 2004 the idea for an archive was formulated, and in 2005 the archive was launched and donated to the London Metropolitan Archives, which was chosen because its experience housing collections pertaining to the lives of both black and queer people in the United Kingdom suggested that it would preserve the political messaging of the rukus! archive (Ajamu X et al. 2009).

Some archives born out of the initiatives of the 1970s and 1980s have remained independent. The Schwules Museum* and Spinnboden in Berlin and STICHWORT in Vienna have remained open with the help of private, nongovernmental organization and state funding, as well as the work of volunteers. In 1999 Homodok, the Lesbian Archives Amsterdam, and the Anna Blaman Huis (the successor to the Lesbian Archives Leeuwarden) merged to establish the Internationaal Homo/Lesbisch Informatie-centrum en Archief (IHLIA; International Homo/Lesbian Information Center and Archive). IHLIA has since become a leader in queer European historical work, working with organizations such as Háttrét Társaság to develop a collection dedicated to preserving the history of same-sex-desiring and gender-nonconforming people across Europe (Nagy and Borgos 2017).

SEE ALSO Archives in Africa; Archives in Asia; Archives in Australia and New Zealand; Archives in Latin America; Archives in North America

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Bibliothèque municipale de Lyon. “Le centre de ressources sur le Genre: le Point G.” https://www.bm-lyon.fr/nos-blogs/le-centre-de-ressources-sur-le-genre-le-point-g/

FILMOGRAPHY

LGBT documentation centers and archives in Latin America are a recent phenomenon, and they are most commonly found in countries with older, more established political movements. Although they contain information about the history of people with a variety of sexual and gender identities, gay men tend to be overrepresented in most Latin American archival collections. For the most part, these repositories of LGBT documentation focus on the history of activism since the 1970s, but some do contain materials from earlier periods. In Argentina, for example, the Comunidad Homosexual Argentina (Argentine Homosexual Community) and the Sociedad de Integración Gay Lésbica Argentina (Argentine Society for Gay and Lesbian Integration) have documentation of the gay movement since the 1980s. A documentary center of left-wing politics, the Centro de Documentación e Investigación de la Cultura de Izquierdas (Center for Documentation and Research on Left-Wing Culture), has preserved one of the largest collections of LGBT political materials from the 1960s to the 1980s. In Mexico, the Centro Académico de la Memoria de Nuestra América (Academic Center for the Memory of Our America), which is part of the Universidad Autónoma de la Ciudad de México, contains the collections that originally belonged to other archives created by LGBT groups, such as the Centro de Documentación y Archivo Histórico Lésbico “Nancy Cárdenas” (Nancy Cárdenas Center for Documentation and Historical Lesbian Archive), and the documentation from the Colectivo Sol (Sun Collective), a human rights group that focuses primarily on issues related to sexual diversity. For Mexico, there is also a CD-ROM by the Centro de Información y Documentación de las Homosexualidades en México (Information and Documentation Center on Homosexualities in Mexico), which contains references to information for the period from 1978 to 1982. The work of Norma Mogrovejo (2000) offers invaluable information for locating materials related to lesbian identity and history in recent decades throughout Latin America. To study Brazil, scholars should consult the Acervo do Grupo Identidade (Identity Group Collection) at the Archivo Edgard Leuenroth (Edgard Leuenroth Archive) (1998–2015) located at the Universidade Estadual de Campinas. Contacting the organization Grupo Gay da Bahia (Gay Group of Bahia) and its founder, Luiz Mott (1946–), may be useful for those studying the early years of the Brazilian LGBT movement, and much of Mott’s own scholarship focuses on sodomy and “homosexuality” in colonial Brazil and early modern Portugal. In Chile, the Centro de Documentación Luis Gauthier (Luis Gauthier Documentation Center), hosted by the Movimiento por la Diversidad Sexual (Movement for Sexual Diversity), has preserved a large body of materials from the movement in that country.

Fortunately for activists and researchers, a growing number of publications and materials from the Latin American LGBT movement are available online. For the 1970s and 1980s digital copies of the Brazilian journal O lamplião da esquina (The lamp on the corner) and the Argentine Somos (We are) are available online. For more recent online documentation, there are also the examples of the Archivo Histórico Lésbico “Ilse Fuskova” (“Ilse Fuskova” Lesbian Historical Archive), created by Potencia Tortillera in Argentina, and the Chilean Movimiento de Integración y Liberación Homosexual (Movement for Homosexual Integration and Liberation). Although information about transgender identities exists in all the above-mentioned centers of documentation, it is relatively scarce. Some efforts have been made to compensate for this archival absence. Transgender activists have produced their own records, including publications and statistics, such as the Archivo de la Memoria Trans (Trans Memory Archive) in Argentina, and books such as Cumbia, copeteo y lágrimas: Informe nacional sobre la situación de las travestis, transexuales y transgéneros (2015; Cumbia, drinking, and tears: National report on the situation of travestis, transsexual, and transgender people), as well as the magazine El teje (The weave). The Museo Travesti del Perú (Travesti Museum of Peru) also offers an opportunity to explore the history of trans politics and identities in the Andes.

The study of LGBT pasts requires a more proactive search for information than do older fields of historical inquiry, especially given the infrequency with which these histories are collected in mainstream historical archives (although there are ample police records throughout Latin America, from the colonial period to the present, dealing with “homosexuality” and same-sex eroticism). Evidence is also available in less institutionalized settings. For instance, LGBT organizations in Latin America have preserved historical materials that are not available in other extant archives. In addition, oral history is especially relevant now that many of the early LGBT activists are aging and are well past their sixties. Some records of Latin American LGBT movements, especially international correspondence and private papers, were preserved outside the region and are available in the United States. A number of North American LGBT activists cultivated active relationships with people from the entire region, including countries other than Brazil, Mexico, and Argentina. Some examples of the institutions holding the resulting documents include the Division of Rare and Manuscript Collections at Cornell University Library, the Lesbian and Gay Liberation Collection at Yale University Library, ONE National Gay and Lesbian Archives at the University of Southern California Libraries, and the GLBT Historical Society in San Francisco (each of which have ample documentation on LGBT histories in twentieth-century Latin America and among diasporic communities in the United States). North American sources on the Latin American LGBT movement have been published since the 1970s, especially by the Advocate, Gay Sunshine Press, and the Canadian Pink Triangle Press and its magazine, The Body Politic, which contains news from activists in Latin America. There are also a number of specialized online digital services offered by university libraries where scholars can search for most of the English-language publications referring to Latin America. For twenty-first-century materials, a reader on LGBT rights edited by Javier Corrales and Mario Pecheny (2010) compiled some of the important writings of activists from areas as varied as the Andean region, the Caribbean, Central America, and smaller countries such as Paraguay.

When studying topics other than LGBT activism, and especially in the case of periods before the 1960s, there is little to no information at LGBT-specific archives. Scholars interested in the history of the multiple sexual/gender identities that existed in Latin America from colonial times to the 1960s have tended to seek evidence in mainstream historical archives and libraries, analyzing the sources against the grain to tease out LGBT histories. One of the main methodological challenges in mining traditional archives, however, is that in most archives the materials related to gender and sexuality have seldom been classified in ways relevant to contemporary LGBT categories and terms of research. Instead, archival materials were usually classified according to the bureaucratic needs of the institutions to which they belonged, which can make it challenging to find information relevant to academic research questions in the twenty-first century. Scholars in the United States and in Europe have sometimes had a strong impact on how materials in archives are classified and even relabeled to facilitate their work. Although the situation has improved significantly in the last few decades, especially in the case of Brazil and Mexico, most Latin American states often lack the resources to develop a reclassification that can better assist scholars studying the history of gender and sexuality. Some institutions, such as the Archivo Nacional de la Memoria (National Archive of Remembrance) in Argentina, have often tried to organize their documentation around themes relevant to activists and scholars today. These institutions often have a separate category for LGBT documentation, but other efforts are still needed in the region. Owing to this challenge, researching LGBT issues requires an understanding of the history of the institutions that preserved records, as well as networking and engagement with individuals (and archivists) who might facilitate access to the evidence. International scholars expecting to arrive in the region and find one established archive where they can locate all the information for their research through daily work in the same space will find that they must take advantage of a wider range of available resources. The information tends to be dispersed among numerous state institutions, libraries, private collections, and other grassroots sites that are usually known only by small groups of people—usually a mix of academics and activists who are invested in the world of politics, social movements, or the arts.
Availability of Information by Period

Information about colonial times is often better preserved, organized, and classified than is the case for other periods, yet such materials are complicated by the fact that "homosexuality" itself is a nineteenth-century invention. Information on criminal and Inquisition trials dealing with sodomy are, for example, available in Mexico’s national archive—the Archivo General de la Nación (General National Archive)—and its files can be searched in an online electronic database, the Guía General (General Guide). The Inquisition and criminal courts produced similar records for Cartagena and Lima, but they have not been so well preserved. Inquisitorial visitations to other parts of Latin America, especially colonial Brazil, also left their documentary mark but to a lesser extent (and all the sodomy cases from colonial Brazil are found in the files of the Portuguese Inquisition in Lisboan archives). Inquisition records and other colonial documentation for the whole region are also available at the Archivo Histórico Nacional (National Historical Archive) in Madrid; at the Archivo General de Indias (General Archive of the Indies) in Seville, Spain; and in the Arquivo Nacional da Torre do Tombo (National Archive of Torre do Tombo) in Lisbon, Portugal. While many of the files from these institutions are digitized and accessible online, there is still much work to be done in terms of digitization and hosting. The national archives and libraries of several countries have also preserved colonial and early national materials, which include evidence related to cross-dressing, transgender issues, bigamy, and sodomy. Historical evidence about same-sex sexuality or alternative gender/sexual identities for the colonial period is also available at the regional church records (which may require an authorization by the bishop) and episcopal archives of the church, such as the Archivo Histórico del Arzobispado de la Habana (Historical Archive of the Archbishopric of Havana) in Havana, Cuba. These kinds of religious archives may contain materials portraying sexual morality as understood by bishops and other ecclesiastical officials in charge of evangelizing the native population.

A large body of information written for the most part by Spanish chroniclers but in some cases also by native writers (see, e.g., Garcilaso de la Vega [1539–1616], also known as El Inca, for colonial Peru), refers to transgender identities, indigenous “sodomy,” and other forms of sex between people of the same gender. The various categories of sins and crimes existing in colonial times have been discussed at length in the current historiography, and a consideration of these categories is crucial for scholars who search for information in colonial published texts and archival materials. Searching for modern terms such as transsexuality, bisexuality, or homosexuality will offer no results, as these were terms unknown in the colonial era. Instead, scholars who are aware of the vocabulary used during the period they study can benefit from digitally available chronicles in which word search is possible, and they will also be able to better navigate physical archives. Examples of the vocabulary used include sodomía (sodomy), the pecado nefando (the “nefarious sin” of sodomy), and the pecados contra natura (the “sins against nature” of sodomy, bestiality,
As the turbulent national period begins with the wars of independence, finding materials becomes more difficult, and at times impossible. Independence wars in the 1810s to 1820s and prolonged civil wars and foreign occupations since the 1820s were not the most conducive for the preservation of records. The Chilean invasion of Peru in 1881, for instance, led to a significant loss of Inquisition records in Lima. The period between 1810 and 1880 is one of the harder ones to explore any issue related to sexuality. In fact, this is probably the least studied period in the LGBT history of Latin America. Some countries continued to have relatively stable judicial records during this period, and information can be found on some sodomy trials from throughout the nineteenth century (as is the case in Mexico). Materials related to regional wars may be available at some of the army archives, perhaps including useful information about sex between men, but no scholar has attempted to find such materials through that channel for the period before 1880. Army archives are among the few that have kept records for this period, and it is possible that many of them contain files depicting the lives of men who had sex with other men. This is especially the case because armies have usually kept internal codes that punished homosexuality even in countries where penal codes lacked any criminalization of sex between men—all of which greatly complicates the archival terrain of LGBT sexuality in Latin America.

Starting in the late nineteenth century, materials about LGBT themes became more abundant again. As the number of wars decreased in most of Latin America, the consolidation of nation-states led to the creation of institutions of social control that produced a large body of data regarding "sexual deviancy." This is especially the case with the rise of modern medicine, criminology, anthropometrics, pedagogy, and other disciplines interested in exploring the consequences of what professionals and state officials understood as "sexual pathology." For this period, the materials published by some of the rising liberal professions are particularly useful. Most of the publications by medical examiners, criminologists, psychiatrists, and related professionals are available in the libraries of colleges of medicine and law within the largest universities, and medical archives abound throughout Latin America (although they may not necessarily be open to researchers). These libraries often bought books and academic journals not only from their countries but from all over the Americas and Europe. Academic networks of knowledge in Latin America became more interconnected in this period, and journals often published materials from other countries. This means, for example, that it is possible to find articles about sexuality in Peru or Brazil published in Mexican or Argentine journals. During the twentieth century, many university libraries developed a sophisticated system of classification by subject. Going through these catalogs allows scholars to develop an exhaustive search of all publications under such topics as "sexual inversion," "tribadism," "hermaphroditism," and other relevant historical terms. Again, knowing the terms used in the studied period is crucial for historical research. Unfortunately, most catalogs in medical and law libraries have not been digitalized or uploaded online. Even when these libraries have online search engines for all their books and journals, the engines often lack the capacity for detailed subject searching that their physical catalogs still have.

Scholars have found invaluable historical evidence for the period since the 1880s in the records produced by the police, the penitentiary, the judicial system, and psychiatric asylums. For example, James N. Green used the criminal records for Rio de Janeiro in the Brazilian Arquivo Nacional (National Archive) and the Pinel Sanatorium records at the Arquivo Público do Estado de São Paulo (Public Archive of the State of São Paulo) to research and write Beyond Carnival: Male Homosexuality in Twentieth-Century Brazil (1999). Similar archives with curated and classified records from modern state institutions since the 1880s exist in most national and some provincial/state archives. Police archives, such as the one from the Ministerio de Seguridad Pública (Ministry of Public Security) at the Archivo Nacional de Costa Rica (National Archive of Costa Rica), likely contain evidence relevant to LGBT studies. These institutions sometimes have highly professional staff interested in LGBT themes. Because of strict budgets and limited physical space, not all national/regional archives have preserved this type of record. Lack of public policies to preserve historical records also plays a role. Sometimes documents are still in the hands of the state institutions that produced them, as is the case with the Centro de Estudios Históricos Policiales “Comisario Inspector Francisco L. Romay” (Sheriff-Inspector Francisco L. Romay Center for Historical Police Studies) in Buenos Aires. In other cases, the records are impossible to locate or have been lost, destroyed, or simply miscategorized and misfiled. Some state institutions closely guard their records and do everything possible to keep them out of reach. This is sometimes the case in countries with a recent history of human rights violations where the police and the army fear that researchers might be looking for evidence to incriminate their staff. Even when institutions of social control open their archives, they have a long tradition of prejudice. In those cases, scholars must assess the pros and cons of disclosing their research topics to the staff. Scholars must also not assume that hostility toward LGBT themes is the default attitude in archives at institutions of social control. Consulting local scholars on the best ways to request authorization to access materials may help researchers determine the best course of action, not only in relation to the decision to disclose one’s research topic but also in terms of the strategies to sort out bureaucratic challenges. Depending on the institution and the ability to contact the right gatekeepers, authorization to consult materials can take anywhere between a day or a few weeks to several years (and sometimes much longer).

Most Latin American universities have specialists in LGBT issues, and some of the larger ones have long-established centers for the study of gender and sexuality. Scholars in these institutions have ample experience accessing archives and collecting scattered evidence. Some of these centers for the study of gender and sexuality also have libraries with secondary sources published in the region that are often insightful and unavailable outside Latin America. Finally, a few research centers are emerging outside of universities, the most famous of which are probably the Brazil-based Centro Latino-Americano em
Modern print media—especially newspapers, books, and magazines—emerged throughout most of Latin America in the late nineteenth century. Until recently, scholars working with these sources had to search through hundreds of thousands of pages in order to, if they were lucky, find a few relevant articles. Digitization and optical character recognition technology have recently created new opportunities through word searching. Some of the most useful online search engines containing Latin American digitized books and media in the last 150 years include the Hemeroteca Nacional Digital de México (National Digital Newspaper Library of Mexico), Hathi-Trust Digital Library, the World Newspaper Archive, the Ibero-Amerikanisches Institut (Ibero-American Institute), the Digital Collections at the UCLA Library, the Hemeroteca Digital “Fray Francisco de Paula Castañeda” (Fray Francisco de Paula Castañeda Digital Newspaper Library), and the Latin American Digital Initiatives. Many Latin American newspapers also offer the possibility of searching their news articles, but this is often possible only for the internet era (since the mid- to late 1990s). After identifying events with dates in the available online records, scholars can easily find news items published on the same date in nondigitized newspapers available in national and provincial/state libraries. All the above libraries have well-preserved hemerotecas (newspaper and periodical libraries). Newspapers and other mass-media sources remain largely unexplored in Latin American LGBT history despite the wealth of information they might offer. It is worth noting that some of the digitized material includes not only mainstream newspapers but also media produced by working-class organizations and anarchist groups, as well as pulp fiction for popular consumption. Searching for LGBT-related terms in these digitized materials could illuminate topics as diverse as the sexual customs of the lower social strata, the attitudes that popular culture developed toward sexual outcasts, and other topics fundamental to LGBT history. Many of the materials commercialized among the urban lower social strata of Latin America contain numerous references to cross-dressing, transgender men and women, and sex between men, among other topics.

Reasons for Scarcity of Sources

Two factors primarily affect the scarcity of sources on LGBT issues throughout Latin America in comparison with the United States, Canada, and Europe. Many countries in the North Atlantic developed a repressive legal system that punished homosexual men, producing a large body of records related to criminalization. After independence in the nineteenth century, however, most of Latin America embraced liberal sexual legislation influenced by the Napoleonic Code, which did not punish any consensual activity between adults in private. Homosexual men were still persecuted by institutions of social control in Latin America, with laws related to vagrancy, drinking, and morality, but in the absence of laws relating specifically to “homosexuality” that justified such persecution, documentation is hard to find. Records of trials against people having sex with partners of the same gender, which are so common for the United States and some parts of Europe, are almost completely absent for most of Latin America. Police records that show evidence of harassment of homosexual men exist, but in the absence of criminalization officers disguised these records under other labels that make the search more difficult. Evidence produced by state institutions persecuting sexual outcasts was scarce and elusive in comparison with that in places where homosexuality was explicitly criminalized. Some Latin American countries, however, did criminalize homosexuality, as was the case in Chile. The first Chilean penal code, enacted in 1874, criminalized sodomy, and this status was confirmed by a reform in 1954. Full decriminalization was achieved in 1999. Therefore, some Chilean archives have a wealth of information on banned sexual behavior that is impossible to find for other parts of the region (see the judicial archives in different cities such as Antofagasta and Valparaiso).

Another factor that has led to scarcity of sources is the absence of a tradition of diary writing, which is associated with Protestant self-reflection rather than Catholic culture. Whereas in the largely Protestant United States many personal diaries offer detailed descriptions of introspection and daily life, such accounts are rare in Catholic-dominant Latin America before the rise of homosexual testimonial writing in the 1950s. An alternative kind of material, however, can sometimes compensate for the lack of diaries. Many twentieth-century foreign visitors to Latin America who had intellectual aspirations and wrote about their travels were interested in exploring anything that could be eroticized. Although narratives in these works are often biased, descriptions of queer behavior and communities of sexual outcasts abound in this genre and deserve closer attention. One resource that includes an extensive collection of writings by foreign travelers in Latin America is the Nettie Lee Benson Latin American Collection at the University of Texas at Austin.

Specific Topics of Research

During the twentieth century, sexuality, especially alternative sexualities and gender identity, became an important topic of academic and political discussion. Some of the classic essays of famous Latin American thinkers discuss the relationship between national identity and “deviant” sexualities, as in the case of Mexican writer Octavio Paz (1914–1998). The prominence of psychoanalysis in some parts of Latin America, and the interest this discipline paid to sexuality, led to the publishing of cases of female and male homosexuality. These case studies often provide detailed descriptions of queer lives as recorded by therapists. The library of the Asociación Psicoanalítica Argentina (Argentine Psychoanalytic Association) in Buenos Aires has one of the largest collections of publications in Spanish throughout the entire region. As modern sexual identities emerged throughout the region, self-testimonial poems and narratives portraying the life of homosexual men from multiple backgrounds became available. Examples of this include the poetry of Mexican writer Salvador Novo (1904–1974; whose letters are available at the Centro de Estudios de Historia de México Carso [Carso Center for the Study of Mexican History]) and the books printed in Buenos Aires by such publishers as Tirso. David William Foster, in his 1991 book, refers to most examples of gay and lesbian autobiographical writing in the region. A large bibliography on LGBT issues in Latin America compiled by Donna J. Guy and Daniel Balderston in the 1990s and subsequently updated by Adán Griego contains innumerable references to literature portraying a variety of queer themes.

Since the rise of the AIDS epidemic in the 1980s, national and international organizations have funded research and the publication of essays, various kinds of studies, statistics, and educational materials, all of which have also inevitably altered the archival terrain. This trend became more pronounced in the 1990s, and the topics diversified then. Among others, these studies were funded by the Joint United Nations Programme on HIV/AIDS, the United Nations Development Programme, the United Nations Development Fund for Women, the Astraea Lesbian Foundation for Justice, the Elizabeth Taylor AIDS Foundation, and the Global Fund for Women. These international institutions clearly have information about international funding awarded to Latin American organizations during these decades, but it is the task of future researchers to mine these materials. Such information may reveal the conditions under which funding was given (or denied) to LGBT organizations and nongovernmental organizations. At a local level, universities, public health centers, nongovernmental organizations, LGBT groups, and a variety of state institutions also launched their own studies and publications. Most of these materials were purchased by libraries in the United States and are available through interlibrary loan. For instance, one might look for materials by the Movimiento Homosexual de Lima (Homosexual Movement of Lima), Nexo Asociación Civil (Link Nonprofit Association) in Buenos Aires, Facultad Latinoamericana de Ciencias Sociales (Latin American School of Social Sciences; with centers in several countries), the United Nations Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean, the Universidad de la República (University of the Republic) in Uruguay, the Coordinadora Nacional de Agrupaciones y Organizaciones de Personas Viviendo con VIH/SIDA (National Coordinator of Groups and Organizations of People Living with HIV/AIDS) in Chile, and Acción Ecuménica (Ecumenical Action) in Caracas, among other places.

Special Sources of Information

International gay and human rights organizations have also kept records of police brutality and persecution of queer people in the last decades. Scholars interested in these topics have successfully consulted the records of the International Gay and Lesbian Human Rights Commission, Amnesty International, and the International Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, Trans and Intersex Association, among others. Physical archives in Latin America may also prove fruitful in looking for this kind of material, as in the case of the Centro de Documentación y Archivo (Documentation Center and Archive) at the Museo de la Justicia (Justice Museum) in Paraguay, the Archivo Histórico de la Policía Nacional (Historical Archive of the National Police) in Guatemala, the Archivo de Derechos Humanos en Chile (Human Rights Archive of Chile), and the Archivo de la Dirección de Inteligencia de la Policía de la Provincia de Buenos Aires (Intelligence Directorate of the Buenos Aires Province Police Archive).

In addition to national archives located in the capital of each country, many Latin American countries also have libraries and archives belonging to the congress, ministries, supreme court, and other state institutions. City, state, and other provincial archives are also prominent, but scholars have explored them to a lesser extent because they tend to be more far flung from the capital cities. Some of these regional archives are extensive and well organized, and they are often more welcoming. Examples include the Archivo Municipal de Antofagasta (Municipal Archive of Antofagasta) and the Archivo Municipal de Trujillo (Municipal Archive of Trujillo). As a result of budget issues, national archives and libraries tend to be understaffed. Although regional archives tend to have even fewer resources, the number of scholars attending is much lower, which gives the existing staff an opportunity to provide more personalized attention. Files requested from national archives can take a long time to arrive, or there may be restrictions on the amount of materials and boxes a scholar can demand in one day. Regional archives are not so well attended, and the staff is eager to serve scholars and justify their very existence. Of course, in the end, each and every archive has its own protocol for granting access and facilitating research.

Cinema constitutes another important source of information for Latin America. Since the 1980s the region has produced a large body of testimonial films for people with transgendered, lesbian, or gay identities. Before the 1980s, there was no explicitly LGBT cinema, but related themes were touched on in numerous films. An online search often suffices to identify a list of historical films relevant for LGBT issues, and most of these films are available in the United States or in the filmotecas (film archives) of Latin America. The Filmoteca at the Universidad Nacional Autónoma de Mexico and the Cinemateca Uruguaya are two prominent institutions of this kind. Located in Montevideo, the latter has preserved more than 3,000 historical films produced in that South American country. Information about other countries is available through the Coordinadora Latinoamericana de Archivos de Imágenes en Movimiento (Latin American Film Archive Coordination Group), a network of film archives in the region. Criticism and debates about these films in the local press can also help scholars explore diverse reactions and overall public opinion. For the period before the 1930s, theater might offer an opportunity similar to that of cinema. Some of the historical theaters of Latin America have their own archival collections where scripts are available, even for plays in lesser known neighborhood theaters. Examples include the Centro de Documentación de las Artes Escénicas (Performing Arts Documentation Center) at the Teatro Municipal de Santiago (Municipal Theater of Santiago) in Chile, the Casa de la Memoria Escénica (House of Scenic Memory) in Cuba, the Biblioteca Gilberto Martinez (Gilberto Martinez Library) at the Casa del Teatro de Medellín (House of Medellin Theater), the Teatro Solís (Solís Theater) in Montevideo, and the Teatro Cervantes (Cervantes Theater) in Buenos Aires.

Finally, for a history of LGBT Latinxs in the United States, there are several useful archives. (The term Latinxs refers to all people of Latino origin, including men, women, and transgendered individuals. Its use has become a common way to avoid the bias inherent in the masculine plural term Latinos as a universal plural.) Lambda Archives of San Diego has LGBT publications from Tijuana and about Latinxs in Southern California. The Stonewall National Museum and Archives has also preserved materials relevant to Latinxs in the United States in its archives in Fort Lauderdale, Florida. The same is the case with other archives throughout the United States, some of which are mentioned above. Scholars studying this topic have often relied on private and personal archives (see the 2015 collection titled Queer Brown Voices, edited by Uriel Quesada, Letitia Gomez, and Salvador Vidal-Ortiz).

Archival research related to LGBT issues in Latin America has been extremely challenging for scholars who have been searching institutions over the last few decades. Against the backdrop of this challenging environment, the constant work of thousands of scholars, as well as the efforts of organizations and institutions that have created documentation centers, has gradually begun to improve access to information and is opening up a new promising field of research.

SEE ALSO Archives in Africa; Archives in Asia; Archives in Australia and New Zealand; Archives in Europe; Archives in North America; Cold War and Sexuality in Latin America; Confessional Manuals in Colonial Latin America; Conquest and Sodomy in Latin America; Inquisition, Criminal Courts, and Sexuality in Colonial Latin America; Mexican Revolution and Sexuality; Museo Travesti del Perú; The Nicaraguan Revolution; Slavery and Sodomy in Brazil

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Corrales, Javier, and Mario Pecheny, eds. The Politics of Sexuality in Latin America: A Reader

Mogrovejo, Norma. Un amor que se atrevió a decir su nombre: La lucha de las lesbianas y su relación con los movimientos homosexual y feminista en América Latina [A love that dared to say its name: The lesbian struggle and its relationship to the homosexual and feminist movements in Latin America]. Mexico City: Plaza y Valdés Editores, 2000.

The development of LGBTQ archives in North America is closely tied to the history of LGBTQ social movements from the mid-twentieth century onward. Before the late 1980s, most university-based archives and public libraries did not specifically aim to collect material documenting LGBTQ history. Taking matters into their own hands, LGBTQ-identified individuals and organizations initiated a wide range of innovative and ambitious projects to collect and preserve historical records. Starting in the 1950s, homophile organizations turned their attention to LGBTQ history by publishing historical articles and bibliographies of relevant sources, as well as starting their own libraries and archives. By the 1970s, the gay liberation and lesbian feminist movements were further catalyzing the development of numerous community-based LGBTQ archives across the United States and Canada, as well as a network of LGBTQ archives, history projects, and researchers. Many community-based archives that were founded in the early 1970s, such as the Lesbian Herstory Archives and the Canadian Lesbian and Gay Archives, continue to exist, even as university-based archives and public libraries have increasingly collected or publicized the existence of holdings related to LGBTQ history. Finally, in the twenty-first century, the availability of digital resources and a broader “archival turn” in the humanities and social sciences have contributed to a growing public and scholarly interest in LGBTQ archives.

The Homophile Movement and the Origins of LGBTQ Archives

In the 1950s lesbians and gay men in the United States established a handful of organizations and periodicals that advocated for gay civil rights. The first Canadian organizations (such as the Association for Social Knowledge in Vancouver) and periodicals (such as Gay in Toronto) appeared a decade later, in the mid-1960s. Collectively referred to as the homophile movement, activists and organizations associated with this movement prioritized educational initiatives. For example, the mission statement of the Mattachine Society, which was founded in 1950 as the first homophile organization in the United States, enshrined education of “all interested homosexuals” and “the public at large” as one of the organization’s three main goals. “The total of information available on the subject of homosexuality is woefully meager and utterly inconclusive,” the statement argued (Mattachine Foundation/Mattachine Society [1951] 1997, 283). To disseminate more rigorous information about homosexuality, the Mattachine Society published a monthly magazine, titled the Mattachine Review, between 1955 and 1966. According to Gerard Koskovich’s historiography (2016), the magazine published twenty articles on LGBTQ history during the first five years of its publication run, including biographical profiles, book reviews, a two-part history of the organization of gender and sexuality in indigenous American cultures, and a history of the Mattachine Society itself.

Founded five years later as the first lesbian civil and political rights organization in the United States, the Daughters of Bilitis (DOB) similarly emphasized education of the so-called sex “variant” (or lesbian) and of the wider public as two of the organization’s founding goals (Daughters of Bilitis [1955] 1997, 328). Much like the Mattachine Society, the DOB published its own monthly magazine, the Ladder, between 1956 and 1972. Among the magazine’s regular features was a book review section titled “Lesbiana,” written primarily by Barbara Grier under various pseudonyms. As the media studies scholar Cait McKinney explains, Grier’s column established her “lifelong focus” on bibliographic activism and formed the basis for The Lesbian in Literature (1967), her “field-defining bibliography for gay and lesbian studies” (2018, 60). In addition to the Ladder, the DOB also maintained lending libraries within the organization’s chapters. A decade after the New York City chapter folded, the then newly founded Lesbian Herstory Archives acquired its library from the artist and writer Jane Kogan, who served as the chapter’s librarian.

ONE Inc.’s library similarly has an archival afterlife as the basis of ONE National Gay and Lesbian Archives, the largest repository of LGBTQ material in the world. ONE was founded in 1952 by members of the Mattachine Society who were specifically interested in starting a magazine, prior to the creation of the Mattachine Review in 1955. Between 1953 and 1967, ONE published a self-titled monthly magazine. More ambitiously, in 1956, the ONE Institute of Homophile Studies was introduced. Eventually receiving, in 1981, state accreditation to offer graduate degrees, the institute offered a wide range of courses on “history, literature, and social studies centered upon homosexuality and its relation to world cultures, religion, law, morals, psychology, medicine, and the arts” (quoted in Koskovich 2016, 15–16). In 1994, after the institute closed, the ONE Institute Library merged with the International Gay and Lesbian Archives—a collection maintained by Jim Kepner, a cofounder of the ONE Institute. In 2000 the University of Southern California acquired the combined collection, later renaming it ONE National Gay and Lesbian Archives. In publishing their own periodicals, compiling bibliographies of published and archival sources, and building their own libraries and archives, members of the homophile movement laid the groundwork for LGBTQ archives and the field of LGBTQ studies. As the anthropologist Gayle S. Rubin argued in a lecture on the history of the field, much of what her cohort wrote in the 1970s was indebted to the “trails charted by our homophile
Gay Liberation, Lesbian Feminism, and Archives

In the early 1970s, the emergence of gay liberation and lesbian feminist movements in the United States and Canada prompted an unprecedented LGBTQ publishing boom, including fiction and nonfiction books, pamphlets, newsletters, newspapers, and journals. Although gay liberation and lesbian feminist movements were larger and more visible than the earlier homophile movement, lesbian and gay activists of the 1970s remained concerned about the preservation of LGBTQ history and culture. Specifically, many worried that most libraries and archives were not collecting LGBTQ material, even as such material was rapidly proliferating.

Numerous community-based LGBTQ archives were founded in the 1970s and early 1980s in response to this problem. In 1973 and 1974, at least four LGBTQ archives in North America came into being. First, the editorial collective of The Body Politic founded what was then called the Canadian Gay Liberation Movement Archives in Toronto—an ambitious title for a “one cupboard reference collection” in the newspaper’s office (Russell, Teeple, and Averill 1985, 246). Still in existence as the Canadian Lesbian and Gay Archives (CLGA), this collection grew to become the largest independent LGBTQ archive in the world. Also in 1973, Mark Silber created the Stonewall Library and Archives in his parents’ house when he was a student at Florida Atlantic University. Like the CLGA, Silber’s collection has similarly grown in scope and has relocated to become the Stonewall National Museum and Archives in Fort Lauderdale, Florida. At the same time, in Chicago, a lesbian collective founded the New Alexandria Library for Women in 1974. Five years later, Bet Power hauled the collection to Worthington, Massachusetts. In 1992, after Power came out as a trans man, New Alexandria changed its name and expanded its focus to become the Sexual Minorities Archives, collecting material related to lesbian, gay, bisexual, trans, queer, and intersex histories. From then until 2017, the collection was housed in Power’s house in Northampton, Massachusetts. The collection was relocated to its own building in Holyoke, Massachusetts, following a fund-raising drive.

The same year that the New Alexandria Library was founded in Chicago, the Lesbian Herstory Archives (LHA) was created in New York City, with the ambitious aim of collecting and preserving records of lesbian lives from all geographical regions and historical eras. Although the LHA was one among many community-based LGBTQ archives founded in the 1970s, the LHA looms large in accounts of the development of LGBTQ archives, perhaps particularly because of the clarity with which the LHA articulated its critique of the collecting practices of traditional archives and its radical vision for a grassroots archive. “We undertook the Archives,” the founders announced in their first newsletter, “not as a short-term project, but as a commitment to rediscovering our past, controlling our present, and speaking to our future” (Lesbian Herstory Archives 1975, 1).
In the late 1970s and 1980s, similar community-based archival projects continued to proliferate, including the BC Gay and Lesbian Archives in British Columbia (1976), the Gerber/Hart Library and Archives in Chicago (1981; originally the Midwest Gay and Lesbian Archive and Library), the June L. Mazer Lesbian Archives in California (1981; originally the West Coast Lesbian Collections), the Quebec Gay Archives (1983), and the GLBT Historical Society in San Francisco (1985). Still in existence, these community-based archives remain key collections for researchers interested in LGBTQ history in general and histories of LGBTQ social movements in particular.

Networks of Grassroots Archives and Independent Researchers

During the 1970s and 1980s, academic historians tended to steer clear of LGBTQ history. General wisdom suggested that focusing on LGBTQ history as a graduate student or junior faculty member was tantamount to committing “academic suicide” (Rubin 2011, 198). In fact, in surveying all the history dissertations completed in the United States between 1972 and 1980, Koskovich (2016) counted a mere three on the history of homosexuality. As a result, independent scholars undertook a good deal of the early work on LGBTQ history. In the absence of university-based support, community-based archives and history projects served as key resources and networking hubs for communities of researchers in the 1970s and 1980s.

The Gay History Group (later renamed the Lesbian and Gay History Project) is a good example of a community-based history project. On 28 January 1978, the first meeting of the Gay History Group was held at Jonathan Ned Katz’s apartment in New York City. A historian without formal training, Katz had recently published Gay American History (1976), a comprehensive collection of documents relating to LGBTQ history. Katz co-organized the Gay History Group with John D’Emilio, then a graduate student at Columbia University, who was in the process of completing a dissertation that was later published as Sexual Politics, Sexual Communities (1983), one of the first dissertations on LGBTQ history. In their (undated) letter of invitation, D’Emilio and Katz described the group as a “small, informal meeting of about ten persons (women and men) who are actively involved or deeply interested in Lesbian and Gay male research.”

LHA collective members Joan Nestle, Deborah Edel, and Judith Schwarz attended the first meeting of the Gay History Group. On 18 March, the group held a follow-up meeting at the LHA, which was then housed in Nestle and Edel’s apartment, to discuss “archives in general” and “the problems of using, getting material out of them, getting permission to publish, and the suppression of homosexual history documents” (Hansen 1978, 1). For the next few years, the Lesbian and Gay History Project, as the group was renamed, met at the Lesbian Herstory Archives.
Similar groups were created across the country. In San Francisco, the San Francisco Gay History Project was formed as a study group in 1978. Originally founded by three gay men, the group changed its name to the San Francisco Lesbian and Gay History Project in 1979, after a number of women joined. Members included the independent scholar Allan Bérubé, the activist and journalist Amber Hollibaugh, the historian Estelle B. Freedman, D’Emilio, and Rubin. In the late 1970s and early 1980s, the San Francisco Lesbian and Gay History Project “read books together” and “met regularly for often intense conversations” (D’Emilio and Freedman 2011, 10). In addition to meeting as a group, individual members were also expected to develop a major project to present to the group. In 1984 Willie Walker proposed an idea for a major project, which was soon realized as the GLBT Historical Society, a major museum and archive.

Once formed, grassroots history projects and archives reached out to one another, forming communication networks. In November 1978, for example, Eric Garber of the San Francisco Gay History Project sent a letter to the Lesbian Herstory Archives to inform them of the history project’s existence and to request information. “One of the reasons we have decided to work together is our shared perspective on the Gay community as multi-class, multiracial, and duo-sexual,” he explained.

To strengthen these existing lines of communication, a number of history projects and archives teamed up to create the Lesbian/Gay History Researchers Network Newsletter in 1980. For each issue, a different archive or history project took responsibility for the newsletter’s production. The four issues of the newsletter were published in turn by the Lesbian Herstory Archives, the San Francisco Lesbian and Gay History Project, the Boston Area Lesbian and Gay History Project, and Lesbian Heritage in Washington, DC. As McKinney argues, the Lesbian/Gay History Researchers Network Newsletter was one of several newsletters that “provided communicative support” for grassroots lesbian and gay research in the 1970s and 1980s (2015, 311).

LGBTQ Collections in Universities and Public Libraries

By the late 1980s and early 1990s, lesbian and gay studies had finally developed a university-based presence with a smattering of research centers (such as CLAGS: The Center for LGBTQ Studies at the City University of New York), journals (such as GLQ: A Journal of Lesbian and Gay Studies at Duke University), book series (such as Series Q by Duke University Press), and a short-lived national conference series in the United States, following two decades of gay and lesbian studies research outside of universities. Coinciding with the growing legitimacy of the field, an increasing number of archives began collecting LGBTQ material at this time. This new interest in LGBTQ material was also driven by broader shifts in LGBTQ political organizing, such as the political urgency of preserving records during the HIV/AIDS crisis of the 1980s and 1990s and the subsequent recognition that gay men and lesbians constituted a viable niche market (see especially Chasin 2000;
Prior to the late 1980s, only a handful of university-based archival collections specifically sought LGBTQ material. One of the notable exceptions was the Institute for Sex Research (later renamed the Kinsey Institute) at Indiana University. Created in 1947, the Institute for Sex Research aimed to collect material related to the American sexologist Alfred C. Kinsey's (1894–1956) research on human sexual behavior that resulted in two best-selling and controversial books: Sexual Behavior in the Human Male (1948) and Sexual Behavior in the Human Female (1953). Among the Kinsey Institute's significant early LGBTQ acquisitions was the collection of Harry Benjamin, author of The Transsexual Phenomenon (1966). Benjamin's collection was pivotal in the historian Joanne Meyerowitz's How Sex Changed: A History of Transsexuality in the United States (2002).

More quietly, the Joseph A. Labadie Collection at the University of Michigan also amassed an impressive early collection of LGBTQ material. Named for the labor activist and anarchist Joseph Antoine Labadie (1850–1933), the Labadie Collection originally consisted of Labadie's personal collection, which was donated to the university in 1911. Although the collection was initially focused on anarchist writings, the collection gradually widened its focus to radical social movements in general.

After Edward C. Weber was named the director of collection in 1960, Labadie began actively collecting material related to the homophile movement. As Rubin explains, Labadie thus “became one of the most extensive repositories of homosexual publications in the country at a time when most university and public libraries dismissed them as pornographic trash” (2011, 349).

By the late 1980s, the tide began to turn. For example, in 1988 Cornell University established the Human Sexuality Collection. Proposed by Advocate publisher David B. Goodstein and the biologist and activist Bruce Voeller, the Human Sexuality Collection is broadly interested in documenting the history of the construction of sexuality, with specific attention to US LGBTQ history and the politics of pornography. Goodstein provided significant financial support for the collection, while Voeller donated the archives of the Mariposa Education and Research Foundation, an independent research collection that was founded in the 1970s.

In the same year that Cornell University introduced the Human Sexuality Collection, the author and feminist activist Sallie Bingham endowed a women's studies archivist position within Duke University's special collections. Five years later, Duke University created the Sallie Bingham Center for Women's History and Culture as a permanent collection, named in honor of Bingham. According to its collection mandate, the Bingham Center specifically aims to collect material on women's sexuality and gender expression. The Bingham Center, for example, houses the records of the Atlanta Lesbian Feminist Alliance, as well as... personal papers from Dorothy Allison, Kate Millett, and Minnie Bruce Pratt.

More recently, in 2000, the University of Minnesota started the Jean-Nickolaus Tretter Collection in Gay, Lesbian, Bisexual and Transgender Studies after acquiring Tretter’s personal collection of material, which had outgrown his apartment. In 2007 the University of Victoria in British Columbia similarly created the Transgender Archives, one of the few collections in North America to exclusively focus on transgender history. Before the archive was officially opened to researchers in 2011, the Transgender Archives acquired three significant collections: the records of the Rikki Swin Institute, the papers of Reed Erickson, and the University of Ulster’s Trans-Gender Archive.

Public libraries also began actively collecting LGBTQ material in the late 1980s and early 1990s. For example, in 1994 the New York Public Library (NYPL) mounted an ambitious exhibit titled Becoming Visible: The Legacy of Stonewall. The largest exhibit of gay and lesbian history ever displayed in a museum or gallery space, Becoming Visible attracted more than 100,000 visitors and resulted in the publication of Becoming Visible: An Illustrated History of Lesbian and Gay Life in Twentieth-Century America (1998). Some activists associated with community-based LGBTQ archives, however, questioned this sudden interest in LGBTQ material. Polly Thistlethwaite, a librarian and the then-coordinator of the Lesbian Herstory Archives, suggested that the NYPL erroneously positioned itself as having a “long-lived interest in collecting lesbian and gay history” (1998, 15–16). The library, she suggested, could have been more “reflective about its problematic relationship with lesbian and gay material” (16).

Interestingly, although community-based archives have a longer tradition of actively collecting LGBTQ material, university and public archives tend to have more robust collections of material from before the mid-twentieth century. As a result, university and public archives have also begun reclassifying and publicizing archival material related to LGBTQ history, alongside efforts to collect new material from organizations and LGBTQ-identified people. For example, the NYPL’s subject guide of gay and lesbian collections includes numerous collections that were in the library’s custody well before they were easily discoverable as sources for LGBTQ history, such as the papers of Dorothee Gore (1904–1982), which document her experience as a member of the Women’s Army Corps (WAC) during World War II (1939–1945), and those of Leo Adams (1903–1995), which contain personal correspondence from the mid-twentieth century that reflects the experiences of gay men during this time. However, much like community-based LGBTQ archives, university and public archives ultimately tend to be strongest in documenting late-twentieth-century LGBTQ social movements. Thus, researchers who are interested in earlier historical contexts often have to look beyond LGBTQ collections. For example, Margot Canaday’s The Straight State (2009) is based on archival research at the National Archives, whereas Clare Sears’s Arresting Dress (2015) relies heavily on court records and newspaper accounts.
LGBTQ Digital Archives

With widening access to the internet, archives have undertaken a range of digitization projects in the twenty-first century. Most pressingly, archives and libraries have worked toward creating online public access catalogs that allow users to search holdings remotely. For example, records of all the processed collections at ONE National Gay and Lesbian Archives are searchable in the Online Archive of California. The finding aid for each collection includes a list of all the folders in the collection, as well as a description, biographical note, and other contextualizing information. Unlike ONE Archives, which is currently housed at the University of Southern California, independent LGBTQ archives are generally less likely to have data management systems that are in keeping with archival standards. However, collections such as Gerber/Hart, the CLGA, the LHA, and the GLBT Historical Society have collection descriptions and in some cases complete finding aids available on their websites.

Archives have also begun digitizing items in their collections. For example, with the support of a National Endowment for the Humanities grant, June Mazer completed a project titled “Making Invisible Histories Visible: Preserving the Legacy of Lesbian Feminist Activism and Writing in Los Angeles” in 2014. This project resulted in the digitization of five collections of high research value: the records of Connexxus, Southern California Women for Understanding, Women Against Violence Against Women, and the personal papers of Margaret Cruikshank and Lillian Faderman.

Similarly, the Lesbian Herstory Archives collaborated with the Pratt Institute’s library school to digitize audiocassettes and videotapes. The digitized audio collection includes recordings of the black lesbian feminist poet Audre Lorde’s speeches; oral history interviews that were recorded as part of Madeline D. Davis and Elizabeth Lapovsky Kennedy’s research on butch and femme bar culture from the 1930s through the 1960s; the archive cofounder Nestle’s oral history interviews with the African American lesbian Mabel Hampton (1902–1989); and recordings from the Women’s Committee of the AIDS direct-action group ACT UP–New York. The digitized video collection includes interviews from a documentary on the DOB and raw footage from Dyke TV, a public-access program that aired in the 1990s.

In the same tradition as community-based LGBTQ archives of the 1970s, the internet has also facilitated the development of web-based archival projects without any connection to existing archives. For example, in 2014 doctoral candidate Eric Gonzaba created Wearing Gay History, a collection of digitized T-shirts from numerous LGBTQ archives across the United States. Similarly, as a doctoral candidate, Avery Dame-Griff created the Queer Digital History Project to archive pre-2010 LGBTQ digital spaces. The Digital Transgender Archive (DTA) is one of the more ambitious of these new digital projects. Created by K. J. Rawson, an assistant professor at the College of the Holy Cross, DTA is imagined as an online hub for trans-related "digitized historical materials, born-digital materials, and information on archival holdings throughout the world" (DTA 2018).

A number of oral history projects are also housed on the internet. Founded by the writer Sarah Schulman and the filmmaker Jim Hubbard—both former members of ACT UP–New York—the ACT UP Oral History Project includes over one hundred interviews with activists associated with ACT UP. Directly inspired by the ACT UP Oral History Project, the New York City Trans Oral History Project is a community archive dedicated to the collection, preservation, and sharing of trans histories. The Tretter Collection at the University of Minnesota is also undertaking a similar Transgender Oral History Project. Digital projects have not only widened general and scholarly access to primary sources, they have also raised the profile of LGBTQ archives.

The Archival Turn

Alongside the growth of LGBTQ archival and digital collections, scholars in the humanities and social sciences have also grown increasingly interested in archives as a subject of scholarly inquiry in their own right. The poststructuralist philosopher Jacques Derrida’s (1930–2004) Mal d’archive ([1995]; Archive Fever [1996]) is often cited to conveniently mark the beginning of this so-called archival turn, although some literature reviews stretch back to Michel Foucault’s (1926–1984) much earlier L'archéologie du savoir ([1969]; Archaeology of Knowledge [1972]) and "Nietzsche, Genealogy, History" ([1971] 1977).

Eight years after Archive Fever, Ann Cvetkovich’s An Archive of Feelings ([2003]) helped initiate a sustained interest in LGBTQ archives in queer studies. In a roundtable discussion that was included in Radical History Review’s 2015 special issue titled “Queering Archives: Intimate Tracings,” the historian Regina Kunzel usefully divided this scholarship into two categories. On one hand, some queer studies scholars use “archive” metaphorically or, as Judith (later Jack) Halberstam writes, “as a free floating signifier” to refer to any grouping of related things ([2005, 169]). On the other hand, a growing body of work in queer studies is, as Kunzel writes, “tethered to material archives” ([Arondekar et al. 2015, 229]). Kate Eichhorn’s The Archival Turn in Feminism ([2012]) and McKinney’s forthcoming work on lesbian feminist networks and LGBTQ archives are examples of projects that are specifically interested in the history and collecting politics of LGBTQ archives in North America.

SEE ALSO Archives in Africa; Archives in Asia; Archives in Australia and New Zealand; Archives in Europe; Archives in Latin America; The Body Politic; Daughters of Bilitis; Lesbian Herstory Archives; Mattachine Society

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Foucault, Michel. Archaeology of Knowledge. Translated by A. M. Sheridan Smith. London:
Tavistock, 1972.

Argentina’s Gender Identity Law

GERMÁN GARRIDO
Assistant Professor
Borough of Manhattan Community College, NY

A groundbreaking law allowing transgender people the right to officially change their gender identity without third-party intervention.

Argentina’s Ley de Identidad de Género (Gender Identity Law; sometimes referred to by its number as “Ley 26.743”; hereafter referred to as “LIG”), which was passed in May 2012, recognizes the right of all people to live and be treated according to the gender they identify with, which may or may not correspond to the gender they were assigned at birth. The law, which conferred on Argentina the status of a transgender-rights pioneer, was one of the most progressive in the world at the time of its passing because it allows trans people to rectify their personal documents through a very simple administrative procedure without medical, psychiatric, or judicial intervention. According to the law, all persons have the right “to the recognition of their gender identity; to the free development of their person according to their gender identity,” and “to be treated according to their gender identity” (Article 1), in both the public and the private spheres. Furthermore, the LIG was the first law in the world to mandate public and private health-care coverage of hormone treatment and sex-reassignment surgeries for those who demand them, always on their own initiative. While the LIG does not require any kind of medical intervention to grant the change in documentation, it does facilitate access to transition-related surgeries and treatments for those who decide to undergo such procedures.
Argentina’s Gender Identity Law, which passed in May 2012, is considered one of the most progressive in the world by allowing transgender people the right to officially change their gender without medical, psychiatric, or judicial intervention.

Details about the Law

In the years prior to the law's passing, a handful of trans individuals in Argentina had been able to modify their official documents through lengthy and costly court proceedings, as was allowed in two other Latin American countries, Brazil and Chile. These processes required, in turn, diagnoses of “gender dysphoria,” evidence that the person exhibited stereotypical masculine or feminine traits in a sustained manner over time, and, as in Brazil and Chile, they most often implied the completion of hormone treatment and sex-reassignment surgeries.

Before Argentina, the United Kingdom and Spain had passed gender identity bills in 2004 and 2007, respectively, but they still required medical or psychiatric diagnoses; although sex-reassignment surgeries were not mandatory, they demanded treatments to adapt the physical appearance of people to preconceived ideas of gender. In 2009 Uruguay passed a law allowing transgender individuals to rectify their official documents without the need of either a diagnosis of “gender dysphoria” or sex-reassignment surgeries, but judicial permission was required.

The Argentine law was the first to forgo this pathologizing perspective and to also challenge bureaucratically fixed and stable notions of gender. The LIG conceives of gender identity as “the internal and individual experience of gender as each person feels it” (Article 2), so that there is no conditionality or third-party requirements for what each person’s own gender represents and how they express it.

Also revolutionary about the law is that the process of rectifying official documentation is simple, free, and “does not require the intervention of any agent or lawyer” (Article 6). It is also confidential, which means that nobody can access the information that was on record before the change, and “any reference to the current law in the amended birth certificate and in the new national identity document issued as a result of it is forbidden” (Article 6). Furthermore, the law takes minors into consideration. Trans children and teenagers under the age of eighteen can complete this process with the consent of their parents or legal guardians, and in case they do not succeed in obtaining such permission, they still have the legal right to appear in court and fight for the change.

Notably, although the law does not require any medical procedure to adjust a person’s gender expression in order to rectify the gender identity and name that is recorded in their official documents, it does, at the same time, mandate access to all medical treatments through the public and private health-care system for those people who decide to undergo “total and partial surgical interventions and/or comprehensive hormonal treatments to adjust their bodies, including their genitalia, to their self-perceived gender identity, without requiring any judicial or administrative authorization” (Article 11).

A Depathologizing Perspective

As of 2017, being transgender was still classified as a “mental and behavioral disorder” in the World Health Organization’s International Statistical Classification of Diseases and Related Health Problems (1992), which is used globally as a diagnostic resource for governments and ministries of health, clinical researchers, pharmaceutical companies, and healthcare providers. Although the eleventh revision of this manual, which was slated to be released in 2018, was expected to eliminate the category of “gender identity disorders,” it was also expected to introduce the category of “gender incongruence of childhood,” which threatens to continue the pathologization of gender diversity.

One of the main reasons the LIG became a new international benchmark was that it ceased to uphold the notion of gender transition as a mental disorder or illness, which was possible thanks to the participation of Argentine trans activists in drafting the law. Some of these activists, such as Mauro Cabral Grinspan, executive director of Global Action for Trans Equality (GATE), are part of the international activist movement for trans depathologization, which fights for the elimination of current diagnostic classifications of gender transitions and for the acknowledgment of gender and body diversity (Suess et al. 2014). The LIG helped, in turn, to strengthen activism for trans depathologization and has often been cited as a precedent to advance similar laws in other parts of the world.

Time and again, one of the preoccupations of the depathologization movement has been how to ensure that trans people can get access to transition-related health-care services if and when they require them, while at the same time eliminating transgender identities from international mental illness and disorder classifications. The Argentine law signified a major improvement precisely because it challenged the notion that a diagnosis is necessary for trans people to be able to receive hormone treatment and/or sex-reassignment surgery when they opt for it.

History and Background

In Argentina, as in other parts of Latin America, the word travesti refers to a person who was assigned male at birth but who identifies as female and uses feminine pronouns. The term itself, which had carried negative connotations for decades, was reclaimed in the mid-1990s by a large community, namely by activists such as Lohana Berkins, and it most often—though not always—implies a Latin American, nonwhite, and/or lower- or working-class identity. Transexual (the Spanish word for “transsexual”) is, in its turn, a term usually reserved for trans women who undergo sex-reassignment surgery. In the past decade, however, and particularly in the past few years, the terms chica trans and mujer trans (“trans girl” and “trans woman,” respectively), as well as chico trans and hombre trans (“trans boy/guy” and “trans man,” respectively), have become increasingly widespread, and while the term travesti is still highly common, considerations about sex-reassignment surgery seem to have lost some of their force as an identity marker.

The Movement to Protect an Oppressed Community In 2005 research conducted by the Asociación de Lucha por la Identidad Travesti y Transexual (ALITT; Association for the Fight for Travesti and Transsexual Identity) in the city of Buenos Aires, in Mar del Plata, and in other districts of the Buenos Aires metropolitan area, indicated that the life expectancy of a travesti barely exceeded the age of thirty. All respondents said they had limited access to housing, health care, or education, and more than 90 percent reported that they had suffered some kind of violence, including police abuse, over the course of their lives (Berkins and Fernández 2005). A 2008 study by the Ministry of Health indicated that 75 percent of the trans population made a living from sex work, and that 50 percent had started to do so between the ages of fourteen and nineteen.
Prior to the passage of the LIG, various trans activist organizations, which had existed in Argentina since at least the early 1990s, had worked on bills to advance the rights of this systematically oppressed community. In 2007 the Federación Argentina de Lesbianas, Gays, Bisexuales y Trans (FALGBT; Argentine Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, and Trans Federation) and the Asociación de Travestis, Transexuales y Transgéneros de Argentina (ATTTA; Travesti, Transsexual, and Transgender Association of Argentina) introduced the first gender identity bill in the National Congress through their ally Silvia Augsburger, a deputy of the Socialist Party. After this bill failed in 2011, the Frente Nacional por la Ley de Identidad de Género (National Front for the Gender Identity Law) was formed specifically to fight for the approval of a bill more in line with the demands of the most progressive local and international trans organizations.

In a political context marked by important advances in terms of human and civil rights, the FALGBT decided to put all its energies first into the passage of a same-sex marriage bill, called the Ley de Matrimonio Igualitario (Egalitarian Marriage Law), only to later focus on a gender identity bill. The strategy was successful. After intense debate in civil society and in Congress, the same-sex marriage bill was passed in 2010—though by a narrow margin—which generated very favorable conditions for the LIG (Farji Neer and Castro 2011). A decisive factor in both cases was the support these bills received from then-president Cristina Fernández de Kirchner. Although the same-sex marriage bill was voted for and against by the legislators of the ruling party, the Frente para la Victoria (Front for Victory), which controlled both chambers, deputies and senators voted unanimously in favor of the LIG, once the passing of the same-sex marriage bill had enshrined support for sexual diversity in the government’s agenda (Díaz et al. 2016). Upon signing the new law, President Fernández de Kirchner apologized to the trans community for the delay in passing legislation in a short speech in front of policy makers, trans activists, and other important LGBTQI leaders in a ceremony at the Government Palace.

Opposition of the Catholic Church Although, unlike in other Latin American countries, in Argentina there are only a few religious political parties and they hold relatively little power, the Catholic Church has had a great influence on governmental decisions throughout Argentina’s history. Until the election of Cardinal Jorge Mario Bergoglio as the new Catholic pope in 2013, Fernández de Kirchner’s government confronted the church, undercutting the power of the Catholic lobby, which, in the case of the Egalitarian Marriage Law, had led Bergoglio—now Pope Francis—to call for a “war of God” in defense of family values.

The Human Right to Identity Another important aspect of the historical and political framework of the LIG revolves around the role of human rights—and human rights organizations—in Argentina. During the military dictatorship of 1976 to 1983, one of the bloodiest in Latin America, an estimated 30,000 civilians were “disappeared”—that is secretly abducted, kidnapped, and most often killed—by the government. Since the restoration of democracy in 1983, human rights discourse and activism have occupied a central place in national politics, especially as embodied by organizations such as Madres de Plaza de Mayo, composed of mothers of many of those who “disappeared” during the dictatorship, and Abuelas de Plaza de Mayo, the grandmothers of the children of the disappeared.

The adoption of a human rights discourse by the LGBTQI movement in Argentina helped to build legitimacy around their demands and to articulate them within a broader political tradition (Hollar 2017). Some of the trans activists who formed part of the Frente Nacional por la Ley de Género, such as Berkins and Diana Sacayán, had strong connections with Madres de Plaza de Mayo, which, in addition to publicly supporting the LIG, provided resources to promote the bill. Moreover, the Abuelas de Plaza de Mayo enshrined the “right to identity” for children of the disappeared who did not know that they had been stolen and adopted illegally during the dictatorship—that is, they defended these people’s right to find out and live according to their “true [genetic or familial] identity.” Articulated in relation to these organizations, therefore, the fight for the LIG built an important part of its foundation on “the right to identity,” which had become one of postdictatorship Argentina’s core democratic values (Ariza and Saldívia 2015), and gained force from previous local political struggles.

Local Impact and Pending Issues

Five years after the enactment of the law in mid-2012, about 5,700 people had rectified their official documentation according to the National Registry of Persons. A 2016 study by the ATTTA and Fundación Huésped (Huésped Foundation) estimated that six out of ten trans people in Argentina already had done so. One of the many positive consequences of the legal recognition of gender identity has been greater access to education, work, housing, and health care—including prevention and treatment of HIV, hormone treatments, and sex-reassignment surgery.

Argentina’s Gender Identity Law has reportedly also fostered the empowerment of trans people, collectively and individually, which has helped them to confront discriminatory situations and bureaucratic requirements, and to counter the internalization of social stigma. Travesti activist Berkins, in a moving piece published a few days after the passing of the law, explained that it redefined the concept of citizenship, marking a historic moment in which the trans community is “invited to the Government palace” to discuss “who makes up the nation state” (Berkins 2012; translation by Germán Garrido).

Despite these important advances, the living conditions of the Argentine trans community remain highly unfavorable. According to the Trans Murder Monitoring project, a study published by Transgender Europe based on data provided by local organizations from around the world, out of the 2,115 reported killings of trans and gender-diverse people in sixty-five countries between 2008 and 2016, 78 percent (1,654) came from Central and South America. (Brazil and Mexico are the countries with more reported killings worldwide in absolute numbers, with 868 and 257, respectively; the United States comes third with 146; Argentina reported 45 killings). In relative numbers, Honduras, Guyana, El Salvador, and Brazil lead this world list, with 9.68, 5, 4.26, and 4.22, respectively, reported murders per million inhabitants, while Argentina reports 1.158. As in other countries of the region, trans individuals throughout Argentina also face machista violence, much of which is specifically transphobic, in addition to other pressing challenges derived from a lack of resources and stark socioeconomic inequality. Although there is little doubt that the LIG has been highly beneficial for the Argentine trans community, it might be too early to measure the extent of this positive impact, some of which may grow and become increasingly visible in years to come.

Among the pending issues directly related to the Gender Identity Law, health-care protections have been particularly hard to implement because of the deficient public health system in Argentina and the resistance of insurance companies to covering the cost of medical treatments. Discrimination in the workplace, in private and public spaces, and, significantly, in the mass media is a persistent problem, and few public initiatives have been designed to enforce the trato digno (dignified treatment or respect) toward trans people mandated in Article 12 of the LIG, especially after right-wing president Mauricio Macri took office in 2015, inaugurating a new period in Argentine history characterized by state disregard for human rights issues at large.

From its outset, there have been activists who pushed for and celebrated the passage of the bill but who have been nonetheless critical of it for not allowing a trans person to identify as “trans” or “travesti” instead of either male or female (Wayar 2012), or for—allegedly—maintaining or even reinforcing the male/female binary. With regard to this last claim, it must be said, however, that the law does not specify what being a (trans or cis) man or woman means, nor does it mandate any form of gender expression for a person to self-identify as male or female. Introducing nonbinary identities or doing away altogether with any gender markers in official documents, on the other hand, would have entailed the repeal of other existing laws.

Most demands from the trans community today do not revolve around possible shortcomings of the law but, rather, point to the need to secure its proper implementation. Furthermore, the LIG has served as a jumping-off point for new initiatives by Argentine trans activists—notably, the elaboration of a regulated system of job quotas for trans people—that seek to overcome the persistently adverse living conditions of the trans population in Argentina to this day. Though the law in itself represents an invaluable step forward, there is a clear—and urgent—need to further advance the struggle for trans rights.
BIBLIOGRAPHY

Asociación de Travestis, Transexuales y Transgéneros (ATTTA) and Fundación Huésped. Ley de identidad de género y acceso al cuidado de la salud de las personas trans [Gender identity law and access to health care for transgender people]. Buenos Aires: Fundación Huésped, 2016.

The Art of Identity in India

SHIVAJI K. PANIKKAR
Professor, School of Culture and Creative Expressions Bharat Ratna Dr B.R. Ambedkar University, Delhi, India

The expression of queer identity in contemporary Indian art in a society that criminalized same-sex sexual expression.

For those who choose nonheteronormative gender identity and/or sexual practices in India, the legal system until recently had been punitive. The recent recognition of the civil rights of the “third sex”/transgender/hijra community was followed by the removal of the draconian Section 377 of the Indian Penal Code, which considered all nonheteronormative practices “unnatural”: “Whoever voluntarily has carnal intercourse against the order of nature with any man, woman, or animal shall be punished with imprisonment for life, or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years.” Generally, nonheteronormative practices are seen as abnormal, and any references to such people and behavior remain a matter of shame and embarrassment. The long, drawn-out legal battle to remove this legal code and antediluvian parliamentary politics had made life difficult for the LGBTQ community in India. The hostile circumstance is doubled several times over with the retrograde social and familial heteronormative conventions.

Social and Legal Activism

Given the hostile legal climate, stereotypical representations of queer persons have been rampant within the popular cultural practices of mainstream Indian society. Sympathetic and realistic portrayals of sexual and gender minorities are rarely depicted in audiovisual media, although some serious treatment has been given in the literary, cinematic, and theatrical genres. The limited spheres of academia and of the elite art world, which at times share boundaries with the platforms of identitarian politics, as well as public discussions in print and electronic media, have definitively helped to create a certain awareness of LGBTQ identities in the public sphere.

The impetus for increased LGBTQ representation in cultural practices is definitely drawn from global and local activist practices. The ideological alignment and collectivity against social taboos was signaled in Bombay (now Mumbai) in 1989–1990 with the publication of the quarterly newsletter Bombay dost. Significant in this context was the formation of South Asian organizations and outreach publications in the United States and Europe from the mid-1980s to the early 1990s. Prominent among such collectives are Trikone (Triangle;
Indian collectives that were established around the same time include Red Rose (New Delhi), Fun Club (Kolkata), Friends India (Lucknow), and Garden City Club (Bangalore). Through the mid-1990s and the first decade of the twenty-first century, many more such initiatives and formations took place, including Sneha Sangama, Good as You, and Sabrang (Of All Colors) (all in Bangalore); Humsafar Trust (Cotraveler Trust), Udaan (Flight), and Khush Club (Happy Club) (all in Mumbai); Council Club (Kolkata); Humrahi (Cotraveler) and Naz Foundation (New Delhi); Gay Information Centre (Secunderabad); and Expressions (Hyderabad). Particularly significant are those initiatives and formations that were formed in small towns such as Sahayak Gay Group (Help Gay Group; Akola); Asara (Help; Patna); Sathi (Friend; Cuttack); and Lakshya (Aim; Vadodara). Apart from running help lines and creating common platforms for LGBTQ persons in specific regional locations, these agencies also systematically worked in the areas of mental and physical health by providing counseling and free clinics and by spreading awareness about HIV/AIDS. They also aided in the legal battle against Section 377, a petition against which was filed by the New Delhi–based nongovernmental organization Naz Foundation, which argued that it violated the right to equality, freedom, and personal liberty. On 2 July 2009, the Delhi High Court repealed the section and decriminalized consensual same-sex relations. The Supreme Court of India overturned this on 11 December 2013, and the curative petition against the decision was referred to a five-judge constitution bench for a hearing. On 6 September 2018 the Supreme Court ruled that Section 377 could not be used to punish same-sex sexual activity.

Artists Representing LGBTQ Activism

The artists whose works are discussed below centrally situate their artistic practices within contexts of LGBTQ activism. While this entry does not include all of the midcareer artists or the youngest generation of professionals, those who are included here inevitably belong to the mainstream art profession.

Bhupen Khakhar (1934–2003) In the early to mid-1980s, inspired by examples in the field of art abroad and gathering strength from the international gay liberation movement, Bhupen Khakhar became the first Indian artist to come out of the closet. His 1979 visit to England had been significant; there he saw homosexual men living together, and this trip also exposed him to gay-themed art (Hyman 1998; Kapur 2002). A chartered accountant by profession and self-trained as an artist, he had become a noted painter by the 1970s. He represented the lives of ordinary middle-class people as he innovated an Indian version of pop art, an art movement that emerged from the United Kingdom and the United States in the late 1950s that sought to upend the established social order by elevating imagery from popular and mass culture into “fine art.” Significantly, this hybrid visual narrative style came to be regarded as an argument against puritanical notions about tradition and a replacement for the sought-after identitarian quest in modern Indian art (also known as the quest for Indianness, a central theme in the development of modern art in India), which simultaneously came to be considered as the strength of the artist, despite his amateurish limitations, as it enabled him to be imaginatively ironic, as well as melodramatically provocative and subversive (Panikkar 2003).

Khakhar disclosed his sexuality with his autobiographic paintings You Can't Please All (1981), Two Men in Banaras (1982), and Yayati (1987), which are painted with exuberant clarity, subversive strength, and confidence. The first depicts the fable of an old man and his son walking along with a donkey, who are unable to satisfy the judgmental attitude of the bystanders; because people criticize whoever sits on the animal for being inconsiderate to the other person, the pair finally decides to carry the animal, but as they cross a bridge the donkey falls into the river and dies. In the foreground of the painting a naked older man—unmistakably the artist himself, shown standing on the balcony of a dwelling looking out at this activity—is thought to represent the “coming out” of the closet of the artist. The other two paintings are more explicitly erotic in their theme of an old man in sexual relation to a virile young man, the third painting dealing specifically with subordination through the mythical allegory of the resurrection of the old by the youthful, angelic lover. Drawing from the history of gay identity and from contemporary life, Khakhar contextualizes his representational concerns in popular myths and religious congregational practices, as the intersection between religion and sexuality was a theme that he explored centrally in many paintings of the 1980s.

Through the late 1980s and 1990s, Khakhar’s works were eccentric, bizarre, and enigmatic as he devised a new pictorial language that objectifies the ambivalence of sexual encounters, as observed in his painting Ghost City (1992). Through this mode he explored the indeterminate aspect of life experiences: moments of belief and disbelief, the tension between a desire to fight or ignore a hostile world, and the seriousness and absurdity of life. These elements are present both in his literary works of this time and in his paintings, and they are seen across his short stories and his play Maujila Manilal; the aspect of the bizarre in his fiction helps to interpret his paintings, where the painterly disjunctions and discontinuities, like those in his fiction, reflect the irrationality, passion, and idiocy of the milieu he shared his life with (for his short stories and play, see Khakhar 2001; see also Khakhar 1999, 2000).

Khakhar made art representing the quotidian realities of homosexual men. In doing so, he exposed what until then had been a private and hidden reality, affirming “deviancy” as a public, ordinary, and valid identity. In the process, he constructed deviant sexual narratives in such a way as to infuse them with imaginative, artistic strength and ironic tenacity. For example, his 1994 watercolor How Many Hands Do I Need to Declare My Love to You? juxtaposes same-sex eroticism with Indian religious iconography. In this work, a seated man is cradled by another in a gesture of intimacy and comfort. The main figure has mostly blue skin and many arms, one of which holds a lotus flower—all characteristics of Indic deities. Another blue male figure is central to his 1998 watercolor Picture Taken on Their 30th Wedding Anniversary, which features two seated male figures; the figure with normal pigmentation holds a lotus flower in one hand and the testicles of his partner with the other. Despite being irreverently witty and daringly subversive in his art, Khakhar eschewed any affiliation with emerging activist platforms, and his art was absorbed within the aesthetic sphere of a prudent high culture. He denied being an activist, and his artistic legacy is largely appreciated for its artistic values, rather than for its identity politics or any political statement.

Jehangir Jani, a sculptor, and Sunil Gupta, a curator, writer, and cultural activist, are younger contemporaries of Khakhar. While Jani had no formal training in art, Gupta received his art training in the late 1970s, studying photography at the West Surrey College of Art and Design and earning a master’s degree in photography at the Royal College of Art in London in 1983. Their involvement with high-art practice coincides with the rise of a more self-conscious LGBTQ activism in India and elsewhere. While Jani remained an active member of the Humsafar Trust, a Mumbai-based LGBTQ community organization, Gupta, residing in London and New Delhi, maintained his activist practices in collaboration with several organizations.

Jehangir Jani (1955–) Jani positions himself within the layered discourses around the phenomenology of gay experiences, while he crucially and critically engages with the sociopolitical structures that undermine and discriminate against the lives of sexual minorities. His simultaneous positioning as an artist and an activist enables him to assume a strategy with regard to the political implication of representation, as he has created a vehemently assertive self-image—an oddly displaced and tortured image of the humiliated. Jani first asserted his artistic and political credentials with his 1998 exhibition titled Faerie Tales ... A Re-look, which featured sculptures in ceramic and sheet metal. This was followed by the exhibition titled Stories (2000), with works done in fiberglass and metal overlaid with gold and silver leaf. Through these works, Jani projects the thematic focus on the identity of kothi, the effeminate Indian gay male identity. Maneuvered to assert a frontal, iconic presence, through their odd, effeminate bodily shifts and inflections, Jani’s sculptures ironically objectify the persona of kothis, who are abusively referred to by names such as chhakka in common parlance. Characteristic traits of the body in movement are transcribed into sculpture with indeterminate masculine/feminine traits that translate ordinary bodily flesh into poignant sculptural language. As such, the identity of kothi translates itself into expressions of sexual desire of the deviant, while resisting the repeated silencing, humiliations, painful tortures, and, above all, the insuppressible assertion of will to survive with dignity. The symbolic, the metaphoric, and the allegorical in representation are what enables Jani to achieve this conceptual complexity.
In most of his works, Jani deliberately fragments figures so that they simultaneously assume a propensity to become fetishistic body parts of the effeminate gay persona or become signs to narrate an affirmative stance in resistance against humiliation. Some of his works feature an androgynous face that curiously beams and smirks, and is often repeated like an assertive self-reiteration of the right to be oneself. A relief sculpture such as Chhaka, Chhaka, Chhaka, Chhaka, Chhaka, Chhaka (1998) is an example of such a strategy. Jani makes contradictory things possibilities by allowing the materials to embody their intrinsic qualities and meanings as the fragility of ceramics is juxtaposed with hard, cold sheet metal; through such a combination, he invokes the inequality of power in the confrontations between minorities and majorities. Or, when the artist covers a figure in gold and silver, as in Survival (a continuum), preciousness and godly dignity become ironic qualities of the rejected and the humiliated.

Jani also explores the political representations of sexual identification through multimedia installations such as Ways of Resisting (1992–2002), Lazarus and Anarkali (2002–2003), and Untitled (2004). Through these, he foregrounds the overdisputed terrain of religious faith in relation to his own identity politics, as he articulates the healing power of faith by threading together fragments of Qur’anic verses, a rosary, simulated blood, and surgical gauze. His conflicted relationship with the religion of Islam, into which he was born, is resolved in various ways through his art-making practice. These installations create a total sensory environment with sounds, sights, and bodily allusions: cast body parts, a cloth-covered corpse, pink lamps flickering through simulated television screens, sounds of ritual breast-beating, and invocations written to God. These become signs of desire, betrayal, death, and the hope of resurrection, all woven together with a “gayish” pink shade, an ironic marker of sexual identity.

Sunil Gupta (1953–) Covering a period of four decades starting in the mid-1970s, Sunil Gupta’s photographs cover a wide range of LGBTQ themes. Initially occupied by candid snapshots of men on the streets of New York and London, portraits of gay couples, images of Indian gay men in public spaces in New Delhi, images of illness brought on by HIV infection, historical architectural sites in New Delhi, kids at the NAZ Foundation’s Care Home for HIV-positive children, photos of an Indian village, and a fictional narrative of photographs loosely based on the 1962 film La jetée, directed by Chris Marker, Gupta explores autobiography through complex, myriad tropes, moods, and dispositions, drawn from human history and relationships. Through photographic juxtapositions in diptychs or via superimposed montages—with images of travel and transport often paired with images of South Asian life both in England and India—Gupta has used digital technology to create a sense of narrative, blowing up his images to 3 meters (9.8 feet), adding greatly to their visual impact.

Balbir Krishan (1973–) Formally trained in the forms of conventional academic painting at Babasaheb Bhimrao Ambedkar University in Agra, India, Balbir Krishan celebrates his openly gay sexuality through figurative imagery, which is romantic, idealized, intensely emotional, lyrical, and spiritual. Painted with sharp mannerist finish, the loving, three-dimensional articulation of nude male bodies, set along with natural forms, exudes the transcendental in human sexual union. The exuberantly sensual colors and forms in his works express gay desires that are rare in sensibility and taste in the contemporary art world.

Tejal Shah (1979–) Belonging to the younger generation, the multimedia art practitioner Tejal Shah engages with the mediums of video, photography, performance, food, drawing, sound, installation, and modes of sustainable living. She had her initial art training in photography at RMIT University in Melbourne, Australia, followed by studies at the Art Institute of Chicago and Bard College in upstate New York. Her practice of “queering” everything unselfconsciously manifests “the inappropriate/d other”—one who cannot be appropriated and who is inappropriate. Shah’s earlier works were simulated and parodic moving or static fiction images, such as her 2000 work Chingari chumma (Stinging kiss), a single-channel video projection. Focusing on the realm of fantasy that is hidden from the public eye, the 2006 hijra fantasy series titled What Are You? is a series of collaborative photo performances by Shah undertaken with transgender persons. Enabling their unfulfilled dreams to be performatively enacted, these were exhibited as archival digital prints. Her more recent works are in the medium of analog and digital collages or multichannel video installations. The immersive experience of these works “entails entering alter-curious worlds riddled with fact, fiction, poetry, and mythology, that compel us to engage with layered propositions on the relationships between interspecies, ecology, gender, post-porn, sexuality and consciousness. Having recently come out as an ecosexual, they think of themselves as ‘some kind of artist working on some kind of nature’” as explained on her website (Shah 2018).
Queerphobia and Art

Paralleling the developments in queer art are the varied phobic responses, particularly censorship, that have simultaneously affected queer artistic practices. As noted earlier, most of Bhupen Khakhar’s art was safely and carefully located within protected private gallery spaces and operated within the aesthetic sphere of a prudent elite culture. However, mistreatment of his works has been reported at the National Gallery of Modern Art in New Delhi in 1997 and at the retrospective show at the National Gallery of Modern Art, Mumbai, in November 2003 (Zitzewitz 2014). Curators of these exhibitions used pejorative language to describe Khakhar’s work, while also sidelining or excluding works with explicit gay themes, particularly those inspired by Hindu religion and myths. In October 2007 Jehangir Jani was pressured into adding a fig leaf to his sculpture Great Expectations after the intervention of Mumbai police in an exhibition at the government-run Museum Gallery.

Furthermore, because of the objections raised, the sculpture titled George and the Dragon was withdrawn from the same exhibition and a photograph of the sculpture was installed instead. After many threatening calls, a masked attacker physically assaulted Krishan and his work was vandalized at his exhibition Out Here and Now on 5 January 2012, at New Delhi's Lalit Kala Akademi Gallery. Another exhibition by Krishan at the Muse Gallery (Marriott Hotel, Hyderabad), was closed on 1 December 2013, before it could be opened.

An exhibition of photographs by Gupta inaugurated on 23 March 2012, at New Delhi’s Alliance Française was abruptly closed a day later as a result of intimidation from the police citing violations of Sections 188 and 292 of the Indian Penal Code; these sections cover, respectively, “disobedience to order duly promulgated by a public servant” and the public display of obscene materials. An exploration of gay life, the exhibition featured sixteen color pictures taken by the artist in France two years earlier. The project involved a photo-narrative loosely based on the French science fiction film La jetée, using homosexuality as a medium to connect to life in Paris.

Several artists in general and particularly artists belonging to minority sexual identities have experienced moral policing and censorship in the twenty-first century. The point to be noted is that the so-called negative public responses to LGBTQ art can easily be identified as motivated by fringe groups within the majority Hindu/right-wing political party, which position themselves as the custodians of public morality. As a result, artists practice strict self-censorship, avoid exhibiting in public spaces, and tend to show only in protected private galleries; they tend to use the internet to sell their work directly to foreign (or national) buyers or find sponsorship. It is also a matter of concern that many younger-generation artists, while taking part in LGBTQ events such as pride marches, generally prefer working without the limitations of identititarian labels such as “gay” or “lesbian” and prefer the more fluid category of “queer.” Suffice it to say that LGBTQ art is a highly constrained category today in India, although it has had a vital, compelling presence in the contemporary art scene since the 1990s.
SEE ALSO The Art of Queering Asian Mythology; New Media in Asia; Section 377 and Section 377A; Section 377 in South Asia

BIBLIOGRAPHY

The Art of Queering Asian Mythology

ALPESH KANTILAL PATEL
Associate Professor, Contemporary Art and Theory Florida International University, Miami

An examination of LGBTQ-themed artwork through the lens of Asian mythology.

In 2017 the Museum of Contemporary Art in Taipei organized the first major museum exhibition of artwork dealing with LGBTQ themes across China, Singapore, Hong Kong, and Taiwan. In much the same way, this entry examines works of art—from paintings, photography, and videos to installation, performance, and zines—that explore LGBTQ themes not only from East Asia but also from South Asia and Southeast Asia. While a broad array of countries and subjectivities are covered, the rationale for bringing these particular works together for analysis is not driven by an interest in being comprehensive. Rather, the works are connected by a common theme: they all use the lens of Asian “mythologies” to queer, or rework, traditional concepts of sexuality.

According to the Oxford English Dictionary (OED), the term mythology can refer to “a body or collection of myths, especially those ... belonging to a particular religious or cultural tradition,” as well as more generally a “set of beliefs which underpins or informs a particular point of view.” The first section of this essay focuses on the former definition, or more specifically, artworks that destabilize an Asian myth or legend and thereby reimagine nonnormative subjectivities. For example, Justin Shoulder and Bhenji Ra’s video reworks the manner in which Spanish colonialists coopted the Philippine mythological figure Manananggal—seen as a threat to their homophobic and sexist views—as something to malign. Chitra Ganesh’s photograph draws on the legend of a famed Indian princess who fought against the British but whose visual depiction is largely nonexistent in the historical record. Focusing on the princess’s bravery, Ganesh depicts her as a heroine in armor and thereby effectively transgendered.

The other section of the essay meditates on the OED’s second definition of mythology, according to which the term need not refer to classical understandings of myths, legends, or stories. Mythology can refer to the way beliefs structure societies and become naturalized or the myths of society that promulgate certain truths as normative. Indeed, this is the bedrock of the work of Mumbai-based scholar Devdutt Pattanaik, as well as French philosopher Roland Barthes’s canonical Mythologies (1957), in which he critiques French popular culture and mass media. The artworks discussed in this section of this essay are concerned with how mythology reveals truths for what they are: fabrications or distortions. In this way, LGBTQ subjectivities become part of—rather than stand outside of—the fabric of society. For example, the paintings of Balbir Krishan that are discussed point to how same-sex sexuality is already part of the fabric of society and therefore hardly unnatural or deviant, whereas MuXi’s work suggests the fluidity of gender, rather than gender naturalized as a binary. Moreover, the zines of Thanh “Nu” Mai and Aiden Nguyễn serve as a bridge between Vietnam’s art and LGBT communities to work against the implicit homophobia of the former and the conflation of the latter with the vapidity of nightlife culture.

SUNIL GUPTA (1953–)

An artist whose practice is decidedly transnational in scope, Sunil Gupta is a Canadian citizen, a leading figure in London’s Black Arts movement, and the most prominent queer photographer in India, one who is also involved in curatorial, writing, and activist projects. Born in New Delhi in 1953, he moved to Montreal, Canada, in 1969 where he attended college, played an inaugural role in Canadian LGBT activism, and made amateur work. In 1976 Gupta studied photography under George Tice, Lisette Model, and Philippe Halsman at the New School for Social Research in New York City, and his series Christopher Street (1976) captures a unique moment for the gay West Village—“post-Stonewall and before AIDS,” in Gupta’s words (2011, 27).

When Gupta moved to London in 1978, he developed a photographic practice consonant with the bold and controversial era of identity that aimed to challenge the white hegemony in British arts. After completing degrees from West Surrey College of Art and Design, Farnham (1981), and the Royal College of Art, London (1983), he joined the Greater London Council’s Race Equality Unit, which led to Reflections of the Black Experience (1986), the first show on black British photography (Brixton Art Gallery). Two years later, he cofounded Autograph: The Association of Black Photographers, the first institute dedicated to black photography in London. Photo series such as Exiles (1986), “Pretended” Family Relationships (1988), and Ten Years On (1984–1985) reflect a queer racialized lens through intimate documentary techniques, whereas his Trespass (1992–1995) series’ digital montage imbricate queer and migratory narratives. In 1995 Gupta was diagnosed with HIV, and Homelands (2000–2003) and From Here to Eternity (1999) make personal connections between his ailing body and the various landscapes of his life (India, Canada, and the United Kingdom). Soon, however, his photography came to consider a life, even a love life, with HIV.

In 2004–2005 Gupta returned to New Delhi and became a leading artist and activist in LGBT representation. This period overlaps with the High Court of Delhi’s 2009 repeal of Section 377, an antisodomy law from the colonial period. The photo series Mr. Malhotra’s Party (2007–2012) and Love, Undetectable (2009) shed light on a new “outness” and queer subjectivity among Indians, while The New Pre-Raphaelites (2008–2009) and Sun City (2010) engender a queer aesthetic as campy tableaux vivants full of cheeky visual citations. These last two series depart from his characteristic documentary eye. Gupta returned to London in 2012 and, in his mid-sixties, decided to pursue a doctorate at the University of Westminster.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

* Natasha Bissonauth
  Visiting Assistant Professor of Writing
  Haverford College, Haverford, PA

Overall, mythologies (broadly construed) can be powerful modes to naturalize homophobia or stereotypes, and it is therefore not surprising that the artists discussed in this essay are keen to reimagine them. In the end, what emerges is a composite image from this constellation of disparate works that reimagine the heteronormative mythologies that undergird societal and cultural norms across Asia.

Myths as Connected to Legends

This section focuses on two works that destabilize Asian myths to reimagine nonnormative subjectivities: a video by Australian artists Justin Shoulder and Bhenji Ra, and a photograph by US-based artist Chitra Ganesh.
Justin Shoulder and Bhenji Ra: Ex Nilalang The title of the video Ex Nilalang (2015)—by Justin Shoulder (1985–) and Bhenji Ra (1990–), artists of Filipino descent who are based in Sydney, Australia—can be roughly translated from Tagalog as “creature” or to “create,” with the ex from Latin meaning “out of” and “out from.” The title is fitting both for the reference to folkloric beings in the work and the provocative notion that the often-maligned creature in most mythological traditions can be a creator rather than a destroyer. About twenty minutes long, the video is composed of three parts—“Balud,” “Dyesebel,” and “Lolo ex Machina”—which reimagine Philippine mythological folklore, pop culture, and ancestral spirits, respectively. This entry will examine the first two parts.

“Balud” focuses mostly on the face of an exquisite figure with dazzling, glittering blue makeup and colorless eyes (see Figure 1). She begins a mellifluous song of lament, and when the camera zooms out, her previously unseen wings and long nails come into view. Depicted is the mythological female known as Manananggal—a beautiful woman by day and a “monster” by night. Spanish colonialists turned this figure into something to be feared, supposedly as a way to combat what they perceived as both the precolonial Filipinos’ unabashed sexual liberation of women and their high regard for nonbinary and trans subjects. In the video, Manananggal is played by Jai Jai, a well-known performer in the bakla/trans community of the Philippines. Bakla refers to categories as diverse as transvestite and homosexuality. Jai Jai presents us with a more sympathetic version of the supposed monster and, in so doing, helps us begin to reimagine the marginalized.
The second part of the video, “Dyesebel,” is based on the artists’ visits to clubs in Manila, where they got to know the city's trans community. From these experiences emerged the idea of an underwater nightclub populated by mermaids, inspired by the urban bakla milieu. The artists drew on pop culture, too, by incorporating the name of a popular soap opera in the Philippines: Dyesebel. Dyesebel’s story is, like that of Manananggal, a sad tale. She was born to human parents but was half-human, half-fish. Feared by the community in which she lived, Dyesebel was eventually thrown out of the city and exiled to the sea, where she befriended other mermaids.

Like Manananggal, the siren-mermaid in Philippine mythology is threatening to human society. For Ex Nilalang, the artist Ra takes on the role of Dyesebel, while friends from Manila’s trans nightclub scene portray the other siren-mermaids. They frolic in the waters, seemingly carefree. The underwater scene is meant to be close in sensibility to the Manila trans nightclub scene, which is both a safe haven and a place to celebrate the community's penchant for all things glamorous. The coming together of LGBTQ subjects in nightclubs produces alternative communities of belonging. Art historian Michelle Antoinette writes that the shared space of this symbolic aquatic world invokes “not only the fluid spaces of the Philippine island archipelago, but also of the fluid contact zone for queer-based connection between the Philippines and its diasporas” (2017, 70). In this way, the work reaches beyond the Philippines to the diaspora.

Chitra Ganesh: The Awakening
The work of New York City–based and lesbian-identified artist Chitra Ganesh (1975–) is concerned with Asia and its diaspora, much like that of Shoulder and Ra in “Dyesebel.” Ganesh is well known for her murals and drawings but less so for her photographs, such as The Awakening (2004), which is discussed here. This work ostensibly explores a historical figure that has reached legendary status: the rani, or princess, of the town Jhansi in India, who famously defied the British in the mutiny of 1857 to 1858. The title is ironic, given that the photograph depicts the princess (the artist herself) lying lifeless in the snow. She has a red bandanna covering her head, a bloody wound on one of her forearms, and blood smeared on her cheeks. Her eyes are rolled back. There is a trail of blood in the snow; footsteps are visible in the snow, too, but it is unclear whether they belong to the princess. While the construction of the ornate silver armor out of modest materials, including cardboard, tinfoil, duct tape, a Frisbee, soldering wire, binder fasteners, and a belt, suggests the precariousness of her act—indeed, she failed in her quest to defeat the British—Ganesh focuses on the steely resolve of the character as embodied by the armor, generally reserved for men, that protects her arms, chest, and legs, as well as the trident that lies next to her (see Figure 2).
When doing research for the photograph, Ganesh found that there was little imagery connected to this otherwise famous figure. As she noted in a 2017 email to Alpesh Kantilal Patel, this lack of imagery might be due, in part, to the fact that armor production and representation were strictly guarded and largely secret in order to preserve methods and strategies from enemy knowledge. Nonetheless, the visual gaps in the archive were curious to her, especially since the heroine took on a role reserved for men. Ganesh's depiction of a transgendered rani provides a way forward to navigate these erasures and was informed by her participation in Sexually Liberated Asian Artist Activist People! (SLAAAP!), a group with which she was involved in the late 1990s and early in the first decade of the twenty-first century that promoted alternative narratives of queer Asian subjectivity. SLAAAP! encouraged photo-based interventions in the streets through the distribution of postcards, posters, and flyers. Awakening, though, was intended for the gallery space.
As she wrote to Patel in the aforementioned email, “Where history ends, myths begin.” So, while the photograph might depict death, it is a metaphorical moment of awakening to new subjectivities hitherto unrepresented. Finally, Ganesh noted that when she was growing up in the West in the 1980s, the only photographic images of South Asian girls and women were those that positioned them as individuals who needed to be “saved.” Ganesh was aware that viewers in the United States, in particular, might have these as their only visual reference points for these subjects. With Awakening, her viewers were getting something unexpected: a strong woman who is able to fight for herself.

Myths that Naturalize Norms in Society

This second section explores a broader array of work by artists who attempt to reimagine naturalized norms in society relating to sexuality—that is, myths that effectively have been turned into truths, which in some cases explicitly exclude LGBTQ subjectivities.

Balbir Krishan In a radical shift of British colonial-era law, India decriminalized sex acts between same-sex subjects in 2009. However, by 2013, the courts in India returned to considering same-sex acts a crime, and the laws once again deemed same-sex sexuality as unnatural. In this context, Balbir Krishan (1973–), an artist based in New York and New Delhi, challenges this development through his paintings and drawings. For example, a large section of his work This Is Not Dark Life–VI (2011) is covered in fields of blue, within which he has painted barely visible traces of bodies performing various sexual acts. On the left side, he creates a silhouette of a figure by leaving areas of the canvas unpainted. However, the artist digitally printed onto the “bare” canvas black-and-white snippets of gay male pornography that he found on the internet. The light green paint used to render the legs of another figure in repose reveals to a lesser degree the pornography underneath. Krishan’s painting poetically brings to the fore that which was kept clandestine in India: that men do have sex with each other. Moreover, the work suggests that gay male sex is part of the foundation of society—indeed, it is literally the ground on which the painting is executed. Krishan digitally printed pornography on the bare canvas of another painting, This Is Not Dark Life–VII (2011) (see Figure 3). He covered this canvas primarily in green acrylic paint and depicted multiple figures of different sizes. Parts of some of their bodies are painted red, and, while no overt sex acts are depicted, pornography is visible under the thin layer of paint used to fill the silhouettes. It is worth noting that India’s Supreme Court decriminalized same-sex sexual activity in a 6 September 2018 ruling.

Both of the works discussed above were part of the series Out Here and Now (2011), which was installed in the eponymously titled exhibition in New Delhi at Lalit Kala Akademi in 2011 and 2012. As Krishan described in an unpublished 2017 interview with Alpesh Kantilal Patel, the exhibition coincided with his decision not only to come “out” as gay but also as a professional artist. Illustrating the stakes involved, he was attacked from behind by an unidentified assailant while delivering remarks during the opening reception, and several of his works were either damaged or destroyed. Some, such as a large watercolor with ballpoint ink on paper titled after the aforementioned series of which it is a part, were taken by the police as evidence and not returned. This particular work displays Krishan’s skill in employing fields of color, as evidenced by the golden-yellow he chose for the background and the sapphire blue-green of one of the heads and torsos of the two figures, who are depicted either just before or after performing anal sex. Its unabashed depiction of a gay male sex act distinguishes it from the works previously discussed.

In an earlier work on paper titled Dream of My Handicapped Life (2009), Krishan depicts two figures without heads but conjoined at the shoulders. This work differs in character and color palette from the works he showed in 2012, but not in his expert use of abstraction and color to explore identity politics. The mixture of thin washes of brown, gray, and black paint applied by the artist make the figures appear bruised or sickly. The figures do not have legs below the knees, and their fingers seem unnaturally long. What could have been a loving portrait of two men embracing or kissing becomes instead something potentially monstrous. The pile of red roses at their feet seems ironic. Given that Krishan lost both of his legs below the knee when he attempted suicide by jumping onto railroad tracks, the work can be read as autobiographical. The drawing implies that the categories “lesbian,” “gay,” “bisexual,” “transgender,” and “queer” tend to obscure other identifications, and that they implicitly concern able-bodied individuals. While there has been a strong interest more recently in the West in thinking about LGBTQ studies and disability studies in tandem, this is not the case yet in South Asia. In this way, Krishan’s work is particularly groundbreaking in its insistence on conceptualizing LGBTQ and disability as both/and rather than either/or.

Queer Feminist Works in China In a similar vein but in connection to East Asia, the exhibition WOMEN 我們 homes in on how the subjectivities of women are often obscured within explorations of LGBTQ lives. Organized by San Francisco–based curator Abby Chen, it opened at EMG Gallery in Shanghai in 2011 and traveled to the Chinese Culture Center of San Francisco in 2012, as well as to the Miami Beach Urban Studios (MBUS) gallery, part of Florida International University in Miami, in 2013. The exhibition took shape initially as an exploration of feminism through contemporary Chinese art and visual culture, a woefully unexamined topic in the art world. The title of the exhibition, WOMEN 我們, is instructive. It is a play on an English-Mandarin homophone: the characters, which mean “we” in Chinese, are pronounced like the English word woman. The title succinctly reveals the crux of the exhibition’s curatorial conceit: to examine issues relating to women in China while shifting and stretching the very terms of what the categories of “woman” and “China” signify. The exhibition kept the category of woman under question through its inclusion of works by artists who are not biologically female, as well as of works concerned with gender ambiguity or gay male sexuality. All of the works described in the next paragraph were part of the exhibition.

Shanghai-based emerging artist MuXi’s (1983–) video installation É蛾 (2011; Moth) depicts a graceful, seminaked, and androgynous dancer onto whose back digital drawings of a caterpillar becoming a moth are superimposed. While caterpillars do not have morphological characteristics that distinguish males from females, moths do. Usually female moths are larger than their male counterparts, even though the genetic blueprints dictating development and growth are the same for both. By juxtaposing the equally ambiguously gendered caterpillar and dancer with the supposedly mature and gendered moth—whether male or female is beside the point—the work suggests that sexual dimorphism is as “natural” as the fluidity, rather than fixity, of gender.

Meiren’er 美人兒 (2009; My little one) by Er Gao and Li Zhe—collectively known as Er Gao Production—is less metaphorical than MuXi’s É蛾. It is an hour-long documentary that includes reflections of various members of the LGBTQ community in Guangzhou on their lifestyles. While homosexuality is not illegal in China, its existence is not officially recognized. Underscoring the danger in making their nonnormative subjectivities visible, some of the documentary’s participants wear masks of various kinds. Yet these often carnivalesque and exaggerated masks ultimately serve more as bold avatars than as something to hide behind.
In contrast to the installation and documentary discussed previously, Zhanling shanghai ditie (2012; Occupy Shanghai Subway) by the lesbian advocacy group Shanghai Nvai and Shanghai-based artist Ling Gao (1980–), was designed to be staged outside of a museum or gallery as a bold intervention into the public sphere. The work is, in large part, a comment on the response of Shanghai’s metro authorities to the sharp rise in sexual harassment of women on its trains. The metro asked women to “please be self-dignified to avoid perverts.” That is, instead of the metro seeking redress by demanding that male perpetrators change their ways, it asked women to literally re-dress themselves. In a protest against the metro authorities’ response, which effectively shifted blame from men to women, Gao and other women rode the subway wearing clothing that resembled burkas and full-face veils while holding tablets that read “It’s a dress, not a yes” and “Want to flaunt, not a taunt.” When Sina Weibo—China’s version of Twitter—asked some 45,000 people what they thought of the Shanghai metro’s call for modest dressing, 70 percent of respondents wrote that women should be careful to dress so as to avoid sexual harassment. This is the sort of reaction Gao hoped to curb, and it points again to the complexity of feminism in contemporary China. The women in the subway performance also wore tea strainers as bras (see Figure 4). Gao’s installation Hey! TTTouch Me! (2010) includes tea strainers hung up as if on a kitchen rack. In this work, the sexualization of a common domestic item conflates—and thereby disrupts—the construction of women as either housewives or whores.
Figure 4: Photo from Gao Ling’s Hey! TTTTouch Me! (2010). Gao Ling and other women wore tea strainers as bras over their clothing while riding the Shanghai subway to protest the official recommendation that women dress more modestly to avoid sexual harassment on public transportation. The sexualization of a domestic item conflates—and thereby disrupts—the construction of women as either housewives or whores.

Thanh “Nu” Mai and Aiden Nguyễn’s Underground Zine Vănguard When artists Thanh “Nu” Mai (1983–) and Aiden Nguyễn (1994–) moved to Saigon (Ho Chi Minh City) from New York City, they found a disjuncture between the LGBTQ and art communities, with little overlap. This led them to found the zine Vănguard in 2014, billed as a safe platform for Vietnamese LGBTQ-identified subjects to freely express themselves through visual arts and written works. In the foreword of the inaugural issue, Mai and Nguyễn wrote that the zine is meant to be a vehicle through which the LGBTQ community can “redefine art and dismantle conventionality” (2014, 2). The magazine also aimed to create a space for an LGBTQ community that is not defined by nightlife, with which queer culture is often conflated.

The production of the magazines is often a group effort, given that they are largely made by hand. The building of the issues themselves brings together the LGBTQ and art communities. Issues feature everything from drawings, digital art, and photographs to essays, poems, and short stories in both Vietnamese and English. The slim first issue of only twenty-two pages included several spreads of photographs, many of which were taken in New York City. One photograph depicts the transgender club diva Amande Lepore. Also in the issue is an essay on the colonial genealogy of the slur word bê đê for effeminate homosexuals in Vietnam. The second issue was slightly larger at thirty-six pages, with essays primarily in Vietnamese and the photography more explicitly connected to Vietnam rather than the diaspora.

Photographs showed naked males standing in large-scale urns and naked women lounging confidently, with cigarettes in hand. The artwork also included collage, as well as a mixture of colorful, pop-inspired drawings, often sexual in nature but always playful. For instance, the front cover of issue 2 includes a series of hearts that on closer inspection are seen to be breasts and ball sacks. Overall, four issues had been produced as of 2017 and were available primarily in Vietnam and Boston. Digital versions of every issue are available online, effectively expanding Vănguard’s reach.

Conclusion

All the artists discussed in this essay do not so much suggest dismantling societies wholesale—a difficult feat given the complex ways in which homophobia is often embedded in them—as they do creating new ones, however flawed. Put another way, the artworks revel in mythologies as “fake facts,” but unlike Barthes’s essays in Mythologies, the artworks do not function as negative critique. In their indulgence of mythologies and their capacity for reimagining the world around us—as filled with everything from women warriors and those who wear tea strainers as bras in public to a glittery "monster” with a sonorous voice and an ambiguously gendered human-asmoth—the artworks are generative and generous, and they point toward a more hopeful and ethical future.

SEE ALSO The Art of Identity in India; Bakla; Boys Love (Yaoi) Manga; Graffiti and Graphic Art

BIBLIOGRAPHY

“New Fangled Feminism: Self-Dignified Indeed.” Economist/Shanghai, 29 June 2012.
Asexuality

ELA PRZYBYLO
Ruth Wynn Woodward Postdoctoral Fellow, Gender, Sexuality, and Women's Studies Simon Fraser University, Canada

The range of definitions that can apply to this sexual identity from the perspective of asexual communities, scientific research, and queer and feminist theory.

The sexual identity and orientation of asexuality has a rich cultural, historical, and political life, even as it continues to be overlooked and neglected in LGBTQ2+ (lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender, queer, two-spirit, plus) spaces and narratives. Commonly understood as not being sexually attracted to anyone, the very modes of defining asexuality are nuanced and contested. This entry explores various definitions and debates around asexuality from the perspectives of asexual communities, scientific research, and queer and feminist approaches, focusing on Western research and communities. It begins with an exploration of asexual activist efforts to define asexuality and question compulsory sexuality. Following on this, it depicts how scientific research has handled asexuality and some of the ways it seeks to define asexuality. Next, it explores feminist and queer approaches to asexuality as they intersect with gender, race, and ability.

Defining Asexuality, Redefining Sexuality: Asexual Activisms and Countercultures

Online asexual communities include the online platform called the Asexual Visibility and Education Network (AVEN), as well as blogs and social networking sites, such as Reddit and Tumblr. Offline, asexual organizing happens locally and internationally, including through meet-ups, conferences, pride parades, zine publications, and an annual “Asexual Awareness Week” (held in the last week of October) (Renninger 2015). AVEN, an online community and education space launched by the asexual activist David Jay in 2001, provides this landmark definition: “An asexual person is a person who does not experience sexual attraction” (AVEN “General FAQ”). Significantly, this definition draws on the language of sexual orientation models to argue for asexuality as a sexual orientation. By using the language of “sexual attraction,” asexuality is granted visibility alongside other sexual orientations that likewise pivot around the criterion of “sexual attraction.” This is an important political move in terms of asexual visibility and education, as it allows for asexuality to be mapped onto already existing understandings of how sexual identities and orientations operate.

Cartoon "Asexuality Comes in a Lot of Flavors". As illustrated by this cartoon, there is a spectrum of identities that fall under the umbrella term asexuality, challenging the idea that there is only one way to be asexual and that a single definition of asexuality can function to explain people’s unique engagements with asexuality across social contexts.

Even while asexual activist definitions often draw on the concept of “sexual attraction,” they also trouble it. Definitions of asexuality springing from the asexual, or “ace,” community suggest that sexual attraction is not an innate aspect of intimate or interpersonal life, thus challenging compulsory sexuality, or the belief that sex and sexuality are innate parts of being human. Challenging the idea that everyone is sexual, ace online and offline communities also generate other vocabularies and understandings of thinking about attraction. “Romantic” and “aromantic” are important qualifiers within ace communities, contributing another axis to how attraction between individuals is imagined. Aromantic asexuals are colloquially known as “aros,” and aromantic asexuality indicates both a low interest in romantic contact and a prioritizing of friendship, or of being “friend-focused” (Chasin 2015). Aromantic identity troubles “amatonormativity,” or the organization of life and love according to a hierarchy that prioritizes sexual and romantic couples (Brake 2012; Neal 2016). Romantic asexuality includes an interest in building romantic, if not sexual, relationships with others, which may include kissing, touching, and cuddling. Other attractional modes that are explored by asexual communities on- and offline include aesthetic attraction (“attraction to someone’s appearance”) and sensual attraction (“desire to have physical non-sexual contact with someone else, like affectionate touching”) (AVEN “General FAQ”). These modes for thinking about attraction, as well as the romantic-aromantic axis, denaturalize the assumption that all intimate relating needs to be sexual, providing different definitional tool kits for thinking about attraction to others.

Asexual organizing also presents opportunities for spectrum- and umbrella-based approaches to asexual identification. “Gray asexuality” or “gray-A” refers to people who are asexually identified yet sometimes experience sexual attraction to others, while “demi-sexual” refers to people who experience sexual attraction to people they intimately bond with first. These terms challenge the idea that there is only one way to be asexual and that a single definition of asexuality can function to explain people’s unique engagements with asexuality across social contexts (see AVENwiki “Lexicon”). Furthermore, the terms gray-A and demi present opportunities for troubling a stark division between people who are “sexual” and “asexual.” These terms also challenge the sexual presumption, or that being sexual is the default and neutral mode of being. As the asexual writer Julie Sondra Decker indicates, another term that challenges the assumed neutrality around being sexual is “alloerotic,” which has been in use by ace communities to refer to people who are sexual (2014, 88).

Ace community and organizing also stress the importance of envisioning asexual identity as part of queer and LGBTQ2+ organizing. Asexuality is an orientation that cuts across other sexual identities, such that in addition to identifying as asexual, aces will also identify as bisexual, lesbian, gay, pansexual, and straight, as well as monogamous and polyamorous. Many asexually identified individuals fall under the transgender umbrella and are transmasculine, transfeminine, trans men, trans women, genderqueer, nonbinary, and agender. According to the 2014 AVEN Community Census, only 75 percent of the 10,880 ace respondents who completed the survey identified categorically as “woman/female” or “man/male” (Ginoza et al. 2014) This has also been triangulated by academic research. For example, one study found that, of sixty-six asexual participants, eighteen chose identities that were nonbinary, including gender neutral, androgynous, or genderqueer (MacNeela and Murphy 2015). This is important to remember because many asexual people report feeling excluded from queer and LGBTQ2+ spaces (Ginoza et al. 2014). Furthermore, by thinking of queerness as not only a matter of gender of object choice but also one of nonnormative intimacies and the political challenging of oppressive straight, cisgender, racist, misogynist, and ableist contexts, asexuality can be understood as “queer” in the sense that it responds to the ableist ideas that bind compulsory sexuality with normality, or the idea that to be “healthy” and “normal” means to have and desire sex.

Asexual organizing effectively presents a challenge to asexual discrimination. Researchers across fields have provided evidence for “asexphobia” (Kim 2014) or “anti-asexual bias/prejudice” such that asexuals are understood as “deficient,” “less human, and disliked” (MacInnis and Hodson 2012, 740). Asexphobia exists at the level of attitudes that have negative effects on asexual people when they are interrogated and asked intrusive questions about their bodies and sexual lives, or when they are presented with “denial narratives” to undermine the validity of their asexuality (MacNeela and Murphy 2015). Discrimination can also take the form of social and sexual exclusion, including in queer contexts; through “conversion” practices in medical and clinical environments to encourage asexuals to have sex; with unwanted and coerced sex in partner contexts; through the misdiagnosis of sexual desire disorders in people who are asexual; and with invisibility and toxic attention or the fetishization of asexual identity (Ginoza et al. 2014; Przybylo 2014; Chasin 2015; Cerankowski 2014). Recognizing discrimination is important because it refuses to see individual acts against asexuals as incidental, providing a systemic view on patterns of “dislike” against asexuals.

A final definitional element arising from asexual communities is the idea of different approaches to sex and sexuality. The sociologist Mark Carrigan (2011) observed that there are three general dynamics among asexual people: sex positivity, sex neutrality, and sex repulsion. In this sense, some asexual people experience repulsion to sex, whereas others “love that you love sex”— as Jay shouted to onlookers at a San Francisco pride parade featured in the 2011 documentary (A)sexual. Furthermore, some asexual people engage in sex and BDSM, suggesting that sexual behavior and sexual identity are not always linked in obvious or absolute ways (Sloan 2015). It is significant to understand all these positionalities as valid and as part of the spectrum of approaches to asexuality and sexuality more broadly.

It is also important to take note of the ways in which asexual organizing and community have arisen as an international identity, though notably one that has been most frequently studied from Western perspectives. AVEN itself is made up of more than 250,000 members, 160,000-plus of whom were on non-English forums as of 1 January 2017 (Brown 2017). Through the flourishing of online asexual cultures, the terminology generated around asexuality has developed and been taken up in and outside the United States and in numerous other countries, including, for example, Japan, India, Poland, the Netherlands, New Zealand, and the United Kingdom. In Japan, for instance, slightly different names around asexuality have emerged: “sexless,” signifying those in married couples who do not have sex; “asexual,” often referring to aromantics; “nonsexual,” often referring to romantic asexuals; and “unsexual,” speaking to those who have sexual desire but do not want to have sex (Harris-Hijiri 2014). Similarly, Day Wong (2015) has explored the phenomenon of asexual marriages in China as one that overlaps with, yet is distinct from, asexual identity as articulated by AVEN. Because of the many aspects and types of asexual identification and experiences, as previously listed, it is useful to think of asexuality in the plural as “asexualities” (Cerankowski and Milks 2010)—an intricate identity that is not possible to contain within one definition.
From Pathology to Allyhood: Science and Asexuality

In distinction to asexual communities, scientific researchers of the past and present tend to take on different approaches to measuring and defining asexuality. In some cases, researchers function as asexual allies, working for the benefit of asexual communities and individuals through the methods of developing accountability and collaboration, whereas at other times the research stemming from the sciences pathologizes asexuality—conceiving of asexuality as a problem to be fixed by medical science. Scientific researchers of asexuality strive to use the measures, tools, languages, and methods of science to demonstrate how sexual orientations, including asexuality, operate in the body and mind, as well as to quantify the occurrence of asexuality among the general population.

Historically, there has been a host of diagnoses that pathologized low levels of sexual desire in North America, western Europe, and other Western countries. Low sexual desire has, since the nineteenth century, been captured with such terms as “sexual anesthesia,” “sexual coldness,” frigidity, and “inhibited sexual desire,” and more recently as “hypoactive sexual desire disorder” and within the fifth edition of the Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders (DSM-5 [2013]) as “female sexual interest / arousal disorder” and “male hypoactive sexual desire disorder” (Cryle and Moore 2011; Ellis 1912; Hastings 1963; Krafft-Ebing [1886] 1922; Lief 1977; Kim 2014). These labels have functioned mostly to disproportionately problematize women's low levels of sexual desire. It has been argued that around the beginning of the twentieth century, Western discourses of white women's “passionlessness” or their “innate” low sexual desire began to shift to ideas that women were meant to be, within the proper heterosexual marital context, sexual and sexually desiring (Cott 1978). Furthermore, this increase in the preferred level of white women's sexual desire in the early twentieth century in Western countries is tied to a fear that whiteness was under threat on account of a lower birthrate. This fear of “white extinction,” buttressed by evolutionary theories and the rise of eugenics, informed an emerging sexological and marriage manual discourse that fostered an intoxication with marriage as a site of sexual satisfaction for white women and a move away from their previously purported “asexual” nature (Owen 2014; Carter 2007).

Alfred C. Kinsey's (1894–1956) development of the seven-point scale of sexual orientation in the United States in the 1940s and 1950s provided an early example of scientific conceptualizations of asexuality. While it is well known that Kinsey stipulated a spectrum-based model of hetero-homo attraction, what is less known is that he also put forward a category known as group “X” whom he understood as those with “no socio-sexual contacts or reactions,” and who “do not respond erotically to either heterosexual or homosexual stimuli, and do not have overt physical contacts with individuals of either sex in which there is evidence of any response” (Kinsey et al. 1948, 638, 647). Furthermore, Kinsey identified 2 percent of men over age twenty-five (656) and “a goodly number of females” (Kinsey et al. 1953, 472) as belonging to this group. It is interesting to note that asexuality, in Kinsey's model, occupied a space outside of the hetero-homo spectrum, placing asexuals as outliers on the map of sexual orientation.

Michael D. Storms's work from the late 1970s and early 1980s provided the next major engagement with asexuality through a reconceptualization of the Kinsey scale in the form of a four-quadrant grid that includes not only heterosexuality and homosexuality but also bisexuality and asexuality, each with a quarter of the grid space. Notably, Storms (1980), along with similar work by Paula S. Nurius (1983), provides a first articulation of asexuality by seeing asexuality as a sexual orientation. William H. Masters, Virginia E. Johnson, and Robert C. Kolodny provide some recognition of asexuality in their “typology of homosexuals,” discussing “asexual homosexuals” as “low in sexual interest and activity and ... not ‘coupled’” (1986, 365). They identify 16 percent of gay men and 11 percent of lesbians as asexual. However, in the process of identifying gay asexuality, they also pathologized asexuals by rendering them “more secretive,” “dysfunctional,” “worse off psychologically” than other homosexuals, and “generally loners” (365).

A groundbreaking piece of scientific scholarship on asexuality came in 2004 when the Canadian psychologist Anthony F. Bogaert published an analysis of the preexisting UK National Survey of Sexual Attitudes and Lifestyles (1994), which happened to have as one of its answer choices “I have never felt sexually attracted to anyone at all” (Johnson et al. 1994, 185). Bogaert’s seminal piece, invested in deducing whether or not asexuality was “real,” brought scientific and popular attention to asexuality in an unprecedented way. After its publication, many mainstream popular news sources and talk shows, including Fox News, The View, The Montel Williams Show, ABC’s 20/20, and CNN, did specials on asexuality, inviting AVEN’s Jay, other asexually identified individuals, “(s)experts” such as sex counselors and scientific sex researchers (Potts 2002), and Bogaert himself to speak on behalf of the legitimacy of asexuality. Though lending visibility to asexuality, much of this popular attention functioned to spectacularize asexuals (Cerankowski 2014) while also representing mostly white, able-bodied, and cisgender male asexuals as exemplars of asexuality (Owen 2014; Przybylo and Cooper 2014). Bogaert’s operationalization of asexuality both in his 2004 piece and in his other work, such as his 2012 book Understanding Asexuality, tends to provide a limiting definition of asexuality that treats asexuals as objects of research to be studied.

Yet a major benefit of Bogaert's study was that it presented a quantitative indication of what percentage of the population might be asexual that has since been used to add legitimacy and credibility to asexuality both in research and the media. Bogaert's 2004 study estimated that 1.05 percent of the population was asexual (drawing on UK-based statistics), while other studies have ranged from 0.4 to 5.5 percent and have focused on findings in the United States and United Kingdom (Aicken et al. 2013; Poston and Baumle 2010). It is important to note the Western, developed-world focus of these studies and that they tend to draw on preexisting data. Sociological data with nearly 1,000 participants in Japan found that people in their twenties and thirties had an increasing tendency for “asexual behavior” and that asexuality is especially common among young Japanese men sometimes referred to as “herbivores” (Kobayashi 2017).

Contemporary scientific research on asexuality focuses on exploring subjective versus physiological arousal, while for the most part arguing against understandings of asexuality as a pathology. Most prominently, Lori A. Brotto and colleagues at the University of British Columbia Sexual Health Laboratory undertake studies to ascertain that asexuality is a sexual orientation (as opposed to a paraphilia or a sexual dysfunction) and to establish how it is possible for physiological/genital arousal to be present even as subjective attraction is not (Brotto and Yule 2011, 2017). Brotto and colleagues have developed the “Asexuality Identification Scale (AIS)” that consists of twelve questions that measure whether someone is asexual through asking whether the person has experienced sexual attraction, whether an ideal relationship for them would involve sexual activity, and whether they avoid situations that might include sex (Yule et al. 2015).

Brotto, alongside asexual activists such as Jay and Andrew Hinderliter, played a key role in removing asexuality as a sexual disorder from the DSM-5, such that the DSM-5 now has exceptions under low-sexual-desire diagnoses for asexuality. Furthermore, whereas the DSM-IV-TR articulated so-called interpersonal distress as a proper cause for diagnosing hypoactive sexual desire disorder (HSDD), the DSM-5 does not allow interpersonal distress to be an indicator of female sexual interest/arousal disorder (FSIAD) or male hypoactive sexual desire disorder. Notably, there is a politics and money-generating factor at work in these diagnoses, especially with the US Food and Drug Administration's approval in 2015 of the drug flibanserin (sold under the brand name Addyi) for the treatment of HSDD/FSIAD; despite unimpressive clinical trials, this drug can now be prescribed to cisgender women as a Viagra-equivalent for stimulating sexual desire.

As outlined, scientific and medical scientific research on asexuality has a checkered relationship with asexuality, much as with other sexual orientations. With the “truth-based” quality often granted to scientific and medical knowledge, it often tends to function as the final word on asexuality and its definitions. While there are possibilities and examples of allyship and of adding legitimacy to asexuality, scientific research can also easily pathologize asexuality because of its commitment to the wedding of “health” and “normality” with sexual desire and attraction through an investment in compulsory sexuality.

Resonances and Intersectionality: Queer and Feminist Approaches to Defining Asexuality

Queer and feminist approaches to asexuality tend to both broaden and pluralize what can “count” as asexuality and how asexuality is defined. KJ Cerankowski and M. Milks (2010) have written that by calling attention to the plural embodiments and expressions of asexuality—as asexualities—it is possible to more fully account for the spectrum of asexual experiences. Ela Przybylo and Danielle Cooper build on this analysis by calling for a broadening of definitions of asexuality. Instead of accepting the definitions of asexuality put forward by the “truth archive” of science they invite for an understanding of “asexual resonances” that challenges the assumption that queerness must be sexual in nature, asserting that “where there is queerness there is also asexuality” (2014, 299). Broadening and pluralizing asexual definitions is important because it is both a more inclusive approach to asexuality and one that acknowledges sexual fluidity—or that a/sexuality changes over the course of a life span. This presents a direct challenge to some of the more limiting understandings of asexuality, such as Bogaert’s (2012) assertion that asexuality, in order to count as an orientation, must be lifelong or the DSM-5’s commentary that for women to avoid the diagnosis of female sexual interest/arousal disorder (and count as “asexual”) they must have never experienced sexual attraction. In this sense, feminist and queer approaches to asexuality push back against a medical model that tends to pathologize low sexual desire.
Second, feminist and queer broadenings of definitions around asexuality also constitute an expansion of the asexual archive, challenging what has tended to be a cisgender, male, and white canon of asexuality. Canonized examples of asexuality include characters such as Todd on BoJack Horseman, Jughead Jones in Archie Comics, the title character on Doctor Who, Sheldon on The Big Bang Theory, Benedict Cumberbatch’s character on the TV show Sherlock, and the first asexual character featured on mainstream television in the New Zealand soap opera Shortland Street. Broadening the archive around asexuality involves thinking about asexuality intersectionally, questioning why asexuality can “count” only if it is a born-thisway type of sexual orientation, allowing for (a)sexual fluidity over the life span, and focusing on queer and feminist representations of asexuality in particular (Przybylo and Cooper 2014). For example, Eunjung Kim (2010, 2011) expands the asexual archive by focusing on asexuality and disability in Donna Williams’s (1963–2017) memoirs about her experiences with autism and asexuality and in the film Snow Cake (2006), which features an autistic and asexual character. Through doing this, she challenges the ablebodied canon of asexuality that is invested in proving that asexuals are “normal” and not “disabled.” In a different way, Przybylo and Cooper (2014) situate the artist Agnes Martin (1912–2004) and the writer Valerie Solanas (1936–1988) as “asexual” in a broad sense of the term, suggesting that an asexual art practice and political asexuality, respectively, can be other modes through which to understand asexuality in conversation with asexual orientation proper.

Third, queer and feminist research definitions of asexuality also place asexuality in direct dialogue with larger power structures and patterns of injustice. Developing the important term compulsory sexuality by drawing on the work of the legal scholar Elizabeth F. Emens (2014), Kristina Gupta (2015) elaborates on the ways in which compulsory sexuality is a system that encourages some people to have sex, even while banning marginalized groups from sexual expression through the process of “desexualization.” “Sexusociety,” or a society organized around sex (Przybylo 2011), partakes in desexualization, as Kim’s work explores, to render marginalized groups such as people with disabilities, lesbians and transgender people, children and older adults, people of size, and some racialized groups as “asexual” by default—misusing the term asexuality in the process. For example, transgender people have historically needed to feign asexuality and demonstrate disgust for homosexual sex in order to have their surgeries approved and their trans identities confirmed as “valid” by medicine (Valentine 2007). More broadly, desexualization ranges from discourses around people with disabilities not being capable of sex or not being desirable to eugenics-based initiatives for managing a population through controlling reproduction via methods of coerced sterilization.

Desexualization and compulsory sexuality are also linked to hypersexualization, or the branding of some groups and most especially gay men and racialized groups as excessively sexual and lascivious and thus in need of population management. Treatment of people with AIDS in the 1980s, for example, and the pivoting of the “AIDS epidemic” as “God’s punishment for being gay” demonstrate how the deployment of hypersexualization, in combination with homophobia, can have lethal effects on marginalized groups. Ianna Hawkins Owen (2014) discusses how compulsory sexuality has uneven racial histories, such that whiteness has tended to emulate an “asexuality-as-ideal” as demonstrative of a form of innocence, moral control, and restraint, whereas black people have often been positioned as hypersexual so as to justify chattel slavery, lynching, and other instruments of racism. Hypersexualization and desexualization have thus been used historically and are in the present used as forms of social control and oppression, toward the maintenance of a white, able-bodied, heteropatriarchal nation-state. Feminist and queer research on asexuality thus invites examinations of the intersectional histories and present-day realities of compulsory sexuality.

Fourth, feminist and queer researchers have also situated asexuality as a possible mode of resistance against oppressive social structures. Asexuality in this sense is explored less as a sexual orientation than as a political strategy. Breanne Fahs (2010) explored asexuality as a “radical refusal” in use by women’s liberation feminists such as Cell 16, Dana Densmore and Roxanne Dunbar-Ortiz (members of Cell 16), and Solanas. In various ways, these feminists articulated a refusal of sex, and particularly heterosexual sex, as a means toward getting things done in the women’s revolution, creating world systems apart from cisgender men, and exploring various forms of erotics between women. Asexuality was likewise articulated as both an anti-sexist and anti-racist strategy by figures such as the novelist Toni Cade Bambara (1939–1995) and the Young Lords Party (YLP), a Puerto Rican leftist group. Bambara (1970) articulates sex as a colonial form of control against black women, while the women of the YLP staged a sex strike in 1970 as a way to demand that changes be made within the party, such as elevating women to positions of power, eradicating machismo, and educating the group on feminist concerns (Nelson 2003). Through situating political asexuality as a form of sex rebellion, these and other feminists provided an oppositional platform to racism, sexism, and patriarchy, as well as to ideas of compulsory sexuality or sexusociety (Przybylo 2011).

Asexuality, like any other sexual orientation, is widely varied in terms of experiences, intersecting identities, and expressions. It is thus no surprise that it has yielded various definitions tied to the stakes of the actors involved. Scientific research has seesawed between pathologizing asexuality and legitimating it as a sexual orientation, whereas feminist and queer researchers have explored the political, intersectional, and resistance-based possibilities of asexuality, questioning limiting definitions of asexuality and asking that asexuality be considered alongside desexualization. Asexual activists and community members, as history makers of the asexuality movement, have provided online and offline languages, vocabularies, and symbologies around asexuality, arguing for inclusion in LGBTQ2+ spaces, bringing asexuality into visibility in unprecedented ways. Together, the overlapping spaces of research and activism raise questions about the omissions of asexuality in queer spaces and stories and provide a compelling reason to think about sexual orientation and identity beyond sexual attraction.

SEE ALSO  Cisgender or Cis; Eunuchs; Kinsey Scale

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Neal, Michon. "5 Ways Amatonormativity Sets Harmful Relationship Norms for Us All." Everyday Feminism, 8 April 2016.
http://everydayfeminism.com/2016/04/amatonormativity-expectations/

FILMOGRAPHY

The Asia Pacific Transgender Network (APTN) was organized in 2009 and launched in December of that year as a regional advocacy and coordinating body for organizations serving trans individuals in the Asia Pacific region. The initial focus was on the policy and program needs of trans women in relation to HIV, human rights, and social well-being issues, such as violence, stigma, legal recognition, and discrimination in employment and health services. Regional networks for “key populations” and “most at risk populations” (groups imminently requiring highly specialized HIV interventions) are important in providing a stronger, unified voice for affected communities, nongovernmental organizations, national bodies, international organizations, health care providers, and donors. Primary roles of APTN include strategic leadership, advocacy for trans-specific needs including the development of policy recommendations, capacity building for organizations serving the needs of trans peoples, network strengthening, and disseminating strategic information. APTN was thus established as a network and platform to address the unique needs of trans people in the region. Although its history is relatively recent, the deaths of key figures, the shutting of community organizations, rapid turnover in personnel, shifts in global strategies to deal with the HIV epidemic, ideological realignments of major HIV funders such as the US government, and the continuing erasure of non-English voices make it difficult to reconstruct the founding of APTN.

Early History and Founding

APTN developed from two parallel sets of sex-worker organizing and gay men’s support based in Bangkok, Thailand, during a period when trans issues were starting to be prioritized in HIV response, programming, and research in the United States (Bockting et al. 1998; Clements-Nolle et al. 2001; Nemoto et al. 2004; Herbst et al. 2008), globally (Pisani 2008; Beyrer et al. 2012; Baral et al. 2013), and in Thailand (Jenkins et al. 2005; Guadamuz et al. 2011; van Griensven et al. 2013). Trans members of the Asia Pacific Network of Sex Workers (APNSW) decided to develop a transgender network at Transtravaganza, a trans health workshop for sex workers held in Pattaya, Thailand, in January 2006. Trans representatives from eight countries prioritized a health resource to be written in simple language that would be readily translated into local languages. The booklet would include general health information, detailed information on hormones, useful HIV-prevention information specific to trans needs, material on mental health issues and aging, and specific information for HIV-positive trans people. Andrew Hunter, policy director of APNSW and president of the Global Network of Sex Work Projects, applied for backing and managed the project on behalf of APNSW with funding from the Foundation for AIDS Research (amfAR).

During the Risks and Responsibilities Consultation on Male Sexual Health and HIV in Asia and the Pacific in New Delhi, India (23–26 September 2006), which was coordinated by the nascent Asia Pacific Coalition on Male Sexual Health (APCOM), the trans representatives resolved to create their own networks, coalitions, and community-based organizations among themselves, as well as to seek separate funding to support these formations and HIV-prevention activities (Khan et al. 2006). The men who have sex with men (MSM) organizations in attendance resolved to support this endeavor. Four problems were highlighted:

1. issues faced by trans people are distinct and separate from those faced by MSM;
2. trans people are often marginalized in MSM funding streams (Fried and Kowalski-Morton 2008);
3. trans women are equally, if not more vulnerable than MSM to HIV infection (Baral et al. 2013); and
4. trans people face stigma and discrimination based on sexuality (like MSM), but also are specifically vulnerable to gender-based violence (Lombardi et al. 2002; Stotzer 2009).

Paul Causey, an early organizer and consultant for APCOM, spearheaded the effort to include trans women and started to use the acronym MSM & TG, rather than just MSM, to refer to men who have sex with men, gay men, and transgender people.

Khartini Slamah of APNSW, the Pink Triangle Foundation, and Laxmi Narayan Tripathi of Astitiva were instrumental in advocating for trans women at both events. The primary message from trans women such as Slamah was “We are not gay men in dresses.” The inclusion of trans women in MSM services, research, and data reporting rendered transgender HIV incidence and needs invisible. This situation compounds the lack of services and systemic discrimination trans women face in health services and society in general. APNSW and APCOM recognized the urgent need for trans-specific interventions, including information on trans health, rights issues, gender-based violence, HIV vulnerability, and HIV-positive care and support. Both organizations also acknowledged that trans communities are best placed to address these issues and should be encouraged and supported to form their own regional network, and thus resolved to address the above issues by supporting the formation of a transgender network for the Asia Pacific region.
In 2009 APNSW’s Hunter hired Dredge Kang to produce a transgender health booklet, based on his prior experience developing trans programs and materials for Asian and Pacific Islander Americans in Los Angeles and San Francisco. At the same time, Shivananda Khan, chairperson of APCOM and chief executive of the Naz Foundation International, hired Kang to create a regional transgender network. Kang suggested that there could be synergy between the two projects and organized a collaborative framework for both projects (Kang 2011). He also advocated for a local trans woman to be responsible for the work under his mentorship in order to develop local trans capacity. Kang hired Sitthiphan (Hua) Boonyapisomparn, who was working at the Southeast Asian Consortium on Gender, Sexuality, and Health housed at Mahidol University’s Center for Health Policy Studies and had previously been the coordinator of Sisters Foundation–Center for Transgenders, to be the interim convener of the APTN. Kang volunteered his time as a coach while taking on the responsibility of writing the transgender health handbook.

Kang enlisted the help of Vince Crisostomo of the Coalition of Asia Pacific Regional Networks on HIV/AIDS (Seven Sisters; of which APNSW was a member) to provide additional in-kind logistical support in Bangkok. Seven Sisters was a coalition of HIV networks, now defunct, initiated at the fifth International Congress on AIDS in Asia and the Pacific (ICAAP) in 1999 in Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia, formalized in 2001 as a Malaysian and later Thai foundation. As a broad-based alliance Seven Sisters brought together seven regional networks: APNSW, AIDS Society of Asia Pacific, Asia Pacific Council of AIDS Service Organisations, Asia Pacific Network of People Living with HIV/AIDS (APN+), Asia Pacific Rainbow, Asian Harm Reduction Network, and Co-ordination of Action Research on AIDS and Mobility in Asia. Crisostomo acknowledged that Seven Sisters should support the inclusion and institutionalization of a trans network within their framework.

Boonyapisomparn and Kang thus worked to manage both projects simultaneously. Planning meetings for both projects were coordinated to overlap so that members participating in both would have to travel only once; this allowed for travel funding to be maximized in joint project consultations. The APNSW Transgender Health Handbook (Kang 2010b) was published shortly after the APTN development conference in 2009 in Bangkok. The following year, an Indonesian version was published (other planned versions never came to fruition, in part due to the untimely death of Hunter). The synergy between the projects allowed both to be completed for approximately $25,000 of combined dedicated funding in small project grants from amfAR and the Joint United Nations Programme on HIV/AIDS (UNAIDS).

Representations and Coalitions

Representational issues were at the core of APTN organizing. The initial APTN organizing conference participants were identified by a committee led by Boonyapisomparn and Kang through consultation with APNSW, APCOM, and subregional and special interest networks.
at the 2009 ICAAP in Bali, Indonesia. Because funding was very limited and the mission of the network focused on HIV, invitations were limited to trans women, with a focus on HIV in resource-poor settings (i.e., developing countries). One of the first discussions was about defining “Asia Pacific,” as Australian representatives were claiming “Asian” national status independent of “Asian” race or ethnicity. Organizers were concerned that Australian and New Zealander participants would dominate the conference and that their issues were very different both from those of other developed nations in the region (e.g., Japan, South Korea, and Taiwan) and especially from those of developing nations. Similarly, there was dialogue about how to define and identify “transgender” community representatives. There was also discussion about what constitutes trans men in a region with a burgeoning, but relatively invisible trans male community among widespread and widely recognized trans masculinities (Blackwood and Wieringa 2007), such as Thai toms (Sinnott 2004), Indonesian tombois (Blackwood 2010), Filipinx tombois (Fajardo 2008), and Chinese individuals assigned female at birth who took on various masculine identities (Leung 2002). Given the guidance from APNSW and APCOM, the initial focus on HIV, the lack of representation of trans men in HIV work, the limited resources involved, the organizing committee decided not to include trans men as participants. Similarly, intersex individuals also were not included in the purview. Participants were invited to act as representatives on behalf of geographic subregions or major countries (excluding Australia and New Zealand) and such special demographic populations as youths, drug users, and sex workers.
A group of trans women nominated by the organizing committee as well as three non-trans experts with extensive knowledge of trans issues were invited to the APTN development conference. The conference was opened by Andy Searle, senior adviser, Sexual and Gender Diversity Knowledge Management Unit from the Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria. Experts then laid out the three core issues to be addressed and to inform the decisions at the workshop: health (Graham Neilsen, adviser on sexual and reproductive health from Family Health International), legal (Douglas Sanders, professor emeritus in law at Canada's University of British Columbia), and research (Sam Winter, associate dean and associate professor, Faculty of Education, University of Hong Kong). While English remains the hegemonic language of transnational organizing, simultaneous interpretation was provided in Khmer, Mandarin, and Thai to broaden the participation of representatives with limited English ability.

As participants did not know how transgender identities were defined and lived throughout the region, the majority of the first day of the conference was devoted to presentations by representatives of their populations. The representative from the Pacific was unable to attend due to travel complications. Additionally, the lack of a Filipina participant was noted. The second two days were focused on APTN structure, strategy, planning, and fund development. Participants identified APTN's vision as “A world free of gender stigma, discrimination and marginalization, where everyone has the same life opportunities regardless of their gender identity or sexuality.” Furthermore, “The mission of APTN is to enable transgender women in the Asia Pacific region to organize and advocate to improve their health, protect their human rights, and enhance their social well-being and the quality of their lives” (Kang 2010a).

Three broad issues were of salience for representation. First, APTN had to decide on how “transgender” and a trans community representative would be defined in the Asia Pacific region. The issue of local subjects who did not identify as transgender (or transsexual) was raised repeatedly. During the presentations, participants described a wide variety of local trans identities in the region, including hijra, banchi, waria, kathoey, and srey sros, and numerous subclassifications, such as "long hair" or “short hair.” Many of these individuals did not know, use, or identify with the term transgender, and some saw the term as an inapplicable foreign, Western, or middleclass concept. There was widespread acknowledgment that gender identity and sexual orientation were not distinct in many contexts. Thus, an absolute division between trans women and gay men or trans men and lesbians was considered tenuous. Additionally, there are many paths to trans identity, and individuals often move through various identifications in both directions throughout their lives (e.g., identify as a gay man, as a trans woman, and as a gay man again). It was also important not to position the Asia Pacific region behind the presumed modernity of the metropolitan West and its hegemonic sex/gender systems (Towle and Morgan 2002; Halberstam 2005).

There was also extensive discussion about who should be a trans representative and whether that person had to identify as trans or be “out.” The framework of middleclass Western confession and disclosure in the mode of “coming out” was not applicable for most individuals, who instead performatively “showed out” (Kang 2014), engaged in other tacit forms of acknowledgment (Decena 2011; Tan 2011), or actively hid their status due to legal, religious, and safety concerns. In a similar vein, “passing” was not considered important in contexts that socially recognized more than two genders (Peletz 2009). Finally, the centrality of medicalization (e.g., gender identity disorder) is not a relevant framework for identity or its resistance. Stigma attached to transgenderism had little to do with psychiatric classification; rather, marginalization was primarily bound to social institutions and relationships, such as religion, gender norms, family relations, romantic expectations, and occupation, especially as sex workers. Criteria for membership that were considered inaccessible, onerous, or dangerous in various nations were rejected, including use of hormones, cross-dressing, living openly as a trans woman, and working for an officially recognized trans program or organization. Participants emphasized that “feeling one is trans” was more important than being recognized as trans by others within a given cultural context. Thus, three broad criteria were enlisted in limiting membership:
Second, the issue of religion was raised in regard to hijras and Muslims. The representatives for India, South Asia, and Muslims focused significant attention on the specific needs of the hijra communities living in India, Pakistan, Nepal, and Bangladesh. Although severely marginalized in all four countries, hijras had started to gain specific constitutional rights. The representatives argued that hijras have their own history, culturally sanctioned religious roles, and kinship networks that are distinct from those who identify as “transgender” in a “global” or cross-cultural sense (Nanda 1999; Reddy 2005). At least in India, hijras were treated separately from trans women in national HIV-prevention plans. The United Nations Development Programme held six regional consultations with hijras and transgender women in May and June 2009 (Chakrapani 2010) that focused on developing a consensus around “commonly acceptable” definitions of these groups and their specific social, policy, rights, and resource issues in relation to HIV. The representatives were concerned that the unique issues of hijra communities would not be fully addressed unless they had their own representative on the interim governing board. Furthermore, other representatives who were Muslim noted that the needs of Muslims in such Muslim-majority countries as Malaysia or Indonesia should be considered completely distinct from those of Muslim-identified hijras. The participating Muslim representative was a hijra. Therefore, it was proposed that hijras and Muslims required distinct representation.

Third, power differentials in professional class and education were acknowledged. Nearly half of the representatives were current or former sex workers. Because many trans women are sex workers, there was concern that the network should not marginalize trans sex workers, but at the same time it should delegitimize the assumption that all trans women are sex workers and acknowledge the wide variability in sex work (Hwahng and Nuttbrock 2007; Infante et al. 2009). It was noted that sex workers are often relegated to lower-status functions in organizations. Furthermore, trans women often had limited access to English- and internet-based resources. Many trans women in the region did not communicate online, but rather through social networks in such sites as beauty parlors. A network representing trans women had to address these issues.

In summary, the discussions about representation focused on what constituted “transgender” in the Asia Pacific region and on the issues of religion, language, and class. Consensus about representation was reached and a framework for APTN board membership was accepted, comprising a governing structure based on seven geographic subregions and seven key populations forming a fourteen-seat interim governing board (constituted from the conference participants, with additional gaps noted). It was stipulated that one of the India or South Asia representatives must be hijra. Thus, the governing board was constituted with representatives from Cambodia, China, India, Indonesia, Malaysia, Nepal, Singapore, and Thailand (APTN 2010).

Hua Boonyapisomparn (Thailand), the conference convener, was unanimously elected APTN coordinator. Representatives and alternates were also appointed to the boards of APNSW, APCOM, and Seven Sisters. As APNSW requires sex worker peer participation, the interim board agreed that the sex worker representative of APTN would automatically be the representative for APNSW. In addition, the working group was tasked with drafting formal letters requesting transgender representatives on the boards of the APN+ and the Asian Network of People Who Use Drugs. The outputs from the conference were:

1. formation of a work plan and budget for 2010;
2. development and agreement on the vision, mission, and core values of APTN;
3. development of the network's organizational and management structure;
4. nomination and selection of people to form an APTN working group with key roles; and
5. identification of potential funders and capacity building needs.

Fighting the pathologization of transgenderism as a mental disorder was also highlighted as the criteria for gender identity disorder were being reconfigured by the World Professional Association for Transgender Health for the Diagnostic and Statistical Manual (APA 2013). The event received broad media and organizational attention from trans, HIV, and other groups around the world, creating linkages with other networks and organizations.

Continual Evolution

APTN has changed significantly since its founding. Leadership changed as Boonyapisomparn relinquished her role as coordinator to pursue education in the United States. APTN became a member of Seven Sisters and operated with minimal funding for several years. In 2009 Slamah became coordinator of Seven Sisters and volunteered to oversee the APTN. In 2011 Joe Wong from Singapore advocated for the inclusion of trans men and joined the board. The governing structure remained, with the establishment of an executive working group consisting of Laxmi Narayan Tripathi, Slamah, and Wong. The three executive members coordinated board member responses and represented the voices of the board in the decision-making process. The three executive members, with the assistance of Seven Sisters, hired Natt Kraipet to coordinate APTN efforts. Subsequently, Wong was selected to be program manager. With the support of Seven Sisters, APTN incorporated as a foundation under the Thai Ministry of the Interior in 2015. As a foundation established in Thailand, APTN has a legally mandated foundation board composed of Thai nationals with fiduciary responsibility to oversee the finances and assets in accordance with Thai law. The governing board has become a regional steering committee composed of trans individuals from throughout the region and diaspora, to ensure that the strategic plan and objectives are in line with APTN’s vision and mission. An advisory board of researchers, care providers, policy makers, advocates, and other professionals with expertise in gender diversity provide technical guidance to APTN. The APTN Secretariat, its program and financial management body, is based in Bangkok and administers APTN objectives and activities under several departments, including communications and advocacy to guide human rights advances and social policy reform. APTN programming has significantly increased since APTN received funding in 2014 from the Robert Carr Fund for Civil Society Networks to support their work of networking, community mobilization, leadership development, and advocacy, especially in relation to health and human rights.

APTN continues to work to benefit trans individuals. It has built strong relationships with diverse trans communities, health-care providers, nongovernmental organizations, networks, policy makers, donors, and other stakeholders in many parts of the region and globally. Since 2012 APTN has published more than twenty reports, policy papers, fact sheets, and other documents. Its key messages are: (1) gender variance in itself is not a disease or mental disorder; (2) transgender individuals have unique health needs and risks that deserve particular attention; and (3) transgender rights are human rights, not special rights. As APTN moves forward, it will continue to have to negotiate local constructions of trans identity, the commonality and diversity of transness in the region, and global trans formations dominated by Western ideologies (Dutta 2013).

SEE ALSO Athletes, Trans and Intersex, in Asia; Bhutan; Hijras; Kathoey; Roopbaan; Sex Reassignment Surgery in Asia; Third Genders; Transgender Organizations in Mainland China, Hong Kong, and Taiwan

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Asrar ʿAitiyyah (2013; Hany Fawzy)

JACINTHE A. ASSAAD
Independent scholar
Cairo, Egypt

The first Egyptian film to focus primarily on homosexuality.

Asrar ʿaifiyyah (Family secrets) opened in Egyptian theaters on 22 January 2014, amid scathing criticism and great controversy. Based on a true story, it is the directorial debut of Hany Fawzy, known as a screenwriter for such films as El-Rayess Omar Harb (2008; Chief Omar Harb), Baheb essima (2004; I love cinema), and Film Hindi (2003; An Indian film). The script for Asrar ʿaifiyyah was written by Mohamed Abdel Qader. The film is a coming-of-age drama about a teenager named Marwan (played by Mohamed Mahran), who struggles with his homosexuality amid a dysfunctional family and an oppressive society. The narrative traces the trials and tribulations of Marwan, who, upon his mother’s discovery of his sexuality, is taken to various doctors to be cured of his illness.

Marwan narrates the story and covers a span of five years of his life, from ages fifteen to twenty. The first flashback recounts the moment his boyfriend, Hazem, decides to end their relationship because he believes it to be sinful. The use of the voice-over, combined with the flashback narrative throughout the film, offers an omniscient perspective on Marwan’s life while simultaneously distancing the narrator from his character. The story begins with Marwan at age fifteen; he is an adolescent confused about his sexuality and unable to accept himself. His struggles are amplified by troubled family dynamics, including a domineering mother, an absentee father who rarely returns from his job in the United States, and an older brother, Sameh, who is an aggressive bully.

Marwan’s attempts to reconcile his forbidden desires for other men, combined with the lack of a loving home environment, result in a schism in his personality that manifests as Nour, his sexually active alter ego. Nour starts engaging with men over the internet, while a conflicted and devout Marwan is encouraged by his mother to pray so God can take these thoughts from him. The narrator expresses his confusion, and feels “as if he is living with two personalities,” not knowing which one he really is. Nour’s various sexual encounters demonstrate society’s ostracization of homosexuality and Marwan’s ambivalence about his own sexuality. However, when given the choice by a sympathetic doctor, Marwan opts to cure his homosexuality. Thereupon, he decides to find his true self and face his fears by suppressing his sexual impulses. The film provides a reconciliatory ending whereby the accepted social order is eventually restored: Marwan looks at heterosexual couples with hope and envy, he confronts his guilt-ridden brother, his mother becomes compliant, and his father and he rekindle their relationship.

Views on Homosexuality

In a 2014 interview discussing the movie, Fawzy stated that homosexuality is not “an unethical attitude, it’s a disease,” and gays should be treated sympathetically. “Homosexuality is a disease such as depression…. Why can’t we say ‘patients’ instead of ‘unnatural’ and ‘sinful’? Does any patient in the world not want to be cured from the disease she/he has? Of course not!” (Muscara 2014). In the same interview, lead actor Mahran states that homosexuality is “something not normal and the community should fix that. But everybody is free in his choices.” Thus, despite the movie’s sympathetic portrayal of Marwan, it still reflects the belief of the director and lead actor that homosexual acts are sinful and that homosexuality is a disease that can be medically cured. These antagonistic attitudes toward Marwan’s sexuality are first and foremost translated in how people perceive his masculinity.

Cultural Viewpoint

Marwan is depicted as a stereotypical young gay man. He has effeminate mannerisms and preferences, including wearing pink clothing and covering his bed in pink satin sheets. He shaves his arms, has long, straight hair, and is soft-spoken. Being a homosexual is thus represented as being effeminate, hence lacking masculinity. “Gay” here is the antithesis of the macho, ideal masculinity advocated by Egyptian society. His sexual orientation is depicted as a disorientation from the prevalent Middle Eastern, Arab, and Muslim masculinity. Several characters in the movie ridicule Marwan for his lack of masculinity, including Dr. Ola, a young, veiled woman who attempts to cure Marwan of his homosexuality by making him ashamed of his physical appearance and lack of manliness. Besides prescribing medication, her treatment includes recommendations that he change his physical appearance by growing a moustache and that he perform masculine activities around the house, such as moving furniture, carrying groceries, and fixing the plumbing. She taunts him to question his masculinity, positing a hypothetical scenario: Would he be able to defend his mother and fight the perpetrator if his mother were to be sexually harassed on the street?

Marwan’s masculinity is thus questioned, since he lacks such typical and conventional male attributes as roughness and physical strength. His physics teacher also belittles Marwan’s effeminate attributes after he catches him sleeping in class. He calls him susu (sissy) and addresses him in the grammatical feminine gender, as if talking to a girl. In a voice-over, Marwan comments that society is looking at him as an epidemic; his lack of virility is a constant object of ridicule. He is a threat to society by his mere physical appearance. Many of the scenes where Marwan is made to feel small are reinforced by the choice of camera angle and types of shot. For example, the teacher is shot from below, which heightens the sense of threat. Marwan's pathos is emphasized by the fact that he is often shown alone in medium shots.

Religious Viewpoint

Marwan's conflict is exhibited not only externally, but also internally. He has difficulty accepting his orientation, morally and ethically, despite the director’s position that homosexuality is not an ethical issue. The social fabric of Egyptian society is inextricably woven with a religious and cultural thread that is impossible to separate. The predominant social view of homosexuality remains that it is sinful.

In the movie, this is most clearly demonstrated by the boyfriend Hazem, who, after his return from umrah (a religious pilgrimage), decides to break up with Nour/Marwan. Hazem’s spiritual awakening coincides with his realization that their relationship is a vice, which he characterizes as qadhara (filth). Of course, Hazem’s stance is hypocritically reversed when, at the end of the film, he contacts Nour/Marwan again to rekindle their relationship. It is very telling that the director chose this particular crossroad to explore the protagonist’s life story and bring the narrative full circle. This artistic choice reinforces the director’s view that homosexuality is a disease and not a sin by showing how even religious Egyptians struggle with it.

During Marwan’s struggle with his sexuality, he decides to visit a sheikh for guidance under the guise of talking about a friend of his. The religious cleric radically condemns homosexuality, stating the prevalent social and religious belief that it shakes God’s throne. The sheikh mentions the punishment of the people of Lut (from the story of Sodom and Gomorrah) and warns about the eternal fires of hell. While the encounter itself is short, Marwan’s life becomes imbued with religion. He prays so God can take those deviant thoughts away from him, and he attends a support group, where he encounters other young Egyptians who share his struggle. One of the group members, Mina (a predominantly Egyptian Christian name), talks about working through his confusing relationship with God, wondering how God could judge him for something he is a victim of, before he finally learned to see God with his heart. Another group member, Shady, had lived his life hating himself, hiding his shame behind his pious beard and appearance until he faced the reality he had denied. Religion (Christian and Muslim) is, therefore, both a rigid facade behind which to hide one’s shame and a means of salvation for one’s suffering. Ultimately, however, it is not religion that saves Marwan.

Medical/Psychological Approach

The film demonstrates that when one is looking for a cure, one goes to the doctor. Homosexuality is from the onset described as a psychological disorder. The psychiatrists that Marwan and his mother visit provide a myriad of interpretations of homosexuality. While Dr. Ola, the first doctor, who works in a center for drug addiction and psychological rehabilitation for adolescents, opts for medication and for making Marwan more manly, she does not, in fact, dwell on “curing him” but on changing him to conform to society’s views on masculinity. A second doctor prescribes antidepressants to curb Marwan’s sex drive, but Marwan eventually rejects this treatment because of its side effects. A third doctor, Nabil Barakat, approaches Marwan more sympathetically. When Marwan questions whether it is possible for him to change his sexual orientation, Dr. Barakat assures him he can change but then suggests that emigration might be the answer: “The problem isn’t you. It’s society as a whole. Maybe if you were living abroad, in a society that accepted gay people.” Marwan, however, finds this suggestion unrealistic.

Marwan finally finds the doctor he needs in the progressive psychiatrist Dr. Amjad Wahby. The doctor refuses to use the term shadh (literally “aberrant,” the traditional reference to homosexual) because it reinforces the oppression of gay people. He finds that it is not logical to oppress a human being because society fears his symptoms. Additionally, he does not like to call homosexuality a disease but rather a psychological developmental disorder, following a particular psychological crisis.

Dr. Wahby explains there is in each person a male and a female, and his theory on homosexuality is that it develops from a split in one’s gender following a lack of identification with the parent of the same sex. This split translates during puberty into homosexual desire and orientation. He then offers Marwan two choices: to decide this is a disease that he wants a cure for, or to refuse treatment and continue to live as a homosexual. The doctor stresses that Marwan is free to decide. According to Dr. Wahby, someone may have a frail masculinity, and homosexuality will develop in the right circumstances. There is a cure, albeit a difficult one, and the most important step is acceptance. Self-acceptance will hence allow Marwan to face his homosexuality.

Marwan opts for a cure. At the doctor’s prompting, he starts writing a journal about his feelings and discovers that, as he writes them down, his homosexual desires become latent. Marwan then reveals to the doctor some meaningful childhood memories. During her pregnancy with him, his mother was told to expect a girl; when Marwan was born, his mother started treating him like a girl for fear of replicating her negative experience with his brother, Sameh. Her husband’s absence enabled her behavior. Marwan confesses to the doctor that he has no memories of his father, either from childhood or recent times. He is completely disassociated from the child he was. Dr. Wahby helps him connect with his inner child, who feels hurt and abandoned. This child is the true Marwan, according to the doctor. Dr. Wahby also helps Marwan deal with the trauma of childhood sexual abuse that he suffered at the hands of Sameh. The doctor emphasizes that a child is not responsible for his abuse, even if Marwan had not rejected his brother. Marwan thus learns to reconnect with himself anew, reuniting with his childhood, his pain, and his weakness, which, according to Dr. Wahby, will enable Marwan to discover his authentic self, thereby dissipated his homosexuality.

Marwan’s struggle with his sexuality turns into a search for not only a cure but an explanation for his homosexual orientation. The film ultimately posits that, if homosexuality is an illness or a psychological disorder, there must be one or more underlying causes. The narrative exposition of Marwan’s circumstances, from his childhood sexual abuse to his domineering mother and absent father, all converge to explain the development of his sexual orientation.

Linguistic Turn

The terminology used to refer to homosexuality is worth exploring because the film traces the linguistic development of the various terms, from khawal and shadh to al-mithliyyah. When Marwan meets Kareem, a thief who scams him, the man uses the term khawal, a derogatory word that particularly expresses a lack of masculinity, when he threatens Marwan in order to dissuade him from pursuing men online. This word is generally an insult to men, and through such an interpellation, gay men are disparaged not only for their aberrant sexual behavior but also for their failure to conform to the social standards and norms that define manhood and masculinity.

In Egyptian society, the prevalent word used to describe a gay man is shadh and homosexuality is shudhudh jinsi (literally, “sexual deviance”). The words denote a negative supposition about homosexuality because the root stems from the word aberrant. Therefore, homosexuality is perceived in terms of abnormal and deviant behavior. Marwan uses the word shadh, which in effect cements his view on his own sexuality.

In recent years, particularly with the onset of sexuality and gender studies in the Middle East and the Arab world, the word al-mithliyyah has surfaced. This term expresses no linguistic or social biases and focuses on the concept of sameness, mithli. Hence, discourse on sexuality incorporates the idea of “homo” and, instead of pathologizing it, it describes homosexuality in terms of same-sex desire. Both Dr. Barakat and Dr. Wahby use the term al-mithliyyah. The film therefore delineates a paradigmatic rhetorical shift in the discourse on homosexuality.

Critical Reception

Asrar ʿailiyah garnered controversy even before its premiere. After first claiming that it would not make cuts to the film solely based on its taboo subject matter, Egypt’s film censorship board demanded thirteen scenes be cut, despite the absence of sexually explicit material. Fawzy feared the censors’ demands would transform the film and present Marwan’s affair as a “romance-free friendship,” when in fact he wanted to convey “the psychological dilemma of the character and his relationship with others” (Kingsley 2014). Egyptian critics defended the censorship by arguing that the deletion of a scene between two gay men lying in bed was not an affront to creativity, which raised a debate about freedom of expression, thought, and creativity.

Critic Majdy al-Tayyīb (2013) criticized Fawzy for scenes that he deemed daring but ineffective in advancing the plot, such as showing clips from the porn films that Marwan watches, or a doctor asking whether Marwan wants to sleep with his crush. Al-Tayyīb characterized these seemingly explicit scenes as muqazez (disgusting). He accused Fawzy of disregarding the contract between the director and the public by discarding the art of subtle allusion, an art that respects the audience’s intelligence and emotions. According to him, the director replaced it with immature confrontation, thus creating sedition or subversion. The film was accused of “promoting indecent behavior,” despite the director’s vehement claiming that the film was not explicit in nature (al-Tayyīb 2013).

Fawzy defended his film and appealed the censors’ demands, maintaining that there should be complete freedom in addressing social issues with utmost candor. The director ultimately previewed his film to the critics before the censors’ final approval. The film was deemed daring, not just provocative, for adopting a theme so taboo in Egyptian and Arab communities. Other works have portrayed homosexuality in Egyptian culture, notably Alaa al-Aswany’s novel Imarat Ya’kubian (2002; The Yacoubian Building [2004]), adapted into a film in 2006, and some earlier films, such as Al-Raqesah wa-al-siyasi (1990; The belly dancer and the politician) and Darb al-hawa (1983; Trail of fancy). Yet, Asrar ‘ailiyah, despite its intolerant view that homosexuality is a disease, was hailed as a breakthrough for bringing to light the issue of homosexuality simply because it portrays its main protagonist as a young, gay man. It was, however, precisely for that reason that it garnered scathing criticism from LGBTQ activists, as well as Western and some local media.

While not directly posing as pro-LGBTQ, some reviewers were critical of the film’s message and its lack of sensitivity to the issue of homosexuality in society. Some such reviews appeared in the Western media, such as Variety, but others came from within Egypt and the Arab world, including Al-Ahram, Elaph, and Al-Bawaba. Critics accused the movie of asserting instead of subverting society’s views: veiled as a daring work, it was, in fact, a direct attack on homosexuals (Adly 2014) and a “poor melodrama” that “does a disservice to its subject” (Zohdi 2014) by promoting “gay conversion therapy” (Weissberg 2014).

Assessment

Marwan’s effeminate character is an obsolete stereotype of a gay man and belies a wrong and naive understanding of homosexuality and the construct of sexuality. Moreover, the idea that circumstances generate sexual disorientation raises the question of agency, which the film, by positing that homosexuality is a choice, reinforces. The other gay men in the film are often negatively portrayed as lewd and lustful. Homosexuality, as Yasmine Zohdi (2014) notes, becomes an illusion, or a confusion, as the case may be with Marwan. The film falls into the trap of explaining the development of homosexuality as a circumstantial response (namely to child sexual abuse, the figure of a domineering mother or an absent father). This clichéd explanation fails to address the complexity of sexual identity, even if it does indeed accurately portray Egyptian society's attitude toward homosexuality. Although some characters, like Mazen (with whom Nour/Marwan has an affair), seem to accept their homosexuality, the film's focus on Marwan's resolution offers a perspective that can be viewed as detrimental to the existence of homosexuality and social responses to it, since it affirms through its reconciliatory ending that being gay is a choice.

Asrar ‘ailiyah can therefore be accused of being homophobic precisely because it depicts homosexuality as the antithesis of the ideal masculinity that society promotes. Additionally, the narrative forcibly circumscribes Marwan's sexual development within the causal circumstances of childhood sexual abuse to suggest that they are a reason for his homosexuality, despite the revelation that his brother had also been a victim of childhood sexual abuse at the hands of the family driver. Since Sameh’s masculinity was not frail, his experience caused him to become “overly masculine,” displaying more anger and violence, traits that are conventionally accepted as masculine.

The film ultimately operates within a heteronormative framework that reinforces the complementarity of distinct gender roles and the viability of heterosexuality as the only socially acceptable norm. It articulates the expected and traditional understanding of gender differences and fails to really engage with the formation of sexuality and subjectivity beyond stereotypes and clichés. The heterosexist and heteronormative narrative reproduces and imposes the accepted idealized construct of national masculinity. The fracture of or departure from ideal masculinity is translated as effeminization. The film articulates an erasure of other forms of masculinities and the affirmation of conventional patriarchal authority. Instead of addressing the problems gay men face in society, the film treats gay men as the problem; homosexuality is a disease that needs to be eradicated. Hence, the visibility that homosexuality garners through the film is one that negatively impacts the LGBTQ community in Egypt. Ultimately, Asrar ‘ailiyah does not give a voice to homosexuality; on the contrary, it stifles it. Society’s condemnation remains justified, while homosexuality continues to be a secret, a taboo, and a condition that can now be cured.

SEE ALSO Hena Maysara (2007; Khaled Youssef); HIV/AIDS in Egyptian Cinema; Imarat Ya’kubian (2002; Alaa al-Aswany); Queer Names and Identity Politics in the Arab World; Zuqaq al-Midaq (1947; Naguib Mahfouz)

BIBLIOGRAPHY

http://scoopempire.com/qa-family-secrets/

Tayyīb, Majdy al-. “Asrar ‘ailiyah ... matā kana hadhf mashhad bayna rajulīyn shādhīn ‘alā sarīr ikhlālan bi-al-ibdā’?” [Asrar ‘ailiyah: When was deleting a scene with two gay men in bed an opposition to creativity?]. Al-Masri al-Youm, 26 November 2013.

Zohdi, Yasmine. “‘Family Secrets’: Poor Melodrama Falsely Posing as Daring Work on Homosexuality.” Ahram Online, 23 February 2014.
http://english.ahram.org.eg/NewsContent/5/32/94981/Arts—Culture/Film/Search.aspx?Text=Egypt
Israel is a country that was founded in 1948, following a 1947 United Nations (UN) resolution that recognized the right to the establishment of an Israeli state and an adjoining Palestinian state in historical Palestine. The latter was never established. The establishment of the State of Israel was a colonial enterprise, beginning in the late nineteenth century with European economic and political intervention in the Middle East; in 1917 the British government announced its support for the creation of a homeland for the Jewish people in Palestine via the Balfour Declaration. Momentum accelerated in the 1920s and 1930s, and the establishment of Israel was further facilitated by the influx of Jewish refugees fleeing Nazi Europe, as well as the exodus of Arab Jews from their home countries (Khalidi 1984; Shenhav 2002).

The conflict between Zionist militias and Palestinian nationalists escalated into armed conflict in 1948. This resulted in the displacement of over 700,000 Palestinians living in the land that would shortly come to be known as the State of Israel. As a result of these events, approximately 20 percent of Israel's population as of 2018 is composed of Arabs of Christian and Muslim faiths. Jewish-Israelis of Arab descent are discouraged from fashioning an Arab identity (Shenhav 2002). Meanwhile, non-Jewish Arabs inside Israel refer to themselves as Arab-Israelis or as Palestinians. To refer to themselves as Palestinians is a political act. This act recognizes Israel's colonial history, evidenced by the ongoing conflict between the state and the Occupied Palestinian Territories of Gaza and the West Bank and by the existence of more than 5 million Palestinian refugees in neighboring countries whose status is still unresolved. The Palestinian refugee crisis extends well beyond Gaza and the West Bank into Lebanon, Syria, Jordan, Egypt, Iraq, and the Persian Gulf countries, where most Palestinians remain unnaturalized in their countries of residence to this day.

Aswat's Founding

It is in this complex, colonial context that two self-declared Palestinian lesbians decided to create an email list for gay, Arab women living in Israel. The women decided to meet in real space in 2002. The following year, seven women who had been in attendance at the 2002 meeting went on to found Aswat, which, according to its website, is a Palestinian gay women’s nongovernmental organization. Aswat was formed as a splinter group out of the feminist organization Kayan, based in Haifa. Soon, Aswat had its own website, and women from all over the Arab world were subscribing to the forums and mailing list. Aswat representatives also hold media interviews both in Arabic and Hebrew to raise awareness about the group’s activities and outreach.

SOURCE: HTTP://WWW.ASWATGROUP.ORG/EN

Home Page of Aswat, an Organization of Palestinian LBTQI Women. One of Aswat’s major projects is its “Information Project” on its website, which aims to combat censorship and misinformation surrounding women’s sexuality and lesbianism as well as connect Palestinian lesbians, among other goals.

Conscious of the precarious place these women occupied in Arab and Israeli society, Aswat’s founders set out to fashion a space that could accommodate their intersecting identities.

We, sexual deviants in a heterosexual world, women in a chauvinistic society, Arab women in the Jewish state, were required many times to give up and leave behind a part of our identity in order to be accepted as normal. [Therefore, we] made a decision to create a place that would cater for a coexistence of the different facets of our identity.

(ASWAT 201 1, 153)

Funded by philanthropic trusts such as the Global Fund for Women and the Astraea Lesbian Foundation for Justice, Aswat initiated a number of support groups in the form of on-site, monthly meetings and set up a hotline offering crisis counseling in Arabic for queer women and transgender men. Recognizing the need for a body of literature dealing with LGBTQI issues specifically written in Arabic, as well as the need for disseminating neutral or positive terminology and semantics, Aswat began publishing monthly newsletters and pamphlets as well. In these short publications, Aswat's contributors discussed the history of LGBTQI civil rights internationally, as well as health issues relevant to queer people, and provided Arabic glossaries of terms related to gender and sexuality. Aswat also published “how to” manuals focusing on, for example, coming out to parents or providing answers to basic sexual awareness questions. Aswat frequently issues press releases and open letters expressing political opinions and taking a stand on issues related to Palestinian and women’s rights. Between 2006 and 2010, Aswat released three short narrative books as well. Two of these anthologies consisted of autobiographical writings. The group makes all its publications available online for free, and some of these are available in both English and Arabic.

Overview of Publications

Aswat's first book, Al-waṭan wa-al-manfá fī tajribat almutaharirrāt jinsīyan: Majmūʿāt maqālāt taḥhath fī mawḍūʿ al-mithlīyah al-jinsīyah (2006; Home and exile in queer experience: A collection of articles about lesbian and homosexual identity), contained a mix of original writings and translations of feminist literature written in English. The group’s second book, Haqi an a’eesh an akhtar an akun (2007; My right to live, to choose, to be), was a literary anthology featuring queer women’s writings by Arab lesbians, for Arab lesbians, and in Arabic. This collection inspired a lesbian group in Lebanon, Meem, to produce its own autobiographical collection, Bareed Mista3jil: True Stories, in 2009. In 2010 Aswat released a second anthology, Waqfet banāt (Girls Take a Stand [2011]), which took on a distinctly autobiographical flavor, departing slightly from the poetry and lyrical prose of its predecessor. Waqfet banāt was translated into and made available in English as well. A second edition of the book appeared in 2011.

Unlike its successor, Haqi an a’eesh an akhtar an akun was published in Arabic only. Several authors, such as Rauda, Rima, Reem, and a young woman writing under the pseudonym Life, contributed multiple entries in the form of short stories, reflections, and poetry. One contributor writing under the pseudonym Pazuzu was an active member of the Lebanese lesbian group Meem and was not resident in Israel. In the introduction, Aswat declared that the book was a community outreach effort, aiming “to introduce [the group] to our society, to increase knowledge of and raise awareness around our struggles, and also to deliver our voices to people who may need to know that they are not alone” (2007, 11; translation by Samar Habib). The introduction liberally used terms borrowed from English and translated them into Arabic without clarification for a nonspecialist reader.

By contrast, the Arabic version of the ensuing book, Waqfet banāt, corrected this issue by containing a glossary of terms in the beginning. This glossary explained the meaning of key concepts in queer gender and sexual taxonomy. Some of the terms it elaborated on were al-hawiya al-jinsiya (sexual identity), al-jins al-biology (biological sex), al-naw‘ al-ijtima‘i (gender identity), and al-khuruj min al-khizana (coming out of the closet) (Aswat 2010).
Aswat's emphasis on publishing in Arabic filled a need in the marketplace of ideas and helped establish a theoretical language capable of sustaining discourse on queer genders and sexualities for the Arab reader. The move also seemed to result from the group's collective experience in 2007, when some of the terms in Haqi an a’eesh an akhtar an akun failed to register for nonqueer readers. Terms such as izdiwaji (bisexual), for example, or mughayiroo al-naw’ al-ijtima’i (transgender) seemed foreign and required clarification. In this way, Waqfet banāt appears to be a continuation of a strategic project that began with Haqi an a’eesh an akhtar an akun in 2007.

The first book centered on the theme of supplying literature in Arabic that could lend itself to describing the thoughts and experiences of its marginalized authors. As one narrator named Aden indicated: “When I started looking for stories in Arabic so I wouldn’t feel so alone, I couldn’t find any. So, I decided to write my story today, so that it may be one of the stories you get to see yourself in, when you begin your search for stories about women like you” (Aswat 2007, 99; translation by Samar Habib). Meanwhile, the second book, Waqfet banāt, extended the effort a step further by institutionalizing the terminology used in the first book and translating the text to English, thus reaching beyond the Arab world and into diasporic Arab communities internationally, as well as to non-Arab readers.

Expressions of Sexuality and Repression

In both Haqi and Waqfet, the reader is treated to intimate narratives of love, sexual desire, and repression in an Israeli society where Arab ethnicity is not only marginalized but also unfavorably politicized. In addition to the impact of Israeli politics on Arab identity, the narrators often must deal with a patriarchal and heteronormative Arab culture that rebukes them. This is evident throughout these writings, although not all the authors are Israeli nationals and most are more concerned with narrating stories of their coming of age than with political analysis and the backdrop of colonialism.

One significant exception in Waqfet banāt is to be found in the afterword by Samira Saraya, then serving as interim general coordinator of Aswat. She recounted a childhood memory of singing the Israeli national anthem and waving the Israeli flag at school on Independence Day (the Palestinian Catastrophe/Nakba Day), without comprehending the colonial history such an act was masking at the time. Years later, Saraya reflected on this memory, realizing its political implications. The parallels between hiding Arab identity and hiding sexual orientation became obvious to her when she recalled that once, on a hospital visit, her mother became distressed when Saraya wrote that she was born in Palestine (having been born in 1936) and had her change the word to “Israel” for fear of complications with hospital staff. Saraya uses these mirroring oppressions as a passageway to communicate about othering to her community. “When I encounter Palestinians in Israel, I make the association between our society, which has experienced oppression and discrimination, and my personal experiences as a sexual deviant, stressing the necessity for the struggle for exposure and legitimacy” (Aswat 2011, 166).

The Palestinian society that emerges out of the narratives in both Haqi and Waqfet is one steeped in sexual repression, tradition, and taboos. Invariably, the narrators share stories of being conflicted about their sexualities and ultimately having to hide who they truly are to those closest to them. Out of this arrangement emerges an alternate consciousness to visibility politics, one in which coming out is not integral to personal liberation. As one narrator put it: “I have learned that coming out is not all black and white, and that there’s a gray area in between; one that allows me to be in and out at the same time” (Aswat 2011, 56).

This motif repeats throughout both books, speaking to the “universal” experience of alienation lived by queer youth elsewhere in the world. Another motif common to this “universal” experience of negotiating the outward and the inward is to be found in the role assigned to the metropolis by queer youth, who find in it a sanctuary from the double identity imposed when one must endure in the vicinity of the family. Narrators often state that they move to cities such as Haifa or Tel Aviv and begin a journey of personal liberation when they start living on their own. One anonymous narrator recalls the following about moving to Tel Aviv at age eighteen:

\[quote\]
In clubs, parties, and gay bars a whole new world of dating proposed itself. I fell in and out of love, had crushes, relations, affairs, and believed that those were the happiest days of my life. Feelings of ambiguity and confusion were finally replaced by feelings of clarity and serenity. Hiding in my dark closet was no longer necessary and thoughts of hope and satisfaction were ultimately replacing my helplessness and frustration.
\[quote\]

(ASWAT 2011, 49)

Uniquely, Waqfet banât includes narratives by non-Palestinians as well. One remarkable example is a woman named Souraya whose father was born in Palestine, a mere forty days before his family’s exile from Palestine to Lebanon in 1948. Although her father married a Lebanese national, Souraya could not inherit her mother’s citizenship because Lebanese law forbids the mother from giving her nationality to her children. That said, Souraya makes no mention of being a Palestinian refugee. It is possible that she had acquired Lebanese citizenship on the basis of her Christianity in the 1990s, or for her father to have acquired it in the 1940s or 1950s, when the Lebanese government made efforts to naturalize Christian Palestinians (a small minority compared to Sunni Palestinians) in order to bolster the country’s dwindling Christian demographic (Ghandour 2017). Not all Christian Palestinians were naturalized in Lebanon in this way. It is remarkable that Souraya makes no mention of her citizenship status; this in itself is an indicator of privilege not likely to be encountered among Palestinians in Lebanon who remained refugees.

Souraya remembers her gender-atypical childhood, her masculine presentation, and her attraction to women even from a young age. Speaking of her mother’s friend, Souraya recalls, “I used to be filled with joy when I saw that woman. I was about 5 at the time. I also still remember how when we’d be watching a movie with my mom and dad, and there would be a scene where a man and a woman kiss, I would imagine myself in the man’s place kissing the woman” (Aswat 2011, 137). Souraya is outed by her peers at school, who are the first to use the term lesbian to taunt her. Her story is unique, particularly in the part of the narrative where she connects her story to the Lebanese underground, recalling the establishment of Helem, the Arab world’s first official LGBTQI organization and her membership in an online forum called GayLebanon. Although Helem and GayLebanon provided Souraya with an LGBTQI community both in real space and in cyberspace, she recalls that this was not enough to fill the void that was left by her excommunication from her Christian community. A devout Christian, she returned to a personal relationship with God as her ultimate solace, believing that God loves everyone, even lesbians.

Other non-Palestinian contributors to Waqfet include Yarra Karris, a Lebanese national who is a transgender woman and who immigrated to Denmark to finally be free from the disapproval of her society and family. Another narrator, Haya Souleiman, lives in Cairo and describes an inability to express her feelings to her family. Some women articulate bisexual desires, and others feel that they are sexually fluid and cannot be neatly categorized. For this reason, Waqfet banāt provides a remarkable representation of the spectrum of gender and sexual diversity in Arab society, focusing primarily on Arabs who live in Israel but also extending its coverage to include neighboring countries and even immigration to Europe, where the experience of oppression is lifted.

Both Haqi and Waqfet are books of personal narrative that are essential to tracing the organic and genealogical growth of LGBTQI grassroots activism in the Arab world. They chronicle the experiences and levels of consciousness of gender-nonconforming and sexually nonconforming women of the educated middle class. What now seems like ordinary diary entries will in the future provide invaluable insight into otherwise hidden struggles and the embryonic formations of queer countercultures in the Arab world.

SEE ALSO alQaws; Bareed Mista3jil: True Stories (2009); Coming-Out/Coming-In Discourses in the Middle East; Internet Queer Sites in the Middle East; Meem: Queer Names and Identity Politics in the Arab World; Urban Queerness

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Intersex and trans competitors have historically faced opposition in sport. Sport organizers have responded to both groups with accusations of unfairness and questions about the role of biological sex in eligibility. Because intersex and trans athletes often do not conform to society’s ideas about appropriate gender, sport organizations have outlined rules to limit their participation. Sex testing criminalized strong women and targeted intersex athletes (Ferez 2012; Pieper 2016). Policies about trans competitors have typically focused on trans women and have frequently mandated medical intervention (Anderson and Travers 2017; Sykes 2006). Such sex-based policies discriminate against both intersex and trans athletes and reinforce gender boundaries in elite competitions.

Intersex and trans people have experienced discrimination for not fitting neatly into binary notions of sex. Intersex is an umbrella term that refers to individuals born with a wide array of natural biological variations that do not meet society’s expectations of male or female (Intersex Society of North America 2018). For example, women with androgen insensitivity syndrome (AIS) have XY chromosomes but are resistant to androgens; they therefore look female and typically live as women but have what is considered a male chromosomal makeup. Trans is also an umbrella term that encompasses a wide variety of identities. Trans women are persons designated male at birth but whose gender identity is female. Trans men are people designated female at birth but whose gender identity is male (GLAAD 2018). Both intersex and trans individuals have experienced resistance in sport for challenging its sex-segregated classification system.

Early Examples of Trans Athletes

Anxieties about gender-ambiguous athletes convinced sport organizers to implement policies to verify their sex. British athlete Mary Weston had been incorrectly designated as female at birth and competed as a woman in the 1920s (Heggie 2010; Tebbutt 2015). Weston placed first in the British Women’s Amateur Athletic Association (WAAA) shot put in 1925 and 1928 and also claimed the 1929 WAAA titles in discus, javelin, and shot put. Weston’s studies in anatomy, required as part of his training to become a masseuse, led him to question his sex and gender. Feeling more male than female, he retired from sport, underwent corrective surgery in 1934, and changed his name to Mark. His story, which was widely disseminated, was cited as undeniable proof that sport masculinized women (Pieper 2016; Tebbutt 2015). Likewise, Czechoslovakian athlete Zdeňka Koubková set several records in athletics as a woman in the 1930s. However, appearance-based concerns prompted the Fédération Sportive Féminine Internationale (International Women’s Sports Federation) to remove Koubková from sport competition and remove his marks. Having fought masculine feelings since childhood, Koubková also underwent corrective surgery and changed his name to Zdenek Koubek (Heggie 2010; Tebbutt 2015). Weston’s and Koubek’s successes in athletics and their later transitions bolstered the case for sport officials to question the appropriateness of participation in physical competitions for women (Anderson and Travers 2017).

Accusations against strong female athletes continued. During the 1936 Berlin Olympics, when US runner Helen Stephens won gold in the 100-meter race, her impressive time and muscular frame sparked accusations that she was not a woman. Olympic officials conducted a physical examination, which she “passed,” marking the first sex test of the modern Olympic Games (Pieper 2016). Also during the Berlin Olympics, German Olympian Heinrich Ratjen placed fourth in the women’s high jump. Several popular accounts posit that the Nazi Party forced Ratjen, who at the time was living as a woman named Dora, to compete in disguise, but medical records show that Ratjen was not a male masquerader. Documents from his birth verify that the midwife first declared the baby a boy, then asserted he was a girl, and finally concluded it was best to raise Ratjen female. Ratjen was arrested in 1938 for “cross-dressing” but was later exonerated. He lived the rest of his life as a man (Heggie 2010).
Sex Testing in Competition

Gender-nonnormative athletes, including powerful female athletes and transgender competitors, challenged conventional ideals that pushed sport practitioners to introduce compulsory sex testing for all women in 1966. The International Association of Athletics Federations (IAAF) first mandated physical inspections; however, scientific innovation, as well as athletes' discomfort with “nude parades,” prompted organizers to switch to a chromosome test in 1967 (Heggie 2010; Pieper 2016). On its first use, Polish runner Ewa Klobukowska, who had previously passed a visual inspection, was barred from competition for having a “mosaic” of chromosomes. Believing the test to be successful in eliminating male imposters and diminishing unfair advantages, the International Olympic Committee (IOC) decided to implement the control in 1968 (Pieper 2016).

When the IOC announced its plan to check female athletes at the 1968 Winter Olympics, the Austrian team visited a local hospital before the games to verify the sex of its participants. Skier Erika Schinegger, who had won a gold medal in the 1966 World Ski Championship women's downhill skiing competition, was informed that he possessed internal male sex organs. Schinegger decided to transition and later joined the men's Europa Cup tour as Erik (Anderson and Travers 2017).

Although the IOC instituted testing to bar gender-ambiguous Olympians, other sport organizations embraced the IOC's method to explicitly block trans athletes from competition. In 1976 the United States Tennis Association used the test to exclude trans athlete Renée Richards from women's tennis. Richards sued the organization and gained access to the women's tour the following year (Anderson and Travers 2017; Birrell and Cole 1990). In 1987 trans golfer Charlotte Ann Wood finished third on the US Senior Women's Amateur Tour. Protests from Wood's competitors convinced the Ladies Professional Golf Association (LPGA) to include a “female at birth” clause in entry forms. This eligibility requirement remained in place until 2010, when trans woman Lana Lawless filed a civil rights lawsuit against the LPGA. In contrast, Women's Golf Australia permitted trans participation; in 2004, Mianne Bagger became the first trans athlete to compete in a professional golf tournament (Anderson and Travers 2017).

Sport organizations in non-Western countries also questioned the acceptability of gender-nonconforming athletes in elite competitions despite their greater cultural acceptance of gender fluidity. For example, Thai society generally recognizes a variety of gender identities and representations, yet when Thai kickboxer Parinya “Nong Toom” Charoenphol blurred the boundaries of masculinity and femininity in sport, she was both celebrated and opposed. Charoenphol was designated male at birth, but identified as female starting in childhood. She discovered Muay Thai, traditional kickboxing, as a teenager and went on to win twenty of twenty-two regional matches, most by knockout. Charoenphol gained national recognition in 1998 when she defeated a bigger, more muscular male opponent at the Lumpini Boxing Stadium, the epicenter of Muay Thai boxing. The Muay Thai establishment embraced Charoenphol as a way to revitalize the sport, but not all Thai fans supported her. Some argued that her inclusion in the masculine realm of kickboxing was inappropriate and even that she desecrated the sacred nature of the sport (Hodgkinson 2005). Charoenphol's story gained further traction in 2003 with the release of the film Beautiful Boxer, a biopic that chronicled her life and career. The film received positive critical reviews but a mixed reception from Thai audiences that paralleled the contentious reaction to Charoenphol’s career in Thai society (Stevens 2005).

The controversies surrounding such trans and gender-nonconforming athletes as Richards, Bagger, and Charoenphol encouraged the IOC to outline a policy for transgender Olympians. The 2003 Stockholm Consensus required trans Olympic hopefuls to undergo anatomical surgery, obtain legal recognition of gender, and verify that hormonal therapy had been administered at “appropriate” levels for the assigned sex (Sykes 2006). Critics immediately pointed out that surgery is impractical or undesirable for many trans individuals, and that it fixates on the anatomical changes of trans women. Moreover, legal recognition was an impossibility for many people from certain countries, and what constitutes appropriate hormonal levels is debatable (Cavanagh and Sykes 2006; Sykes 2006). Protests against the Stockholm Consensus eventually convinced the IOC to outline a new policy, just as protests against sex testing had pushed the IAAF and IOC to change their gender-verification practices.

Challenges to Sex Testing

In the mid-1980s, Spanish hurdler María José Martínez-Patiño underwent a chromosomal check that revealed she had AIS. Rather than remove herself from competition, as advised by the team doctor, she competed and was publicly barred from sport (Martñnez-Patiño 2005). Her plight brought increased attention to the discriminatory nature of gender testing, and the resultant international protests encouraged the IAAF to abandon compulsory checks in 1992, and the IOC to do the same in 1999 (Chapelle 1986; Pieper 2016).

But the suspension of compulsory testing proved to be short-lived. In 2009 South African runner Caster Semenya finished first in the 800-meter race at the World Track and Field Championships, defeating the second-place finisher by more than two seconds. Both her appearance and her time spurred many people to question her sex. The IAAF and IOC responded by implementing a new verification system. In 2011 the organizations introduced hyperandrogenism policies that bar from competition women with higher than average levels of naturally produced testosterone. The policies establish 10 nanomoles per liter as the testosterone ceiling for women, including for trans women (Schultz 2012).

Opponents immediately protested that the testosterone limit was arbitrary, and also argued that naturally produced hormones are a biological advantage no different than increased lung capacity or above-average height (Rogol and Pieper 2017; Schultz 2012). Many also criticized the racist underpinning of the testing because women of color were disproportionately targeted: sport officials did not subject white, Western women to the same level of scrutiny due to normative expectations of racialized femininity. For example, during the 2012 London Olympics practitioners identified four women as having hyperandrogenism. The four Olympic hopefuls were all tall and muscular, under the age of twenty-one, and came from “rural or mountainous regions of developing countries.” These athletes later underwent surgery in order to compete in international sport (Fénichel et al. 2013). Indian runner Dutee Chand, who also underwent testing and was withdrawn from the 2014 Commonwealth Games under the hyperandrogenism guidelines, appealed to the Court of Arbitration for Sport (CAS). The CAS halted the IAAF's policy that placed a limit on naturally produced testosterone for two years and ordered the IAAF to provide evidence of the advantage that hyperandrogenism affords to women. In 2018 the IAAF introduced revised eligibility regulations for female classification in races from 400 meters to a mile that forces women to medically reduce their natural testosterone levels if those levels are above a certain limit (IAAF 2018).
Canadian trans cyclist Kristen Worley also opposed the testosterone ceiling mandated by sport practitioners, citing health reasons; she had found that the allowable levels did not support her basic health needs. She filed a human rights complaint against cycling organizations, arguing that the level of testosterone permitted violates the rights of XY female athletes. Worley settled her case in 2017, and the named entities agreed to review the policies on gender verification and transitioned athletes and to promote the message to the IOC and other global organizations (Aalgaard 2017).

Trans Men in Sports

While most of the gender concerns regarding trans athletes focus on trans women and the physical advantages they might have over their cisgender female competitors, several trans men have also made headlines. Kye Allums became the first openly transgender National Collegiate Athletic Association (NCAA) athlete to play Division I sports as a member of the women’s basketball team at George Washington University when he acknowledged his male identity (though designated female at birth) in 2010. He remained on the women’s team, which was allowed by the NCAA because he had not undergone hormone treatments (Thomas 2010). Professional hockey player Harrison Browne of the Metropolitan Riveters in the National Women’s Hockey League in Canada became one of the first openly transgender professional North American athletes when he came out as a trans man in 2016. Like Allums, Browne continued to play with the women’s team because he decided to wait until retirement to begin hormone replacement therapy (Steele 2016).

The first trans man to compete as a man on a Division I college team was Schuyler Bailar, who was originally recruited for the women’s swim team at Harvard University in 2013 but elected to compete on the men’s team after transitioning during his gap year (Merrill 2015). Transgender high-school wrestler Mack Beggs did not have the same option; despite undergoing testosterone treatments as part of his transition from female to male, he was forced to continue competing against girls due to a policy in Texas that mandates that “student-athletes in high school must compete as the gender that’s on their birth certificate” (Howerton 2018), despite his stated preference to compete against boys. He won two state titles in a row, in 2017 and 2018.

SEE ALSO Athletes, Trans and Intersex, in Asia; Sports, Women in, Africa; Sports and Sexuality in Latin America

BIBLIOGRAPHY

http://www.isna.org/faq/what_is_intersex

Martínez-Patiño, María José. “Personal Account: A Woman Tried and Tested.”

Merrill, Emma. “Schuyler Bailar to Be First Openly Transgender D1 NCAA Swimmer.”
Swimming World, 17 June 2015.

Pieper, Lindsay Parks.

Rogol, Alan D., and Lindsay Parks Pieper. “Genes, Gender, Hormones, and Doping in Sport: A Convoluted Tale.”
https://www.ncbi.nlm.nih.gov/pmc/articles/PMC5643412/

Steele, Michelle. “NWHL Player Harrison Browne Comes Out as a Transgender Man.”
ESPN.com, 7 October 2016.

Stevens, Dana. “Film in Review: ‘Beautiful Boxer.’”

Tebbutt, Clare. “The Spectre of the ‘Man-Woman Athlete’: Mark Weston, Zdenek Koubek, the 1936 Olympics and the Uncertainty of Sex.”

Thomas, Katie. “Transgender Man Is on Women’s Team.”
Athletes, Trans and Intersex, in Asia

RUSHAAN KUMAR
Assistant Professor of Feminist and Gender Studies
Colorado College, Colorado Springs

The complexities of sex segregation, testing, and verification in sports, including the cases of noteworthy Asian trans and intersex athletes.

The term trans acquires different meanings over distinct geopolitical and temporal contexts within Asia and beyond, with its broadest application encompassing gendervariant, gender-queer, nonbinary, transgender, transsexual, transvestite, and, at times, intersex people. Here, the term is used as a descriptor for the various forms of sex and gender nonconformity listed above but does not reflect the athletes’ self-identifications, which are often unknown. Trans here may pertain to athletes who have chosen to undergo a medical transition involving gender-affirming surgeries and/or hormone replacement therapy, as well as those who do not make that choice. Furthermore, trans does not stand in contradistinction to other sexual identities, such as lesbian, queer, bisexual, or gay, because trans people may also be gay, lesbian, or any other sexual orientation.

Usually, the term trans is distinguished from intersex, which includes people with “atypical combinations of chromosomes, hormones, genitalia, and other physical features” (Buzuvis 2011, 11). It is a term that is often ascribed to certain athletes whose physical attributes, gender embodiment, or gender performance are deemed as divergent from the sex/gender norms within sports and are subsequently brought under medical scrutiny in order to determine the biological sex of these athletes. While intersex has been reclaimed by many as a descriptor of identity and shared community, in the context of gender-nonconforming athletes in Asia, it is a term often imposed by medical professionals, the media, or academics. Thus the use of trans and intersex here also references the contentious relationship between ascription and (self-) identification and between gender and sex difference, alluding to the existence of multiple identities, terms, and descriptors used by gender/sex-nonconforming people in different parts of Asia. Since the mid-1980s several Asian athletes have been accused of committing gender fraud by fellow athletes and international sports federations, often suspending or ending their careers. It is important to note that in the context of such accusations, the use of the terms trans and intersex is embedded within structures of containment and management of transgender and intersex athletic bodies in Asia through restrictive and pathologized labels, and yet also gestures to the myriad self-identifying terms for gender nonconformity that proliferate in the region.
The controversies surrounding athletes Pinki Pramanik, Santhi Soundarajan, Aprilia Santini Manganang, Dutee Chand, and Nong Toom further illuminate these tensions as detailed below.

Sex Segregation in International Sports

Sex segregation has been a contentious issue in sports since at least the 1960s and has come to involve a range of ethical and political questions involving standards of fairness, the economic aspects of sports careers and competitions, national pride, and the very basis of sex and gender divisions. Elite athletes are seen as symbols of human capability and achievement that possess a strong body, will, and mind within Olympism, a philosophy and set of principles espoused by the International Olympic Committee (IOC) in its Olympic Charter (Henne 2015). Historically, the status of “elite athlete” was bestowed on a select group of competitors who were considered exemplary, both physically and morally, and was explicitly denied to women and non-Western people (Henne 2015). While these exclusionary policies were eventually reconceived, Kathryn E. Henne (2015) and other scholars have shown that they continued to influence policies of fair play, meant to ensure that all athletes compete on a level playing field, so to speak.

In this context, anti-doping regulations, for instance, mandated that athletes must perform at their own individual capacity and not with artificial aids of any kind. This logic of controlling unfair performance enhancements has been extended to include what is deemed an excessive or even unnatural presence of testosterone, a “male” sex hormone presumed to enhance speed and strength in female athletes. Through the use of technology, medicine, and legal mechanisms, female bodies are evaluated for their compliance with, or transgression of, fair play. This notion is, in turn, based on a set of Western standards for the proper embodiment and performance of femininity. Along with the sex segregation of sports, sex verification is a key mechanism through which proper femininity and standards of athletic performance are controlled (Henne 2015). Almost exclusively employed on bodies assigned female at birth, sex-verification tests legitimate the presumption of a clear boundary between male and female, as well as uphold the hierarchy between female and male athletic capabilities (note that “sex verification” and “gender verification” are often used interchangeably in media reportage). Indeed, the trigger for a female athlete to come under scrutiny and testing has often been an extraordinary performance that is seen as antithetical to femininity. An early example of this was Japanese middle-distance runner Hitomi Kinue whose excellent performance in the 1928 Olympics combined with her embodiment of musculature brought widespread accusations of being a “tomboy” and/or physiologically male, both by Olympic sports officials and the Japanese media (Pieper 2016).

A primary anxiety has been to maintain the difference between people assigned female at birth and people considered “gender frauds” and perceived as male, transgender, and/or intersex. Even as fair-play regulations prohibit the use of myriad artificial substances that might aid athletic performance, many female athletes are often forced by sports authorities to take hormones to lower their naturally occurring testosterone. Such contradictions demonstrate the control exerted over women and people assigned female within elite sports, in addition to the overt exclusion of trans and intersex athletes.

PINKI PRAMANIK (1986–)

The case of Pinki Pramanik has been the most publicized example of the mistreatment of intersex and trans athletes in India. Born in West Bengal, India, in 1986, Pramanik had a successful career as a middle-distance track athlete. It is rumored that she was advised by Indian sports officials to retire early, soon after the Santhi Soundarajan controversy at the 2006 Asian Games. Years later, in June 2012, Pramanik was arrested and charged under several sections of the Indian penal code, including 376 (rape), 417 (impersonation), and 493 (cohabitation caused by a man deceitfully inducing a belief of lawful marriage), based on accusations by her live-in companion.

At the time, Indian criminal law held that rape could be committed only when a penis nonconsensually penetrates a vagina. Prior to April 2013, rape laws did not recognize penetration by any other body part or extraneous object, nor did they recognize same-sex sexual violence. Thus, the police demanded a sex-verification test to determine whether Pramanik was capable of committing rape. While the accusations had nothing to do with her athletic career, journalists repeatedly questioned whether Pramanik should give up her awards in light of the maleimpersonation accusations. This line of public questioning led to several nonconsensual sex-verification tests, including unnecessary DNA testing (Mitra 2014). Pramanik received bail, her tests turned out to be inconclusive, and it was revealed that she was being entrapped in false accusations over a land dispute. The charges were dropped.

Pramanik’s case not only revealed the institutional mistreatment and abuse of gender/sexual minorities but was also a powerful example of the harmfulness of contemporary journalistic practice. It was instrumental in galvanizing activist and academic work on the rights of intersex athletes and trans people in India.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Mitra, Payoshni. “Male/Female or Other: The Untold Stories of Female Athletes with
The 1960s saw the formalization of sex verification at competitions governed by the International Association of Athletics Federations (IAAF) in the form of visual and gynecological verification of binary sex at “women’s” competitive events. In 1968 the IOC introduced mandatory genetic or chromosomal testing that would identify the presence of two X chromosomes to determine who could or could not participate in women’s events. This compulsory test for women’s events was discontinued by 2000, in part because of the ineffectiveness of such procedures. Nevertheless, sports authorities remain heavily invested in binary conceptions of sex and gender in spite of scientific evidence proving that differences between male and female are subtle, ambiguous, and thus unreliable. Although sex-verification tests are no longer mandatory, the IOC and IAAF still practice them on a case-by-case basis to verify suspicions of “gender fraud” in women’s events. This means that while sex and gender regulations are no longer explicitly exclusionary toward trans people, trans and intersex athletes are often targets of scrutiny because of their perceived gender and/or sex difference.

Controversial Cases Involving Athletes Assigned “Female” at Birth

During the twenty-first century there have been several controversies involving Asian athletes subjected to sex-verification tests as a response to accusations of gender fraud from fellow competitors or from regional or international sports authorities. But the case that brought the issues of sexsegregated hierarchies in sports, invasive sex-verification tests, and the rights of intersex and transgender people into unprecedented public attention was that of Caster Semenya, a South African athlete who was made to undergo sex-verification tests after a record-breaking performance in an 800-meter race at the 2009 World Championships in Berlin. Semenya’s case brought other similar cases in Asia to the forefront and demonstrated the need to reconsider the malefemale binary in sports.

Santhi Soundarajan Santhi Soundarajan was born in 1981 in the small town of Pudukkottai, Tamil Nadu, India. She was assigned female sex at birth and self identified as a girl growing up. She realized she was different at puberty when she did not menstruate and her breasts did not develop. For Soundarajan, success at sports meant social acceptance and possible social and economic mobility in the future. She became a successful middle-distance runner, earning many medals and awards and competing at the international level by 2005. At the 2006 Asian Games in Doha, Qatar, Soundarajan won a silver medal in what would be the last formal race of her career, as soon afterward she was declared genetically male by a medical board. The medal and 100,000-rupee cash prize were stripped from her. The government of India and the sporting fraternity withdrew their support, leading to Soundarajan’s attempted suicide in 2007. She received consistent support only from the Dalit-led Tamil Nadu state government (Dalits being the “untouchable,” oppressed caste in India), which saw her mistreatment as amounting to caste-based oppression at the hands of upper-caste national leaders. In 2016 the National Commission for Scheduled Castes began an investigation on Soundarajan’s behalf, with the probe centering on caste-based bias against her in 2006. Additionally, her case was helped by the work of transgender activists—namely, the education and welfare initiatives undertaken from 2006 to 2011 through the Tamil Nadu Transgender Welfare Board (Mitra 2014). In early 2017 Soundarajan filed a complaint with the National Human Rights Commission against the Athletics Federation of India, the Indian Olympic Association, and the Sports Authority of India because of the nonconsensual and humiliating way in which her gender tests were conducted in Doha. Sports officials claim, however, that because her medals were stripped from her by the Olympic Council of Asia, and not the national agencies, there is little that can be done to address the issue at the national level. Soundarajan’s case indicates the need to understand the class- and caste-based implications of sex segregation and verification in sports.

Dutee Chand Dutee Chand is another Indian athlete who failed a sex-verification test. She was born in 1996 into an economically poor family of weavers in Gopalpur, Odisha, India. At age seventeen, she won a bronze medal in the 200-meter race at the 2013 Asian Athletics Championships. At eighteen, she was disqualified and prohibited from participating in the 2014 Commonwealth Games because she failed the hormonal sex-verification test initiated by the Athletics Federation of India as a result of her elevated levels of natural testosterone (a medical condition known as hyperandrogenism). In 2015 Chand appealed to the Court of Arbitration for Sport (CAS) to undo the actions of the Athletics Federation of India and the IAAF, arguing that insufficient evidence had been produced to prove that there is a link between heightened androgen levels and greater athletic performance. The CAS responded by providing a two-year deadline for further evidence to be furnished by the IAAF in support of its rule against hyperandrogenism, effectively negating Chand’s suspension from competition. Chand went on to represent India at the 2016 Summer Olympics but met an early exit. Intersex activists have used her Olympic performance to argue that hyperandrogenism does not automatically enhance performance and that athletic success is based on hard work and access to quality training facilities—and some argue that international sports authorities should take those factors into account when determining fair play, rather than sex and gender characteristics.
Park Eun-seon Born in 1986 in Seoul, South Korean soccer player Park Eun-seon also faced controversy in 2013, as six rival teams within the South Korean women’s soccer league demanded that she pass a gender test. Despite having complied with several prior gender tests—for example, for the 2004 Athens Olympics—she continues to be brought under suspicion and scrutiny. Some have conjectured that such accusations against the star player of the South Korean women’s soccer team are part of a conspiracy to undermine her career, and lack any real merit.

Aprilia Santini Manganang In 2015 another controversy over sex testing for an athlete assigned female at birth occurred. Volleyball player Aprilia Santini Manganang was born in 1992 in Indonesia, and led her national team to a resounding victory against the Philippines in the 2015 Southeast Asian Games. Afterward, the leader of the Filipino delegation approached the organizers of the event to verify Manganang’s sex. The organizers denied this request as earlier testing had revealed only slightly elevated testosterone levels (not enough to get her suspended), and she was allowed to keep competing. It must be noted that the humiliating and violent practice of sex verification is disproportionately targeted at athletes assigned female at birth and serves to control female athletic achievement and the athletes’ gender embodiment.

Trans and Intersex Athletes Assigned “Male” at Birth

Although sex-verification controversies have predominantly revolved around athletes assigned female at birth, the legitimacy of some trans athletes assigned male at birth has also been publicly questioned. One such case involves Satree Lek, a Thai men’s volleyball team that includes transvestite, kathoey (any transgender or gender-nonconforming person), and gay people assigned male at birth. In 1996 Satree Lek participated in the Thai national championship despite stigma and opposition from peers and sports authorities. Their triumph at that competition led to The Iron Ladies (2000), one of the first Thai films portraying kathoeys and transvestites in a positive light. The film even cast at least one self-identified kathoey and went on to spawn two hit sequels.

In 1998 another kathoey athlete, Parinya Charoenphol—popularly known as Nong Toom—benefited from the precedent set by Satree Lek. Whereas national sports officials had tried to bar kathoey members of Satree Lek from competing, when Toom became the newest Muay Thai (Thai boxing) champion, they supported her. Toom’s life story became the basis of the 2004 film Beautiful Boxer. Although Toom’s character in the film was played by a non-trans male actor and former kickboxer, Toom herself went on to become an actress and toured with her one-woman show titled Boxing Cabaret. Toom’s successful career as a Muay Thai champion, model, and actress is indicative of changing public opinion about kathoeys and trans and intersex people in Thailand.
In 2015 Iran’s entire women’s soccer team underwent mandatory sex-verification tests after multiple players’ sex and gender identity were suspected. The team’s goalkeeper was first accused of being a female impersonator in 2010. By 2014 Iranian sports authorities had instituted random, unannounced medical checks to ensure that all women on the team fit prevailing gendered codes of ethics and fair play. In the same year, the clubs had to mandatorily perform sex-verification tests before signing contracts with players. In 2015, eight team members were declared either intersex or trans women yet to undergo gender affirmation surgery and were barred from playing.

Trans and Intersex Athletes and LGBTQI Organizing in Asia

Transgender, transsexual, and intersex activism in Asia is a changing terrain, with nations increasingly recognizing and instituting protections for the rights of trans people. Contrary to homosexuality, which is prohibited and criminalized in several Asian countries (e.g., India, Iran, and Pakistan), crucial strides have been made by trans rights activists lobbying their governments to ensure the equal treatment of trans people within the national culture and economy. This discrepancy exists, in part, because transgenderism is often seen as a psychosexual aberration—not a choice but a condition that causes dysphoria and suffering—that some governments have come to consider their responsibility to fix. For example, in Iran a 1986 fatwa not only recognizes trans identity but also substantially subsidizes the cost of gender affirmation surgeries in order to “fix” transgender people and restore them to heterosexuality. Reportedly, many Iranian gay, lesbian, and trans people feel pressure to undergo surgery to remain in their same-sex relationships. The Iranian historian Afsaneh Najmabadi (2014) explores this “proximity” of the categories of transgender, transsexual, and homosexual, wherein the otherwise disparate realms of Islamic jurisprudence, psychiatry, and biomedicine at times intersect in some scholarly work to turn transsexuality and sex reassignment surgery into a corrective to homosexual desire.

At the same time, as a result of worldwide notoriety from how the media, the IOC, and the IAAF handled the Semenya case in 2009, LGBTQI activists and academics the world over have advocated for greater awareness about and policy reform pertaining to trans and intersex athletes. They have demonstrated that sex and gender are much more diverse and ambiguous than sporting regulations allow for and have argued that not updating the relevant sporting rules violates the rights of trans and intersex people. Transgender athletes have been allowed to compete at the Olympic Games since 2004 but only after surgery and at least two years of hormone therapy, as well as with legal documentation of the gender change. In 2016, as a result of trans advocacy in medicine, the IOC stopped requiring gender affirmation surgeries, citing them as unnecessary and “inconsistent with ... notions of human rights” (IOC 2015, 2). This changed policy is certainly indicative of increased awareness about transgender rights, but its deeper impact on conceptions of sex, gender, ability/excellence, and gender roles within and outside sports remains uncertain.

Of concern, for instance, is the new IAAF regulations released in April 2018 that require anyone competing under the category of “female” to “reduce her blood testosterone level to below five (5) nmol/L [nanomoles per liter] for a continuous period of at least six months” (IAAF 2018), regardless of whether her body produces the hormone naturally. Such intersex athletes as Semenya and Chand, who have naturally elevated testosterone, will be forced to take testosterone suppressants because of the findings of a 2017 study funded by the IAAF and the World Anti-Doping Agency concluding that “female athletes with higher testosterone levels can have a competitive advantage of between 1.8–4.5 per cent” (Bloom 2017). Since 2003 trans women have also had to comply with similar rules, according to which they must prove that they are on hormone replacement therapy to suppress testosterone levels. Furthermore, the new IAAF regulations, effective starting November 2018, require every athlete competing under female classification to be recognized as female or intersex by the law, thereby imposing additional bureaucratic hurdles for transgender women athletes (IAAF 2018).

Thus these rules posit cultural and legal standards of “normal” feminine ability and performance that is then regulated by sports authorities under the guise of scientism and fair play. In the wake of the media controversy around Pramanik, the Indian feminist scholar Nivedita Menon (2011) has challenged this paradigm by noting that such strict management and regulation of athletic bodies is not extended to men’s sports. Such athletes as Michael Phelps and several very tall basketball players whose anatomical and genetic differences give them a clear advantage over other male competitors are not subjected to intrusive scrutiny.

Thus, feminist scholars such as Menon and Payoshni Mitra (2014) have called attention to the ways in which policies of the IOC and the IAAF uphold binary and hierarchical understandings of gender, despite seemingly becoming supportive of transgender and intersex rights. Furthermore, in light of the institutional ill-treatment of controversy-ridden trans and intersex athletes—especially of Soundarajan and Pramanik in India—Dalit feminists and transgender activists have productively reframed the question of trans athletes from biology and anatomy to one that also accounts for the caste-, race-, and class-based discrimination that makes gender-nonconforming athletes exceptionally vulnerable. In this way, the visibility of trans and intersex athletes, albeit imposed, has played a significant role in energizing feminist and LGBTQI activism and has served to reshape public discourse on trans and intersex rights.

What is erased even now, however, is the individual dignity and humanity of these athletes in the aftermath of public controversy and the loss of a career. In this context, some poignant and much-needed efforts have been made to create safe and equitable spaces for trans and intersex athletes. In 2015 a female-to-male transgender youth basketball club was established in Tokyo, Japan. In 2017 the state government of Kerala and the Sexual and Gender Minority Federation of Kerala organized an event called the Kerala State Transgender Athletics Meet. A first of its kind at the state level in India, this event promises to undo the stigma and suspicion with which trans and intersex athletes are regarded and to help integrate them within national and international sports.

SEE ALSO Athletes, Trans and Intersex; Sports, Women in, Africa; Sports and Sexuality in Latin America

BIBLIOGRAPHY

testosterone-medication-study/

Mitra, Payoshni. “Male/Female or Other: The Untold Stories of Female Athletes with

The history of the struggle for Australasian LGBTI rights, as well as the increased political and cultural impact of this community from the late twentieth century onward.

It is possible to understand the history of sex, gender, and sexuality in Australia and New Zealand with a national focus. Indeed, this is the way it is usually done. Australia and New Zealand are independent national states and have been since the early twentieth century. This fact is important for understanding some of the ways in which the politics of sexuality have been played out. But these two countries also share a history and culture that binds them across national borders into an easily recognized cultural realm. They are both products of nineteenth-century mass migration from the British Isles that overwhelmed indigenous peoples and cultures. They both have a culture shaped by English as the dominant language, Christianity as the main religion, the Westminster parliamentary system, and English laws and judicial practices. They share the British monarch as their head of state. Although not widely used, the term Australasia can serve as a convenient label for this transnational reality. Until well into the second half of the twentieth century governments and citizens alike in Australasia looked to Britain as the source of investment, as a target for exports, and as the fountainhead of literature, arts, and popular culture. Beginning in the 1960s, the focus shifted to the United States. More recently Asia has loomed large but chiefly as a source of migration and a focus of economic activity.

These national and transnational lenses need to be supplemented, however, by looking at the subnational, the regional, and the local. Judicial and geographic differences within the two nations matter. The six states and two territories that constitute Australia, the North Island and South Island in New Zealand, and the distinctions between rural and metropolitan areas (with the addition of “remote” regions in Australia) have all had a powerful influence on how people live their lives and have generated distinct subnational subcultures. In the Australian states, as well as in both countries’ local government areas, jurisdictional rights and responsibilities have been important elements in the play of power.

It is important, too, to remember that societies are not a single thing; instead, they are a congeries of institutions and structures within which people make history. The governmental, the economic, and civil society all matter, as do other domains of society. And all of them are unavoidably pluralistic. The governmental domain includes ministers and the cabinet, members of parliament, and the government and the opposition at national and local (and in Australia at state) levels. The electoral domain includes political parties (themselves composed of members, officials, and branches) along with interest and lobby groups. The administrative/bureaucratic domain includes the public service, the courts, and the police. There are legal, medical, and religious professions and their organizations. The economic domain is composed of businesses large and small, their industry associations and lobby groups, and trade unions. The media domain is composed of print, broadcast, and digital formats operated by competing corporations and small self-managed networks. In civil society, families, friendship circles, and any number of affinities are all in play. When people talk about historical change, they are talking about what happens in the broader cultural realm, in the regions and their subcultures, and in the social domains and their constituent parts—all of which may be moving in different directions and/or at different paces.

Historical Overview

England’s laws against buggery (promulgated during the reign of Henry VIII [r. 1509–1547]) arrived with the Australasian settlers/invaders, and even after the colonies gained self-government over the course of the nineteenth century, they tended to follow Britain’s lead on reform. The Australasian legislators might usefully be thought of as Anglotropic in their attitude to British laws (that is, like heliotropic plants that turn toward the sun, Anglotropic cultures looked to Britain for guidance). So, when it came to laws on buggery and sodomy, where Britain led, the colonies followed. The obligation to prove not just anal penetration but “emission of seed” was removed, the death penalty abolished, gross indecency laws introduced, and vagrancy laws redefined. When the British Parliament (partially) legalized homosexual acts in England and Wales in 1967, Australasian legislators were generally of the view that their publics were not ready. But decriminalization was on the agenda, and, although it was a remarkably drawn-out process, there was never any serious doubt that homosexual acts would be legalized in Australasia as they had been in Britain.

New Zealand’s unitary state made such laws a matter for the national parliament; in the Australian federation they were within the remit of the states. But it makes sense to think of the struggle for decriminalization as being fought out transnationally over ten jurisdictions: six Australian states, two territories, its federal jurisdiction, and New Zealand. Each campaign had its own history, but the logic was identical: for the individual’s right of sexual self-determination (phrased as the “consenting adult in private”; a phrase adopted from a British government inquiry, the Wolfenden Report of 1957). The changing social context over the quarter century that it took to bring about decriminalization (1972 to meant that the early efforts were relatively easy, relying as they did on a liberal political climate that even conservative parties were adapting to. By the 1980s and 1990s, reform was a harder task than it had been earlier, as conservative forces, rather taken by surprise by the rise of liberalism in the 1960s and 1970s, had organized themselves and set out to resist all further reform of laws and attitudes. In New Zealand (1985–1986) and Tasmania (1988–1997) bitter, hard-fought campaigns were necessary to overcome this newly mobilized opposition from the Right.

At the same time, however, the demand for decriminalization was supplemented, even before it was won, by wider demands for relationship recognition, parenting rights, and protection from discrimination. In Australia, all of these were state responsibilities and were, as in New Zealand, legislated in an ad hoc manner over the course of the period after 1980. In Australia, at the federal level, the government acted to reform and eradicate homophobic practices within its own areas of jurisdiction. Beginning in 1991, Australians could sponsor their same-sex partners as migrants. (Unlike the United States and Canada, it had never been against the law for homosexual individuals to travel or migrate to Australia or New Zealand; what was new here was the acceptance of the existence of homosexual relationships as a basis for immigration.) In 1992 gay and lesbian people were allowed to serve in the Australian Defence Force. In 2010 this right was extended to transgender people. New Zealand opened up its military in 1993 based on a reading of the Human Rights Act and by 2014 had been ranked by The Hague Centre for Strategic Studies' LGBT Military Index as the world’s best for LGBT inclusion. In 2008 the Australian parliament amended something like 100 laws to eradicate from almost all federal laws discrimination against same-sex couples, supplementing what the states and territories had been doing for the best part of twenty years. (The exceptions related to marriage.) In 2013 federal antidiscrimination protections were extended to encompass sexual orientation, gender identity, and intersex status.

The path to same-sex marriage equality in Australia was a remarkably convoluted one—and all the more revealing for that. In 2004 the Marriage Act (a federal law) was amended to ensure that same-sex marriages could not be contracted in Australia, nor could overseas marriages be recognized. This was in response to same-sex couples returning from Canada, married, and expecting to have their relationship accepted. In order to prevent the courts doing so, the law was changed. The conservative government was joined by the Labor Party in this vote. Almost immediately a campaign was established to overturn the law. By 2011 the Labor Party had reversed itself, embracing same-sex marriage. By this stage a solid majority of public opinion was in favor. After Ireland and the United States adopted marriage equality in 2015, the expectation was that Australia would follow. Conservatives, however, announced that there would be a popular vote on the issue prior to any parliamentary vote. More machinations followed, and in the end a voluntary nonbinding postal survey was held instead. In this survey 61.6 percent voted to change the law to allow same-sex marriage. On 7 December 2017 the parliament voted down a series of rearguard amendments purporting to protect religious freedoms and passed the bill. The vote was, of course, historic. In many ways, the campaign to get out the “yes” vote was even more so. The campaign estimated that 15,000 people volunteered, making over a million phone calls and engaging in door-to-door contact at 100,000 households. Thousands of businesses, big and small, expressed support.

More broadly, in both countries, governments at all levels have been brought by many years of struggle to a point where they now seek to actively promote LGBTI well-being (health policy and so on) via antihomophobic policies and practices by their agencies and within the wider society, and they support LGBTI community events such as pride festivals and marches and days of commemoration such as the International Day against Homophobia, Transphobia, and Biphobia. Australian and New Zealand governments have also played a significant role in advancing the cause of LGBTI equality on the world stage, reflecting a shared commitment to a “middle-power diplomacy” whereby smaller nations work to extend the human rights protections provided by international law. Both countries have supported the various declarations and resolutions on LGBTI rights in United Nations bodies since 2006. One less obvious role that national governments have played is in signing and being bound by various international rights agreements. In 1994 Nicholas Toonen, a Tasmanian gay man, was able to rely on Australia’s adoption of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights to argue to the United Nations Human Rights Committee that Tasmania’s anti-buggery laws violated his privacy. After the committee found in Toonen’s favor, the federal government used its constitutional right to enforce its international treaty obligations to invalidate the Tasmanian laws (Toonen v. Australia 1994).

Early Kamp Culture

Historically speaking, there has been a remarkably rapid shift in laws and attitudes regarding sex, sexuality, and gender, given the deeply rooted nature of Anglo-Celtic homophobia. The first organizations established to argue for decriminalization were founded as late as, in New Zealand, 1962 (which lapsed and was reestablished in 1967) and, in the Australian Capital Territory, 1969. Well before then, there were well-established kamp subcultures in major cities such as Sydney, Melbourne, Auckland, and Wellington that historians can recognize as early as the 1920s and 1930s. (Kamp or camp was the term most commonly used before 1972 by homosexuals in Australasia, where it worked as a simple synonym for homosexual, without the associations of flamboyance that the word had in Britain and the United States.) Groups of men and women lived in semiclandestine social worlds based on shared social spaces, an esoteric language, and a sense of common identity. But there is evidence, too, of friendship circles and other forms of sociability beyond the major cities, in regional towns, especially after World War II (1939–1945)—researched and studied in Darwin, in Newcastle, and, in a particularly remarkable find, in small-town New Zealand centered on the photographer Robert Gant in the 1890s (Brickell 2012).

Evidence of these worlds exists particularly in literature. Novelists such as Gerald Glaskin (writing as Neville Jackson) offered a lightly fictionalized account of kamp life in 1950s Perth (No End to the Way [1965]). Jon Rose (again, a pseudonym) offered something similar for Sydney during World War II in his At the Cross (1961). Kamp people would also read the work of local authors who had migrated overseas, such as New Zealand’s James Courage (whose 1959 novel A Way of Love was set and published in England and banned in his home country). Michael Hurley’s encyclopedic Guide to Gay and Lesbian Writing in Australia (1996) reveals a much richer world of literary visibility in the pre-gay liberation era than many would have expected, drawing out the value of such writing and providing insights into this otherwise shadowy period. The Australian Lesbian and Gay Archives and the Lesbian and Gay Archives of New Zealand have collected oral history interviews that throw further light on kamp lives of the era before the rise of gay politics.

There were a number of pubs and hotels that were prepared to welcome, or more often turn a blind eye to, gatherings of well-behaved kamps, but the central institutions of the kamp world were private parties and, for women, especially it seems, “sporting clubs, particularly women’s cricket, the army, motorcycle and car clubs” (Chesser 1993, 34). What is clear is that, unlike in Europe and North America, until the mid- to late 1960s bars played a relatively minor role in the subcultures. And it was not from these subcultures that homosexual politics emerged in Australasia.

Instead, the politics of law reform and social tolerance emerged within a wider movement that might be characterized as “modernizing liberalism,” whose proponents set out in the 1960s to transform Australian and New Zealand politics and society from being, in one participant’s description, “racist, anglocentric-imperialist, puritan, sexist, politically genteel-acquiescent, capitalist, bureaucratic and developmentalist” (Horne 1980, 4–5). Through small magazines, initially, and then through newspapers, the movement for change came to occupy an ever more prominent place in the political middle ground, especially through state and national Labor/Labour parties. Among the targets of this movement—immigration and migrant resettlement policy, indigenous affairs, censorship, abortion, foreign policy, urban ugliness, the monarchy, the environment, poverty—antihomosexual laws and attitudes came to be seen as evidence of social backwardness. Decriminalization and tolerance came to be seen as desirable elements of the kind of modern liberal society that these reformers aspired to. Initially, at least, most of this discussion took place in the more marginal niches of social and political life: in student newspapers and in civil liberties and humanist newsletters and meetings. The partial decriminalization of homosexual acts in England and Wales in 1967 provided a fillip to those looking to reform the laws. Synods and inquiries of Methodist and Presbyterian churches (among the smaller Christian denominations) and in the Anglican church in various dioceses around Australia and New Zealand called for decriminalization. In 1970 Australia’s federal attorney general, looking to revise the law code of the Australian Capital Territory, floated the idea of decriminalization. He was soon forced by his party to back away from this, but others took up the challenge. In the Labor Party, which had adapted most thoroughly to the new liberalism, Gough Whitlam, the federal party’s leader, echoed the famous remark by the Canadian prime minister Pierre Trudeau that the state had no place in the bedrooms of the nation.

The breakthrough years in Australasia came in the late 1960s as the issue of decriminalization, so long discussed in the liberal press, started to take organizational form. In Wellington, the law reform society that had existed briefly in 1962–1964 was revived in 1967, initially as the Wolfenden Association but soon changing its name to the much more open New Zealand Homosexual Law Reform Society (NZHLRS). Two years later, in Canberra, the Homosexual Law Reform Society of the Australian Capital Territory came into being. These were remarkably similar organizations. Founded at public meetings organized by a handful of liberal reformers, none of whom publicly identified as homosexuals, they conducted research, drafted legislation, published pamphlets and newsletters, and lobbied opinion makers and members of parliament. They found widespread support but had no success in achieving their goal. The NZHLRS remained the main vehicle by which the campaign for decriminalization was advanced for the next several years.

In Sydney in 1970, a group of gay people, meeting privately, decided to take a public stand. Their organization, the Campaign Against Moral Persecution (CAMP), was originally intended to be a media-monitoring group that would identify and respond to misinformation published about homosexual people. It was one of a number of small groups that emerged at that time in various cities. When the Australian, a major national newspaper and at that time a flagship of the liberal press, interviewed CAMP founders John Ware and Christabel Poll, using their full names and photos, opportunities dramatically opened. Hundreds of people wrote to the new organization, and within a year there were branches in almost every Australian capital city and at most universities. The language employed and the goals were liberal (law reform, education, a denial that homosexuals were in any significant way different from anyone else), and, while its leaders were aware of developments in the United States following the Stonewall riots (1969) in New York City that launched the modern gay rights movement, they did not expect anything similar to emerge in Australia, suggesting that it might be twenty years before Australian homosexuals were likely to be marching in the streets. Despite these limited expectations, CAMP was in many ways “born gay” in that it reflected not the conservative, respectable lobbying of concerned citizens that characterized the 1950s and 1960s (which we might describe as “homosexual politics”) but the open, confident, and demanding tone of the gay rights movement. CAMP and its leaders saw homosexual experience as a valid basis for understanding the homosexual condition and eschewed any reliance on experts. They put homosexuals visibly and publicly at the forefront of their campaign (without formally excluding straight people). They emphasized self-organization (opening club rooms where resources permitted) and self-expression, producing publications in which homosexuals spoke for themselves to the wider world (including a monthly national magazine, Camp Ink, state-based newsletters, and agitational flyers). And their first demonstration came, not after twenty years, but after thirteen months, in October 1971.

The Emergence of Gay Liberation

CAMP aspired to include women and men, gay and straight, radicals and moderates within its ranks. But by the time of its founding, US politics and culture had been reshaping the West for well over a decade, and in the antipodes Anglotropia gradually gave way to American cultural hegemony. Although the Stonewall riots were not reported in Australia, the gay pride marches celebrating their first anniversary in 1970 did appear in the local press, as well as in widely read American newsmagazines such as Time. It was inevitable that the newly emerging current—gay liberation—would arrive, and be taken up, in Australia. For activists, a particularly important moment came with the publication of Dennis Altman's seminal book Homosexual: Oppression and Liberation (1971). This defining text drew on and reported Altman's encounter with the emergence of liberation politics in New York in 1970 and 1971. It gained added attention locally from the fact that Altman was Australian, returning from New York shortly after publication. The book—and the flood of material that followed in student newspapers, in movement newsletters, in the mainstream press and electronic media, and in overseas magazines such as The Body Politic (Toronto) and Gay News (London)—spoke to the emergence of new strands of politics alongside the modernizing liberalism of the 1960s. Young people, profoundly influenced by revolutionary and countercultural ideas, saw in gay liberation a vehicle to challenge a social order whose time was passing. Liberationists saw society as the problem and saw in pride and defiance the means to transform it. The revolutionary eradication of all sex and gender roles would free not just homosexual people but everybody. The goal was not equality but liberation: “Gay, in its most far-reaching sense, means not only homosexual, but sexually free.... Gay is good for all of us. The artificial categories ‘heterosexual’ and ‘homosexual’ have been laid on us by sexist society” (Melbourne University Gay Liberation Front 1973; taken from Young 1972, 28–29). Gay liberationists stood in solidarity with women, indigenous people, migrants, trade unionists, and all those struggling for a better world.

In Sydney, a group called Gay Liberation was established in January 1972 as a result of disputes within CAMP and the secession of those who saw themselves as more radical than the existing leadership. In Melbourne, a discussion over dinner led to the decision to found a local organization. In the same year gay liberation organizations were established in numerous New Zealand cities, often on university campuses, including Auckland, Canterbury, Wellington, and Hamilton. An early campaign issue was sparked by a decision by US immigration officials to deny the New Zealand citizen Ngahuia Te Awekotuku entry to the country because of her lesbianism. Gay liberation groups proliferated in cities and towns across Australasia. Initially, the groups tended to be based on university campuses but the desire to transform the world led members to want access to wider audiences and to seek out opportunities to operate in what was often called the “real world.” Collective households, gay liberation centers, and regular meetings on- and off-campus provided spaces in which people could meet, debate, decide on actions, welcome new participants, and pick each other up.

International links to the United States, the United Kingdom, and Canada were fundamental, and much of the movement’s ideology, its style and language, and its demands were drawn from overseas. International travel (though expensive and relatively rare) brought activists face-to-face with their sisters and brothers in the struggle, providing ideas and inspiration. Overseas publications were widely read, and content was frequently reproduced locally, often with a breezy indifference to copyright. “Gay” replaced “camp” as the main form of self-identification, although radicals resisted “gay” for many years, seeing it as too respectable a term—as failing to challenge heterosexual society—defiantly using “homosexual” well into the 1970s.

The repertoires of struggle, too, were drawn from an international pool. “Coming out” as a means of confronting both social and internalized homophobia became increasingly common, and protests to defend those who were victimized by church and state after coming out played an important part in highlighting the extent and viciousness of antigay feeling. The 1972 murder of University of Adelaide law lecturer George Duncan, who was thrown into the River Torrens at a well-known beat (a cruising ground for homosexual men) and subsequently drowned, became a national scandal as it became increasingly clear that a small group of off-duty police officers were at least present at the time of the death. This injustice was remembered for decades by gay and straight people alike as emblematic of the tragic impact of antigay attitudes. The first national action in Australia (where communication between widely scattered state capitals was difficult) was Gay Pride Week in 1973. New Zealand held its first Gay Pride Week that same year. Where demonstrations were not possible, zaps (small, militant actions carried out by a handful of people) were deployed. The use of electroshock and chemical aversion therapy and brain surgery to “cure” homosexuals inspired noisy, disruptive, and very public protests. Solidarity with other oppressed and exploited peoples was proclaimed and acted on: “Gay liberation has a perspective for revolution based on the unity of all oppressed people—that is, there can be no freedom for gays in a society which enslaves others through male supremacy, racism and economic exploitation (capitalism)” proclaimed one leaflet (Melbourne University Gay Liberation Front 1973; taken from Young 1972, 25–26).

Fracture and Reaction from the Right
There were, of course, divisions within the movement. The sexism of gay men led many lesbians to prefer to work independently. Radicalesbians was a significant force in Melbourne, as was the group Sisters for Homophile Equality in Canterbury and Wellington. But even in less organized forms, lesbian activism was carried on via collective households, theater groups and the arts, publishing, conferences, bookshops, festivals, sports teams, and women’s health and safety campaigns and organizations.

Gay Pride Week in 1973 marked the high point of the early gay liberation years; after that, the movement fragmented into a myriad of activities and organizations. While many at the time bemoaned this, in retrospect it gave the movement a new impetus, as people took up issues that appealed to them and stepped away from ideological and personal conflicts. Telephone advice services, conferences, newspapers, election campaigns, lobbying, trade union caucuses, professional associations—the range of activities available meant that there was something to get involved in for anybody who was drawn to the movement. In 1975 the Australian Union of Students convened a national conference for homosexual activists attended by about 600 people. Dozens of workshops discussed every aspect of the movement’s work, and numerous action groups were founded that went on to make great gains in the following years. Such conferences were held annually until 1986, each one leaving a plethora of new and revitalized organizations behind to carry on the struggle. In New Zealand the National Gay and Lesbian Conference was held annually from 1972 to 1989 (except for 1983).

By the late 1970s, the gains of the movement were starting to look substantial. Law reform had been achieved in a small number of jurisdictions and was firmly on the agenda of most of the others, as was antidiscrimination legislation. Trade unions and professional associations were starting to recognize the claims of their members for protection and recognition. In 1972 the top body of the Australian and New Zealand psychiatric profession called for the decriminalization of homosexual acts and in 1973 went further in a clinical memorandum that declared that homosexuality was not, in and of itself, commonly or necessarily associated with neurotic symptoms. Progressive trade unions such as the Builders Labourers Federation were persuaded to defend victimized students by blackbanning (refusing to work on) campuses to support the movement’s protests. In Victoria, all of the teachers’ unions had adopted strong pro-gay policies covering the rights of teachers and students. Public opinion was shifting markedly toward support for law reform and for greater public acceptance. By the late 1970s, the mainstream media started to talk about the power of what would later become known as the pink dollar. As more and more lesbians and gay men came out, they were increasingly likely to find a positive response from family, friends, and coworkers. A cultural shift was well and truly underway.

This did not escape the attention of the Right, who had been taken rather by surprise by the rise of women’s liberation, gay liberation, and the general radicalization of the late 1960s and had failed to respond effectively. Inspired by the rise of the Right in the United States and the United Kingdom, conservatives in Australasia started to organize. While Christians, especially from the smaller denominations (Baptists and Presbyterians) and from conservative elements in the Anglican and Catholic churches (especially in Sydney), were outspoken in their calls to oppose the cultural shift, Australasian society tended to be strongly secular in its public life, and the Right was more likely to appeal to “tradition” than to scripture. Anita Bryant’s Save Our Children crusade in the United States and Mary Whitehouse’s British campaign against “smut” in the media provided models to be emulated.

Following overseas developments closely, Australasian activists were aware of the threat that the Right represented and mobilized early and strongly against it. Whitehouse’s 1978 speaking tour of Australia and New Zealand was disrupted and mocked and was a financial and political failure. The idea of a tour by Bryant was quickly dropped. The fear among lesbian and gay activists and their allies of a backlash against the gains of the movement was strong during this period. And it was not entirely fanciful. There were police raids on gay men’s sex clubs in Sydney and Auckland in 1980. A day of solidarity with the US campaign against Bryant, held in Sydney, to coincide with Stonewall Day in 1978, went well until the police attacked the evening parade, beating and arresting scores of people. Over the next several months, protests against this action were regularly attacked by the police, and the arrest count mounted. Ultimately the charges were dropped. In order to make the point that gay people had a right to be visible, the following year an anniversary march was held—thus giving birth to the annual Sydney Gay (later Gay and Lesbian) Mardi Gras. The belief that the Right was on the offensive, and that it was supported by the state and the media, gave an urgency to the struggle against the backlash and revitalized many old activists, while generating many new ones. And the successes of that period of struggle laid the foundations for responding to the greatest threat to gay and lesbian rights ever seen: AIDS.

Response to the AIDS Epidemic

It was inevitable that AIDS would arrive in Australasia soon after its appearance in the United States. International travel was cheaper and much more common than a decade before, and San Francisco’s status as a gay mecca drew many across the Pacific to see (and experience) it for themselves. The first reports of AIDS in the Australasian press were of US cases. The first local deaths came in 1982 and 1983. But, alerted by coverage in the US gay and lesbian press, activists in Australasia were ready. Public meetings to found AIDS action groups took place in major cities, rapidly leading to the establishment of national organizations. Australia and New Zealand were well placed to respond to the emerging threat. Both have a strong state-supported, easily and cheaply accessed health system with subsidized pharmaceutical medicines and long traditions of public health education and intervention. Of more immediate importance, Australia and New Zealand had in 1983 and 1984, respectively, elected national Labor/Labour Party governments more than willing to work cooperatively with the community-based AIDS organizations and with the state and private medical professions to respond to the threat.

By 1985 the community organizations were receiving substantial government funding with which they were expected to educate their communities and to bring about behavioral change. Drawing on a decade of activism and the recent successful mobilizations against the Right, with deep roots within their communities, gay activists were in a powerful position to deliver change. With governments at arm’s length, these safe-sex materials could be as explicit as necessary. As one activist said, when it came to these campaigns, “an arse was an arse, and a fuck was a fuck” (van Reyk 1992, 13). The fact that male homosexual sex was still illegal in many states all through this period, and in New Zealand until 1986, was set aside in the interests of promoting “harm minimization.” So successful was this approach that it was rapidly extended to sex workers and injecting drug users. All blood donations were tested from a very early date. Condoms were made freely available. Needle-exchange programs were implemented. These efforts worked. Infection rates peaked early and dropped away to very low levels by the mid-1980s. (More recent research has thrown doubt on the timing of this and the extent of the drop, but it remains generally true and was certainly a powerful belief in and after the 1980s [Wand et al. 2010]). And it is undeniable that an incalculable number of lives were saved. The initial media and public hysteria was calmed. The Australian and New Zealand response to HIV/AIDS is widely regarded as the best in the world.

The effects of the AIDS epidemic were, as in many Western countries, rather contradictory. The traumatizing effect of losing loved ones to AIDS scarred a generation of gay men, their families and friends. But the response to the epidemic brought activists into the political mainstream, working as trusted partners with governments and medical professionals. The decriminalization of homosexual acts was carried through both to assist in the campaign against AIDS (the argument being that people would cooperate more fully with the calls for behavioral change, to be tested, and to access treatments if their sexuality was not criminalized) and, in a sense, as a reward for the community’s responsible participation in seeing off the threat. In Western Australia and Queensland buggery laws were repealed in 1989 and 1990–1991, respectively. In New Zealand, a furious resistance by the Christian Right was successfully overcome, and the laws were reformed in 1986. In Tasmania, the same kind of response from the Right held up reform until 1997 where it was brought into being only by a major political mobilization and the aforementioned Toonen appeal to the United Nations Human Rights Committee.

The ways in which queer people are acknowledged has developed in surprising ways. In the early twenty-first century, a number of parliaments have supplemented their repeal of anti-buggery laws with formal expungements of all convictions and with apologies to those affected. Victoria has gone beyond giving its human rights commission responsibility for LGBTI rights (as most jurisdictions now do) and appointed a commissioner for gender and sexuality whose priorities include, among other things, actively campaigning against homophobia in rural and regional parts of the state.

Increased Visibility

The late 1970s saw the beginnings of a major transformation in gay life and in gay politics that continued even during the AIDS years. More and more lesbians and gay men started to accept the ideas of gay pride and that they had a right to the free expression of their sexuality. As Altman pointed out, by the late 1970s, the gay man in Australia (and the same applied to lesbians) “was likely to be non-apologetic about his sexuality, self-assertive, highly consumerist and not at all revolutionary, though prepared to demonstrate for gay rights” (1980, 52). The commercial scene grew and grew. The hotels that had turned a blind eye in the 1950s and 1960s were replaced by venues that were increasingly open to gay clientele. In Sydney, clubs such as the Purple Onion and Kandy’s were more or less openly kamp by the late 1960s. In the 1970s mainstream hotels increasingly offered “gay nights” (usually the quiet nights). But bars (the US term rapidly came to the fore) run for, and often by, gay men and lesbians started to emerge. In Sydney this was marked by a shift in the late 1970s of the gay world’s center of gravity from King’s Cross to Oxford Street, which rapidly achieved international status. On a smaller scale, other cities in Australasia followed on, creating concentrations of venues, including bars, coffee shops, and sex clubs. Sometimes residential communities were created around these. The gay scene became increasingly visible, as did gay people. New styles developed, such as the gay male “clone” with his short hair, moustache, jeans, flannel shirts, and work boots, and the “lipstick lesbian” with her conventionally feminine makeup, dresses, and so on. Both styles, imported directly from the United States, reflected an embrace of gender conformity strikingly at odds with the older forms of sissy men and butch dykes.

Activists adapted to this, seeing this new emerging community as a vehicle for the continuing advance of lesbian and gay equality. As Craig Johnston (1981), one of the movement’s leading tacticians, pointed out, talk shifted, from “oppression” to “discrimination,” from “liberation” to “rights,” and from “movement” to “community.” Perhaps the clearest expression of this was the transformation of Mardi Gras in Sydney from a conventional political march to an increasingly flamboyant parade. The parade does not shy away from politics. The issues of the day are always highlighted, most memorably, perhaps, in 1988 when the bicentenary of the British settlement/invasion of Australia was marked by Mardi Gras by having a float feature Indigenous Australians “discovering” Australia.

The political shift of Mardi Gras, and of the wider lesbian and gay movements, did not go uncontested by lesbian and gay radicals, but the tide was flowing strongly away from liberation and toward equality. The conception of the gay world as a community was important here. In both Australia and New Zealand, there was a conscious decision by governments and social and cultural elites to recognize the reality—and promote the idea—of multiculturalism, of seeing society as being composed of many cultures and communities. The notion of a gay community fitted this comfortably. It allowed politicians and others to welcome and work with gay people and gay issues. It also allowed for the increasing diversification of the gay world itself. Beginning in the mid-1980s gay was replaced by gay and lesbian (or, commonly, lesbian and gay) both in the names of organizations and in everyday speech. After that, bisexuals, transgender, and intersex people staked their claim for recognition, respect, and equality as partners and full participants in the LGBTI/queer community. Diverse subcultures organized and expressed themselves around a plethora of identities: ethnicity (initially, for example, as Asian and then over time more specifically as Chinese, Vietnamese, Pacific Islander, and so on); preferred sexual practices (BDSM); or body types (bears). These communities were often forced to confront discrimination and prejudice from within the queer community, as well as from the wider society.

Indigenous people drew on traditional and contemporary elements of their communities' history of sex, gender, and sexuality to generate culturally specific identities such as Sistergirls and Brotherboys in Australia (especially visible in the northern regions) and takatāpui in New Zealand. These developments reflect the emergence of new, confident queer Indigenous voices in the public realm, expressing their own diverse cultures, fused from historical and contemporary worlds, and demanding respect from within those cultures and from the wider community (Hodge 2015).

This diversity of identities was encompassed and encouraged in the 1990s by the rise of “queer.” Imported from the United States (as virtually all Australian sexual politics was by this time), queer was, in one manifestation, an academic disciple, taken up in the humanities departments of the universities, that aspired to deconstruct the dominant discourses around sex and sexuality in order to reveal therein the play of a reified power. In this form, queer remained confined largely to the universities and to those who had absorbed its ideas there. Its ideas are best preserved in a short-lived Australian journal, Critical in Queeries (1995–1998).

Despite this kind of derivative adoption of US-based ideas, Australasia has made some contributions to the international understanding of sex, sexuality, and gender—more so that its small size and propensity to rely on overseas thinking might have led one to expect. Raewyn Connell’s contribution to a “southern theory” of, among other things, gender is an example (Connell 2007), backed up by her internationally acclaimed 1990s work on masculinities and owing something perhaps to her work in the 1970s as the designer of the first gay studies program at an Australian university. It is also true that research into the social and cultural aspects of HIV/AIDS in Australia has shaped international thinking and practice very greatly. Perhaps the best-known writer on global sexuality coming out of Australia is Altman, who, beginning with his groundbreaking Homosexual: Oppression and Liberation (1971), has spent over forty years charting the history of sex, gender, and sexuality as it has unfolded internationally. In both analysis and practice he has brought an independent insider’s eye to political and cultural developments. His work and his writing on HIV/AIDS draws on, and speaks to, the experiences of the industrialized and the nonindustrialized worlds alike (Altman 1994). In Global Sex (2001) he turned his attention to the relationship between globalization and sexuality, exploring the possibilities of a global sexual politics and the role in it of theories, social movements, realism, and utopianism. More recently he has, in a 2016 book cowritten by Jonathan Symons, turned his attention to what they call the “queer wars” being waged internationally between and within countries over the regulation and deregulation of same-sex sexualities.

But, again drawing on US models, the term queer was also employed as a means of expressing a rejection of the politics of the mainstream lesbian and gay movement, embracing militancy, defiance, nonconformity, and anticommercialism. In Melbourne, for example, ACT UP was succeeded by Queer Nation, which protested exclusionist door policies in gay bars and marched in solidarity with Indigenous struggles but disappeared within a year or so. In the United States, the term was adopted in an angry reclaiming of a term of homophobic abuse. This was less true in Australia where the older terms of abuse... were poofter and lezzo.

For the most part, queer worked as an umbrella term for the diversity of sexual identities that were emerging in the 1990s. It embraced not just the LGBTI spectrum of current usage but all kinds of ways of “doing gay,” including fetish sexualities, varied body types, racial and ethnic identities, and HIV-positive people. But while this usage was employed for some time, it never really broke out of the political world and came eventually to be criticized for the way in which it concealed rather than celebrated identity diversity.

These developments were visible in a community-based media sector of newspapers, radio, and television programs. But these media did more than report gay life; they actively shaped it. They developed and explored notions of LGBTI identity, promoted a liberal political consciousness, and advanced social and political reform. The media—the press especially—was deeply enmeshed in the commercial scene (being funded by advertising and advancing the communities and identities that were being generated there). This generated both opportunities and challenges that required constant negotiation. The turnover of titles was high, but some papers and magazines lasted for decades, shifting and adapting to changing circumstances before succumbing to managerial incompetence or, more recently, to the unnavigable storm of online and digital technologies (Calder 2016).

Beyond the inner-city communities, from the 1990s on, LGBTI people in regional areas, which had long harbored small and often secretive kamp friendship networks and subcultures, were adopting conventional metropolitan forms of expression. LGBTI communities became increasingly visible in rural and regional areas. Small businesses, service organizations, and local councils started to recognize and welcome queer residents. Episodes of discrimination and hostility directed against this increased visibility attracted media attention but seem to have been relatively isolated. Some places became LGBTI tourist spots on a substantial scale, and as of 2017 more than a dozen localities across Australasia were staging pride festivals each year. Half a dozen communities in New Zealand host pride weeks.
Cultural Impact

The 1970s witnessed the creation of new literary and audiovisual cultures by gay and lesbian writers and filmmakers. Until the 1960s, Australian and New Zealand governments habitually banned books, films, and plays with homosexual characters. But restrictions were loosened in the late 1960s under the influence of the new modernizing liberalism that was opposed to these forms of censorship. Films and plays from overseas started to be screened and staged, attracting large and appreciative audiences. When the American play Boys in the Band ran into trouble with the police in Melbourne in 1969, it was for bad language rather than its depiction of homosexuality. The real breakthrough came with the television series Number 96, a soap opera set in a block of flats in Sydney that, running from 1972 to 1977, focused on the (increasingly lurid) lives of the residents. One of those characters, Don Finlayson, was a homosexual, conventionally masculine in his gender presentation, but openly gay. Don had the usual adventures of soap opera characters, falling in and out of love with both screaming queens and straight-acting men, but was unable, given the tight controls on television programs, ever to kiss his boyfriends, much less sleep with them, on-screen. Eventually a lesbian character appeared. Other shows took their lead from this. Prisoner (1979–1986), set in a women's prison, featured a number of lesbians. In 1996 Sweat, a drama set in a sports academy and aimed at teenagers, included a gay cyclist character whose relationship ran through a number of episodes. It is indicative of the courage of such a depiction that it would be over a decade before teen-directed soaps would again feature lesbian and gay characters and story lines. These days such depictions are increasingly common in programs of all genres, produced both overseas and locally.

In terms of literature, established writers such as the Australian Nobel laureate Patrick White (in the 1970s) and the Maori author Witi Ihimaera (in the 1990s) became increasingly public about their sexualities and were prepared to write on queer themes. More importantly, perhaps, community-identified writers, playwrights, and artists of all kinds started to explore the myriad experiences of queer people, often in small magazines but increasingly with the support of mainstream publishers. Kerryn Higgs published All That False Instruction, a novel of lesbian life and politics in 1975, but was constrained by family circumstances to publish under a pseudonym and to reset her Melbourne story in Sydney. By the late 1980s there was an escalation in gay male and lesbian writing and publishing across all genres: fiction, poetry, and nonfiction. For the most part, such works were consumed by LGBTI people seeking entertainment and insights into their lives and pleasures, but some works had crossover appeal and found mainstream audiences: Christos Tsiolkas's novel Loaded (1995) centered on Ari, a nineteen-year-old “wog poofter junkie”; Timothy Conigrave's memoir Holding the Man (1995) centered on the relationship between the author and his boyfriend and was made into a feature film and a documentary in 2015; Robert Dessaix's works A Mother's Disgrace (1994) and Night Letters (1996) received wide critical acclaim. The history of films and plays in Australasia has the same pattern: mostly small productions with occasional breakout moments. A rich history of queer theater exists, going back to lesbian feminist theater work in Adelaide in the 1970s and 1980s and continuing into the present, nurtured especially by the various annual pride festivals. Films occasionally seize the public imaginations, most notably The Adventures of Priscilla, Queen of the Desert (1994), which tells the story of two drag queens and a transgender woman making their way by bus from Sydney to Uluru. Desperate Remedies (1993), a flamboyant and lavishly camp film, was set in a fictional New Zealand port town in the nineteenth century and is suffused with a queer sensibility and characters.

Australians and New Zealanders like to think of their countries as sporting nations and certainly they do well, relative to size, in a number of sports internationally. Lesbian and gay sports teams are common. Elite-level, mainstream sportspeople who are “out” are rare but all the more noticeable for that. In Australia, the first nationally significant sportsperson to come out was the Sydney rugby league player Ian Roberts in 1995. The diver Matthew Mitcham and the swimmer Ian Thorpe, both Olympic gold-medal winners, created waves of enthusiastic interest when they came out in 2008 and 2014, respectively. The New Zealand Olympic speed skater Blake Skjellerup came out in 2010. Like Mitcham, he had doubts about whether his sexuality, once known, was likely to adversely affect sponsorship deals. In Mitcham’s case it certainly did. The creation of an elite-level Australian football women’s league in 2017 provided the opportunity for many lesbian football players to publicly celebrate their sexuality and relationships, among them the league’s “best and fairest” player that year, Erin Phillips. (The term best and fairest is widely used in Australia to designate a player for a team or competition who has been the most valuable performer and who received no penalties for unfair play in a season.) Katie and Priscilla Duncan, a married couple, have played football (soccer) at the World Cup level for New Zealand. At the same time, however, the complexities generated by sex-segregated competitions led the Australian Football League (AFL) in 2017 to refuse a transgender woman admission as a player to the women’s league on the grounds that her strength, stamina, and physique would have given her an unfair advantage. In 2018 this decision was reversed as a result of a process of consultation within the AFL involving a variety of experts and advocates (McClure 2017; Dutton 2017; Ryan and Spits 2018).

© ROSS SETFORD/GETTY IMAGES

Trans and Intersex Rights

If lesbian and gay men are firmly ensconced in the political and cultural mainstream, the place of other rainbow groups is not yet secured. In the queer world and in mainstream cultural and political life, “LGBTI” is the most commonly used label, and laws allowing people to change the sex on their birth certificates and other legal documents are near universal. But until the early 2010s, trans and intersex experiences were represented primarily through the efforts of prominent individuals. Catherine McGregor was a senior member of the Australian Defence Force and a well-known writer on cricket who announced her transition in 2012. New Zealand lays claim to the world’s first openly transgender member of parliament, Georgina Beyer (who served from 1999 to 2007). Her political career began in 1995 when she was elected mayor of a small town as an openly transgender woman. She had previously been an active participant in the Wellington gay scene as a drag performer and sex worker.

The intractable problems of sex designation for intersex babies and puberty-blocking hormones for young trans people have occupied doctors, politicians, advocacy groups, and court officials for some years, although the issues are usually discussed out of the spotlight. The Family Court of Australia found itself at the center of public debate and discussions because of a variety of laws concerning parental rights, child protection, and irreversible medical interventions. In 2017 it formally ruled out any role for itself, leaving the decision to teens, their parents, and their doctors. New Zealand’s Human Rights Commission (in 2010) and the Australian Human Rights Commission (in 2015) have both examined the issues of trans and intersex people in an effort to inform public attitudes and policy responses. In 2013 the Australian federal parliament made discrimination on the grounds of sexual orientation, gender identity, and (reportedly, for the first time in the world) intersex status illegal.

Increasingly, trans and intersex people have taken the lead in these public debates themselves. In relation to intersex issues, the Darlington Statement was produced at a 2017 gathering of Australian and New Zealand intersex people (Black et al. 2017), setting out demands around a number of issues (human rights and legal reform; health and well-being; peer support; allies; and education, awareness and employment). It was greeted as a “com[ing] of age” for the intersex movement (Tony Briffa, quoted in Carpenter 2017).

But the field of gender diversity remains one in which anxiety can be relatively easily tapped into, as evidenced by a campaign launched in 2016 by the Right in Australia against an antibullying program for school kids called Safe Schools, which, it was alleged (falsely but effectively), promoted gender nonconformity (e.g., cross-dressing, breast binding, queer sexual practices). The fears excited were enough to persuade most politicians to abandon, or at least, modify the program.

It is difficult not to be optimistic about the place of LGBTI people within Australasian society. The period since the late 1960s has witnessed a remarkably successful struggle to make these societies fairer and more equal. Some of the struggles have been heartbreakingly long and drawn out, but all of them have been successful. There is no reason to think this will not continue to be true.
SEE ALSO Antisodomy and Buggery Trials; Archives in Australia and New Zealand; Camp; HIV/AIDS; Human Rights; Pride Parades and Marches; Section 377 and Section 377A; Vietnam War; Vietnam War, LGBTQ+ Veterans

BIBLIOGRAPHY

McClure, Sam. “Transgender Footballer Hannah Mouncey Has Bid to Enter AFLW Draft

Ryan, Peter, and Scott Spits. “Hannah Mouncey Cleared to Play at State League Level” Age (Melbourne), 13 February 2018.

ʿAwdat al-Almani ilā Rushdih (2006; Rashid al-Daif)

Modern Arabic literature generally offers a reductive treatment of homosexuality, particularly in light of the more complex engagements with homoeroticism that abounded in the medieval Arab Islamic tradition (Lagrange 2000; al-Samman 2008; Massad 2007). The literary critic and translator Ken Seigneurie contends that while studies of homosexuality in the Arab world are flourishing, “almost nothing exists by way of opening an intercultural dialogue over the question [of homosexuality]” (2015, 171). Rashid al-Daif’s ‘Awdat al-Almani ilā rushdih (2006; How the German Came to His Senses [2015]) recounts a crosscultural encounter between a heterosexual Lebanese author and a gay German novelist who engage in personal and intellectual discussions about the topic of homosexuality. Therefore, this novelized biography offers a critical contribution to the Arabic literary canon.

In 2003 al-Daif and Joachim Helfer, Lebanese and German authors, respectively, were paired together to engage in an intercultural dialogue sponsored by the West-Eastern Divan program, a Berlin-based initiative that facilitates opportunities for collaboration among writers from Germany and the Middle East, with the aim of advancing mutual awareness of German and Middle Eastern literatures and cultures. Al-Daif visited Berlin for six weeks, where he met Helfer and engaged with him in conversations about various issues, including literature, culture, and gender and sexuality. In turn, Helfer visited Beirut, where the two writers resumed their conversations and participated in various social and intellectual activities. With Helfer's approval, al-Daif wrote a novelized account of his encounters with Helfer, particularly focusing on the latter's homosexuality, which he found interesting and befitting for a text that seeks to advance intercultural dialogue. Recounted from the point of view of the narrator, Rashid, who should not be conflated with the author Rashid al-Daif, this novelized biography primarily encapsulates Rashid's recollection of the intercultural exchange, but it does not purport to offer an objective account of al-Daif and Helfer's actual encounters.
This novelized biography by Lebanese author Rashid al-Daif represents an increased willingness in contemporary Arabic literature to engage more openly with homosexual issues in its depiction of a cross-cultural encounter between a heterosexual Lebanese author and a gay German novelist.

Following al-Daif’s Arabic publication of ‘Awdat al-Almani ilâ rushdih, Helfer published a book titled Die Verschwulung der Welt (2006; The Queering of the World [2015]), which included a German translation of al-Daif’s book, in addition to Helfer’s point-by-point response to that text. Al-Daif’s and Helfer’s texts prompted intriguing debates among various scholars. The heart of these debates included the following issues: al-Daif’s controversial portrayal of homosexuality; the efficacy of al-Daif’s use of irony and humor as a means of deconstructing dominant stereotypes about homosexuality; and the suitability (or lack thereof) of Helfer’s analytical essay as a response to al-Daif’s fictionalized account, particularly his attempts at identifying any perceived misrepresentations of the events.

Stereotypes, Irony, and Humor

Seigneurie (2015, 184) argues that in much of his work, al-Daif employs a strategic rhetoric that entails a “delicate equivocation between candor and self-irony” as a means of creating a discursive space where frank and transformative dialogue may occur. In ‘Awdat al-Almani ilâ rushdih, al-Daif constructs a narrator who takes on a stance close to popular opinion in an attempt to ensure that the narrator’s rationale and reactions would resonate with his imagined Arab reader. Consequently, as the narrative unfolds, and Rashid is forced to weigh his conceptions of homosexuality against a more complex lived reality, al-Daif’s reader ideally undergoes a similar experience of reexamining his or her deeply engraved opinions (Seigneurie 2015). In a related manner, in her article “Colonial Discourse and Dissent in Rashid al-Daif’s and Joachim Hefner’s Contributions to the West-Eastern Divan,” the literary scholar Rebecca Dyer contends that al-Daif “enables his self-deprecating narrator to express (in comic parody) his culture’s more provincial ideas about same-sex relationships—hinting at their hurtful consequences and at his own previous naïveté” (2015, 200). From the outset, Rashid confesses that his knowledge of homosexuality is limited and that his experience with the openly gay Joachim might therefore be educational, introducing him to a world to which he remains an outsider. Rashid struggles with understanding homosexuality, in part because he has been socialized into espousing a local model of masculinity that privileges procreation. Rashid explains that while his society celebrates men who father children, it condemns homosexuals, who are referred to as “perverts,” and “their practices are considered sex acts against nature” (al-Daif 2015, 3). He perceives homosexuality as inherently antithetical to masculinity, in part because it precludes birthing children. He confesses that despite his attempts to “reexamine at every turn society’s convictions,” as well as his own “personal convictions,” the cultural milieu in which he was born and raised has instilled in him dominant ideas that “have penetrated [him] and do their work in [him]” (3). Rashid's admission of possessing prejudiced ideas, as well as critical distance from his local culture, sets up the stage for Rashid’s contentious learning journey as he prepares himself to meet and partake in a dialogue with a colleague who likely adheres to a different worldview.

In addition to undermining homosexuality because of its alleged preclusion of procreativity, Rashid professes that his unfavorable interactions with “rare gay friends” in Lebanon have further solidified “the rigid stereotype of homosexuality” in his mind (4). Rashid cannot shrug off the stories of his gay friend J. B., who would roam Beirut’s dangerous streets during the civil war (1975-1990), in search of lovers and immediate gratification. He also vividly recalls being the target of unwanted sexual advances from another gay French colleague who was aroused by Rashid’s hairy arms and even pulled at the hair without Rashid’s consent. While Rashid cites examples of the sexually aggressive gay men he has encountered, he acknowledges that perhaps “these were special cases” that do not represent “widespread tendencies” (4–5). He therefore cautions the reader against drawing strict conclusions based on his personal anecdotes. Throughout the novel, Rashid fluctuates between affirming and critiquing his own worldview, as well as those articulated by Joachim, therefore allowing a wide range of perspectives to coexist within the narrative—in constant debate.

Upon meeting Joachim, Rashid is polite yet ridiculously self-conscious. He eagerly attempts to assert his heterosexuality in order to avoid any “unpleasant circumstances that could jeopardize” their collaboration. Rashid even “took every chance to make [Joachim] understand how much [Rashid] loved women ... and how [he] smelled the odor of putrefaction and armpits when in the company of men without women” (6). Rashid’s perceptions of homosexuality are not extricable from his culturally rooted beliefs about masculinity and femininity. Rashid associates femininity with purity, because women are ordinarily charged with maintaining a clean and orderly home in his culture. He associates masculinity with dirt and negligence because men in his society do not typically partake in managing the domestic sphere. It is no surprise then that he had initially supposed that “two men living together equal dirt, negligence, and the absence of women” (14), because he cannot fathom how two men could possibly maintain proper hygiene and decorum in their lived spaces. As the next section demonstrates, however, Rashid will be disabused of such misguided assumptions during his visit to Joachim and his partner N.’s immaculate home.

Rashid recalls pulling on his sleeves restlessly to hide the hair on his hands in Joachim’s presence, “as a seated woman pulls down her skirt to cover what she can of her thighs” (6). Rashid’s extreme behavior, which al-Daif depicts with a significant dosage of humor and irony, turns out to be completely unwarranted. As Seigneurie notes, “Much of the text’s humor springs from the contrast between Rashid’s anxiety and Joachim’s rational calm” (2015, 186). There is no indication that Joachim is even remotely interested in having a romantic relationship with his Lebanese colleague. Rashid is depicted as a victim of his own imagination. Joachim and Rashid’s early interactions expose the absurdity of the straight man’s fears of the seemingly menacing gay Other. As the novel progresses, Rashid’s simplistic perceptions of homosexuality erode even further.

Dominant Perceptions versus Lived Reality of Homosexuality

Rashid is disabused of many of his reductive views on homosexuality, as he witnesses, firsthand, a lived reality that contradicts the homogenizing narrative that he had uncritically internalized. His fear of gay filth dissipates when he visits Joachim and N.’s elegant home, which offers a “great surprise ... in terms of taste, cleanliness” (al-Daif 2015, 15), therefore proving that men, not just women, can maintain clean, well-lit places. In Joachim and N.’s home, Rashid is confronted by the harmony and wholesomeness of a gay couple’s life, not just their personal space. He confesses: “I’d never visited a gay ‘couple’s’ home before (‘couple’ meaning a married couple), so this was a first” (15). Rashid’s use of the term married couple reflects his acknowledgment of the seriousness and depth of Joachim and N.’s relationship and his realization that same-sex relationships cannot be reduced to “asswork” (14) as he had initially presumed.

The effect of Rashid’s visit to a gay couple’s home lasts beyond his visit to Germany. During Joachim’s subsequent visit to Lebanon, Rashid feels guilty for “stabbing [N.] in the back” (34), after attempting to match Joachim with a woman. As he reflects back on his experience in Berlin, Rashid blames himself for possibly monopolizing Joachim’s time and for “being inattentive to the matter of their being a ‘married’ couple and completely like man and wife or maybe even much more so,” because “society had made them suffer for it until it finally accepted them for who they are” (35). Rashid’s mention of the plight of marginalized gay populations, who have had to struggle for recognition, demonstrates the transformative dimension of his one-on-one encounter with Joachim. At the same time, the novel suggests that while Rashid now acknowledges the complexity and humanity of same-sex partnerships, he does not necessarily support LGBTQ-friendly public policies.

Rashid’s experience also leads him to invoke cultural parallels. He recalls historical anecdotes about same-sex partners mentioned in classical Arabic literature. As if reexamining such stories with fresh eyes, he contends that what is conventionally referred to as “curiosities” in the Arabic literary history is “not at all a curiosity” (35), considering the serious and affectionate nature of same-sex partnerships, including the relationship between Abd al-Majid (c. 726–809) and Ibn Munadhir (died c. 813), a poet and a hadith scholar, respectively. Rashid questions the term curiosities, which now strikes him as a misnomer that perhaps fails to capture the profoundness of same-sex relationships.

In addition to engaging Rashid in discussions about the injustices that homosexuals have endured throughout history across the globe, Joachim particularly highlights the ongoing plight of gays and lesbians in Lebanon. He shares with Rashid the tragic stories he had heard about Lebanese gay youth, who risk imprisonment, murder, and suicide. Such stories serve to further remind Rashid of a devastating reality from which he had remained distant. They also offer a counternarrative to Rashid’s own stories about “predatory gay men,” by drawing attention to the concrete ways in which gay people are often targeted and victimized by the dominant culture. The deconstruction of Rashid’s proclamations on the filthy, transient, and predatory “nature” of gay relations has the potential to challenge the assumptions of recalcitrant readers who espouse stereotypical views and who, through the act of reading, might undergo a similarly sobering experience.

Deconstruction of Gender and Family Roles

Joachim’s seemingly “sterile” masculinity initially clashes with Rashid’s local masculinity, where fatherhood is both an aspiration and an inescapable responsibility. Rashid cannot reconcile Joachim’s alleged lack of interest in having children with Joachim’s aspiration to find a young man whom he can love and mentor in the same way that N. had nurtured him. Rashid questions Joachim’s rationale, and his sense of justice, when the latter seems indifferent about having children. Rashid muses to himself: “Joachim wanted to enjoy the fruits of the labor of others—I mean their children—without bothering to have a son himself to let another enjoy the fruits of his labor and his child” (al-Daif 2015, 10). He becomes unsettled when he learns that Joachim is not interested in finding out whether or not he is the biological father of two children who were born to two separate women with whom he had been sexually involved. Rashid cannot fathom how any man can father children and not feel the urge to claim and care for them. However, after Joachim explains that German women today may not necessarily demand, or even welcome, having a sustained relationship with men with whom they have had sexual relationships, or even conceived a child, Rashid appears to better comprehend Joachim’s rationale.

The conversations about Joachim’s life choices lead to broader conversations about evolving gender roles in Germany. Rashid learns that a man should not boldly pursue a woman but rather “reveal only gentle suggestions, and she is the one who takes the initiative if she wishes.” He concludes that there has been something akin to a “role reversal” between men and women in Germany and that “young men today are in some ways the girls of yesterday” (19). Rashid grapples with shifting notions of gender and sexuality as he is faced with global models of masculinity and femininity that challenge his traditional ideas. As the novel unfolds, he also recognizes that homosexuality does not necessarily preclude parenthood.

During Joachim’s visit to Lebanon, the plot takes an unexpected turn: Joachim meets a German woman named Ingrid. The two feel a genuine connection, and they decide to have a baby together. When Rashid learns about this unexpected news, he jokingly asks Joachim: “ʿadat almanya ilā rushdiha idhan?”—that is, “Germany has come back to its senses then?” (41). Rashid’s tongue-in-cheek question emphasizes his comic attempt at taking some credit for catalyzing Joachim’s important decision, because the name Rashid is derived from the root rushd, which means “reason” or “sense.” Despite making such hyperbolic statements, however, Rashid realizes the irrationality of his own desire to see Joachim settle into a more “normal” and “reasonable” lifestyle, one where fatherhood takes precedence over everything else. Regardless of Rashid’s wishful thinking, the narrative emphasizes that Ingrid and Joachim’s arrangement does not translate into Joachim’s conversion to heterosexuality or his separation from his long-term partner, N. Instead, Joachim and Ingrid enter into a mutual agreement to establish a nontraditional family, one that enables Joachim to take part in coparenting his child with Ingrid, the child’s primary caretaker, while still remaining committed to N. This subplot further contributes to the deconstruction of restrictive binaries such as “heterosexual/homosexual” and “procreative/sterile” masculinities.

Not only does Rashid’s character evolve over the course of the novel, but Joachim also appears to have become queerer in his thinking. While no “cause-effect” relationship exists between the colleagues’ discussion of gender, sexuality, and parenting, and Joachim’s sudden decision to have a child with Ingrid, “in the text as a literary work, it is hard to ignore that we are reading about a process—a bildung—in which decisions are part of a web of experiences, which would include Joachim’s dialogue with his colleague Rashid” Seigneurie 2015, 181). Both Joachim and Rashid appear to have benefited personally and professionally from their intercultural dialogue and visits to each other’s countries. According to the literary scholars Andreas Krass and Benedikt Wolf, “In a sense, al-Daif is right in suggesting that Helfer came to his senses when he visited him in Lebanon. The cultural exchange program he participated in, as well as his host’s account of it, inspired Helfer to write a commentary that relentlessly deconstructs all the heteronormative biases that al-Daif mocks” (2017, 204). In The Queering of the World, Helfer offers a critique of the dominant stereotypes that Rashid initially expresses about homosexuality, including its association with effeminacy, childlessness, and sexual coercion. However, “it was the man al-Daif, not an ironic literary mask, who did and said what Helfer reports” (Krass 2015, 245). Furthermore, Helfer explains that he was not amused by Rashid’s futile attempt at matching him with a woman in Beirut, but rather found Rashid’s “game” disrespectful and insensitive with regard to the young woman. Helfer also retells his story of meeting Ingrid and explains the intentionality behind his and Ingrid’s decision to establish a family that resists heteronormative conventions. The Queering of the World suggests that Helfer considers Rashid’s comment regarding the German “coming to his senses” further evidence of al-Daif’s inability to appreciate complex, nonbinary constructions of masculinity and femininity, homosexuality and heterosexuality. Al-Daif’s and Helfer’s texts ultimately reveal both the potentialities and limitations of personal encounters, as well as literary productions, in engendering personal growth and mutual cultural awareness.

SEE ALSO Asrar ‘Ailiyyah (2013; Hany Fawzy); Bareed Mista3jil: True Stories (2009); Bayrūt ’75 (1975; Ghāda al-Sammān); Hajar al-Dahik (1990; Hoda Barakat); Lesbanese (2008; Alissar Gazal); Masculinity in Iranian Cinema

BIBLIOGRAPHY

In the early morning hours of 17 November 1901, complaints registered with the Mexico City police led to a raid on a house party at which a group of over forty men were found to be celebrating and dancing together, many dressed up in women’s clothing. As Mexican law, based on the Napoleonic code, made no mention of homosexuality, the police arrested everyone for offenses to “good customs.” The subsequent scandal raucously brought what had apparently been a thriving underground culture of male same-sex eroticism and transvestism in Mexico City into the public sphere, where it evoked both rabid condemnation and fascination. In a response to putative public outrage, those arrested were sent to sweep the streets of the city, with the cross-dressers still adorned in their glamorous makeup, jewelry, and elegant dresses. In addition to this public humiliation, and without any formal legal process, the alleged offenders were sent to the Yucatán Peninsula to assist the Mexican army digging trenches and laboring in mess halls in the ongoing armed conflict with Maya insurgents. The scandal of the Famous 41 can be said to have introduced male homosexuality, etched in the public memory as synonymous with cross-dressing, into the Mexican national cultural imaginary; the maricón—the effeminate male homosexual—was both mocked and celebrated as a colorful and very Mexican archetype. The story garnered headlines in Mexico City newspapers for several weeks, reflecting the public’s apparent indignation (and its simultaneous fascination) with the partygoers’ provocative challenges to social and sexual norms. As male same-sex desire had been radically absent from public discourse in Mexico throughout the nineteenth century, El Baile de los 41 (The Dance of the 41), described in the press with often voyeuristic and often explicitly sexual references, took on historical significance, defining a culturally specific Mexican notion of male homosexuality that would remain in place for decades, and indeed still carries weight today. As Carlos Monsiváis put it, “From that moment, and until recently, in popular culture gay is equivalent to transvestite [travesti]; and there is only one kind of homosexual: an effeminate one” (1995, 199; translation by Robert McKee Irwin). The scandal not only shined some light on a social context unknown to most Mexicans at the time but also gave rise to a new, distinctly Mexican stereotype (the effeminate male homosexual). While it is important to note that everything published about the Famous 41 came from the perspective of outsiders—those implicated never had a chance to represent their own views, whether in the press or in legal proceedings, and nothing has ever been documented convincingly regarding their names, their sexual practices, or their gender identities—the excessively cartoonish representations of the Dance of the 41 took deep hold in Mexican culture.

It has been suggested that the 1901 scandal of the Famous 41 made possible the incorporation of the male homosexual into the Mexican national imaginary (Irwin, McCaughan, and Nasser 2003). In both popular journalism and literature, and even in scientific discourse, beginning in 1901, the Mexican maricón, a figure completely absent from nineteenth-century Mexican cultural production, suddenly was made eminently visible as a figure projected as simultaneously repulsive and fascinating. However, despite the symbolic value that quickly was attached to the number 41, this archetype was seen as representing values that went deeply against those of the Mexican nation. This entry presents a historical summary of the nationalization of a stereotyped construction of the Mexican homosexual man in the early twentieth century and its ultimate rejection through the emerging ideology of the Mexican Revolution (1910–1920). El Baile de los 41 opened up new possibilities for imagined sexually diverse communities while also laying the foundations for discrimination and violence against them.
Challenges to Traditional Gender Roles in Early Twentieth-Century Mexico

Male same-sex desire, defined as sinful, had been punished during the colonial era by viceregal authorities and by the Inquisition (and indeed was used as a moral justification for the conquest of Mesoamerican cultures by the Spanish imperial authorities). Yet, during the first decades of Mexican independence, the topic was absent from public discourse (Monsiváis 1995). Early constructs of Mexican national culture did not incorporate sexual identities or practices realized between men; this lack of public visibility meant there was a lack of scrutiny and criticism, making for the possibility of expressions of deep affection between male companions, or even of homoeroticism, that would by more recent standards come across as raras (“strange” or queer).

In 1901 Mexico was in the midst of the lengthy presidential rule of Porfirio Díaz (1877–1880, 1884–1911), a period of significant political stability that would be broken only by the revolution of 1910. During what became known as El Porfiriato, accelerated modernization, industrialization, and urbanization were bringing about cultural and social changes that began to challenge traditional gender roles. El Baile de los 41 was only one of many events that drew attention to changing attitudes and practices regarding gender and sexuality, and the scandal it provoked ultimately made it one of the most influential. Mexican cultural production—modernist and naturalist literature, positivist science, and the popular press—of the period abundantly represented and discussed challenges to sexual norms. While modernist flourish and excess is often thought of as a reaction against positivism’s propensity to rationalize and quantify, artists and scientists alike seemed to fixate on the theme of sexual perversity (Irwin 2006). Although male homosexuality was rarely alluded to directly, the 1895 trials of the Irish-born writer Oscar Wilde brought the theme to the public eye and set the stage for a public discussion about this concept in a local Mexican context, which is what took place beginning in November 1901 (Irwin 2003).

With the scandal of the Dance of the 41, what had been presented as a somewhat exotic foreign problem became a recognizably Mexican topic. Unlike some other Latin American contexts—such as that of Argentina, where male homosexuality was linked to immigration and identified as a pose (i.e., a false posturing and not an authentic subjectivity), a vice that in the end had nothing to do with national culture (Molloy 1998)—Mexico assumed both the explicit (male transvestism, effeminacy) and implicit (male homosexuality) divergences from cultural norms of gender and sexuality represented in public debate on the 41 scandal to be national problems from the start. The first visible representations of the 41 were a series of engravings by José Guadalupe Posada (1852–1913), whose popular art, including his famous calaveras (skeletons), was emblematic of Mexican culture during the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. The Posada works included illustrations of the ball itself, with mustachioed men in dresses dancing with other men; the public humiliation of mustachioed men sweeping the streets in their elegant garb while a curious and amused crowd looks on; and the departure of these same figures for the Yucatán. The images were accompanied by text, which in the form of a corrido (popular ballad) told the story in a mocking tone, employing a range of slang terms to refer to the 41, such as lagartijo (literally meaning “lizard,” a term referring to men who pay excessive attention to grooming), jotito (a term thought by some to refer to a particular section of the Mexico City municipal jail where effeminate prisoners were segregated), and maricón (literally meaning “big Mary”)—expressions whose usage would soon become widespread.

No one accused the men of being “foreign”; instead, they were recognized as some of the “dandies who are seen daily on Plateros Street” (quoted in Irwin, McCaughan, and Nasser 2003, 22)—that is, they were familiar Mexican faces. However, while the dandies had often been criticized for their frivolous attention to fashion and grooming and had perhaps been seen as inadequately masculine, the sexual difference of the Famous 41 was seen as something new, something marking a new era, as the press announced the event as a “baile estilo nuevo siglo” (new century–style ball) (El Popular, 25 November 1901).

Homosexuality in Public Discourse

In the years immediately following the scandal of the 41, the theme of homosexuality entered public discourse at multiple levels. The Mexican criminologist Carlos Roumagnac published a series of books composed of case studies of those incarcerated in Mexico City jails in which his interpretative readings of their histories seemed to uncover homosexual tendencies at every turn (Roumagnac 1904, 1906–1910). For example, in his analysis of medical files, he sought out what he understood as “the physical characteristics that mark the habit of active pederasty” in the genitals of male prisoners (1904, 29; translation by Irwin). Roumagnac does not make clear how a physical examination of genitalia might reveal evidence of practices of “pederasty,” which generally refers to intergenerational same-sex sexual relations between men and boys.

Newspapers, no doubt responding to popular interest in the 41 scandal, began publishing not only further news on similar sexual scandals but also a newly ribald humor that ridiculed male public figures as sexually deviant (Buffington 2003). After decades in which male same-sex desire was radically absent from the public sphere, challenges to sexual orthodoxies became a hot topic. Posada referred directly to the Famous 41 in a 1904 engraving titled Feminism Imposes Itself that implied that feminism’s defiance of gender norms translated into a breakdown in gender norms not only for women but also for men. Posada depicted men carrying out all kinds of traditional women’s roles (such as ironing, cooking, and embroidering) around the huge number 41, which linked their gendered acts with the sexual deviance associated with the 1901 ball.

In 1906 Eduardo A. Castrejón, pseudonym of the Mexican general Mariano Ruiz Montañés (1846–1932), published a novel titled Los cuarenta y uno: Novela críticosocial (The forty-one: A sociocritical novel), which reiterated the story of the 41 with the same mocking derision of the 1901 press, but also with an obsessive attention to detail that complicates its oft-hyperbolic rhetoric of rejection. At the turn of the twentieth century, several mainstream Mexican authors, reflecting this same fascination, introduced sexually unorthodox characters, including a lesbian prostitute in Federico Gamboa’s Santa (1903; Saint) and the bizarre case of a woman's soul in a man's body in Amado Nervo’s El donador de almas (1899; The donator of souls).

The Rise of Macho Culture and Homophobia

By the time Mexico's revolution of 1910–1920—which was, superficially, a class war, in which insurgent peasants, at least symbolically, defeated an elite oligarchy—had concluded, the incorporation of a range of national symbols drawn from popular culture into Mexican national culture led to an exaltation of a macho style of masculinity that had previously been disparaged as low-class and a rabid homophobia directed against the newly formed stereotype of the effeminate male homosexual—the maricón. The term macho, which itself had previously been applied principally to refer to male animals, and which extended to humans only metaphorically to signal male savagery, came to embody Mexican national culture. At the same time, the initial playful derision evoked by the visual and textual depiction of the 41 scandal soon transformed the maricón into an anti-Mexican, antinational figure. As Monsiváis put it, “If the revolution creates spaces of development of a distinct sensibility, the revolutionaries also flaunt a rampant machismo. (I don’t use the term homophobia as this is a term corresponding to a time when it negatively qualifies an irrational hatred for homosexuals. Before that, when everyone shared the attitude, there is no point in specifying)” (2000, 32; translation by Irwin).

The number 41, meanwhile, entered firmly into the popular Mexican imagination of the twentieth century—but with connotations so negative that the number was radically avoided. Francisco L. Urquizo (1891–1969), a general during the Mexican Revolution, wrote the following in 1965:

> There is no army division, regiment, or battalion that bears the number 41. They go up to 40 and from there skip to 42. There is no list with a 41st line. There are no cities that label a house number 41.... There is no hotel or hospital room with the number 41. No one celebrates a 41st birthday; from 40 they skip
The number 41 resurfaces with positive connotations only in the early 1960s, coding the title of one of Mexico’s earliest literary representations of Mexico’s male homosexual underworld: Paolo Po’s 41; o, El muchacho que soñaba en fantasmas (1964; 41; or, The young man who dreamed in ghosts), a novel that documents and provides the foundations for a newly emerging national imagined community of male homosexuals.

The discovery (by Monsiváis and Irwin, among others) of the Castrejón novel, which no one knew had existed, in a Mexico City archive in the 1990s, revived interest in the 41. New editions, published first in the United States (in excerpted form, in the 2003 volume The Famous 41, edited by Irwin, Edward J. McCaughan, and Michelle Rocío Nasser) and later in Mexico (2010), brought about critical interpretations of the scandal, which for the first time incorporated sexual dissidence into the mainstream of Mexico’s cultural history. Its unearthing coincided with the global rise of sexuality studies and no doubt inspired new efforts by historians to seek out other events, figures, and sites that might reveal the importance of sexually heterodox subcultures for the national culture of Mexico, as well as that of other nations that have meticulously constructed their national histories and cultures in homophobic terms. The fact that the most notorious of the scandal’s (and the novel’s) protagonists are transgender is especially significant as this group, long in the peripheries of activism, has gained legitimacy in many spheres. Indeed, one of the earliest studies of the 41 scandal addresses it from the perspective of transvestism (Sifuentes-Jáuregui 2002).

By the second decade of the twenty-first century, Mexico’s sexual landscape had changed drastically, with significant inroads made into protecting same-sex couples and prohibiting forms of discrimination and violence against those perceived to transgress national norms of gender and sexuality. Nonetheless, homophobic violence remains widespread in Mexico, and much of it continues to be directed toward los obvios (the obvious ones): effeminate male homosexuals, drag queens, transgender women—in other words, those implicated by the stereotype that emerged from the scandal surrounding El Baile de los 41. Although Mexico in the early twenty-first century offers significant tolerance of difference, at the same time harassment, bullying, and brutality—and at times much worse—continue to dehumanize those whose ways of performing their gender or sexuality defy national norms (Lozano Verduzco 2014; Celorio 2017).

SEE ALSO Antisodomy and Buggery Trials; Bathhouse Raids, Toronto (1981); Camp; Fin de Siècle Sexuality; Mexican Revolution and Sexuality; Queen Boat Trials (2001–2002); Wilde Trials, International Significance of
BIBLIOGRAPHY

Roumagnac, Carlos. Los criminales en México: Ensayo de psicología criminal [Criminals in...

Schneider, Luis Mario. La novela mexicana entre el petróleo, la homosexualidad y la política [The Mexican novel between oil, homosexuality and politics]. Mexico City: Nueva Imagen, 1997.

Bakla

GARY C. DEVILLES
Assistant Professor, Department of Filipino
Ateneo de Manila University Loyola Schools, Philippines

A term used in the Philippines for an effeminate man or a homosexual.

The Philippines is a country in Southeast Asia, situated in the western Pacific Ocean. It consists of about 7,641 islands, with nineteen major languages (including Tagalog) and twelve major ethnic groups, resulting in a great diversity of culture.Comparatively, the territory of the Philippines is slightly smaller than the state of California, yet it has more than double the population of California, with overpopulation causing serious social problems. While the Philippines has a diversity of people and languages, the Catholic religion is dominant, with 81 percent of the population adhering to that faith in 2010, according to the Pew-Templeton Global Religious Futures Project. The importance of Catholicism in Filipino culture is a legacy of Spanish colonialism. Catholic Spain controlled the Philippines from 1521 until it lost its colony to the United States in the Spanish-American War (1898).

The influence of Catholicism has resulted in widespread discrimination against the country’s LGBT community, which has limited legal rights. Homosexuality is not criminalized, and antidiscrimination ordinances to protect LGBT persons have been passed in some cities. Yet, there were no legal protections at the national level and same-sex couples could not marry as of 2017 (Mosbergen 2015). While a 2013 Pew Research Center report noted that 70 percent of Filipinos believed homosexuality should be accepted in society, Manila-based LGBT activist Ging Cristobal believes that high tolerance does not translate into real acceptance (Mosbergen 2015).

History of the Term Bakla

Bakla is a Tagalog word that conflates effeminacy, transvestism, and homosexuality (Manalansan 2003). The term can be used in both a derogatory and an endearing way, alongside other phrases and words used to describe nonheteronormative people, such as bayogin (literally, a local bamboo variety), binabae (to be turned into a woman), bayok (a type of timber, the bark of which yields a dye), asog (asexual), paminta (masculine gay men), parlorista (a cross-dresser who works in a beauty parlor), and ladlad (literally, “unfurled the cape,” referring to those who have come out).
Prior to the arrival of the Spanish, some pagan priests or shamans known as catalonans or babaylans could be considered to fall into the category of bakla, although they were not called such. While members of this elite group were frequently female, they could include men with “female inclinations” (Barreto-Tesoro 2008, 74), which included cross-dressing. The Spanish colonizers systematically dismantled this religious system in the sixteenth century.

Bakla has a curious etymology that evolved during the Spanish colonial period, though it was not used to refer to Filipino gay men. In the 1760 Tagalog poem “Mahal na Passion” (The Holy Passion of Christ) by Gaspar Aquino de Belen, bakla or binacla refers to a feeling of inadequacy or failure. In the nineteenth-century Vocabulario de la lengua Tagala (Tagalog dictionary) of Juan de Noceda and Pedro Sanlucar, bakla means to seduce (enganar con lustre o hermosura), to be afraid of something new (expanto de cosa nueva), or to experience pain due to scratching (desollarse por rascarse). Among the many metrical romance narratives written during this period, there is only one, Bernardo Carpio, that has a reference to a character who could be construed as gay: Alfonso de Castro, who is described as someone who does not have a wife and does not like women. This is the closest description of a gay man in colonial literature, but even so, he is never explicitly identified as such. Even in the 1865 Confession Manual of Fray Sebastian de Totanes, homosexual acts were referred to as “playful acts with the same sex,” or nagbibiruan sa kapwa lalake, but never as bakla (Garcia 2008).

There was still no usage of the term bakla in the early years of American colonialism (1898–1946), although interestingly in a 1921 collection of Filipino tales by Dean S. Fansler, there is a short tale about the origin of homosexuality. In the story, St. Peter punishes and beheads some Filipinos, and when Christ orders him to put the heads back on, he mistakenly puts some women’s heads on men’s bodies. In this cautionary tale, it is assumed that men who have women’s heads were bakla, but again nowhere in the story are they identified as such.
The Characters Maxi Oliveros (left) and Victor Perez from the 2005 Filipino Movie Pagdadalaga ni Maximo Oliveros. This coming-of-age film focuses on a teen bakla (Maxi) who is torn between his love for a young police officer (Victor) and his loyalty to his family of petty criminals. The movie is one of the first independent films produced in the Philippines to contextualize gay pathos within class and religious conflicts.

Depictions of Bakla in Film and Television

It is possible that the earliest use of the term bakla is in Filipino films, which were influenced by Hollywood films with gay characters that were flamboyant, effeminate, and humorous, referred to as the “the pansy” and “the sissy.” Bakla then, which can mean “to be confused” or “to be afraid” of something new, could easily be used in this context. Thus, in the 1954 film Jack and Jill, written by Mars Ravelo and produced by Sampaguita Pictures, the comic actor known as Dolphy played the cross-dressing Jill, with Lolita Rodriguez as his tomboyish sister, Jack. Jack in this story is bent on making a man out of her gay brother and ironically agrees to marry any of her suitors who can do it, even though Jill is bent on being gay. Dolphy’s portrayal of this hilarious cross-dressing character would later serve as a bakla stereotype and a model for many comedians in the Filipino film industry.

Dolphy would continue to play humorous gay characters in his movies, but in the 1978 drama Ang Tatay kong Nanay (My father who is my mother), written by Orlando Nadres and directed by Lino Brocka, he portrayed a gay beautician, Coring, who is in love with a younger man named Dennis. In this story, Dennis entrusts his child to Coring because Dennis is going to work overseas; the child grows up believing Coring is his father. This poignant film tackles the hardships of being a single parent and the discrimination experienced by homosexuals. In one scene, Coring, after winning a gay beauty pageant, gives a speech about what it means to be a bakla. The film garnered major acting awards, after which depictions of bakla in Filipino films in the 1970s to the 1990s would vacillate from the humorous to the more serious (Baytan 2008).

The rise of telenovelas and independent films in the 1990s would also contribute to various depictions of bakla across classes and ethnic identifications. Although some of these films and telenovelas degenerated into formulaic confessionary narratives, others presented more challenging depictions. One example of a nuanced characterization of bakla is Ang Pagdadalaga ni Maximo Oliveros (The Blossoming of Maximo Oliveros; dir. Auraeus Solito), a 2005 coming-of-age film about a gay teen who is torn between his love for a young police officer and his loyalty to his family. In 2010 the film was named the best Filipino film of the decade. It is one of the first independent films that contextualizes gay pathos within class and religious conflicts in the Philippines.

Challenges and Gains for Bakla in the Twenty-First Century

Whether or not the preponderance of these gay films will contribute to a positive outlook on bakla or gay people in Philippine society remains an open question. Despite the growing visibility of bakla, there was still little legislation that protected them against discrimination as of 2017. A number of independent LGBT organizations have been formed since 2000 to serve specific needs, including sexual and mental health, HIV/AIDS prevention and treatment, representation in sports and politics, and religious and spiritual concerns. As of 2017, there was no umbrella organization uniting these groups.

In 2003 prominent LGBT activist Danton Remoto founded the political party Ang Ladlad, but it failed to win any seats in the Filipino congress. Ang Ladlad organizes an annual pride march in Manila. The theme of the 2017 Pride March was #HereTogether, which served as a call for the allies of the LGBTQ+ community—friends, family, co-workers—to come out and show their support for equality. The parade was held in Marikina City and drew 7,718 attendees—a larger crowd compared to the 4,000+ people in 2016. This movement serves as a reminder to the Philippines that LGBT rights are human rights, and activists are calling on the country to recognize the rights of people of all sexual orientations and gender identities.

There are signs of progress. In 2016 Geraldine Roman became the first openly transgender woman elected to the Congress of the Philippines. That same year, the Department of Social Welfare and Development and the Department of Education approved a new dress code that allows students to wear the school uniform that matches their gender identity. In 2017 the Department of Education began a review of public school curricula and programs to identify gender bias. The new policy also mandated the observance of LGBT-related celebrations and events in schools, including Pride Month in June.

According to a 2017 report issued by the Association of Southeast Asian Nations caucus on Sexual Orientation, Gender Identity and Expression, the Philippines has become more open to discussions about LGBT issues and has seen a rise in cooperation from government, especially in urban areas. Some local governments have passed laws on gender rights and equality, but these laws are not always enforced.

Filipino gays’ struggle for acceptance and recognition continues. As for Filipino gay emigrants, like many queers of color, they are creating alternative paths to queer modernity and citizenship. For anthropologist Martin Manalansan, the struggle for identity is fraught with the contradiction of progressive development and eventual assimilation. These struggles can be seen in the mundane and everyday, in public engagement that questions racialized and gendered images, and in dealing with life-threatening situations involving AIDS. For instance, scholar Robert Diaz studied the queering of comfort women (those forced into sex work by the Japanese army in occupied territories during World War II) and the issue of the japayuki (Filipinos who migrate to Japan and work as prostitutes) as covered in films like Markova: Comfort Gay (2000; dir. Gil Portes) and The Sex Warriors and the Samurai (1995; dir. Nick Deocampo). Diaz argued that these films provide flashpoints into diasporic nationalisms and a nuanced understanding of the ways in which Filipino queer subjectivities are produced locally and globally. For the bakla and LGBT community everywhere, what is clear is that identity is not merely a consumable product or lifestyle but rather the very “nexus” or contested space by which they confront the tribulations of a changing world (Manalansan 2003, xi).

SEE ALSO MSM (Men Who Have Sex with Men) in Asia; Religion and Same-Sex Behaviors: Christianity

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Totanes, Sebastián de. Arte de la lengua tagala y manual tagalog para la administracion de los ss. sacramentos manual Tagalog para auxilio de los religiosos de esta santa provincia de San Gregorio Magno. Binondo, Philippines: Imprenta de Miguel Sanchez y C., 1865.

Herculine Barbin was a French intersex person, determined female at the time of birth in 1838 but reclassified later as male. Barbin, according to Alice Domurat Dreger (1998), is one of the most famous hermaphrodites of the nineteenth century. Michel Foucault (1926–1984), a well-known French philosopher and intellectual, discovered Barbin’s memoirs while conducting research for The History of Sexuality, and they were translated into English by Richard McDougall and published in 1980.

Biographical Overview

Barbin’s memoirs are brief and tragic. Born in Saint-Jean-d’Angély, France, on 8 November 1838 as Adélaïde Herculine Barbin, Barbin was placed in a home for orphaned girls after the death of her father. Eventually, one of the nuns arranged to have her study at a school run by the Ursuline order on a scholarship. In 1856 she was sent to Le Chateau to study to become a teacher, gaining a position as an assistant teacher in 1857. She fell in love with one of the instructors, Sara, and rumors of the affair began to circulate.

Barbin had been ill for most of her life, experienced excruciating pains, and had never begun to menstruate, although she did begin to develop facial hair. Troubled by her embodiment, she sought confession with Jean-François-Anne Landriot, the bishop of La Rochelle. Upon receiving a medical examination in 1860, a physician discovered that though Barbin had a small vagina, she had a small penis and testicles inside her body. She was diagnosed with male pseudohermaphroditism. Barbin was redesignated as male and by law was required to live the rest of her life as a man. The legal decision to reclassify Barbin as male circulated in the press in 1860, causing a salacious scandal; she changed her name to Abel Barbin (though known as Alexina or C) and moved to Paris—leaving her job and her lover to live anonymously. Barbin lived in poverty for the rest of her life while completing her memoirs, which were found beside her bed in February 1868, when the concierge of her boardinghouse found her dead by suicide through the inhalation of gas.
Barbin’s story—unearthed out of a collection of files and reports of medical examiners, lawmakers, and onlookers, along with the rediscovery of her memoirs by Foucault—is a complex one that demonstrates how institutions grappled with regulating bodies considered to be irregular in the eyes of the modern systems of lawmakers, classification. Foucault’s critical introduction to Barbin’s memoirs (1980) allows for an investigation of the genealogy of the category of true sex, which, he argues, had not made an appearance medically until the modern age. In the Middle Ages, he explains, intersex people could decide for themselves if they wished to continue to identify with the sex that had been assigned to them at birth—and only when they intended to marry. Foucault asserts that biological theories of sexuality and the forms of administrative control in modern nations gave rise to the rejection of a “mixture of the two sexes” and ultimately led to the limiting of individual free choice. According to Foucault, from the modern and medical point of view, the physician was no longer concerned with the presence of two sexes, but rather with deciphering the true sex of an intersex person that was hidden beneath ambiguous appearances.

Scholars and historians of sexuality have avidly engaged with Foucault’s analysis of Barbin’s life and memoirs, and the text has served as an important point of departure in discussions of sex and gender, in Foucault’s theories of biopolitics, and in analyses of the power exerted over bodies in the modern age. In Gender Trouble (1990), Judith Butler argues that Foucault’s discussion of Barbin’s life contradicts Foucault’s own theory of power explored in the first volume of The History of Sexuality (1978). Butler criticizes Foucault for his romanticized view of Barbin’s world and sexuality as a “happy limbo of non-identity” (Foucault 1980, xiii), noting that Foucault fails to recognize the power relationships that construct, inform, and condemn Barbin’s sexuality in the modern age. This romantic view of Barbin’s sexuality is at odds with Barbin’s own narrative and instead can serve as a window through which one can understand Western social and cultural views on female love, intimacy, and sexual activity in the 1860s, the 1970s, and today. Jemima Repo (2014) has argued that this complication lies in Foucault’s own analysis of sex as a tool for the exertion of biopower—the power exerted over bodies—rather than being the effect of a cultural system; according to Repo, Butler is more concerned with discussing the various contexts in which identity can manifest via Barbin’s story than with the emergence of gender as a power-laden discourse. These debates have allowed scholars and historians of gender and sexuality to engage with a complex understanding of the ways in which power, biopolitics, sex, and gender inform one’s experiences and relationships both with oneself and with hegemonic social institutions such as law and medicine.

As such, the subject of Barbin’s own self-identification has also been debated in academic circles. The anthropologist Gilbert Herdt (1994) praised Foucault’s analysis of Barbin’s story and further identified Barbin as having provided a crisis for “modern ideology,” in that Barbin’s self-identification was neither male nor female. This was contested by the sociologist M. Morgan Holmes (2004), who argues that Foucault’s critical introduction is taken at the behest of Barbin's own writings; Barbin's own memoirs describe a self-identification as exceptional female but not outside the boundaries of the female. Holmes asserts that Foucault’s use of Barbin's story serves more to assert the existence of a nonidentity than to engage with Barbin’s own perception of her self-identity. In this way, the scholarly attention Barbin's story has received has led to the revisiting of previous discussions of sex, gender, and biopolitics to engage with considerations of self-identification and the agency of the historicized subject.

Outside of academic contexts, Barbin’s story has been the subject of several scripts, films, and writings. Barbin’s memoirs were used as the inspiration for Jeffrey Eugenides’s Middlesex (2002), which won the Pulitzer Prize for Fiction. The birthday of Barbin, 8 November, is internationally marked as Intersex Day of Remembrance.

SEE ALSO Foucault, Influence of; Intersex Identities; Transvestites/Transsexuals

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Bareed Mista3jil: True Stories (2009)

SAMAR HABIB
Research Associate, School of Oriental and African Studies
University of London, United Kingdom

A collection of autobiographical narratives written by Lebanese lesbians and one trans man.

This entry examines autobiographical writings by homosexual women and a trans man who live in the multiconfessional, multiethnic, and quasi-secular Lebanese state, as they are narrated in the unique collection of autobiographies Bareed Mista3jil: True Stories. As described by the book’s publisher, the title of the book “has a very close meaning to ‘Express Mail’ but a better translation would be ‘Mail in a Hurry.’ It reflects both the urgency of getting these stories across and also the private nature of the stories—like letters written, sealed, and sent out to the world” (quoted in Levin 2012). It focuses in particular on the relationship between the individual and society as seen through the prism of the religious and the sacred.

Bareed Mista3jil: True Stories was published in Lebanon in May 2009 by the country’s first lesbian activist organization, Meem. Founded in 2007 and disbanded in 2013, Meem was the first and only lesbian-focused organization in Lebanon. Meem was funded as a nongovernmental organization (NGO), but unlike its more established counterpart, Helem, it was not state-registered. The short-lived but powerful organization produced a weekly online queer magazine, Bekhsoos (the original site was launched and discontinued in 2008; the new site ran from 2009 to 2013), which was published in Arabic and English and had at its height an international circulation of approximately 10,000 readers weekly. Bekhsoos provided the platform and the audience for the publication of Bareed Mista3jil in Arabic and English in 2009. The book sold out its first print run of 550 copies (Parashar 2009). Bareed Mista3jil was the second autobiographical collection of its kind to come out in Arabic and from the Arab world; it was preceded by Haqi an ‘aeesh, an akhtar, an akun (I have a right to live, to choose, to be), published by Aswat, a Palestinian gay women’s group, in 2007.

Religion and Lebanon: A Brief Background

Lebanon is a country that faces the great challenges of rebuilding economically and socially after a civil war that lasted from 1975 to 1990. This war was brought about by multiethnic and multiconfessional tensions and the destabilizing effect of the creation of the Israeli state with a resulting Palestinian permanent refugee crisis that began in 1948. Lebanon’s religious demographics comprise a small majority of Sunni and Shi’ite Muslims, who account for more than 50 percent of the population. The remaining populace belongs to other branches of Islam or various Christian sects, the largest of which is the (Christian) Maronite sect. The Lebanese government has not conducted an official census since 1932, fearing that new demographics may unsettle the delicate balance (or imbalance) of political power, which rests with the country’s Maronite population. Although reformed in 1989 under the Taif Agreement to include greater parliamentary representation of Muslims, the Lebanese governmental system still requires a Maronite president, a Sunni prime minister, and a Shi’ite president of the General Assembly. For this reason, the Lebanese government has not conducted a census of its population in over eighty-five years, hoping to preserve its quasi-democratic political system that is a legacy of the country’s French colonial past (Faour 2007).

While education and state law in Lebanon are both secular, marriage and inheritance are strictly determined according to religious affiliation, rather than in accordance with secular state laws. Activists have lobbied for civil marriage in Lebanon since the 1950s, and the country is moving slowly toward adopting such laws; the Beirut Bar Association drafted a proposal and submitted it to parliament in November 2017 (Diwan 2017). For the time being, it remains important for every citizen to have a religious affiliation because this affiliation determines rules for marriage, divorce, inheritance, and custody apart from secular family and personal law. And while a new law in 2009 gave permission to citizens to omit religious affiliation from their civil records, the absence of personal civil legislation makes this law symbolic at best.

Despite this focus on religion, Lebanese society, particularly in Christian and metropolitan Beirut, can be both secular and francophone. Since the end of the civil war, efforts toward women’s liberation have increased exponentially (Qāṭirjī 2007; Salīm 1999; Husseini 1997; Joseph 1997). NGOs play no small role in the agitations for social change. The women’s rights NGO ABAAD was instrumental in a successful campaign in 2017 to abolish Lebanon’s Penal Code 522, a law granting clemency to a male rapist if he marries his female victim.

Although Bareed Mista3jil was born out of this feminist activist culture that is powered solely by NGO money and structures, its authors were writing in a time before these advances and, understandably, the experiences they share reflect a darker perspective. Of particular interest are the few personal narratives in Bareed Mista3jil that deal with religious identification in some way, because religion is so central not only to the legality of the individual in Lebanon but also the individual’s position in a relational social space. As the anonymous author(s) of the collection’s introduction recognize:
Both the institution of religion and religious beliefs play a big role in the lives of queer women in Lebanon. Queer people come from all 18 of our official religious sects.... The institution of religion in Lebanon, with its laws and regulations, oppresses women’s bodies and condemns unregulated sexuality outside the marital framework as a socially unacceptable form of expression. This form of oppression happens at both the religious institutional level and that of religious public moral opinion.

(2009, 15)

Lesbian Voices from the Margins

Interestingly, the autobiographical representations discussed here reverberate in theme and experience with those discussed in a sociological study conducted by Ibrahim Abraham with “queer” Muslims in the Australian diaspora (2010). Both sources demonstrate that there is an ongoing struggle between religious identity and sexual/gender preference that is met with either shame and repression, abandonment of the faith, or an embrace of a noninstitutional, spiritual practice. Another study of a Malaysian Muslim population in Singapore also yields similar results, giving these findings a peculiar internationalism (Maulod and Jamil 2010). These studies suggest that queer Muslims struggle with their community of faith, which polices their nonnormative behavior, rather than with how their own sexuality may be at odds with revered scripture (Abraham 2010; Maulod and Jamil 2010; Kelly 2010). Nevertheless, the community of faith also relies on scripture to validate its prejudices. One autobiographical account in Bareed Mista3jil exposes precisely this phenomenon. In the chapter titled “Becoming,” the anonymous narrator tells us,

I was born in 1982.

Growing up in a Maronite family, I was a very religious teenager. I read the Bible three times a day. In the morning, I would read inspiring verses from the Psalms. After school, before doing my homework, I would read a passage from the Gospels, and before I went to bed, a passage from the Letters....

At the same time, I knew I was gay since I was six years old.... I honestly did not believe that homosexuality was a problem. It was so natural to me and I was sure it wasn’t a problem.

(53 – 54)
The narrator's perspective changed at age fourteen after reading what she describes as “a passage that would haunt me for years” (55). In Romans 1 the apostle Paul provides the basis for centuries of church persecution of same-sex sexuality, attributing to same-sex behavior a series of immoral character traits such as homicidal tendencies, covetousness, deceptive intentions, and evil-mindedness (Hergemöller and Phillips 2001). This religious perspective is also drawn from the biblical story of Lot, which appears originally in the Torah and reappears in the Qur’an (with Lot’s name changed to Lut). In this story of God’s terrible judgment on the sinful cities of Sodom and Gomorrah, the Sodomites are ascribed evil traits and it is implied that these are inextricable from (and possibly caused by) same-sex sexual behaviors. Many scholars have problematized the literal readings of these stories as condemnations of sexual orientations and identities as we understand them in more recent contexts (Boswell 1980, 1994; Habib 2008; Karslake 2007; Kugle 2010; Wink 1996, 1999). Nevertheless, monotheistic religious institutions cannot be absolved of the homo- and transphobia that have affected and certainly continue to affect the lives of nonnormative persons throughout the world.

After reading Romans 1, the narrator of “Becoming” experiences the guilt and shame that is described more generically by the anonymous author of the introduction:

Many Lebanese queers fear that God frowns upon non-heterosexual desires and behaviour. Their sexual identity comes with a lot of guilt, shame, and attempts of repression…. The outcome of these struggles in some cases is an understanding of God’s unconditional love and a reconciliation of faith and sexuality. But in other cases, queer people reject faith altogether and choose to be agnostic or atheist.

(16)

Interestingly, the author of “Becoming” finds a way to reconcile her Christianity with her sexual orientation. Rather than remaining steadfast in that childhood certainty that she is a moral and natural being, her self-love deteriorates until one day when she chances on a Lebanese television program about homosexuality. A homosexual man was being interviewed, along with a number of Muslim and Christian religious figures. The usual venomous condemnation and demonization of the homosexual guest was interrupted when one priest argued against this trend, asserting that homosexuality was natural. When another priest on the program said that if he loved homosexuals so much, then he should go and become one, he responded calmly that he could no more become a homosexual than a homosexual could become heterosexual.
For the author of “Becoming,” this was a defining moment in her life. On her own, and with the backing of a religious authority on the subject, she was able to reread Romans 1 and to recognize that her sexual orientation alone could not possibly make her an enemy of God. She tells us that “I became happy and confident again” (57).

This newfound faith was not shared by members of her religious community, who, on learning her sexual orientation, shamed her and pressured her to cure the incurable. The narrator’s mother, who is mortified when she learns that her sixteen-year-old daughter has identified herself as a lesbian, confines her to her room and subjects her to a series of hot baths for thirteen consecutive days. At school, her classmates are told that she is “ill,” and she is banned from participating in activities in her parish, which once were the center of her young life. Given this reaction, it is no wonder that the narrator of “Becoming” asserts, “I’ve learned that organized religion only wants to control people, and that the only true message of any faith is love…. I started a lesbian support group called Meem, based on the same principles of solidarity and friendship. And that little tomboy who wanted to be a missionary is now an activist for social justice” (61).

The narrator of the chapter “My Faith Is about Love” also comes, independently, to a similar conclusion. She too is a devout Christian, involved in her parish’s many youth activities. One day she kisses another girl her age and discovers her sexual orientation. Unlike the narrator in “Becoming,” she struggles to accept her sexuality and initially finds herself fixated on the idea that the Church did not accept homosexuals, that what I was doing was sinful and shameful…. Then one day, out of the blue, at 15 years of age, I wake up and it hits me that I could be wrong in my thinking…. With time I reevaluated everything I had been taught about Christianity…. Homosexuality doesn’t hurt anybody and it doesn’t offend God. On the contrary, it is about love and the freedom to love.

(79)

In these two narratives, religion spills into a broader realm of spiritual being, and activism is infused with Christian values of love and forgiveness, as well as social justice, where the figure of Christ becomes all “about love” rather than daily ritual or dictates concerning day-to-day living. Faith is also a source of solace for families with lesbian or transgender children in Lebanon; it need not always be a source of homo- or transphobia, as demonstrated in the story “God’s Will.” The narrator tells us that at seventeen she came out to herself as a lesbian, and when she told her mother, a devout Muslim, her mother took solace in the belief that God is the organizer of all being and has thus writ for her daughter.
Elegantly the narrator tells us, "My parents' faith is the source of their compassion and unconditional love towards me and all of their children" (83). Nevertheless, the narrator of "God's Will" has to confront an unusual set of prejudices in the small Lebanese lesbian community to which she belongs. In choosing to wear the veil, she often finds herself engaged in discussions about the incompatibility of her faith and her sexual orientation. Yet she perseveres in her beliefs because of the example her parents have set in adhering to her religion and its practices.

The narrator of “My Hijab and I” reveals that she faces discrimination from some members of the lesbian community. Discrimination based on the visibility of the veil is a marker of the body against which her Christian counterparts need not defend themselves. She comes up with a humorous response that exposes the ethnocentricity of those who challenge her about the hijab and its “incompatibility” with her sexual orientation: “It’s not like I suddenly lose all sexual feeling when I cover my head” (176). The narrator tells us that even as a young girl she had wanted to wear the veil because for her it denoted adulthood and, when she was a child, it was a means for her to imitate the women in her life who were important to her, particularly her mother, whom she held in high esteem. Indeed, her mother denied her requests to wear the hijab until she reached a suitable age (after puberty).

Narrative of a Trans Man

In the chapter “Transexual Not Translucent,” a young trans man from a Muslim family tells the reader

> There was a show with a transsexual plot: a male teacher was transitioning to become female. I was watching my mom the whole time, hiding in the corner. Suddenly, she looked at me and said, You know, in Islam it's completely okay for transsexuals to change their gender. I looked at her disbelievingly. Yes, she continued, it’s against religion to force yourself to be something you’re not.

(169)

The narrator does not realize that his mother was speaking of intersexuality, not transsexuality; when he tells her the next day that he wants to change his sex, she rejects the idea totally, showing none of the understanding she had seemed to voice the previous evening. She calls his father (whom she divorced when the narrator was eight) who lives in New York, and he too fails to support his son’s wishes. In investigating Islam’s stance on transgender operations, the narrator discovers that the Islamic Republic of Iran and Saudi Arabia both permit and financially facilitate gender-reassignment surgeries in spite of stringent Islamic dogmas that condemn homosexuality. This is because there is no mention of transsexuality in either the Qur’an or the Hadith (the primary scriptures from which religious rulings are derived by the clergy); interpretations of the story of Lut in the Qur’an form the basis for condemnation of same-sex sexual behavior. Nevertheless, the permissiveness of the theologians is not relevant to the narrator’s case; he tells us that as far as his parents were concerned, “I was starting to understand that society plays a bigger role in their lives than religion” (170).

What can be learned from these narratives? Primarily, an understanding of the different ways religion permeates the lives of gender- and sexual-minority persons in Lebanon can be gained. Faith can empower LGBT people and members of their families, or it can be a reason for disillusionment. Social customs and traditions, rather than religion more narrowly, appear to be what drive and sustain homophobia and transphobia, but there is certainly a synergy between the community (of faith) and religion in the construction of the sinful and the sacred. In Lebanon, though the secular state is only quasi-secular, it has to an extent resisted the insularity of theocratic states such as Iran and Saudi Arabia, allowing a new, postwar generation of young queer persons to discover a community and activism with which they can learn and empower themselves. The narratives also provide evidence that contradicts the stereotype of an Arab world that is homogenously prohibitive and unaccepting; instead, there are glimpses of familial acceptance and closeness based on candid disclosure of formerly clandestine identities, as well as instances of familial rejection and abuse after those disclosures. Ultimately, however, the narratives reveal that lesbians and transgender persons in Lebanon are neither the helpless victims imagined in the West nor the evildoers caricatured by social and religious institutions that continue to struggle to accept and admit them. These narratives present eloquent autobiographies that reveal strength, determination, and, above all, introspective survival.

SEE ALSO Aswat; ʿAwdat al-Almani ilā Rushdih (2006; Rashid al-Daif); Bayrūt ‘75 (1975; Ghāda al-Sammān); Coming-Out/Coming-In Discourses in the Middle East; Hajar al-Dahik (1990; Hoda Barakat); Jannāt wa-Iblīs (1992; Nawal El Saadawi); Lebanese (2008; Alissar Gazal); Meem; Religion and Same-Sex Behaviors: Christianity; Religion and Same-Sex Behaviors: Islam

BIBLIOGRAPHY

FILMOGRAPHY

Bars and Cabarets in Europe

CLAYTON J. WHISNANT
Professor, Department of History
Wofford College, Spartanburg, SC

The development of drinking establishments throughout Europe that specifically serve gay and lesbian customers.

Drinking establishments, which have also frequently offered entertainment such as music, dance, and theater, have long served as significant locations within the urban homosexual subcultures of Europe. Their ability to attract men and women looking for relationships has turned them into sites where communities have formed and identities have been fashioned. The first evidence of such drinking establishments date back to the eighteenth century. As northern Europe’s cities (especially London, Paris, and Amsterdam) grew dramatically in size, certain pubs, inns, and restaurants began to acquire a reputation as places for men interested in sexual contact with other men to meet. Most of these establishments probably served a mixed public, but a few seem to have been more exclusively focused on people who would today be called homosexual men. In London, so-called molly houses included both alehouses and several coffeehouses where men who acted effeminately and sometimes dressed as women were known to congregate.

The number of establishments remained quite small through much of the nineteenth century, with most remaining open for a very short time. As Aaron Betsky (1997) has observed, they were often located in socially marginal spaces such as slums, red-light districts, or the outskirts of town. However, as the economic transformation of Europe after 1860 led many European cities to explode in size, new centers of entertainment for gay men appeared. London’s gay life focused on the West End, with many of the bars located near Piccadilly Circus, Leicester Square, and Soho. Paris’s gay life was a little more dispersed at first, but by the 1920s the neighborhoods of Montmartre, Pigalle, and Montparnasse had emerged as centers of gay nightlife. In Berlin, clusters of gay clubs could be found on Friedrichstraße, around Nollendorfplatz, and in the western district of Schöneberg. And by the interwar period, gay bars could even be found in smaller cities such as Cannes, Copenhagen, Hannover, Cologne, Düsseldorf, and Munich.

After World War II (1939–1945), a new phase of economic expansion that also interacted in complicated ways with a postwar transformation in sexual mores took place. Amsterdam and Hamburg established reputations as major centers for gay life in northern Europe during the 1950s, and by the 1970s the first gay bars had appeared in Mediterranean countries such as Italy, Portugal, and Spain. Because of communist domination, much of eastern Europe was left out of this development until after 1990; today, however, Prague has a prospering nightlife scene for gay men and lesbians, and homosexual bars and nightclubs can be found even in Moscow, Saint Petersburg, and Warsaw. In many cases, urban areas with clusters of gay bars became nuclei around which queer villages formed beginning in the 1970s, with London's Soho, Berlin's Schöneberg and Kreuzberg, Paris's Marais, Munich's Glockenbachviertel, and Barcelona's Gaixample being some of the best known.

Lesbian bars were slower to be established, but by the end of the nineteenth century small groups of women were sometimes seen using predominately male gay bars to socialize and drink. As economic opportunities for single women expanded and social anxieties about unaccompanied women taking advantage of public space slowly relaxed, a few bars devoted to lesbians began to appear. Paris, famously, had Le Monocle on Boulevard Edgar Quinet, which became known by the 1920s for the women wearing tuxedos who sat about drinking through the evening. Berlin had a handful of exclusively lesbian bars by the turn of the century, and this number grew to over fifty by the mid-1920s. World War II and the Nazi occupation of much of Europe led this nascent lesbian scene to largely disappear for several decades, but lesbian bars began to reappear during the 1970s in the wake of the sexual revolution and the rise of second-wave feminism. However, feminist commentators have observed that even today there continues to be many more bars that cater to gay men than to lesbians.

Cabaret

Cabaret refers to a form of theatrical entertainment that mixes comedy, songs, skits, dance, and sometimes other forms of entertainment such as juggling or pantomime. Shows deal with topical issues—politics, fashion, current events, and above all sex—generally in the form of satire or parody. Such variety entertainment emerged first in the music halls of early nineteenth-century Britain and then spread to the United States (where such shows were known as vaudeville) and continental Europe by the 1880s.

Cabaret sometimes included female impersonators onstage. Perhaps the best-known female impersonator during the interwar period, thanks to publicity offered by the French poet and artist Jean Cocteau (1889–1963), was Barbette (c. 1899–1973; née Vander Clyde), an American who performed a high-wire act in drag at such well-known theaters as Paris's Moulin Rouge and the Folies Bergère. Also famous were Leif (1909–1967) and Paal Roschberg (1909–1955), otherwise known as the Rocky Twins, who performed as the Dolly Sisters for the first time at the Casino de Paris music hall in 1928.
The Eldorado was a famous nightclub in Weimar-era Berlin that specialized in cross-dressing performers and employees, both male and female. Although there were earlier bars and theaters that went by this name, this particular nightclub opened originally on Kantstraße during the early 1920s and then moved to Lutherstraße 30 directly across from the wellknown Scala cabaret. This position at one of the centers of the city’s nightlife allowed it to become Berlin’s best-known transvestite revue. As the city acquired international attention for its risqué entertainment, the club by 1927 became a popular location for celebrities, socialites, and tourists interested in a taste of the city’s “decadent” sites. Visitors to the club described an elegantly decorated room with an orchestra and performers who danced and sang. In the audience, one could see women wearing tuxedos sitting at tables together, as well as men in women’s costume who circulated to dance with paying customers. A second, larger Eldorado was opened at the corner of Motzstraße and Kalckreuthstraße, near Nollendorfplatz, in early 1931. Both clubs operated simultaneously for a time until the Lutherstraße location closed later in the year. It is the Motzstraße location whose exterior, adorned with a large marquee reading “HIER IST’S RICHTIG!” (Here It’s All Right!) above its doors, is best known through existing photographs. It stayed open until October 1932, when Berlin’s police chief revoked the dance permit for clubs where same-sex couples were known to dance.

Truth be told, the Eldorado was not typical of the city’s gay nightlife. It never advertised regularly in Germany’s homosexual periodicals, nor is it clear that it attracted a predominantly homosexual audience during the interwar era. Nevertheless, famous descriptions of the club were recorded in Ruth Margarete Roellig's (1928) and Curt Moreck's (1931) popular overviews of Berlin’s gay scene. The expressionist painters Otto Dix (1891–1969), Ernst Fritsch (1892–1965), and Christian Schad (1894–1982) also created noteworthy images of moments in the club. Its interwar reputation allowed it to be transformed after 1945 into a metonym for Weimar’s homosexual subculture, now imagined as a kind of golden age for experimentation, nighttime adventure, and sexual freedom. After the war, a club by the same name reopened on Martin-Luther-Straße and continued to feature the city’s best-known drag show until the end of the 1960s, when it closed.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Roellig, Ruth Margarete. Berlins lesbische Frauen [Berlin’s lesbian women]. Leipzig,
There was much overlap between variety shows and the cross-dressing acts that became popular in some gay bars around the turn of the century. Weimar-era Berlin became especially well known for the transvestite revues that one could watch in the Eldorado club or the Mikado. Many of these nightclubs were closed over the course of the 1930s and 1940s as Nazi influence was extended across the continent; they reappeared, however, during the 1950s. Drag shows continue to play an important role today in all gay scenes across Europe.

Gay and Lesbian Bars as Social and Political Spaces

What precisely happens in homosexual bars has varied a great deal over the years. Same-sex dancing has been common, although obviously this has depended on the legal status of homosexuality and local government regulations that might have made it dangerous for owners and patrons alike. By the 1970s, though, discos with large dance floors and enormous sound systems were attracting a large number of gay men and lesbians. Prior to the era of readily available recorded music, many bars featured a piano player who might provide background music or orchestrate sing-alongs in the crowd. Other bars featured a stage to host singers or theatrical acts.

Establishments have been differentiated from one another not only by the entertainment that they provided but also by the customers. By the early twentieth century, several major cities included smaller, rather plain bars for male prostitutes and working-class customers, posher bars for a middle- and upper-class public, clubs full of cross-dressers (which also frequently attracted tourists interested in slumming), and then smaller, quieter pubs that attracted an older clientele. Some clubs have also focused on customers with particular fashion and sexual tastes: for example, Le Monocle in 1920s Paris attracted women who wore tuxedos or other masculine attire, and Hamburg’s Loreley turned itself into the first club for leathermen in 1967.

Beginning with the emergence of the first molly houses in the early eighteenth century, there is evidence that gay drinking establishments served as important social locations for the construction and expression of sexual identity. By the turn of the twentieth century, there are signs that a similar interaction between physical space, socializing, and performance of identity was taking place in lesbian clubs of Paris and Berlin. In drinking establishments devoted to homosexual customers, homosexual men and women acquired a sense of belonging to a larger community. Here, they could also fashion identities through specific clothes, language, stories, songs, behavior, and interactions.

During much of the twentieth century, some gay bars also hosted social and political organizations devoted to gay and lesbian life. For example, many of the friendship societies of 1920s and post-1945 Germany met in local gay and lesbian bars. Because homosexual bars have served over the years as spaces nurturing sexual identity and hosting homosexual organizations, they have been seen by some historians and academic champions of cultural studies as serving important political purposes. Although no European bar offers such a clear example of political confrontation as New York’s Stonewall Inn did during the riots of June 1969, one can certainly argue that the social networks of the bars created possibilities for resisting efforts of the police and other government authorities to monitor and regulate homosexual activities. Furthermore, the subculture that took form in part in the bars was political in the sense that it implicitly questioned and challenged normative attitudes about proper gender behavior and sexual preferences. Such arguments have perhaps most commonly been made in connection to the “camp sensibility” that found expression in the gay cabaret of 1920s Europe and in the drag shows put on by some clubs today. Finally, the presence of gay bars in some neighborhoods has enabled a kind of “reterritorialization” and “recoding” of urban sexual space in the form of gay villages, creating opportunities for gay- and lesbianpositive images and symbols to be exhibited.

It should be noted, however, that politicized gay men and lesbians have not always embraced the activities or the spaces of the bars. Activists have been known to complain about the difficulty of motivating bar patrons to become politically engaged. There also has been some concern that such spaces encouraged unhealthy sexual habits and identities and only fed prejudices that circulated within the wider society. Some of the friendship societies of the early twentieth century, most notably France’s Arcadie, hoped to create an alternative space away from the bars. During the 1970s, Marxist-influenced critics of the New Left criticized gay commercial establishments as manifestations of the larger capitalist society that they hoped to destroy. And even as Marxist influence has declined, some political activists continue to see the bars of the commercialized (and increasingly gentrified) gay scenes of Europe as distractions at best and as elements of the social structures that segregate people along lines of age, ethnicity, nationality, and wealth at worst.

SEE ALSO Bars, Working-Class, in Mexico; Cabaret Theater in Latin America and the Caribbean; Cruising and Cruising Grounds; Drag, Asian; Friendship Societies in Europe; Molly Houses; Sexual Revolution in Europe
BIBLIOGRAPHY

Bars, Working-Class, in Mexico

IVÁN EUSEBIO AGUIRRE DARANCOU
Assistant Professor, Hispanic Studies
University of California, Riverside

Notable establishments in various Mexican cities where classes mix in a sexually diverse environment.

Mexican sexuality is usually understood, both popularly and academically, under the grand narratives of the active/male–passive/female dichotomy, the Mediterranean complex that focuses on the act of penetration, and the cultural readings of symbolic sexual acts developed by Octavio Paz in his seminal El laberinto de la soledad ([1950; The Labyrinth of Solitude [1985]]). However, as demonstrated by the anthropologist Guillermo Núñez Noriega (2001), among others, (homo)sexuality in Mexico is widely diverse and historically rich and encompasses a series of activities that cannot be conceived of and are silenced in such dichotomous understandings. Diverging from the hegemonic definitions of sexuality as manifestations of the nationalist social order of male and female citizens (i.e., “Mexican machismo”), working-class sexuality has historically been shaped as much by processes of industrialization, rural geographies, and structures of power and discipline (as in Pablo Piccato’s [2003] scholarship on Mexican prisons) as by mutual pleasure. In historical sources such as the Mexico City bus-drivers’ journal El chafirete (a slang term for “chauffeur”; published in 1923), Cantinflas’s early film Águila o sol (1937), and Salvador Novo’s autobiography La estatua de sal ([1945; Pillar of Salt [2014]]), there is ample historical evidence of working-class homosexual and homosocial individuals and communities that belie the active/passive–penetrator/penetrated Mediterranean complex. And even though the commercialized Zona Rosa has become the quickest-growing and most popular gay community, reflecting Mexico City’s rapid modernization, the rest of the establishments in the city and the country provide rich alternative histories of LGBTTTQI (lesbian, gay, bisexual, transsexual, transgender, transvestite, queer, and intersexual) individuals and communities. LGBTTTQI is the acronym used by Mexican activists to bring attention to how the mestizo nationalist heteropatriarchal order enacts layers of exclusion, from sexual preference to gender performance to biological difference.

Mexico’s cities and towns, over the course of the twentieth century, grew at the rhythm of the nation’s economic development, and bars and other venues appeared where citizens excluded from the nationalist sociosexual hegemony gathered. In some, men assemble under the performance of a norteño (northern Mexican) hypermasculinity, and the feminine behaviors of jotos (queers or faggots), are discouraged. Others in more developed cities gather a wider diversity of sexually and socially divergent individuals, some of whom experience extreme intolerance for their sociosexual expression. The diversity of these individuals and communities assembles alternative masculinities and femininities that question not only the symbolic active/passive dichotomy of the sexual act but also the violent and heteropatriarchal order of mestizo Mexicanness (mexicanidad). The establishments discussed below are examples of urban workingclass spaces from various parts of the nation, and by no means should they be taken as representative of all working-class experiences in Mexico.

El Norte

In the northern regions of Mexico, the hegemonic ideologies of mestizo nationalism collide with norteño masculinities, making public expressions of sexual or gender nonconformity potentially dangerous because of the exclusionary violence demanded by these ideologies, where men and women who refuse to conform their bodies can be subject to physical violence. LGBTTTQI working-class sexual interactions tend to take place in private gatherings, parties, and unofficial venues, where men engage each other socially and sexually, as shown in Oliver Rendón's 2011 documentary En tierra de vaqueros (In the land of cowboys). Places such as these allow men to interact sexually, while avoiding being labeled with the sociosexual identities of “homosexual,” “gay,” or “joto,” because they are performing masculinities whose success depends on complex codes of honor and silence and not only strength or virility. As documented by Núñez Noriega (2001; 2008; 2015) and other anthropologists, these spaces allow normative masculinities to be negotiated through mutual pleasure, where the active-passive complex is disturbed by the hegemonic and hypermasculine category of the hombre (the Mexican “man”). As long as these men perform masculinity, their sexual choices do not mark them as “homosexual” or anything other than straight. In more urban areas such as Hermosillo, Sonora, with a population of less than a million, established venues and bars such as Cantina Pluma Blanca, La Campechana, and Club Obregón provide spaces where a wider diversity of individuals engages each other socially as much as sexually. Pluma Blanca is a small cantina serving only liter-size caguamas (bottles) of Pacífico beer; its proximity to the public university attracts countercultural politicized students and manual laborers who in their interactions expand and challenge definitions of masculinities and femininities. Club Obregón and La Campechana are, by contrast, two very different bars, where women mingle and where straight pornography may play on television screens, but the men who frequent them are often there to seek out other men.
Interior of Pluma Blanca in Hermosillo, Sonora, Mexico. The Pluma Blanca’s proximity to a nearby university attracts a mix of countercultural politicized students and manual laborers who expand and challenge their definitions of masculinities and femininities in their interactions.

What these spaces signal is a sexual spectrum that discretely separates acts from identities. While individuals are performing acts for which they are excluded from the hegemonic order, the resistance of some to categories such as “homosexual,” “joto,” or “afeminado” (effeminate man) points to a working-class positionality in the social order that associates these categories with a middle-class consumer status. Thus, alternative masculinities and femininities are generated, sexually fluid but publicly performed within gender forms; this bypasses the violence that Mexican heteropatriarchy demands of men by rejecting the dichotomy of active/passive associated with male-female/conqueror-conquered (Paz [1950] 1985). In establishing zones of sexual pleasure where masculinities and femininities are reified while simultaneously eroded, especially by embodying what Paz ([1950] 1985) negatively describes as the openness associated with femininity and weakness, these working-class bars resignify gendered, sexual, and national identities by rejecting the violence inherent in the normative mestizo nationalist ideologies that instruct citizens to be macho men and submissive women. It must be remarked, however, that the historical predominance of male-dominated spaces silences female experiences, whose presence in them is understood in relation to these models of masculinities and not in female-exclusive or lesbian bars, which are vastly outnumbered by male-oriented establishments. In the more urbanized areas, the number of women and trans-oriented organizations surpass the number of lesbian or trans bars, pointing to a difference in socializing spaces and political goals.

In terms of urban centers in northern Mexico, Monterrey, Nuevo León, with a population of 4.5 million, is the most industrialized city in that region. Although there are many gay bars in the city, especially in the downtown area, most cater to the middle class, and almost none to the upper-class population. However, the city does have several unique working-class bars. The most famous of these are the twin bars Wateke–El Jardín Cruz Blanca, located in the city center under the metro line. An assortment of patrons enter a door at the literal end of a rainbow painted on the outside wall: construction workers just ending their workday, the dust and sweat still heavy on them; taxi and bus drivers; public university professors; manual laborers; transvestites and transsexuals; and the odd newcomer or artist. The bars become a space where, similar to Pluma Blanca, masculinities and femininities are fluid and constantly renegotiated. With an open acceptance (as opposed to tolerance) of all gender expressions, Wateke and Jardín are notorious for being sexual spaces characterized by communal self-care and self-expression. The wide diversity of patrons who gather there create an environment where (lower) class alliance allows for an inclusion that detaches “homosexual” from exclusive markers of gender, race, consumer habits, and gender performance. Instead, in coming together, these patrons make explicit their intersectional similarities: their marginalization and precariousness with regard to the Mexican state and general society. As demonstrated at various events, such as raising funds for the parents of forty-three students from the Ayotzinapa teachers college who disappeared on their way to a protest in 2014, the patrons of Wateke and Jardín assemble their definition of (homo)sexuality in an intersectional manner, inserting a historicity of subjective experiences that opposes the flatness of a more cosmopolitan, urban, and consumer-oriented “gay” identity (present in other middle-class bars in the downtown area). In doing so, their definitions of gender and sexuality are intrinsically a political taking of position, a gesture toward the rejection and marginalization these patrons experience from society at large in Monterrey.

On another end of the spectrum, Monterrey has the bar known as El E (with the E pronounced as in the English alphabet), where men whose identity rests on norteño masculinity come together. The music is exclusively rancheras and cumbias, with no pop music; patrons are almost exclusively cismen, dressed in jeans, boots, buckled belts, and Texan hats and performing a masculinity resting on stereotypes of rural cowboys, with the presence of ciswomen, trans women, and other performances of femininity discouraged. This exclusion negates the explicit political thrust that working-class spaces such as Wateke and Jardín hold, fetishizing and reifying a version of norteño masculinity whose performance must be impeccably “manly” in order to remain legitimate. By contrast, club Muxets (a play on muxe, the transgender tradition among the Zapotec communities on the Isthmus of Tehuantepec in the state of Oaxaca) brings together working-class individuals performing fluid or trans identities. Heavily decorated with sequins on the stage, the bar usually resonates with upbeat dance music. Patrons are men and women who come together to see drag shows and Mr. Gay pageants; in spite of this global phenomenon, the overall performance and space is decidedly working class, observable in the habitus of the patrons as they appropriate and subvert the globalized notions of “gay” and drag. As opposed to lesbian bars such as Between, characterized by a butch environment materializing the masculinizing "Lola la traílera” stereotype of a female truck driver, Muxets and other drag bars allow expressions of femininity performed by any gender, thus resisting the limitation of “gay” as feminine-performing male bodies or “lesbian” as masculine-performing female bodies.

Mexico City

Aside from the now globally positioned Zona Rosa—a neighborhood historically known for prostitution but now associated with a highly commercialized/consumerist (and, as some would argue, hegemonic) gay community—Mexico City, too, offers a variety of working-class bars, as do many major urban centers throughout Latin America. One of the most famous is El Spartacus, located near the Benito Juárez International Airport in Ciudad Nezahualcóyotl. Chacales—“rough trade” men whose masculinity is tied to the eroticization of manual labor—populate the bar along with a wide variety of trans and female patrons. With a highly sexualized atmosphere, El Spartacus contrasts with the Zona Rosa gay bars in that patrons are encouraged to express their sexuality freely, with condoms distributed by the nation’s Secretariat of Health. In this way, the consumer habits associated with urban homosexualities are thwarted and substituted by sexual habits that assemble a homosexual identity based on sexual acts and not on performative or consumer decisions. In downtown Mexico City, bars such as El Viena and El Oasis provide spaces where working-class men and women socialize after the daily toil in nonsexual spaces, dancing to salsa, cumbia, and banda. By associating homosexuality with popular Mexican icons, the patrons of these bars construct sociosexual identities that again contrast with the more cosmopolitan and market-oriented (and middle/upper-class) homosexualities of the Zona Rosa.

As in other Latin American countries with strong traditions and processes of nation formation that have been promoted by (often violent) states, Mexico’s working class has been stereotypically described as the ultimate embodiment of the heteropatriarchal society (by such writers as Samuel Ramos, Octavio Paz, and Roger Bartra). Contrary to this idea, working-class spheres provide a diversely rich version of LGBTIQQI history that surpasses the limits of contemporary definitions of “gay” or “lesbian.” These citizens have generated spaces where LGBTIQQI individuals, and some straight-identifying people, come together to challenge the processes of nationalist subjectification by reappropriating popular symbols and stereotypes (e.g., rural masculinity in vaqueros and charros, wrestlers, gogo boys) and resignifying them as vehicles of mutual pleasure without the violent heteronormative components. The presence of these straight-identifying citizens challenges the norms of heterosexuality, foregrounding sociosexual acts over identities. Given the historical roots of male “homosexual” identities in middle- and upper-class experiences and identities (e.g., El Baile de los 41, the Contemporáneos artistic group), these and other working-class spaces allow individuals to generate and assemble their own variation of what it means (historically, politically, sexually, and socially) to be LGBTTQI, or even to identify as “heterosexual” and still engage in same-sex sexual encounters but more importantly socialize in these spaces, especially when the hegemonic urban centers of knowledge production are so closely tied to the geographies and habits of an increasingly global consumer culture.

SEE ALSO Bars and Cabarets in Europe; Cabaret Theater in Latin America and the Caribbean; Cruising and Cruising Grounds; Madame Satã (1900–1976); Mexican Revolution and Sexuality

BIBLIOGRAPHY

FILMOGRAPHY

Boytler, Arcady, dir. Águila o sol [Eagle or sun]. CISA, 1937. Film starring Cantinflas.

Rendón, Oliver, dir. En tierra de vaqueros [In the land of cowboys]. Consejo Nacional para la Cultura y las Artes, 2011. Documentary short.
On 5 February 1981, four gay bathhouses in downtown Toronto were raided by police. More than 300 men were arrested and charged under Canada’s “bawdy house” laws, which criminalized group sex and other nonnormative sexual activities. The raids were the culmination of Operation Soap, a six-month police investigation involving extensive undercover surveillance.

The response of Toronto’s LGBTQ community was furious and rapid. In less than twenty-four hours, over 3,000 angry demonstrators were on the march. Chanting “No more shit,” the demonstrators confronted police officers at the Division 52 station before continuing to Queen’s Park and the Ontario Legislative Building (Warner 2002). This was the largest LGBTQ demonstration in Canadian history until a second protest involving 4,000 people occurred on 20 February 1981 (Hooper 2016). LGBTQ activists devoted extensive time and energy to the legal defense of the men charged with various “bawdy house” offenses. The Right to Privacy Committee assumed a leading role in terms of legal strategy and fund-raising. Most of those charged were eventually acquitted. This legal rebuke, as well as the strength of LGBTQ opposition, forced the Metropolitan Toronto Police to rethink its tactics (Grube 1997).

The bathhouse raids of 1981 are an important milestone in Canadian LGBTQ history. The raids generally unified Toronto’s LGBTQ community against state regulation, while fostering solidarity and linkages with activists based in cities such as Montreal, Ottawa, and Edmonton, where similar police raids were occurring. The Right to Privacy Committee provided a model for organizations that were established to confront the HIV/AIDS crisis in the mid-1980s (McCaskell 2016). To be fully understood, the bathhouse raids must be situated in several historical contexts.
Gay Liberation

Gay liberation crystallized in Canada in the early 1970s. Toronto-based activists played a leading role in the “We Demand” protest of 1971, which produced one of Canada’s first gay liberation manifestos (Churchill 2014). This manifesto called on the Liberal government of Pierre Trudeau (1919–2000) to expand the Canadian government’s partial decriminalization of homosexual acts between two adults over the age of twenty-one. During the 1970s, Toronto emerged as an internationally significant center of gay liberation activism, in part because of an influx of LGBTQ draft dodgers from the United States who opposed the Vietnam War (Churchill 2001). These individuals advanced the growth of the city’s gay liberation institutions, such as The Body Politic.

By the mid-1970s, The Body Politic had become one the most important gay liberation periodicals in the world and had established a reputation for courageous articles that explored and challenged sexual norms (de Groot 2015). One such article, Gerald Hannon’s “Men Loving Boys Loving Men,” was a journalistic investigation into intergenerational sex and sexuality. Published in 1977, the article unleashed a firestorm of outrage in Toronto, especially because it was printed in the aftermath of the high-profile, sexualized murder of a young boy named Emanuel Jaques by adult men (Graydon 2011). The Metropolitan Toronto Police, in conjunction with the Ontario Provincial Police, responded with a major raid on The Body Politic in December 1977, which resulted in obscenity charges and a lengthy court battle. This was an early attack by Toronto’s police establishment against a gay liberation movement that was rising in prominence and visibility, and an important precursor to the bathhouse raids.

The Barracks Raid

On 9 December 1978, Toronto police stormed into the Barracks, a major gay bathhouse in downtown Toronto. It may have been targeted by police because of its reputation for sadomasochism and kinkiness involving leather, chains, whips, and restraints (Nash 2014). Two undercover officers entered the bathhouse shortly after midnight and proceeded to document acts considered indecent under Canada’s bawdy house laws. These acts included sex in a communal space, masturbation in a room with an open door, and the use of toys such as whips and clamps. After gathering evidence of such “indecency,” the undercover officers opened the front door of the Barracks to a group of twenty police officers. They proceeded to arrest and charge twenty-eight men with various bawdy house offenses (Warner 2002).

Mere hours after the raid, a group of gay activists, businesspeople, and bathhouse patrons gathered at the home of Peter Maloney, a local gay businessman and bathhouse owner, to consider a response. They decided to mobilize broad-based opposition, and a meeting was held at the 519 Church Street Community Centre, a major gathering place for Toronto’s LGBTQ community, on 11 December 1978. Activists and community members decided to hold a press conference denouncing the raid. At the press conference Mariana Valverde, a member of The Body Politic collective, asserted that “an attack on any gay establishment is an attack on the whole gay community, and that includes lesbians” (quoted in Hooper 2016, 53). A public demonstration involving approximately 400 people was then held on 16 December 1978 (Warner 2002). Protesters linked the prosecution of The Body Politic with the raid on the Barracks and denounced police oppression.

The Right to Privacy Committee

The group that mobilized this response was soon named the Right to Privacy Committee (RTPC). Not everyone agreed with this name because of its liberal connotations. Nevertheless, the name stuck. Members of the RTPC included Tom Warner of the Coalition for Gay Rights in Ontario, Brent Hawkes of the Metropolitan Community Church, Brian Mossop of the Gay Alliance Towards Equality, and businesspeople Peter Maloney and Michael Laking (Hooper 2016). The RTPC included an eclectic mix of gay liberationists, liberals, and capitalists who disagreed on many things but concurred that Canada’s bawdy house laws were outdated and unjust.
These laws dated back to the nineteenth century. The 1892 Criminal Code of Canada included a bawdy house section designed to criminalize not only prostitution but also the "houses of ill fame" in which prostitution occurred. A 1917 amendment expanded the Criminal Code's bawdy house section to include sites in which acts of “gross indecency” occur (Russell 1982). None of these sections was annulled or amended by the Criminal Law Amendment Act of 1968–1969, which only partially decriminalized homosexual acts. Canada’s bawdy house laws meant that those arrested at a gay bathhouse could be charged as either a “found-in” or a “keeper.” The found-in charge was a summary offense entailing the presence of an individual within a bawdy house. The keeper charge was a more serious, indictable offense related to the ownership and operation of a bawdy house.

As a result of the Barracks raid, five men were charged as keepers and seventeen men were charged as found-ins (Hooper 2016). In its legal strategizing and fund-raising, the RTPC prioritized the defense of the keepers. Many believed that keeper acquittals would naturally lead to acquittals of the found-ins. Occurring on 19 November 1979, the first trial against the keepers occurred nearly one year after the Barracks raid. Defense lawyer Morris Manning argued against the constitutionality of the charges on numerous grounds, such as the lack of clarity surrounding the term indecency. These constitutional challenges worked their way through the Ontario court system to the Supreme Court of Canada on appeal. When the Supreme Court finally ruled that the Barracks charges were indeed constitutional, a new trial date was set for March 1981. However, less than two months before this trial, a larger series of raids captured the attention of Toronto's LGBTQ community.

Operation Soap

Beginning in August 1980, four undercover Toronto Metropolitan Police officers opened a large-scale investigation into the city's gay bathhouses. Working in plain clothes, the officers scoured local baths for evidence of prostitution, masturbation, anal sex, fellatio, or any form of group sex. Seventeen undercover investigations were conducted over several months, yielding twenty-four hours of direct surveillance (Hooper 2016). Frequently observing the sexual practices they sought to discover, police made preparations for a series of raids under the code name Operation Soap. This code name made a strong association between homosexual acts and dirt, conjuring “an image of dirty gay sex being cleansed from the social body by police action” (Kinsman 1996, 340). After obtaining search warrants and citation papers, nearly 200 police officers from districts across the city assembled to carry out the raids on four gay bathhouses on 5 February 1981.

Timed to occur at approximately 11:00 PM, the simultaneous raids followed a general pattern. Many of the officers who flooded into the bathhouses were threatening, derogatory, and physically violent. One patron recalls being called a “faggot,” punched, and pushed into the wall so hard that his nose bled (Warner 2002). Other men remember police declaring that they wished the place would catch fire and that the showers could be hooked up to poison gas (Grube 1997). Rather than using keys offered by bathhouse operators, police smashed doors and used hammers, crowbars, and sheers to rip open mattresses, break lockers, and generally tear the bathhouses apart. At least $35,000 in damage was caused (Warner 2002). Ultimately, more than 300 men were charged under bawdy house laws.

Local politics were certainly a factor in the timing of the raids. Only a few months prior, Toronto mayor John Sewell (1940–) had lost his reelection bid. A supporter of Toronto’s LGBTQ community, Sewell during his mayoralty had bravely spoken out against the 1977 police raid on The Body Politic. Sewell had also endorsed the gay rights activist George Hislop’s run for a seat on the Toronto City Council. The defeat of both Sewell and Hislop in the 1980 election was viewed by many as a referendum on policing practices and signaled to Toronto police that the bathhouse raids would be met with less opposition, perhaps even political support (Kinsman 1996). Transnationally, the raids can be situated within a broad-based, conservative backlash to the politics of gay rights that was growing across North America, Europe, and Australasia during this period (Fetner 2008; de Groot 2015).

Community Response

By the time the 1981 bathhouse raids had concluded, it was clear that their scope and scale were unprecedented. As news of the raids spread, members of Toronto’s LGBTQ community rapidly mobilized in opposition. Representatives of organizations such as the Coalition for Gay Rights in Ontario and the Metropolitan Community Church met at The Body Politic’s office. While some believed that it was too logistically challenging to stage a demonstration the night after the raids, Christine “Chris” Bearchell, a prominent local activist and member of The Body Politic’s editorial collective, successfully argued that immediate action was necessary. Posters advertising the event were plastered throughout Toronto’s gay district and downtown core, and over 4,000 flyers were circulated (Hannon 1981).

Demonstrators began to gather at the intersection of Yonge and Wellesley Streets on the evening of 6 February 1981. They set off for Division 52, the police station that had orchestrated the raids. Chanting “No more shit” and “Fuck you 52,” the crowd marched down Yonge Street, Toronto’s most famous thoroughfare (Warner 2002). A blockade of police cars was defied and overrun by the crowd. One activist jumped onto the hood of a police car and urinated while a stunned officer sat inside (McCaskell 2016). Upon reaching the Division 52 station, protesters were met by a phalanx of defending police officers. Hoping to avoid violence, organizers redirected the protesters up University Avenue to Queen’s Park and the Ontario Legislative Building. There were chaotic scuffles between demonstrators and police throughout the night, which resulted in eleven charges varying from breach of the peace to assaulting an officer (Hannon 1981). Involving 3,000 people at its peak, this was the largest LGBTQ demonstration in Canadian history to date.

The Right to Privacy Committee 2.0

The Right to Privacy Committee was not directly involved in this initial demonstration against the bathhouse raids. Beset by internal conflicts, the RTPC was experiencing problems in terms of community legitimacy. In the months before the 1981 raids, the organization’s meetings sometimes had to be canceled on account of a lack of attendance. In the aftermath of the raids, RTPC abandoned the cautious approach championed by its former chair, John Alan Lee. Shortly after the raids, George Smith became chair of the organization and, henceforth RTPC pursued a more confrontational, community-oriented direction (Hooper 2016).

Holding mass community meetings, the RTPC consulted with constituents to determine how to orchestrate a vociferous response to the bathhouse raids moving forward. A second, even larger demonstration was planned. Occurring on 20 February 1981, this event involved approximately 4,000 people and proceeded under the slogan “Enough Is Enough.” Beginning at Queen’s Park and the Ontario Legislative Building, the protesters proceeded down College Street to Yonge Street, where they defied a police order to remain on the sidewalk. Plainclothes Toronto police officers infiltrated the demonstration and attempted to incite fights, vandalism, and other illegal acts. The demonstration continued to 52 Division, where speeches reproaching police policy and conduct were delivered, and support was expressed by labor and black community leaders. Further demonstrations were organized by the RTPC in the months to come, such as a “Gay Freedom Rally” at St. Lawrence Market attended by over 1,000 people and featuring speakers such as Hislop and the writer Margaret Atwood (Hooper 2016). Also notable was a hunger strike by Metropolitan Community Church leader Brent Hawkes, who demanded a formal inquiry into the bathhouse raids. His hunger strike resulted in a partial victory; Arnold Bruner was commissioned to write a report into relations between Toronto police and the city’s LGBTQ community (Warner 2002). Bruner’s report concluded that the LGBTQ community should be treated by the police as a legitimate minority group and recommended that sexual orientation protections be included in human rights legislation (Kinsman 1996).

Legal Victories

In addition to victoriously organizing demonstrations and public events, the RTPC had considerable success coordinating the legal defense of those charged in the 1981 bathhouse raids. The organization learned a valuable lesson from the failed constitutional challenge to charges stemming from the Barracks raid; focusing on bawdyhouse keepers was not a winning strategy (Warner 2002). Moving forward, the RTPC devoted more attention to defending found-ins, who vastly outnumbered keepers. The organization tirelessly fundraised on behalf of those willing to plead not guilty. This encouraged many men to contest their charges. While the RTPC could not afford to cover the full costs of every case, the organization usually paid at least half (Hooper 2016).

As the trials proceeded, RTPC-affiliated lawyers made an important discovery. Toronto police believed that found-ins would rapidly plead guilty given their shame and embarrassment. No one forecasted mass LGBTQ opposition or a community-coordinated defense. When police arrested the found-ins, they did not record detailed information beyond simple descriptions such as height, eye color, and race. When called to testify at trial, the arresting officers generally could not provide enough information to establish identity. Thus, a large number of found-in cases were thrown out by exasperated judges. When the identity of defendants was legally determined, RTPC lawyers successfully exploited the fact that a bawdy house found-in was defined as a person apprehended there “without lawful excuse.” Numerous lawful excuses were thus concocted. Judges sometimes dismissed cases because defendants claimed be at a bathhouse to use the sauna for therapeutic or medical purposes, or to exercise at gym facilities, or to stay in a cheap room for the night. Of 266 found-in cases, 230 ended in acquittals (Hooper 2016). Trials against keepers proved somewhat more successful as a result of several guilty pleas and plea bargains. But overall, and from a legal point of view, Operation Soap was an emphatic failure.

Legacies

The bathhouse raids of 1981 caused great stress, anxiety, and pain for those charged with bawdy house offenses. Closeted men, in particular, lost jobs and families as they were thrust into the court system. Bathhouses were not only spaces of queer sex but also sites of community building, camaraderie, and subcultural expression (Bérubé 2003). In political terms, the bathhouse raids of 1981 can be conceptualized as something of a “coming out” event for Toronto’s LGBTQ community. The large-scale demonstrations staged in response received significant local and national media coverage. While some media outlets, such as the Toronto Sun, featured hostile and homophobic coverage, most criticized the excessiveness of the 1981 bathhouse raids. For example, a Globe and Mail editorial titled “Heavy Hand of the Law” (1981) criticized the extensive use of police resources to prosecute sexual acts in private spaces and questioned the targeting of an embattled minority group. Additionally, many local and national public figures and groups came out in support of Toronto’s LGBTQ community and denounced the bathhouse raids. These figures and groups included progressive members of the Toronto City Council, civil liberties groups, religious organizations, black community leaders, cultural figures such as Atwood and June Callwood, and leftist civic activists such as Jack Layton (Kinsman 1996; Hooper 2016).

Another legacy of the raids is that they served to unite Toronto’s LGBTQ community against state regulation. There were certainly points of tension and disagreement between the city's gay liberationists, gay liberals, gay businesspeople, lesbian feminists, and socialist feminists. Specifically, many lesbians questioned the gay male emphasis on sexual freedom and pleasure and tendency to ignore sexual violence and exploitation. Nevertheless, these groups generally came together to oppose such an obvious instance of police oppression and heavy-handedness. The bathhouse raids also created opportunities for linkages and collaborations between activists in Toronto, Montreal, Ottawa, and Edmonton where similar raids had taken place. In a country as geographically vast, regionally fragmented, and culturally pluralistic as Canada, the event provided a common basis for working toward the repeal of bawdy house and indecency laws on a national level.

A final legacy is that the bathhouse raids and the RTPC had an important impact in terms of Toronto's response to the HIV/AIDS crisis. As the crisis grew in the mid-1980s, many activists with valuable political experience gained through the RTPC joined HIV/AIDS advocacy groups. Moreover, the AIDS Committee of Toronto, founded in 1983, first modeled itself after the RTPC, and the two organizations maintained a close working relationship (McCaskell 2016). Partially as a result of the institutional strength of the RTPC, public health officials in Toronto did not simply close bathhouses in response to HIV/AIDS, as they did in some North American cities. Instead, the RTPC and allied organizations worked to realize the bathhouses' potential as centers of HIV/AIDS prevention and education.

SEE ALSO El Baile de los 41; The Body Politic; Canadian Criminal Code Reform (1969); Compton's Cafeteria Riot (1966); Queen Boat Trials (2001–2002); Stonewall Riots, International Effects of

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Bayrūt ‘75 (1975; Ghāda al-Sammān)

KIFAH HANNA
Associate Professor of Language and Culture Studies Trinity College, Hartford, CT

Arabic novel in which homosexuality is depicted as a by-product of national violence and class inequity.

Ghāda al-Sammān’s (1942–) first full-length novel, Bayrūt ‘75 (1975; Beirut ‘75 [1995]) is celebrated for predicting the eruption of sectarian violence in Lebanon. Published shortly before the outbreak of the Lebanese civil war (1975–1990), Bayrūt ‘75 is considered prophetic in its exploration of the societal ills that led to the fifteen-yearlong civil strife in Lebanon. In short episodes narrating the lives of five characters in Beirut, the author explores sexual repression, social and economic inequity, obsolete customs, and political corruption as the main causes of the conflict.

The novel opens with two of the five main characters in a taxi heading from Damascus to Beirut. Farah and Yasmeena share a humble, conservative background and great dreams of freedom, wealth, and fame. Young and ambitious, they see the city of Beirut as a place of rescue from their repressive social and sexual reality in Damascus. From the outset of the novel, Farah’s paranoia and pessimism are palpable. His excitement for the new possibilities awaiting him in Beirut is overcome with fear and a sense of melancholy that turns into paranoia as he hears the weeping of the three mourning women who occupy the backseat of the taxi. He contemplates: “Why do they sob so? Do you suppose I’m headed to my death, and these … soothsayers of fate [are] lamenting my departure as they escort me to my grave?” (al-Sammān 1995, 5). Farah’s prophetic vision of his own demise is articulated as the taxi approaches Beirut. He finds himself reciting the words of the inscription written over the gates of hell from Dante’s Inferno: “All ye who enter here, abandon all hope!” (11). Although Farah is the only character who survives physical death in the novel, his Dantesque journey to Beirut to seek fame and wealth leads to his mental demise as he sexually surrenders to Nishan, a movie tycoon and arms dealer. Along these lines, al-Sammān explores homosexuality in Lebanon on the verge of war within the power dynamics of class inequity and national conflict.

Esmaculation, Death, and Dehumanization

The initial introduction of Farah as a pessimistic, paranoid young man overcome by sorrow and distress yet lacking empathy and concern for others seems only fitting for the development of his character in the shadow of other, more powerful, men. Contemplating the difficulties he faces upon arriving in Beirut, Farah acknowledges that “something about my face leads people to persecute me. Something draws me to powerful men who get their kicks out of lording it over me” (al-Sammān 1995, 18–19). For Farah, it was his “tyrannical peasant” father who started this cycle of submission to powerful men and, eventually, his emasculation. Averse to Farah’s intellectual interests, his father would scold Farah for not being like his wealthy relative Nishan. As he burns Farah’s books in his bonfires, the father would shout at Farah: “That voice of yours could be turned into a fortune. I’m going to turn you over to my cousin Nishan. He’ll pour you into the right mold—a golden one!” (19). Thus begins Farah’s emasculation, as his fate is determined for him by powerful men: his father and, later, Nishan.

This “turning over” process for the sake of challenging socioeconomic demarcations entails the remaking of Farah into the “singer of manliness” at the high cost of Farah’s “absolute obedience” to Nishan (45). Nishan’s “vicious and hard” voice, “like the crack of the trainer’s whip on the bodies of circus animals,” reminded Farah of “the story of the man who signed a pact in blood with Satan, in which he agreed to give his soul to the devil if the latter would fulfill all his desires. What was the man’s name?” Farah meditates, “Maybe it was Farah—or was it Faust?” (45–46). Hanadi Al-Samman argues that the analogy between Farah and Faust signifies “the manipulative aspect of the [impending] homosexual relationship, represented in the bourgeois economic control of the fate of the lower classes in post-independence era” (2008, 280). By evoking the English playwright Christopher Marlowe’s (1564–1593) Doctor Faustus, the author, then, equates emasculation and total submission to abusive power with death.

Unable to cope with his new reality, Farah is rendered powerless and lost. This is at first expressed in his physical inability to make love to women. After his failed sexual encounter with a woman, the text shines this light on Farah’s interior thoughts: “And when she had closed the door behind her, he felt as though the door between him and the world of women had been shut forever” (al-Sammān 1995, 70). Kifah Hanna argues that, within the existentialist framework, Farah’s eventual sexual surrender to Nishan “only results in another form of death, that of impotence and the broken chain of life which that implies” (2016, 50). Ghālī Shukrī (1990) contends that Farah’s petit bourgeois dream, which favors life in the jungle (i.e., in Beirut under Nishan’s control) over death in the tomb (i.e., in his small peaceful Syrian village, Douma), is figuratively presentenced to death because it is based on the fear of falling into the lowest ranks of the working class.

ʿAfīf Farrāj (1980) reads Farah’s emasculation and ensuing impotence as reflective of what he calls the “fake manhood” predominant in Beirut on the verge of civil conflict. The narrator presents Beirut collectively as a city experiencing a hunger for “the man’s man” (al-Sammān 1995, 68). Ironically, Farrāj continues, Beirut is packed with men indifferent to the imminent national crisis, exemplified by the Israeli planes breaking the sound barrier. Here Farrāj equates the lack of national zeal to emasculation and impotence.
Hanadi Al-Samman maintains that Farah’s obedient surrender to Nishan “emphasizes the master/slave, nonegalitarian aspect of their impending relationship” (2008, 280). With Farah’s sexuality corrupted by the allure of upward social mobility in Beirut, his emasculation also marks, according to Hanadi Al-Samman, “the beginning of a dehumanizing, symbolic transformation of the passive same-sex partner into an animal. This transformation is complete when, toward the end of the novel, Farah starts howling like a wounded dog instead of singing” (280). On this point, Shukrī (1990) emphasizes the Kafkaesque element in Ghāda al-Sammān’s allegorical employment of animals. For Shukrī, the author not only personifies animals, granting them human feelings of fear, sadness, and rebellion; she goes as far as passing off her characters as animals in a union reminiscent of Franz Kafka’s (1883–1924) Die Verwandlung (1915; Metamorphosis), in which a man becomes a cockroach.

Indeed, the narrative of Bayrūt ’75 builds toward such allegory. The author deliberately uses animals within the power dynamics of master/slave to represent her characters’ anguish as they attempt to cope with class inequity. From the dancing monkey, whose performance on Hamra Street Farah keeps stumbling upon, to the “Phoenician” turtle that Yasmeena keeps as a pet, to the goldfish trapped in clear plastic bags, to the circus animals, to the burning butterflies—al-Sammān employs these symbolic references to further underscore the power dynamics in prewar Beirut.

Throughout the novel, the affiliation between Farah and the dancing monkey figures prominently as the author emphasizes the master/slave allegory. Feeling lost and lonely in Beirut, Farah contemplates the relationship between the dancing monkey and its master: “what kind of infernal tie binds those who form alliances for the sheer sake of survival, even if one of them happens to be a monkey!” (21). Almost simultaneously, Farah finds himself thinking of Nishan again. Later in the narrative, Farah perceives himself as a “tiny fish for sale swimming about in … water-filled nylon bags … frantically to and fro, its head colliding continuously with the sides of the nylon bag as it searched in vain for an outlet to the sea. But there was none” (23–24). Unable to cope with his deep sense of emasculation and loss, Farah turns to cross-dressing as a public display of his emasculation and dehumanization.

Homosexuality and Madness

Hanadi Al-Samman describes the homosexual relationship between Farah and Nishan as a “traditional active/passive, male/female, master/slave, rich/poor dyad.” Within this context, she identifies their physical encounter as a form of rape, a violent “bodily invasion” (2008, 281). The violent act of rape renders Nishan’s homoerotic desire inapt. “Women aren’t able to give me this kind of pleasure, you magnificent man!” Nishan tells Farah after their first sexual encounter. “With a man I feel intimate and familiar, whereas with [women] I feel alienated and estranged” (al-Sammān 1995, 69).
Farah’s inability to reconcile the virile image imposed on him by the title “singer of manliness” while enduring Nishan’s physical abuse leads to his mental breakdown. This is initially manifested in a series of nightmares and hallucinations before Nishan checks Farah into an insane asylum. Having lost his ability “to pray and make love to women” (89), and horrified at the sight of Nishan’s face pressed against his as he tries to wake up, Farah imagines Nishan as a “ghoul straight out of legends and myths” with “one eye in the center of his face.” Feeling utterly trapped, he pronounces: “This is Sodom and Gomorrah, only bottled inside a jar!” (110). Farah’s proclamation is not only prophetic of the impending civil conflict, it—along with the earlier reference to his inability to pray—underpins the Islamic, Christian, and Jewish view of homosexual acts as immoral and sinful.

Hanadi Al-Samman elaborates on the passive sexual role imposed on Farah in the context of ubna, or the treatment of a male’s desire to be penetrated as a disease. She offers a reminder that despite the overall ban on homosexuality in the Qur’an and the equal incrimination of both active and passive partners in Islamic law, there remains culturally a clear distinction between “the active partner, who can maintain his ‘masculinity/normality’ and even enjoy respect in society, and the passive partner, who is often cast in the degrading role of mu’ajir (the equivalent of a male prostitute)” (2008, 281).

Nevertheless, Farah’s humiliating sexual role, which leads to his deep sense of emasculation and mental demise, does not turn him into a gay man. Throughout the novel, he is portrayed within the normative heterosexual delineations. Indeed, the novel opens on a heteronormative note, with Farah feeling “his body shudder at the name ‘Beirut,’ as if it were the body of a naked woman brushing up against him” (al-Sammān 1995, 3). Shortly before his first sexual encounter with Nishan, Farah contemplates: “Like all the men in the world, I love women with a passion” (68). In addition, he reminisces about the days when “even a cow or a sheep would have been unsafe” around him in his village (67). Such a hypermasculine portrayal made it possible for critics and scholars to approach homosexuality in Bayrūt ’75 with conventional tendencies.

Wafiq Gharīzī (1994), for instance, considers Farah’s character the ultimate example of homosexual practices in Ghāda al-Sammān’s work. Keeping in line with taboo approaches to homosexuality in the Arabic literary scene of the mid-twentieth century, Gharīzī considers homosexuality not only a deviance but also a fatal disease. For him, Farah’s sexual surrender to Nishan turns him into “a female monster, a sexual object,” and “a castrated figure.” He dismisses the idea that Farah’s “sexual deviance” is pathological or biological. Instead, he perceives it as the product of socioeconomic pressures or what he terms as “deviant reality,” represented mainly by Nishan (Gharīzī 1994, 100; translation by Kifah Hanna). Within this context, in Bayrūt ’75 homosexuality is mainly exemplified through Nishan and is seen as destructive—a threat to normative masculinity and social order. Dalila Mahdawi confirms such views as she reads Farah’s experience with Nishan as representative of “debauchery [and] twisted social traditions” in prewar Beirut (2007, 78).
Testifying to the nature of the discourse on homosexuality and homoeroticism in Arabic criticism, Gharīzī (1994) condemns Nishan's infatuation with men as vulgar. Referring indirectly to the Abbasid period (750–1258) as shameful, Gharīzī reflects on Nishan's homosexual practices as evocative of the premodern Islamic era, in which it was culturally acceptable to treat young boys as sexual playthings or to castrate men, and he concludes by dismissing Nishan's homoerotic desires as boorish.

The condemnation of Nishan’s greed and indifference to others—not necessarily his homosexual acts—is indicated in the closing scene of the novel. As Farah escapes the insane asylum, he contemplates that Nishan is “the one who’s ill, though, since he’s the one who’s able to accommodate himself to this sick society. As for me, I’m healthy. That’s why I wasn’t able to fall into a state of utter, absolute madness” (al-Sammān 1995, 115). Farah’s awareness suggests that, in prewar Beirut, survival is determined by the will to sacrifice one’s human principles and morality. The novel, which opens with a passive, insecure Farah, closes with him reclaiming his lost self and taking action. He escapes from the insane asylum to which he was admitted by Nishan. Dreaming of returning to his village, Douma, he steals a sign at the entrance of the asylum that reads “Hospital for the Mentally Ill” and plants it in place of the sign “Beirut” at the city entrance (115). The closing scene brings al-Sammān’s representation of homosexuality as a disease full circle. In Bayrūt ’75, the homosexual passive object is rendered crazy as a result of the unbearable misuse of power and class inequity he has to endure. Emasculation and dehumanization, therefore, seem the natural outcomes within such a contaminated reality.

SEE ALSO Awdat al-Almani ilā Rushdih (2006; Rashid al-Daif); Bareed Mista3jil: True Stories (2009); Hajar al-Dahik (1990; Hoda Barakat); Homosexual Acts in Shariʿa; Lebanese (2008; Alissar Gazal)

BIBLIOGRAPHY

The initialism BDSM encompasses a wide range of alternative sexual behavior, including bondage and discipline, dominance and submission, and sadism and masochism (Cross and Matheson 2006), as well as Leather, fetish, and WIITWD (what it is that we do). BDSM is an exchange of power and/or sensation, sometimes pain, for the purpose of cathartic release whether emotional, sexual, or both, and ranges from light spanking or bondage to engaging in a fetish for a specific object or body part, to multiday sensory experiences and long-term power-exchange contracts. The exchange of power creates a degree of intimacy, which many people find to be unparalleled in non-BDSM, or “vanilla,” interactions, and some participants consider their primary sexual orientation to be BDSM (Califia 2000b).

The dynamics of and motivations for BDSM and power exchange are as various as those who practice them. Gay men who practice chastity through the wearing of “cock cages” and giving keys to a trusted “keyholder” may do so from a desire to have or relinquish power, for feminization, to prolong sexual or relationship focus or performance, for sexual or emotional pleasure, to demonstrate self-control for either/both parties, and as a sign of commitment/fidelity (SM Gays 2018). Being caged creates a circumstance in which one is hyperaware of one’s penis and simultaneously unable to use it for orgasm (Krevitt and McCarty 2017), queering normative ideas of phallocentric masculine pleasure.

Consent is of particular importance in BDSM. On behalf of the organization Gay Male S/M Activists, slave david stein is credited with having coined the phrase “safe, sane, and consensual,” or SSC (slave david stein 2000). RACK (risk-aware consensual kink) was proposed by Gary Switch of the Eulenspiegel Society’s Usenet list, based on the recognition that much of the activity in BDSM is inherently unsafe, and therefore the best choice is to mitigate the risks, much like any extreme sport (Switch 2001). There are various perspectives on the use of alcohol or recreational drugs, and harm reduction comparisons are sometimes employed but hotly debated among community members, with some seeing complete sobriety during play as essential to both legal and community accountability, and others seeing BDSM and altered states as part of a wide continuum of pleasure-seeking activity. Master Jackson (1992) likens S/M (sadomasochistic) play to flying an airplane, both in that common sense is necessary to avoid potential harm and in that there is a need for education and practice. The intentions of both SSC and RACK are to differentiate consensual BDSM from abuse outside as well as within BDSM communities, and to facilitate education and community accountability.

Mitigating Systemic Inequality and Legal Concerns

BDSM practice centers on the (re)enactment of systemic power inequalities, which, when transferred into the erotic realm, carry with them the power of the real, the possibility of transformation, and the charge of the forbidden (Stallings 2015). It is a way of engaging with the patterns of systemic power structures such that “structural violence ... forms an imaginative, symbolic basis, a repertoire of sorts, through which these performative practices take shape” (Martin 2011, 8). BDSM is becoming more common, if not necessarily more accepted, as a 2017 study demonstrated: between one-third and one-half of Canadian respondents expressed a desire for kink or BDSM activities, and over one-third had tried it at least once (Joyal and Carpentier 2017). A 2005 survey by condom manufacturer Durex of 317,000 people worldwide showed that around 20 percent had tried bondage at least once, and that 5 percent identified as BDSM practitioners (Lin 2015). A 2003 survey of Hong Kong women’s ideas of “good sex” showed that 3.3 percent of those surveyed were interested in BDSM (Chan 2008), and in 2017 the SG Learn and Play! (SLAP!) group in Singapore reported a steady increase in membership, with new members being mostly young professionals in their twenties and thirties who find the group online and are seeking practical information about BDSM (Tong 2017). The National Coalition for Sexual Freedom, which was formed in 1991, has been a major force for the education and decriminalization of BDSM, being instrumental in the reclassification of sexual fetishes in the fifth edition of the Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders to indicate that BDSM and fetishes, when engaged in without causing distress, can be a normal and healthy part of sexual expression (American Psychiatric Association 2013).

Antecedents and Precedents

BDSM practitioners tend to put time into thinking and theorizing about their sex and play. Richard Joseph Martin notes in his 2011 study on BDSM in Berlin that it is not uncommon to find books on anthropology, philosophy, and psychology for sale at a BDSM fair along with BDSM toys and fetish wear. For instance, reading Victor Turner’s anthropological work on ritual, community, and social organization can offer ways of understanding how BDSM informs social interaction and of how (communal) ritual can be engaged as transformative, giving practitioners a better understanding of how they engage with and subvert social norms and systems of power.

Michel Foucault (1990) situates the construction of modern deviance/sadomasochism as beginning with the eighteenth- and nineteenth-century focus on maintaining control over the body and sexuality, as well as with the subsequent medicalization and delimiting of sexualities other than heterosexual procreative intercourse. But it has also been noted that his views were influenced by his own desires and a perception of what constitutes “a valuable life, of which sex is a part” (Plant 2007, 533), particularly Foucault’s own involvement in gay BDSM communities in the 1970s, which he draws from in his writings on the intersections of power and sexuality. Foucault makes numerous references to contemporary sexual practices as liberatory and different from those of previous eras of repression: “Never have there existed more centers of power; never more attention manifested and verbalized; never more circular contacts and linkages; never more sites where the intensity of pleasures and the persistency of power catch hold” (1990, 49). Foucault’s categorization of the contemporary period as particularly liberatory in terms of its approach to alternative sexual practices is valid inasmuch as the particular ideologies of sexual liberation, public acceptance, and celebration of queer identities and popular representations of BDSM proliferate.

Just as queers have reclaimed the term queer, so too have BDSM proponents reclaimed a variety of pejorative terms: primal, pervert, freak, deviant, and so on. Unlike LGBTQ movements, with which they sometimes overlap, the tendency in alternative sexuality communities is not always to seek to “come out” in the sense of being known to everyone in one’s life but rather to “come out” in terms of finding like-minded individuals with whom to participate in BDSM, activism, and socializing, whether online or offline. For participants in countries and societies where social norms are not conducive to publicly expressing BDSM interests, online participation through dating apps, discussion groups, and social forums can be a way to meet and connect with like-minded people.

Representations of pain associated with the erotic date from the Edo period in Japan and from early Greece and can also be found in the Kama Sutra (an ancient Sanskrit guide to human sexuality as part of a fulfilling life). The era after World War II (1939–1945) is, however, unique in terms of access to global (tele) communications and industrialization, which normalized leisure time. Gay men returning from the service sought out fraternal organizations for camaraderie, and motorcycle clubs were a way of circumventing laws against homosexuality. From these motorcycle clubs, came leather/biker bars and private clubs. The first leather bar in the United States was Shaw’s, which opened in New York in 1951; the first leather bars in Europe were both located in Amsterdam: Mandje (meaning “little basket”), run by a “leather dyke on bike” starting in 1927, and Hotel Tiemersma (later renamed Argos), which opened in 1957 (Cuirmale 2018). Leather men and trans people have historically been particularly persecuted by law enforcement, and they have had an uneasy relationship with the mainstream LGBTQ community as the latter sought to gain more freedom from police and legal persecution (Dong 1995). Leather bars and community meetings coalesced around the individual nodes of fetish and S/M society centered in large cities. Within US and Canadian educational organizations, there was some overlap between gay and straight BDSM communities. In Germany and the United Kingdom, there has tended to be a more pronounced division between gay and straight BDSM communities. For gay men, the “hanky code” was a way of signaling their desire by carrying different colored handkerchiefs; although it has grown over time, a basic list includes black for S/M, red for fisting, dark blue for anal sex, light blue for oral sex, orange for anything goes, and yellow for watersports or piss play. Worn on the right, the handkerchief indicates that the wearer is the bottom/submissive, and on the left, that the wearer is the top/dominant.

For trans and gender-variant people, the BDSM community can be a place to find acceptance and the freedom to explore gender, in part because of the ways in which gender performativity is used as play. Queer- and trans-positive spaces offer a wide variety of people space in which to play and socialize without having to cater to social gender norms. Within queer BDSM groups there are some gay men’s and women’s groups that are still trans-exclusive, but many are trans- and gender-variant inclusive, and there are some trans- and genderqueer-only social and play groups as well. Within the BDSM community there are those who fetishize trans people and specific bodily configurations that can be erotic if one is consenting and desirous of being the recipient of such attention, or alienating if one wishes to be seen as a person first.

Fetish Fashion and Corporatization

With a community that has been, by the nature of its connections, “underground” or “taboo,” the ability to connect anonymously has held tremendous appeal, and connecting for public sex in a bathhouse or online creates a sense of safety for those who risk social stigma, loss of employment, or familial or legal persecution as possible consequences of disclosure. Beginning in the 1930s in Europe and the United States, a series of fetish magazines emerged that included images of women in leather and rubber corsets and high heels (Lunning 2013), and that also featured personals sections that used highly euphemized references to BDSM activity. One of the most notable fetish models was Bettie Page, whose iconic image is still the most recognizable “fetish icon” ("Bettie Page" 2018). Before the advent of such BDSM networking sites as FetLife, home computers enabled people to connect to local-network BBS systems that linked community members to each other directly. Later, BDSM channels on internet relay chat and Usenet groups such as alt.sex.bondage continued to enable members to connect and build community from home. Private parties held at individual homes and exclusive/membership sex and BDSM clubs such as the Hellfire and the Mineshaft in New York’s meatpacking district gave people ways to connect in person. Now, apps such as Kik, or WeChat in China, can provide similar opportunities for people to connect safely; to engage in cybersex, cyberdomination, and online learning; and to prescreen potential partners and munch attendees before meeting face-to-face (a munch being a social get-together for people with similar interests to meet and talk, usually held in a public place such as a restaurant or café).

Skin Two, famous for its London club and a magazine of the same name, came onto the scene in 1983. Bridging the UK punk street-wear look and fetish couture, its aesthetic was predicated on the idea of Histoire d'O ([1954; Story of O [1965]]), written by Anne Desclos under the pseudonym Pauline Réage, and the ways in which O’s submission also came with being chic (Polhemus and Randall 1994). Fetish as a mainstream and runway commodity had started to come into its own, and during the 1980s and 1990s, leather stores moved from the biker aesthetic of black implements and silver fastenings to include bright colors and modern high-tech materials. Some of this change can be attributed to the growing acceptance, if not in the mainstream, then in alternative and sex-positive communities, of BDSM activities as “serious leisure.” These activities were likened to other adrenaline-raising sports such as mountain climbing—something to spend time and money on and for which safety education and social networking are both enjoyable and essential (Newmahr 2010). Carey Gray, the owner of ASLAN Leather in Toronto and a BDSM educator and porn producer, has been involved with the Feminist Porn Awards since their inception. Of the groundbreaking fetish shows he produces for ASLAN Leather, he says, ”My aim is to bring a realistic portrait of people into kink to the public. I want to give players and sex enthusiasts of all genders and perversions a place where they can see others showing off their gorgeous sexy selves” (ASLAN Leather 2018).

Organizations and Events

Leather conferences, clubs, contests, and play parties provide opportunities for people engaged in leather/fetish/BDSM to get together and learn, socialize, and network. In 2017 the first Mister Leather Brasil and Mister Urso (Bear) Brasil were selected at the Eagle in São Paulo, along with Ms. Leather Brasil. Dom Barbudo (Mr. Bearded) represented Brazil at the 2017 International Mr. Leather contest in Chicago (Mister Urso Brasil 2018). Leather contests, in particular, create moments of peer validation and opportunities for mentorship, as titleholders are expected to contribute to community building, education, and activism. Conference weekends often include classes on play and safety techniques, as well as spaces for play and vendor areas for BDSM equipment and fetish products.
Beyond fetish apparel and equipment, the best known signifier of BDSM is the leather pride flag, which was first unveiled by Tony DeBlase in May 1989 at the International Mr. Leather contest. Intended as a prototype, it was so popular that the image went into production as stickers just months later. The leather flag provided a way of demonstrating alliance and connection, which was unique to modern BDSMers. Variations on that initial design include a black, white, and green version for daddies (a masculine dominant who takes a more caring or mentorship role toward their submissive/boy/girl/little) and the boys of Leather (an organization founded in 1999 by Ray Hall for those who identify as “boys/bois” in their Leather path, dedicated to “service and devotion”); a pink, white, and black version for the girls of Leather (an organization started in 2003, by Sheryl Dee, to support those with a “girl heart” in walking their Leather path); and one in shades of brown, black, and white with a paw for bears and cubs. (Bears and cubs make up a community that coalesced in the 1980s in San Francisco around the idea of “masculinity without the trappings,” the tagline for the magazine Bear, which featured men with body and facial hair; it has since become associated with being physically large as well as hairy.)

The Folsom Street Fair is one of the largest leather/BDSM events in the world, but it began as a combination of celebration and protest after the city of San Francisco began to try to crack down on the BDSM and handballing (fisting; the sexual and meditative practice of inserting a well-lubricated hand into a partner’s anus/rectum creating endorphins and an ecstatic high for both parties) clubs that occupied the South of Market area from the 1960s to 1980s. While the gay male S/M community was being decimated by AIDS, the city felt that getting rid of bathhouses and sex clubs was timely, a necessary sociopolitical process of urban renewal. Initially termed Megahood, Folsom was organized by Kathleen Connell and Michael Valerio in 1984 and provided a space friendly to BDSM but not centered around leather. It was not until 1988 that the Folsom Street Fair became a leather event.
Public activism and visibility of Leatherfolk increased in large part because of rising death tolls from HIV/AIDS and the threat of proposed quarantine for those living with the virus.
After some difficulty with scheduling conflicts and attendance in the 1990s, Folsom garnered more corporate sponsorship, which has helped to ingratiate it with the San Francisco City Hall and has consolidated its place as the major leather fair to attend (Kukura 2014). Being able to be out in public with both the safety in numbers and the anonymity of a large crowd provides a sense of freedom for many: “Like the spirit of carnival, the grimy dreamworld of the Folsom Street Fair grants permission. License to do what you want in public, even if you haven’t dared to do it in private yet” (Sheppard 2003, 128). The SM Pride marches in London came about as a response to the Spanner case of 1993, in which a group of gay men who had been engaged in consensual BDSM were charged with assault and convicted. The annual SM Pride marches (which ended in 2000) were intended to show support for the defendants, to serve as a demonstration of the presence and visibility of “SMers,” to provide an opportunity for education, and to challenge the criminalization and pathologization of consensual BDSM practices (Dymock and Lodder 2016).

What about Feminism?

During the “lesbian sex wars” of the 1980s—an ideological conflict of “the feminist anti-porn movement against the s/m women” (Cameron 2002)—feminists protested sadomasochism, concerned about practices they felt perpetuated social inequalities, particularly social conditioning around male violence and female masochism (Linden et al.
1982). Barnard College’s ninth annual Scholar and the Feminist Conference in 1982 is often represented as a pivotal moment in the ideological disagreements between sex-positive activists and scholars in what would later become queer studies, and antipornography activists and scholars, although Rachel Corbman (2015) points out that some of the rhetoric codifying movements and conflicts was also part of the process of field building as feminist studies became part of academic institutions during the following decades. A focus on individual freedoms, including sex positivity and sexual autonomy, is considered a hallmark of third-wave feminism, and the ideological debates over sex and pornography are considered to represent the dividing point between those two movements.

Feminist Leatherfolk have responded to these critiques with writing about the ways in which their BDSM practices constitute a reclamation of sexual selves in the face of male violence (Allison 1992), ongoing declarations of autonomy differentiated from systemic injustice, opportunities for community building (Califia 2000b), and a liberatory space where historical patterns of racism and racialized oppression can be fantasized and recontextualized (Cruz 2016). Samois (first known as Cardea, then Samois, then the Outcasts, and now the Exiles) is one of the oldest lesbian-feminist BDSM organizations. It grew out of a women’s group of the Society of Janus, one of the first pansexual BDSM organizations. The group is known for its writings on feminism and BDSM, created to respond to the charge that BDSM is antifeminist and consisting of two anthologies, Coming to Power (1981) and The Second Coming: A Leatherdyke Reader (1996), in which they include feminist theory around BDSM and women’s agency, as well as erotica celebrating lesbian S/M sexuality and feminism as integral to women’s sexual autonomy and agency. In the late 1980s and 1990s sadomasochism as a psychological/sociological framework was proposed by such feminist scholars as Jessica Benjamin (1988) and Lynn S. Chancer (1992), who used unequal power dynamics as a theoretical basis for examining interpersonal and institutional dynamics. These frameworks are still used in contemporary literary analysis.

Edge Play: Walking the Fine Line

Among consenting adults within BDSM, there are types of play that are still considered edgy, and, for some, off-limits. Race play, rape play, animal play, total power exchange, and age play are among the forms of play that have the potential to create unease. The work of bloggers, theorists, and academics is beginning to demystify the taboos, delineate the boundaries between political and sexual arenas of engagement, and find ways to highlight the sometimes contradictory ways in which consensually negotiated fear can heighten arousal. When these intersections of power are manifested in ultimately controllable locations, they have the potential to reify the ways in which consent is enacted and maintained, as well as to make manifest locations of desire and traumatic reenactment as sites of transformation and healing.

Total power exchange and consensual nonconsent are fraught concepts even for leatherfolk because the community is predicated on respecting boundaries, and on maintaining an understanding of and respect for each other’s limits. V. M. Johnson is a BDSM educator and “community elder” known for her long-standing commitment to community building and mentorship. Her 1999 book To Love, to Obey, to Serve: Diary of an Old Guard Slave outlines her experiences coming out into leather in the 1970s and 1980s in New York and contains diary entries that detail not only consensual subjugation but also the ways in which power exchange is enacted between people in day-to-day life. In her 2016 book The Color of Kink, Ariane Cruz uses Gilles Deleuze’s writing on Leopold von Sacher-Masoch’s ideas of love contracts to make sense of the contemporary reality of Johnson (a black woman) voluntarily engaging in and committing to a relationship based on and constructed around the institution of slavery, which has caused so much lasting harm to black people. Cruz draws attention to the ways in which autonomy is enacted through Johnson's drawing up of her own slave contract (Deleuze's "masochist's contract") (Deleuze 1971) as well as to how the reliance of the contract on the slave's willingness to submit to the power dynamic subverts the institutional master-and-slave dynamic after which it is patterned.

Mollena Williams-Haas, “the Perverted Negress,” is known as a BDSM educator with particular expertise in race play. She discusses consensual race play on the basis of its erotic potential and recognizes it as both politically and erotically charged, but she also identifies its potential for processing traumatic events through repatterning—what Andrea Beckmann (2009) refers to as “rememorizing.” Williams-Haas, however, cautions against using BDSM independent of therapy to process trauma. Having the ability to control the experience is a key component to the success of the cathartic experience for those who desire to re-create and rememorize traumatic events through BDSM. Being able to self-select the amount of vulnerability; knowing that the event has a clear beginning, middle, and end; and knowing that the outcome is predetermined and that one will emerge satiated and whole are key components of the neurobiological rebuilding that occurs during this type of reenactment (Malizia 2018).

Play that engages fantasies of the inability to consent offers particular types of freedom to the bottom or submissive. While they differ in many ways, animal play and age play overlap in that they include social constructions of classes of beings considered powerless in dominant hierarchies. Sassafras Lowrey is a New York City–based author and BDSM/age-play educator, who uses hir writing and podcasts to educate on being genderqueer and being a little (engaging in play and/or power dynamics while embodying a younger self), as well as to create online space for and to demystify the experience of being a little in an age-play relationship (Lowrey 2018). Not all age-play—and not all BDSM—is sexual, and it is important to recognize that, for some, the power dynamics, the creation of safe spaces and ultimate trust, and the ability to give up or hold control constitute the desired catharsis or state of being, rather than erotic/sexual gratification.
Japan

Japan is known for its variety of available fetish material, the freedom with which fetishes are discussed and portrayed—particularly the Lolita, or schoolgirl, fetish, as well as tentacle erotica, which came from hentai (a form of adult/sexual manga, or illustrated erotic literature, featuring “abnormal desires”)—and its lack of censorship rules about the depiction of male genitalia. Used interchangeably in the West to refer to “Japanese-style” bondage, shibari (Japanese for “to tie”), and kinbaku (literally meaning “tight bondage”), a Japanese style of bondage that involves tying up a person with several pieces of thin rope in a visually intricate pattern, have origins in hojojutsu, a martial art used by law enforcement during the Edo period (1603–1868) to restrain prisoners. Specific ties were used for prisoners of different statuses and by different prefectures; the ties were without knots, as there was an element of shame associated with being bound by rope, so that hojojutsu was rope wrapped aesthetically around the body in such a way as to restrict movement (Nawakari 2017). Inspired by scenes of bondage and torture in Kabuki theater, Ito Seiyu was the first to capture images of kinbaku, doing so in his 1928 photography book Seme no kenkyu (Study of torture). Unlike Western ideologies of sadism and masochism exclusively for sexual pleasure, kinbaku is based on a cultural ideal of noble suffering and the idea of tying for aesthetic, restrictive, and painful/ecstatic ends. In the 1950s and 1960s, the magazine Kitan Club published fetish and kinbaku images, as well as serial erotica including Oniroku Dan’s serialized novel Hana to hebi (Flower and snake), which later became a well-known fetish film. Also in the 1960s, Osada Eikichi began performing kinbaku as S/M theater, becoming world renowned for his technique and artistry. Osada Steve apprenticed under Osada Eikichi and has been doing the Osada Seminar at Studio SIX since 2000 (Osada
Popularizing the Scene

BDSM and fetish fashion and iconography has often been adopted by those seeking to impart a risqué or avant-garde flavor to their work—from Jean Paul Gauthier’s bustiers to the science-fiction wardrobes of the Alien or Matrix movies. Thirty-five years after Madonna’s coffee-table book Sex (1992) capitalized on the forbidden eroticism offered by depictions of both BDSM and queerness, Erika Leonard (pen name E. L. James) began writing fan fiction based on Stephanie Meyer’s Twilight series. The first published result, Fifty Shades of Grey (2011), was an instant sensation, spawning a series that sold over 100 million copies worldwide and that brought BDSM into the mainstream in an entirely new way. The story, however, is not a modern understanding of healthy BDSM. While the tools described, such as nipple clamps and paddles, are those of contemporary BDSM, the storyline is derived directly from Psychopathia sexualis, a nineteenth-century text on sexuality and “deviance”: Christian, the leading man, has a perception of love distorted by childhood trauma and seeks out an innocent, Ana, to hurt and control in order to soothe his inner torments. The book has an aspect of the Harlequin or Cinderella romance: Ana, in her innocent desire to love and save her tormented hero, gives herself to him; in the end, he is redeemed, experiences an emotional freeing from his traumatic past, and is finally able to experience real love without BDSM (Green 2015). Much like depictions of homosexuality in pulp fiction, where queer desire had to be transcended by the redemption of the protagonist to heteronormativity, so too, in Fifty Shades, the reader is rewarded with the redemption of the tortured hero to heteronormative (vanilla) reproductive futurity.

In stark contrast, the BDSM educators and erotic/smut authors John Preston, Patrick Califia, and Laura Antoniou create worlds that are just as unbelievable but that are more authentic for being written by members of the community. Preston was a Leatherman and an author known both for his impossibly ideal depictions of power exchange and smoking-hot gay male S/M—particularly in the novel Mr. Benson, which was serialized in the gay leather magazine Drummer—and for his nonfiction writing, as well as for his commitment to mentoring young queer writers (Antoniou 1995). Califia, a cofounder of Samois and a prolific theorist, engages with the edges of power and consent with visceral fiction that flirts with the edges of possibility (Califia 2000a). Antoniou, in her Marketplace series, builds a kinkier and better world, one in which fantasies really do come true, sometimes (Antoniou 2000).

SEE ALSO Foucault, Influence of; Orgasm and Orgasmology; Pornography

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Samois, ed. Coming to Power: Writings and Graphics on Lesbian S&M. San Francisco: Author,

FILMOGRAPHY

Benga, François “Féral” (1906–1957)

BABACAR M’BAYE
Associate Professor of Pan-African Literature and Culture Kent State University, Kent, OH

Senegalese cabaret dancer whose sensuality was perceived as a symbol of homoeroticism in both Paris and the United States in the 1930s.

François Benga was born in Dakar, Senegal, in 1906, as an illegitimate child of wealthy parents from different ethnic groups. He moved to Paris in 1923 where, against his parents' wishes, he decided to take up a dancing career. This was a time when popular clubbing, bohemian lifestyles, and creative sexual expression and subcultures flourished in major cities such as Paris, New York, and London (Barber 2010). It was also a time of heightened interest in African and African American cultures, spurred by the Harlem Renaissance in the United States. Several African American entertainers, such as Florence Emery “Embry” Jones, Ada “Bricktop” Smith, and Josephine Baker moved to Paris, where audiences were eager to engage with the “exoticism” of black performers. Benga made strong contributions to these cultural developments through the strategies that Margaret Rose Vendryes (2008) represents as negotiating tactics, which consisted of garnering strong relationships with a broad and cosmopolitan community, including Africans and African Americans who were living in France or the United States during the Harlem Renaissance.

Benga took the stage name “Féral Benga” and became a professional chorus dancer, performing onstage with Baker and other stars in shows that featured “erotic choreography often performed in steamy jungle settings populated by very dark Africans” like him (Vendryes 2008, 66). Benga deliberately appealed to the racist and primitivizing inclinations of the Parisian audiences by dancing nearly nude with great sensuality. He became much in demand in Parisian bohemian circles as a result. After successful years as a dance performer in 1920s Paris, Benga starred in French movie director Jean Cocteau’s 1930 film titled Le sang d’un poète (The blood of a poet) (Lindstrom 2013). In addition, Benga appeared in Louis Valray's 1935 romance film Escale (Thirteen days of love) and Léo Joannon's 1936 crime and drama movie Quand minuit sonnera (When midnight strikes).
Benga made a name for himself as a Parisian cabaret dancer who usually performed nearly nude and with great sensuality, appealing to the racist and primitivizing inclinations of his French audiences.

Benga is a central figure in African history because he was the person who facilitated Geoffrey Gorer’s (1905–1985) trip throughout West Africa in 1934. Gorer was a British ethnographer who traveled extensively around Senegal that year in the company of Benga, who, like the British adventurer, wanted to go to West Africa “to study the native dances and if possible bring back a black ballet” (Gorer 1935, 4). Africa Dances: A Book about West African Negroes (1935) is the outcome of the collaboration between Gorer and Benga. In his narrative, Gorer represents Benga as a man who, by the autumn of 1933, “had already made a reputation for himself as a dancer at the Folies Bergères, a reputation that was enhanced by the ‘mystery’ surrounding his private life—which being translated into English from the Parisian meant that if he had love affairs they were not known about and he was practically never seen in fashionable houses or night clubs” (3). Benga’s “private life,” his status as “an extremely rich and impossible to meet” person, and what Gorer identifies as his “mythical vices” (3) do not constitute enough evidence to identify him as a bisexual or homosexual man. Yet, although he might not have been a homosexual, Benga was an icon who had a strong impact on transnational gay culture of the 1930s. According to James Smalls (2001), Benga played a major role in post(modern) queer ethnographies.
because he was a black man whose “naked beauty” was perceived as a symbol of homoeroticism in both Paris and the United States in the 1930s.

In a similar vein, Benga had a strong impact on global black gay culture, especially on the artistic work of the African American gay sculptor Richmond Barthé (1901–1989) in the 1930s. In 1934 Benga met Barthé, who popularized him in the United States through the renowned Féral Benga bronze casting, which is currently in the Newark Museum in New Jersey (Lindstrom 2013). Barthé used Benga’s homoerotic appeal as a means of representing the aesthetic contributions of black people to universal artistic conceptions of beauty, maleness, and finesses. Discussing Barthé’s employment of Benga’s body in his sculpture, Smalls writes:

> Barthé attempted to sanctify homoerotic desire and Africanity in his most visibly famous statue, Feral Benga ... by combining a European feature often associated with homoerotic desire (i.e., Michelangelesque forms), and angular physical movements identified with an impulsive African primitivism. Despite the differences in media, Barthé’s works are similar to [Carl] Van Vechten’s in their juxtapositioning of racial focus and the sensual worship of the black male physique in motion. (1997, 179–180)

Benga’s influence on the transnational black gay culture of the 1930s provides a starting point for exploring the role of Senegal in the global history of homoeroticism in the first part of the twentieth century.

Embodiment of Afropolitanism

J. K. S. Makokha represents Afropolitanism as the process through which “the phenomenon of displacement and mobility across the limits of African spaces—physical, epistemological and disciplinary—changes across teleology and geography” (2011, 19). Benga epitomized the Afropolitan’s ability to use art and movement as means to cross space and disrupt the binary between tradition and modernity. He embodied the modern African who was able to create a fine balance between the past and the present while infusing his original culture into Western civilization. His ability to remain African and blend his traditions with Western customs without being geographically confined in his original homeland reveals his Afropolitanism.

Benga also embodies Afropolitanism because his life represents a model of negotiation of culture, power, and space in fluid locations that provides a better understanding of the gender and sexual identities of early twentieth-century urban and transnational African migrants. Benga’s biography reveals much about the significance of these Africans’ use of Western theatrical and artistic stages as a means of garnering Pan-African and cosmopolitan support and surviving oppression. His trajectory reflects a few of the strategies that some Africans who moved to the West during the twentieth century sometimes developed to negotiate space for their modern identities.

Unfortunately, Benga is largely neglected in African studies, and his role in the transnational influence of Senegalese culture in the early twentieth century is little known.
In Senegal itself, few people are aware of Benga, and his name does not appear among those figures who are celebrated in Senegalese history and culture, despite his status as a key bridge between colonial Senegalese arts and customs and both French and African American cultures during the 1920s and 1930s. This neglect is a grave error because Benga was one of the first artists to serve as a transnational black ambassador and propagator of Senegalese culture in the 1920s and 1930s, years before the Negritude movement was born.

SEE ALSO Bars and Cabarets in Europe; Camp; Senegal

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Barber, Trudy. “Stephanie Is Wired: Who Shall Turn Him On?” In LGBT Identity and Online
New Media, edited by Christopher Pullen and Margaret Cooper, 245–257. New York:

Coutelet, Nathalie. “Féral Benga: De la danse nègre à la chorégraphie africaine” [Féral Benga: From the Negro dance to the African choreography]. Cahiers d’études africaines 52, 1935.

Lindstrom, Lamont. “Geoffrey Gorer and Féral Benga: A Collaboration.” History and

Makokha, J. K. S. “Introduction: In the Spirit of Afropolitanism.” In Negotiating Afropolitanism: Essays on Borders and Spaces in Contemporary African Literature and Folklore, edited by Jennifer Wawrzinek and J. K. S. Makokha, 13–22. Amsterdam: Rodopi, 2011.

Smalls, James. “Public Face, Private Thoughts: Fetish, Interracialism, and the Homoerotic in Some Photographs by Carl Van Vechten.” In Sex Positives? Cultural Politics of Dissident

El Beso de la Mujer Araña (1976; Manuel Puig)

MATTHEW J. EDWARDS
Associate Professor of Spanish
University of Missouri, Kansas City

Argentina novel that upends normative storytelling and normative sexuality while giving marginal subjectivities a voice.

El beso de la mujer araña (1976; Kiss of the Spider Woman [1979]), by Argentine author Manuel Puig (1932–1990), is written from within the context of global struggles against authoritarianism that characterized the 1960s and 1970s. Like contemporary testimonials of human rights violations that circulated throughout Latin America, Puig's novel voices the experiences of the persecuted, condemned, and suffering. However, El beso de la mujer araña is different from the work of Puig's contemporaries in that with this novel Puig directly connected the struggles of the political Left for sociopolitical revolution with the often-overlooked legacy of sexual- and gender-based resistance by queer subjects. While the story of their shared condemnation is given life through dialogue, resistance and coexistence are imagined through the gay man’s voice and in his negotiation of other stories, of films, and of romantic motifs.

Setting, Characters, and Plot

Puig’s novel begins in an Argentine prison cell during the years leading up to the nation’s most recent military dictatorship (1976–1983). Here, Molina, a gay man condemned by his queer sexuality, reenacts a series of foreign films to his cellmate, a leftist revolutionary named Valentín. The films themselves provoke discussions of clarification or debate and enable a desired flight from the dominant sexual, political, and ideological frameworks edified in the prison walls. Despite their intentions to permanently evade prison life, the inevitable need for water, restrooms, showers, and food routinely remind the two of their detention. And when Valentín becomes ill after ingesting food poisoned by the prison authorities, the film narratives become a clear coping mechanism to the suffering associated with marginalization.
In this novel, Puig directly connected the struggles of the political Left for sociopolitical revolution with the often-overlooked legacy of sexual- and gender-based resistance by queer subjects.

For Molina and Valentín, in particular, the discursive networks formed around the films produce an appreciation of their differing opinions and realities that, in times of need, develops into clear expressions of empathy and kindness (Edwards 2017; Santoro 1997). Molina, who has typically wavered in the presence of authority, manipulates a meeting he is called to with the warden so as to bring supplies back to his ill cellmate. As their struggle continues, Valentín sheds his stoic demeanor and welcomes the warmth of his companion’s touch. Their reactions to prison life come naturally to a close when the two men make love in the darkness of their own systematic marginalization. Afterward, the two prisoners part ways, and, as they confront authority alone, the possibility of political revolution and social change vanishes.

Resistance through Form

Scholars have linked the content of El beso de la mujer araña to its formal elements, including textual layout and discursive framing. In particular, much like the manner in which Molina and Valentín’s film narratives represent both a survival tactic and a show of resistance to prison authority (Rosenkrantz 1999), the narrative structure of Puig's novel has been likened to a stand against the organizational, rationalizing goals of the nineteenth-century novel as understood by scholars, including Doris Sommer and Julio Ramos. Read largely, the flexible, open-ended dialogue that frames interaction within the cell and that, specifically, characterizes the filmic recreations is understood as providing a counterpoint to modernizing narratives by decentralizing storytelling (Edwards 2017). This juxtaposition is framed clearly within the novel when Molina leaves the cell and is invited to the warden’s office in chapters eight and eleven and at the beginning of chapter fourteen. In these instances, social interaction is documented, named, and registered according to scripted models of not only social interaction but literary representation and cultural reflection (Edwards 2017).

Within the cell, the absence of a narrator prioritizes the representation of the marginal subject’s experience. This emphasis on marginal storytelling is further elaborated, however, in the novel’s textual layout. First and foremost, the introduction of footnotes, beginning in chapter three, have been explained as a parallel story line, engaging in the revolutionary politics associated with queer sex, much in the same way the prisoners do within the cell (Balderston 1999). However, it is important to note that, unlike the dialogue between the two cellmates that focuses on the elaboration of six feature-length films (Páez 1995), the footnotes explicitly address the presence of the reader. The in-text asterisk that identifies each of them signals away from the prison cell and toward a research-based narrative defined by order, clarity, and knowledge. The first footnote appears, for example, amid a discussion between the cellmates when Molina is moved by a scene in one of his filmic recreations and recalls a past love. Valentín notices his cellmate’s change in humor and inquires into the details of the relationship. “If we’re going to be in this cell together like this, we ought to understand one another better, and I know very little about people with your type of inclination,*” (Puig [1976] 1991, 59). The asterisk at the end of Valentín’s inquiry directs the reader away from marginalized actors and toward medical discourse, science, and high culture, and specifically to a description of a list of theories on the origins of homosexuality that spans the lower half of the following three pages.

The remaining footnotes, scattered across chapters four through eleven, continue to provide elaborate, extensive digressions from the central prison narrative into psychoanalytic approximations to sexuality, as well as detailed descriptions of the contextual framings of Molina’s films. Together, they carefully mark the separation between researcher and object of study. José Amícola (1998) argues that Puig’s careful and intentional integration and combination of sources results in a social, sexual, and textual democratization. Similarly, the footnote, understood as a minor text, and as an addition to a primary narrative authority, confirms Puig’s refusal to accommodate normative discourses over and above the voice of difference.
Queer Love, Cultural Revolution

In El beso de la mujer araña, sexual revolution is inseparable from political change and aesthetic innovation. Here, the representation of sex between the two cellmates through textual space left blank, or the suggestion of touch, taste, and desire with ellipses, hint at the symbolic translation of marginality itself. The scene's documentation marks the translation of the silence, codified communication, and hidden spaces that have characterized queer experience through time (Masiello 2001). For Daniel Balderston and José Quiroga (2005), Puig's novel and, in particular, this sequence identify a turning point in the recognition of queer time and space as unique political terrain. In general, however, the priority Puig's novel assigns to representing marginal experience and the revolutionary quality given to queer sex allow such scenes to develop into explicitly queer narrative, like those by Cuban writer Reinaldo Arenas (1943–1990), for example. In addition, Puig's representation of a politicized queerness helps to understand El beso de la mujer araña as anticipating Pedro Lemebel's (1952–2015) baroque stylings of gay sex in Santiago, Chile, and the tales of interclass, nonnormative transgendered pleasure in the work of today's Argentine authors Alejandro Modarelli and Naty Menstrual.

SEE ALSO Antes que Anochezca (1992; Reinaldo Arenas); Bom-Crioulo (1895; Adolfo Ferreira Caminha); Cold War and Sexuality in Latin America; The Cuban Revolution and Homosexuality; Frente de Liberación Homosexual; El Vampiro de la Colonia Roma (1979; Luis Zapata)

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Bhutan

KARMA DUPCHEN
LGBT Bhutan
Thimphu, Bhutan

The status of the LGBTQ community in Bhutan.

Bhutan is a landlocked South Asian country in the eastern Himalayas with a small population of around 800,000 people. Bhutan entered the modernized era around the beginning of the twentieth century and remains a highly religious country. Buddhism is the state religion and its influence can be observed in Bhutanese lifestyle and culture. The Bhutanese can be quite tolerant and open regarding topics that would otherwise be considered taboo for a small religious country. For example, sex education is prioritized in schools all over Bhutan, and Bhutanese people approach the topic with subtlety and tolerance.

A lot of international media and individuals outside the country have characterized Bhutanese society as openly bisexual because Bhutanese men do not shy away from playful physical contact with one another even in public. This is a mischaracterization of Bhutanese cultural expression, which is strongly based in the beliefs that gender is binary (male/female) and that sexual expression is limited to heterosexuality. Hence, for men to be holding hands or engaging in even more intimate forms of affection is not considered homosexual because the Bhutanese do not acknowledge that homosexuality exists in Bhutan.

Although there is no cultural recognition of the existence of same-sex sexuality, Bhutan’s penal code does include language that could be construed as criminalizing sex acts that deviate from heterosexual norms. Articles 213 and 214 state that “A defendant shall be guilty of the offence of unnatural sex, if the defendant engages in sodomy or any other sexual conduct that is against the order of nature.... The offence of unnatural sex shall be a petty misdemeanour” (Bhutan 2014). Although such articles have been used elsewhere to prosecute LGBTQ individuals, the intent in Bhutan is more ambiguous. For instance, the law does not specify the gender of the defendant; hence, the law itself does not specifically target homosexuals or men who have sex with men. As a result, even heterosexuals are subject to the same law. The article also fails to define what other sexual acts are “unnatural” and who makes that determination. As of 2017, Bhutan had not seen any cases involving the charge of unnatural sex, but the threat of prosecution looms in the service of homophobic agendas.
Emergence of LGBTQ Community

Historically, LGBTQ individuals at large have remained invisible in Bhutan. Until the twenty-first century, there had been no documentation of homosexuality or queer individuals in Bhutanese history. The first-ever article on gay people, “How Gay Are Bhutanese Gays?,” appeared in a local newspaper on 19 December 2008. The Facebook page LGBT Bhutan and the Twitter handle @LGBT_Bhutan were created in 2013, becoming the first-ever platforms to cater to, as well as publicly acknowledge the existence of, LGBTQ people in the country. The freelance journalist Namgay Zam helped bring awareness to LGBTQ issues through several articles and interviews, including a 2016 article published on her personal blog that first brought international attention to LGBTQ rights in Bhutan. Slowly and steadily, LGBTQ individuals of the millennial generation in Bhutan have become more comfortable with the idea of accepting their sexualities and not necessarily having to hide and remain underground. In 2015 Passang Dorji, a physiotherapist by profession, made headlines as the first gay man to come out publicly and talk about issues concerning gay people on national television. Since then, there have been a number of articles and television documentaries highlighting LGBTQ individuals in the country.

LHAK-SAM, BHUTAN’S NETWORK FOR HIV-POSITIVE PEOPLE

Lhak-Sam is Bhutan’s first and only AIDS organization registered with the nation’s Civil Society Organization Authority. Started by executive director Wangda Dorji, Lhak-Sam works toward preventing the spread of HIV/AIDS in the country and also supports a strong network of HIV-positive people in Bhutan, providing them with proper health care and counseling, as well as spreading information and awareness both for HIV-positive individuals and their family members. After becoming an official civil society organization in 2010, Lhak-Sam received support from the Joint United Nations Programme on HIV/AIDS; the Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria; and the United Nations Population Fund, while securing assistance from other stakeholders in the country, such as the Ministry of Health.

During the second decade of the twenty-first century Lhak-Sam has incorporated LGBTQ awareness into its outreach program. With the help of a steady group of LGBTQ volunteers, Lhak-Sam aims to shed light on ongoing issues regarding LGBTQ discrimination and the self-stigma that most LGBTQ individuals experience. The organization has played a key role in reducing discrimination and spreading awareness about homosexuality and gender identity, working with key stakeholders in the country. With assistance from the Global Fund, Lhak-Sam has been a pioneer in the LGBTQ movement in Bhutan. By providing technical assistance to awareness programs and training to volunteers and community members, Lhak-Sam has been able to empower key community members to be proactive in lieu of a more organized LGBTQ movement in the country. The organization played a key role in assisting Bhutanese physiotherapist Passang Dorji to come out on national television in 2015. In 2016, coinciding with the International Day against Homophobia, Transphobia, and Biphobia, the rainbow-colored flag was flown in Bhutan for the first time ever, at the United Nations Development Programme office in Thimphu.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Karma Dupchen
LGBT Bhutan
Thimphu, Bhutan

Issues

Internalized homophobia is the biggest threat to LGBTQ individuals in Bhutan. “Self stigma” is a prevalent cultural norm that leaves LGBTQ individuals feeling displaced and alienated from society. This is largely attributable to the absence of LGBTQ role models and a culture that fails to acknowledge the presence of LGBTQ people, a practice that often makes young gay or lesbian teens in particular feel out of place and alone. Especially in Bhutan, this can be highly detrimental because most Bhutanese have a strong desire to fit in and be a part of the society, whereas standing out and being different is frowned on.

Bhutan’s Buddhist culture has helped minimize discrimination and hate crimes against its LGBTQ community. Buddhism does not proscribe a specific sexuality or sexual orientation but rather focuses on finding peace in one’s inner self. There is no question, however, that the very invisibility of the LGBTQ community has also played a role in shielding LGBTQ individuals from negative repercussions. Bhutanese people in general are unaware of the existence of LGBTQ people in the country. So, currently, LGBTQ people have managed to stay out of the spotlight (good or bad), giving them the advantage of existing in a cloak, invisible yet observant. Additionally, the lack of documentation, research, and attention in the mainstream media does not leave much opportunity for the greater society to consider their views on homosexuality, either positive or negative. If in the near future Bhutan’s gay culture and LGBTQ community engage more openly in society, one can expect disagreement from the greater part of the country’s population.

Decriminalization of homosexuality in Bhutan remains in limbo. As long as the LGBTQ community in Bhutan remains underground and forgoes their civil and legal rights, the government cannot and will not take the initiative to unearth the intricate layers of homosexuality and gender identity at a national level. In 2008 the first democratic elections in the nation's history took place, marking Bhutan's change from an absolute monarchy to a constitutional monarchy. As such, Bhutan is still a very young democracy, suggesting that Bhutanese people have a long way to go in terms of rights and governance. Awareness and outreach programs in the meantime will prove to be a meaningful tool in battling homophobia. At the same time, programs and community-building activities that encourage a free society will be highly beneficial in attaining the ultimate goal of an open society without prejudice.

SEE ALSO Family Law in Asia; New Media in Asia; Section 377 in South Asia; Sexology in Asia

BIBLIOGRAPHY

http://www.namgayzam.com/colouring-a-rainbow/
Academics and laypeople have for centuries debated what causes a person to be attracted to someone of the same gender or to identify with a gender that differs from their assigned sex at birth. Currently, this debate includes a wide variety of identities, but until the twenty-first century, scientific work on LGBTQ+ sexuality primarily focused on the causes of homosexuality and transsexuality. Although some critics argue that the terms gay, lesbian, transgender, or trans are now preferred over homosexual or transsexual because they emphasize identity over medical classification, it should be noted that, prior to the 1970s, many people relied on medical terms such as homosexual and transsexual to formulate their own sense of self. The various hypothesized causes of sexuality and gender identity fit within the broader “nature versus nurture” debate, in which biological phenomena (e.g., genes and hormones), social phenomena (e.g., cultural norms and family dynamics), or a mix of both are thought to determine human behavior. When human behavior is assumed to be caused by an immutable biological trait, despite evidence of sociocultural factors, this bias is often called biological essentialism. Although typically invoked either to argue against the idea that gender and sexuality are socially constructed and context-specific categories, or to support politically motivated arguments, biological essentialism may describe any instance in which human phenomena are erroneously attributed to nature and not nurture. Scientific research into the biological underpinnings of gender and sexuality has mostly focused on men, although frequent inferences have been made from studies of animal sexuality (Terry 2000). Since the inception of the term, scientists and activists have invoked biological essentialism to argue both for and against LGBTQ+ rights, but this tactic has always perpetuated gendered stereotypes about queer people.

Nineteenth-Century and Early Twentieth-Century Theories
Locating the precise origin of an abstract concept such as biological essentialism is difficult because it is a bias that has been widely present in scholarly and political discourse, as opposed to a specific social or political movement with clear dates and locations. Nevertheless, it makes sense to begin with nineteenth-century sexology because it represented a fundamental turning point in the science of sexuality and marked the inception of gender inversion, a central theory in the biological essentialism of homosexuality and transsexuality (Greenberg 1988). Prior to the 1800s, religious and legal authorities saw homosexuality as a depraved or heretical act (e.g., sodomy, buggery) rather than a representation of one’s identity, but as Michel Foucault (1926–1984) has argued, this era saw a shift among scientists and courts to viewing homosexuality as defining an identity (Foucault 1978). A number of factors contributed to this shift—which was, crucially, gradual and uneven—but biological essentialism was a major influence.

These factors received concentrated attention starting in the mid-nineteenth century in various parts of Europe, including Germany and France. A particular turning point was studies of “contrary sexual sensation” and “inversion of the genital sense” (termed anima muliebris in corpore virili inclusa, often translated as “female psyche confined in a male body”). This hypothesis suggested that inverts (people who would now be considered homosexual people) have sex-crossed brains, with such men assumed to have the psyches of heterosexual women, and such women assumed to have the psyches of heterosexual men. “Today,” the medical historian Vernon A. Rosario notes, “it is commonplace to identify ‘inversion’ as a radically new sexual identity and the ‘invert’ as the immediate ancestor to the modern ‘homosexual.’ The birth of the invert is more historically complex, however, for he did not spring fully formed from the mind of German physicians in 1869” (1997, 70). Rosario contends that the characteristics of sexual inversion had been gradually accumulating in nineteenth-century medical literature but that it was in the 1880s that this category would fully emerge and be transformed into a range of “sexual perversions” (83).

The Austro-German sexologist Richard von Krafft-Ebing’s (1840–1902) book Psychopathia sexualis (1886) was an important scientific attempt to document “sexual pathology.” Krafft-Ebing is often thought to have popularized the word homosexual, while the word heterosexual was first used in Charles Gilbert Chaddock’s (1861–1936) 1892 translation of Psychopathia sexualis. Like many other sexologists of the period, Krafft-Ebing saw reproduction as the biological purpose of sex and therefore considered any sexual behavior that did not result in procreation to be inherently pathological. Homosexuality, masturbation, and other forms of recreational sex were all considered deviant on the same grounds. Krafft-Ebing believed that gender inversion was a wide-ranging continuum of problematic gender variance that included what is now understood as transgender identity. He speculated about both congenital (e.g., anomalies in prenatal development) and acquired (e.g., poor parenting or experience in same-sex environments such as schools and prisons) cases of gender inversion. Krafft-Ebing’s work is viewed as deeply pathologizing today, but his beliefs were relatively compassionate for his time in that he used his medical models of gender inversion to argue against imprisoning people for homosexuality and instead advocated treating them in medical facilities because he believed that such people were sick.

Because of the notoriety of Psychopathia sexualis, Krafft-Ebing is often inaccurately credited with introducing gender inversion in academia, although he had a number of predecessors. For instance, the German sexologist Karl Heinrich Ulrichs (1825–1895) presaged Krafft-Ebing by twenty years. Ulrichs openly identified as an Urning, his term for what society would today call a gay man, and he spoke about homosexuality as a natural biological phenomenon (Greenberg 1988). Ulrichs described male homosexuality as a female psyche in a male body, so although Ulrichs differed from Krafft-Ebing in terms of whether he believed that homosexuality was pathological or not, they both believed in gender inversion.

Magnus Hirschfeld (1868–1935), a German sexologist who founded an early homosexual rights organization in 1897, also argued that homosexuality and transsexuality were forms of biological gender inversion (Greenberg 1988). Hirschfeld, like Ulrichs, believed that gender inversion was a part of natural biological diversity, claiming that same-sex attraction and sex-crossed behavior are inborn character traits. Hirschfeld and Ulrichs argued against antihomosexuality laws, using biological gender inversion as evidence that people who would now be called LGBTQ+ cannot help their natural behavior. So, too, did Marc-André Raffalovich (1864–1934), a French homosexual writer and psychiatrist who clashed with Hirschfeld but who shared his belief that homosexuality could be natural and who also rejected pathology and criminalization. Raffalovich proposed the concept of “unisexuality.” As with today’s conceptions of homosexuality, unisexuality involved an attraction to the same sex, rather than strictly psychical hermaphroditism, a term commonly used in the late nineteenth century. Raffalovich elaborated on this theory in his 1896 book Uranisme et unisexualité: Étude sur différentes manifestations de l’instinct sexuel (Uranism and Unisexuality: A Study of Different Manifestations of the Sexual Instinct [2016]).

A number of other prominent scientists of the period, such as the American sexologist David O. Cauldwell (1897–1959) and the British physician Havelock Ellis (1859–1939), believed that homosexuality and transsexuality could be caused by either a dysfunctional childhood or biological anomalies (Stryker and Whittle 2006). Today, these scholars’ views are considered largely sympathetic to LGBTQ+ people, as they argued that gender variation was normal in humans and that homosexual behaviors—and the people who engaged in them—were examples of this variation. That being said, Ellis still cautioned against homosexuals having children because they would “for the most part ... belong to a neurotic and failing stock” (1901, 198).

The British social theorist Edward Carpenter (1844–1929) also provided a biological model of homosexuality that was not pathological and did not center on abnormality in works such as Homogenic Love and Its Place in a Free Society (1894), Love’s Coming of Age (1896), and The Intermediate Sex (1908). Indeed, Carpenter argued that what he termed “homogenic love” and “comrade love” performed social and intellectual functions that were positive and central to modern states. Carpenter posited that sex exists on a continuum from heterosexual male to heterosexual female, with homosexual people occupying various intermediate types. Although this model still assumed that same-sex attraction was a function of biological gender differentiation, it argued that this differentiation was normal and not pathological.

In France, the neurologist Jean-Martin Charcot (1825–1893) and the psychiatrist Valentin Magnan’s (1835–1916) “Inversion du sens genital” (1882; Inversion of the genital sense) offered a degeneration theory for gender inversion, one that mirrored eugenic arguments (Reed 2001). In so doing, they built on Ambroise Auguste Tardieu’s (1818–1879) Étude médico-légale sur les attentats aux moeurs (1857; Medicolegal study of assaults on decency) and Bénédict Morel’s Traité des dégénérescences physiques, intellectuelles et morales de l’espèce humaine et des causes qui produisent ces variétés maladives (1857; Treatise on physical, intellectual, and moral degeneration in the human species and the causes that produce these diseased varieties). Degeneration theory emphasized a concept of heredity in which organisms acquire traits over their lifespan and then pass those traits on to their children. Degeneration theory was used to argue that individuals’ pathological or criminal behavior led to inborn physiological deficits, called hereditary taint, that would be passed down to their offspring, and this would compromise societal progress (e.g., education, industry). Charcot and Magnan argued that inversion among Greeks and pagans was reflective of their underdevelopment as peoples and that modern French society had evolved past this primitive sexual state. Inverts were thus seen as reverting to more primitive humans and therefore posed a threat to France. Charcot and Magnan’s theory was thus another biological model that pathologized homosexuality.

Biological essentialism played a central role in the eugenics movement (Bashford and Levine 2010). Eugenics refers to an idea that human “stock” or genetic quality can be improved by controlling or otherwise intervening in sexual reproduction. Francis Galton (1822–1911) coined the term, and he used the English naturalist Charles Darwin's (1809–1882) theory of evolution to argue that human characteristics were almost entirely hereditary and genetic (i.e., biological essentialism). The implication of eugenics was that people who were deemed inferior (e.g., homosexuals, convicted felons, the physically or mentally disabled) would conceive children who are also inferior. In an attempt to improve the quality of the human species, eugenicists pushed for practices that ranged from birth control to segregation to involuntary sterilization, the last of which is a form of genocide. The eugenics movement exemplifies how biological essentialism can lead to injustice.

Some of the most prominent sexologists (e.g., Hirschfeld, Ellis) were eugenicists themselves, although they did not advocate for the more extreme forms of eugenics (e.g, forced sterilization and abortions; Greenberg 1988). Instead, Ellis and others advocated for a voluntary genetic aristocracy formed through racist and classist mate selection, which was a popular idea among scientists of the time. So although arguments based on biological essentialism were at times used to funnel people who would now be called LGBTQ+ out of European prisons in the 1800s, this belief system was also used to advocate for abuses ranging from anti-interracial marriage laws to attempted genocide through sterilization in the early 1900s.

As psychoanalysis gained prominence around the turn of the twentieth century, some scientists increasingly saw gender inversion as arrested sexual development. The Austrian neurologist Sigmund Freud (1856–1939) advocated for a universal potential for same-sex attraction, which he called innate bisexuality, in his seminal Three Essays on the Theory of Sexuality ([1905] 1962). In this theory, Freud used evidence that humans are not sex-differentiated during very early stages of fetal development to argue that humans have an inherent bisexuality that normally fades as they mature. From this perspective, homosexuality was described as stunted development. Freud also argued that gender inversion was caused by a failure to resolve the Oedipal complex, where a child identifies with the same-gender parent and falls in love with the other-gender parent (Freud 1951). Freud waffled on whether gender inversion was normal, but because his theories of human behavior centered on fundamental conflicts and neuroses from childhood, he ultimately took an environmental model of universally troublesome sexual development to position homosexual and heterosexual people as more similar than ever before.

Twentieth-Century Theories

Starting in the 1930s, scientists in the United States began to build on gender inversion and psychoanalytic models of homosexuality. George W. Henry’s (1889–1964) study titled Sex Variants (1941) sought to psychologically and physiologically profile homosexuality, collecting childhood case histories, X-rays, nude photographs, semen samples, and surveys of gendered behavior (Minton 1986; Terry 1999). Henry believed that homosexuals have an inferior genetic constitution that is exacerbated by poor parenting, especially feminine fathers and masculine mothers, which results in gender inversion. Similarly, Sex and Personality: Studies in Masculinity and Femininity (1936) by Lewis M. Terman (1877–1956) and Catharine Cox Miles (1890–1984) asked homosexuals and heterosexuals questions related to several psychosocial factors, including the masculinity-femininity scale (Minton 1986). Terman and Miles sought to prove that homosexual men were abnormally feminine and homosexual women were abnormally masculine, but their results showed that many homosexual people were more gender conforming than several of the heterosexual samples. To reconcile this, Terman and Miles proposed that some homosexuals are not invert but are instead perverts: people who are not biologically same-sex-attracted but instead through “chance circumstances” became homosexual in order to satisfy their wanton curiosity. From this perspective, inverteds were true homosexuals caused by biological substrates (essentialism), whereas perverts were situational homosexuals who had sex with the same gender because of their attraction to sexual deviance (nonessentialism). Terman was also a eugenicist, who relied on his work on intelligence testing to argue for innately higher intelligence quotients (IQs) among white people, eventually joining the Human Betterment Foundation, which promoted compulsory sterilization laws for those deemed less intelligent.

Conducted in the midcentury, Alfred C. Kinsey (1894–1956) and colleagues' research is still considered among the most exhaustive studies of homosexuality. Kinsey, an American biologist and sexologist, eschewed the theory of gender inversion and labels such as "homosexual" and "heterosexual," instead arguing that sexual orientation exists on a continuum from same-gender-attracted to both-gender-attracted to other-gender-attracted, called the Kinsey scale. Kinsey believed that sexual orientation was fluid across time and context. He also argued that labels such as "invert" and "homosexual" were cultural constructions that foisted a false binary on people's sexuality. Kinsey's work was the first prominent explanation of homosexuality that stressed cultural causes and did not rely on pathological or biological causes. After his work on male sexuality, Kinsey developed a quiet interest in transvestism (Meyerowitz 2001) and became acquainted with a medical expert in this field, Harry Benjamin (1885–1986). Coming from the German sexological tradition and an endocrinologist himself, Benjamin worked closely with patients to argue against the then prevalent psychoanalytic understandings of cross-gender identification. Like Kinsey, Benjamin championed a scale, known as the sex orientation scale, which situates different degrees of transgender inclinations on a continuum. Often credited with coining the term transsexualism, Benjamin explained the desire for sex change in terms of biological constitutional factors and advocated surgical interventions for the treatment of transsexuality (Meyerowitz 2002). Both Kinsey and Benjamin would later be reclaimed by queer activists as scientists unusually sympathetic to gender and sexual minorities.

Kinsey's research, along with gay and lesbian activism, was instrumental in formally depathologizing homosexuality (Chiang 2008; Drescher 2015). The American Psychiatric Association (APA) catalogs and describes mental illnesses in the Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders (DSM), and homosexuality was included to some degree in the initial three versions. The DSM-I included homosexuality as an outright illness, but during the late 1960s and early 1970s, the APA began to reconsider this diagnosis because of gay and lesbian activism (e.g., activists disrupted APA conventions in 1970 and 1971) and research such as Kinsey's that showed that homosexuality occurs among psychologically healthy people. In 1973 the APA concluded that homosexuality is normal and changed the diagnosis in the DSM-II to "sexual orientation disturbance" and again in the DSM-III to "ego-dystonic homosexuality"; these diagnoses were reserved for homosexual people who experience distress around their sexual orientations. These later diagnoses were ultimately removed in 1987 for the DSM-III-R because they blamed individuals for experiencing a societal problem (i.e., antigay stigma). The DSM-5 (2013) has no diagnosis for homosexual people, but there is a classification for “gender dysphoria,” denoting transgender persons who experience distress about their gender identity or expression. LGBTQ+ advocates have criticized the concept of gender dysphoria for again pathologizing queer people for experiencing social stigma. Although the current DSM still pathologizes transgender people, each successive version has pathologized homosexuality and transsexuality less than the former iteration, and this has been informed by both biological and cultural research on gender and sexuality.

Although Kinsey and other scholars (e.g., George Weinberg, John H. Gagnon, William Simon) provided a cultural-behaviorist explanation for homosexuality, it was not until several decades later that academics took up this argument in force. Foucault (1978) presented his aforementioned thesis that society did not think of homosexuality as defining an inborn character trait until the nineteenth century. Judith Butler (1956–) coined the term performativity to describe how gender and sexual norms are acted out unconsciously to produce the impression of stable genders and sexualities. Other scholars, including Jack (formerly Judith) Halberstam (1961–) and David M. Halperin (1952–), have analyzed historical records and modern-day queer subcultures to show variability in how sexuality and gender are expressed. These scholars have demonstrated wide-ranging rates of homosexual and transsexual identity and behavior (suggesting a cultural role) and proposed theories as to how social norms affect LGBTQ+ experiences.

Modern Biological Theories and Evidence

As cultural models of homosexuality and transsexuality were popularized during the end of the twentieth century, so were new biological models of these identities. Simon LeVay’s (1943–) 1991 study of differences in brain matter between homosexual and heterosexual people constitutes some of the most polarizing research on homosexuality. In that study, LeVay found that a region of the hypothalamus known to play a role in sexual functioning may be dimorphic in terms of sex and sexuality: the volume of cells in this region is proportionally higher for women than men, except for gay men, whose volume is similar to that of women. Despite a small sample size and other methodological issues (e.g., most participants had died of AIDS, the study could not be replicated), this research garnered intense media attention as proof of a biological cause of homosexuality. A gay man himself, LeVay integrated his findings with other biological studies and argued that homosexuality is not a choice and that gay people should thus be granted equal rights. Although LeVay stopped short of calling LGBTQ+ people gender inverts, his work operates under the familiar assumption that homosexuality is caused by biological gender nonconformity.

Scientists from the late 1990s through the second decade of the twenty-first century folded LeVay’s findings into a broader theory of homosexuality, called the prenatal hormonal influence theory (Blanchard 2008). This theory argues that maternal hormones feminize gay men's brains before birth, thus producing homosexuality. Ray Blanchard (1945–) and Anthony F. Bogaert (1963–) were among a number of scientists in the late 1990s and the first years of the twenty-first century to show that gay men have more older brothers than straight men, called the fraternal birth order theory. This theory argues that successive gestation of male fetuses progressively builds up anti-male antibodies in the womb, thereby feminizing later-born boys. Prenatal hormones have also been used by scientists to explain higher rates of left-handedness and potentially longer index fingers among gay men because these phenomena are connected to testosterone exposure in utero. Although fraternal birth order and several other demographic characteristics are well founded, the prenatal hormone explanation for these phenomena has not been directly tested and is therefore speculative (Mustanski, Chivers, and Bailey 2002).

Similar to LeVay’s study, Dean H. Hamer (1951–) and colleagues’ 1993 study of the “gay gene” captured the imagination of laypeople and scientists alike. This study found a correlation between homosexuality and the Xq28 genetic marker, which has been interpreted to mean that there is a heritable, genetic component to homosexuality (i.e., a gene that makes you gay). Again mirroring LeVay’s study, Hamer and colleagues’ findings were based on a very small sample size (forty families with two gay brothers) and have not been replicated. Despite these limitations, the news media have embraced the concept of a gay gene and often regard it as a matter of fact. Although evidence for a single gay gene is not well supported by empirical research, there are a variety of findings and hypotheses that converge on the possibility of a genetic component to homosexuality. Large-scale genome-wide association studies of twins or other siblings have found multiple genes associated with homosexuality, suggesting a more complex genetic contribution to same-sex attraction (Sanders et al. 2017).

Because evolutionary theory dictates that only adaptive genetic traits will be passed down to future generations through natural selection, the authors of gay gene studies have speculated about the evolutionary origins of homosexuality (Kirkpatrick 2000). E. O. Wilson (1929–) originated the kinship theory of homosexuality, which argues that gay people improve the survivability of their relatives, thereby indirectly preserving their genes despite not producing children themselves. Research has consistently shown that homosexual men have more-fertile female relatives than heterosexual men, which supports the kinship theory. Gay men are also hypothesized to aid in the survival of their kin because they often express lower levels of aggression and higher levels of empathy, verbal reasoning, and intelligence; except for intelligence, these traits are culturally associated with femininity. These behavioral differences do not have an identifiable biological substrate (e.g., gay and straight men have similar levels of testosterone), so the presumption that gay men aid their kin’s survival as feminized males again shows a bias to assume gender inversion. Taken together, genetic research suggests a hereditary component to homosexuality derived from aiding familial fertility, but the tendency to regard homosexuality as caused by a gene that makes men gay by making them feminine is an unfounded conceptual leap and thus constitutes biological essentialism (Mustanski, Chivers, and Bailey 2002).

Since the turn of the twenty-first century, biological researchers have synthesized genetic and prenatal hormonal findings to argue for an epigenetic explanation for homosexuality. Epigenetics refers to a process whereby environmental factors moderate (i.e., turn off or on) gene expression. In the case of homosexuality, maternal hormones are hypothesized to cause expression of gay genes. As such, twin and other sibling studies have modeled the unique contribution of genetic factors and prenatal environmental factors to show the role that both play. Michael Balter's (1947–) 2015 article in Science is among the most prominent of the epigenetic studies. The most popular explanation for this interaction is that homosexuality is a latent possibility among many family lines that is expressed only when there is a surplus of men (i.e., older male siblings).

Animal studies have also been used to argue for a biological cause of homosexuality. Most notably, Bruce Bagemihl's (1962–) 1999 book Biological Exuberance reviews homosexual behavior among hundreds of animal species. Bagemihl's work identifies five types of homosexuality: courtship, affection, sex, pair-bonding, and parenting. Various animals can engage in any number of these forms of homosexuality, and they can range from single instances to long-term arrangements. Animal studies in general have been used as evidence of the biological role of sexual orientation and gender expression, but this research points to a different manifestation of homosexuality than biological models among humans. With few notable exceptions (e.g., sheep), homosexuality in animals occurs in isolated instances or along with heterosexual behavior. These findings thus suggest universal bisexuality or a latent potential for homosexuality that is activated only when necessary. So although these findings suggest a biological role in homosexuality, they undercut the gender inversion hypothesis that genes and hormones interact to produce exclusively homosexual creatures.

Culture and Politics

Biological essentialism and the “nature versus nurture” debate are largely Western constructions. Indigenous groups and other non-Westerners have attributed human behavior, including homosexuality and transsexuality, to spiritual phenomena (which are neither nature nor nurture) or simply did not speculate about causation. There are, however, ways in which beliefs about homosexuality and transsexuality in the West were affected by colonialism, and much of the modern nature or nurture debate references sexual identities and practices from non-Western regions.

Today, cross-cultural research deeply informs the nature versus nurture debate, in part by highlighting how same-sex sexual behavior can manifest outside of the ostensibly mainstream Western gay or lesbian identity model. Biological essentialism is also an unstated assumption that underlies policies and laws about homosexuality in some non-
Western countries, sometimes in complicated ways. For example, engaging in same-sex sexual acts is a capital crime in Iran. However, Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini (1902–1989), then the country’s leader, issued a fatwa in the 1980s that allowed people to legally receive gender reassignment surgery, with the rationale that some people are trapped in a body that does not match their true gender and this biological mistake should be able to be corrected. Although liberatory for trans people who want to undergo reassignment surgery, this combination of laws may also pressure other individuals to change their gender even in cases where this is not their desire.

Nature versus nurture debates about homosexuality and transsexuality have also profoundly shaped American LGBTQ+ social justice movements (Seidman 1993). The homophile movement of the 1950s and its most prominent organizations (e.g., the Daughters of Bilitis, the Mattachine Society) believed that homosexuality was caused by biological abnormalities that cause innate difference, but they advocated for disregarding this difference in order to assimilate gays and lesbians. The gay liberation and lesbian feminist movements of the 1970s pivoted from the homophile movement: they argued that gender and sexuality were cultural norms that oppress both straight and queer people. Proponents of gay liberation argued that dismantling gender roles and sexual taboos was the solution to ending discrimination against LGBTQ+ people.

In the 1980s the AIDS crisis generated a sense of urgency around queer rights, with organizations such as ACT UP and Queer Nation taking more militant approaches to activism (e.g., publicly outing closeted celebrities; Duggan 1992). This movement presented queer people as a homogenous minority group that is discriminated against for its inherent difference from the dominant group (sometimes called a racial or civil rights model of activism). The civil rights model of LGBTQ+ activism persists today, and although it does not necessarily attribute LGBTQ+ experience to biology, it is closely associated with the mainstream idea that queer people are “born this way” and trans people are “born in the wrong body.”

SEE ALSO ACT UP; Daughters of Bilitis; Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders (DSM); Ecology and Environmental Issues and Activism; Foucault, Influence of; Gay Liberation Front; Institut für Sexualwissenschaft; Kinsey Scale; Mattachine Society; Psychopathia Sexualis (1886; Richard von Krafft-Ebing); Situational Homosexuality; Third Genders

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Seidman, Steven. “Identity and Politics in a ‘Postmodern’ Gay Culture: Some Historical and

The black freedom movement was a social movement led by and for African Americans across the span of the twentieth century to obtain full human rights in the United States. Historians have traditionally pointed to the Montgomery Bus Boycott of 1955–1956 as the event that marked the start of the peak of this movement, also known as the civil rights movement. While the civil rights movement is acknowledged as the crowning era of the black freedom movement, black Americans and their allies fought against segregation and racial discrimination many years prior to 1955 using a wide variety of tactics, including but not limited to protests, boycotts, sit-ins, legal cases, and investigative journalism.

The Montgomery Bus Boycott marked a new era in the long trajectory of the black freedom movement because a shift in tactics and an upsurge in local community-driven movement building occurred. While such national organizations as the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) were still critical to the black freedom movement in the 1950s, local grassroots campaigns became a defining feature of the movement as well. In many ways, because of the legacy and historical impact of slavery and the subsequent rise of Jim Crowism, the US South was the center of the black freedom movement; however, black communities across the entire country participated, and local struggles outside the South proliferated. Historians have traditionally placed the end of the civil rights era during the second half of the 1960s, some pointing to the assassination of the Reverend Martin Luther King Jr. in 1968, and others marking the decline of the civil rights movement a few years earlier with the passage of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 and the Selma to Montgomery marches of that same year. However, the black freedom movement represents a longer struggle that extended well past the late 1960s, reaching into subsequent decades with the expansion of different strains of black politics and activism including but not limited to black nationalisms and black feminisms. Additionally, this movement also influenced the rise of such other movements as the second wave of the feminist movement and the gay rights movement. The historian Jacquelyn Dowd Hall (2005) coined the phrase “the long civil rights movement” to describe the political links between the African American civil rights movement and simultaneous and subsequent movements in the second half of the twentieth century.
Heterosexism in the Black Freedom Movement

Lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender, and gender-nonconforming individuals contributed significantly to the black freedom movement throughout its entire history; however, very few people were “out” in the movement before and during the civil rights era because of the dangers of the homophobia and transphobia that permeated the movement from the outside in. Additionally, the movement’s dependence on racial uplift ideology and the maintenance of respectability politics that idealized black identity in a heteronormative fashion reinforced heterosexism in the movement. For the most part, cis-male (people who were assigned male sex at birth and have a gender identity that matches normative notions of maleness—i.e., not transgender), patriarchal, charismatic leadership maintained a dominant presence in the movement, which in turn had a significant impact on the historical memory of it. This is true even though women and queer people played vital roles at both the local and national levels.

For most of the twentieth century, being open about nonnormative gender identities and sexualities could result in arrest and imprisonment in the United States. It was common for people to be arrested for acts of “indecency,” and queer spaces such as gay bars were highly surveilled by police. This was especially true during the pre-Stonewall era. In 1969 the Stonewall Inn, a gay-friendly bar in New York City, was raided by police. Fed up with profiling and police brutality, patrons, led by trans women of color, fought back. This became known as the Stonewall riots. Every state in the United States criminalized homosexuality during the era of the civil rights movement. Not only did LGBTQ individuals fear for their own safety, they rightfully feared that their identities would jeopardize the organizations they were a part of, the campaigns they worked on, and the movement as a whole. LGBTQ civil rights organizers and leaders struggled to keep their private lives private and were often manipulated, blackmailed, and threatened by other organizers and various entities of the state. The knowledge of their sexual identities was used against them and wielded as weapons against the legitimacy and progression of the movement. They were targeted by McCarthyism (an aggressive campaign against alleged communists in the US government and other institutions, named for its primary agitator, the Republican senator Joseph McCarthy) and COINTELPRO, the Federal Bureau of Investigation’s (FBI) Counter Intelligence Program.
Black Feminist and Civil Rights Leader Pauli Murray. Murray was one of the founders of the Congress of Racial Equality in 1941 and challenged segregation both directly and in her writings. Attracted to feminine women and often dressing like a man, Murray refused to label herself as homosexual and struggled to define her gender identity.

Pre-Stonewall LGBTQ Civil Rights Leaders

While there were certainly numerous LGBTQ organizers and leaders in the pre-Stonewall era, not many were open about their sexuality or nonnormative gender identities. Additionally, for many decades the language to describe nonheteronormative, nonbinary, and transgender identities did not exist, often leaving individuals struggling to grasp for an understanding of who they were and how to exist in a world that did not affirm their identities. Pauli Murray, Bayard Rustin, and James Baldwin are all examples of LGBTQ individuals involved in the struggle for black freedom before the Stonewall riots of 1969.

Pauli Murray

Pauli Murray (1910–1985) was a black feminist author, Episcopal priest, civil rights leader, and attorney from Durham, North Carolina. Murray struggled to define her sexual and gender identity for many years, and throughout the 1930s and 1940s committed herself to institutions and underwent treatment to address the bouts of intense depression she experienced stemming from confusion around her identity. Murray refused to describe herself as homosexual, though she was attracted to feminine women. She desired a monogamous heterosexual relationship and preferred to take on the normative gender roles and appearance of a cis man. Lacking the language to describe the possibility of a transgender identity, Murray consigned herself to identifying as a woman. At times she dressed as a man and was once arrested for posing as a man while attempting to desegregate a public bus in Petersburg, Virginia. This arrest, which occurred in 1940, was not the first or last time Murray directly challenged segregation.

Beginning in 1938, Murray attempted to gain admission to the all-white University of North Carolina. Her case was supported by the NAACP and received national attention, though ultimately she was not admitted on account of race. In 1941 Murray entered historically black Howard University to study law. Murray was the only woman-identified person in the law program at the time (the only other woman-identified person having dropped out) and frequently experienced gender discrimination, an experience from which she coined the term Jane Crow. At Howard, Murray endured sexist jokes, she was excluded from class discussions and the campus legal fraternity, and her masculine gender performance was rejected. In many ways, Murray did not meet the definition of the ideal woman in civil rights circles, including Howard Law School. However, this experience did not defeat Murray. She, along with Rustin, James Farmer, and George Houser founded the Congress of Racial Equality in 1942 and adopted the strategy of nonviolent civil disobedience that Mahatma Gandhi used against British colonialism in India.

When Murray graduated in 1944, she applied to Harvard University for graduate study but was rejected because of her gender. After this rejection Murray earned a master’s degree from the University of California, Berkeley, School of Law. In 1965 she became the first African American to earn a doctor of juridical science degree from Yale University. In 1951 she published the book States’ Laws on Race and Color, which became a major asset to civil rights lawyers in years to come. Like many of her comrades, queer or otherwise, starting in the early 1950s Murray was the target of McCarthyism because of her political ties to civil rights organizations and her personal politics.

In 1956 Murray published a biographical account of her family’s experience with white supremacy called Proud Shoes: The Story of an American Family. In 1961 Murray was appointed by John F. Kennedy to the Civil and Political Rights Committee of the President’s Commission on the Status of Women. During the 1960s, although Murray was included in the male-dominated circles of national civil rights leadership at times, she agreed with such women as Ella Baker who were critical of the form of leadership that cisgender, mostly heterosexual men embodied in their approach to political movement building, and she was especially disturbed by the fact that black women, though they were conducting a critical amount of labor at the grassroots level, did not hold national leadership positions. She continued to advocate for black women and feminist causes after the peak of the civil rights movement. In 1977 Murray became the first African American woman to become an Episcopal priest. Before she died of cancer in 1985, she wrote an autobiography, Song in a Weary Throat: An American Pilgrimage. This work was published posthumously two years later.
Bayard Rustin A contemporary of Murray, Bayard Rustin (1912–1987) was perhaps the best-known openly gay organizer of the modern civil rights movement. He was raised in a Quaker home in West Chester, Pennsylvania. His family was political and involved in civil rights causes. He attended Wilberforce University, Cheyney Training School for Teachers (now known as Cheyney University of Pennsylvania), and City College of New York. Rustin was a controversial figure during his lifetime because of his sexuality and his politics. In the 1930s Rustin was a member of the Young Communist League. He also refused to fight in World War II (1939–1945) after the bombing of Pearl Harbor. He was surveilled by the FBI and arrested by various local police forces throughout his lifetime.

Although Rustin's contemporaries in the civil rights movement often defended him when he was attacked for his political beliefs, they did not defend him when he was targeted for his sexuality. His sexuality was seen as a liability for the movement, especially under the surveillance of McCarthyism. Rustin was arrested for public lewdness in the 1950s. Conservatives used this arrest and other stains on his criminal record in an attempt to sully the reputation of the black freedom movement.

Rustin is perhaps best known for his position as deputy director for the March on Washington for Jobs and Freedom in 1963, but his political work stretched back several decades. He was a founding member of the Congress of Racial Equality and the Fellowship of Reconciliation, and he studied nonviolence in India. In 1947 Rustin organized the Journey of Reconciliation, which was later used as a model for the Freedom Rides of 1961. As result of the Journey of Reconciliation, Rustin was arrested and sentenced to nearly a month on a chain gang. Rustin was also a trusted mentor to Martin Luther King Jr. and Coretta Scott King. He was highly influential in the movement at the national level and was a conduit through which nonviolence became a major tactic for challenging segregation in the United States. After the height of the civil rights movement, Rustin shifted his energies and used his political expertise for other causes. In the 1970s and 1980s he advocated on behalf of LGBTQ rights in the state of New York and beyond. He died in 1987 at age seventy-five.
James Baldwin James Baldwin (1924–1987) was a prolific gay African American writer and public intellectual who was active in the black freedom movement. Baldwin grew up in Harlem, New York. By age twenty-four he had grown so tired of American racism that he moved to Paris, France, living much of the rest of his life outside the United States. His experiences abroad in such countries as France, Turkey, and Switzerland, as well as in various parts of Africa, had an impact on his writing. In Paris, Baldwin was involved in the cultural movement of the Left Bank. Drawing on his personal experiences, several of his works not only illuminate the black experience in the United States for readers but also focus on the experiences of gay and bisexual men. Although its characters were predominantly white, his second novel, Giovanni’s Room (1956), focused on queer men many years before the gay liberation movement unfolded. By the early 1960s Baldwin was world renowned for his writing. His essay “Down at the Cross” was published first in the New Yorker in 1962 and then as one of two lengthy essays in the 1963 book The Fire Next Time. In this essay, which was awarded the George Polk Memorial Award, Baldwin discussed the role of Christianity in American society and its impact on the history of black Americans.

Also in 1963, Baldwin became more of a public face in the civil rights movement both nationally and internationally. He led a demonstration in Paris in August of that year and participated in the March on Washington for Jobs and Freedom. He also went on a speaking tour of the US South in 1963, speaking on the state of the black freedom movement and the black experience in the United States. Throughout the 1960s, he made numerous television appearances and spoke frequently on college campuses to packed rooms of eager listeners. Baldwin maintained friendships with many celebrities, artists, and activists, black and white, who were allied with the black freedom movement. He was a friend to the activists Medgar Evers, Malcolm X, and Martin Luther King Jr., all of whom were assassinated. First published in 1972, his book-length essay No Name in the Street discusses the impact of losing comrades to assassination among other subjects related to his experiences in the late 1960s and early 1970s. When Baldwin died in 1987, he had yet to finish Remember This House, a memoir of the civil rights movement that reflected on the lives and assassinations of his three slain friends in the movement. This unfinished manuscript was the basis for the 2016 film I Am Not Your Negro, a documentary by the Haitian filmmaker Raoul Peck.

The Black Freedom Movement in the Post-Stonewall Era

Toward the end of the 1960s the black freedom movement underwent significant political shifts as civil rights gave way to Black Power. Several new political formations grew out of and were influenced by the major tactics, events, experiences, organizations, and campaigns of the civil rights era. Black Power, accompanied by various formations of black nationalism and black feminism, was on the rise by the late 1960s. The mainstream second-wave feminist movement and the gay liberation movement were influenced by the black freedom movement as well. Many individuals who participated in feminist and gay liberation circles gained experience in building political movements through participating in the black freedom movement during the civil rights era and through allying themselves with Black Power organizations.

Black Power and Gay Liberation Black Power rhetoric is often characterized as hypermasculine in popular culture and academic scholarship. Just like civil rights, Black Power and black nationalism were steeped in normative gender roles and traditional notions of sexuality. In many ways Black Power organizations inherited the heterosexism of the civil rights era, although some Black Power leaders saw queerness as an oppressed identity and advocated for an alliance between the gay liberation movement and the Black Power movement. In the Bay Area of California, the gay liberation movement and the Black Panther Party (BPP) developed an alliance around police brutality in particular. Huey P. Newton, a cofounder of the BPP, gave a speech in 1970 advocating for a revolutionary alliance between the movements of Black Power, gay liberation, and women's liberation. Though steeped in masculinity, the BPP was one of the only national black organizations during the era to place numerous women in leadership positions and to speak out in support of gay liberation.
Still, there was much tension between some Black Power activists and gay liberation organizations. In 1969 New York's Gay Liberation Front (GLF) split apart over the question of how, if at all, to support the BPP and whether it was important to ally the gay rights movement with organizations not focused solely on gay liberation. When the GLF made the decision to support the BPP, some members left the organization as a result. By the early 1980s, there were still tensions between the two movements. In 1981, at the historic First National Plenary Conference on Self-Determination, factions of the black liberation movement determined that it was not in their best interest to support gay liberation, gay leadership within their movement, or support queerness as “correct practice” (Clarke 1999, 31).

Black Feminism and Sexuality Prior to this, during the late 1960s and early 1970s, black feminist activists and intellectuals began to form collectives and organizations that addressed the numerous kinds of oppression they experienced as both African Americans and as women. Many individuals who founded or joined black feminist organizations brought political organizing experience from the civil rights, Black Power, and feminist movements. They often incorporated the structural analysis and the rights- and identity-based politics of these movements into their new political formations and organizational foci. Additionally, because they experienced sexism in the civil rights and Black Power movements and racism in the feminist movement, black feminists formed the National Black Feminist Organization in 1973, the Combahee River Collective in 1974, and the National Alliance of Black Feminists in 1976. Beyond sexism and racism, numerous black women who were a part of these organizations also expressed frustration with the heterosexism and classism they experienced in black organizations and women's organizations. As a result, black feminists often articulated a political stance that was pro-LGBTQ and challenged capitalism. The Combahee River Collective published a statement in 1977 that articulated how radical black feminists understood their own oppression as multifaceted. The collective’s political lens was anti-capitalist, feminist, anti-racist, and LGBTQ affirming:

```
The most general statement of our politics at the present time would be that we are actively committed to struggling against racial, sexual, heterosexual, and class oppression, and see as our particular task the development of integrated analysis and practice based upon the fact that the major systems of oppression are interlocking. The synthesis of these oppressions creates the conditions of our lives.

```
The structural analysis of black feminists in the Combahee River Collective statement represents, to that point in history, one of the most comprehensive intersectional political stances of the era. Black feminist politics as articulated and practiced in the 1970s made an indelible mark on numerous radical black organizations and activism in the decades to come. Currently, several national organizations that are part of the Movement for Black Lives coalition claim a radical queer black feminist political lens. Examples include the Black Youth Project 100 and Black Lives Matter, two organizations founded and led by queer black women and youth.

SEE ALSO Combahee River Collective; Harlem Renaissance; Human Rights Campaign

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Gaines, Kevin K. Uplifting the Race: Black Leadership, Politics, and Culture in the Twentieth

FILMOGRAPHY

Extortion and blackmail have been the constant accompaniment of laws that ban same-sex sexual acts probably since such laws were first invented. However, the true golden age of blackmail really began only in eighteenth-century Europe when same-sex acts and desires began to be seen as a distinct area of criminal law. Although laws against “sodomy” (which could at various times include all sorts of sexual acts) date back to the ancient world, it was not until the thirteenth century that similar laws were enacted by civil authorities in western Europe. Even then these laws were very infrequently enforced, if at all. The wider impact of these laws was also diluted by the fact that in Europe and many other places sex between men was often considered unexceptional as long as it accorded with important social hierarchies and the “active,” or insertive, partner was of a higher social status than the “passive,” or receptive, one. Sex between women was widely regarded as implausible and hence was hardly ever criminalized.

The key alteration in the law came about in England, when sexual acts between men were included in criminal rather than ecclesiastical laws against the wider category of sodomy (which also included sex with animals). The first antisodomy statute making such acts capital crimes was passed by Henry VIII of England (1491–1547) in 1533 as part of his expansion of state authority; before that, church courts had jurisdiction over sodomy. Even then, the enforcement of these laws was uneven, and they were applied with any force only in northern Europe after 1700, especially in England and the Netherlands; the latter made sodomy punishable by death in 1730. Over the course of the nineteenth century, most western European countries adopted laws against public indecency that were used against same-sex behavior. The early English laws later became the basis of most antisodomy statutes in force in the United States, as well as in the British Empire and the countries that grew out of it following decolonization, many of which retained the original statutes and still did as of 2017.

In northern Europe in the eighteenth century it was gradually agreed that enforcing morality should be a key duty of the state. As a result, increasing numbers of criminal trials drew attention to the existence of “sodomites,” who it was increasingly possible to see as a distinct type of individual. It was not long before conspiracies to extort or blackmail under the accusation of sodomy were made public. One of the first alleged cases that is known involved the trial of the Earl of Castlehaven for sodomy and rape in 1631. As a contemporary ballad put it, the earl testified that “he did it not / but conceived it a plot / to take away him and his life” (quoted in Herrup 1999, 164). The earl’s case was an isolated one until the eighteenth century, and it was only then that the rising numbers of prosecutions in England for all kinds of same-sex acts and circumstances, along with the accompanying antisodomy rhetoric of moral reformers, provided blackmailers with their first serious opportunities. One the first cases to be prosecuted was that of Thomas Vaughan and Thomas Davis, convicted of conspiring with two other men in 1707 in an attempt to extort money from two men under the charge of sodomy. Vaughan was said to have made a similar accusation eight years previously (Compleat Collection 1718–1721).

Blackmail in City Street Cultures

Blackmail has flourished in cities. By the 1780s extortionists in London were often said to belong to gangs who made their living in this way. The crowds that cities attracted, not to mention the critical mass of people looking for sexual opportunities of all kinds on the city’s streets, provided an ideal context in which accusations of impropriety could be made. In 1843 it was reported by a magistrate that a man named Long, who belonged to “a gang of an infamous character,” had “for about 15 years” earned his living in this way (quoted in Cocks 2003, 131). Certain places such as parks, streets, and urinals in the center of London had by that time become notorious sites of both sexual exploration and peril. In England blackmail of this kind even had a name: the “bounce” or the “common bounce”—the latter to distinguish its same-sex variety from more ordinary kinds of extortion. Anonymous threatening letters were also the frequent instrument of Victorian blackmailers (Davitt 1885; Cocks 2003).

The changing status of blackmail was signaled by the fact that between about 1780 and 1840 it became a distinct offense defined with increasing clarity in English law. Extortion under threats to accuse someone of a same-sex act was singled out from other forms of robbery with violence. The courts decided that a threat to character and reputation constituted a form of violence in itself, even if physical violence had not accompanied the threats. Statute law followed the courts, and in 1827 the British Parliament defined threats to accuse someone of a “sodomitic” act as a specific crime, whereas in 1838 such offenses were included in English criminal statistics for the first time. Although countries that operated under the civil code introduced by the French emperor Napoleon (1769–1821) did not specifically criminalize homosexual acts, instead classifying them as forms of public indecency, blackmail also occurred in these states.

Most European cities in the twentieth century contained street cultures involving sex between men. These were mainly populated by young unmarried men who did not lay claim to a “homosexual” sexual identity but saw sex with other men as part of the usual life course. Just as in the nineteenth century, assignations took place in streets, parks, cafés, urinals, and pubs, as well as increasingly in places of commercial leisure such as cinemas or steam baths. These cultures were often structured by age and class, and the relations that emerged frequently had the ostensible character of a transaction. This is indicated by the term rough trade, which was used in English street slang to refer to working-class men who might be sexually available. In these cultures, any encounter between men of different classes was customarily accompanied by some form of exchange—if not actual cash, then a drink or a meal or some other offering in kind. In such circumstances, it often became difficult to distinguish these formalized transactions from others that involved a degree of menace. Exerting pressure on one’s upper- or middle-class suitor for money or gifts, known as “tapping,” was part of the business of trade and reflected the harsh economic realities of the interwar period. Some historians have argued that in these circumstances, informal blackmail (sometimes called “poof rorting” in English interwar street slang) was an opportunistic response to the evident inequalities of “trade.”

Although the press, from the nineteenth century onward, tended to see homosexual blackmail as the business of organized criminal gangs, or to focus on individual cases in which large sums were handed over, the reality was much less systematic. It is often argued that the implied bargain, menaces, or even violence that went with many same-sex encounters should be seen not as some “homophobic” response but as an inherent aspect of these street cultures, part of a “continuum” that began with intimacy or sex and that could end in blackmail, theft, or assault (Houlbrook 2005). This is a productive way of looking at blackmail as it focuses not on the sinister threatening figure lurking in the shadows portrayed in such classic films as the English filmmaker Basil Dearden’s drama Victim (1961) but on those involved in the various forms of queer culture themselves.

Blackmail in Politics and Government

Blackmail has also had a wider significance, especially in Cold War politics, and is not merely confined to informal transactions on city streets. In the United States in the 1950s, fear of the security implications of homosexuality, in particular the potential susceptibility of homosexual men and women to blackmail, was one of the many motivations behind the “lavender scare” that resulted in the dismissal of thousands of men and women from government service. As part of the McCarthyite witch hunts against communism, homosexual men and women were suspected of a loyalty to some secretive group or ideal that might be more binding than love of country. As a consequence, a series of purges took place, especially in the State Department, that aimed to remove this potential security threat (Johnson 2004). These fears were heightened by the revelation in 1956 of the defection to the Soviet Union five years earlier of two British MI6 operatives, Guy Burgess and Donald Maclean, the former of whom was homosexual. A third, Kim Philby, followed in 1963, while a fourth, Anthony Blunt (also gay), remained discreetly hidden in government service until the 1980s as Queen Elizabeth II’s official art expert. The gay honey trap used by the Russians to ensnare the lowlevel UK government clerk John Vassall in the mid-1950s and his arrest in 1962 merely completed the picture.

Later attempts to defuse this problem often seemed to make it worse. The US government’s “don’t ask, don’t tell” policy, which was in effect from early 1994 until 2011, aimed to get around previous bans on gays and lesbians serving in the military by removing any requirement to state their sexual allegiance. Nevertheless, homosexuality was still regarded with suspicion by military authorities and could be a cause of dismissal from military service. The policy therefore led to anxieties that it enhanced the possibilities for blackmail. While there are no statistics on such cases, there are anecdotal reports. J. D. Smith, formerly of the US Air Force, revealed in a 2011 article, just before the repeal of “don’t ask, don’t tell,” that he had been blackmailed by an instructor. Smith subsequently helped establish OutServe (now OutServe-SLDN) to support gays and lesbians in the military.
Surge in Blackmail outside the West

Homosexual blackmail in Europe and North America has declined with the repeal, from the 1950s onward, of laws against male homosexuality. Blackmail has surged, however, in those countries (seventy-three or more) that still have antigay laws and a strongly (albeit sporadically) homophobic press. Many of these states inherited English antisodomy laws from their imperial pasts but have often added to them, although most have only very recently begun to enforce such laws with any vigor. The story of blackmail in some African, Asian, and Middle Eastern countries is complicated by the fact that many of these regions have their own traditions of same-sex behavior that cannot be subsumed by Western models of sexual identity. The global spread of gay rights has encouraged some men and women in these countries to adopt Western models of “out” gayness, and it is often this open, legitimizing feature of homoeroticism that is regarded as new and problematic. The consequences of these developments—alongside the continuing existence of antisodomy laws, an antipathetic public opinion, and a hostile press—have created ideal conditions for blackmail.

The ease and anonymity of encounters made on social media have facilitated extortion, as has the fact that many such sites are often used by married men or by those who do not identify as gay in the Western sense. In Kenya, for instance, the National Gay and Lesbian Human Rights Commission reported in 2015 that blackmailers have used social media to entrap men and film same-sex encounters, leading to threats that the footage would be sent to wives or employers. Another tactic was robbery or forcing the victim to an ATM to hand over money. Even the police were not immune from such accusations (Langat and Kushner 2015). Another new factor is blackmail against women seeking sex with other women. Female same-sex activity has historically tended to not lead to such accusations, mainly because same-sex acts between women have rarely been illegal. According to a 2011 report by Ryan Richard Thoreson, women in Nigeria have faced “threats from family, friends, lovers, and the people in their schools and workplaces.” Among other instances, the report shows that blackmail has even descended into the school system and sets out the case of five high school students who were blackmailed by classmates for same-sex activity.

Blackmail cases have been closely associated with the enforcement or declaration of antigay laws. In India in 2014, after the Supreme Court upheld the imperial antisodomy law set out in Section 377 of the criminal code, gay websites such as Grindr and PlanetRomeo, as well as Facebook and WhatsApp, were used by criminals to extort money from those seeking same-sex encounters (Phadke 2014). Digital technology has facilitated what is sometimes called “sextortion” on a much wider scale, often across national boundaries. In a village in the Philippines, Maria Caparas, “the Queen of Sextortion,” tricked hundreds of people across the world into performing sexual acts on camera, the footage of which was then used to blackmail them (Parry 2017). Cases of Palestinians seeking same-sex encounters being blackmailed by the Israeli security services have also been reported.

Governments that decry same-sex activity or legislate against it frequently encourage a wider climate of extortion. Debate over the notorious Ugandan anti-homosexuality bill (introduced in 2009) that aimed to imprison those men and women guilty of homosexual offenses for between seven years and life, and even to introduce the death penalty in some circumstances, was accompanied by a wave of homophobic press and harassment that led to the violent death of the prominent gay activist David Kato (1964–2011) at the hands of an assailant (Okeowo 2012). Enacted in early 2014, the Ugandan law was struck down by the country’s Constitutional Court later that year. Similarly, the 2013 Russian law outlawing “gay propaganda” has been accompanied by reports of widespread extortion and harassment (Silchenko and Titova 2016). These were often associated with criminal gangs working through dating sites. Recorded cases follow the pattern often repeated in African countries of setting up dates and then ambushing the partners in a flat before claiming that their associate was under age. This is then followed by threats to call the police or release a secretly filmed video. The Russian activist group Vykhod (Coming Out) recorded twelve similar attacks in Saint Petersburg in 2015 (Silchenko and Titova 2016). Since 2010 persecutions of those seeking same-sex encounters in the Caucasus have equally widened harassment, extortion, and blackmail. In Dagestan, it has even been reported that gay men have been blackmailed into the service of the security forces, apparently a long-standing Soviet practice (Patin 2017).

Blackmail and persecution in these places can be seen as an instrument of the nationalist state in response to supposed “Western” incursions and modes of identity. In the history of blackmail, it should be remembered that this is a problem directed not only against self-identified gay, lesbian, transgender, or other queer individuals but against all those seeking same-sex encounters.

SEE ALSO The Closet; Cruising and Cruising Grounds; The Gay International and Mideast LGBTQI Organizations; Homonationalism in Africa; Lavender Scare; Military Law and Policy in the United States; Treason and Queerness; The Wolfenden Report

BIBLIOGRAPHY

The Body Politic

CATHARINE JEAN NASH
Professor of Geography
Brock University, Canada

The Body Politic (TBP) was a gay liberation magazine published in Toronto, Canada, between 1971 and 1987. Considered to be groundbreaking in both its content and approach to LGBT issues, TBP was available in cities across Canada and Europe and as far away as New Zealand and Australia. TBP played a pivotal role in the evolution of the gay and lesbian liberation and human rights movements both in Toronto and across Canada through its coverage of political debates, its reporting on academic research on homosexuality, and its listing of LGBT social activities, along with coverage of arts and culture. TBP not only documented the numerous challenges facing lesbians and gays over the course of its existence but also actively shaped the gay and lesbian movements' political, legal, and ideological responses to mainstream challenges (Jackman 2011). For many, TBP was “essentially the first real voice for queer people across Canada” and acted as a central clearinghouse for information on LGBT issues and as a communications center connecting LGBT communities (Knegt 2016). TBP also had the foresight to actively archive its own materials and to collect information on other organizations and individuals. This contributed to the formation of what became the Canadian Lesbian and Gay Archives (CLGA) on Isabella Street in Toronto, one of the largest lesbian and gay archives in the world and an invaluable resource for scholars doing research in LGBT history and activism in Canada (CLGA 2017).

Homosexuality was partially decriminalized in Canada in 1969, reflecting the ongoing and substantial political and social transformations already underway around gay and lesbian issues when TBP was established. This shift in legal status opened the way for the formation of a number of gay and lesbian organizations, including the Community Homophile Association of Toronto (CHAT) and Toronto Gay Action (TGA). As noted by collective member Michael Riordan, the TBP editorial collective was “born in the wild heat and ferment of Canada’s first gay upheavals” (quoted in Knegt 2016). It included TGA members and other local activists, including Gerald Hannon, Tim McCaskell, and Jerry Moldenhauer. Several of the original collective members were actively involved in Toronto’s counterculture movements, writing for the alternative paper the Guerilla. Dissatisfaction with the marginalization of issues related to sexuality in the Guerilla...
spurred calls for a publication keying on questions of sexual orientation and identity, discrimination and inequalities, and the need for community formation (Churchill 2003). The collective hashed out editorial decisions at weekly meetings marked by spirited and sometimes vitriolic debates around particular topics or themes. Distributing each edition was labor intensive and time consuming prior to desktop publishing. TBP was initially sold on local street corners and in bars in Toronto, although the paper developed a substantial mailing list over its lifetime (Jackman 2011).

As noted by Michael Connors Jackman in his 2011 history of The Body Politic, TBP “brought together a network of sex radicals who documented, celebrated and critiqued the arrival of the new world of gay life in urban centres throughout much of North America and Europe.” The November 1971 inaugural issue elaborated TBP's goals in an article titled “We Demand,” a manifesto previously presented to the federal government in Ottawa setting out the long-range goals for the nascent Canadian gay and lesbian movement. It detailed the central concerns for gays and lesbians in Canada, including the removal of certain criminal code provisions, such as “gross indecency” and “indecent act,” that were often deployed against homosexuals. Amendments were needed to immigration and divorce laws, which often discriminated against gays and lesbians, and there were broader calls for legislated human rights protections for gays and lesbians in both federal and provincial human rights codes (Nash 2005). Many collective members were university educated, thereby bringing a critical analytic to the magazine’s content and writing style. It was not uncommon for some articles to draw on the works of Karl Marx, Herbert Marcuse, or Michel Foucault or to highlight the contemporary scholarship of academics such as Gayle Rubin (Churchill 2003). As Steven Maynard argues, a visit by Foucault to Toronto in 1982, together with the publication of Foucault’s History of Sexuality, sparked a fierce debate between some collective members about the deficiencies in “existing left sexual history and the mainstream gay movement’s lack of radical theory” (2016, 124). In the early years of TBP, the collective struggled to articulate a distinctive “gay-left politics” together with the production of theory—efforts that arguably disappeared with the advent of queer theory and its rejection by activists as just so much impenetrable jargon (Maynard 2016).

In the same period, the magazine also exhibited a more liberationist ideology calling for the freeing of all individuals, both heterosexual and homosexual, from oppressive sexual (and gendered) regimes (Nash 2005). The magazine encouraged gays and lesbians to come out to family and friends, as well as publicly, and to become politically active in challenging social and political constraints on sexual and gendered expression. Sexual-political analysis focused on, among other issues, the formation and acceptance of homosexual identities by the mainstream community and on challenging the heterosexual and normative constraints embedded in Canadian political, social, religious, and legal institutions (Jackman 2011). Such a politic would gradually be eclipsed, in the early 1980s, by a human rights activism focused on obtaining equal rights for gays and lesbians, grounded in a politics of identity and difference and requiring protections in employment and housing, open service in the military, and same-sex marriage (which was implemented nationwide in Canada in 2005) (Nash 2005).

Controversies

TBP became an important and very public forum for airing debates relevant to the gay and lesbian community not only in Toronto but across Canada. Many articles touched on (and generated) hot-button issues that shaped perceptions about Toronto’s gay and lesbian community. As its presence and reputation grew, the paper was increasingly considered the leading informational resource for both the mainstream press and the general public about the LGBT community. TBP was the primary source of information on the latest medical or scientific research on homosexuality (including book reviews) and on resources and services related to the HIV/AIDS crisis in the early 1980s. TBP often shaped the debates around controversial issues, such as the political and social response to the bathhouse raids by Toronto police in 1981, the 1977 murder of twelve-year-old Emanuel Jaques, and the 1978 protests against a visit to Toronto by the antigay Christian celebrity activist Anita Bryant.

As an intentionally provocative publication, whose articles often galvanized sometimes polarizing debate within the LGBT community, TBP also attracted the attention of the police and municipal officials. In August 1972 the paper published an article by Gerald Hannon titled “Of Men and Little Boys” suggesting the potential “benefits” of sexual relationships between adult men and minors (Bradburn 2015). Many in the local LGBT community were appalled, and the article garnered considerable mainstream attention as proof that the decriminalization of homosexuality in 1969 posed a serious threat to children. Both the Toronto Star, the largest local newspaper, and the Globe and Mail, Canada’s largest national newspaper, ran articles condemning TBP. The Globe claimed that the federal government was inadvertently supporting pedophilia through its funding of a related homosexual drop-in and distress center run by CHAT. CHAT, a more socially conservative organization, distanced itself from TBP by highlighting the political and social differences within Toronto’s gay and lesbian community. The article prompted a police investigation, although no charges resulted.

In December 1977 TBP published another controversial article by Hannon titled “Men Loving Boys Loving Men,” an arguably ill-timed piece given the sexual assault and murder of Jaques in July of that year by several men with distant ties to the LGBT community. The article focused on the experiences of three men who had relationships with underage boys. Mainstream backlash was swift and predictable, as local journalists claimed the article provided proof of the pedophilic inclinations of gay men. TBP’s offices were raided by the Toronto police department’s “pornography squad,” which seized substantial material, some of which was unrelated to the contentious article. The removal of documents, including mailing lists and account information, prompted some to argue that the raid was designed to undermine the magazine's ability to publish and to intimidate those who wrote for or received copies of the paper (Bradburn 2015; Jackman 2011). This time, charges were laid against collective members Hannon, Ken Popert, and Ed Jackson for using the mail to distribute “immoral, indecent or scurrilous” material. Despite the negative publicity, many rallied around the publication, including John Sewell, the mayor of Toronto, and the local activist June Callwood. After a series of trials and appeals, the matter was finally dropped in the fall of 1983. These events are emblematic of a slew of public battles over TBP’s publication of various advertisements, classified ads, cartoons, and stark descriptions of cruising practices and public sex.

Given its prominence in the gay and lesbian political, social, and cultural issues of the day, TBP has achieved almost mythical status in the annals of gay male and, to a lesser extent, lesbian history in Canada. And there is little doubt that understanding its influence is pivotal to understanding the formulation of LGBT and queer life in Canada. Yet, as Marc Stein (2014) points out, what might be known about gay history is often driven by what is deemed worthy of saving in an archive. Arguably, it is the seemingly more respectable and predominantly white, male, and middle-class periodicals that are preserved (and lionized) rather than publications related to or for lesbians or people of color (Vigiletti 2015) or more sexually explicit magazines and newsletters (Stein 2014). TBP, by having the foresight to preserve its own materials through the creation of an archive, ensured its prominence as the gay periodical of record for Canadian LGBT political and social activism.

While TBP members might be accused of ignoring questions of race and class in favor of a dogged focus on sexuality and sexual identity, there is some suggestion that the collective did struggle to consider the intersection of sexuality with questions of racism, class positioning, and social justice. Collective members, such as McCaskell, argued that questions of race and class were not much of an issue given the centrality of sexuality as the site of discrimination at the time (Jackman 2011). Nevertheless, questions about race and sexuality emerged in April 1985 after the publication of what has become known as the “houseboy” ad, a classified advertisement published two months earlier. The advertisement read “Black Male Wanted: Handsome, successful GWM [gay white male] would like young, well-built BM [black male] for houseboy.” The decision to publish the advertisement came after considerable debate between collective members, and its publication “revealed contrasting political visions, differing sensibilities, and deep divisions” within the collective (Churchill 2003, 114). It also drove debate in the larger lesbian and gay community about sexuality, desire, and race. In an effort to address the divisiveness generated by the advertisement’s publication, TBP organized a meeting with Zami (the first Canadian group for black and West Indian gays and lesbians; Brown Canada 2017) and Gay Asians of Toronto. Discussions about the intersection of race and sexuality ordered themselves along a continuum from claims about the centrality of sexuality as a universal experience (in which racialized desires played a part) and the essentialist nature of desire to claims about culturally entrenched racism exacerbated by cultural and social attitudes (such as those demonstrated by the advertisement). Never satisfactorily resolved, the incident demonstrated that while TBP understood itself as reaching out to a broadly based gay and lesbian community, many felt excluded by their limited visibility in its pages.

Assessing the Legacy of TBP

The gay and lesbian press in North America, Europe, Australia, and New Zealand played a critical role in the formation of gay and lesbian identities, politics, and communities from the late 1960s into the second decade of the twenty-first century (Baim 2012). Young people and those new to “the life” drew inspiration from the pages of LGBT periodicals and magazines (Streitmatter 1995). Magazines such as TBP undoubtedly played a central role in the Toronto and Canadian context in constituting recognizable homosexual identities understood as belonging to a recognizable community and in generating debates around key gay and lesbian issues (Cover 2005).

Nevertheless, contemporary scholarship, while recognizing the invaluable contributions of the early gay press for individuals, communities, and the political movement, is also quite critical of both the positive and negative impacts of the press’s activities. This includes critiques of such publications' Western-centric and gay white male focus, the press’s influence on the commodification of LGBT neighborhoods, and how, through their selective archival activities, they have excluded the voices of marginal groups (e.g., women, people of color, trans people) from the histories and geographies of gay and lesbian communities.

By the 1990s the gay press was a global phenomenon spreading Global North conceptualizations of sexual and gendered life across the world. Scholarly works published in the second decade of the twenty-first century have examined how the gay and lesbian press in the United States in the late 1950s and early 1960s portrayed the lives of gays and lesbians in eastern European, Latin American, Caribbean, Middle Eastern, and African countries often in paradoxical ways. Some writers used the existence of LGBT people in other countries as evidence that gays and lesbians existed “everywhere” throughout history and even in “primitive” countries (Serykh 2017). Alternatively, some exotic locales were portrayed as more sexually liberated, often reflecting certain more colonialist discourses about the freedom of “native” moralities around sexuality (Gleibman 2017). Yet, despite the obviously problematic nature of these claims, these publications also served to develop a transnational homosexual and/or queer political network and a sense of shared community that underpins modern LGBT activism worldwide (Milo 2017). Certainly, TBP was an early precursor of this global influence given the largely informal circulation of TBP in Europe, Australia, and New Zealand.

Historically, the gay press, including TBP, covered issues relevant to the entire community, although in hindsight it is fair to say that thematically most of the content appealed to largely white, middle-class, and, in the case of TBP, university-educated gay men. Certainly, lesbians participated in the production of TBP and contributed articles and editorials to the publication, most notably Chris Bearchell, but the relationship between gay men and lesbians on the collective was often fraught (Jackman 2011).

Coupled with this critique is the argument that much of the gay press, while initially giving voice to a minority group seeking radical political and social change, was transformed because of growing corporate sponsorship and advertising revenues. In catering to these corporate and advertising interests, the gay press contributed to a reworking of the queer community and related spaces into marketable consumer identities and places (Fejes and Lennon 2000). While TBP might evade much of this critique with its demise in 1987, its successor, Xtra, certainly played a central role in this phenomenon in Toronto.

Finally, although wide ranging and keenly focused, TBP has been criticized almost from the outset for its primary focus on the interests and concerns of white, middle-class gay men to the exclusion of minority groups and women. Matters came to a head in the spring of 2016 when several events were held in Toronto to celebrate the forty-fifth anniversary of TBP. Two particular events are of note. The first is the opening in May 2016 of a play by Nick Green called Body Politic, at Buddies in Bad Times Theatre in downtown Toronto. The play's intent was to celebrate the inception and important historical role of TBP in shaping the Canadian gay and lesbian movement. Coinciding with the play's run was a daylong symposium hosted on 28 May 2016, by the Mark S. Bonham Centre for Sexual Diversity Studies at the University of Toronto and several other organizations. Billed as an event to explore the lessons this “cheeky tabloid” had for “new generations of queer activists,” the speakers included a range of scholars, activists, and former members of the collective (“Paper Trail” 2016).

While community discussions around the play pointed out how it excluded references to the presence of women and people of color in the inception and history of TBP, it was during the Bonham Centre symposium that serious rifts in the largely celebratory portrayal of TBP’s legacy became visible. Particularly critical of TBP was Rinaldo Walcott, a professor at the University of Toronto and a symposium panel member who argued that the presence of a largely white audience at the symposium was also part of TBP’s legacy. He noted that “for black queers, we live and love in the ruins of the aftermath of The Body Politic, not because of it but in spite of it” (quoted in Mann 2016a). Walcott also drew attention to how the materials archived by the CLGA reflected the invisibility of black queers, something echoed in the lack of people of color in the pages of TBP. Other speakers also pointed out that TBP’s successor, Pink Triangle Press (PTP), was also guilty of excluding representations of black queers. Syrus Marcus Ware, a community activist, highlighted the invisibility of women and trans people in both TBP and PTP publications and retrospectives, while asserting that the omissions in the approved archives can “produce a whitewashed canon” often reflected in LGBT institutions that display subtle antiblack racism (quoted in Mann 2016a). As an example, speakers highlighted how the narratives about Toronto’s 1981 bathhouse raids ignore the participation of people of color in both public protests and in fund-raising. In the contemporary period, black queers play a pivotal role in current social and political activism, engaging in immigration issues and supporting black queers, especially youth, through associations such as Black Lives Matter Toronto and Black Queer Youth.

Undoubtedly, TBP is an important publication, contributing to the development of a gay and lesbian community in Toronto and supporting the activism that shaped the Canadian social landscape. Nevertheless, contemporary criticism reinforces the need to be vigilant in how one frames that history, including both the inclusions and exclusions such publications might foster.

SEE ALSO Bathhouse Raids, Toronto (1981); Butt Magazine; Canadian Criminal Code Reform (1969); “We Demand” Protest (1971)

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Bom-Crioulo (1895; Adolfo Ferreira Caminha)

CÉSAR BRAGA-PINTO
Professor of Brazilian, Lusophone African, and Comparative Literature
Chair, Department of Spanish and Portuguese, Northwestern University, Evanston, IL

A naturalist novel dealing with race, homosexuality, and crime in Rio de Janeiro.

Bom-Crioulo is a novel by Adolfo Ferreira Caminha (1867–1897), a Brazilian writer and journalist who had also served as a naval officer. It has been hailed as one of the first Latin American fictional works to deal explicitly with homosexuality, and it is the first Brazilian novel to feature a “purely” black protagonist. It was written at a time in Brazil that was characterized by the recent abolition of slavery (in 1888), the transition from the Portuguese monarchy to the first republic of Brazil (established in 1889), and the introduction of the 1890 penal code.

The Novel’s Content and Style

Divided into two distinct parts, the story takes place sometime between 1830 and 1840, during the reign of Pedro II, the second and last ruler of the empire of Brazil, reigning from 1831 to 1889. The first half narrates the experience of Amaro, a thirty-year-old runaway slave known as “Bom-Crioulo,” as a sailor in the navy. In the all-male and multiracial space of the ship, homosexual practices and relations were widespread and somewhat tolerated. Amaro is physically strong, extremely jealous (the allusion to William Shakespeare’s Othello is explicit throughout), and driven by excessive alcohol consumption to “crazy excesses,” like a “beast let out of a cage” (Caminha 1982, 34). Impulsive by nature, Amaro is frequently involved in fights, and he is physically punished as a result in scenes that remind the reader that Caminha, who had been a vocal abolitionist in the late nineteenth century, was also strongly opposed to the flogging of sailors, a practice he had repeatedly witnessed as a naval officer. Amaro, in the novel, enters into a sexual relationship with a white, feminized fifteen-year-old named Aleixo. But unlike Aleixo and the other (lighter-skinned) homosexuals and lawbreakers on the ship, Amaro’s own temperament and congenital criminality are connected to his race and sexuality. Thus, Caminha’s novel, perhaps unwittingly, reproduces some of the assumptions of the school of criminology with which he was familiar if not a proponent.
Caminha's novel was innovative in its frank examination of homosexuality at its intersection with race and racial stereotypes. This becomes clear in the second half of the novel, which is set in Rio de Janeiro. The two sailors share a room in a boardinghouse run by an old friend of Amaro’s, a masculinized woman named Carolina who had immigrated to Brazil from Portugal. Carolina seduces Aleixo during his lover’s temporary absences, and Aleixo comes to outgrow his homosexual “vice,” eventually finding Amaro, his sexual advances, and his racialized body utterly repulsive. Amaro, returning to the boardinghouse, hears this news from a worker in a nearby shop. Overcome by jealousy, he murders Aleixo and leaves his body in the middle of the street, surrounded by a curious crowd. As the novel ends, the narrator urges the reader to focus on the criminal, not the victim: “Nobody paid attention to the other combatant, to the black man ... everybody wanted to see the body, to analyze the scar, to stick his nose in the wound” (141). In spite of his abolitionist past, Caminha now, seven years after the emancipation of the slaves, expressed anxieties about the growing presence of blacks in the capital of the recently proclaimed republic.

Arguably, the greatest innovation of Caminha’s novel is its frank examination of so-called congenital homosexuality or sexual inversion at its intersection with race and racial stereotypes. The following passage demonstrates the novel’s ambivalence on the subject:

_Bom-Crioulo felt an extraordinary fever of eroticism, an uncontrollable ecstasy of homosexual pleasure. Now he understood clearly that only with a man, with a man like himself, could he find what in vain he had looked for among women. He had never been aware of this anomaly in himself; never in his life did he recall having had to examine his sexual tendencies.... Well, there was nothing he could do except be patient, seeing that it was “nature” herself who was imposing this punishment on him.

After all he was a man, and he had his sexual needs, like any other man.... Anyhow, his own conscience was clear, all the more so because there were examples right there on board of conduct similar to his—not to mention a certain officer concerning whose personal life terrible rumors were spread. And if the white man did it, the black man was even more likely to! For not everybody has the strength to resist: nature is stronger than the human will.

(63-64)

In spite of its daring subject matter, its ambiguity, its apparently nonjudgmental approach to same-sex desire, and its vicarious sympathy for its protagonist, _Bom-Crioulo_ emulates much of the style and scientific mentality of the so-called experimental novel of nineteenth-century naturalism—a literary movement that shocked its contemporaries for its use of excessively crude language, and for claiming to apply scientific methods to the novel, and of which the French author Émile Zola (1840–1902) was the most important representative. The pseudoscientific doctrine of the Italian criminologist Cesare Lombroso (1835–1909), known as criminal anthropology, was particularly influential in Latin America. One of its main projects was to associate physical traits (called stigmata) with tendencies toward crime, among them, homosexuality. But whereas in works originated in other regions of Latin America (such as Argentina) homosexuality was most often associated with foreign influence or foreign bodies, _Bom-Crioulo_ associates homosexuality with an internal other—a growing Afro-Brazilian presence in urban areas, particularly in Rio de Janeiro.

Male Homosexuality in Nineteenth-Century Brazilian Literature

Although _Bom-Crioulo_ was thought to be the first novel in Brazil to deal explicitly with sex and romance between men, and one of the first in any European language to do so, critics in the twenty-first century have acknowledged at least three notable precedents: _Um homem_ gasto (1885; An exhausted man), O Ateneu (1888; The Athenaeum [2015]), and O barão de Lavos (1891; The baron of Lavos). Um homem gasto, by the writer and physician Lourenço Ferreira Leal, does not focus on homosexuality per se so much as on the “excesses” and subsequent sexual disorders suffered by its protagonist, Alberto. Still, the book mentions Alberto’s evolution in boarding school from an “Antinous of many Hadrians” to a “Hadrian of several Antinouses” (Leal 1885, 185; translation by César Braga-Pinto), in other words, from what was then called a “passive pederast” to an “active pederast.” The best-selling novel O barão de Lavos, written by Abel Botelho, a Portuguese army officer, also deals with homosexuality. Caminha was aware of both novels, and he even referred to O barão de Lavos in his defense of Bom-Crioulo. In contrast, O Ateneu, written by Raul Pompeia, is more nuanced and less inclined toward moral condemnation. In that novel, the first-person narrator, a boarding school student named Sérgio, describes his sentimental education, successive gender identifications, and same-sex desires (as well as those of other students).

In 1897, two years after the publication of Bom-Crioulo, the symbolist writer Nestor Vítor published “Sapos” (Frogs), a short story that depicts an Irish Brazilian man's sexual devolution into pederasty and promiscuity upon ending an intense relationship with an office mate. In his contemporary review of Vítor’s volume Signos, where the story was first published, João da Cruz e Sousa (1861–1898), the first renowned black Brazilian poet, drew an analogy between the main character’s sexual abjection and the fate of all social outcasts, including blacks (Cruz e Sousa 1897).

Each of these late nineteenth-century works is, to some extent, indebted to French naturalism, a literary movement that emphasized observation and relied on scientific doctrines of evolution, race, degeneration, and heredity. While these authors’ fictional characters are objects of curiosity and even sympathy, they are never sources of attraction or models of alternative or oppositional politics to be emulated. Similarly, the homosocial spaces of the school, the ship, and the office are never developed into allegorical representations of a national fraternity. An exception from this period is the work of the mixed-race and reputedly homosexual Paulo Barreto (1881–1921), who published two stories in the newspaper Cidade do Rio in 1899 and 1900. “Impotência” (16 August 1899; Impotence) is indebted to decadent and naturalist aesthetics and the main character of À rebours (1884; Against nature), by the French novelist Joris-Karl Huysmans (1848–1907). In that story, a seventy-year-old man recalls his passion as a youth for a gardener. Similarly, “Ódio, ou Páginas de um diário” (19 May 1900; Hate; or, Pages from a diary) is a rare, passionate tale of same-sex desire, homophobia, and homosexual panic that is clearly modeled on French decadence, a late nineteenth-century literary movement that was characterized by excess, artificiality, and the exploration of sexual perversion.

Critical Reception and International Circulation

Critics initially reacted to Bom-Crioulo with prudish indignation and facetious speculation
Nothing more than a case of sexual inversion studied in [Richard von] Krafft-Ebing, [Albert] Moll, [Ambroise] Tardieu, and in books of legal medicine.... If we are to believe certain imbeciles—according to whom the characters of novels should reflect the authors' character—[Gustave] Flaubert, [Émile] Zola, and [José Maria de] Eça de Queiroz would have practiced incest and monstrous acts.... What is more pernicious: Bom-Crioulo, in which homosexuality is studied and condemned, or those pages that are now circulating and preaching, in a philosophical tone, the dissolution of the family, concubinage, free love, and all sorts of social immorality?

(CAMINHA [1896] 2009, 447; TRANSLATION BY BRAGA-PINTO)

After having faded from circulation and critical consideration in the early twentieth century, since the late 1950s Bom-Crioulo has been regularly published and has gained entry to the canon of Brazilian literature. Widely read, it has been reprinted in a variety of popular and educational editions in multiple languages. But while Brazilian critics and educators have focused on the work’s scientific intentions and naturalist style, the 1982 publication of an English translation by Gay Sunshine Press has drawn the attention of largely gay-identified readers and literary critics, some of whom have reclaimed it as a foundational text of Brazilian and even world “gay literature.” It has also been translated into several other European languages, with international editions that deploy various marketing strategies. The cover of the first French edition (Rue de la Miséricorde [1996]) features a photograph by the French ethnographer Pierre Verger (1902–1996), known for homoerotic portraits of Afro-Brazilian subjects. In contrast, a later French translation (Un amour d’ebène [2010]) advertises the novel as a masterpiece of universal literature that all “honest men” should read. In Spain, the work was published as Buen Criollo (2005), initially as part of a gay and lesbian series with the same Verger photo on the cover, and later (2008) featuring a different but equally erotic image. The Mexican edition, El buen negro (2008), was translated by the well-known gay writer Luis Zapata (1951–) and published with a cover that shows a mixed race, rather than black, man. The German edition (Tropische Nächte [1994]) is particularly interesting given that it was published as part of a collection of gay erotica, its cover illustration recalling Querelle, the iconic 1982 gay film directed by the German filmmaker Rainer Werner Fassbinder (1945–1982). In Brazil, depending on the target audience, the novel’s numerous current editions tend to emphasize either Afro-Brazilianness or homosexuality, but rarely both.

Scandalous at the time of its publication, banned in Brazil for almost half a century, and most recently celebrated—and at times appropriated—by global and queer literary criticism, Bom-Crioulo constitutes a unique case for the study of postcolonial and sexual histories and cultures. It may be true that uncritical claims of its modern and positive (or merely ambivalent) portrayal of interracial homosexuality risk confirming prejudices regarding biological fatalism as it relates to both sexuality and race. Yet the novel has continued to draw the interest of readers, both in the present and in the past, who seek to challenge stereotypes and assumptions concerning the immutability of race and sexuality.

SEE ALSO Imperialism and Colonialism; Situational Homosexuality; Slavery and Sodomy in Brazil

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Foster, David William. “Adolfo Caminha's Bom-Crioulo: A Founding Text of Brazilian Gay

The history of LGBTQ+-themed bookstores, including their unique role as activist centers and community spaces.

Beginning in the early 1970s, bookstores catering to the LGBTQ+ community became important social spaces for advocacy and pride, moving beyond existing gay crisis hotline and drop-in center models to make positive information about gay and lesbian lives more widely available for browsing and purchase. Typically operating as a combination of literary salon, queer archive, and gaymart, storefront businesses from Toronto to Berlin served a customer niche that included seasoned activists, newly out individuals, and LGBTQ families all seeking their own history and literature. A rainbow flag raised high over the door and window displays showcasing a range of publications from the spiritual to the erotic countered centuries of shame and secrecy. As Daniel Lefferts noted in his 2014 article “Why We Still Need LGBT Bookstores,” “Our newfound sociopolitical liberties, instead of obliterating the need for a distinctive gay culture, should instead give us license to explore that culture and develop it further. We need gay bookstores, not as sanctuaries for the repressed, but as museums and libraries for the out and proud.” Over time, roughly corresponding to 1970 to 2014, the diverse owners, managers, collectives, and volunteers staffing LGBTQ and feminist bookshops negotiated politics, poetry, pornography, and profit to stay afloat. They popularized new, out and proud writers from Judy Grahn and Jewelle Gomez to Armistead Maupin and Jeanette Winterson, and brought older literary giants out of the closet. Although in much of the world such bookstores were forced to operate more secretly (and in both the United Kingdom and North America stores were sometimes subject to police harassment), they served as significant venues for readings and book launches, allowing LGBTQ authors to gain new fans and critical attention. Publishers whose books were sold widely at LGBTQ+ bookshops included Harrington Park Press, the Gay Men’s Press, Paradise Press, Virago, Alyson, the Women’s Press, and, in the United States, lesbian presses including Aunt Lute, Bella Books, Bywater Books, Cleis, Naiad, New Victoria, and Spinsters Ink. With the rise of LGBTQ studies in academia, scholarly titles from Duke University Press, the University of Wisconsin Press, and the State University of New York Press appeared, as well as journals including GLQ: A Journal of Lesbian and Gay Studies, Journal of Lesbian Studies, and TSQ: Transgender Studies Quarterly.

As known addresses, bookshops quickly became a focal point of identity- and community-building with an explosion of store openings in the gay hubs of San Francisco and New York during the period of increased activism after the 1969 Stonewall riots. Whereas more militant, street activism might be dismissed by mainstream critics, bookstores elevated the profiles of the LGBTQ reader and writer alike, asserting new queer consumer power and a role in the literary market. This was a direct challenge to the old stigma attached to “adult” bookstores—hitherto the only sites, aside from libraries or special academic collections, for books and films featuring explicit gay sexuality. Some LGBTQ bookshops did maintain a separate, “adults-only” section with explicit magazines for gay men (sometimes referred to as “stroke books”), and also sold critical studies addressing the culture and politics of sex work. As in the early years of homophile organizing by 1950s and 1960s advocacy groups such as the Mattachine Society and the Daughters of Bilitis, which pushed a “respectable homosexual” platform for gaining political rights, the visibility of erotic literature and gay porn troubled some who saw it as an obstacle to assimilation. Yet, sexually frank literature was an important and popular sales item for gay men: the Dutch quarterly Butt was one example of a bookshop item drawing attention to male nudity; it was also named one of the Guardian’s top twenty magazines. The manager of Australia’s Bookshop Darlinghurst, which opened in 1982, even suggested that some older gay men just starting to come out “found a sexual partner in our shop as well, when erotic gay magazines used to be published and we stocked them. Our magazine section tended to be cruise-y at times! But there has also been romance, and one of our own staff met his partner there” (Bereznai 2017).

During the so-called sex wars of the tense 1980s, when many lesbian feminists attacked pornography as harmful to women and anonymous sex was blamed for the AIDS crisis, bookstores differed widely in their inventories and their responses to would-be censors. Lambda Rising Bookstore’s selections acknowledged anonymous sex as a vibrant part of gay subculture and, therefore, gay writing; popular author and filmmaker John Waters praised Lambda Rising Bookstore’s Baltimore branch as “a seriously good bookshop, with the added touch of porno” (Marech 2008). By the 1980s and 1990s, with increased awareness of safe-sex techniques and AIDS prevention through condom use, shops marketing gay literature often sold safe-sex products and lubricant at the counter, for both ethical and commercial reasons.

Thus, despite their preponderance of high-quality materials, occasionally LGBTQ booksellers were charged with obscenity, notably Gay’s the Word Bookshop in England (raided in 1984 by Her Majesty’s Customs and Excise on grounds of indecency), Glad Day in Toronto (which in 2003 won a federal lawsuit defending the right to sell “adult” films without the approval of the Ontario Film Review Board), and Little Sister’s Book and Art Emporium in Vancouver (which was cleared by the Canadian Supreme Court after a 2000 customs battle when inventory from the United States was seized at the border). These bookstores all eventually prevailed in costly court battles due to the outpouring of support from loyal customers and literary advocates. The first LGBTQ bookshop in Taiwan, Taipei’s GinGin Books, opened in 1999 amid legal pressure from censors who challenged owner “JJ” Lai Jeng-Jer for distributing so-called obscene material (and for importing magazines and sex toys from Hong Kong, Japan, and Germany). In 2010 Shobhna Kumar opened what the Hindustan Times called “India’s first gay bookstore,” an online shop called Queer Ink in Malad, but it is important to note that the feminist bookshop Streelekha in Bangalore was selling books by lesbian author Suniti Namjoshi in the early 1990s.

GAY’S THE WORD BOOKSHOP

Founded by Ernest Hole with assistance from Peter Dorey and a small group of people from Icebreakers, a gay socialist group, Gay’s the Word bookshop opened for business in London, England, in January 1979. Inspired by the rise of lesbian and gay bookstores in the United States and named after the last musical written by Ivor Novello, Gay’s the Word was the United Kingdom’s first lesbian and gay bookshop. Others followed, including West and Wilde in Edinburgh, Out in Brighton, and Silver Moon women’s bookshop in London. Today, Gay’s the Word is the last surviving physical bookshop specializing in LGBTQ+ literature in the United Kingdom and the second-longest running lesbian and gay bookshop in Europe, after Prinz Eisenherz in Berlin.

From its inception, the bookshop was intended to be a community resource and political hub, providing access to information and a space to nurture the well-being of the lesbian and gay community at a time when antigay prejudice was commonplace and gay books were not generally available in mainstream bookshops. No material that was considered racist, sexist, sexually exploitative, or which presented negative perspectives on gay or women’s liberation was stocked. Today, Gay’s the Word continues to operate along that original mandate with staff attentive to the needs of customers seeking advice on “coming out” and with numerous discussion, activity, and support groups convening in the venue in the evenings. As the novelist Sarah Waters observed in 2007, “It’s not just a bookshop, but the hub and affirmation of a whole community.”

In 1984 Her Majesty’s Customs and Excise, assuming the shop to be a porn store rather than a serious bookstore, mounted a large-scale raid and seized thousands of pounds’ worth of stock. Works by Tennessee Williams, Christopher Isherwood, and Jean Genet were among the books seized. Directors were eventually charged with conspiracy to import indecent books under the Customs Consolidation Act of 1876. The Defend Gay’s the Word campaign was set in motion, with a defense fund raising over £55,000 from the public. Many well-known writers also gave their support, including the American writer Gore Vidal, who donated £3,000. All charges were eventually dropped.

Organizations that have held meetings in the bookshop over the years include the Lesbian Discussion Group (meeting for more than thirty-five years), the Gay Black Group, and the Gay Disabled Group. From 1984 to 1985 Lesbians and Gays Support the Miners met at the shop and collected money outside, as immortalized in the 2014 film Pride, directed by Matthew Warchus. The success of the film has helped to underscore the importance of Gay’s the Word in people’s minds, bringing a whole new generation of customers to the bookshop’s door, further improving its viability.

With one of the best-curated, comprehensive ranges of LGBTQ+ books available to buy in the world, the stock includes lesbian and gay fiction, history, biography, literary criticism, queer studies, sex and relationships, parenting, kids, young adult, trans, secondhand, religion and spirituality, and poetry. Following a challenging trading period in 2007, Gay’s the Word launched a high-profile campaign to raise funds, which included a shelf-sponsorship initiative called “Cash-for-Honours.” Customers and authors, including the actor Ian McKellen and the writers Ali Smith and Philip Hensher, rallied round and the shop was saved.

The first two decades of the twenty-first century were marked by a rash of closures of queer venues in London (and across the world), which resulted in part from economic gentrification and the effects of digital technology on behavior, the importance of unique spaces such as Gay’s the Word has come into sharp relief. Venues such as independent LGBTQ+ bookshops are part of the living, breathing fabric of queer culture. Often serving as a touchstone venue that people discover early in their personal journeys and as sites of pilgrimage for those from other, more restrictive cultures, they are special places where people find politics, understanding, and each other. In the words of the American writer Armistead Maupin in a 2007 email to the author, “Gay’s the Word, to my mind, is the fountainhead of queer literature in Britain. I am deeply grateful that these pioneers fought so hard for our right to tell—and read—our own stories.”

Uli Lenart
Bookseller
Gay’s the Word bookshop, United Kingdom

This history reminds us that mail order, though certainly a lifesaver for many, was not always a safe solution for distant customers because mail could be subject to confiscation—a predicament dating back to the nineteenth-century Comstock Laws in the United States, which gave the US Postal Service broad latitude to seize “obscene” materials. In the years before World War I (1914–1918), those laws were used to target literature about birth control, notably Margaret Sanger’s daring magazine The Woman Rebel. The “plain brown wrapper” designating adult material delivered by mail eventually inspired the title of a lesbian book, Rita Mae Brown's early (and now rare) volume A Plain Brown Rapper (1976). However, for closeted readers or those threatened by the loss of jobs, housing, or custody if outed in their homophobic communities, access to queer culture via mail was life changing and a link to the burgeoning global pride movement.

Moving beyond these occasional challenges from conservative or state critics, gay bookshops took care to construct an atmosphere that welcomed customers of all ages and interests, hosting author reading events, serving as ad hoc organizing sites, donating books to community fund-raisers, and forging important relationships with rare-book collectors and burgeoning LGBTQ archives. They were some of the first sites of accessible literature for queer and questioning youth, for gay and lesbian parents, and for educators seeking appropriate works for classroom units on LGBTQ life and identity. As public sites with free admission, LGBTQ bookshops also changed the tone of urban “gayborhoods,” which had long been defined by bars and late-night performance clubs—legally boundaried meeting spaces that limited participation to those over the age of twenty-one. (Age limits tended to be lower across Europe and in the United Kingdom.) In far too many cases, bars and clubs enabled a culture of alcoholism coupled with racist ID practices, whereas bookshops offered an alternative of self-discovery and self-help through titles on recovery and diversity. Books also provided a means of talking back to one’s oppressor through the elegant written word, fostering empowerment in regions where political writing of any kind represented the triumph over censorship and false narratives about history. With the expansion of LGBTQ bookstore culture in the United States and elsewhere, finding accurate depictions of gay, lesbian, and, more recently, trans life no longer meant a lonely quest for just one book or film with a happy ending.

History

Three sites compete for the title of first/oldest gay bookstore: Oscar Wilde in Greenwich Village (opened by Craig Rodwell in 1967, originally as the Oscar Wilde Memorial Bookshop), Glad Day Books in Toronto, Canada (opened in 1970), and Giovanni’s Room in Philadelphia (opened by Ed Hermance in 1973), the oldest LGBTQ bookstore in the United States to operate continuously at one site. The oldest gay bookstores in Europe also opened before the end of the 1970s: Gay’s the Word and the Man to Man Bookshop in London and Prinz Eisenherz Buchladen in Berlin. SisterWrite on Upper Street N1 in London featured a no-men-allowed lesbian books room and a women-only café from 1979 to 1993. Although the trans community would later disrupt and interrogate the premise of male and female as essential categories, it is noteworthy that several early bookshops promoted, through name and policy, customers’ preference for a same-sex sanctuary as well as the legitimacy of a same-sex attraction. Edinburgh’s Womanzone (opened 1983) was another where, not incidentally, women could buy lesbian titles from publisher Onlywomen Press, and in London Silver Moon Bookshop was denied a liquor license for its café because it did not provide toilets for men.

The urgency of making a space for gay liberation literature in the years just before and after the Stonewall riots of 1969 began in more liberal cities of the North, but a second wave emerged in the American South in the 1990s. Drawing on both local and national concerns, each independent bookshop offered a range of activities and events, including responses to hate crimes and pending LGBTQ rights laws. From its position in the nation's capital, Lambda Rising played an important role in extending the literary reach of LGBTQ publishing by starting Lambda Book Report in 1987 and the Lambda Literary Awards in 1989. Since 1996 the Lambda Literary Foundation has operated as a nonprofit (now on the West Coast) responsible for LGBTQ book festivals, conferences, reviews, monthly book clubs, awards, scholarships to emerging writers, writers in the schools, and other activities affirming the lavender word. The Lambda Rising Bookshop at Dupont Circle in Washington, DC, saw considerable foot traffic from out-of-towners during all four of the national marches for LGBTQ rights (1979, 1987, 1993, and 2000); a sign in its window also directed local activists to gather at the US Capitol for a spontaneous rally in response to the killing of Matthew Shepard, a gay college student beaten to death near Laramie, Wyoming, in the fall of 1998.

Throughout this same post-Stonewall era of pride and activism from the 1970s through the 1990s, lesbian customers were just as likely to buy their books and films through the global network of woman-centered feminist bookstores such as Amazon Books, Lammas Women's Books and More, Women and Children First, Sisterhood Books, and Crazy Ladies. These bookstores were both part of and separate from the LGBTQ bookshop community, offering books, art, readings, and concerts that emphasized women's lives, and benefiting from the platform of issues raised by the women's movement. Although there were actually more feminist bookstores catering to women than LGBTQ bookstores catering to men and women in that era, it is unclear whether women's bookstores took customers or sales away from LGBTQ enterprises. Both complementary to male gay rights interests by featuring materials and workshops on general LGBTQ political rights and also offering women-only events and materials specific to lesbian lives, feminist businesses struggled financially. For bookshop managers whose lesbian-feminist politics were more revolutionary than entrepreneurial, turning a profit was not as urgent as smashing the patriarchy and interrupting racism. Kristen Hogan's The Feminist Bookstore Movement (2016) addresses the ways that staff and volunteer “bookwomen” labored to create social spaces that were simultaneously welcoming, accessible, and provocative; the business ethos of sales was sometimes barely apparent. In the pre-internet era, women's authentic experiences of sexual violence, racial oppression, homophobic disregard of lesbian realities, and class struggles in a sexist wage economy were rarely, if ever, discussed in mainstream media. Independently published books told those truths and also offered a resounding link to lost women writers who had dared to pen lesbian narratives long before the so-called second wave of feminism in the 1960s and 1970s.
Often run by collectives, women's bookstores first emerged as a cultural wing of the radical feminist movement, serving a political agenda separate from the male-dominated Left. Lesbian activists in the late 1960s and early 1970s encountered sexism from gay men as well as homophobia in feminist organizations such as the National Organization for Women, and thus began an exodus from both streams to give voice to lesbian-feminist concerns through publishing and recording. Not all feminist bookstores were lesbian-owned or -operated, but most offered materials by and about lesbians that other presses, including newspapers, refused to print. Like gay bookstores, feminist bookstores functioned as informal gathering sites and hosted author events, but they also sold albums and served as concert venues for the lesbian music movement, and they were rallying points for actions against male violence. Feminist bookstores proliferated in the United States and beyond, and their names deliberately emphasized female literary history and essentialism: A Room of One’s Own (Madison, Wisconsin), A Woman’s Prerogative (Ferndale, Michigan), Amazon Books (Minneapolis, Minnesota), Antigone Books (Tucson, Arizona), Artistic Amazon (Portsmouth, New Hampshire), Bluestockings (New York City), Boadecia’s Books (Berkeley, California), Book-Woman (Austin, Texas), Charis Books and More (Atlanta, Georgia), Common Language Bookstore (Ann Arbor, Michigan), Crazy Ladies (Cincinnati, Ohio), Crone’s Cupboard (Boise, Idaho), Crone’s Harvest (Jamaica Plain, Massachusetts), Dreams and Swords (Indianapolis, Indiana), Gertrude and Alice’s (Collinsville, Connecticut), Herland Sister Resources (Oklahoma City, Oklahoma), Lammas (Washington, DC), Lioness Books (Sacramento, California), Little Sister’s (Vancouver, Canada), Mama Bear’s (Oakland, California), My Sister’s Words (Syracuse, New York), People Called Women (Toledo, Ohio), Sisterhood Bookstore (Los Angeles, California), Streelekha (Bangalore, India), Venus Envy (Halifax, Canada), Women and Children First (Chicago, Illinois), and WomenCrafts (Provincetown, Massachusetts). The independent presses printing and supplying new lesbian books likewise chose names that declared a woman-identified sensibility: Down There Press, Shameless Hussy Press, Persephone Press, Diana Press, Spinsters Ink, Daughters, Naiad, and, in Britain, Onlywomen Press and Pandora Press. In 1999 Amazon Bookstore Cooperative in Minneapolis sued Amazon.com for trademark infringement of its name, and in a complicated settlement then signed over rights to the name (while licensing ongoing usage of “Amazon” through 2008).

Frustration over the marginalization of black women’s voices led Barbara Smith and her sister to form Kitchen Table/Women of Color Press, and at least one bookstore, Sisterspace in Washington, DC, catered to the community of black women. Before the social media networks of the twenty-first century, breakthrough writings by lesbian authors (particularly women of color) created occasions for transforming both the isolated newcomer and the evolving activist. Bookstores offered resources to repair the fragmented conditions of women’s lives while also subjecting their staff and business practices to constant political scrutiny. Women in Distribution, Carol Seajay's Feminist Bookstore News, and the early Women in Print conferences connected bookstore staff to one another as the threats of online shopping, chain bookstores, and conglomerate mergers encroached and antitrust laws limited feminist booksellers’ ability to act in coalition. But in terms of placing hard-to-find and beloved feminist texts into readers’ hands, feminist bookstores emerged victorious in the battle with capitalist interests. The complete history of independent lesbian periodicals, women’s presses, and the women’s bookstore movement from 1969 to 1999 is now available from scholars such as Julie Enszer, Judy Grahn (A Simple Revolution [2012]), and former Feminist Bookstore News publisher Seajay. Seajay’s essay on the rise and fall of feminist bookstores, “Our Words in Our Hands: A Brief History of Women’s Presses and Bookstores,” which appeared in Ms. magazine in July/August 1992, remains a classic for understanding the economic and political underpinnings of women-identified businesses. In the interdependent economy that typified lesbian cultural networks, where sheer distribution often took precedence over profit, women’s bookstores sent booksellers to festivals and conferences while their home stores featured bins of women’s music and woman-made crafts or jewelry as well as books. The elevation of lesbian poetry readings to a kind of performance art helped to introduce new writings by lesbians of color, including nonfiction anthologies, as well as recorded concerts. These did not shy away from confronting white lesbians about racism and classism, but lesbian-themed writing brought women across racial lines in a very different way than the street protests of the 1960s. A bookstore, like a library, permitted quiet, autodidactic radicalization and commitment. Women who had access to a feminist bookstore in their cities could now browse uninhibited for hours, avoiding the drama of trying to find or check out lesbian books at schools or libraries.

Some bookstores expanded into cafés so that women could meet free from male harassment, reprising an earlier era’s network of suffragist tea rooms. (In 1911 feminist Alva Belmont ran a successful suffrage restaurant in New York.) Bloodroot restaurant and bookstore in Bridgeport, Connecticut, published a feminist cookbook titled The Political Palate in 1980. Bookshops also helped publicize a year-round calendar of activism for lesbians during the 1980s and 1990s, papering entire walls with flyers and brochures for upcoming events and later displaying the books or recorded manifesta that had resulted from such gatherings. Bulletin boards at bookshops included want ads for housemates, for rides to festivals, for submissions to anthologies, and even for interviews with some of the first scholars looking to study lesbian lives. In cities with large military populations, where homophobic police informants monitored women in uniform who tried to enter known lesbian bars, a visit to a bookstore might be a military lesbian’s only community entry point; a poetry reading usually flew below the radar of known, and banned, lesbian spaces. Typically alcohol-free except for occasional book-release wine and cheese receptions, bookstores were an alternative sober social space for women in recovery. During the 1980s, shelves were filled with books on twelvestep programs and codependency and memoirs by authors addressing their journeys toward sobriety. Despite their politically textured aspects, bookstores were also flirtatious and friendship-based community spaces, which was fondly illustrated in Alison Bechdel's long-running comic strip Dykes to Watch Out For. By 1992, Seajay's essay in Ms. acknowledged these changes:

> There was a time at the beginning of the women's movement when a committed feminist could store everything in print about the women's liberation movement in a few file folders on her desk. Now there are 140 women's bookstores scattered across the US and Canada. The larger stores stock 15,000 to 18,000 titles.... Most have more books than any one woman could read over the course of her lifetime.

A 1988 edition of Gaia's Guide International, for lesbian travelers, listed lesbian bookstore-cafés in Austria, Australia, Belgium, Canada, France, Germany, India, Ireland, Italy, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Spain, and Sweden.

Mainstreaming, Visibility, and the Internet

Gradually, the best of lesbian writing and art percolated into mainstream distribution as both lesbians and gay men gained attention in academia and pop culture. A central conflict of the 1980s concerned age-appropriate LGBT books for children whose families were not represented in schoolbooks; in the United States, the American Library Association defended lesbian author Lesléa Newman, author of Heather Has Two Mommies (1989), when evangelical and right-wing groups sought to ban lesbian and gay authors from school shelves. Other controversial releases were Michael Willhoite's Daddy's Roommate (1991) and, in Europe, Danish author Susanne Bosche's groundbreaking Mette bor hos Morten og Erik (1981; Jenny Lives with Eric and Martin [1983]). In 1986 Bosche's photoessay was labeled “homosexual propaganda” by the secretary of education in the United Kingdom, as Section 28 made it an offense to advocate homosexuality. LGBTQ+ bookshops and mail-order services played important roles in distributing this new genre of family-friendly storybooks because they were banned from some schools.

However, more and more adults were exposed to new books with overt and sexual LGBTQ content as they were adapted into screenplays, such as Dorothy Allison's Bastard Out of Carolina, which debuted on cable in the United States in 1996 with mainstream Hollywood star Jennifer Jason Leigh in a lead role. Many films about LGBTQ life featured scenes in bookstores, including Pride (2014), set in London's Gay's the Word; Better Than Chocolate (1999), set in Vancouver's censorshipridden Little Sister’s; and Armistead Maupin’s Tales of the City miniseries (1993), with a scene in San Francisco's A Different Light bookshop.
Both Better Than Chocolate and Tales of the City were noteworthy for featuring trans women as strong central characters well before greater visibility and advocacy for trans rights in the twenty-first century. When American comedienne Ellen DeGeneres came out on her television series in 1997, her character, Ellen Morgan, managed a bookstore.

But as former customers began to read, make purchases, and meet one another online, bookstores (along with many other social and physical sites of LGBTQ culture) began to go out of business in the early twenty-first century, vanishing from the diverse landscapes they had helped build and define. Over 1,000 bookstores (LGBTQ included) closed in the United States alone between 2000 and 2007. The reasons are complex. In the 1990s the appearance of select LGBTQ books in mainstream chain bookstores, such as Barnes & Noble and Borders, suggested social progress but cost independent booksellers crucial sales and foot traffic. LGBTQ bookstores, like all independent bookstores, also battled the innovations of cyberspace and social media, which presented fresh opportunities for marketing and direct mail orders but pitted smaller businesses against the powerful Amazon distributor. Facing competition, LGBTQ+ bookshops turned to survival strategies including expanding into cafés, while others reinforced sales of sex toys, which were not available in mainstream bookstores. (In a 1996 installment of Bechdel’s comic strip Dykes to Watch Out For, the employees of fictional Madwimmin Books discuss similar options. Lois suggests that the bookstore can meet rising costs by offering a range of sex toys, since popular bookstore chains “might carry lesbian erotica, but they don’t sell the hardware!”)

Just before Christmas 2010, Ted Jensen and Kevin Medley, the founder/operators of OutLoud Bookstore in Nashville, Tennessee, cited these factors in their decision to close after fifteen years: “The greed of some in the banking industry continues to push interest rates so high that most small businesses can’t afford them. Affordable credit is simply not available to most small business owners…. Supersized businesses like Amazon, Wal-Mart, and Best Buy have unfair price advantages over locally owned businesses” (OutLoud 2010). Bruce Bawer’s 2003 “Closing Time” column in the New York Times offered similar reflections. In contrast, when Lambda Rising closed in 2010, founder Deacon Maccubbin’s assessment was positive: “If we’re successful, there will no longer be a need for a specialty gay and lesbian bookstore because every bookstore will be carrying [this literature]. And 35 years later, that’s what happened. We call that mission accomplished” (Proctor 2015).

The economic challenges of sustaining brick-and-mortar businesses in an era of online shopping and socializing had other costs for people of color identifying as LGBTQ, as many low-income and minority communities were displaced by soaring rents and gentrification. Those white, gay men whose higher income levels allowed them to enjoy urban home ownership were able to put down roots in neighborhoods now devoid of post-Stonewall radicalism. For women escaping abusive marriages or navigating the legal waters of lesbian motherhood, the feminist bookstores that had been walkto refuges vanished. Bechdel’s Dykes to Watch Out For, which ran in syndicated LGBTQ magazines and newspapers from 1986 to 2013 and was inspired in part by the original Amazon Books in Minneapolis, presented every real-life change and challenge experienced by existing bookstores over those decades, from a brick thrown through the window to the gradual inclusion of trans women to the necessity of stocking fanciful sex toys as book sales were lost to competing chain bookstores. In 2012 the comic strip story line featured the inevitable closing of Madwimmin Books, and soon afterward, Bechdel moved on to write her award-winning graphic memoir Fun Home (2006), which became a Broadway hit in 2015.

In his 2014 essay “The Slow, Tragic Death of the LGBT Publishing Industry,” Lethe Press manager Steve Berman notes, “How individuals learn about new books, or old classics that deserve to outlive their authors, is tricky. In the early days of LGBT publishing there were few titles available, so the clerks and owners were more likely to have read each and every one.” Lambda Rising Bookshop once encouraged patrons to drop a business card in a glass jar on the counter for a chance to Win a gay library!; the explosion in LGBTQ-themed books has taken us far beyond what can be contained in an individual collection or a shop space. Ironically, whereas federal authorities once persecuted the LGBTQ community, today some government sources are making funds available to promote the preservation of LGBTQ history. From New York’s LGBT Historic Sites Project website to the National Park Service study of LGBTQ America, LGBTQ sites are now of historic interest. In the next years, we will see more bookshops designated as historically precious to the development of an LGBTQ literary tradition and the cultural victory over discrimination. History will judge whether the mainstreaming of LGBTQ literature is a victory for open expression of identity or an erasure of once-vital locations for a community still under legal and moral assault.

SEE ALSO Butt Magazine; Pulp Fiction, Gay and Lesbian

BIBLIOGRAPHY

New York LGBT Historic Sites Project. “Oscar Wilde Memorial Bookshop.”
http://www.nyclgbtsites.org/site/oscar-wilde-memorial-bookshop/

Contrary to many accounts, the American writer Henry James (1843–1916) did not coin the term Boston marriage. His sister, however, was in one. Alice James (1848–1892) and the educator Katharine Loring (1849–1943) shared what Henry called “a devotion so perfect and generous ... a gift of providence so rare and so little-to-be-looked for in this world that to brush it aside would be almost an act of impiety” (quoted in Faderman 1981, 196). Henry was also familiar with the writer Sarah Orne Jewett (1849–1909), who was in an almost thirty-year relationship with the writer Annie Adams Fields (1834–1915), and his notebooks suggest he was intrigued by the erotics between the women’s rights activist Susan B. Anthony (1820–1906) and the talented orator Anna Elizabeth Dickinson (1842–1932). So when James published his novel The Bostonians (1885–1886) about, as he put it, “one of those friendships between women that are so common in New England” (quoted in Matthiessen and Murdock 1947, 47), he was pointing his pen at a recognizable attachment between otherwise unmarried women. A Boston marriage was recognized as long-term, monogamous, and involving a degree of financial independence, sometimes inherited and sometimes earned. The women in these marriages were often involved in suffrage, philanthropy, breaking into professional spheres, and “New Woman” politics.
Charlotte Cushman (left) and Matilda Hays. American stage actress Charlotte Cushman lived in what was described as a “female marriage” with Hays for a decade in the mid-nineteenth century. This relationship and others Cushman had with women did not excite scandal because they were assumed by many to be nonsexual.

In Surpassing the Love of Men (1981), Lillian Faderman traced the first use of the term to the early twentieth century. More recently, Benjamin Kahan (2013) has uncovered its use in an 1893 letter that also refers to even earlier, widespread usages. Prior to the use of the epithet Boston, the term female marriage was often used. The English poet Elizabeth Barrett Browning (1806–1861) employed it, for example, when she met the American actress Charlotte Cushman (1816–1876) and her lover, Matilda Hays (1820–1897), in Paris in 1852. Barrett Browning wrote to her sister that Cushman and Hays had “made vows of celibacy & of eternal attachment to each other—they live together, dress alike ... it is a female marriage” (quoted in McAleer 1951, 27).

Race and Class

The categories of Boston marriages and romantic friendships both imply a high degree of socioeconomic status. Although assuredly working-class women in the industrial Western world have always lived together in similar formations, the terms are found applied only to middle- and upper-class women. This may be because written histories have predominantly attended to subjects who have estate, and it may also be that marriage of any kind has historically been about estate. The question of cross-class relationships between women is relatively unattended to. There has been some scholarly attention to cross-class, long-term relationships of gay men such as the English homosexual rights activist and writer Edward Carpenter (1844–1929), the American poet Walt Whitman (1819–1892), and the English novelist E. M. Forster (1879–1970). The possibility of erotic relationships between, for example, a lady and her maid is powerfully expressed in the poem “Warming Her Pearls” (1987) by Carol Ann Duffy (1955–) but has received less scholarly attention. Exceptions include work on Jewett's fiction, notably “An Autumn Holiday,” “Miss Tempy’s Watchers,” Deephaven, The Country of Pointed Firs, and, most especially, “Martha’s Lady.” Deephaven (1877) portrays a Boston marriage between “best of friends” Kate and Helen who set up “housekeeping” together. Jewett was herself in a longterm same-sex relationship with the Boston socialite and philanthropist Fields, a relationship that lasted until Jewett's death in 1909.

Although the terms Boston marriage and romantic friendship are delimited by class, they have jumped racial barriers and been used to describe black women's relationships. To cite one example, the African American writer Angelina Weld Grimké (1880–1958) had a romantic friendship with her African American school friend Mamie Burrill (Rupp 2001). Grimké used the language of marriage in a way that was clearly more than metaphorical: “I know you are too young now to become my wife, but I hope, darling, that in a few years you will come to me and be my love, my wife! How my brain whirls how my pulse leaps with joy and madness when I think of these two words, ‘my wife’” (quoted in Perry 2001, 313). The schoolgirl Grimké here looks ahead to a lesbian future that most scholars agree was foreclosed; Gloria T. Hull describes Grimké as a “thwarted lesbian, who forswore lasting intimacy at an early age” (1987, 21). Grimké’s adult writing is fretted by passion for lost loves and women admired from afar or yearned for across distances created by hesitancy, prohibition, or death. For Grimké, youthful romantic friendship allowed her passion a freedom denied her in adult life.

An antebellum example of a same-sex relationship between black women can be found in the history of Rebecca Cox Jackson (1795–1871). Jackson was an African American free woman who divorced her husband and became an itinerant preacher before joining the Shakers, who were impressed by her mystical visions and welcomed her as a prophet. In 1851 she moved to Philadelphia with her partner, Rebecca Perot, where they founded the first black Shaker community. After Jackson’s death, Perot took the name “Mother Rebecca Jackson” and assumed leadership of the community.

Beyond Boston: Some Questions on Nation

The term Boston marriage is structured by two allegiances: anglicized geography and estate. What happens if both of those constructions are removed? Scholarship on female friendship and marriage emerged at a time when queer theory was still very Anglo-American-centric, with some consideration of French literature and culture. That Western bias, however, has been changing. Area studies has provided valuable national and ethnically specific case studies as well as new calls for scholars to make global and even transhistorical connections. In 2000 the Journal of Women's History marked the twenty-five years of scholarship since Carroll Smith-Rosenberg’s 1975 article “The Female World of Love and Ritual” with an issue that draws connections between Smith-Rosenberg’s American “female world” and those of nineteenth-century Bohemia and South Asia. The journal’s editor, Leila J. Rupp, later published Sapphistries: A Global History of Love between Women (2009), which she describes as contributing to “a transnational history of lesbianism” (6). Her account shows that forms of female marriage have existed at many times and in many places; what is contested is how they are represented. Rupp cites ancient rabbinical commentary condemning marriage between two women as Egyptian or Canaanite as “an early example of blaming sexual deviance on foreign influence” (2009, 36). Rupp also cites some African scholars’ impatience with African American writers such as Audre Lorde (1934–1992) hailing African forms of female marriage as lesbian: “What looks like a transhistorical, transnational history of Black women’s relationships to some, looks like Western misinterpretation and misappropriation to others” (2009, 88–89).

Andrea Sankar’s 1986 article, “Sisters and Brothers, Lovers and Enemies: Marriage Resistance in Southern Kwangtung,” on female marriage resisters in Hong Kong between 1865 and 1935 reveals patterns of sworn sisterhood and homosocial networks that are similar to the same-sex spinster cultures of nineteenth-century America. The article also provides a reminder that “kinship” and the terminology of kinship—“sister,” “wife,” “daughter,” and so on—are complex entities. Within living memory in the United States, for example, marriage inequality prompted some gay couples to adopt each other for legal and financial protection. Bayard Rustin (1912–1987), a leading activist in the civil rights movement, adopted his partner, Walter Naegle (1949–), who was then described as Rustin’s “son” in Rustin’s New York Times obituary. For those who live in countries where same-sex unions are not legal, adoption remains the only way to formalize a relationship through law and inherit each other’s estates without death duties.

Women living outside of heterosexual marriages have always suffered especial precarity in the matter of inheritance. Anne Lister (1791–1840), the wealthy gentlewoman whose decoded diaries testify to her twin passions of lesbian adventuring and the pursuit of wealth, inherited her estate from an aunt. In her own will, she left the bulk of her estate not to her partner, Ann Walker (1803–1854), but to her paternal cousins. Lister had given Walker a wedding ring and had their union blessed in a church, but after Lister’s death Walker was left with a “life interest” in their shared home of Shibden Hall, with the proviso that she must not marry. Lister’s posthumous — and some might say patriarchally limited— protection for her same-sex spouse did not, however, protect Walker when she was declared insane, removed from Shibden Hall, and confined to an asylum.

Michael Field: A Case Study
“Michael Field” was the name under which the couple Katharine Bradley (1846–1914) and Edith Cooper (1862–1913) wrote and published poetry and plays in fin-de-siècle England. In their poetry, they pledged to be “poets and lovers forever more” (Thain and Vadillo 2009, 28), a description that expresses a bond not only between the two women but also between literature and love. The two women, who were also aunt and niece, maintained a multivolume set of jointly written journals, which tell scholars yet more about how the women understood their union. In the first instance, they rejected all attempts to parse the singularity of their chosen name into two parts. Describing their literary work as “perfectly mosaic” and their writing practices as absolutely intertwined, “let no man think,” Bradley wrote, “he can put asunder what God has joined” (quoted in Sturgeon [1922] 1975, 47). Bradley writes these lines in 1886 to the British sexologist Havelock Ellis (1859–1939) in a letter that she must admit she wrote single-handedly, but her admission shows how carefully she and Cooper self-fashioned the story of the closeness of their union, as well as how much they were reaching for a model of marriage more perfect than others had achieved. Bradley’s echoing of the language of the marriage ceremony in writing “Let no man think he can put asunder” is both pointed and chastising; she claims divine imprimatur to swat aside mortal detractors.

If Bradley sounds imperious about the sanctity of their union, it is because she and Cooper were downright competitive about it. Elizabeth Barrett and Robert Browning had one of the most famous courtships and marriages of the nineteenth century, but the women who announced “we are Michael Field” (Field 1933, 20) asserted in their journals that they were “closer married” (16). The basis for their audacious claim? The Brownings did not write together, Bradley reflected, and therefore did not, like Michael Field, “bless or quicken one another at their work” (16). “Bless” and “quicken” is the language of sex and pregnancy; Bradley and Cooper saw their relationship as one that could enfold the elements of heterosexual marriage and then exceed them, metaphysically. They found philosophical grounds for their ideas about communion in the work of the Dutch philosopher Baruch Spinoza (1632–1677), who “with his fine grasp of unity says: ‘If two individuals of exactly the same nature are joined together, they make up a single individual, doubly stronger than each alone,’ i.e. Edith and I make a veritable Michael” (16).

Although their relationship was seen by some as eccentric, arrogant, and codependent, it was also shaped by and expressive of epistemic shifts in sexual culture. In both their literature and journals, Michael Field explored the limitations and banalities of conventional heterosexual marriage. They witnessed the trial of their friend and sometime champion, the Irish writer Oscar Wilde (1854–1900), and felt the anxieties of their gay male friends that followed from this first-ever prosecution of homosexuality. They socialized with the British writer Vernon Lee (1856–1935) and her then-partner, Kit Anstruther-Thomson (1857–1921), finding their “mannish” dress off-putting. Some of their heterosexual friends were sexually freestyling, too, trying out ménage à trois living, which Bradley deemed “the most difficult of all combinations” (quoted in Donoghue 1998, 87).
She spoke from some experience; “we are Michael Field” expressed a unity that was not necessarily monogamous, and Bradley and Cooper’s relationship encompassed numerous flirtations and affairs. Although they did not consider themselves as looking for new sexual and romantic forms—instead convinced they had already found one—they were participants in a moment that formed a crucible for sexual reinvention.

Loving by Another Name

A useful heuristic for understanding the way that play and plurality undergirded the forms of Boston and female marriages and intimate and romantic friendships is the tracing of nicknames and pet names. Although Michael Field might have insisted on the singularity of their pen name in the public sphere, their private papers positively bristle with an array of pet names for each other. In the simplest forms, Bradley took the name “Michael,” while Cooper answered to “Henry.” Just a few of their other names for each other include Archangel, Old Cat, Daphne, Felicity, All Wise Fowl, Heinrich, Kittie, the Mother One, Perpetua, Persian Puss, Old Pop, and Sculptor. The names cross lines of species, nation, generation, and gender, and yet more were used to refer to friends and family. It might be argued that prior to what the French philosopher Michel Foucault (1926–1984) describes as the invention of the homosexual (Foucault 1978), a search for queer kinship structures produced and was expressed by fashioning names and roles for each other. This practice of proliferating polymorphous endearments was by no means unique to Bradley and Cooper. Lee and Mary Robinson (1857–1944), Lee’s lover prior to Anstruther-Thomson, enjoyed what Martha Vicinus calls “an orgy of renaming” (2004, 9) that was similarly inventive and scrupulously avoided Lee’s given name, Violet. At the fin de siècle, the “love that dare not speak its name” had many names and ones of its own choosing.

These naming practices bespeak self-invention and a carefree attitude toward prescribed social and romantic roles. Pet names work much in the same way as in-jokes; they express an intimate knowledge of someone, and they also rebuff outsiders who lack that knowledge. Pet names can therefore be seen as an extension of fin-de-siècle salon life that was, variously, flamboyant and closeted. The terms homosexual and heterosexual both date to the late 1860s, coming into English language usage only in the 1890s. As sexuality was coming to be named by doctors and jurisprudents, queer subjects were naming themselves in exuberant and riddling fashion. These naming practices, and the role-playing they implied, express the importance of performativity that queer theory would explicate at the other end of the century. In their afterlives, these same pet names have also played a role in the suppression of the history of relationships between women: the affection and flirtation that they express has often been too much for editors, who censor the names. The ability of pet names to disclose lesbian desire can be mapped onto the way that the terms Boston marriage and romantic friendship sit on a continuum with myriad other terms that belong to a history of women loving women: pash, smash, woman-couple, female husband, spinster, sapphist, tribade, companion, amazon, and tommy.

Scholarly Debate

Smith-Rosenberg’s “The Female World of Love and Ritual” first established the significance of how, in eighteenth- and nineteenth-century America, “women 'routinely formed emotional ties with other women'” (1975, 1). Her argument was based on recognition of the power of “single-sex or homosocial networks” (9); rigid gender-role differentiation led, she showed, to women “forming primary emotional, perhaps physical and sexual, ties with other women” (DuBois et al. 1980, 61). A key feature of these relationships was, she showed, that they were “openly avowed” (Smith-Rosenberg 1975, 4). Faderman then took up romantic friendship as a central term for her similarly groundbreaking 1981 study, Surpassing the Love of Men. In between the publication of these two works, in 1980 Adrienne Rich published an article in which she outlined a concept that she called the “lesbian continuum,” referring to a range of woman-identified experience. Between them, and over the course of just six years, these scholars managed to bring into focus a huge range of female same-sex relationships that were, as Smith-Rosenberg put it, “undeniably romantic and even sensual” (1975, 24). These relationships were not only socially sanctioned but also produced by the social enforcement of heterosexual marriage. The conventions of marriage, in other words, have histories that are as much same-sex as opposite-sex.

All three scholars recognized that the same-sex relationships they described occupied a wide spectrum, from schoolgirl to spinster, from nonsexual to erotic. Some subsequent critics, however, objected that accounts of romantic friendships and Boston marriages emphasized emotional intimacy but sidelined sex. These scholars pointed out that women’s sexual desires are routinely treated as nonexistent, that the very possibility of sex between women has often been refuted, and that scholarship must not redouble these misreadings, rendering lesbian desire once again phantasmic. Terry Castle, for example, kicked against what she called the “often cloying” model of romantic friendships (1993, 95) explored by Faderman, Elizabeth Mavor (1971), and others. The early scholarship on romantic friendships had defined itself against “individual psychosexual developments” (Smith-Rosenberg 1975, 2) in favor of describing social bonds. In Faderman’s and Mavor’s hands, this methodology was mostly anti-psychological. Faderman claimed that the category of romantic friendships disappeared in the wake of the invention of the category “lesbian.” Sexology, Faderman argues, “changed the course of same-sex relationships” because it simultaneously turned lesbianism into an available identity and “cast suspicion on romantic friendships” (1991, 35). Similarly, Mavor deemed Freudian interpretation a “blunt instrument” (1971, xvii). Castle, however, bridled against the way that these scholars made sexual innocence the default interpretation for the same-sex female bonds they were uncovering, repudiating what she called the “no-sex-before-1900” school of thought (1993,
More recently, Sharon Marcus has built on the notion that nineteenth-century “female marriages” were variations on marital convention rather than challenges to it. Her in-depth 2007 study of friendship, desire, and marriage in Victorian England is undergirded by a methodological objection to work on gender and sexuality that has overly emphasized deviance, transgression, and oppression. Foucauldian approaches to the history of sexuality have been structured by pathology and prohibition, which, Marcus argues, skewed the archive. Turning away from sexology, psychology, and law, she instead explores the representation of bonds between women in the more quotidian media of life writing, advertising, dolls, and fashion.

Since scholars first learned to think of same-sex bonds between women as culturally central, there have been two significant turns in queer theory that offer opportunities for revisions of critical understandings of romantic friendships and Boston marriages. The first is trans theory. Many of the women in these relationships called themselves “husbands” and took on other forms of masculine identification. Should they therefore be considered to have transgender, rather than lesbian, subjectivities? “John” Radclyffe Hall (1880–1943) was, for example, “husband” to “wife” Una Troubridge (1887–1963), and scholars such as Jay Prosser (2001) have begun to argue that Hall’s depiction of themself as an “invert” or member of the “third sex” should be read as a transgender narrative.

The second relevant turn in queer theory is toward scholarship that establishes identifications with asexuality or celibacy. In the 1980s and 1990s Faderman and Castle jousted over whether there was any sex between the women in Boston marriages and romantic friendships. In a 2013 work, Benjamin Kahan offered the category of “celibacy” to “break [the] deadlock” between Faderman and Castle, suggesting that although some Boston marriages included sex and some did not, all “share a social identity with celibacy” (41). Kahan’s approach does not exclude the sensual or erotic but is rather a way of theorizing sexuality without sex. As such, he offers a history to an emergent contemporary identity category, asexual.

This new work in queer theory provides some counterbalance to the field’s earlier investments in transgression. Scholars have begun to ask whether it is possible to instead have queer theory without antinormativity and have pointed out that the privileging of transgressive energies and identities has been predicated on white, visible, able, and masculine bodies. Given that a key element of Boston marriages and romantic friendships was that they were, on the whole, socially sanctioned, there is an opportunity for these renovations of queer theory to be mapped back onto older forms of female intimacy. And what of future queer scholarship? Is anything on the horizon that might make the field revisit the history of Boston marriage and romantic friendship? If so, it might come from a surprising quarter—an expanded study of heterosexual marriage.
Scholars have fought over presumptions of sexlessness in Boston marriages, but what of straight marriages? Was sex always or consistently a central term in that institution? When scholars write of the “convenience or economy” (Kahan 2013, 41) of women living together, what is the history of those imperatives with regard to heterosexuality? Elizabeth Freeman’s 2002 work on what she called the “wedding complex” showed that the rituals inaugurating monogamous heterosexual marriages have always been sites for “imagining and enacting forms of social intimacy” (294) that exceed monogamy and heterosexuality. The contemporary polyamory movement has also helped query the centrality of monogamy to heterosexual relationships. If scholars can simultaneously resituate celibacy in gay male culture and non-monogamy in straight culture, they may open some interesting paths via which to revisit the history of lesbian marital formations.

SEE ALSO Female Husband; Marriage, Woman-Woman, in Africa; Sappho, Nineteenth-Century Rediscovery of; The Well of Loneliness (1928; Radclyffe Hall)

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Rupp, Leila J., ed. Journal of Women's History 12, no. 3 (2000).

The limited evidence that exists of the sexual mores of precolonial southern African societies living in the region that includes present-day Botswana suggests that same-sex sexual practices were probably commonplace and accepted by the original Khoisan hunter-gatherers but not by the agricultural Bantu-speaking settlers who dominated the region by the end of the first millennium CE. These settlers had various tribal or totemic identities but were mostly close enough culturally and linguistically to be grouped together by ethnicity (plural: Batswana; singular: Motswana) and language (Setswana). The colonial experience—and resistance to it—brought them still closer, and a half-century of independence has further solidified Batswana's sense of national and ethnic identity.

Whereas egalitarian Khoisan societies had little need to police sex or gender, the labor-intensive agriculture and ancestor veneration practiced by the Bantu-speaking newcomers required large families, clear lineages, and strict hierarchies of gender and age. Sexuality was identified with procreation, leaving little room for the expression of homosexual desires or gender diversity. Nonnormative sexual and gender inclinations must nevertheless have existed and may sometimes have found expression. Although the power of socialization to make “deviant” behaviors literally unthinkable should not be underestimated, there is inferential evidence that, before childbearing age at least, nonprocreative sexual activities, including same-sex relations, were seen as “play” and winked at if carried on discreetly.

Colonialism, Christianity, and Capitalism

Colonialism brought concepts and practices that both disrupted and reinforced existing ones. Christianity was slow to take root—the pioneering missionary Robert Moffat (1795–1883) famously admitted he made only about 200 converts in fifty years of evangelizing the Batswana—but gained ground rapidly once local believers took the lead and emphasized those aspects of the Christian message and “culture” most congruent with existing Setswana customs and values.
This indigenization process arguably enabled the most sexually repressive aspects of Setswana traditional culture and Victorian Christianity to reinforce each other in colonial Bechuanaland (1885–1966). Traditional culture confined public discussion of sex to the bogwera (male) and bojale (female) initiation ceremonies at the onset of adulthood. These were now abandoned as pagan. The new mission schools taught nothing about sex and sexuality but superimposed heteronormative Victorian concepts of gender over the already strict Setswana ones. This reinforced some aspects of traditional patriarchy but clashed with others, most notably polygyny (the practice of having more than one wife).

The new silence around sex, together with the promotion of strict Victorian gender norms and the introduction of legal prohibitions against “gross indecency” and “carnal knowledge against the order of nature,” further denied nonnormative sexual desires and gender identities. At the same time, however, colonial capitalism introduced modes of social and economic organization—including migrant labor, salaried employment, private ownership of land, town life, and paid work for women—that, by disrupting traditional familial ties and opening new social spaces, created previously unimaginable opportunities for freer sexual and gender expression in, for example, boarding schools, worker hostels, and the more anonymous environments of new urban spaces such as Gaborone and Francistown. Ironically, traditional Setswana concern for the integrity of the family and lineage enabled a limited freedom in this regard. Together with traditional taboos around the public discussion of sex outside initiation, it made something of a fetish of domestic privacy. This permitted a degree of tolerance—albeit circumscribed and provisional—of sexual and gender nonconformity by enabling people to “look the other way” (go ikgatholosa) as long as forbidden relationships were carried on discreetly and did not disturb social cohesion or interfere with the responsibility to marry, produce children, and carry on a lineage. This tradition of discretion and “open secrets” has remained strong despite the disruptions of colonialism and globalization.

Emergence of the Struggle for LGBTQ Rights

The originally Western concepts of sexual orientation, gender identity, and sexual rights demand public recognition of sexual minorities and legal and policy reforms to ensure equality of citizenship. This conflicts with a traditional reluctance to acknowledge sexual and gender nonconformity publicly or to “intrude” into familial privacy. The struggle for LGBTQ rights in Botswana illustrates both the challenge this conflict poses for African activists who want to avoid the charge of merely copying Western LGBTQ activism and the potential of using indigenous values to build a more effective local LGBTQ movement.

Organized LGBTQ activism in Botswana dates from the mid-1990s. “Gay life” before this was confined to house parties and a handful of bars in Gaborone and Francistown that tolerated discreet LGBTQ customers. Those with the means enjoyed the larger and more open LGBTQ social scenes in South Africa and developed connections with South African activists, especially after the African National Congress officially endorsed LGBTQ equality in 1990. Some activists began to discuss ways of promoting a more open, rights-based environment for the LGBTQ community in Botswana.

In December 1994 Utjiwa Kanane, a Motswana, and Graham Norrie, a British expatriate, were arrested in a hotel room in Francistown and charged with "carnal knowledge against the order of nature" (Section 164 of Botswana's penal code, unamended since colonial times). Except for a little noticed case of prison rape in 1991, this was the first time the “sodomy statute” had been invoked since independence in 1966. Norrie pleaded guilty and was fined and deported. Kanane appealed his conviction, arguing that the statute discriminated on the basis of gender (it referred only to males) and violated his right to freedom of association. His unprecedented boldness and defense by a prominent opposition lawyer made the case a cause célèbre, bringing homosexuality and the idea of sexual rights prominently into public discourse for the first time in Botswana and galvanizing the small LGBTQ community's nascent interest in sexuality as a human rights issue.

In 1998 the language of Section 164 was made gender neutral in a move to nullify the strongest argument for vacating Kanane’s conviction. This underscored the state’s hostility to LGBTQ rights and motivated some gay men and lesbians in Gaborone to launch Botswana’s first LGBTQ advocacy and education group, Lesbians, Gays, and Bisexuals of Botswana (LeGaBiBo). To avoid the expense and security risks of applying for nongovernmental organization (NGO) registration, LeGaBiBo was hosted as a program of the Botswana Centre for Human Rights, known as Ditshwanelo, an amicus curiae (impartial adviser) in Kanane’s appeal. Over the next five years, LeGaBiBo organized several pioneering workshops for the Gaborone LGBTQ community, but funding constraints prevented more from being done. After the Kanane appeal failed in 2003, outside interest subsided, and the LeGaBiBo program closed for lack of funds. In 2005 a different group revived LeGaBiBo as a program of the Botswana Network on Ethics, Law, and HIV/AIDS (BONELA). This time, the group applied for registration as an NGO but was denied on the grounds that registering an organization for “homosexuals” would amount to condoning illegal acts. Nevertheless, no action was taken against LeGaBiBo or BONELA.

Meanwhile, the strategy of addressing LGBTQ rights through the lens of HIV prevention proved fortuitous. At the time, Botswana had the highest estimated HIV prevalence rate in the world, and the government in conjunction with major international donors had recently launched the first free national antiretroviral-drug treatment program in Africa, along with a massive and unusually frank public education program that stressed, among other things, openness about sex. The importance of “key populations,” including “men who have sex with men,” was recognized by both donors and the government, and funding became available for initiatives targeting them. These necessarily involved the promotion of at least limited LGBTQ rights (e.g., the right to nondiscrimination in health care). LeGaBiBo was able to acquire a permanent, professional staff for the first time and the resources to develop a sophisticated program of activism. In particular, as a participant in BONELA's HIV/AIDS activities, it engaged with audiences that would otherwise have been inaccessible: members of parliament, government officials, police and armed forces personnel, teachers, health-care workers, traditional leaders (dikgosi), and ordinary Batswana at the traditional ward meetings (dikgotla) that are key shapers of public opinion.

In the process, LeGaBiBo developed a communication strategy that blends Western-originating international human rights discourse with the indigenous tradition of botho (humanness), which is, in effect, Botswana's “state philosophy” and has been relentlessly promoted in the media and education system since independence. Botho's emphasis on molomo (dialogue) and tlotlo (respect) is routinely cited as responsible for the prosperity and continuous peace that Botswana, unlike many other African countries, has enjoyed. By invoking these principles in its own work, LeGaBiBo has been able to get at least a polite hearing. This strategy may account for the otherwise incongruous protection of sexual orientation in the Employment Act of 2010, the first such policy in sub-Saharan Africa. The civility and avoidance of open conflict enjoined by botho have arguably helped prevent the backlash that LGBTQ activism has provoked in some other African countries.

In 2011 LeGaBiBo reapplied for registration and was again refused. This time, it sued the government, arguing constitutional grounds (equal protection of the law, freedom of association, and freedom of expression), and won. The government appealed the initial ruling, but in March 2016 Botswana's highest court dismissed the appeal, and LeGaBiBo was finally registered on 29 April 2016. Traditional cultural factors may have played an important role in the legal process. The attorney general's arguments struck many as less than competent, and it was widely speculated that the appeal was meant to fail. Being compelled by the courts inoculated the government against political fallout, but it also continued a policy of go ikgatholosa regarding LGBTQ rights. In 2010 former president Festus Mogae revealed that during his term (1998–2008) he had instructed the police not to enforce Section 164, and his successor, Ian Khama, reiterated that same year that “if you see someone and you know that they are gay, they are not going to be arrested and charged.... Being gay is private. Let us take it gore ke tsa bone [that it is their business].”
Botswana's President Ian Khama in 2014. Khama advocated a policy of gore ke tsa bone (that is their business) toward the country's LGBTQ population during his presidency from 2008 to 2018.

The fact that Khama has long been rumored to be gay makes traditional values, in particular the practice of go ikgatholosa, an especially significant issue for LGBTQ activism in Botswana. Khama was the favorite son of Botswana's revered founding president, Seretse Khama, and is the hereditary paramount chief of the country's largest “tribe.” He was vice president under Mogae and head of the armed forces before that, and he and his family enjoy tremendous prestige. His homosexuality, widely regarded as an open secret among the urban, educated elite, is not publicly discussed as such in Botswana, although his bachelor status regularly is, usually in the context of speculation about “fiancées.” Khama's only officially acknowledged engagement was announced during the run-up to his first presidential election campaign, but the relationship “ petered out” after he was elected (Tabengwa 2011). For many, this only confirmed the rumors, yet journalists and political opponents have continued to “look the other way.” In the meantime, stories about the president’s sex life circulate quietly in an LGBTQ community that is increasingly assertive about its rights but that also enjoys a limited and makeshift degree of tolerance based on the traditional discretion around sexuality that the president’s situation illustrates so strikingly.

Whether Botswana's indigenous culture of discretion, of which go ikgatholosa is a key part, can coexist with modern expectations of “out-and-proud” LGBTQ identities remains to be seen. The results so far of LeGaBiBo’s strategic use of botho suggest this may be possible, and developments in Botswana should therefore be carefully watched by LGBTQ activists. Much will depend on the extent to which traditional discretion reflects the humanism of bothe, which should ultimately make it compatible with international human rights discourse, or is in reality merely an indigenous expression of homophobia and transphobia.

SEE ALSO Activism in Africa South of the Sahara; Colonialism in Africa South of the Sahara; HIV/AIDS in Africa; Human Rights

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Boys love (BL; also written “boys’ love” and “boy’s love”) first emerged in Japan in commercially published shōjo manga (girls’ comics) magazines at the beginning of the 1970s. The male characters in these relationships usually do not identify as “gay” (gei), and many artists and fans have distanced their works from connections to real-life homosexual men. Fans themselves, however, have made these connections since the genre first appeared (Welker 2015). While its genesis is roughly concurrent with Anglophone “slash” fiction—a type of fan fiction in which, typically, female fans of a television series or other work pair existing male characters to create fantasy same-sex relationships—no connection has been established between the origins of slash and BL. Although initially created by young female artists to help adolescent girl readers in Japan circumvent restrictive norms on female gender and sexual expression, contemporary BL fans use the freedom provided by this media to enjoy “pure romance” as well as to “play” with gender and sexuality in general (Fujimoto 2015). This media has at times been criticized by gay men for appropriation of their image (Ishida 2015), but its popularity in Japan shows no signs of abating, and some gay and bisexual men enjoy it (Baudinette 2017).

BL also continues to spread globally. In the early decades of the 2000s, BL media from Japan, as well as locally produced BL inspired in whole or in part by Japanese BL, is consumed around the world in multiple media formats including manga, anime, prose fiction, video games, drama CDs, illustrations, music videos, and live-action films and television programs. These BL media are variously created and circulated in many countries and transnationally through both commercial and noncommercial channels. In terms of scale, in Japan alone the total annual market size including both commercial and noncommercial sales was estimated at around 22 billion yen (roughly $200 million) in the middle of the 2010s (Yano Research Institute 2017).

BL in Japan

While preceded in the early 1960s by male homoerotic fiction by writer Mari Mori (1903–1987), the origin of BL is usually linked to a new generation of young women artists who reinvented shōjo manga, including new approaches to gender and sexuality. The creation of BL is often specifically attributed to Keiko Takemiya (1950–) and Moto Hagio (1949–), whose short manga works “Yuki to hoshi to tenshi to ...” (1970; Snow and stars and angels and ...) and “Jūichigatsu no gimunajiumu” (1971; November gymnasium), respectively, are widely considered the first works of the genre. Hagio’s subsequent Tōma no shinzō (1974; released in English as The Heart of Thomas) and Takemiya’s Kaze to ki no uta (1976–1984; The song of the wind and the trees), alongside manga such as Toshie Kihara’s (1948–) Mari to Shingo (1977–1984; Mari and Shingo) and Ryōko Yamagishi’s (1947–) Hi izuru tokoro no tenshi (1980–1984; Emperor of the land of the rising sun), are some of the most significant manga works of the genre in its first two decades (Welker 2015), when the genre was usually called shōnen'ai or bishōnen manga.

In the 1970s and 1980s, manga labeled shōnen'ai, meaning love (ai) for or by boys (shōnen), typically featured romantic or sexual relationships between beautiful boys (bishōnen) or young men. A number of popular shōnen'ai works were serialized in mainstream shōjo manga magazines over many years alongside works in other genres, sometimes created by the same artists. Popular works were also released in bound volumes. While Takemiya’s Kaze to ki no uta, for instance, included somewhat explicit sex scenes, commercially published shōnen'ai works of this period generally depict no more physical intimacy than passionate kisses. This may explain why the label “shōnen'ai” has come to be used by fans outside Japan, who often spell it “shounen-ai,” to describe works that depict romantic but not sexual relationships. The term has largely fallen out of use among manga fans in Japan, where it retains its original meaning of pederasty.
By the mid-1970s, female fans were beginning to create fan works that paired into homosexual relationships ostensibly heterosexual male characters from existing texts, such as the anime _Uchū senkan Yamato_ (1974–1975; Space battleship Yamato; later localized for the United States and other markets as _Star Blazers_), as well as real-life rock stars and other celebrities, such as members of the band Led Zeppelin. Circulation of _dōjinshi_ (fanzines) featuring such manga and fan fiction at fan events date to around the same time at Tokyo’s Comic Market (Komikku Māketto; shortened to both Komiketto and Komike, stylized in Roman letters as Comiket and Comike). Comic Market was established as an event for sharing _dōjinshi_, including both original and derivative work. While it has become a massive biannual three-day event that often sees participation by over 500,000 attendees and 35,000 _sākuru_ (circles; i.e., groups that produce and distribute _dōjinshi_ and other media and goods), Comic Market was first held in December 1975 with around 700 attendees, then mostly adolescent girls. The popularity of male homoerotic works by and for female fans at Comic Market in its early years was a major impetus for the publication of the magazine _June_ (originally called _Comic Jun_) in late 1978. _June_’s position as the sole commercial publication focused on male homoerotic manga and fiction by and for female consumers led to its title being used as a genre label among fans and others, who called such work “June” or “June-mono” (June things). “June” continues to be used alongside “BL” at Comic Market to label original BL works (Welker 2015).

One of the three days of every Comic Market is dominated by original and derivative BL works. In addition, nearly every weekend somewhere in the country there is at least one fan event involving anywhere from fewer than one hundred to thousands of fans at which BL dōjinshi and related goods and sometimes “cosplay” (costume play) are the primary or only focus. Attendees and circle members at these events are overwhelmingly female and range in age from teens to fifties. At events focused on original works, such as J.Garden, a majority of attendees and circle participants are in their thirties or older, while at events focused on parodies of recently popular manga and anime, a majority are under thirty.

In 1979 members of the circle Ravuri (Lovely), popular at Comic Market, released a dōjinshi titled Rappori: Yaoi tokushū go (Rappori: Yaoi special issue) containing original male homoerotic narratives. The yaoi in the title is an acronym for “yama nashi, ochi nashi, imi nashi” (roughly, no climax, no point, no meaning), which had recently been used by members of the circle as a self-deprecating label for their work in general, regardless of content. Its use in the title of this dōjinshi, however, led to the term being specifically associated with male homoerotic work. While the yaoi special issue contained no explicit sex scenes, the relative freedom from constraints imposed by commercial publishers meant that some dōjinshi distributed at Comic Market and elsewhere contain very explicit sex scenes (Welker 2015). Although through the beginning of the 2000s the term yaoi in Japanese tended to be associated with male-male romance dōjinshi in general, with no reference to the level of explicitness, the relatively common nature of explicit sex scenes in these dōjinshi may be the reason that outside Japan “yaoi” is often used as a label for sexually explicit works.

By the mid-1980s, homoerotic parodies coupling characters from popular shōnen anime and manga such as Yōichi Takahashi’s manga and anime series Kyaputen Tsubasa (Captain Tsubasa), a narrative about a boys’ soccer team that was first serialized in the shōnen manga magazine Shōnen Jump from 1981 to 1988, became a large and very visible presence at Comic Market. Other major shōnen manga and anime, often featuring sports teams because they provide many possible character couplings, have served as source material since then. Works that have been popular among creators of derivative BL include Seinto Seiya (originally serialized 1986–1990; released in English as Saint Seiya), Yoroi den samurai torūpā (1988–1989; Samurai Troopers), and Slam Dunk (1990–1996), followed by One Piece (1997–), Naruto (1999–2014), Tenisu no ojisama (1999–2008; Prince of Tennis), Yowamushi Pedal (2008–), and Haikyū!! (2012–) (Welker 2015).

The strong continued popularity of original and derivative male-male romance narratives in commercial magazines and at Comic Market and other events throughout the 1980s helped set off a wave of new commercial activity. Several dozen new commercial magazines featuring male homoerotic manga or fiction were established between 1989 and 1995, though many were short-lived (Welker 2015). The magazine Image distinguished itself with the tagline “BOY’S LOVE❤ COMIC [sic]” on the cover of its first issue in December 1991. The phrase is almost certainly a direct translation into English of shōnen’ai manga, a term that was still in use among fans. Within a few years, the term boy's love—also written boys’ love and in the phonetic katakana script (pronounced bōizurabu) or abbreviated to BL (pronounced bīeru)—would grow increasingly popular (Welker 2015). While Image and many other magazines of this era initially published the work of amateur artists, “boy’s love” and variants became associated mainly with commercial works, in contrast to “yaoi” and sometimes “June,” associated mainly with amateur works. This distinction largely disappeared in Japan over the course of the first decade of the twenty-first century. Perhaps owing to the relative lack of explicit sex scenes but common presence of implied sex in commercially published BL, outside Japan, “boys love” has come to be used by many fans as a label for works with some sexual content but few or no explicit sex scenes. Among contemporary fans in Japan, however, “boys love” and “BL” are widely used as broad labels encompassing all such narratives.

In early twenty-first-century Japan, there are major and minor publishers producing over a dozen monthly, bimonthly, and semiannual magazines and multiple imprints of BL books sold online and around Japan at bookstores, many of which have shelves or whole sections devoted to BL manga and prose fiction. In addition, BL anime have sometimes been broadcast on television, beginning with Mineo Maya’s shōnen’ai-themed Patarillo! in 1982. Notable BL anime series include the anime versions of Maki Murakami’s Gravitation broadcast in 2000, Yun Kōga’s Loveless in 2005, and Shungiku Nakamura’s Junjo Romantica in 2008. The original sports anime with strong BL themes Yuri!!! on Ice, broadcast in Japan in late 2016, quickly became a global hit, winning seven of Crunchyroll’s Anime Awards for 2016, including Anime of the Year. Recordings of male voice actors performing BL narratives were first distributed in the late 1980s, starting with Tsuzumigabuchi, released in 1988 by the publisher of June (Nishimura 2015). Later, these BL dramas began circulating on CDs called drama (dorama) CDs or BLCDs, which continue to be popular, along with mp3s and other digital formats. Popular BL video games, the first of which is said to be Boy x Boy: Shiritsu Kōryō Gakuin Seishin Ryō (1999; Boy x Boy: Kōryō Gakuin Seishin dorm) (Nishimura 2015), include both romancedriven games and those with pornographic content. Outside of the commercial marketplace, BL-related dōjinshi and cosplay events, which can be traced back to the Comic Market, are held around Japan with great regularity. A neighborhood in Tokyo’s Higashi Ikebukuro district has become a mecca for BL fans, with multiple shops devoted to the sale of commercial and fan-produced BL media and related goods along a street nicknamed “Otome Road” (maiden road).

As of the second decade of the 2000s, most BL fans and creators are still female, but there are a small number of gay, bisexual, and heterosexual males involved in the consumption and production of BL in Japan (Baudinette 2017).
BL outside Japan

By the 2010s, BL had developed thriving fandoms in many countries in Asia, Europe, and elsewhere, especially online, entailing the consumption of official translations as well as fan-translated pirated versions of Japanese BL manga and prose fiction, and the sharing of fan art and fan fiction. The foundations for this fandom in many countries were laid in the 1990s, or earlier in some regions. As interest in the genre spread, BL gradually began to appear in a number of countries via individual imports, licensed and fan translations, and locally produced works. In the mid-1990s, BL fans around the world began using the internet to share information about Japanese BL manga and anime, distribute their own unofficial synopses and translations, and sometimes gather together to translate works (Sabucco 2003). While licensed and pirated hard copies of BL manga and anime as well as BL fan works are available at bookstores, and conventions are regularly held in dozens of countries, the internet remains the primary source of BL and primary site of sharing BL outside Japan.

In the first decades of the twenty-first century, BL is particularly popular in Asia, where BL fandom appears to have developed earlier than elsewhere. In Taiwan, for instance, in the mid-1980s BL parodies of Saint Seiya were published in the back of commercially published pirated translations of the original manga in a section called “Xingshi xiaojuchang” (Seiya little theater) (Miyako 2016). In the early 1990s, pirated BL manga began to appear in the Chinese marketplace as part of an influx of Japanese manga (Yang and Xu 2017). However, due to relative ease of production and distribution, in China prose fiction is by far the most common form of BL. In China, BL is usually called danmei, the Chinese pronunciation of the Japanese term tanbi (aesthetic), a term that has sometimes been used to label BL in Japan. In spite of the difficulty of publishing locally—on account of being targeted by state censors because of the genre’s association with both homosexuality and pornography—a handful of short-lived magazines have been published since 1999, while amateur artists have been distributing fanzines (tongrenzhi) at fan events since the beginning of the 2010s (Yang and Xu 2017). Danmei has also developed a massive online presence, primarily in the form of prose fiction. Fans can be roughly divided into three “circles” (quan) based on their focus: original Chinese danmei fiction, Japanese works, and Euro-American slash fiction (Yang and Xu 2017). The online danmei fan community includes a large number of fans from outside mainland China, including Taiwan and Hong Kong, as well as diasporic Chinese around the world (Yang and Xu 2017). As in Japan, in Chineselanguage BL fandom the connection between BL and real gay men is not straightforward, but some BL fans in Taiwan were involved in activism supporting same-sex marriage rights.

Concurrent with China, BL was first imported by individuals in the first half of the 1990s into South Korea, where it has been strongly associated with dōjinshi fan culture (Kim
The circulation of a pirated version of Minami Ozaki's (1968–) influential BL manga Zetsuai (1989–1991; Absolute love) in 1993 served to ignite a long-running and still ongoing yaoi boom among fans of the female-targeted sunjeong manhwa (pure romance comics) within the dōjinshi fan community (Kim 2013).

Southeast Asia has also seen the development of a strong and overlapping community of BL fans and producers, who sometimes attend fan conventions in neighboring countries (Bauwens-Sugimoto 2017). In many parts of this region, BL media is kept underground by legal restrictions and cultural norms proscribing pornography and homosexuality. The expectation that teenage girls and young women would not be interested in either helps make it possible for them to create and consume this media without attracting outside attention (Bauwens-Sugimoto 2017). In the Philippines, Lights Out, a small convention for fans of yaoi and BL, was held annually in Manila from 2003 to 2010, and reestablished two years later as BLush Convention. In contrast with Japanese fans, Filipino yaoi fans associate the genre with gay men, and many describe it as “gay love” or “gay porn” (Fermin 2013). Local publisher of Japanese manga-style comics Black Ink has been publishing original BL manga in Tagalog since the early 2010s. The popularity of translated (often pirated) and original BL manga and prose fiction helped inspire the production in the 2010s of dozens of BL-themed live-action films and television series in Thailand, where BL media overlaps... with LGBTQ media. These live-action media are popular around the region, and increasingly around the world, as versions subtitled by fans in multiple languages circulate online via networks both of BL fans and of gay men.

BL fandom in Europe and the Anglophone world also dates to the early to mid-1990s. The first local BL fanzine was produced in Italy in 1994, followed by the official Italian release of an anime version of Kazuma Kodaka’s (1969–) manga Kizuna: Koi no kara sawagi (1992–2008; released in English as Kizuna: Bonds of Love). Successful sales led to the release of more BL anime. Marimo Ragawa’s New York, New York (1994–1998) was the first licensed translated BL manga in Italian when it was published by Marvel Italia in 1999 (Sabucco 2000). In France, a translation of the popular manga collective CLAMP’s Tokyo Babylon (1990–1993), a series with a male-male romance plot, was released by commercial publisher Tonkam beginning in 1996. Starting in the twenty-first century, a thriving BL fanzine scene began to develop in France, with fanzines containing any combination of critiques, original comics, and derivative fan art and fan fiction (Sylvius 2012). In Germany, the first official translation of Ozaki’s Zetsuai was released by Hamburg publisher Carlsen starting in 2000, and it soon drew the attention of the German media and inspired other presses to follow suit (Malone 2010).

The United States had developed enough of a BL fan base to support a BL-focused fan convention, San Francisco’s YaoiCon, as early as 2001. In 2017 BishounenCon, a second BL-themed convention, was first held in Warwick, Rhode Island. BL and BL fans have also long had a visible presence at other conventions, including Comic-Con International in San Diego and Sakura-Con in Seattle. The United States saw its first licensed translation of a BL manga in 2003: volume 1 of Sanami Matoh’s (1969–) Fake (1993–2000), released by Tokyopop, followed by Kodaka’s Kizuna by Central Park Media’s Be Beautiful imprint. The success of these soon led to more licensed publications of BL (Pagliassotti 2008). BL has subsequently been published by other major publishers of English-language manga and graphic novels, including Viz and Yen Press. There have also been niche publishers of BL in the United States, including Yaoi Press, founded in 2004 with a focus on publishing original English-language BL from around the world. Soon after the first English-language print editions of BL appeared, the release of digital editions of BL manga works began, including on the major site eManga. com, run by Digital Manga. Digital Manga’s imprint Juné, named after the first commercial BL magazine in Japan, has published several hundred print and digital editions of BL titles in English (Brienza 2016). In some cases, commercial presses have altered the ages of characters under eighteen or otherwise changed the original works to avoid the implication or depiction of minors in sexual situations (Pagliassotti 2008; Brienza 2016). On account of its market size, the United States has been the primary hub for licensed English translations and releases of BL media.

In Latin America, which has also seen a flourishing of BL fandom in the first two decades of the twenty-first century, BL primarily circulates in a mix of Spanish, Portuguese, and Local Amazon stores and other online bookstores are dominated by English-language translations of Japanese BL manga as well as original English-language BL fiction. Locally produced manga and fiction and translations from Japanese into Spanish and Portuguese are published in print and digital formats by mainstream and niche commercial presses, however. For instance, Lit Ediciones, with the tagline “Yaoi Hecho en México” (yaoi made in Mexico), has been publishing local BL since 2016, while Oops Comics Studio, based in Monterrey, Mexico, describes itself as publisher of doujinshi (dōjinshi) with yaoi and yuri (female-female romance) themes. In Brazil, Editora Draco, publisher of fantasy, science fiction, and graphic novels, and NewPOP Editora, publisher of manga and comics, have released a small number of original Portuguese-language and translated Japanese BL titles. BL fans and works are also visible at conventions. In Monterrey, Oops Summer Fest, which bills itself in promotions as “the first yaoi event in Mexico” was first held in September 2016. Doki Doki City, first held over two days in November 2017 in Mexico City, has described itself on its website as “the largest and most important yaoi-themed convention in Latin America.”

BL-Related Terminology

As noted previously, since its creation in the 1970s, BL media has been referred to as “shōnen'ai,” “yaoi,” “June,” “boys love,” and “BL,” among other labels, at various stages in its development. These labels have sometimes been used by creators and fans to reference specific periods and forms of BL. In the early twenty-first century, “BL” and “boys love” have been the primary labels for the genre in Japan. In English and some other languages, these terms are sometimes used alongside “shōnen'ai” and “yaoi,” often spelled or pronounced differently, to classify works based on the degree of sexual explicitness.

In Japan, passionate fans of BL are sometimes called and self-identify as fujoshi, meaning “rotten women” or “rotten girls.” The term, which became popular in the middle of the first decade of the twenty-first century, is a homophone of and a play on a word meaning “women” and “girls.” Male BL fans are sometimes called fudanshi, meaning “rotten boys” or “rotten men.” Other terms using fu, meaning “rotten,” have also been coined in Japanese to refer to this fandom. Local pronunciations and variants of these and other terms are in use among fans in Chinese, English, Korean, and many other languages.

In Japanese, amateur works are classified as either orijinaru (original) or sōsaku (original works), or niji sōsaku (derivative works) or aniparo (short for anime parodi [parody]). The pairing of two characters together is often called kappuringu (coupling) in Japanese, while in English this is often called “shipping,” which is short for “relationshipping.” In couples, one partner is usually exclusively sexually insertive and the other sexually receptive in anal intercourse, which is an expected though not always depicted part of relationships in most BL. Couples in which partners engage in both roles are rare. The sexually insertive partner, who is commonly also socially dominant, is called the seme (attacker), while the receptive partner is called the uke (receiver), terms that date back to the 1980s in this sphere (Ishida 2010). Many terms exist to classify subtypes of seme and uke based on their personality. Seme and uke are used among fans speaking other languages, though the pronunciation is often different. Some members of the gay community in Japan have begun using seme in place of tachi, the longstanding term for the sexually dominant, or insertive, and usually more masculine partner (Ishida 2010). While uke has been used in the gay community since at least the 1950s (Ishida 2010), the term neko had been the dominant term to refer to the sexually passive, or receptive, partner from the 1990s (Ishida 2010) through the early 2010s. However, 9monsters, a popular mobile phone dating app for gay and bisexual men released in 2011, asks users to identify themselves as “tachi,” “uke,” or riba (short for “reversible,” meaning versatile), favoring the term used in BL.

In Japan, BL is sometimes considered to include a genre called shota, which depicts prepubescent boys, often in sexual relationships with significantly older boys or men. The genre name derives from the term Shōtarō complex, an attraction to prepubescent boys named after the young male protagonist in the 1950s to 1960s manga and animated series Tetsujin 28-gō (called Gigantor in its American adaptation). While many BL are set in high school or middle school, shota works involve characters of elementary school age or younger. Also, in contrast with BL, shota has a very large male fandom. A series of shota fan events first held in 2006 called Shota Scratch, for instance, is dominated by male participants.

In Japan, BL is treated as distinct from the minor category of manga made by and for gay men, which is often called gei manga, gei komikku (gay comic), or gei komi (Baudinette 2017). Fan events for this type of media are dominated by male fans and creators. In English and other languages, this manga is sometimes called bara (rose), based on the history of that term’s association with homosexual men in Japan. Outside of Japan, however, the line between these two genres and male and female fandoms and artists is significantly less clear.

SEE ALSO Otaku Sexualities in Japan; Pornography in Asia; Pulp Fiction, Gay and Lesbian

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Brienza, Casey. Manga in America: Transnational Book Publishing and the Domestication of

Lavin, Maud, Ling Yang, and Jing Jamie Zhao, eds. Boys’ Love, Cosplay, and Androgynous Idols: Queer Fan Cultures in Mainland China, Hong Kong, and Taiwan. Hong Kong: Hong Kong University Press, 2017.

“Brokeback Mountain” is a short story by the American writer Annie Proulx (1935–), originally published in 1997 in the New Yorker. In 2005 it was adapted into an Oscarwinning motion picture directed by Ang Lee. Proulx’s story narrates the twenty-year love affair between Ennis del Mar and Jack Twist, two young ranch hands who meet and become lovers while tending sheep in the mountains of Wyoming during the summer of 1963. Denying to one another that they are “queers,” they maintain secrecy around their relationship and part ways when the summer ends. Although they both go on to marry a woman, Jack and Ennis reunite several years later and resume their affair. Jack proposes that the two men buy a ranch together, but Ennis refuses, recalling the violence he witnessed as a child against two rural men who were believed to be lovers. The affair continues over the next two decades, but the relationship is ultimately strained by difficult timing, geographical differences, and Jack’s resentment of Ennis’s refusal to make a life with him. When news of Jack’s death reaches Ennis in 1983, he suspects that Jack may have been the victim of homophobic violence and expresses profound regret over his inability to commit to him.

Proulx’s body of fiction focuses on the complexities of rural life, particularly in the American West, and “Brokeback Mountain” is one of Proulx’s only stories that addresses gay themes. She anticipated that the story would be controversial, but it quickly garnered praise in the literary world, winning an O. Henry Award and a National Magazine Award in 1998. The story was later included in her awardwinning 1999 collection Close Range: Wyoming Stories. Despite the story’s mainstream success, Proulx recalls that very few LGBT organizations reached out to her after it was published and that it was also met with resistance by residents of Wyoming. Nonetheless, Proulx also received a number of moving letters written by sexual minorities from rural areas who saw their own experiences reflected in Jack and Ennis’s story. Following the release of the feature film, Proulx was dismayed by the influx of mail she received from readers with “powerful fantasy lives” (Cox 2009) who offered alternative endings to the story that envisioned Ennis living a happy life with new male lovers.
Scene from Brokeback Mountain (2005), Starring Jake Gyllenhaal (left) and Heath Ledger. Annie Proulx's short story "Brokeback Mountain" about two Wyoming ranch hands who maintain a homosexual relationship was made into a feature film in 2005. The movie garnered widespread attention for its groundbreaking portrayal of a homosexual relationship between two ruggedly masculine men in a rural setting, overturning the stereotype of gays as effeminate urbanites.

Indeed, the reach of the story broadened significantly with the release the story's feature-film adaptation in 2005. Screenwriters Larry McMurtry and Diana Ossana remained largely faithful to the original story, and the film featured Oscar-nominated performances by Heath Ledger and Jake Gyllenhaal. It received many critical accolades, and won Oscars for Best Director, Best Adapted Screenplay, and Best Original Score. It was nominated for eight Oscars total, including Best Picture. A Taiwanese director living in New York, Lee had a history of experimenting with a variety of genres, and his take on the American Western reflected his affinity for the genre's romance. The Taiwanese director Yao-chi Chen described Brokeback Mountain as an "outstanding cross-cultural performance" that incorporated visual and thematic elements of Chinese cinema and poetry, from a focus on landscape to the understated expression of its characters' deeply felt passions (Associated Press 2006).

As the film gained widespread popularity and acclaim, it received some homophobic backlash. But overall, its sensitive portrayal of same-sex love had a profoundly positive impact on mainstream perceptions of homosexuality in the United States. Some critics praised the film as doing the most to normalize homosexuality since Jonathan Demme's Philadelphia (1993). Importantly, while Philadelphia created sympathy for gay men in its portrayal of an HIV-positive character, Brokeback Mountain takes place in the decades prior to the epidemic, thus breaking the association between gay sexuality and AIDS.

The rugged masculinity of the film’s protagonists also broke new ground, overturning dominant stereotypes that associated gay men with urban culture, domesticity, and effeminacy. Frequently dubbed the “gay cowboy movie,” it elicited a range of responses that sparked debate over the apparent contradiction between the terms gay and cowboy. While some felt that the characters’ queerness undermined the heterosexual image of the American cowboy, many appreciated the way the film brought out the homosocial and queer undertones that have always existed in the genre of the Western.

The extent to which Jack and Ennis can be understood as “gay” characters, or Brokeback Mountain as a gay film, has also been a source of contention. Indeed, despite its reputation as the “gay cowboy movie,” many viewers observed that, in truth, Jack and Ennis are neither gay nor cowboys. While the film can easily be read as a portrayal of closeted sexuality, consistent with the historical experience of sexual minorities throughout the twentieth century, neither character claims the label “gay,” and both have sexual relationships with women. This led some commentators to play down the film’s LGBT content, lauding it as a universal love story that happened to be between members of the same sex. Other critics saw the film’s avoidance of labels as a queer gesture that disrupted the very notion of “the closet.”

SEE ALSO The Closet; Rural Queer Communities, US; Rural Queerness

BIBLIOGRAPHY

FILMOGRAPHY

The Bubble (2006; Eytan Fox)

SAMHITA SUNVA
Assistant Professor of Cinema, Department of Middle Eastern & South Asian Languages & Cultures
University of Virginia

The Bubble is a drama of star-crossed lovers, highlighting an affair that unfolds in Tel Aviv between two young men—one Israeli and one Palestinian. Upon its release in 2006, the film, by director-writer duo Eytan Fox (1964–) and Gal Uchovsky (1958–), enjoyed a successful run across several international LGBTQ festivals, where it was touted as an engaging romp reminiscent of the hit HBO television series Sex and the City (1998–2004) and lauded for its bold portrayal of a taboo affair between two men on opposite sides of the Israel-Palestine conflict. Reviews noted the film’s memorable cast of characters comprising an energetic collective of young, progressive Israeli friends. The three main Israeli characters share an apartment in Tel Aviv, participate in critiques of the Israeli military occupation, are proudly out and about as sexually liberated men and women looking for love in the city, and relish any and all opportunities to both dish about and grill one another over the trials and tribulations of their respective romantic lives.

At the same time, scholars and critics alike have noted the film’s proclivities toward an Israeli nationalist discourse of pinkwashing, or the marketing of a queer-friendliness that obscures other political issues. Tel Aviv is depicted as a queer-friendly bubble whose idyll—the namesake of the film—is threatened by the inconvenient violence of an ethnic conflict that encroaches from without, both spatially and temporally. In the film, violence is shown to seep into the city from militarized checkpoints and borders that lie beyond Tel Aviv as the result of an earlier generation’s conflicts that hang over young Israelis and Palestinians as a burdensome inheritance. The film draws parallels between the violence of the Israeli occupation and the violence of the closet, whose twin oppressions become too much for the main Palestinian character, Ashraf, to bear. While a motley cast of Israeli characters are shown in a variety of professions, political leanings, and personalities, the Palestinian characters fit into rather predictable tropes: the closeted queer Palestinian; the fiery, homophobic radical; the suicide bomber; and the traditional, conservative woman defined primarily by her domestic roles as wife, mother, and/or sister.
Framing Desire and Power

The Bubble opens with a scene at a checkpoint, as a soldier with the Israel Defense Forces (IDF) brusquely directs a group of Palestinians through the procedures of a security search. Ostensibly, the scene is being recorded and delivered to the audience by a small film crew using a handheld camera, as indicated by the intercutting of shaky vérité footage, the presence of the camera crosshairs in this intercut footage, and a moment at which the soldier approaches the camera and tells the crew that recording is not allowed. In this way, the opening scene positions the audience as privy to a set of realities that are largely unauthorized—off the record, intimate, and illicit. It is in this very opening scene that Noam, another IDF member stationed at the checkpoint, and Ashraf, a young Palestinian man who is among the group that is being searched, are shown to gaze at one another in a series of close shots that reveal their clandestine, lingering eyes. The suggestion of mutual erotic interest, within a heavily imbalanced set of power relations, is intensified by a series of shots that comply with the soldier’s demands, as the bodies of Palestinians are subject to his scrutiny, as well as that of the audience. The men are asked one by one to lift up their shirts, baring their abdomens and chests. In a closer frame, the slow manner in which Ashraf lifts his shirt seems flirtatious and coy, akin to a striptease. But in the larger context of the security search, the display ensues with ambiguity, marked by hesitation and shame as the Palestinian men are compelled to bare their torsos for the soldier and, by extension, the audience. The soldier barks at a veiled pregnant woman, demanding that she reveal “what you have there.” Shocked, she slowly unbuttons her jacket, as even her pregnant belly becomes an object of suspicion.

Tragedy bookends the film, as, during this opening sequence, the pregnant Palestinian woman suddenly goes into labor under the stress of the search. Her stripping continues, as the young, well-intentioned Noam jumps to her aid. Ashraf serves as translator, and Noam asks that her buttons be loosened to allow her to breathe. Her veil is removed as well as her bloodstained undergarment, and Noam pries apart her legs to examine the status of her labor himself. He coaches her to push, and the audience is positioned among the crowd of onlookers for whom the woman’s body, writhing with pain, is fully in view. A team of medics soon arrives to examine the baby that Noam has just delivered, only to pronounce it lifeless. The woman screams with agony, and anger and grief surge among the group of Palestinians, who accuse the IDF members of intentionally killing the child. In this way, the film establishes several fraught political contexts and themes at the outset: an occupation that is violently tragic even in its most routine operations; the need to breathe and thrive, as well as the impossibility of doing so under the occupation; the critical work of progressive Israeli activists in documenting human rights violations related to the occupation; a rights-based politics of visibility and witnessing; and the futile inseparability of the deeply personal and deeply political, as the sexual charge of the glances exchanged between Noam and Ashraf are inextricable from the power relations of occupation, suspicion, and violence that occasion their initial encounter.

Coming Out On-screen

Many of The Bubble’s opening themes quickly recede into the background, as the rest of the film’s narrative, formal, and genre proclivities become less about the occupation per se and more in step with the Israeli “gay cinema” of the 1990s. Films such as Amazing Grace (1992; Amos Guttman) and Gotta Have Heart (1997; Eytan Fox) celebrated a Western, internationalist discourse of coming out and dovetailed with a state-supported rebranding of Israel as progressive, tolerant, and gay friendly. The Bubble followed upon this 1990s wave of popular Israeli films, for which the renowned director-writer couple Fox and Uchovsky became well known.

Abandoning both the grainy, vérité-style footage and the tense atmosphere of the opening checkpoint sequence, the scenes that compose the bulk of the film take place in Tel Aviv—referred to as “the bubble” by characters within the film. Notwithstanding the fraught circumstances of the opening scene that hint at a love-at-first-sight exchange between Noam and Ashraf, the two are reunited when Ashraf suddenly shows up at Noam’s Tel Aviv apartment. Ashraf announces that he has come to return Noam’s identity card, which he found and picked up at the checkpoint. Tel Aviv, the city to which Ashraf is an outsider, is cinematically rendered in slick continuity and features attractive, cosmopolitan, sexually liberated white characters who move between bohemian apartments, trendy cafés, and immaculate shops that offer an array of artisanal and luxury items. As a young Israeli who serves in the IDF; gets along with friends of different sexual orientations and political leanings; works at a hip record shop; and holds a discerning preference for Morrissey, Bright Eyes, and George Michael over Israeli pop stars, Noam in particular emerges as an ideal subject of Israeli homonationalism. His queer identity, in other words, upholds a widespread post-1990s branding of Israel as a tolerant, Westernized, gay-friendly nation.

The budding romance between Ashraf and Noam is detected by Noam's roommates, Yali and Lulu, and it becomes fodder for their teasing banter à la Sex and the City, as the roommates' close friendships are cemented by frank exchanges over matters of love and sex. In a direct reference to the American sitcom, Yali even refers to Lulu as “Israel's Carrie Bradshaw.” Frankness when it comes to sex at the level of the roommates' conversation is reinforced by the visual frankness of the film in showing parallel scenes of hetero- and homosexual consummation between Lulu and her journalist love-interest Sharon on the one hand, and Noam and Ashraf on the other. In the parallel editing of the two sexual encounters, the film espouses a “coming out” in terms of an ethos of visibility in Israeli cinema, which upholds a tolerant avowal of queer love, both nonheteronormative and, in this case, interethnic-cum-interreligious. The latter ultimately remains a tragic impossibility within the bubble of a bohemian fantasy of free love that bursts—quite literally and violently—with the queer-Palestinian-turned-suicidebomber who cannot come out. He detonates himself as he is embraced by Noam in The Bubble's final moments.

The Bubble, the Closet, and the Camp

The most exuberant moment in The Bubble is the scene of a beachside rave, as the three roommates are among a motley group of young Israelis who take ecstasy, dance, and party freely with their respective love interests, regardless of sexual orientation, race, and political leanings. Lulu vociferously participates in an anti-occupation campaign that organizes the beach party under the headline “Rave against the Occupation.” During the dance party, Noam and Ashraf are together, as are Yali and Golan, a boorish, hunky caricature of a gay man with right-wing political proclivities, as well as Lulu and Shaul, an endearingly puppy-faced fellow activist who is completely smitten with Lulu. A woman activist with a shaved head, who in an earlier scene casually bared her breasts while changing her T-shirt, is shown to kiss another woman passionately. It is this carefree bubble that is vaunted as exemplary within the film: open, tolerant, fun, and uncontaminated by political violence, as the political “rave against the occupation” takes a backseat to the party space's exceptional inclusivity and queer friendliness.

The exuberance of the dance party unravels as Ashraf finds it more and more difficult to pass—first, as an Israeli by the name of Shimi in Tel Aviv, despite his facility with Hebrew; and second, as a straight Palestinian who must disavow any friendly contact with Israelis among his Palestinian relatives in Nablus. In this way, the film portrays Ashraf as being oppressively and repeatedly closeted, and the brutal pressures of this closeting become equitable to, if not a displacement of, the violence of the occupation itself. Meanwhile, Noam and Yali exchange remarks over the impossibility of Ashraf coming out “over there” (i.e., in a Palestinian-Arab-Muslim community that is assumed to be the ultraconservative antithesis of gayfriendly Israel), and Yali wonders, half-jokingly, whether the heavenly reward that awaits gay Muslim suicide bombers is that of seventy-two young men, instead of the traditional seventy-two virginal maidens. Within a nationalist Israeli discourse that forwards ethnic stereotypes of an Arab-Muslim other, The Bubble offers only one alternative masculinity to that of the closeted, queer Palestinian—that of the terrorist suicide bomber. Besides Ashraf, the only other significant male Palestinian character in the film is Ashraf’s soon-to-be brother-in-law, Jihad, a fiery radical who is portrayed not only as a member of terrorist circles that are plotting violent attacks on Israelis but also as intensely anti-Semitic and homophobic.

Ethnic stereotyping of Palestinians in The Bubble is formally embedded as well. The capturing of Palestinian spaces and communities is framed by modes of news reportage and documentary, which mark a distinct departure from the slick continuity with which Tel Aviv is rendered in the film. Parallel to the manner in which the audience’s witnessing of the opening sequence is motivated by the presence of activists who are documenting human rights violations of Palestinians at an Israeli military checkpoint, the audience’s witnessing of scenes in Nablus is motivated by Noam and Lulu’s decision to bring along a camera and pose as French journalists who wish to document the wedding of Ashraf’s sister Rana and Jihad. Here, too, the documentary premise frames the audience’s witnessing of yet another round of violence. This time, it is that of the closet that confines Ashraf to an unambiguously anti-Semitic, homophobic terrain of feudal Arab-Muslim social structures. While Ashraf and Noam are kissing one another in an actual closet in Ashraf’s home in Nablus, they are caught by Jihad. Jihad blackmails Ashraf, demanding that Ashraf marry his cousin Samira in exchange for his keeping Ashraf’s shameful secret. With a heavy heart, Ashraf attempts to comply with the forced arrangement and approach Samira, only to end the conversation abruptly in a split-second decision to attempt a coming out instead. Ashraf goes to his sister Rana, who is preparing herself as the bride, and attempts to come out to her. Rana is taken aback and unable to process Ashraf’s confession. The permanence of the closet looms over Ashraf as the family revels in the wedding festivities of Rana and Jihad—the traditional ritual in which Noam and Lulu initially claimed an ethnographic interest, posing as French journalists who hoped to document Palestinian life. In this manner, The Bubble continually frames Palestinians not only through ethnic stereotypes of abjection within a culture that is ossified and unchanging but also as ever-ready subjects for the newsreel, documentary, and/or ethnographic footage that bears witness to their ongoing traumas.

For both Israeli and Palestinian characters in The Bubble, visibility/witnessing is put forward as the proper antidote to trauma. In other words, the metaphorical movement out from the hidden confines of the closet and into the realm of the visible expands within the film, as an end in and of itself. The film’s discourse of coming out, as a means of overcoming trauma-as-repression, is perhaps most evident through a scene in which Noam takes Ashraf to watch a performance of the American dramatist Martin Sherman’s play Bent. The play bears witness to the violence borne by gays, as less visible victims of the Holocaust, alongside the horrific extermination of Jews, in Nazi concentration camps. The audience, as well as Noam and Ashraf as audience members within the film, witnesses a scene from the play that shows two men—one marked as gay and the other as a Jew—who fall in love while inside a concentration camp. They take solace in poignantly professing their love for one another, even as they are unable to touch one another and must prepare themselves for the inevitable. This scene from Bent reinforces The Bubble’s themes of trauma-as-closet. Indeed, the intimacy between Noam and Ashraf further deepens through exchanges of their respective childhood traumas. Witnessed by the audience as grainy memories—flashbacks that are stylistically marked in both cases as found footage of amateur home videos—Ashraf and Noam both “come out” to one another. Ashraf’s childhood traumas are recollections of dispossession and displacement from Jerusalem, as the flashbacks show Israeli bulldozers razing the home that his father painstakingly built, forcing the family to flee for Nablus. Noam’s are those of witnessing failure and defeat in the deeply pained eyes of his mother, following her futile attempts to organize against the outcasting of Palestinian families in their neighborhood.
Noam is portrayed as a progressive Israeli subject who, like the activists in the film’s opening, can marshal the resources of a well-adjusted, liberated society that can exorcise its traumas through healthy practices of nonrepression. Noam teaches Ashraf about “coming out,” takes him to Bent, and encourages him to talk through his childhood traumas. But ultimately, this goes only so far, and when Ashraf’s sister is inadvertently killed in the crossfire of Israeli bullets intended for Palestinian terrorists during a shootout, Ashraf declares that he will step in for Jihad and carry out the requisite suicide attack in order to avenge Rana’s accidental death. In the concluding scene, the final gesture that Ashraf makes before detonating his suicide vest is not one of vengeance or anger but one of love. As Noam spots Ashraf outside a café, Ashraf turns himself away and moves toward the empty street. He traces his eyebrow with his index finger, mimicking a gesture designated by a character in the play Bent as a secret sign that means “I love you.” Ashraf is embraced by Noam as the film fades to white in slow motion, although the ambiguity of this moment is clarified by a newscast that immediately follows, reporting on a suicide bombing that has taken place outside a Tel Aviv café and strangely claimed just two lives in the middle of an otherwise empty street. In light of this ending, one of the stakes of The Bubble’s deeper ideological structures is its implicit suggestion that the ultimate tragedy is that of Ashraf’s inability to come out, as he finally conforms and martyrs himself to the pressures of Palestinian masculinity, construed by the film’s Israeli nationalist discourse as necessarily violent, anti-Semitic, and homophobic. As such, The Bubble offers a robust critical opportunity within both LGBTQ studies and cinema studies to examine the post-1990s globalization of a celebratory Western discourse of visibility politics, while urging attentiveness to the concomitant pressures, complexities, and contextual specificities not only of the closet but also of coming out.

SEE ALSO Coming-Out/Coming-In Discourses in the Middle East; Einayim Pkuhot (2009; Haim Tabakman); The Gay International and Mideast LGBTQI Organizations; Pinkwashing

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Abingdon, UK: Routledge, 2014.

Butt Magazine

PETER REHBERG
Affiliated Fellow
ICI Berlin—Institute for Cultural Inquiry

A post-pornographic fanzine for gay hipsters.

Butt is a gay fanzine with interviews and photos that was published in Amsterdam beginning in 2001, and later for some time in New York. Since 2011 Butt has appeared exclusively online as a digital archive and social network. The Butt brand, however, also circulates in other ways: Jop van Bennekom and Gert Jonkers, the two Dutch founders of Butt, host parties in Berlin, London, and New York and sell fan merchandise such as calendars, T-shirts, and towels with Butt logos or themes. In 2006 the “Butt” Book, with a “best of” selection of interviews and photos, appeared through the German art-book publisher Taschen. In December 2014 an expanded new edition came out under the title Forever “Butt.” In addition to the magazine and its spin-off products, Butt in the early twenty-first century founded a new gay indie aesthetic, which became a global phenomenon and centers on an aesthetic-sexual lifestyle that brings together pornography and art (Rehberg 2012, 2014, 2016). Butt spawned imitators—including the fanzines Kaiserin, Basso, Kink, Meat, and They Shoot Homos, Don’t They? Each of these fanzines emerged from an urban gay scene (e.g., Paris, Berlin, Barcelona, London, Melbourne) or focused on a specific sexual fetish (e.g., hair, piss) (Bronson and Aarons 2008).
The Representation of Masculinity in Post-Pornography

"Butt"'s photos, printed in a documentary style and on pale pink paper, can be situated in the context of the post-porn movement, which seeks to affirm a queer appropriation of the genre of pornography, and thus to mobilize its cultural and political potential for the rearticulation of gender and sexuality in the service of a critique of heteronormativity (Stüttgen 2010; Biasin, Maina, and Zecca 2014). While "Butt" is holding on to a notion of masculinity as pornographic value, it seeks to shift its representational politics: it showcases new masculinities of the imperfect and ungroomed (Rehberg 2012). "Butt" aims to mobilize the erotic value of “authentic masculinity”; that is, the documentary value of the pictures promises to give access to masculinity and pleasure beyond artifice. This project points toward a debate about the constructedness of gender and desire within feminism and gay studies (Butler 1990; Mulvey 2009; Bersani 2010). What is at stake in "Butt"'s dialogue between porn and art is an aesthetic of “reality.” The amateurish stars of "Butt" embody the philosophy of fanzines as magazines made by fans and for fans. As in other cultures of media convergence, the producers and consumers of "Butt" might be the same (Jenkins 2006). This aesthetic presented by the "microcelebrities" (Marwick 2016) of "Butt" is inspired by the documentary value of the different forms of so-called netporn (Jacobs...
such as DIY porn, realcore, and the interactive setting of porn 2.0.

Even though online porn also leads to a popularization of the commodified masculinities characterized by José Esteban Muñoz (1999, 87) as “white normative sex clone[s]”—the spectacle of an impeccable gym body—magazines such as Butt do manage to disseminate alternative body politics. The diversified types of men in Butt no longer submit unconditionally to the norms of propagated fitness and are legible as a countermovement against the dictates of “health pornography,” the critical potentials of which have been a controversial topic within gay studies (Miller 1992; Halperin 1995; Padva 2002). In this regard Butt also becomes legible in the context of HIV and AIDS: through its historical distance to the 1980s AIDS crisis and because of the medical advancements in HIV treatment since the second half of the 1990s Butt moves beyond the regimes of representation of 1980s and 1990s gay porn, whose mission was to give evidence of “gay health” as a reaction to the trauma of AIDS (Halkitis 2000). According to this line of thinking, Butt presents itself as a counter-counterreaction to the representation of the gay male body in the context of HIV and AIDS.

Transnational Utopia

Butt presents a hybrid, alternative picture of masculinity, in contrast to the globalized American porn identity. In contrast to the homogenized vision of male bodies in American pornography, the visual aesthetics of Butt must be understood as a form of transatlantic dialogue that generates a specific code, a combination of cultural signifiers that was also popularized in the first decade of the twenty-first century on a broader scale beyond queer post-porn with the advent of the hipster (Rehberg 2012, 2014, 2016). With this pop-cultural phenomenon, several forces, including race and class, intersect.

First and foremost, the post-pornographic hipster must be understood in terms of race. Next to the omission of other subject positions such as trans, it is Butt’s focus on whiteness that is striking. Nonwhite bodies are rarely shown; out of twenty-nine covers, only three featured nonwhite men, among them Kele Okereke, singer of the British pop group Bloc Party, on the cover of Butt issue number 28. In this regard, Butt proves to be rather homogenous with its representational politics, a gesture familiar from the New Queer Cinema (Davis 2013), and which can also be said of the culture of post-pornography as a whole, as noted by Tim Stüttgen: “Some people have criticized post-porn for being a white and Western genre and that might be true” (2010, 14).

But the white hipster bodies in Butt also claim their “naturalness” by departing from the code of white hegemony. Butt’s staging of whiteness and its claim of “naturalness” become truly legible only by means of a distinction between different forms of being white. Butt presents a “dirty” or “secondary” whiteness. This suggests that, in addition to race, the post-pornographic images of men also need to be deciphered with regard to their class affiliation. In this respect, the imperfect corporeality of the images in Butt draws meaning from the culture of North American white trash, whose "less restricted access to sexuality"—that is, its pornographic value within the cultural imagination (Penley 2004)—contributes to the sexiness of the young men in Butt. In addition to Butt's white-trash masculinity, a queer European bohemian masculinity serves as a model for its alternative aesthetics. In contrast to the case of “white trash,” however, the European genealogy of the imperfect white male body is less about class and a direct access to a “natural” sexuality than about an aesthetic and intellectual contextualization of pornography itself. The body image of Butt claims the authenticity of a worker sexuality, while at the same time staging a pornographic image that is also always a critique of pornography. The status of the image between pornography and art, as well as the class and national moorings of Butt's image of masculinity, thus remain ambiguous, but in the context of web culture and porn 2.0 they also represent an attempt at reimaging the sexual, aesthetic, and social utopias of the 1970s. Butt's "post-AIDS" aesthetics mirror pre-AIDS aesthetics.

SEE ALSO The Body Politic; Pornoterrorismo and Post-Porn; Pulp Fiction, Gay and Lesbian; Urban Queerness

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Cabaret Theater in Latin America and the Caribbean

GREGORY MITCHELL
Associate Professor, Program in Women's, Gender, and Sexuality Studies
Williams College, Williamstown, MA

The use of cabaret as political statement by Latin American and Caribbean LGBT artists.

Cabaret emerged in many parts of the Americas as an important form of popular entertainment in the early twentieth century and drew heavy influence from the German Kabarett and that tradition’s emphasis on political satire and dark comedy. Cabaret is a broad category of theater that contains singing and other musical numbers, as well as skits, usually woven together by an MC, or master of ceremonies. Cabaret theater almost always occurs in a pub, nightclub, or restaurant, such that audiences are eating and drinking during the show. In many parts of the Americas, cabaret came to include elements of burlesque and drag, which also contributed to its strong associations with LGBT nightlife.

Distinguishing Features of Latin American Cabaret

Cabaret performance in Latin America is most markedly distinguished from other cabaret traditions by the nature of its political content (such as satirical skits skewering current events in news and politics) and, in particular, its relationship to authoritarian dictatorships. Such regimes—both of the left- and right-wing variety—historically repressed homosexuality and persecuted queer people throughout the twentieth century. In many Latin American contexts, the Right associated lesbians and gays with communism and persecuted them as immoral dissidents. However, communist and socialist regimes often looked on queers as selfish, decadent, and unwilling to do their reproductive part to uphold the state. In some places, such as Cuba under Fidel Castro (1926–2016), the state persecuted gays because it found them incompatible with its idealized vision of the “New Man” that the state required to uphold the gendered ideals of the revolution. Consequently, Castro’s regime rounded up gay men into camps and forced others into exile. Given the widespread oppression of LGBT people under authoritarian regimes in the region, underground spaces such as bars and cabarets where LGBT people congregated became important sites of community. In particular, cabaret performance spaces, where queerness and skits espousing radical politics could take center stage, were important sites for both art and resistance. This history has shaped cabaret performance traditions in Latin America and molded them into the vibrant performance art scene present today.
Another important distinguishing feature of cabaret in Latin America is its relationship to (and frequent antagonism toward) the Roman Catholic Church, which has exerted powerful control in much of Latin America since the beginning of the colonial period. One important dimension of this relationship is the role of the carnivalesque, the aesthetic and social modality associated with pre-Lenten celebrations. During Carnival, everyday people are free to indulge in various forms of debauchery ranging from gluttony to sexual licentiousness, including greater tolerance for homosexual behavior (regardless of sexual orientation), cross-dressing, and spectacular forms of queer performance. (Despite such ostensible sexual liberation, there is also violence against LGBT people during this time that often goes unpolicied and unpunished.) For many countries in Latin America and the Caribbean, cabaret traditions have drawn on the tropes of the carnivalesque. Similarly, many cabaret traditions in Latin America have poked deliberate and ribald fun at the Catholic Church.

Cabaret Performance in Mexico

Mexico boasts perhaps the richest and most vibrant of queer cabaret traditions in Latin America, including many famous performance venues, such as El Closet del Sor Juana (Sor Juana’s Closet) and El Hábito (The Habit). There is an especially noteworthy genealogy of feminist performance art with roots in cabaret in Mexico, with Mexico City at its epicenter. Queer cabaret in Mexico dates back to the early twentieth century when tandas (a type of variety show) emerged as a popular entertainment. Tandas included singing, dancing, and skits satirizing political events. Although government repression of tandas eventually led to their demise, this tradition continued at El Hábito, a cabaret nightclub on the south side of Mexico City in Coyoacán (Erdman 1995). In 1980 Jesusa Rodríguez and her partner Liliana Felipe debuted at El Fracaso (The Failure; originally El Cuervo, or The Raven) and became immensely popular. In 1990 they opened El Hábito, fulfilling their dream of running a German-style cabaret modeled on the infamous ones found in Berlin. El Hábito became one of the most important venues for queer cabaret in Latin America, spawning several notable offshoots as frequent collaborators and performers opened their own venues, such as Tito Vasconcelos and David Rangel’s Cabaré Tito in the gay neighborhood of Zona Rosa in 1998. In 2005 El Hábito closed its doors permanently, with Rodríguez and Felipe having performed hundreds of shows there. A new cabaret group, Las Reinas Chulas (The Cool Queens), took over the space, which they renamed El Vicio (The Vice). Rodríguez and Felipe continue to perform in various other venues. They also do cabaret workshops with indigenous women in Mexico and work with street children.

JESUSA RODRÍGUEZ (1955–)

Jesusa Rodríguez is a Mexican director, actress, writer, playwright, performance artist, and social activist. Along with her wife, Argentine singer and actress Liliana Felipe (1954–), she is one of the key figures in contemporary Latin American cabaret theater. In 1990 Rodríguez and Felipe founded a theater space in the Coyoacán, Mexico City, called El Hábito (The Habit). For fifteen years, they staged weekly cabaret performances that were improvised and based on the political happenings of the week. Aside from this contemporary political commentary, Rodríguez and Felipe developed a series of “Cabarets Prehispánicos” (Pre-Hispanic Cabarets), which, while based on pre-Columbian beliefs and texts (such as the Popol Vuh), pointedly addressed questions of empire and patriarchy in contemporary Mexican society.

At El Hábito, Rodríguez also began to develop works about seventeenth-century Mexican poet Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz. Her first major piece about Sor Juana, Sor Juana en Almoloya (Sor Juana in Almoloya) (1995), was similar in style to cabaret pieces presented weekly at El Hábito. In this particular performance, Rodríguez tackles the issue of corruption within the Mexican government while evoking the period of time within which Sor Juana was forced to abandon all writing and intellectual work upon being condemned by the bishop of Puebla in 1691. As part of her explorations of the life and works of Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz, Rodríguez took on the arduous task of memorizing the 975-verse “Primero sueño” (“First Dream”), one of the poet's most important and personal works. Rodríguez performed the poem in its entirety as part of her piece Sor Juana, el primero sueño (2002). In 2005, Rodríguez and Felipe, wanting to devote more time to activism and to developing pieces outside of their space, turned over El Hábito to the Mexican cabaret group Las Reinas Chulas (The Cool Queens), who changed the name of the space to El Vicio (The Vice).

After their time at El Hábito, Rodríguez and Felipe continued to develop and produce independent performance pieces. A notable piece titled Juana la Larga (Long Juana) debuted in 2013. In her 2014 essay “Archives, Bodies, and Imagination,” scholar María Elena Martínez recounts how Rodríguez and Felipe became interested in her historical archival work concerning an eighteenth-century inquisitorial case about a Guatemalan intersex woman known as Juana Aguilar (who was pejoratively nicknamed “Juana la Larga”). The piece interrogates colonial understandings of gender and bodies—with Rodríguez satirically playing the role of Doctor Narciso Esparragosa, the Enlightenment-era Guatemalan doctor who assessed the body of Aguilar to determine whether or not she was physically capable of committing sodomy. (He concluded that she was not.) The performances, however, have been at the center of a series of sometimes heated discussions about the ways in which Rodríguez’s performances represent trans and racialized bodies (in sometimes Orientalizing ways). Such scholars as Jack Halberstam, Lok Siu, and Diana Taylor have written about the performance and its reception in recent years. This piece, along with Rodríguez’s solo work and some of her other works with Felipe at El Hábito, have been archived and made available to the public by the Hemispheric Institute of Performance and Politics through their Digital Video Library (HIDVL).
In addition to being a writer, actress, and performer, Jesusa Rodríguez is also a prominent activist. In 2006, for example, she founded the Resistencia Creativa (Creative Resistance) movement in response to electoral fraud in the Mexican presidential elections. In the days after the election, candidate Andrés Manuel López Obrador denounced the results and called for a meeting in Mexico City’s main plaza, El Zócalo. More than 500,000 people showed up to protest the election results. Rodríguez envisioned Resistencia Creativa as a kind of “massive cabaret” (HIDVL). Through art and culture, Resistencia Creativa has found and continues to find creative ways to perform acts of civil disobedience. In its first months, the movement’s focus centered on the issue of electoral fraud, but it has since taken on other equally critical social and political issues directly affecting Mexican society. Rodríguez continues to live and work in Mexico City, her work highlighting the intersection between LGBTQ and indigenous cultures and narratives, as well as continuing to shine a light on corruption in contemporary Mexican politics.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

https://bullybloggers.wordpress.com/2014/07/05/you-are-triggering-me-the-neo-liberal-rhetoric-of-harm-danger-and-trauma/

Hemispheric Institute Digital Video Library (HIDVL). “Jesusa Rodríguez.”

To understand the significance of El Hábito and its relationship to larger political, economic, and sexual issues of the time, it is worth examining more of Rodríguez's work. Rodríguez is known for blurring genres, and she created performances throughout her career that drew on forms as diverse as Greek tragedy, pre-Columbian indigenous performance traditions, opera, sketch comedy, and musical revues (Taylor and Costantino 2003a). She adapted works from William Shakespeare, such as ¿Cómo va la noche, Macbeth? (How's Your Night Going, Macbeth?) in 1981, as well as operas such as Donna Giovanni in 1983. Rodríguez toured her shows throughout South America, the United States, and Europe.

In 1994 Rodríguez took to El Hábito's stage to perform in Supermachos '94, which covered the turbulent events happening earlier that year, such as the guerrilla uprising in the state of Chiapas; the assassination of presidential candidate Luis Donaldo Colosio; and the abduction, ransoming, and near execution of the billionaire businessman Alfredo Harp Helú. The piece was structured as an allegory in which the Mexican Republic (represented as a blond, high-society flapper played by Regina Orozco) awakens to realize there is an insurrection. Her lover, the aristocratic president Carlos Salinas, tells her to pay a visit to the countryside where the instability lies. The town in question turns out to be populated by characters from the popular comic strip Supermachos. To pacify the Zapatista rebels and negotiate peace, she performs a series of nationalistic parody songs before holding a fraudulent election. She eventually learns that her Indian servant (played by Rodriguez) has been brutalized by the military and religious authorities, which prompts her to return to the capital, where she finds chaos as local factions fight with one another and the International Monetary Fund.

Supermachos '94 is typical of Rodriguez's work in that it mocks the political and religious establishment and draws on cutting-edge contemporary issues. However, it is interesting to note that she also took a jab at El Hábito's leftist intelligentsia in the audience by satirizing Subcomandante Marcos, the Zapatista rebel leader, by having the actor playing him begin to perform a burlesque-style striptease number (Erdman 1995). In her later work, Rodríguez continued to be timely and to mix critiques of politics and religion. For example, in Sor Juana in Prison: A Virtual Pageant Play (2000), the famous nun (who is often claimed as a lesbian icon) has a Macintosh computer in her jail cell alongside her old inkwell and uses her writing to eviscerate US political figures George W. Bush and Dick Cheney in between references to US television shows All My Children and The Rosie O'Donnell Show and US actress Susan Sarandon (Rodríguez 2003).
Another major figure to emerge from this tradition was Astrid Hadad. Hadad rose to fame in Rodríguez’s all-female opera Donna Giovanni in 1985, but she also had her own cabaret shows. Hadad was well known for mixing genres and styles, drawing from classic rumbera films of the 1940s and 1950s, melodramas, ranchero songs, and street theater, as well as German-style cabaret traditions. Invariably, Hadad uses stereotypical Mexican iconography (e.g., pistols, virgins, holiday decorations, tequila bottles) to playfully subvert dominant ideologies and notions of nationalism, often placing her physical body at the center of her work and calling attention to it as a mode of political address (de Bragança 2011). The use of nationalist symbols in this way was a common theme among feminist and queer performers in Mexico and may be one of Mexican cabaret’s unifying features (Garrido 2007).

A final cabaret performer from Mexico to consider is Orozco. Orozco trained at Juilliard in New York City and was renowned for her abilities in performing opera. However, she also created theater workshops, did theater for social change with indigenous women in the rural mountains, and campaigned for sex education and condom use, as well as working against domestic violence and child homelessness. She was also outspoken in her support of gay rights. Like Hadad, Orozco performed in Rodríguez’s Donna Giovanni, but she participated in its European tour when she was just eighteen. She also was a well-known film and television actress, having been nominated at the Venice Film Festival for a best actress award for her work in the 1996 film Profundo carmesí (Deep Crimson) (Alzate 2011). Orozco’s cabaret was unique because it combined her love of improvisational comedy with opera, and she relished subverting opera’s traditional style with her satire while not compromising the tremendous ability that came with her classical training. She simultaneously presented herself as a diva while mocking the archetype of the diva and making fun of her own body and self-presentation. This type of self-effacing humor is typical within Latin American cabaret theater, as it prevents the show from becoming too didactic or taking on the kind of earnestness that could cause the skits to become propagandistic, instead playfully emphasizing that the performer is “in on the joke.” Self-parody has also been an important part of queer performance art more broadly, such as in the work of Holly Hughes, Tim Miller, and Pomo Afro Homos.

Cabaret Performance in Brazil

Another Latin American country with a rich cabaret tradition is Brazil. Here again, the form and content of the performances were shaped by the experience of dictatorship and oppression. One of the most famous troupes in Brazil was Dzi Croquettes, an all-male drag troupe founded in the 1970s that drew on tropicalismo, a musical and artistic movement that was characterized by a blend of avant-garde artistic elements with popular motifs and a mix of foreign influences, such as the Beatles, with traditional Brazilian sounds, visuals, and ideas. This led to an overall aesthetic of gender blurring, psychedelic imagery, loud colors, and ribald sexual provocations. The troupe eventually fled the dictatorship and performed in Europe, where they became a favorite of US entertainer Liza Minnelli, who helped launch them to international fame. The group marked a departure from the more mainstream gay liberation movement in Brazil and adopted a more radically queer anti-assimilationist stance (Alvarez and Issa 2009).

Another heir to this tradition were the so-called Divinas Divas (Divine Divas) of the Teatro Rival (Rival Theater), which was founded in Rio de Janeiro by Américo Leal. Teatro Rival emerged in the 1960s amid the Brazilian military dictatorship (1967–1985), which treated LGBT and queer people brutally. The Divas identified variously as drag queens, transgender women, travestis (a term related to but distinct from transgender deployed within Brazil), or gay men, frequently sliding across multiple gender and sexual categories and identifications. They reported a variety of complicated feelings about hormones, surgeries, and the kinds of words they wanted to use for themselves, which illustrates the complexity of gender and sexuality operating during this time period in Brazil.

The divas often performed cabaret numbers in the persona of classically glamorous female icons, which distinguished them from Dzi Croquettes’ carnivalesque and genderfuck aesthetics that aggressively blended hyperbolic elements of masculinity and femininity. Also, while the Croquettes went into exile in Paris, the Divas mostly stayed in Rio de Janeiro and suffered under the regime. They positioned this as an important political act because they could provide entertainment and escapism for the gay community after the military coup d’état at a time when so many other artists were fleeing.

Leal’s granddaughter created a documentary film, Divinas Divas (2017), which follows eight aged Divas as they reunite and perform together fifty years later. The leader who reconvenes her peers for this encore performance was the artist known as Rogéria. Some of the Divas, such as Camille K, who in the 1970s was continually beaten and assaulted for her clothing, now live full time in women’s clothes, which have included ostentatious costuming from the eighteenth century. Likewise, Marquesa identified as a woman. Other Divas included Jane di Castro, Divina Valéria, Fujika de Halliday, and Brigitte de Búzios. Many of the Divas eventually had careers that took them into television, the cabaret scene abroad, and more mainstream venues. Some of them also engaged in sex work part time.

One final Diva from Teatro Rival to leave a major legacy on cabaret and performance in Brazil was Eloína dos Leopardos. Eloína was inspired by shows with male striptease and nudity in San Francisco and decided to create performances featuring naked men, known as Os Leopardos (The Leopards), with their signature show called A noite dos Leopardos (The night of the Leopards). Here, a woman would perform a cabaret number, but scantily clad masculine men would dance and eventually perform nude with erect penises. Sometimes there would be showers onstage for the naked men to dance in. Gay men would reportedly fellate the men offstage in the wings to keep them hard between numbers.
Several of the men who performed with Os Leopardos also worked in gay pornography. Eloína opened her theater for this erotic male revue in Galeria Alaska in Rio de Janeiro and made her fortune as the producer.

Eventually, Os Leopardos became a major tourist attraction and catered to a largely heterosexual audience as an example of the imagined exoticness and hypersexuality of Brazil rather than the explicitly gay pornographic (and politicized) cabaret show that it had been. Eloína also became a samba sensation, competing with the famous samba school Beija-Flor. Eloína and Os Leopardos illustrate the overlapping worlds and co-constitutive influence of cabaret, showgirl spectacles, erotic revues, drag shows, carnival performances, and sex work in Brazil. It is also noteworthy that Galeria Alaska was the site of Cabaret prevenção, a cabaret put on by a nongovernmental organization that focused on performances about HIV/AIDS awareness. Thus, Galeria Alaska could provide space and opportunity to celebrate the pleasures of queer culture but also to provide lifesaving information and education, which illustrates the complicated purposes and possibilities of queer cabaret theater.

Cabaret Performance in Other Latin American and Caribbean Contexts

Throughout the region, cabaret traditions influenced performance art more generally, and it can be difficult to define the parameters of cabaret as a genre. However, there are many notable performers who press at these edges. In Colombia, Lucy Bolaños founded Teatro la Máscara (The Mask Theatre) in 1972. Although initially a mixed-gender group, in 1985 it became an all-female troupe. Even though the women perform political plays and adapt texts from various sources, they frequently include popular music performances in their shows as well. The group had to flee the right-wing extremist forces in the late 1980s, but they continued their work in Costa Rica until they could return. The group periodically attempted to foreground themes of homosexuality and lesbianism, such as in their show La flor de Pilar (The flower of Pilar), but they often found audiences hostile, a fact that illustrates the homophobia that exists even among the political left-wing dissidents and activists who made up a sizable portion of their audience (Taylor and Costantino 2003c).

Another artist who draws on a wide variety of entertainment traditions to create her work is Rosa Luisa Márquez in Puerto Rico. Márquez uses popular theater, the avant-garde, installations, and technology to create her politically charged works. She often tackles current issues, such as HIV/AIDS education, US imperialism in Puerto Rico, and homelessness. She worked with a number of major theaters and practitioners, including Agusto Boal and Bread and Puppet. As a child, Márquez was drawn to mime, dance, puppetry, and musical theater, among other traditions. She built a small theater in a poor part of San Juan in 1973 to house her Anamù Theatre Group. The troupe used a Latin American–style collective dramaturgy based on Marxist improvisation about dramatic conflicts and group decision-making (Taylor and Costantino 2003b). Although the theater group stages a variety of shows, they often use street theater that is influenced by the performance traditions found in cabaret, having traded the smoke-filled bars like El Hábito for the open-air barrios.

Broader Significance

As cabaret theater in Latin America progressed throughout the twentieth century, it refashioned itself in response to various political situations and served as a site of critique and resistance to authoritarianism. It also became a diffuse genre, embracing ribald sexual elements that ultimately blurred into burlesque, striptease, and erotic reviews. In time, the form’s popularity diminished, but many performers went on to careers as performance artists. Indeed, it is often difficult to distinguish cabaret from these other genres apart from the nature of the venue (table seating, drink service, etc.). However, this shift also serves as a marker of the form’s impact and ability to shape other genres. The fact that it has often exported its political sensibilities also demonstrates the particular utility cabaret theater has had in queer activism in Latin America and the Caribbean.

SEE ALSO Bars and Cabarets in Europe; Carnival and Sexuality in Brazil; Cinema, Latin American (Early Twentieth Century); Performance Artists in Latin America

BIBLIOGRAPHY

FILMOGRAPHY

Cabo Verde

FRANCISCO MIGUEL
Master, Department of Social Anthropology
Universidade de Brasília, Brazil

The status of the LGBT community, both historically and into modern times, on this island nation off the west coast of Africa.

Cabo Verde (known as Cape Verde prior to its official name change in 2013) is an archipelago country, located in the region known as Macaronesia, about 410 miles (660 km) from Dakar, Senegal. It comprises ten volcanic islands, nine of which are inhabited. Its territory was discovered, uninhabited, in 1456. It is a former Portuguese colony that became independent in 1975. The Creole population, a genetic and cultural mixture of Europeans and Africans, totals approximately 500,000 inhabitants. Twice as many Cabo Verdeans have emigrated to other countries. The official language is Portuguese, but the language that is broadly spoken is Cabo Verdean Creole. The country has a semipresidential regime whose democratic institutions have been continuously consolidated since its independence, especially since the political opening to a multiparty system in the 1990s.

Cabo Verde is known as one of the African countries that most respects the individual freedom of its inhabitants. There are two main reasons for the relative greater sexual freedom observed nowadays in Cabo Verde: Portuguese colonization, for which the dimension of sexual control seems to have been less rigid than in other colonial experiences; and the diasporic influence, because migration is economically vital to the islands and more than half of the Cabo Verdean population has long been living and circulating in other countries, particularly in North America and Europe.

Historical Prosecution of Homosexuality

Homoeroticism in Cabo Verde was first recorded by the legal-religious processes of the Portuguese Holy Inquisition in the seventeenth century. In documents from that period, at least three cases are recorded in detail. In 1633 the Cabo Verde bishop sent an emissary to the Holy Office of Lisbon denouncing sodomitic acts of the then governor of the archipelago, Dom Cristóvão Cabral, who was thirty-three years old. His list of crimes included anal sex, reciprocal masturbation, and anilingus, practiced through physical violence not only with men but also with women. The second case refers to twenty-eight-year-old priest Gabriel Dias Ferreira, in charge of the Ribeira Grande Parish, who was arrested in 1654 and accused of different homoerotic acts with eighty-two accomplices, most of whom were black slaves between the ages of ten and twenty (Mott 1999). The third case refers to Portuguese priest Frutuoso Álvares, sent to Cabo Verde, who confessed to committing the “wicked sin” in the archipelago with two young men (Trevisan 2011).

The Holy Office was the strategy used by the Roman Catholic Church, during the Counter-Reformation, to control sexuality in lands under the purview of the church. Since the Council of Trent in the sixteenth century, the church had determined that human sexuality should be at the service of only reproduction, which is why sodomitic acts (anal sex) were strongly repressed. The Portuguese Inquisition was enforced not only in the kingdom but throughout the whole colonial empire, which included the small archipelago of Cabo Verde. It is known, however, that there was greater liberality of customs in the Portuguese colonies than in the metropolis (Braga 2006).

© JULIE BRINKMANN

First LGBT Pride Parade in Cabo Verde, 2013. Trans individuals demonstrate in front of the Palácio do Povo in the city of Mindelo on the island of São Vicente. Cabo Verde was the first West African country and the second African country to host an LGBTpride parade (after South Africa).

Travestes (Transvestites)

Following the end of the Holy Inquisition in the early nineteenth century, it seems that Cabo Verde did not record any other case of a legal procedure related to homosexuality in the national territory, although the colonial law that criminalized acts “against nature” was in force in the archipelago until 2004 (Miguel 2016). Transvestism in Cabo Verde dates back to Carnival festivities of at least the 1940s. Even after this period, the image of a transvestite remained in Carnival as a symbol of subversion. The boundary that separates gays and travestes (the local term for transvestites) is very tenuous and porous. The traveste identity not only refers to classifications regarding the intensity of masculinization/feminization of bodies but also has to do with class positions. In general, travestes are lower-income people who were born with male genitalia and, when wanting to become women, keep their bodies as feminized as possible and sometimes advocate that identity for themselves. In contrast with Brazilian transvestites, Cabo Verdeans travestes never have their bodies transformed by silicone implants and hormone treatments, technologies that are not always desirable, not locally available, and unviable from an economic point of view for them.

Travestes reported that since the 1970s the piping of a desalinization plant on the island of São Vicente was used for public and fortuitous sexual encounters (Miguel 2016). Depending on the island, travestes can walk the streets freely without fearing for their safety. However, because they are one of the most marginalized groups in the economic and social structure of the country, they have a harder time finding employment. Some of them still study, whereas others have small businesses or work in prostitution.

A hegemonic system of masculine sexuality exists in Cabo Verde that divides “men” from “gays”/“travestes.” Given the more marked gender division typical of Latin and Mediterranean societies, men are expected to act like “men” (and be the active ones in sex), while gays and transvestites can articulate in their bodies signs associated with the feminine (among them, being passive in sex). This position is articulated by Bela, a Cabo Verdean transvestite, as quoted in a 2015 article by Andréa Lobo and Francisco Miguel: “We in Cabo Verde, we are gays, we are travestes, but we never get involved with gays. We like to get involved with men. Men who do not like to take it in the ass. Men. We like men; we do not like gays, unlike foreigners. Abroad, gays like gays. But not us, we are different” (50). In the middle and upper classes, however, the Western model of homosexuality—where differences in sexual behaviors do not make such a difference in the experience of a couple—has been gaining more and more resonance.

Lesbian and Intersex Invisibility

In Cabo Verde, lesbians have been keeping out of public life for reasons that are not yet fully known owing to the scarcity of data on their social lives. It is known that they are part of the elite of the country’s capital, living in unofficial marital relations with their partners (Rodrigues 2009). When some of them were invited to take part in a debate on homosexuality on state television in 2013, they chose not to go, whereas gay men went. It is assumed that gender hierarchy in Cabo Verde makes it more difficult for women than men, who have greater freedom, to admit their homo- or bisexuality publicly. In spite of this, reports say that in 2016 a group of lesbians started a new LGBT nongovernmental organization in the capital of the country. There is no available information about intersex people and their experiences in Cabo Verde.

Homophobia and Violence

There are no official data on homophobic violence in Cabo Verde. Accounts about verbal attacks or physical violence against LGBT people are not that common, but they exist. Some individuals report fights, name calling, and infrequent turmoil. Mandar bocas—the term for name calling directed publicly to homosexuals on the streets (but not only to them)—is many times interpreted by native homosexuals themselves as a joking courting rite by men that is not necessarily or always intended as mistreatment but rather as an invitation to sexual encounters (Miguel 2016).

LGBT Advocacy

In the 1990s, on the island of São Vicente, Cabo Verdian transvestites took to the streets in daylight dressed in feminine clothes to challenge the gender norms in place at the time. They were physically and verbally assaulted because of this demonstration. In that same decade the "Miss Gay" and "Miss Traveste" beauty pageants first took place, a phenomenon that aroused the curiosity and interest of the locals, including the non-LGBT public (Silva 2015). In 2010 the Associação Gay Cabo-Verdeana Contra a Discriminação (Cabo Verdean Gay Association against Discrimination) was founded. This nongovernmental organization, acknowledged by the state without resistance, has the purpose of fighting for the rights of citizens at the margins of society in the country, not limited to the LGBT populations. In 2013, in the city of Mindelo, on the island of São Vicente, the first Mindelo Pride took place, a weeklong event of activities that included photo exhibits, a film exhibit focusing on LGBT issues, and, at the end of the event, the first gay pride parade in the country. Thus, Cabo Verde became the second country in Africa—after South Africa—to have a LGBT pride parade with the consent of local authorities. Since then, the event has taken place every year without interruption. Among other agenda issues, the movement advocates the end of discrimination, the legalization of same-sex marriage, and more opportunities for the inclusion of LGBT people in the job market.

SEE ALSO Activism in Africa South of the Sahara; Christianity in Africa: Roman Catholicism; Colonialism in Africa South of the Sahara; Inquisition, Criminal Courts, and Sexuality in Colonial Latin America; Travesti and Trans Activism in Latin America and the Caribbean

BIBLIOGRAPHY

In Cameroon, homosexuality was in relative terms a subject largely discussed in discreet circles and was not an issue of much public discussion until late 2005 and early 2006, when the situation changed significantly. Two events played a defining role in putting LGBTQ issues in the spotlight, indirectly influencing the social climate for gays and lesbians. In 2005 the then-archbishop of Yaoundé (Cameroon’s capital), Victor Tonyé Bakot (1947–), openly condemned the practice of homosexuality in Cameroon in a sermon on Christmas Day, characterizing it as a moral corruption that was gaining ground among Cameroonian youths. The archbishop, without calling out individuals, accused high-level government officials of abuse of office by luring youths into homosexuality in exchange for access to professional opportunities. In January of the following year, three private newspapers published the names of government officials “rumored” to be involved in homosexuality. The publications received tremendous public attention as they conveyed allegations of scandal within government in a context where same-sex sexual practices are criminalized. Jumping on the bandwagon, other media organizations reprinted the list of alleged “top 50 homosexuals” in Cameroon published by the newspaper L’Anecdote. The fact that L’Anecdote presented no evidence to back its allegations did not seem to matter. These two open statements were akin to casting the first stone of indictment against same-sex sexuality, as increased homophobia against presumed LGBTQ people followed in their wake. Media debate programs focusing on homosexuality became more frequent, providing platforms for influential figures to bash and dehumanize homosexuals. The Cameroonian law against homosexuality (Section 347 of the penal code), which was seldom enforced, gained renewed interest as the police intensified prosecution of suspected homosexuals, albeit focusing on common people with little power (Awondo, Geschiere, and Reid 2012). The law prescribes six months to five years of imprisonment and a fine of 20,000 to 200,000 CFA francs ($35 to $355) for homosexual acts. Unlike the situation in most former British colonies, where anti-homosexuality laws are a legacy of colonial law, Section 347 was introduced through presidential decree in 1972 by Cameroon’s first (postindependence) president, Ahmadou Ahidjo (1924–1989). Being an authoritarian leader, Ahidjo instituted the law without any debate by the national assembly.
In music, the controversial song “Les pédés” (a pejorative term for gays) released in 2007 by the popular Cameroonian artist Petit Pays aptly depicts the contention around LGBTQ issues that the newspaper publications of 2006 stirred up in the public sphere. Interestingly, the rumor of same-sex practices within government that was at the heart of the public controversy was not a new phenomenon in the Cameroonian context. Already in 2001, an elaborate conspiracy theory publication, Blood: Biya’s Power Lotion, which accused Cameroonian president Paul Biya (1933–) of homosexuality and occultism, was in circulation. From the safety of self-exile, the author, Ebale Angounou, claimed that, as a high-ranking member of the Rosicrucian order, Biya engaged in homosexual intercourse with members of his cabinet as part of a mystical ritual that kept them loyal to him. The banning of the publication by the government only stirred curiosity, and its circulation underground fed stereotypes of homosexuality as occultism. Rumors, which are known to spread rapidly in the Cameroonian context and which are often widely embraced as truth (Nyamnjoh 2005) in the sense of “there is no smoke without fire,” helped to foster such stereotypes.

Perception of homosexuality as occult practice has a foothold in modern-day Cameroonian societies not only because of enduring traditional beliefs in the existence of witchcraft but also because this perception is aligned with preexisting notions about Rosicrucian societies. Since the colonial era, Freemason and Rosicrucian secret societies have been associated with homosexuality (Geschiere 2010, 2017). In this regard, LGBTQ people were considered wizards and “witches in the cultural sense and as modern bloodsuckers under the spell of the white man’s Freemasonry and Rosicrucian orders” (Nyeck 2013, 157). This view of homosexuality as imported from the West has endured (Ndjio 2012). Against this backdrop, homosexuality as a practice based on same-sex physical attraction is dismissed as utterly absurd. Meanwhile, homosexuality as a condition of the homosociality observed particularly in same-sex boarding schools, where boys or girls in puberty satisfy their sexual urges with their peers, are either hushed up or explained as due to demonic influence.

The Role of Religion

In precolonial Cameroon, a number of indigenous religious practices (Schilder 1988) encouraged “homosociality” and cross-dressing, aspects that are now associated with same-sex behavior (Epprecht 2013). The Betis, for example, had the mevungu ritual exclusively for females and the so ritual for males. Interestingly, the so ritual required that boys wear female attire during the final stage of their initiation into masculinity (Houseman 1993). In addition to such indirect intimations of same-sex practice in indigenous cultures, the German ethnographer Günther Tessmann (1884–1969) drew attention to homosexual relationships among the Bafia people in the early 1900s, which he claimed were fostered by their belief in the nonexistence of God (Tessmann [1921] 1998).
Over time, Christianity and Islam, both of which strongly disapprove of same-sex practices, have gained dominance over indigenous beliefs.

The Catholic Church, especially, has been very active in LGBTQ debates. In 2009 Catholic priests and Christians organized a protest march against the government’s signing of the Protocol to the African Charter on Human and Peoples’ Rights (Maputo Protocol) in 2003, as they saw this as a potential prelude to government efforts to decriminalize homosexuality (Awondo 2016). Two years later, the National Episcopal Conference of Cameroon, through the state newspaper Cameroon Tribune, criticized the European Union for providing financial support to Cameroonian gay rights associations. Pentecostal churches, which have increased tremendously in number since the promulgation of laws on freedom of association in 1990, have also put up strong opposition to LGBTQ rights through charismatic preaching. This has notably been through presentation of homosexuality as (1) an “evil” that will prevent Cameroon from receiving God’s blessings (prosperity gospel); (2) a demonic affliction from which individuals require spiritual deliverance (healing gospel); and (3) a sign that the end of the world is at hand (end-time gospel) (Lyonga 2016).

Amid the intense contention around homosexuality, the government in 2013 communicated its official position on the subject, appropriating religion as the basis for the law criminalizing same-sex sexual behavior. In a press release, the minister of communication, Issa Tchiroma, stated that the law reflected the culture and values of the wider Cameroonian public, who are Christians and Muslims. Within religious circles, overt dissenting voices to the general condemnation of homosexuality by the Christian churches in Cameroon are rare. In this regard, Jean-Blaise Kenmogne, a Protestant pastor, is notable as one of the few clergymen who have openly advocated for respect of the rights of homosexuals, notably through the publication of his book Homosexualité, église et droits de l'homme (2012; Homosexuality, the church, and human rights). Such advocacy from a rights-based perspective is in constant competition with rumors and statements of public figures that frame homosexuality as occult—a notable example being a book by the now-deceased ruling party member Charles Ateba Eyene, Crimes rituels, loges, sectes, pouvoirs, drogues et alcools au Cameroun (2013; Ritual crimes, cults, sects, power, drugs, and alcohol in Cameroon), which received significant media coverage. In numerous media statements, Ateba Eyene called Biya's attention to same-sex occult practices among the elites, which by implication presented the president as a solution to the issue rather than as a participant in these practices.

Activism for LGBTQ Rights

Before homosexuality emerged as an issue of public debate, groups advocating for the rights of LGBTQ people had no visibility. For instance, L'Association pour la Défense des Droits des Homosexuels (ADEFHO; Association for the Defense of Homosexual Rights), which has been very influential in the struggle for LGBTQ rights, was created in 2003 but became more visible only in 2006 (Awondo 2010). Led by the prominent lawyer Alice Nkom, ADEFHO has been instrumental in bringing the plight of homosexuals in Cameroon to the attention of the international community and in providing legal defense to several individuals detained and prosecuted for same-sex sexual acts. Furthermore, Nkom has been at the forefront of advocacy for LGBTQ rights on television debate programs, calling on the Cameroonian government to scrap the law against same-sex sexual acts because it infringes on the constitutional rights of LGBTQ people. Other associations, such as Alternatives-Cameroun and the Cameroonian Foundation for AIDS (CAMFAIDS), advance the struggle for LGBTQ rights from the standpoint of ensuring access to HIV outreach services for men who have sex with men, a key population at risk of contracting HIV.

Given the predominance of narratives that fan homophobia within the Cameroonian public, activism for LGBTQ rights occurs in a context of great risk. Nkom has reported receiving several death threats in relation to her campaign. In 2013 the offices of Alternatives-Cameroun were set on fire by unknown attackers. Shortly thereafter, Eric Lembembe, an outspoken LGBTQ rights activist and the executive director of CAMFAIDS, was tortured and murdered in his home—a crime widely believed to be related to his activism because he had received death threats. Lembembe's murder, which was widely condemned by rights groups, further contributed to putting Cameroon into the international spotlight as a site of LGBTQ struggle. Challenges notwithstanding, these human rights groups, with the help of funding from international donors, are making progress in creating some measure of community, where LGBTQ people living underground can draw support from each other, as depicted in the award-winning 2013 documentary Born This Way.

SEE ALSO Activism in Africa South of the Sahara; Christianity in Africa: Anglican; Christianity in Africa: Pentecostal and Charismatic; Christianity in Africa: Roman Catholicism; Islam in Africa South of the Sahara; Witchcraft/Occult in Africa

BIBLIOGRAPHY

FILMOGRAPHY

DISCOGRAPHY

An elusive term, often used to describe a particular mode of behavior or way of being in the gay community that is associated with flamboyancy, affectation, vulgarity, and effeminacy.

The American interior decorator, author, and socialite Elsie de Wolfe (c. 1865–1950), on seeing the Parthenon in Athens, Greece, for the first time, declared “It’s beige! My color!” This is the motto with which Andrew Ross prefaces his 1988 article on the “Uses of Camp” (Ross 1999 [1988], 308). It is a good motto in that it illustrates, in the shortest space possible, many of the characteristics of camp: incongruity (the very small versus the very big; the ephemeral and frivolous versus the eternal; a debased stereotypical femininity versus the masculine sublime; “popular” culture versus “high” culture, etc.); a combination of preciosity and commodification (beige, used to describe a color, is a comparatively new piece of vocabulary: the Oxford English Dictionary places it firmly in the second half of the nineteenth century, connoting the specialized color palette of fashion designers and interior decorators, the latter being the profession that de Wolfe helped create in the early years of the twentieth century); overstatement and a flashy exposure of surfaces (two exclamation marks!); and a flamboyant self-assertion where an awed silence is called for (the unabashed assertion of similarity: “My color!”). In many ways, the example tells more about camp than any scholarly piece of writing can, not least the reason why camp has held and continues to hold the attention of literary and cultural critics.

What Is Camp?

When Fabio Cleto’s collection of core writings about camp was published in 1999, he had counted more than 1,000 pieces of critical writing but concluded that, in spite of this, “the slipperiness of camp has constantly eluded critical definitions … and all the ‘old’ questions remain to some extent unsettled” (Cleto 1999, 2). The list of “old” questions would include, for example, camp’s relationship to homosexual identities, its status as subversive of heterodoxy (and which heterodoxy?) or parasitic to it, the relation of camp to gender and to transgender, the question of its politics or lack of politics, and its commodification by or subversion of popular media formats. Indeed, there is at this moment no stable definition of what camp “is.” Susan Sontag, in her landmark essay “Notes on ‘Camp’” (1964), saw camp as a “sensibility” and as so elusive that in order to “snare” it (Sontag 1999 [1964], 54), she opted for the very open form of a list of propositions that surround the issue—and not always without self-contradiction—rather than defining it. Philip Core, twenty years later, starts with a claim that in order to understand camp, a “working definition is essential,” only to then founder (campily?) on a list of characteristics: “Camouflage, bravura, moral anarchy, the hysteria of despair, a celebration of frustration, skittishness, revenge … the possible descriptions are countless” (1984, 9).

In 1993 David Bergman, editing an important collection of essays on the connection between camp and homosexuality, does provide, if not a definition, then a description that, according to Bergman, “everyone agrees” on:

---

Camp is a style (whether of objects or of the way objects are perceived is debated) that favors “exaggeration,” “artifice,” and “extremity” … camp exists in tension with popular culture, commercial culture, or consumerist culture … a person who can recognize camp … or who can camp is a person outside the cultural mainstream … camp is affiliated with homosexual culture, or at least with a self-conscious eroticism that throws into question the naturalization of desire.

(4–5)

---

Whether “everyone agrees” on this characterization of camp, however, immediately becomes problematic, and in any case, even Bergman’s definition leaves one key issue—that of perception and objects—unresolved. In “Uses of Camp,” Ross comes to the conclusion that “universal definitions of camp are rarely useful” (1999 [1988], 317). Much more recently, Zadie Smith speaks of “camp’s vast kingdom” in contrast to the word being “too often stupidly and narrowly used, or else brutally defined” (2018, 181). In the face of such slipperiness, from the very beginning, camp criticism’s best ploy has been an inductive method that tries to generalize (or not even that) from observation of the manifestations of camp, and this means lists (and the debating of them). Sontag establishes this pattern, which many would follow (e.g., Richard Dyer, Jack Babuscio, Mark Booth), by claiming a “canon of Camp,” listing anything from Max Beerbohm’s 1911 novel Zuleika Dobson, Tiffany lamps, or Vincenzo Bellini’s operas to “stag movies seen without lust” (1999 [1964], 54–55). Philip Core drives this approach to its logical conclusion by providing not so much a study of camp as a richly commented sort of encyclopedia of camp examples. More recent criticism tends to take the route of approaching camp, as it were, phenomenologically, by arguing individual cases of camp, taking a broad understanding of the term for granted, rather than trying to provide any ultimate definition or characterization (e.g., McMahon 2006; Stępień 2014; Hotz-Davies, Vogt, and Bergmann 2018; Drushel and Peters 2017).
In all of this, even today, any discussion of camp will begin with Sontag’s 1964 essay, a relevance recently confirmed by a collection of essays dedicated to Sontag’s continuing influence (Drushel and Peters 2017). Cleto, having reviewed the “state of the art” (1999, 23) of camp criticism in 1999, provides a list of (possible) characteristics rather than a definition: camp is “aestheticism, aristocratic detachment, irony, theatrical frivolity, parody, effeminacy and sexual transgression” (9). All of these can be found as elements of camp in Sontag’s essay, and she has left us with a number of memorable and often quoted phrases—for example that “camp sees everything in quotation marks” (Sontag 1999 [1964], 56), that camp is a “seriousness that fails” (59), that it is the “glorification of ‘character’” (60), and, maybe most importantly, that camp is “a solvent of morality” (62, 64).

At the same time, Sontag introduced a number of ideas that came to be highly controversial. First of all, there is the claim that camp is a “sensibility” or “taste”—a view that became influential and was subsequently modified by Jonathan Dollimore’s memorable suggestion that camp is more “an invasion and subversion of other sensibilities” (1991, 311). In the above example of the Parthenon, for example, one can detect many of the qualities cited so far, including the very palpable sense that de Wolfe’s utterance is designed to “invade” and undo from within the sensibilities of the sublime. For Sontag, the camp sensibility seems to reside both in the perception of an observer and in specific objects, people, and behaviors; depending on the degree of awareness, there is naïve and deliberate camp.

Camp, then, has been perceived in mutually connected, but also uneasily combined, ways: as the result of a particular perception and appreciation of objects, as a quality that resides in such objects, and as a mode of utterance and behavior embraced by a conscious practitioner of camp. Again, de Wolfe’s example is instructive: can the Parthenon (!) be camp? Are we witnessing de Wolfe’s exaggerated personality traits or a conscious camp effort? The distinction has haunted camp criticism for a long time. Maybe the best solution was offered by Mark Booth, who distinguished “camp” (as a set of outrageous and overstated performances) from “camp fads and fashions” (as those objects, persons, and behaviors that may attract camp readings) (1983, 15).

The Connection to Homosexuality

One of the key issues Sontag did not settle was the question of gender and sexuality. Camp, for her, seems to be something exclusively produced by men, even though many of its icons are women (or maybe “women”), and while she believes that the specific stigma of male homosexuality does have something to do with camp’s theatricality, effeminacy, and duplicity, she also asserts that camp is not per se a “homosexual taste” (1999 [1964], 64).

Against this, critics arguing from within or against the stigmatized position of homosexuals have recognized more than just an affinity between homosexuality and camp. Here, it is especially the experience of the closet that suggests such an affinity. The closet produces a number of characteristic perceptual and communicative formations: double consciousness and imitative skill (the closet dweller as double agent “passing” in a straight and often hostile environment); skepticism about essences (the act—or art?—of passing requires close and analytical scrutiny of the gendered behaviors of others and tends to denaturalize one’s perception of the “givenness” of gender); and communicating in “code,” that is, fusing concealment with disclosure (no one must know and those in the know must be able to know). All of these are excellent preconditions for camp’s subversive quotations and misquotations from the canons of gendered habits ([Dyer 1999 [1976]; Babuscio 1999 [1978]]).

What is at stake here are two separate issues. If camp is connected to homosexuality, should it be seen affirmatively as a gay tradition, as something that enabled survival in pre-Stonewall days (and if so, what should happen to camp after Stonewall)? Or should camp be condemned as a perpetuation of stigma in its acceptance of society’s worst construction of homosexual men as less than manly (and, one might add, of “femininity” as the most abject position to be embraced by camp)? Dyer, for example, sees camp as “unambiguously gay male” and understands it as a form of gay self-defense that should, in all of its ambivalence, both in terms of homosexual stigma and the inclusion or exclusion of women, be seen as “the only heritage we’ve got” ([1999 [1976], 111; more recently, see Halperin 2012]). Andrew Britton, by contrast, found in camp a “language of impoverishment” that is “both reductive and non-analytical” ([1999 [1978–1979], 140]).
This brings us to another problematic of camp: is it political? Sontag, while clearly stating that camp has nothing less than the power to undo morality (and what is this, if not politics?), left no doubt that “the Camp sensibility is disengaged, depoliticized—or at least apolitical” ([1999 [1964], 54]). Britton undoubtedly would agree, as the reason for his harsh critique of camp lies exactly in the fact that it is not serious, dissolves certainties, including political ones, has no standpoint, and is, in other words, “non-analytical.” But this is where the continuing debate has also made the most inroads in defining not so much whether camp is “political” (no one would deny this at this point), but in how its politics work.

Camp and Queer Performance

This development coincides with and is powered by the conjunction of camp with its close relative, queer: “Camp and queer, in fact, share in their clandestine, substantial inauthenticity, and in their unstable and elusive status, a common investment in ‘heterodoxia’ and ‘para-doxia’ as puzzling, questioning deviations from (and of) the straightness of orthodoxy” (Cleto 1999, 16). Already in the late 1980s, Ross, addressing the question of whether camp is misogynist, noted a close connection between “non-essentialist feminism” and camp (1999 [1988], 325), and this is the point: to anyone believing in an essential “woman,” “man,” “homosexual,” or “transsexual,” camp will always be an insult, an impiety as it were, as its very raison d’être lies in torqueing, twisting, questioning, and parodying the naturalness of gender and sexuality, especially, but not exclusively, in its manifestation in drag.

So, it is no surprise that Judith Butler should have chosen drag as the test case with which to argue her hypothesis that gender is the result of iterative performances of a model to which there is no original. In her reading of drag, camp reveals, in exaggerated imitations of the scripts of femininity, the imitative structure of gender itself, not in relation to a true original, as any essentialist understanding of gender would claim, but rather “the parody is of the notion of an original” (Butler 1990, 138). That is, for a notion of gender as “performative,” camp is of value as that queer place on the margin or at the extreme end of gender inscription from which heteronormativity itself can be questioned both in terms of gender and of nonheteronormative sexualities.

But this is only one side of the queer debate, for to see queer as merely deconstructive would be missing the point. This may be nowhere more clearly formulated than in Eve Kosofsky Sedgwick’s plea that an antiheterosexist politics must develop next to what she called “paranoid” readings (skepticism, suspicion, deconstruction, identification of the sources of oppression, etc.) and “reparative” techniques—that is, ways of understanding the world that are capable of sustaining stigmatized lives (Sedgwick 2003). This “reparative” function of camp has been noted from the earliest discussions onward—in most detail, perhaps, in Esther Newton’s pioneering 1972 sociological study of American drag artists—and it has been a mainstay for gay people even in the darkest moments of the AIDS epidemic (Lassen 2011).

Relation to Femininity and Women

Aligning camp with “nonessentialist feminism” has also breathed new life into the discussion of the relation of femininity, women, and camp. Starting from Pamela Robertson’s important 1996 work on women’s gleeful enactment of the obvious staging of femininity and masculinity in film and popular culture, to the discussion of the lesbian butch-femme tradition as a form of genderplay rather than the replay of heteronormative gender hierarchies (Case 1999 [1988]), to June Reich’s amused diagnosis that “the dildo most certainly is camp” (1999 [1992], 263), there has been a sizable debate on the role of women in camp. If we see camp’s practice as a form of gender pastiche (Butler 1990, 138–139), this also opens a door toward performativities of “race” as camp practices. The idea here is that we are dealing with a form of mimicry, in Homi Bhabha’s words, a practice of imitation that is “at once resemblance and menace” (quoted in Dollimore 1991, 313). Smith, commenting on Mark Bradford’s video installation Niagara (2005)—itself a work intertextually connected to Marilyn Monroe’s (camp?) gender performativity—insists that as a resource of the marginalized, camp is a technique of “doing more than is necessary with less than you need,” and that a “hip-hop swagger is as camp as Marilyn's mosey” (2018, 181).

Camp's Broadening Scope

Ultimately, the theoretical sophistication of queer studies has breathed new life into camp studies so that the question of what should happen to camp after Stonewall has been answered: it is here to stay. This continued existence is facilitated by the appropriation of camp performativities in popular cultural formats, starting with pop in the 1960s—for example, in the work of Andy Warhol or John Waters (Ross 1999 [1988]; Meyer 1994). Camp has enjoyed a long tradition in the form of queer fan cultures “camping up” icons from (Hollywood) cinema, music, ballet, or opera (Cohan 2005; Shugart and Waggoner 2008), and it has become a fixed feature in rock and pop music (Leibetseder 2012).

This twentieth-century broadening of the scope of camp has led some critics to see its origins in the late nineteenth century, but there are good reasons to place its origins much earlier in the late seventeenth and eighteenth centuries (Booth 1983; King 1994). This is also the period that, according to Thomas Laqueur (1990), sees the gradual establishment of a strictly binary model of two naturally given and mutually exclusive biological sexes as opposed to the more gradational model of “one sex” that governed earlier. In this new “two-sex” gender regime, camp would be seen as coemerging as gender (and “sexuality”) essentialism’s skeptical sister, one possibly trying to hark back to the older tradition that was being superseded. Dollimore seems to be building on precisely this historical shift when he points to a surprising continuity between camp and early modern notions of “gender” and “sexuality” (1991, 320).

One thing in any case is certain: that camp not only has a future but also a longer past than may have been imagined. It has, and continues to have, a strong literary tradition (Kiernan 1990; McMahon 2006; Lassen 2011; Kellerman 2017). However, especially in recent decades, the discussion has shifted almost exclusively to those areas where “performance” may be taken literally as the deportment of bodies in space, be it on the screen or in the concert hall (Leibetseder 2012; Robertson 1996; Shugart and Waggoner 2008), opening up another crux in camp’s long history of critical oppositions (Cleto 1999): the question of whether camp is deconstructive of mass tastes, or is, in fact, itself commodified, or both (already argued by Moe Meyer and Ross). That is, can a performance by, say, Madonna or Lady Gaga, which reaches many millions and generates as many millions in revenue for its practitioners and all who profit from the sales of their products, be “camp”? Just how “subversive” can camp be under these circumstances?

Maybe the secret lies in camp’s unique solution to the question of cultural binaries. Newton notes that “camp usually depends on the perception or creation of incongruous
The art of camp seems to lie not so much in juxtaposition as in fusion, a “holding together” (Cleto 1999, 28, quoting Dyer), insisting on maintaining a nonexclusionary simultaneity of binaries that are elsewhere thought to be irreconcilable and foundational to the symbolic order: femininity and masculinity, homo and hetero, the vulgar and the precious, the dirty and the clean, and ultimately the abject and the dignified (Hotz-Davies, Vogt, and Bergmann 2018).

Maybe the greatest challenge in de Wolfe’s recognition of a shared sense of color between the Parthenon and herself is not so much that it juxtaposes the little woman and her clothes and the massive grandeur of the Parthenon, but that it insists that they exist and be perceived simultaneously, that the one is no more and no less magnificent than the other, that the very basis by which they are separated is, in the moment of de Wolfe’s utterance, momentarily erased. In Juliane Rebentisch’s 2014 turn to a “material” reading of camp, even the material world itself is arranged in a nonhierarchized assembly of “creatures” holding together people, trash, rubble, and much more in one holistic assembly. In dissolving the binaries that make stigma possible in the first place, noncommodified camp, then, would ultimately result in a vision in which stigma is not so much negotiated as rendered inoperable.

SEE ALSO Bars and Cabarets in Europe; Biological Essentialism; Cabaret Theater in Latin America and the Caribbean; Carnival and Sexuality in Brazil; The Closet; Language; Language in Europe; Madame Satã (1900–1976); Popular Music and Queer Identities

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Leibetseder, Doris. Queer Tracks: Subversive Strategies in Rock and Pop Music. Translated by

Canadian Criminal Code Reform (1969)

GARY KINSMAN
Professor Emeritus of Sociology
Laurentian University, Canada

Changes to Canada’s criminal code in 1969 that included the partial decriminalization of certain homosexual acts.

In Canada in 1969, homosexual acts were partially decriminalized as part of broad-ranging omnibus reform of the criminal law introduced by the Liberal government of Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau (1919–2000). This was part of a broader reform agenda that used the rhetoric of establishing a “just society.” The legislation known as the Criminal Law Amendment Act also included reforms regarding gambling, lotteries, the decriminalization of distribution of information on birth control, and the partial and limited decriminalization of abortion (Kinsman 2013).

Prior to 1969, all sexual acts between men were officially criminalized in Canada. The 1969 reform led to the partial decriminalization of the two offenses of “gross indecency” (very vaguely defined but most often referring to oral sex) and “buggery” (also vaguely defined but most often used to cover anal sex). While “gross indecency” was officially extended to cover lesbian acts in the early 1950s, charges such as “gross indecency” were rarely used for sexual acts between women, as lesbian oppression was organized more through social policies and family law than through these sex offense provisions (Pearlston 2017). While some have suggested that the reform “legalized” or entirely decriminalized homosexuality (Smith 2011), this was actually the partial and limited decriminalization of only two offenses that men engaging in sex with other men could be charged with. Even Canadian prime minister Justin Trudeau (1971–; the son of Pierre Trudeau) in his 2017 apology for the national security purge campaign against homosexuals and for other state discrimination against gay men and lesbians noted that “this didn’t end in 1969 with the partial decriminalization of homosexual sex.”

“Gross indecency” and “buggery” remained criminalized, but an exemption was introduced to decriminalize them when two people (and no more than two) with the age of consent set at twenty-one (much higher than for heterosexual activities, set at fourteen) engaged in these practices in "private"—basically behind bedroom doors (Hooper 2014; Kinsman 1996, 2013). These two offenses remained criminalized if they involved anyone under the age of twenty-one, if more than two people were involved, or if they were in “public.” This significantly higher age of consent was motivated on the basis that adolescent males needed special protection from homosexual advances and established a legal basis for constructing gay men as a presumed sexual danger to boys and young men (Kinsman 2013).

Social Context and History Leading Up to the Reform

The homosexual law reform occurred in broader social and historical contexts. The social transformations and struggles leading up to the reform of the Criminal Code of Canada include gender, sexual, racialized, and class transformations in the post–World War II years, setting the stage for new sexual and political movements and regulatory strategies. Sexuality and sexual discussions (largely confined to heterosexuality) assumed a social centrality in more people’s lives. There was a shift in family formation, particularly a growing integration of married women into the wage-labor force, the development of new birth-control technologies, and the generation of new sexological knowledge, while women continued to be assigned the vast bulk of unpaid domestic and reproductive labor. The expansion of consumer capitalism led to the increasing commodification of social life, including sexuality, with women’s bodies used to sell consumer goods, and discourses of femininity. By the later 1960s in Canada, the massive transformations of capitalist, patriarchal, and racializing social relations led to less reliance on the centrality of the heterosexual family in capitalist and state relations, opening up spaces for struggles over sexual and gender regulation (Kinsman 2013).

In the context of these major social transformations, there was a clash between morally conservative strategies of sexual regulation that led to the entire criminalization of homosexuality and emerging liberal approaches to regulating sexual practices that led to partial decriminalization. Canadian state legal formation during these years was influenced by developments in both the United States and the United Kingdom. In the 1950s and early 1960s in the United States, the criminalization of homosexuality was extended through designating homosexuals as “sexual psychopaths” (Freedman 1987), basically defined as individuals unable to control their sexual impulses. Similar sentencing provisions were added to the Canadian Criminal Code. This designation conflicted with the liberal approaches that were generated to respond to the social shifts of the postwar years. This was typified by the Wolfenden Report (1957) in the United Kingdom, which was the product of a committee set up to address what were portrayed by the government and the media as the pressing social problems of street prostitution and male homosexuality (Home Office and Scottish Home Department 1957). The Wolfenden Report became a key text of liberal sexual regulation in Canada, given the legal frameworks and practices of sexual regulation inherited from British colonialism.

Dangerous Sexual Offenders and the Klippert Case

In Canadian state legal formation, as mentioned, growing influences from south of the border led to the adoption of criminal sexual psychopath (1948) and, later, dangerous sexual offender (1960) provisions, which established that participation in consensual homosexual sex could get one sentenced indefinitely (Kinsman 2013). This development set the stage for the important Everett George Klippert case. Klippert was sentenced as a dangerous sexual offender on the basis of a series of convictions for “gross indecency” in Calgary and in the Northwest Territories. His lawyer appealed this decision all the way to the Supreme Court of Canada. The resulting Supreme Court majority decision in November 1967 agreed, in a literalist reading of the Criminal Code section, that because Klippert was likely to continue to engage in homosexual activities, he was correctly sentenced as a dangerous sexual offender (Kinsman 1996). The implication was that all sexually active homosexuals could be dangerous sexual offenders. The decision facilitated the law reform process by provoking considerable opposition, especially given that the Wolfenden Report–inspired decriminalization of consensual sexual relations between two adult men in private had been enacted on 27 July of that year in England and Wales. This led in December to the then justice minister (but soon to be prime minister) Pierre Trudeau’s famous remark, borrowing from the Wolfenden perspective, that “there is no place for the state in the bedrooms of the nation” (quoted in Kinsman 2013, 195) and his proposals for homosexual law reform, introduced on 21 December 1967.

As Douglas Sanders, a homophile activist who had been involved in the Association for Social Knowledge in Vancouver in the 1960s, expressed it, the Klippert decision “wiped out any middle ground in the debate” because the most sophisticated argument against Criminal Code reform “was that changing the law was some form of approval” of homosexuality (quoted in Kinsman 2013, 194). However, it was now clear that, with the existing laws, continuing engagement in gay sex could lead to indefinite detention (Kinsman 1996). In responding to these pressures, Trudeau and the Liberal government looked to the recent reforms in England and Wales and the Wolfenden perspective that led up to them. The Wolfenden approach became very cogent in formulating a response in these circumstances.

Impact of the Wolfenden Approach

While the Wolfenden Report’s articulation of liberal sexual regulation and policing marked an important shift, it also maintained the morally conservative strategy of criminalization in the broadly defined public sphere. This was, in part, an attempt to privatize homosexuality and confine it to a limited private realm (Kinsman 1996). The struggles leading up to the partial decriminalization of homosexual sexual practices in 1969 in the Canadian state are linked to uses of this approach. This connection is also tied to the previously mentioned law reform in England and Wales in 1967 that set up a tension between sexual reform happening there and the Klippert decision and the extending criminalization strategy. The Wolfenden Report came to be used as an active text in shaping and reorganizing sexual regulatory discussions toward law reform within the Canadian state.

The Wolfenden regulatory strategy was used by activists in a number of different social locations to open up space for law reform discussions and to facilitate popular educational discussions on lesbian and gay concerns (Kinsman 1996). Homophile activists organizing in the 1960s argued for tolerance toward homosexual men and women and also supported law reform efforts. This included a range of activities such as public meetings; organizing with the churches through the Canadian Council on Religion and the Homosexual; the short-lived formation of the Homophile Reform Society with the support of Sidney Katz, who was then an associate editor with Maclean's magazine and who also wrote articles on homosexual issues; raising homosexual law reform that actually went beyond the age limitations of the Wolfenden Report in the Criminal Law Subsection of the British Columbia Division of the Canadian Bar Association in 1966; and a paper by Sanders on sentencing for homosexual sexual offenses that supported law reform, originally written for the Association for Social Knowledge and then published in Criminal Law Quarterly in 1967 (Kinsman 1996).

These activities also included support for the early 1964 law reform effort of Arnold Peters, a maverick member of Parliament from the New Democratic Party (the Canadian social democratic party). He proposed a private member's bill to amend the Criminal Code along Wolfenden lines. Peters was also involved in homophile organizing with the Canadian Council on Religion and the Homosexual and the short-lived Homophile Reform Society, and was supported by the homophile activist Gary Nichols (Kinsman 1996). These initiatives, among many others, facilitated support for law reform in the media, in some church circles, within the legal profession, and in some official political circles. By the later 1960s, as pressure for homosexual law reform intensified, the Wolfenden public/private legal approach began to be raised in legal cases in Canada, even though at this point it had no official legal status (Gigeroff 1968; Kinsman 1996).

Attempting to move beyond the limitations of the Wolfenden approach, homophile activists challenged the discriminatory age restriction of twenty-one imposed on participation in homosexual sex. Sanders forwarded to Prime Minister Trudeau a resolution from the North American Conference of Homophile Organizations (NACHO), a network of homophile and gay groups that the Association for Social Knowledge was involved in and which was also increasingly influenced by the rising militancy of the black civil rights and black power movements, as well as the student and antiwar movements. In this resolution, adopted at a conference in Chicago in 1968, NACHO stated that it wished to express its sharp disappointment that Mr. Pierre Elliott Trudeau ... has seen fit to introduce the limited and inadequate provisions of the English homosexual law reform bill ... which makes 21 the age of consent for homosexual acts.... The Conference encourages the Canadian government to ... enact provisions for age of consent which are identical for homosexual and heterosexual acts.

(QUOTED IN KINSMAN 1996, 265)

Sanders also suggested that one way to increase gay and lesbian visibility in the lead-up to reform was for Association for Social Knowledge supporters to go door-to-door with petitions supporting the law reform measures. This suggestion was reluctantly accepted at one meeting but then rejected at the next by individuals who felt that if they rocked the boat they might hurt the chances of reform. The attempts by homophile activists to use the Wolfenden approach to open up space for popular education on homosexual concerns were contained by the shift to the official use of the report in the 1969 Criminal Code reform. These state discussions reduced the reform to public/private and adult/youth distinctions. As homosexual experience was worked up as private and public sex and along adult/youth lines, it led to the eclipsing of broader gay and lesbian initiatives for popular education, public acceptance, and a broader decriminalization (Kinsman 2013).

Sanders later described his experience of the 1969 reform. In his view, this strategy of public/private regulation takes the gay issue and describes it in non-homosexual terms. [Decriminalization] occurs in a way in which the issue is never joined. The debate never occurs. And so homosexuals are no more real after the reform than before.... I felt that an issue had been stolen from us. That we had forgotten that the reform issue was an issue that could have been used for public debate and it had been handled in such a way that there had been none. The only thing that had a promise of helping people was a public debate. It didn't happen.

(QUOTED IN KINSMAN 1996, 264)

Gay experiences were transformed into distinctions between public and private, and there was, therefore, little transformation of popular understandings of gay men and lesbians.

The Reform Debate and Its Outcomes
The 1969 Criminal Code reform debate in Parliament saw the governing Liberal Party and the New Democratic Party support the reform along with some Conservatives, whereas most of the Conservatives and the Créditistes (a small Catholic-based right-wing social credit party from Quebec) were opposed. While the opposition mobilized morally conservative arguments, both sides of the debate tried to link their positions to the ideology that lesbians and gay men were “sick” or mentally ill. Supporters of the reform were able to seize this terrain through the argument that homosexuals were not all criminals and if they engaged in activities in private with another consenting adult (twenty-one or over), they should be under the care of a doctor, a psychiatrist, or a therapist, and not in jail. In the end, the vote in the House of Commons on 14 May 1969 was 149 to 55, and the reform became law in August 1969 (Kinsman 2013).

The reform was part of a new liberal strategy of sexual regulation based on public/private and adult/youth distinctions. This reform strategy directed the police much more specifically against homosexual sexual expression in public, which is why the number of men charged increased after the reform, and the police began to use the bawdy house legislation and its “acts of indecency” clause, which was added in 1917 (Russell 1982), much more pervasively. The public realm was constructed very broadly and the private realm very narrowly, embedding the notion that homosexual sex was more indecent than heterosexual sex in the law and policing. This was not a mistake made by homophobic individuals, but was mandated by the 1969 reform strategy itself.

The limitations of the 1969 Criminal Code reform were well understood by the early Canadian gay liberation movement. The August 1971 “We Demand” protest—the first gay and lesbian rights demonstration in Canada—was explicitly organized against the limitations of the 1969 reform. The cover letter for the demands of the demonstration, signed by Cheri DiNovo and Brian Waite, stated:

In 1969 the Criminal Code was amended so as to make certain sexual acts between consenting adults, in private, legal. This was widely misunderstood as “legalizing” homosexuality and thus placing homosexuals on an equal basis with other Canadians. In fact, this amendment was merely a recognition of the non-enforceable nature of the Criminal Code as it then existed. Consequently its effects have done but little to alleviate the oppression of homosexual men and women in Canada. In our daily lives we are still confronted with discrimination, police harassment, exploitation and pressures to conform which deny our sexuality. That prejudice against homosexual people pervades society is, in no small way, attributable to the practices of the Federal government.

(QUOTED IN KINSMAN 2013, 197)
The reform and the discussions surrounding it did lead to more visibility for gay and lesbian individuals and communities, and this soon moved beyond the narrow private sphere to become more public in character. In response, the police were marshaled against the emerging visibility of gay community formation and sexual cultures in the mid- to late 1970s as people moved beyond the privatization of homosexual sex sanctioned in the 1969 reform. This escalation of sexual policing included the “cleanup” campaign in Montreal prior to the 1976 Summer Olympics, the 1977 raid on the Montreal gay bar Truxx, and the major bathhouse raids in Toronto in the late 1970s and early 1980s (Kinsman 1996; Kinsman and Gentile 2010). The police continued to use gross indecency (abolished only in 1988), buggery (changed to anal sex in 1988, with an age of consent set at eighteen, which has been challenged in the courts and the Liberal government is committed to abolishing), indecent act (a section of the Criminal Code often covering masturbation and mutual masturbation), and the acts of indecency section of the bawdy house laws against men having sex with men. In response, there was a groundswell of organizing against these raids in Montreal, Toronto, and other centers that forced the police to retreat (Kinsman 1996).

The Limitations of the 1969 Reform

While significant in allowing homosexuals to engage in certain sexual activities in a very limited private realm, the Criminal Law Amendment Act did not remove the state from the bedrooms of the nation, as heterosexuality remained the normalized sexuality and as homosexuality continued to be constructed as “sick” and often as “criminal.” The public/private, adult/youth regulation that informed the 1969 reform was a strategy of liberal, but still oppressive, sexual regulation and policing (Kinsman 2007). “Liberal” in this context cannot be understood as progressive or liberationist but rather as a different strategy of social regulation and policing. Without underestimating the changes the Criminal Code reforms brought about, it was only a partial relaxation of the earlier morally conservative total criminalization strategy with regard to homosexual sexual activity. Although the reform was a new strategy of regulation, it was not aimed at establishing social equality for gay men and lesbians with heterosexuals. Instead, it shifted sexual policing to focus on homosexual sex in a broad public realm (including when more than two people were involved), as well as that involving young people. Continued organizing by movement activists would be necessary to repeal the laws the police were able to use against consensual gay sex and to limit police actions against consensual homosexual sex.

SEE ALSO Antisodomy and Buggery Trials; Bathhouse Raids, Toronto (1981); Chechnya, Detention Camps in; Fortune and Men’s Eyes; Human Rights in Europe; Inquisition, Criminal Courts, and Sexuality in Colonial Latin America; Section 377 and Section 377A; Section 377 in South Asia; Sins against Nature in Colonial Latin America; Sodomy Laws in the United States;
The Wolfenden Report

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Trudeau, Justin. “Remarks by Prime Minister Justin Trudeau to Apologize to LGBTQ2 Canadians.” Office of the Prime Minister of Canada. 28 November 2017.
Cape Town

ZETHU MATEBENI
Senior Researcher, Institute for Humanities in Africa
University of Cape Town, South Africa

The South African port city known as the Gay Capital of Africa.

The city of Cape Town is nicknamed the Mother City because it was the first area of European settlement in South Africa; the colonial remnants of Cape Town offer European travelers a rich cultural heritage (Bickford-Smith 2009). Tourists are attracted to the dramatic mountains, glistening beaches, the flora and the fauna of the Cape, long summer nights, and the city's colonial architecture. Immigrants are similarly drawn to the city because of its location and job prospects in a country with the most progressive constitution in Africa. Yet, this image of Cape Town is counterbalanced by a legacy of slavery that “continues to shape the present in profound ways,” as noted by Gabeba Baderoon (2014). The Cape also has a long history of serving as a penal colony for political and religious exiles, extending to antiapartheid activists banished to Robben Island, located 6.9 kilometers (4.3 miles) off the coast of Cape Town. Among the recorded cases of execution in the Cape for homosexual activity was that of Klaas Blank (c. 1705–1735), a young Khoi man from the southwestern part of the Cape and a prisoner on Robben Island, popularized by the 2003 film Proteus (Newton-King 2005).

Historical Overview

As early as the late nineteenth century the city of Cape Town was already considered a global tourist destination owing to the rise of railways and steamships, which facilitated travel within and to South Africa. European elite and travelers alike found home in the colonial establishments of the Cape vineyards, castles, and memorials. This contributed to the whiteness of the city, branding Cape Town as a destination for what could be seen as white leisure, differentiating itself from other (South) African cities. But this was not to last very long. Sanctions during the violence of the apartheid years (1948–1991) and the forced removals of people of color from the inner city affected the country and the city's tourist industry. This later changed during the democratic transition, with political figures such as Nelson Mandela being released from prison and Robben Island being accessible to travelers as a prime tourist site. The dawn of the new democracy ushered in many opportunities, including a vibrant multicultural, cosmopolitan culture and an explosion of queer life, which had always been part of Cape Town culture.
Since the 1900s the figure of the moffie (a South African term for a gay or effeminate man) appears in what was known as the Coon Carnival but has since been renamed the Cape Minstrel Carnival. The event is a male-dominated annual carnival that occurs in Cape Town on 2 January (Jeppie 1990). The moffie queens played an important role in leading the carnival through the streets of Cape Town, from organizing their own troupes in the 1930s to being included in the official lineup starting in 1952. At the same time there has been a stigma against women—especially lesbian women—participating in the carnival (Gevisser 1994; Baxter 1996; Pacey 2014). The drag queen or moffie, as popularly known in Cape Town, is simultaneously an undesirable figure and a source of beauty and entertainment (Matebeni 2016). In the carnivals of the 1950s, the moffie was perceived to be sexually abnormal, was pathologized, or was “symbolized [as] the most subversive” (Jeppie 1990, 82).

A booming gay subculture was visible during the period of World War II (1939–1945). Cape Town's suburbs were abuzz with a rich social life of gay men cruising in places such as Sea Point and being entertained by moffies or cross-dressers in drag pageants in coloured areas in Athlone, while cross-dressers occupied prominent positions as hairstylists around the city. Many drag icons were featured in local and national print media and became the face of avant-garde Cape Town. In the late 1960s stringent laws on homosexuality under the amended Immorality Act affected many gay subcultures, including that of Cape Town. While a vibrant coloured gay and drag community existed, what soon characterized gay life in the late 1960s was an “apolitical’ and accommodationist” white gay subculture (Gevisser 1994, 63), resulting in the gay identity politics and AIDS activism of the 1970s and 1980s.

One of the first organizations to have an impact in LGBT politics in South Africa in the early 1980s was the Gay Association of South Africa (GASA), which had a Cape Town chapter that focused mainly on health issues. GASA had an apolitical stance. Its offshoot Cape Town organizations, such as Lesbians in Love and Compromising Situations (LILACS) and Lesbians and Gays against Oppression (LAGO), were overtly political. LILACS took feminist and political stands, with members who felt sidelined by the male focus and apolitical stance of GASA. LAGO, which came a bit later, had the political intent of injecting gay rights issues into the antiapartheid struggle. By 1984 many of the members of these organizations under the GASA Cape Town chapter were part of the AIDS Action Group. By this time HIV had hit the gay community in Cape Town hard (Pegge 1994), as organizers were not always clear about where to seek help. Gay rights and AIDS activism during this time set the tone for the Treatment Action Campaign's strong and successful effort to push the South African government to provide access to treatment (Mbali 2013). Some of the key figures in the Treatment Action Campaign were gay and lesbian activists who had been organizing in Cape Town since the 1980s.

Gay Cape Town in the Twenty-First Century
The claim for space is an integral part of contemporary Cape Town. In present-day Cape Town, the demarcations of the city enforce a racial, class, and gender divide that banishes black people, coloured people, and gender nonconforming people to the townships and the Cape flats, leaving the city to be occupied by the majority of wealthy white people (Leap 2005). While gay and lesbian organizations in Cape Town existed since the late 1980s, these had a predominantly white membership base and operated within the city center. For example, the Triangle Project, currently based in the heart of the city, remains the oldest LGBT organization in South Africa. Cape Town has also boasted the most popular gay and lesbian film festival, Out in Africa, which until 2014, when it closed its doors after twenty years, was based in the city center. The Mother City Queer Project and the Cape Town Pride festival remain the most popular gay tourist attractions in Cape Town.

Pride itself is a site of contestation as evidenced by the controversy generated by pride events in South Africa. The 2016 Cape Town Pride slogan “Gay|Proud|Colourblind” angered black and coloured LGBTQ people in Cape Town because its stated desire to be “Colourblind” was perceived to be insensitive to those LGBTQ individuals who have suffered discrimination based on their race. Some argued that the slogan attempted to conceal the very blatant structural injustices that ensured that black people were kept out of the city. In essence, this ideology, produced by white gay male organizers of Cape Town Pride, “justifies and defends the racial status quo” and its embeddedness in power relations (Rodriquez 2006, 645). At the same time, the focus of the Pride event prioritized men who have sex with men as the sole category for health interventions, in particular with respect to HIV/AIDS, disregarding the ways in which HIV affects lesbians, bisexual women, and transgender people (Matebeni et al. 2013; Sandfort et al. 2013; Stevens 2012). There has been a radical departure from the first Pride march that took place in Cape Town in 1993, organized by the activists Theresa Raizenberg, Taghmeda (Midi) Achmat, and her brother Zackie Achmat who started the HIV/AIDS advocacy campaign Treatment Action Campaign (Achmat, Raizenberg, and Holmes 2003; Achmat and Raizenberg 2006). In the early 1990s the Pride march had a very specific political agenda—fighting against discrimination—and was organized by activists. This changed as Cape Town Pride became a capitalist venture with a heavy focus on commercialization (Nath 2012).

Queering Cape Town

For many black and coloured LGBTQ individuals, Cape Town is a gay capital only for those who can enjoy the luxury of not having to negotiate all forms of class, gender, sex, and racial injustices and oppressions associated with post-apartheid identification. It is this patriarchal and racist narrative of gay Cape Town that requires queering—an interrogation of the forms of exclusionary practices that have separated the city’s inhabitants along lines of race, class, gender, and sexual orientation.
In this queer narrative, black queer persons—those deemed nonnormative or not desirable, or who exist on the margins of the city—become part of the fabric of the city. These are bodies that unsettle the white able-bodied (homo)normativity of the city: black lesbians whose stories remain untold or are noted only in relation to violence and hate crimes (Matebeni 2015); trans people, who experience exclusion in educational institutions in the city, in lesbian and gay organizations, and in how they for decades crafted their own forms of communication and organizations even as unwanted and unrecognized citizens; and refugees and asylum seekers, who are considered foreign and have to regularly dodge xenophobic, transphobic, and homophobic attacks in a postapartheid city (Camminga 2017).

In these narratives, transwomen sex workers expose the rich queer tapestry of a different Cape Town—through their interactions with the justice system and in their access to health care, and how every day on the streets of the city they put their bodies on the line, pleasing heterosexual men and appearing as the “moffies” and drag queens who have famously marked the city as “gay.” While they occupy the streets every day, they are still considered outsiders engaging in work that is criminalized. Some would argue that until Cape Town treats all its citizens equally and addresses the racial and gender injustices that have plagued the city since colonization, slavery, and apartheid, the claim to be the gay capital of the continent will remain a fallacy for the majority of the city’s inhabitants.

SEE ALSO Activism in Africa South of the Sahara; HIV/AIDS in Africa; Language in Africa; Sex Work/Sex Tourism/Sex Trafficking in Africa; South Africa

BIBLIOGRAPHY

The intersections and contradictions of Carnival and queer expression.

Carnival in Brazil is a national holiday officially consisting of the four days preceding the Christian solemn religious observance of Lent, beginning on the Saturday before the official start of Lent on Ash Wednesday and ending on Fat Tuesday, although in reality the holiday itself extends to Ash Wednesday. Some cities, such as Rio de Janeiro, the twin cities of Recife and Olinda, and Salvador—famous for their Carnival celebrations that are often funded by public money—offer scattered large-scale street parties that go far beyond this official holiday, some of them happening as early as forty-five days before Lent. So perhaps the first thing to understand about Carnival itself as a cultural event, in Brazil and elsewhere, is that everyday social conventions tend to be suspended in favor of elaborate celebrations that highlight the body as a transient medium for a continuous figuration and recreation of the self and the social world, a process that is actually sanctioned by political authorities and society at large. For that reason, Carnival is rife with social meaning and symbolism for LGBTQ-identified individuals and other marginalized groups in Brazil, populations forced to endure multiple forms of rejection and the feeling of inadequacy in everyday life.

Beginning on Friday evening, many busy streets and avenues throughout the country are closed by the state authorities in order to become the space for festivities and all sorts of celebratory rituals, making most kinds of work schedules impossible to continue for many days in a row. The streets and other public spaces acquire new uses and give way to new types of social interaction, mostly structured by the dynamics of partying and satirical performance. In Recife, for instance, the biggest Carnival bloco (street parade), Galo da Madrugada (Rooster of Dawn), starts at 7:00 AM right in the city center, typically drawing a crowd of over 2 million people. In Rio de Janeiro, foliões (Carnival partygoers) may choose to sleep in the afternoon in order to attend the escola de samba (samba organizations in lower-class communities that parade and compete during carnival) parades that run throughout the night and into dawn. The institutionally sanctioned suspension, and often inversion, of everyday experiences of space and time during Carnival renders Brazilian society at large “unstructured or rudimentarily structured,” to use Victor Turner’s terms in his analysis of liminality ([1966] 2008, 96). Carnival goers submit to the general authority of the ritual, which in this case is composed of a clear and unapologetic celebration of the carnal, hedonistic inclinations of the body, usually repressed by the demands of labor, family life, and moral values.

Homosexual Visibility and Social Inversions

This temporary upending of social hierarchies of course has had a huge impact on sexual and racial minorities, who have managed to take advantage of the possibilities afforded by this institutional loosening up of social conventions in order to express and perform their identities more assertively. Particularly, travestis—a well-known Brazilian minority group of biological males who tend to be attracted to men, who dress, and sometimes identify, as women, and who despite making use of hormone therapy and silicone gel for corporeal modification do not typically undergo genital surgeries—and gay men in general acquire an exuberant visibility during Carnival, and the performance of gender inversion is often invoked as an embodiment of the very spirit of Carnival.

The visible presence of travestis and the utter abundance of gay blocos, gay bailes (balls), gay beauty contests, gay costume pageantries, and gay-occupied street strips throughout many large cities during Carnival week may give the outsider the false impression that Brazil is a tropical gay paradise, a place where deviance and gender fluidity is the rule. In reality, such scholars as Barbara Browning (1995), Don Kulick (1998), and James N. Green (1999) have shown that such idealized descriptions of Carnival as a time of absolute queer harmony and freedom do not reflect the actual experience of most LGBTQ Brazilians, particularly not the experience of those from lower social classes, including the travestis.
Revelers at the Banda de Ipanema during the Rio de Janeiro Carnival, 2015. Cross-dressers participating in public street revelries, such as this man dressed as a bride and handing out flowers to bus passengers, is a hallmark of the Rio Carnival.

In a discussion of the coupling of Carnival and homosexuality in Brazil, it is important to remember that Brazil is a country marked by profound social inequality and economic disparity, often played out on racial lines. While an obvious increase in homosexual visibility and the many kinds of Carnival gender and socioeconomic inversions should, and indeed must, be read along the political sense of possibility they evoke, it is prudent to also approach Brazilian Carnival as a particular mode of intensifying the historical contradictions and social conflicts that give shape to that society.

Contradictions and Social Conflicts

In Beyond Carnival: Male Homosexuality in Twentieth-Century Brazil, Green revisits these contradictions when he writes, “Mainstream Brazilian society has accommodated itself uneasily and unevenly to the expansion of homosexual territories within pre-Lenten festivities. Public and official responses have shifted between acceptance and repression, between curiosity and disgust” (1999, 201). According to Green, drawing primarily from historical sources and oral histories in Rio de Janeiro, one finds records of homosexual men “invading” masked Carnival balls in feminine attire as early as the very beginning of the twentieth century. These men later organized groups of cross-dressers who would participate in public street revelries, which continue to be a landmark of the Rio Carnival today, exemplified by blocos such as Banda de Ipanema, which attracts thousands of foliões, gay and otherwise. Green also writes that gender impersonation and performance began to appear in Carnival drag balls by the 1940s, growing considerably in numbers, size, and visibility during the entire next decade, and becoming a prominent space for the emergence of an exclusive homosexual subculture. By the mid-1970s, though, these “drag balls had become an integral part of the Carioca [i.e., Rio de Janeiro] Carnival. They attracted extensive and positive media coverage and an international host of participants. Concurrently, luxury costume contests at the government-sponsored ‘official’ Carnival ball held at the Municipal Theater became another venue for homosexual men. Their creations became the epitome of the sumptuous Carnival fantasia (costume)” (Green 1999, 201). Even today, homosexual men dominate the venues for costume pageantry in Rio and other cities, including Recife and Salvador.

But solely focusing on the positive aspects of this relationship would be missing the point. Drawing from the Brazilian historian Maria Clementina Pereira Cunha’s work, Green writes that pre-Lenten festivities should be framed less as an inverted mirror of the Brazilian social structure and an expression of communal egalitarianism than as a moment in which different social classes (as well as races and sexualities) express and play out social conflicts. Likewise, Green argues that cross-dressing also reveals and reflects deeply embedded social tensions. Instead of understanding Carnival as an “act of inversion,” for many Brazilian homosexuals these gender performances provide the opportunity for an "intensification of their own experiences as individuals who transgress gender roles and socially acceptable sexual boundaries the entire year” (1999, 203).

Along these same lines, drawing from ethnographic data collected in the city of Salvador, Kulick argues that as far as travestis are concerned, Carnival offers no better shelter against abuse and physical attacks than any other time during the year. As he walked back home with a group of travestis who had participated in the annual gay beauty Carnival contest in Salvador, Kulick himself witnessed a bloco de travestidos—ironically a group of heterosexual men parading down the street dressed as women—hurling at the real travestis “exactly the same kinds of insults and abuse that travestis have all grown wearily accustomed to hearing from men at any other time of the year” (1998, 37).

Similar contradictions can be found in going through the records of Carnival culture in other Brazilian cities. In Fortaleza during the 1940s, for instance, a time when the city hosted two US military bases, a large Carnival bloco de travestidos called Bloco das Coca-Colas was noted for promoting a misogynistic and xenophobic satire of what these men called the “coca-colas” (local women who broke with regional moral values of the time by hanging out and dating American soldiers in public spaces, such as the beach and US military-exclusive parties, where supposedly they drank Coca-Cola before it was available to the larger public). According to local intellectuals, the Bloco das Coca-Colas was all men, both “manly” and “effeminate,” but united in being equally dressed in drag as a way to mock the young women who already faced social scorn for their choices and for their sexual relationships with members of the US military.

Gay pride during Carnival has often articulated itself around contradictory signs. A case in point is the famous (and infamous) marchinha de carnaval (Carnival song) “Cabeleira do Zezé.” Composed in 1964 by João Roberto Kelly, an entrepreneur who popularized the professional drag show Les Girls in Rio de Janeiro in the 1960s, the lyrics scorn a man with long hair: “Look at Zezé’s long hair. Do you think he is? Do you think he is?” Green notes that foliões in Carnival balls in Rio filled the missing response with the shout “Bicha!” (“Queer!”), as a pejorative reference to effeminate men. But in the Carnival gay balls in Praça Tiradentes, the queer folks shouted the same filler as an “affirmation of their sexual identity” (1999, 228). In subsequent years, this song would become one of the most played tunes in the history of Brazilian Carnival, continuing to evoke multiple meanings. “It retained its pride-laden content for gay revelers, while also serving as a vehicle for Brazilians who retained a hostile attitude toward homosexuality to make fun of effeminate men” (228). Every year during Carnival, social media activists recuperate the heated debate of whether the song is homophobic or not, and every year gay Brazilians fail to resolve this contradiction.
In her account of Carnival in Bahia, Browning (1995) also highlights the difficulties in creating easy, onesided narratives and interpretations about the sexual and racial politics that get played out in the festivities. Browning is particularly interested in the Carnival blocos afro, dance and percussion groups that are also community associations whose street parades revolve around themes and rhythms that emphasize Afro-Brazilian heritage. In Salvador, these neighborhood grassroots organizations and their street performances turn toward diasporic retellings of a history of continuity with Africa, revealing Carnival as a potentially powerful means of educating Afro-Brazilian peoples and mobilizing them into political awareness. Interestingly, in her discussion of these groups, which are far from exclusively gay, the homosexual subject emerges as a figure imbued with aesthetic and even religious prowess. The blocos afro Filhos de Gandhi, Olodum, Ilê Aiyê, Ara Kêto, and Muzenza, all draw on secularized versions of religious rhythms played for orixás (African divinities) in Candomblé (the syncretic Afro-Brazilian religion that has deep roots in Brazil’s colonial past). The blocos afro grew popular during the 1980s, and they are today one of the cornerstones of Carnival in Salvador, Bahia. Approaching the carnivalesque tradition of cross-dressing discussed above, through the context of Bahia, demands that one step back from the party and turn toward an understanding of a larger structure of minority sexual and racial belonging that gets articulated in Candomblé, where gods and goddesses are often described as bisexual and androgynous, and where gay men are capable of embodying female principles and taking on a central role in the magic labor of the religion.

Performing Racial Political Affiliations

In the context of Candomblé and the Carnival traditions that stem from it in Salvador, racial political affiliations are also performed through a deconstructive play in gender roles. As Browning notes, “While the embodiment of the orixás in the candomblé is not imitative, it does demonstrate the irrelevance of the specific body in establishing ‘real’ gender” (1995, 154). According to Browning, while in the Bahia Carnival the explicit message of the dances that derive from Candomblé is not one of shifting gender roles, the blocos and afoxés (Carnival groups more rooted in the Afro-Brazilian religion) “always hold open a place for the bicha” (155), understood by many of the heterosexual organizers to have a closer relation to the orixás and therefore also having superior dancing skills. So here, through the mediation of religious tradition and affiliation, there is a more sexually mixed Carnival, where gay men find the space to come out more openly next to their heterosexual saint-brothers (men who have been initiated in Candomblé by the same priest or priestess)—thus with full support from their diasporic religious community.

Browning thus discloses the dynamics of cross-identification and political affiliation happening through multiple performances during the Carnival. Through samba, often described as a sexy rhythm and dance, and its variations, “a racial history is lived in the modality of sexuality (1995, 159). Gender and sexuality, informed by Afro-diasporic values and divine principles, are constructed in specifically Afro-Brazilian terms, which openly refuse the humiliation of the homosexual body. Carnival thus emerges as a privileged site not only for theorizing but also for living intersectionality—a fact that has significant meanings, potential, and even limitations for LGBTQ peoples in Brazil, as elsewhere in Latin America.

SEE ALSO Grupo Gay da Bahia; Parada do Orgulho LGBT de São Paulo, Brazil; Travesti and Trans Activism in Latin America and the Caribbean

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Cavafy, C. P. (1863–1933)

DIMITRIS PAPANIKOLAOU
Associate Professor in Modern Greek
University of Oxford, United Kingdom

Greek poet whose homoerotic works made him a queer icon.

When, in 1973, the Canadian poet Ian Young penned a portrait of the Greek poet Constantine P. Cavafy for the San Francisco fanzine Gay Sunshine, he concluded with these lines:

Later, in the more perfect society
Someone else made just like me is certain to appear and act freely.

(17)

The poem this extract comes from, aptly titled “Hidden Things,” had been recently unearthed in Cavafy’s personal papers alongside other poems and personal notes, published in Greek (1963) and soon translated into English (Savvas 1969 and Cavafy 1971). Cavafy, a poet from Alexandria, Egypt, who wrote his best work in Greek in the first decades of the twentieth century and died in 1933, had already acquired a considerable international following, especially among a learned audience, for his historical and erotic poems. But in the 1970s the elements were there for him to be turned into an icon. The persistent way his poetry, published or unpublished during his lifetime, had engaged with social marginalization, closeting, and the disavowal of homosexuality was now becoming more evident. He looked now even more like a precursor to the unfolding gay liberation movement, an early voice finally vindicated by the very culture that publications such as Gay Sunshine saw themselves as representing. Young would go on to publish his own poem “For Constantine Cavafy” in a subsequent issue of the magazine, and there the tone is jubilant:

Sometimes,
Remembering my silences,
A decade later, with the AIDS epidemic spreading and homophobia once again on the rise, these lines would already sound quite out of tune, as if history had played an ironic joke at the poet’s expense. They might, though, have seemed even more Cavafian for that very reason, because in many a Cavafy poem, statements of power, knowledge, victory, happiness, and success are made just before the events that will radically alter their course and meaning. Today, given the long history of Cavafy’s immense influence around the world, his importance for queer expression and theorizing seems to be based less on his early and unapologetic portrayal of men desiring (and having sex with) men and more on his complex thinking about social construction, the dynamics of the closet, and the historical contingencies that can at times allow, color with dramatic irony, or disavow certain political and identitarian statements.

Early Life and Writing

C. P. Cavafy was born in Alexandria in 1863 to a wealthy family of merchants. At the time a multicultural city that prided itself on its “European attitudes,” Alexandria was home to a large Greek diasporic community. After a youth that was marked by the death of his father and some years spent in London and Liverpool, England, where the family had financial interests, as well as in Istanbul near his mother’s relatives, Cavafy returned to his native city in 1885. There he settled into a quiet life spent between the Alexandrian cafés, bookstores, and social clubs where the Greek community gathered, with his unassuming flat on the second floor of a three-story building on Rue Lepsius (today a museum), and his lackluster clerical job in the British-led (and Dantesque-sounding) Third Circle of Irrigation. He lost his wealth, outlived most of his extended family, and nursed a sense of solitude and permanent bereavement that was often expressed in his later poems and has come to shape the popular image readers have of him.

Little more is known about his personal and private life apart from the fact that, after a certain moment in the early 1900s, he started writing and publishing poems with overtly homoerotic and homosexual content. His seems to have been the life of many a late Victorian homosexual artist but led in reverse: rather than adopting a semi-open homosexual lifestyle that would then be expressed in art in code, Cavafy had a rather discreet life— with no affair ever becoming public knowledge, not even as gossip— while at the same time publishing openly erotic poems received by all around him and further afield as autobiographic and confessional. “Cavafy was a homosexual, and his erotic poems make no attempt to conceal the fact…. [He] is exceptionally honest. He neither bowdlerizes nor glamorizes nor giggles,” wrote the Anglo-American poet W. H. Auden (1907–1973) many years later (1961, ix).

“Honesty” and his constant references to his native city of Alexandria in its mythical, historical, and contemporary versions became the trademarks of Cavafy’s poetry, especially for a growing international readership (Keeley 1976). This is an image (to an extent self-promoted) of Cavafy as a detached and brave voice, steeped in Greek history, part of the soul of the city of Alexandria, and unashamedly queer. It is exactly this Cavafy who was memorialized by the British writer E. M. Forster (1879–1970) in a phrase destined to become proverbial: “a Greek gentleman, in a straw hat, standing absolutely motionless at a slight angle to the universe” (1923, 110). Forster first met Cavafy in Alexandria in 1916, and the two kept a warm correspondence until the poet’s death (Jeffreys 2009). He became a keen advocate of Cavafy’s work, arranging for it to be published and circulated in English, as well as writing some of its earliest critical appreciations. Most critics today agree that what fascinated Forster about Cavafy, apart from a vision of ancient and modern history intertwined in the context of cosmopolitan Alexandria, was the Greek poet’s ability to write about homosexuality and love without obscuring the former or resorting to a despecification of the latter (Moffat 2010).

Ancient Eros, Modern Preoccupations

It is not the case, however, that code, anxious confession, or agony had been absent from Cavafy’s life. Of the little archival material (now in the Cavafy Archive in Athens) that survives from his earlier period, it is known that during the 1890s and early 1900s the poet agonized over his health, the care of the body and the self, and the propriety of his actions. He repeatedly wrote in his private notes phrases such as “I sinned again,” “I gave in once again; but now I take a decision and I swear again,” and so on (quoted in Liddell 2000, 67, 72–73). Critics tend to interpret those private memos as related to his struggle against practices that were considered degenerative at the time; masturbation, homosexual conduct, or (even) excessive drinking of alcohol have each in turn been suggested as the possible sources of anxiety for the younger Cavafy. More recently, of course, commentators have been quick to point out that all these anxieties do not cancel each other out but are linked through the larger biopolitical priorities framing the late nineteenth century and feed into the discursive networks that would help constitute male homosexuality as an identity in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries.

No matter what tormented him at the age of thirty, by 1902 and approaching the fifth decade of his life, Cavafy seems to be “clearing the ground” (McKinsey 2015). His memo entries start talking more concretely about “sexual deviance [that is] the root of greatness,” and by 1905, in a series of notes meticulously collated and safeguarded, he describes his willingness to find “those words that would be able to tell and hide” in order to speak about “that Eros” that exists in all nations “albeit in a few people of course,” and to wonder about how to write texts able to “offer enlightenment and emotional fulfillment to those who are made like me” (Cavafy 1983, 29, 35, 36 [translated by Dimitris Papanikolaou]; cf. Papanikolaou 2013). In 1908 he composed “Hidden Things,” a poem that reads like a manifesto, as it opens with the inability to speak, and closes with the promise of the condition’s eventual reversal:

> From all I did and all I said > let no one try to find out who I was > ... An obstacle was often there > to stop me when I’d begin to speak
> ... Later, in the more perfect society
> someone else made just like me
> is certain to appear and act freely.

(CAVAFY 1978, 142)

It is no coincidence that this poem—like Maurice, Forster’s novel about homosexuality, written in 1913 and 1914 (and later revised) but only published posthumously in 1971—would itself remain “hidden.” It was kept in the poet’s archive alongside many other poems marked with the phrase “Not for publication but may remain here.” Yet other outspoken poems were written, edited, and finished, eventually finding their way to publication in the decades after 1910, in what was a very calculated and long-term tactic of “training” the public to accept his more radical content. Cavafy's idiosyncratic strategies of publication effectively supported this tactic: he published few poems every year in pamphlets, magazines, and newspapers, or in self-collated collections that were circulated outside the book market to friends and correspondents (Cavafy 2007).

Evidently, Cavafy's erotic poetry self-consciously belongs to a long tradition: aestheticism, idealism, and art-for-art’s-sake are used to express queer desire in code; decadence is validated as a set of intense and modern experiences that crucially include sexuality; comradeship, classical teaching (paideia), erotic fulfillment (hedone), and Hellenic settings are employed to make homosexual representation acceptable; and artworks are first circulated among the initiated and the willing. All these strategies would remind readers of the way the classical Greco-Roman past is used by modern authors associated with the movements of aestheticism and decadence, such as Walter Pater (1839–1894), John Addington Symonds (1840–1893), the circle of Oscar Wilde (1854–1900), or by the clandestine circle of poets who became known as the Uranians. In the same decades as Cavafy's homoerotic writing was published, the German photographers Wilhelm von Gloeden (1856–1931) and Guglielmo Plüschow (1852–1930) started producing homoerotic photographs in "Arcadian settings," that were then circulated to a large network of clients and correspondents.

Nevertheless, Cavafy follows, but crucially revolutionizes these strategies. The ancient references become complicated, almost never alluding to ancient myth or classical Athens, focusing instead mostly on the Hellenistic, Roman, and Late Antique periods and on the margins, not the center, of the Greek-speaking world (as, in fact, Cavafy's Alexandria was). As erotic poems set in these environments converge (often in the very sequence of their publication) with more strictly “historical” poems, Cavafy's focus remains persistently on moments of syncretism, upheaval, and dramatic change and fall, as well as on the intersections of power with knowledge. Daring homosexual references, thus, become an integral part of a larger tapestry of historical consciousness and identity flux. Something similar happens in his poems set in contemporary Alexandria: there, a poetic voice, the autobiographical element of which is both implied and bracketed off, keeps focusing on art, desire, homosexuality, social precarity, memory, loss, and the passing of time, but also, crucially, on their intertwinenement (cf. Alexiou 1983). Particularly characteristic of this process, the series of poems titled “Days of …” focus on a key moment in their protagonists' life. In “Days of 1909, '10 and '11,” for instance, the poetic voice narrates the story of a young worker in a blacksmith's shop, dressed in poor clothes, his hands “completely grimed with rust and oil.”

---

Evenings, when he was closing up the shop, if there was anything he was really longing for,
some tie that cost a little bit of money,
some tie that was just right for a Sunday, or if in a shop window he’d seen and yearned for some beautiful shirt in mauve:
one or two shillings is what he’d sell his body for.

---

Even though the main point throughout the poem remains the youth's precarity and unfair social treatment, the queer viewpoint that makes these observations cannot possibly be disavowed, especially as a whole tradition of homoeroticism and its depiction in art is self-consciously thematized in the poem's closing lines:
I ask myself whether in antique times glorious Alexandria possessed a youth more beauteous, a kid more perfect than he—for all that he was lost:
for of course there never was a statue or portrait of him;
thrown into a blacksmith’s poor old shop,
he was quickly spoiled by the arduous work,
the common debauchery, so ruinous.

(CAVAFY 2009A, 156)

In such ways, this slowly developing oeuvre of relatively short, self-contained, and interrelated poems demands to be read as a whole, with queerness as one of its major building blocks. In “ancient” or “modern” settings, the homoerotic is never far away, sometimes implied as a viewpoint, at other times crucial to an identitarian statement or a life decision (Syrimis 2003). Progressively, the erotic poems (more than half of Cavafy’s published oeuvre) develop a realist and unapologetic depiction of specific moments in homosexual men’s lives, passions, traumas, and travails, and seem to respond directly to the problematic depiction of homosexual life stories in the work of modern sexologists (Papanikolaou 2013; Coavoux 2016). Cavafy’s work has often been hailed as a poetry of eroticism and reflection (what Mark Doty once called “memory’s erotics”), yet its most radical element is that it is also a poetry of modern homosexuality and its intersections.

By the end of his life, instances from homosexual life-stories had become so central in Cavafy’s material that he appears to have meticulously calculated new ways to broaden his range. Some of his unfinished poems venture into new territory: he talks about gangs of gay men stealing from the rich and sharing the loot, homosexual petty criminals who sleep with each other after a heist, or men who read in the newspaper that someone with whom they had a one-night stand has just been the victim of a sexual crime (Cavafy 2009b; cf. Coavoux 2013). For a contemporary reader, there is no doubt that with Cavafy, one has left behind the aestheticism and diffuse homoeroticism characteristic of the previous century and entered a new phase in the representation of gay love (Robinson 2005). In these terms, to claim that Cavafy is the first modern gay poet might not be such an anachronism or overstatement after all. As the polemical editorial of the first journal of Greek studies to have addressed the issue once insisted, “Cavafy is neither ‘perverse’ nor ‘obsessed’ nor even ‘erotic.’ Cavafy is gay. Cavafy articulates a specifically homosexual strategy of liberation and historical consciousness” (“Editors’ Statement” 1983, 6).

Queer Afterlives

Throughout the twentieth century, Cavafy’s reputation as a gay icon kept growing, as did his specific impact on queer literature and art. A number of artists turned to Cavafy's poetry in order to make a statement about their own identity, often creating work that would become influential in queer culture in its own right. David Hockney's (1937–) famous “Illustrations for Fourteen Poems on C. P. Cavafy,” first published in a collector's edition in 1966 to accompany a new English translation of erotic Cavafy poems by Nikos Stangos and Stephen Spender (Cavafy 1966), is perhaps the best known example. Not directly referring to the poems they are meant to illustrate, the etchings show male couples in everyday scenes, making clear the homosexual nature of their relationship and the deep bond it creates. They are calculated to be both aesthetic and political statements, prefiguring later developments in Hockney's art while also marking the moment just before the eventual decriminalization of homosexual acts in private in Britain in 1967. Other queer artists who have produced notable work “after Cavafy” include the photographers Duane Michals (1932–) and Dimitris Yeros (1948–); the authors James Merrill (1926–1995), Cathal Ó Searcaigh (1956–), Mark Doty (1953–), Marguerite Yourcenar (1903–1987), and William Plomer (1903–1973); the songwriter Lluís Llach (1948–); the choreographer Dimitris Papaioannou (1964–); the painter Yannis Tsarouchis (1910–1989); and the director Constantine Giannaris (1959–) (Papargyriou and Papanikolaou 2015; Jeffreys 2015).

In the twenty-first century, Cavafy's erotic poetry has given rise to novel critical approaches informed by gender and queer theory, which underline his modern attitude toward homosexuality and its relevance to contemporary developments (Papanikolaou 2014). With emphasis on his erotic poems, Cavafy's work has been connected to identity, place, and (post)colonialism (Halim 2013); cultural capital (Dimirouli 2014); classical reception (Mendelsohn 2003); the confluence of sexuality, modernism, and capitalism (Roilos 2009); the power of language to shape perception and identity (Boletsi 2006); the cultural economy of a sexual-world system (Kahan 2017); and, of course, and perhaps more promisingly, the importance of affect and emotions for a new theory of social belonging and ethical subjectivity (Faubion 2010, 2014; Sedgwick 2011). Cavafy has become global in a manner that perhaps few queer poets have managed, as became evident in the 2013 global celebrations of the 150th anniversary of his birth; the full digital publication of his archive, scheduled for late 2018, is expected to widen this global appeal even further and offer a platform for new artistic and research projects cementing the iconic status of the poet.

SEE ALSO Aestheticism and Decadence, Nineteenth-Century; Classical Studies; The Closet; Homoerotic Poetry of Abū Nuwās; Homoeroticism in the Plays of Ibn Daniyal; Literary Discourses in the Ottoman Middle East (1500–1900); Poets in Latin America; Sappho, Nineteenth-Century Rediscovery of

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Alexiou, Margaret. “Eroticism and Poetry.” Journal of the Hellenic Diaspora 10, nos. 1–2

Coavoux, Sophie. “Cavafy homoérotique entre scientia sexualis et ars erotica: Du discours ‘médical’ de la critique à la subversion poétique de la maladie” [Homoerotic Cavafy between scientia sexualis and ars erotica: From the ‘medical’ discourse of criticism to the literary subversion of illness]. Transtext(e)s Transcultures 跨文本跨文化: Journal of Global Cultural Studies 11 (2016).

Faubion, James D. “In Passing: Cavafy's Ontology of the Emotions and the Theoretico-

The Central American solidarity movement, also known as the Central American peace and justice movement, was one of the largest social justice formations of the late twentieth century. Active from the mid-1970s through early 1990s, it centered principally on conflicts in Nicaragua and El Salvador, with lesser attention to the Guatemalan civil war. In Nicaragua, the Sandinista Revolution (1979–1990) overthrew the country’s Somoza dictatorship, instituted socialist reforms, and battled the US-sponsored contra war. In the Salvadoran civil war (1980–1992), left-wing forces fought the right-wing government, which was led by a military junta and also backed by the United States. The Guatemalan civil war (1960–1996) saw government-sponsored genocide against hundreds of thousands of indigenous Guatemalans.
LGBTQ Activists in New York Demand the United States Keep Out of El Salvador, 1980. The Central American solidarity movement linked activists in Central America and the United States, including many gay and lesbian activists who saw work toward sexual freedom as interwoven with organizing to oppose US military intervention in Central America, to support national self-determination for Central American countries, and to achieve socialist change.

The Central American solidarity movement was a transnational network that especially linked activists in Central America and the United States, as well as elsewhere in Latin America, in Canada, and in Europe. Central American solidarity found origins in the Central American diaspora, the internationalist left, and liberation theology. Its activists supported the region’s radical struggles, opposed right-wing governments and US intervention, and defended migrants and refugees. In addition, and of particular importance to LGBTQ history, the Central American solidarity movement drew in significant numbers of lesbian and gay activists from around the world. Many lesbian and gay activists saw their work advocating for sexual freedom as interwoven with organizing to oppose military intervention, support national self-determination, and achieve socialist change.

Lesbian and gay solidarity with Central America gained particular strength in relation to the Nicaraguan Revolution and through activism located in the San Francisco Bay Area. In addition, the solidarity movement influenced LGBTQ/LGBTI and HIV/AIDS activism both within and outside Nicaragua. Because this entry examines the Central American solidarity movement through the lens of gay and lesbian involvement, it centers primarily on Central American migrants and exiles created the first organizations and networks of the solidarity movement. These activists sought not only to win international support but also to develop their political and armed struggles at a distance from right-wing regimes. Nicaraguans and Salvadorans organized from within Mexico, Costa Rica, and the United States, and they drew political and financial support from the Cuban and Soviet governments. They worked in cooperation with Nicaragua's Frente Sandinista de Liberación Nacional (FSLN; Sandinista National Liberation Front) and with Salvadoran groups that in 1980 merged into the Frente Democrático Revolucionario (FDR; Revolutionary Democratic Front) and the Frente Farabundo Martí para la Liberación Nacional (FMLN; Farabundo Martí National Liberation Front). Solidarity efforts expanded over the 1970s as Central American immigrant and refugee populations grew. At the same time, right-wing organizing also developed transnational ties, and ideological divides fractured Central American immigrant and refugee communities. In both the United States and Central America, right-wing activists upheld social conservatism, while socialist thought—despite patterns of sexism and homophobia in the left—offered openings to feminism and to lesbian and gay freedom. This split affirmed the value of Central American solidarity for many lesbian and gay radicals.

The first two solidarity organizations were founded in San Francisco in 1974 and 1975, respectively: El Comité Cívico pro Nicaragua en los Estados Unidos (Civic Committee for Nicaragua in the United States; commonly known as El Comité Cívico) and El Comité de Salvadoreños Progresistas (Committee of Progressive Salvadorans). These groups were founded by Central American migrants and exiles, and they were soon followed by others around the United States, with principal bases of organizing in San Francisco, Los Angeles, and Washington, DC. By the late 1970s and early 1980s, non–Central Americans in the United States were joining the solidarity movement, creating such organizations as the Non-Intervention in Nicaragua Committee (NIN), the Committee in Solidarity with the People of El Salvador (CISPES), the Network in Solidarity with the People of Guatemala, and the Pledge of Resistance. The movement met repression both inside and outside Central America. Inside the United States, the FBI (Federal Bureau of Investigation) broke into and stole files from CISPES offices; the CIA (Central Intelligence Agency) monitored phone calls between Sandinistas and members of Congress; and Salvadoran death squads operated against leftist Salvadorans living in Los Angeles.

Central American solidarity grew in response to several events, including the Sandinistas' seizure of power in 1979, the 1980 escalation of the Salvadoran civil war, and the acceleration of US intervention by the Reagan administration in 1981. Nicaragua's Sandinista Revolution unseated the decades-old, US-sponsored Somoza dictatorship and pursued a socialist agenda of social welfare, equality, and economic redistribution and development, although it also restricted political dissent and continued the subjugation of indigenous and black Nicaraguans. Some solidarity activists, especially Central Americans and others on the left, directly supported revolutionary struggles in Nicaragua and El Salvador. Others concentrated on opposing military intervention and assisting immigrants and refugees. Travel brigades became important in Nicaraguan solidarity after the Sandinista government requested international help with its coffee harvest in 1983. These travel projects proliferated to include observation in war zones, health training, and technical assistance for rural development. In the Salvadoran and Guatemalan wings of the movement, activism especially centered on documenting human rights abuses and providing church-based sanctuary to immigrants and refugees.

Lesbians and gay men participated in Central American solidarity work in large numbers. One reason for this was timing: Central American solidarity developed at a time in which lesbian and gay activism was both flourishing in general and closely tied to other social justice movements. Activists in the gay and lesbian left had long opposed US militarism, and both leftists and liberals saw that the same politicians backing intervention in Central America also opposed gay and lesbian rights. Furthermore, Central American solidarity became a means to develop transnational gay and lesbian organizing. In addition to simply participating in the solidarity movement as individuals, a number of activists developed specifically gay and lesbian solidarity groups and explicitly linked the politics of national self-determination to sexual freedom.

Gay and Lesbian Solidarity with Nicaragua

Lesbian and gay solidarity with Central America developed most extensively within the Nicaragua movement and in the San Francisco Bay Area. There were several reasons for this. First, in 1979 Nicaragua's Sandinista Revolution ousted the Somoza dictatorship and won power. Although the Sandinistas faced the contra war, they embarked on a program of socialist change that appealed strongly to gay and lesbian radicals who embraced socialist feminism and saw it as interwoven with their sexual politics. By contrast, the Salvadoran and Guatemalan movements operated in more defensive modes, as necessitated by war against right-wing military governments. In these movements, the pressures of war and the prominence of church-based organizing tended to push gay and lesbian politics to the side. A second factor encouraging lesbian and gay solidarity with Nicaragua was that the Sandinistas included many prominent women leaders, and the FSLN approached women's rights as an important topic of debate and policy change. Activists both inside and outside Nicaragua believed that women's status in the Sandinista Revolution might open paths to gay and lesbian inclusion. Third, Nicaraguan solidarity developed a stronghold in San Francisco's Mission District. This neighborhood was home to a sizable lesbian feminist community and next door to the prominently gay Castro District. Reflecting this geography, gay and lesbian newspapers and organizations in the San Francisco Bay Area discussed Nicaraguan and Central American solidarity as both local and global issues. Activists often saw solidarity as interwoven with efforts at anti-racism in the gay and lesbian community, and they broadcast the existence of lesbian and gay solidarity to activists across the United States and around the world.

Solidarity activists often held romanticized views of Central American revolutions and revolutionary leaders. Such views also shaped lesbian and gay solidarity and became expressed in multiple, even competing ways: through admiration for militant women leaders, through overblown hopes for gay and lesbian inclusion in the Nicaraguan Revolution, and through claims that homosexuality was foreign to Central America. Yet, lesbian and gay solidarity was also a site in which perceptions of Central America and its revolutions could be tested and challenged. Gay and lesbian radicals who were people of color, particularly those who were Nicaraguan or otherwise Latin American, played especially important roles in propelling more sophisticated and complex understandings. But while Central American solidarity prompted debate over transnational sexual politics, such dialogues were interrupted by the broader collapse of the solidarity movement in the 1990s.

Origins in San Francisco and the Nicaragua Diaspora The first documented instance of gay and lesbian solidarity with Central America was an evening of political theater held in June 1978 in San Francisco and organized by the Gay Latino Alliance and Bay Area Gay Liberation. The Nicaraguan solidarity group NIN initially backed the effort but pulled its support just before the event occurred. The next year, just as the Sandinistas were seizing power, some of the same gay and lesbian activists who had organized the theater event created Gay People for the Nicaraguan Revolution (GPNR, also known as Gays for Nicaragua).

GPNR was the first organization recorded to be created expressly for the purpose of lesbian and gay solidarity with Central America. Its politics linked socialist feminism, opposition to US militarism, and unity against the right. It formed contingents in solidarity marches and made frequent presentations to gay and lesbian organizations on college campuses and at cultural events, as well as from the speakers’ platform of San Francisco’s Lesbian and Gay Freedom Day. Furthermore, it helped establish a rhetoric that mobilized lesbian and gay solidarity through admiration for Sandinista women militants. The group was mostly composed of white women, but among its members was a Nicaraguan-born gay man, Roberto Gurdián, who had helped to organize the political theater event in June 1978.

Central American–born activists played important roles in gay and lesbian solidarity, as well as solidarity more broadly. Gurdián had come to San Francisco in the mid-1970s, and his brother was one of the founders of Casa Nicaragua, an important group in the Nicaraguan community at large. In part because of this relationship, GPNR received mail at the Casa Nicaragua office, and it also collaborated with Casa Nicaragua members by providing childcare at meetings and events and by holding a workshop on gay and lesbian issues. The ties between the groups helped GPNR gain recognition from some members of the Sandinista leadership and to send representatives to international solidarity conferences. Another figure in early lesbian and gay solidarity was Rita Arauz, a Nicaraguan who had moved to San Francisco in the mid-1960s, come out as a lesbian feminist in the 1970s, and then joined the FSLN's international solidarity network. When Arauz returned to Nicaragua in the 1980s, she played an important role in gay, lesbian, and AIDS organizing there.

Expanding Networks and Travel Brigades Lesbian and gay solidarity with Nicaragua fostered involvement in the Central American solidarity movement more broadly, particularly as related to El Salvador. In 1983 activists in San Francisco helped pass Proposition N, an initiative calling on the United States to end support for the Salvadoran government. The activists’ campaign included the Lesbian and Gay Task Force, which mobilized voter turnout, held speaking events, and coordinated contingents in anti-intervention marches and for San Francisco’s Lesbian and Gay Freedom Day. After the electoral victory, the task force was remade into a group called Lesbians and Gays Against Intervention (LAGAI; pronounced “la gay”). LAGAI remained active as of 2018, including through a Palestinian solidarity effort called QUIT (Queers Undermining Israeli Terrorism). During the 1980s, LAGAI frequently participated in direct actions against US intervention and promoted lesbian and gay solidarity through speakers and other community events. It also helped fuel an expanding network of lesbian and gay solidarity groups.

VICTORIA MERCADO BRIGADE

The Victoria Mercado Brigade was the first specifically lesbian and gay brigade to travel to Nicaragua during the Sandinista Revolution. Purposefully composed of a majority of people of color and largely women, the group traveled from San Francisco, California, to Managua, Nicaragua, in May and June 1985. The project’s physical work entailed building the foundation for a community center in the Managua neighborhood of Shelim Shible. Participants also lived with host families, attended meetings with Nicaraguan organizations, and met informally with Nicaraguan lesbians and gay men. The brigade raised the profile of lesbian and gay participation in the solidarity movement and fostered lasting exchanges between lesbian, gay, and AIDS activists in Nicaragua and the United States, particularly in the San Francisco Bay Area.

Plans for the brigade began in 1984 in meetings held by Lesbians and Gays Against Intervention (LAGAI), a group that organized lesbian and gay participation in Central American solidarity efforts and that had developed out of a 1983 campaign to call on the US federal government to end all aid to the government of El Salvador and to withdraw the US military from the country. But LAGAI members were divided over the utility of a brigade, and other activists were concerned about the project’s predominately white leadership. A network of lesbians of color took over the project and adopted the name of Victoria Mercado, a Chicana lesbian and labor activist who had been murdered in Oakland in 1982.

As a group that was both lesbian and gay and led by people of color, the Victoria Mercado Brigade challenged major precepts in Central American solidarity work, as well as in lesbian and gay organizing. Many solidarity activists presumed homosexuality to be foreign to Central America and asked lesbian and gay participants to be silent about sexuality. But, like other lesbian and gay leftists of the time, Victoria Mercado Brigade members saw sexual liberation and anti-imperialism as interdependent rather than in conflict. Furthermore, as lesbian and gay people of color, they sought to counter views of lesbian and gay identities as white and middle class. The brigade grew out of racially diverse networks in San Francisco’s Mission District. Its leadership was rooted in a writing group of women of color, and it raised funds through multiracial benefit concerts. The trip’s thirteen participants included four Latina women (Chicana, Cuban, and Puerto Rican), four black women (one of whom was both black and Filipina), two men of color (one Native American, the other Chicano), and three white people (two women and one man).

Following its trip, the Victoria Mercado Brigade organized presentations in the Bay Area in which members discussed their experiences, including what they had learned about gay and lesbian politics in the Sandinista Revolution. It published reports in the gay and lesbian press, mobilized a contingent and speakers at the 1985 San Francisco Lesbian and Gay Freedom Day, and helped to inspire at least two other gay and lesbian travel projects from the United States (one from Philadelphia and another from Boston). The Victoria Mercado Brigade played an important role in advancing political exchange among lesbian, gay, and AIDS activists inside and outside Nicaragua.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

A significant aspect of the expansion of lesbian and gay solidarity could be seen in organizing and cultural work by Latinx people and people of color. (Though not in usage during the 1980s, today Latinx is becoming adopted as a gender-neutral term for Latino and Latina people and communities.) The playwright and actor Rodrigo Reyes, earlier a leader of the Gay Latino Alliance, created plays and other artistic works addressing the intersections of gay, Latinx, and Central American identities and issues. Amaranto, a group of lesbian and gay Latin American immigrants in the San Francisco Bay Area, became an important support network. The San Francisco Women’s Building further facilitated connections between solidarity activism and women of color feminisms. For example, it served as the organizational sponsor of Somos Hermanas, a women’s solidarity organization whose members were majority women of color and about half of whom were lesbian or bisexual. Another important example could be seen in the first gay and lesbian brigade to Nicaragua, the Victoria Mercado Brigade, which traveled in 1985. Seeking to counter images of gay and lesbian identities as inherently white and North American, it was purposefully composed of a majority of people of color.

Although most heavily concentrated in the San Francisco Bay Area, lesbian and gay solidarity with Central America also developed in several other locations, with examples including the Boston organization United Fruit, and a Philadelphia-based lesbian and gay brigade to Nicaragua. Solidarity work received significant attention in the Boston-based Gay Community News, which had an international reach, as well as through publications that reported on the development of Nicaraguan gay, lesbian, and AIDS activism (Rose 1988; Schapiro 1988).

Impacts in Nicaragua and the United States

From the early years of solidarity organizing, lesbian and gay Nicaraguans engaged in dialogue with activists from other countries. Through these exchanges, Nicaraguans joined in transnational discussions about the status of sexual politics under both socialist and capitalist systems. The first known lesbian and gay organization in Nicaragua began to develop in 1985 and formally incorporated in 1986. By late 1987, activists from this group had formed an HIV/AIDS project. This project, which was independent from but sponsored by the Sandinista government, became known as the Colectivo de Educación Popular.
contra el SIDA (Popular Education Collective against AIDS). Throughout their organizing efforts, Nicaraguan gay, lesbian, and AIDS activists mobilized the resources and communication networks of the solidarity movement to advance their own goals for inclusion in the Sandinista Revolution.

Another impact of Central American solidarity could be seen within the AIDS direct action movement in the United States. This movement is typically described as beginning with the AIDS Coalition to Unleash Power (ACT UP), which formed in New York City in March 1987. However, the first instances of direct action to confront AIDS, and the first two AIDS direct action organizations, developed well before ACT UP, and were products of lesbian and gay solidarity organizing in the San Francisco Bay Area. The most important example can be seen in the AIDS Action Pledge, which formed in summer 1986 and modeled itself on the Central American solidarity organization Pledge of Resistance. Central American solidarity helped activists redefine AIDS from a sign of pathology to a human need that could be met by a stronger welfare state. They encapsulated this politics through the slogan “Money for AIDS, not war.” This slogan circulated across the United States, including through the 1987 National March on Washington for Lesbian and Gay Rights, and was later used by ACT UP.

The Central American solidarity movement constituted a major dimension of LGBTQ activism during the 1980s. Its influences were comparable to the influences of the anti–Vietnam War and Black Power movements on earlier gay liberation. Lesbian and gay solidarity had lasting effects both within Central America and through the HIV/AIDS movement in the United States. It engaged debates regarding the political economy of sexuality and the transnational circulation of sexual politics that remain central to LGBTQ activism and scholarship today.

SEE ALSO ACT UP; Gay Latino Alliance (GALA); The Nicaraguan Revolution

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Gosse, Van. “‘El Salvador Is Spanish for Vietnam’: A New Immigrant Left and the Politics of Solidarity.” In The Immigrant Left in the United States, edited by Paul Buhle and Dan

The imprisonment of men in the Russian republic of Chechnya for alleged homosexuality.

The existence in the Russian republic of Chechnya of detention camps for men deemed to be homosexual was revealed in April 2017 by Elena Milashina, a journalist with the Moscow newspaper Novaya Gazeta. Further investigations confirmed that more than 100 men had been incarcerated for alleged homosexuality in two unofficial jail facilities in the town of Argun and the village of Tsotsi-Yurt—both situated near Grozny, the capital of Chechnya (Lokshina 2017; Dearden 2017; Knight 2017). At least three men were reported murdered (Milashina and Gordienko 2017). These detentions were undertaken by the republic’s official law enforcement officers, including the special forces commander Abuzaid Vismuradov (Milashina 2017b), with the complicity of Chechnya’s parliamentary speaker, Magomed “Lord” Daudov, considered to be one of the closest friends of the head of the republic, Ramzan Kadyrov (Lokshina 2017). The authorities of the republic refuted these reports, citing the absence of LGBT persons in the region (Walker 2017a).

The Russian LGBT Network organized evacuations of the victims and LGBT individuals who felt threatened by the actions of Chechen authorities. The victims were transferred to Moscow and Saint Petersburg to initiate procedures for acquiring refugee status outside Russia. The Russian Ministry of Foreign Affairs assisted in obtaining international passports, while some European Union states expressed readiness to accommodate the victims (Ponniah 2017). By mid-summer 2017, 120 persons had applied to the Russian LGBT Network for help, 75 had been evacuated, and 27 had left Russia (Russian LGBT Network 2017b). In September, the Canadian charity organization Rainbow Railroad reported that another 35 victims were granted refugee status in Canada (Gilchrist 2017). Yet, detentions in Chechnya continued as of 2017.

How the Camps Were Established

At the outset, the antigay campaign in Chechnya was associated with attempts to organize an LGBT pride parade in neighboring regions in March 2017 (Milashina 2017a). Victims’ testimonies (Gessen 2017) permitted the reconstruction of a different picture relating to more general, extralegal practices of local police forces, as some gay men were detained as early as autumn 2016 and claimed they were not the first ones to find themselves in the unofficial jails (Lokshina 2017; Khazov-Cassia 2017a). In fact, the detention of one individual arrested by police on 21 February on charges of substance use was enough to initiate a purge of gay men in the republic (Milashina and Gordienko 2017). His smartphone contacts served as a list of suspects: once caught, a person became the source of information for police officers who intended to find his associates. As ex-detainees recall, they were kept together with substance users; drug use, like homosexuality, is also not illegal in Russia but is punished nonetheless. While in jail, the detainees were tortured with electric shocks and beatings in order to make them disclose the names of their connections. Their cellular phone contacts were inspected for more potential victims. The information would be used for blackmail or to further extralegal investigations. Thus, the number of victims snowballed (Gessen 2017; Khazov-Cassia 2017a).

Perceived sexual identities of the detainees have not always matched their own self-understanding. Although police officers targeted gay men, some of their victims were bisexual or heterosexual individuals. Nevertheless, this was not always regarded as a reason to stop the illegal persecution. The detainees were kept in the detention camps for different amounts of time, from a week to several months (Gessen 2017; Milashina and Gordienko 2017; Khazov-Cassia 2017a). Those who survived torture were handed back to their families. The sexual identity of the detainees was revealed to their families, and police officers then instructed these families to commit honor killings to wash away the “shame” of homosexuality from their kin (Washington Post 2017). Journalists discovered at least two such cases in which the instructions were followed (Milashina 2017a).

The existence of detention camps for gay men was reported to Russian federal government officials (Lui 2017). Continuing their investigation, journalists found a list of twenty-seven persons executed for a variety of accusations, from terrorism to being gay (Bobrova and Milashina 2017). This information was forwarded to federal law enforcement agencies with all relevant details. The Russian Federal Investigation Committee initiated inspections of Chechen police practices (Walker 2017b). The chief of inspection was soon removed, however, and eventually the federal committee did not uncover any “facts” relating to violence against LGBT people in Chechnya. As of October 2017, the Russian ombudswoman, herself a former police officer, continued to press the investigation committee (Bobrova and Milashina 2017).

Although only men were placed in the detention camps, the situation for lesbians in the republic of Chechnya is also alarming. The camps-related story prompted journalistic investigations into the everyday experiences of women who secretly identify as lesbians. Forced marriage, rape, and honor killings are among the methods used by the women’s families to violently control their sexuality (Khazov-Cassia 2017b).
Cultural Attitudes toward Homosexuality in Chechnya

The situation relating to the detention camps in Chechnya signals a break with the established culture of silence surrounding homosexuality that had previously characterized the environment in the republic of Chechnya and that corresponded to the more general conditions of LGBT citizens in Russia (Kondakov 2014). Some of the victims were Chechen television reporters and singers whose homosexuality had been tolerated by the society until then. Earlier reports from 2013 revealed the existence of a Chechen gay underground (Leonova 2013). The accounts of a transgender refugee confirm that the current situation is dramatically different from both that of the Soviet period and of a more recent history (Taylor 2017).

Chechnya is a predominately Muslim region (Abdulagatov 2014) and as such, in the framework of colonial logic, has served as a barbarian Other for Russia (Reznikova 2014; Russell 2005; Essig 1999), including with regard to its Muslim traditions related to homosexual practices (Healey 2001). During the Soviet period, the patriarchal norms of the society were destabilized by Soviet anti-religious campaigns and policies involving women in paid work (Szczepanikova 2012). As a consequence, religion and patriarchal rule were privatized: in many respects, expressions of patriarchy were conditioned by arrangements in specific households (Sokirianskaia 2005; Kurbanova 2011).

In the post-Soviet period, however, all further developments have been structured by the war between the Chechen government and Russian federal forces (Sakwa 2005). Chechnya enjoyed relative independence between 1991 and 2000, and federal military operations ceased only in 2009 (Sakwa 2010). The war contributed to the militarization of public life, poverty, a degradation of education, and the spread of lawlessness. This led to the strengthening of the patriarchal order within the “war generation” as a result of the lack of education and general disenfranchisement (Szczepanikova 2012). Besides, the Kremlin-backed leader of Chechnya, Akhmad Kadyrov (who previously served as the major mufti of the independent Chechen state) promoted a particular kind of Islamization (Wilhelmsen 2005): a puritan Sufist version of the religion as opposed to a violent Wahhabism (Russell 2008). After his assassination in 2004, his son reinforced the political deployment of Islam in the republic through official policies and the support of vigilante groups policing public expressions of gender (BBC News 2016).

Revival of dogmatic Islam, conditions of war, and authoritarian postwar administration have produced an environment in which ignorant attitudes toward sexual diversity, so common in Russia, are amplified in Chechnya. Police brutality and atrocities are part of the experience of LGBT citizens in many regions of Russia. Chechnya, however, is distinguished by the scale of these practices, best exemplified in the existence of detention camps for gay men.

SEE ALSO El Baile de los 41; Bathhouse Raids, Toronto (1981); Human Rights in Europe; ISIS Gay Trials; Queen Boat Trials (2001–2002); Russian Gay Propaganda Law

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Lui, Kevin. “Russia Is Reportedly Investigating an Alleged Gay Purge in Chechnya.” Time, 26

Chevalier d'Éon or Mademoiselle Beaumont (1728–1810)

ALBA BARBÉ ISERRA
Research Group on Social Control and Exclusion/Catalan Anthropology Institute
University of Barcelona

The colorful life of the famous eighteenth-century French cross-dresser.

Charles-Geneviève-Louis-Auguste-André-Thimothée d'Éon de Beaumont, also known as Mademoiselle de Beaumont, is a historical figure surrounded by wide speculation. He was a member of the group of spies Le Secret du Roi (King's Secret) in the service of the French king Louis XV (1710–1774). It has been claimed that as a French diplomat he entered the court of the Russian empress Elizabeth by posing as a woman, Lía Beaumont, and facilitated the rapprochement between France and Russia, for which he received the Cross of Saint Louis.

In 1763 he was sent to the British court now dressed as a man with the aim of facilitating a French invasion of Britain, but his lifestyle and difficult behavior soon had the French government attempting to recall him. Using his leverage as a royal spy and ambassador with access to incriminating documents, d'Éon threatened to reveal all. He published a book of diplomatic correspondence in 1764, making him a sympathetic figure in Britain because of the embarrassment the book’s publication caused the French government. Louis XV decided to continue to use d'Éon, who now had even better coverage as a spy given his contentious relationship with the French government.
Chevalier d’Éon or Mademoiselle de Beaumont. The colorful story of this famous eighteenth-century French cross-dresser led to the coining of the term eonism to refer to men who dressed as women but did not engage in homosexual practices. Eonism was used as a term for transvestism until the mid-twentieth century.

Around 1770, rumors began to circulate that d’Éon was actually a woman, which grew to the point that London’s gamblers began placing bets as to his/her “real” gender. He held to this story when recalled by Louis XV’s successor and son, Louis XVI (1754–1793), while taking several months to negotiate the conditions of his return. When d’Éon did finally return to France in 1777, it was under the condition that he dress as a woman.

Finding life in the French court oppressive as a woman, d’Éon returned to Britain in 1785. When the French Revolution resulted in his pension being cut off, d’Éon was forced to share a flat with a widow, and he died there in 1810. The widow made the startling discovery that d’Éon had male genitalia while preparing the body for burial, a fact that was widely reported in the newspapers.

Based on d’Éon’s story, the English sexologist Havelock Ellis (1859–1939) coined the term eonism in 1928 to refer to the inversion in the sphere of clothing among men who did not abandon their “active” role, unlike sexual inversion. Ellis considered d’Éon a pseudo-transvestist. Ellis had regarded sexo-aesthetic inversion or eonism as an “intermediate sexual anomaly.” Eonism was used as a term for transvestism until the mid-twentieth century, when an interpretative shift took place.

Critical approaches to d'Éon provide insights into social and sexological interpretations from the eighteenth century, as well as into the modern construction of the self and the complexity of British attitudes toward “the French” and the communities that took refuge in London in the eighteenth century. Certain researchers have clarified d'Éon’s theological self-narratives from his manuscripts: they reveal an ethical and moral regeneration associated with dressing as a woman. Despite the divergence among academics connecting his attitude to political and strategic objectives, d'Éon demonstrated the possibility of both sexes coexisting, as revealed by his insistence on dressing as a woman and at the same time wearing the Cross of Saint Louis, a military order and reflection of male social status. D'Éon's legacy forces transgender studies to examine cross-dressing in the early modern period and to read the practices of that period in the light of their political and social contexts.

SEE ALSO Cross-Dressing in the West; Transvestites/Transsexuals

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Christianity in Africa: Anglican

KEVIN WARD
Associate Professor in African Religious Studies
University of Leeds, United Kingdom

The position of the Anglican Communion in Africa on sexual minorities.

It is, at first sight, somewhat surprising that the Anglican churches in Africa have taken on such a controversial role in debates about same-sex relationships. Anglicans worldwide like to portray themselves as quintessentially moderate: avoiding hard-line dogmatic positions; balancing "scripture," "reason," and "tradition"; encouraging cool debate; and being slow to judgment and quick to mediate in disputes. Such a self-image risks accusations of arrogance and complacency. Evangelical Anglicans, in particular, have never felt altogether comfortable with what they see as the liberal values and tendency to compromise of the Anglican establishment. In places such as Uganda and Nigeria, the Anglican church is both evangelical and institutionally strong, and church leaders have traditionally assumed a leading role in shaping public morality. In both countries, Anglicans have been at the forefront in urging their governments to enact punitive measures against same-sex activity. In South Africa, by contrast, Anglicans are comparatively weak numerically. Yet there, too, the Anglican church has influence, partly as a result of its sustained opposition to apartheid (at least among its leadership) over many years. In the figure of Archbishop Desmond Tutu (1931–) it has a Nobel Peace Prize laureate with a high profile both within South Africa and worldwide. Tutu's criticisms of homophobia and support for LGBTI rights have made an important contribution to postapartheid debates on sexuality.

African Anglicans have had an increasing role in shaping the worldwide Anglican Communion. Numerically, they constitute over half the global Anglican membership. Nigeria claims more members than the Church of England itself, and Uganda's Anglicans are a third of the total population—also far higher (as a percentage) than that of England. Anglicanism is a vibrant African religion, with strong roots in indigenous society; it is increasingly unwilling to play the passive role in shaping communion affairs that it had, perforce, taken in colonial times and that persisted long after the end of the colonial era. The sense of a common Anglican identity, transcending national and ethnic roots, has also been an important factor in highlighting debates on homosexuality as threats to the unity and cohesion of the communion as a whole. Debates in the preceding decades about women's ministry were vigorous, but gradually a consensus emerged that allows the various provinces of the Anglican Communion to make their own decisions on these matters and to achieve a mutual acceptance of difference. The debates on sexuality have followed a very different trajectory.

Historical Background

For the Anglican church in Africa, homosexual conduct from time to time surfaced as a matter of discipline concerning missionary and clerical personnel. In 1869 Bishop Edward Twells of the Orange Free State resigned his see in order to avoid an impending trial over alleged abuse of adolescents and young men (Southey 1997). What W. S. F. Pickering (1989) describes as the homoerotic subculture of English Anglo-Catholicism has its parallels in the church in South Africa into the twentieth century, where high church traditions were dominant and English celibate religious and single clergy were numerous. But even in the evangelical Anglican missions of East Africa, homosexual activity might give rise to concern. At King’s College Budo, in Uganda, the Anglican tutor to the Kabaka (or king) was dismissed in 1942 after accusations of homosexual activity in the school. This was particularly sensitive because the young Kabaka, Mutesa II (1924–1969), was a student at the school at the time. Christian missionaries had long denounced his grandfather, Mutesa I (c. 1838–1884), for the homosexual practices of the Buganda court in the 1880s, and for a teacher to be implicated in such activities in the leading Protestant school in the 1940s was embarrassing (Summers 2006).

Debates on Homosexuality from Lambeth Forward

As a wider pastoral issue for the African church, the issue of homosexuality emerged suddenly in 1998 at the Lambeth Conference, an assembly of Anglican bishops worldwide that has traditionally been held every ten years. Initially the debate had been seen by African Anglican leaders as a Western ethical issue with little direct impact on African Christianity. Heterosexual relations were seen as the universal accepted norm for all people. The main Christian task in Africa was to find ways of encouraging monogamous marriage in societies where this was largely seen as neither feasible nor desirable. It was not so much that African Christians did not recognize homosocial and homoerotic feelings (which had indeed been traditionally expressed much more openly than in more regimented Western societies), but the idea of same-sex unions as an alternative to marriage and the production of children was considered new and potentially threatening. There had been no sustained discussion of homosexuality as such in African Christian ethical thinking.

It was not Africans who initiated the debate within Anglicanism. Instead, conservative forces within the Episcopal/Anglican churches in the West were fearful that discussions at the Lambeth Conference of 1998 might encourage the gradual acceptance of same-sex unions and the welcoming of openly gay and lesbian clergy within the life of the church. In the Episcopal Church of the United States, in particular, conservative forces felt that they had been marginalized for too long. They saw in the growing and vibrant churches of the Global South allies who still held strongly to “biblical” and “traditional” Christian moral values, and who could readily be encouraged to voice their concerns. In 1997, in Kuala Lumpur, a meeting of Anglican church leaders from the Global South (known as the Anglican Encounter in the South and chaired by the archbishop of Nigeria, Joseph Adetiloye [1929–2012]) addressed these perceived dangers:

> We are deeply concerned that the setting aside of biblical teaching in such actions as the ordination of practicing homosexuals and the blessing of same-sex unions calls into question the authority of Holy Scripture. This is totally unacceptable to us. This leads us to express concern about mutual accountability and interdependence within our Anglican Communion.

("KUALA LUMPUR STATEMENT" 1997)

These sentiments found expression in the debates at Lambeth the following year and led to Resolution 1.10d, in which more nuanced expressions of the problem of same-sex activity that had occurred in the drafting stage were replaced by a much more forceful statement. The resolution affirmed that marriage was between one man and one woman for life, unequivocally “rejecting homosexual practice as incompatible with Scripture” (Anglican Consultative Council 2005, 9). Subsequent African Anglican involvement in communion matters on a worldwide level has largely been dominated by these issues. Africans were at the center of the creation of an alternative Anglican forum to the Lambeth Conference: the Global Anglican Future Conference, which first met in Jerusalem in 2008 (preceding a boycott of the 2008 Lambeth Conference by many African bishops) and subsequently in Nairobi, Kenya, in 2013. Some African bishops (particularly those from Uganda and Nigeria) have also shown increasing disinclination to attend the primates’ meetings, in which archbishops or presiding bishops of autonomous Anglican provinces discuss issues more informally. Justin Welby (1956–), the archbishop of Canterbury, did persuade all to come to such a meeting in 2017, to discuss the changed canon on marriage of the US Episcopal Church. The primates passed a censure motion and forbade the Episcopal Church from representing the Anglican Communion at ecumenical meetings and from having a voice in discussions on church doctrine. The perceived ineffectiveness of such measures caused the archbishops of Uganda, Rwanda, and Nigeria to refuse to attend a meeting hastily arranged in the light of a similar change in the marriage canon by the Scottish Episcopal Church. In North America, and more recently in the United Kingdom, dissident traditionalist groups have broken away from the established Anglican churches over the issue of sexuality. They have sought support and episcopal oversight from African bishops in Rwanda, Nigeria, and Uganda.
At the same time, however, bishops within Africa, despite the hostile climate of opinion, have taken a more moderate stance and assumed important positions in the institutions of the Anglican Communion worldwide on retirement: Josiah Idowu-Fearon (1949–), formerly the archbishop of Kaduna in Nigeria, became the secretary general of the Anglican Consultative Council in 2015 (to the disapproval of the Nigerian hierarchy), and the retired archbishop of Burundi, Bernard Ntahoturi (1948–), was appointed director of the Anglican Centre in Rome in 2017. Both bishops support the Lambeth 1998 resolution. They do not accept the notion that same-sex relations are compatible with Christian teaching. Idowu-Fearon has, however, spoken out against the criminalization of gay people in Nigeria, which put him at odds with his fellow bishops. Ntahoturi, who has been involved in peace-building processes within Burundi, has strongly advocated for continuing dialogue and amicable relations between the divided Anglican provinces.

The Environment for Sexual Minorities in Specific African Nations

© HENNY RAY ABRAMS/AP PHOTO

Anglican Archbishop Henry Luke Orombi of Uganda in 2005. Both Orombi and his successor Stanley Ntagali have spoken strongly against homosexuality and have been hostile to the emergence of moderate voices within their church. The Anglican Church in Uganda has been at the forefront in urging society to reject homosexual practices as both un-Christian and un-African.
The widely reported arguments within the global Anglican Communion have tended to foster within Africa itself an environment extremely hostile to balanced ethical debate on the issues. In Uganda, an Anglican member of the nation’s parliament, David Bahati (1973–), introduced the Anti-Homosexuality Bill in 2009 to dramatically increase the existing penalties under the old colonial laws on sodomy. The bill widened the scope of offenses, included penalties for failure to inform the authorities about same-sex sexual activity, and, in its first draft, mandated the death penalty for certain repeat offenses. The bill became law in 2014, but the nation’s Constitutional Court nullified the law later that year because it had been passed without the constitutionally mandated quorum. The bill was widely endorsed by the Anglican leadership, although they did urge the removal of the capital punishment penalties. Archbishop Henry Luke Orombi (1949–) and his successor, Stanley Ntagali (1955–), have both spoken out strongly against homosexuality and have been hostile to the emergence of moderate voices within their church. Anglicans have certainly contributed to the moral panic that has characterized public debate in Uganda, particularly over what is seen as a “gay agenda”—a fear that rich gay foreigners are coercing and bribing schoolchildren into “becoming homosexuals.” While avoiding the extreme rhetoric of some Pentecostal preachers, the Anglican Church of Uganda has been at the forefront in urging society to reject homosexual practice as an unacceptable way of life that is both un-Christian and un-African. Orombi prohibited the acceptance of grants from the US Episcopal Church, arguing that to accept such “bitter money” would diminish the life and witness of the church. Arguments about money and the ability of forces in the opulent Global North to purloin individuals and institutions came to be used on both sides of the debate to discredit opponents. Taking a stand against a morally permissive Western culture was seen as important partly because it asserted the autonomy of African Christianity and marked its emergence from self-imposed dependence on a Western Christianity that had compromised biblical orthodoxy.

Bishop Christopher Senyonjo (1931–), in retirement, has been the lone bishop supporting local gays and lesbians and providing supportive counseling for Uganda's LGBTI community. He was much criticized by fellow church leaders for welcoming a gay organization, Integrity Uganda, perceived as an American gay advocacy group masquerading as an indigenous organization. Senyonjo was subsequently dismissed from office in the Church of Uganda. Canon Gideon Byamugisha (1959–), a longtime HIV/AIDS activist, has spoken out against intolerance of gay people, warning of the dangers of stigmatizing a minority group as had happened in the Rwandan genocide. Law professor Sylvia Tamale (1967–) and feminist academic Stella Nyanzi (1974–), both with Anglican backgrounds, are outspoken in advocating for gay rights in Uganda. The murdered gay activist David Kato (1964–2011) was the son of an Anglican pastor; and a blogger who operated under the name of “Gay Uganda” provided a lively, ironic, often sardonic, commentary on what he considered to be the homophobia of Christian leaders, not least from the Anglican church in which he grew up. Public debate on issues of homosexuality in Uganda (and in Kenya) is much more robust than the image in the West would allow. However, annual Martyrs' Day celebrations (commemorating the massacre of Christians between 1885 and 1887) have increasingly focused on a homosexual theme: the fury of Kabaka Mwanga, the young king of Buganda, because of the refusal of one of his Christian pages to comply with his sexual desires. This was previously a relatively minor theme, compared with issues of loyalty, nationalism, arbitrary power, and repression of dissidents, which had resonated strongly in the 1970s, during the repression of the regime of Idi Amin (1925–2003).

In Nigeria a bill to outlaw same-sex marriage was passed into law in 2014, with strong support from Nigerian Anglican leaders. Archbishop Peter Akinola (1944–) and his successor, Nicholas Okoh (1952–), have been prominent in condemning what they consider to be Western apostasy that puts in doubt the value of retaining the traditional links with Canterbury, which had previously defined what it means to be Anglican. At the 2011 Divine Commonwealth Conference in Abuja, Nigerian Christians (with strong Nigerian Anglican representation) roundly condemned the British government’s attempt to make British aid dependent on adherence to the human rights of gay people.

It is clear that [the British prime minister's] true agenda is to force the normalization of homosexuality and gay marriage as a “human right.” While acknowledging the sacred worth of every human being we reject this erroneous notion as contrary to God’s intention for humankind.

(CHURCH TIMES 2011)

A common trope in discussions about homosexuality among Nigerian Christians is that homosexual desire is itself an enslavement from which a person needs deliverance. This is reinforced by bitter memories of slavery and the slave trade, which feed into suspicions that there is a “gay agenda” on the part of the West aimed, yet again, at the emasculation of African humanity. There is also anger at the seeming hypocrisy of “the West,” which formerly denounced African sexualities as barbaric and continues to lack understanding of the cultural context of polygyny. As Ntagali has written:

Judgement and condemnation will not help; after all there are many who will say that polygamy is in itself essentially a responsible, caring, legal and enduring relationship that is fully accepted in many parts of the world. There are many who will say that a marriage such as this cannot be broken up. Who will be sent away? Who will be denied the fellowship of the church? The
This raises the question (not addressed by Ntagali) of why such tolerance and empathy cannot be extended to African gay relationships.

Strained relations with Islam have also become a factor in the debate about homosexuality, with Anglican leaders complaining that liberal Anglicans in the United Kingdom and the United States are ignorant of and unsympathetic to the volatile religious divide in Nigeria and citing the use a militant Islam can make of discrediting Nigerian Anglicans for being part of a worldwide faith where decadent moral values prevail. The abduction of Christian girls and assassination of Christian students by Nigeria-based radical Islamic sect Boko Haram have little direct connection with homosexuality, but they add to the sense of anxiety on the part of Anglicans and reinforce the need to stand firm for traditional Christian values.

This political and social climate has not been conducive to tolerance of sexual minorities and has inhibited the emergence of openly gay communities in Nigeria. One Nigerian Anglican gay activist, Davis Mac-Iyalla (1972–), a respected Anglican school principal and lay reader, was dismissed in 2004 when his own sexuality became known. His campaigns for acceptance of gay people in the Anglican church were considered unacceptable. He suffered periods of imprisonment in Nigeria and eventually went into exile. Mac-Iyalla has written an autobiography, Fiyabo (2014), outlining the sufferings of gay people and their families in Nigeria and the attempts of the church to discredit him.

Whereas in Uganda and in Nigeria the law has progressively eroded the rights of same-sex-loving men and women, in South Africa the constitution of 1996 has promoted equal rights and freedoms for sexual minorities. These developments have been welcomed and encouraged by a succession of archbishops: Tutu, Njongonkulu Ndungane (1941–), and Thabo Makgoba (1960–). Prominent in the struggle against apartheid, Anglican leaders have been concerned to fight against the rise of a “new apartheid,” among other injustices, including discrimination against people on the basis of their sexuality. In South Africa the Anglican church has firmly stood out against deep-seated homophobic attitudes in the larger society, a legacy of the apartheid era, with its regressive attitudes toward women and its assault on masculine self-worth. But this progressive liberalism has also had conservative critics within the church.

Those Anglican African churches that have taken a strong stance against gay inclusion have felt confident that their position has wide popular support both within the church and in the wider society. But this is a precarious position. They can also be seen as part of an authoritarian and repressive establishment that uses the sexuality debate to avoid the contentious topics of corruption, inequality, and the erosion of democracy and freedom. Outside South Africa, there has also been a lack of theological, biblical, and ethical analysis of the issues, as well as of critical reflection on the human consequences of the attempt to repress sexual minorities.

SEE ALSO Christianity in Africa: LGBT Friendly; Christianity in Africa: Pentecostal and Charismatic; Christianity in Africa: Roman Catholicism; Nigeria; Religion and Same-Sex Behaviors: Christianity; South Africa; Uganda

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Christian beliefs and actors are key factors fueling homophobia and opposition to LGBT rights in contemporary Africa. Yet simultaneously, many LGBT Africans identify as Christian, attend Christian churches, and practice the Christian faith, finding ways of negotiating and/or reconciling their sexuality and religious identity (van Klinken 2015). Moreover, several African Christian theologians and church leaders have been actively involved in supporting LGBT people and advocating for LGBT rights. The South African archbishop Desmond Tutu (1931–) is the most well-known example, but another name to be mentioned is Bishop Christopher Senyonjo (1931–) from the Anglican Church of Uganda. After his retirement as bishop in 1998, Senyonjo developed a ministry for LGBT persons in Uganda, and in 2010 he established the St. Paul’s Reconciliation and Equality Centre in Kampala, inspired by the exemplary love of Jesus Christ and the belief in the parenthood of God regardless of people’s sexual orientation (Senyonjo 2016). These progressive church leaders and theologians consider the popular usage of the Bible to argue against homosexuality “selective and arbitrary,” and they argue that the overall message of the Bible is one of love, inclusion, and liberation (Mombo 2006, 146).

According to Ezra Chitando and Tapiwa P. Mapuranga (2016), faith-based organizations have played an important role in facilitating interactions between church leaders and LGBT activists in several parts of Africa, especially as part of the response to the HIV/AIDS epidemic. They point to the work of the World Council of Churches' Ecumenical HIV and AIDS Initiatives and Advocacy (EHAIA) and of the International Network of Religious Leaders Living with or Personally Affected by HIV or AIDS (INERELA+), which was founded in 2002 by the Reverend Canon Gideon Byamugisha (1959–) from Uganda and was active in fifteen African countries as of 2017. The work of EHAIA and INERELA+ has become inclusive of LGBT people out of the experience “of addressing HIV and AIDS stigma and discrimination” and because of the “notion that all human beings are created in the image of God” (Chitando and Mapuranga 2016, 178, 179). Another major development is the emergence of Christian LGBT organizations in various parts of Africa, such as the following examples.
Metropolitan Community Churches

Metropolitan Community Churches (MCC) began as a North American denomination, founded in 1968. It seeks to build churches that promote inclusion, human rights, and justice specifically in relation to the LGBTQ community. According to its website, MCC is active in five countries on the continent: Kenya, Nigeria, South Africa, Uganda, and Zimbabwe. Apart from South Africa, it is difficult to verify the current level of activity. In South Africa MCC has various branches, in Cape Town, Johannesburg, and Pretoria. Its majority-black congregation in Johannesburg, the Hope and Unity Metropolitan Community Church, was founded in 1994 by the Reverend Tsietsi Thandekiso. The church challenges the idea that homosexuality is incompatible with African cultures and helps members integrate their sexuality, faith, and African cultural identity (Reid 2010).

House of Rainbow Fellowship

House of Rainbow Fellowship aims to help people of faith reconcile their sexuality and spirituality. Founded in 2006 by the British Nigerian gay theologian the Reverend Rowland Jide Macaulay, the fellowship according to its website was active in eleven countries in Africa (Botswana, Burundi, Ghana, Lesotho, Liberia, Malawi, Nigeria, South Africa, Tanzania, Uganda, and Zambia), as well as in two European countries (Sweden and the United Kingdom), as of 2017. Macaulay, who was ordained in the MCC, describes House of Rainbow as a “radically inclusive and affirming mission” following the example of Jesus’s inclusive ministry, specifically catering to LGBTI Christians of African and African Caribbean descent (Macaulay 2010, 11).

DESMOND TUTU (1931–)

Desmond Tutu is the best known among those African Christian leaders who have spoken out systematically and radically in favor of the recognition of same-sex sexualities and LGBT human rights. Ordained as an Anglican priest in 1960, he served as general secretary of the South African Council of Churches from 1978 to 1985, as bishop of Johannesburg from 1985 to 1986, and as archbishop of Cape Town from 1986 until his retirement in 1996. Influenced by the tradition of black liberation theology, which emerged in North America and South Africa in the 1960s and 1970s, Tutu became a vocal critic of apartheid, the system of white-minority rule and racial segregation in South Africa (1948–1994).

After the end of apartheid, Tutu coined the term rainbow nation for the new, democratic South Africa, reflecting his vision of a society organized on the basis of equality, diversity, and inclusion. For Tutu, this applied not only to the question of race but also of sexuality. Denouncing the ways in which Christianity in South Africa has been involved in perpetuating both racism and homophobia, Tutu stated, "If the church, after the victory over apartheid, is looking for a worthy moral crusade, then this is it: the fight against homophobia and heterosexism” (1997, x). Tutu’s thoughts on this matter are informed by the idea that both race and sexual orientation are innate and are part of the way God created humankind; therefore, they cannot be a ground for discrimination. Both racism and homophobia reflect, according to Tutu, “the ultimate blasphemy” (x), as they make certain children of God doubt—because of their race or sexuality—whether they are truly children of God. Referring to the American civil rights leader Martin Luther King Jr. (1929–1968) and his dream of an inclusive and diverse world as a source of inspiration, Tutu claimed that “as God has made me black, so God has made some of us gay. And how incredibly wonderful is it that God has created each of us to be who we are” (2012, 149).

It is difficult to assess Tutu’s direct influence on legal changes in post-apartheid South Africa, where discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation is explicitly prohibited in the country’s 1996 constitution and where same-sex civil unions were legalized in 2006. Yet it is clear that the outspoken stance of a prominent, highly respected figure such as Tutu has made a significant contribution to the building of a culture and society in which the human dignity and rights of gay and lesbian people are being respected. Importantly, as a black African and Christian leader, Tutu challenges the popular rhetoric of homosexuality being “un-African” and “un-Christian,” presenting a theology and spirituality based on the African indigenous concept of ubuntu, according to which one can be human only in relation to and in harmony with others, in all the diversity with which God created humankind (Battle 2009).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Adriaan van Klinken

Associate Professor of Religion and African Studies, School of Philosophy, Religion and History of Science

University of Leeds, United Kingdom
Other Sheep Africa

Other Sheep works for the inclusion of LGBT people of faith within their respective faith traditions. Founded in 1992 in Latin America, the organization has been active in Africa since 2007, especially in the eastern part of the continent. With the Reverend Michael Kimundu, a Kenyan Anglican priest, as president, the organization worked from its headquarters in Nairobi developing activities in such countries as Kenya, Rwanda, Uganda, and the Democratic Republic of the Congo. However, the organization’s current state and level of activity is difficult to verify.

United Coalition of Affirming Africans

The United Coalition of Affirming Africans (UCAA) is an initiative of an African American organization, the Fellowship of Affirming Ministries (TFAM). TFAM aims to promote a “theology of radical inclusivity,” and it did so initially in the black church in the United States but since the first decade of the twenty-first century in Africa also. Through national chapters in countries such as the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Kenya, Rwanda, Uganda, and Zimbabwe, it brings together progressive African Christian clergy and LGBT activists, training them to be at the forefront of dialogues about culture, theology, and sexuality. In Nairobi, Kenya, TFAM also has established an LGBT-inclusive Christian church. The UCAA and TFAM frame their activities in an explicitly Pan-African narrative according to which progressive black Christians fight against the influence of American white conservative evangelicals (van Klinken 2017).

Catholic Church

The Catholic Church in Africa has kept a relatively low profile on LGBT issues: it has generally not engaged in the virulent antigay rhetoric typical of many Protestant (especially Anglican and Pentecostal) churches, but neither has it actively participated in pro-LGBT Christian initiatives. Yet at least one prominent African Catholic theologian, Agbonkhianmeghe Orobator (originally from Nigeria but currently serving as principal of Hekima University College in Nairobi, Kenya), has spoken out frankly. In response to Pope Francis’s exhortation Amoris Laetitia (2016), Orobator publicly interpreted this document as a call to “embrace wholeheartedly African families and their LGBT members who have been stigmatized, marginalized, and excluded from the life of the church,” and he used the notion of the church as “family of God” to emphasize values of inclusion and hospitality (quoted in McElwee 2016).

SEE ALSO Activity in Africa South of the Sahara; Christianity in Africa: Anglican; Christianity in Africa: Pentecostal and Charismatic; Christianity in Africa: Roman Catholicism; HIV/AIDS in Africa; Religion and Same-Sex Behaviors: Christianity
BIBLIOGRAPHY

LGBTQ debates and the life of sexual minorities in contemporary Africa cannot be disentangled from religious discourse and its influence on the African public sphere and political domain. The level of religiosity on the continent, across the three dominant religious expressions of Islam, Christianity, and traditional African religions, grew steadily in the twentieth and twenty-first centuries to the point that many consider Africa as the future center of gravity of the world’s Muslim and Christian populations. By 2050, nearly four in ten (38%) of the world’s Christians will be based in sub-Saharan Africa, up from 24 percent in 2010 and from the tiny figure of 2 percent in 1910 (McClendon 2017). Religious influence in Africa has never been relegated to the private sphere or diminished in importance as predicted by Western theories (and experiences) of modernity. On the contrary, religion has continued to influence and shape the life of African citizens and their public affairs (Ellis and ter Haar 2007). Religious leaders, ideas, idioms, and institutions are an important reservoir of political creativity and material support (such as health care, education, and financial services), often in contrast to the failures of the postcolonial African state’s capacity to offer adequate service delivery and political stability and transformation (Bompani and Frahm-Arp 2010).

Within the rapid growth of Christianity on the continent, it is important to highlight the even more rapid growth of Pentecostal-Charismatic churches and Charismatic expressions since the late 1970s. Although this movement is far from homogeneous, and is in fact extremely diverse, for the sake of the analysis of LGBTQ matters in relation to Pentecostal and Charismatic Christianity in contemporary Africa, it is sufficient to highlight two specific traits: (1) these Christian groups moved from being small minorities to dominant and vibrant voices in the African public sphere in less than forty years; in more recent years they also moved away from being generally aloof from the materiality of the everyday politics to becoming active political actors; (2) with their voice and visibility raised, their theological and phenomenological understandings started to be publicly expressed and elaborated with the intention to influence public policies and the running of the African state.
It is through this process that it is possible to observe the emergence of a highly moralized interpretation of politics and the moralization of the public sphere and political debates in many African contexts. Drawing from Pentecostal and Charismatic interpretations that dichotomize sinful and holy public behaviors, Pentecostal and Charismatic voices started to articulate clear distinctions and identify groups to be excluded from the national community of moral citizens, among which LGBTQ communities became a priority target. The rise of the religious moralization of politics also coincided with the rise of LGBTQ communities’ visibility and fight for better rights in several African countries, while, internationally, LGBTQ groups were winning rights and engaging with both secular and religious communities.

For example, in 2008 the Lambeth Conference, which brings together the global Anglican communion every ten years, was the site of fierce debates over the inclusion of openly gay and lesbian clergy and the celebration of same-sex marriage following the consecration of an openly gay and partnered bishop in the American diocese of New Hampshire in 2003 (Vanderbeck et al. 2011). About a quarter of the invited bishops (including a substantial number from sub-Saharan Africa) ultimately boycotted the conference and accused Rowan Williams, the then archbishop of Canterbury, of colonial and discriminatory attitudes toward the voices of the bishops from the Global South despite their growing numbers. (Indeed, over 50% of the total communion's 80 million adherents live in sub-Saharan Africa.) The Lambeth Conference of 2008 had an enormous impact on many Christian communities on the African continent, especially on Pentecostal and Charismatic groups, who started to express their distinctiveness from what they perceived as the liberal North and its “illnesses”—growing secularization and a growing distance from the “African way” of understanding the guiding moral role of religion in society. This historical convergence fused together, on one hand, the politicization of Pentecostal and Charismatic groups and their highly moralized public action and, on the other hand, the politicization of homosexuality on the continent (Awondo, Geschiere, and Reid 2012) with the rise of LGBTQ activism and the related emergence of countermeasures brought in by political and religious conservative actors. And this convergence frames the contemporary interplay between Pentecostal and Charismatic Christianity and LGBTQ debates and the life of sexual minorities in Africa.

Charismatic and Pentecostal Christianity in Sub-Saharan Africa

Under the umbrella of Pentecostal and Charismatic churches there is an incredible liturgical and everyday diversity that evolves and overlaps, and denominations often use terms interchangeably. Nevertheless, since the beginning of the twentieth century in the United States, Pentecostal and Charismatic movements can generally be classified in three waves that represent three movements: classical Pentecostals, with a more uniform doctrine and more centralized structures, initiated by the Azusa Street Revival in California in 1906; the Charismatic movement, which emerged in the 1960s and did not separate into a new Christian denomination but applied Pentecostal characteristics to historical denominations, such as Anglican charismatics or Catholic charismatics; and the more recent neo-Pentecostals or Pentecostal-Charismatics, who since the late 1980s rapidly expanded and became the most dynamic form of Christianity in the Global South. Owing to their dynamism, expansion, and dominance, the last two expressions are commonly the focus when discussing Pentecostalism in sub-Saharan Africa. The rapid growth of the movement since the late 1980s paralleled economic crisis, political instability, and the harsh effects of the international imposition of neoliberal socioeconomic interventions in the form of structural adjustment programs. This was fertile ground for the healing and empowering potential of Pentecostal and Charismatic theology, which with its focus on improving the material and spiritual life in the present offered relief from the harshness of daily life for many Africans.

All three groups share certain basic religious doctrines, such as the need for believers to have a conversion experience (to be “born again”), personal salvation, and the principle of evangelization (the call to convert others to the doctrine). Pentecostals and Charismatics place an emphasis on the gifts of the Holy Spirit, such as speaking in tongues, divine healing, direct revelations from God, and prophecies, and they have very strict ethical rules. Neo-Pentecostals also have a clear emphasis on the spirit of accumulation and prosperity through action and praying. Many authors point to this emphasis to explain the success of the movement on the African continent during times of deepening poverty and uncertainty (Comaroff 2009; Freeman 2012), whereas others tie the success of those churches to their spiritual and emotional character, as well as their ability to deal with and make sense of African spiritual worlds made of evil sources, witchcraft, and guiding spirits (Kalu 2008).
Their theology draws on clear dichotomies that separate the past of the believers from the moment of conversion, while also distinguishing between rightful and acceptable behaviors versus sinful and demonic ones. As part of a religious movement that engages with emotions and with invisible forces, Pentecostal and Charismatic churches must fight a daily battle to guide the life of the religious community and to liberate it from evil spirits that possess and corrupt the body and the soul of African citizens. According to this interpretation, political corruption, greediness, mismanagement, the perceived lack of moral behavior, and lack of respect toward the elderly and authority—problems that are often publicy raised as barriers to the “progress” of African societies—are also all interpreted as evils against a righteous and holy way of living a Christian life. It is through praying and action that Pentecostal and Charismatic Africans are invited to fight those vices and sins and to play an active role to change the social and political reality. If, initially, Pentecostal and Charismatic churches viewed the political sphere as an avoidable demonic realm, then in the twenty-first century, the urgency of fighting evil and sinful behaviors has driven their political activity to the point that religious and political discourse are becoming increasingly indistinguishable. It is sufficient to witness the active role Pentecostal and Charismatic churches and leaders played in twenty-first-century elections in Ghana, Nigeria, Kenya, Zambia, and Uganda in supporting certain candidates and influencing the electorate. It is also important to highlight the instrumental use that some African politicians make of moral Pentecostal discourses by ostensibly demonstrating support for those moral campaigns in the hope of reciprocal support and votes from Christian constituencies (Ukah 2017). Often these churches speak of this being a critical time for religiously inspired sociopolitical transformation, especially in light of changing values and attitudes toward sexuality and family norms.

Indeed, sexuality and sexual behavior are in some way at the forefront of the construction of the moral framework of Pentecostal and Charismatic churches in Africa. First, the sexuality discourse links to the idea of reproduction and continuation of the religious community that is expressed in heterosexual married couples. Second, morality, respectability, and integrity assign a clear place in society to everyone according to divine will. Fixed sex roles control and maintain the moral order; any alteration would cause chaos and destruction that correspond—still in Pentecostal terms—to the success of evil over good forces (Bompani 2016).

Intracountry Realities

Given the strong role played by morality and normative sexual interpretations in these churches, it is perhaps no surprise that LGBTQ groups, which also gained visibility and became increasingly organized in the African public sphere since the late 1990s (Currier 2012), are the community that most overtly challenges the Pentecostal-Charismatic fixed order in which heteronormative families reproduce and nurture future generations of moral citizens. LGBTQ groups are by extension considered de facto dangerous enemies of this Pentecostal-Charismatic vision and, according to this interpretation, should be excluded from and deprived of their rights and privileges as citizens. This explains the support that Pentecostal and Charismatic churches have given to the implementation of tight legal measures against sexual minorities in Africa. Such measures have included the Anti-Homosexuality Act in Uganda, which was signed into law in February 2014 but then struck down by the country’s Constitutional Court a few months later, and the Same Sex (Prohibition) Act signed into law in 2014 by Nigerian president Goodluck Jonathan. Other anti-LGBTQ feelings and actions have been well documented in other countries, including Kenya, Zimbabwe, Malawi, Ghana, and Zambia. Even in South Africa, where LGBTQ lives are officially and legally protected by an inclusive and progressive constitution, Pentecostals contest liberal rights around gender equality and sexual minority rights; and they find in this engagement a common unifying terrain for public and political action across otherwise diverse churches (Burchardt 2013).

There is a counterpoint to the interplay sketched out above. Although most of the academic and public reflections generally focus on the public role of Pentecostal and Charismatic Christianity in negatively affecting the life of sexual minorities in Africa, it is equally relevant to note that at a personal or individual level many LGBTQ African people are religious themselves, and many are Pentecostals or Charismatics. In fact, within the movement there are groups, individuals, and even churches that counteract the dominant exclusionary and conservative discourse, even if this is not always publicly recognized. For example, the Deo Gloria Family Church and Victory Ministries Church International, both based in Durban, South Africa, are affirming and inclusive churches. Even in contexts in which supporting LGBTQ groups remains against the law, as in Uganda, there are small underground organized Pentecostal communities that preach a more liberal gospel (found through fieldwork research in Kampala, 2012–2014). This suggests that one must search beyond simple dichotomous interpretations holding that all LGBTQ activism is secular and that all churches are homophobic, given that in African contexts activism does not coincide with the negation of religion as an absolute oppressive force. On the contrary, religion remains embedded in the private and sometimes public lives of many African sexual minorities involved in the fight for their rights. Understanding religion in Africa, especially Pentecostal and Charismatic Christianity, is central to understanding the continent’s social, cultural, and political past, present, and—especially—future.

SEE ALSO Christianity in Africa: Anglican; Christianity in Africa: LGBT Friendly; Christianity in Africa: Roman Catholicism; Religion and Same-Sex Behaviors: Christianity

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Christianity in Africa: Roman Catholicism

HENNI ALAVA
Postdoctoral researcher in Development and International Cooperation
University of Jyväskylä, Finland

The position of the Roman Catholic Church in Africa on sexual minorities.

The Roman Catholic Church (RCC) is the largest single Christian denomination in Africa south of the Sahara, with over a fifth of the region’s population as its members. Through missionaries and national churches, the RCC has wielded enormous influence over the religious, cultural, and legal norms that regulate sexuality; the heteronormative patriarchy inherent to Catholic tradition has both accommodated and reinforced similar tendencies in African societies (Alava 2017; van Klinken 2013b). Catholic teaching on sexuality is shaped both from above, through formal doctrine formulated and upheld by the church hierarchy, and from below, through interpretations and emphases deriving from responses to particular contexts. In their reflections on the process of engagement between Christian doctrine and African cultures, referred to in Catholicism as inculturation theology, African Catholic scholars have sought to counter the negative stereotypes created through colonial and missionary accounts of the continent. Often, however, this has been achieved through the creation of an idealized image of one homogenous “African culture,” which is construed as being fundamentally averse to sexual diversity (van Klinken and Gunda 2012).

African Emphases in Catholic Sexual Ethics

African Catholic teaching on sexuality stands on three pillars: the sacramental status of marriage, specific understandings of so-called natural law, and an emphasis on community and procreation over individual rights or sexual pleasure. For the RCC, the sacramental union between a man and a woman symbolizes the union between Christ and the church. Marriage is perceived as the foundation of both church and society, for which reason protecting it from perceived threats is considered pivotal.

Natural law, which claims that certain moral principles are recognized universally, is an essential premise of Catholic moral theology. In African Catholic theology, natural law arguments are commonly coupled with particular interpretations of biblical creation stories and with essentializing claims about “African tradition.” Man and woman are seen as having been created fundamentally different and complementary, a view that is claimed to form the heart of African conceptualizations of personhood, in which “the bipolarity of man-woman is a most important dimension.... Neither as man nor as woman are human beings complete but rather both together constitute a whole human being” (Bujo 2009, 37). While many African priests have joined early missionaries in condemning certain African customary practices, others have explained polygyny, (asexual) female-female marriage, and the practice of levirate, whereby a widow can be inherited by the deceased husband’s brother, as having served the interests of the community (Magesa 1998).

In the view of the most influential of Catholic theologians in Africa, the community rather than the individual is at the heart of sexual ethics. The morality of sexual behavior is thus assessed in light of its contribution to marital stability and the transmission of life from the ancestors to posterity (Bujo 2001). While some African theologians have criticized the negative tone adopted by the RCC in matters of sexuality (Kisembo, Magesa, and Shorter 1998), they unite in teaching that sexual pleasure belongs strictly within marriage and that searching for it elsewhere is destructive.

Debates over LGBTQ Rights in Africa

Formal Catholic doctrine distinguishes between homosexuality as an intrinsic tendency and homosexual acts, only the latter of which are deemed sinful. African Catholic theologians cast minority sexual identities and practices not only as against church teaching but as foreign and abhorrent to their continent. For example, Joseph K. Njino claims that “homosexuals are dismissed as sub-human or abnormal people in traditional African cultures” (2004, 349), while Bénézet Bujo writes that the supposedly new sexual practices imported by foreigners “destroy the people of Africa, and bring on them a culture of death” (2009, 158). Even when it is acknowledged that some people may be “born gay,” African Catholic writers teach abstinence, in line with the RCC’s official stance.

Although some of the RCC’s national episcopal councils have called for respect for LGBTQ minorities, they have all supported legislative measures — excluding the death penalty, which the RCC universally opposes — against minority sexual practices. Individual priests have used their pulpits for hate speech, although perhaps the most important contribution of the church toward LGBTQ minorities has been the heteronormative silencing of their existence (Alava 2017).

The stances of Catholic churches in recent debates on homosexuality in Africa are not mere reflections of formal church doctrine or local theology but are profoundly influenced by broader societal dynamics. The growth of Pentecostal and Charismatic Christianity has pushed the RCC to adopt increasingly fierce rhetoric, particularly in those countries where it has been accused of being unpatriotic, of harboring homosexual priests within its ranks, or of having originally imported homosexuality to Africa (Nyeck 2016; van Klinken 2013a). Conservative Catholic organizations such as Human Life International have invested financial and personnel resources to strengthen antigay stances in the region, whereas LGBTQ-friendly voices heard within the global RCC have been almost completely absent in Africa south of the Sahara.

Ongoing Debates and Future Trajectories

Around the time of the Second Vatican Council (1962–1965), rather liberal views on sexual ethics were accommodated, only to be sidelined again under the papacies of John Paul II (1978–2005) and Benedict XVI (2005–2013). Pope Francis (2013–) has shown moderate support for sexual and gender minorities, but African bishops have vocally demanded that the RCC retain its conservative stances (Miller 2015). African Catholics, however, have historically shown remarkable flexibility in accommodating the contradictions between formal doctrine and customary practices. Even in regions where the RCC is highly influential, the norms that govern sexuality have not been dictated by the church but are negotiated “in the dynamic space between religious, ‘traditional,’ and ‘modern’ moral sensibilities” (Alava 2017, 45). Furthermore, failure to follow Catholic teaching does not lead individuals to be ostracized from local RCC communities. Thus, although this is far from full acceptance of LGBTQ minorities, Catholic churches in Africa could at least draw on their tradition of inclusive pastoral practice, as well as on theological resources such as the notion of human beings as images of God (Phiri 2016), to counter the violent antigay activism witnessed in many religious communities in the region. In those contexts where prominent representatives of the RCC have joined actively hostile antigay lobbies, this may appear a wishful and unlikely scenario. Yet the decriminalization of homosexuality in 2004 in Cabo Verde, where over 90 percent of the population is Catholic, and the approval of antidiscrimination work law in Mozambique in 2007, where Catholics, at 28 percent of the population, are the largest religious group, point to the possibility of change toward greater acceptance and inclusion of LGBTQ minorities within Catholicism in Africa south of the Sahara.

SEE ALSO Christianity in Africa: Anglican; Christianity in Africa: LGBT Friendly; Christianity in Africa: Pentecostal and Charismatic; Ethiopia: Religion and Same-Sex Behaviors: Christianity; Uganda

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Phiri, Lilly. “‘Born This Way’: The Imago Dei in Men Who Love Other Men in Lusaka, Zambia.” In Christianity and Controversies over Homosexuality in Contemporary Africa, edited by Ezra Chitando and Adriaan S. van Klinken, 157–170. Abingdon, UK: Routledge,

Representations of same-sex desire in English-language films made in Africa or by directors of African descent.

Representations of same-sex desire and practices in English-language African cinema are deeply entangled with the regional dynamics of African political history and the history of African cinema. Although such representations address a range of themes, they predominantly give voice to sexual counterpublics that challenge dominant constructions of sexuality. The cinema of Nigeria—known as Nollywood—would be the exception to this trend: its representations are generally negative, and the plots are predicated on the reintegration of individuals with nonnormative sexualities into socially sanctioned sexual practices.

Historically, South African cinema has had the largest archive of same-sex representations, but twenty-first-century anti-LGBTQ political rhetoric has spurred a dramatic rise in the production and dissemination of narratives about nonnormative sexualities across Africa. Because of the historical connections among these representations and regional political cultures, any appraisal must attend to the historical absence of nonnormative sexualities from African cinema, the rise of African LGBTQ activism, the emergence of political homophobic discourses, and the backlash against the so-called imperialist global gay agenda. Discussions of African same-sex sexuality in film also face a central dilemma about the designation African because many films about this subject are produced by teams from outside the continent. Rather than qualify these representations as exclusively African, it might be more productive to agree that the growing archive consists of films produced by Africans and non-Africans but that such films focus on Africans. What follows is a short introduction to the themes, aesthetics, and histories of these representations.

On Taxonomies of Same-Sex Representations

There is an ongoing debate on the proper taxonomies that can be deployed in studies of African same-sex representations. Scholars point to the diversity of “African intimacies” (Hoad 2007) or “vocabularies of the non-normative” (Matebeni and Msibi 2015), and Martin P. Botha (2014) specifically cautions against Western LGBTQ terms. However, (documentary) filmmakers regularly deploy those very terms, as they narrate experiences framed within African LGBTQ activism or demands for legal rights. The preponderance of human rights framings prompted Karl Schoonover and Rosalind Galt to ask if non-Western nonnormative sexualities can be understood only within the framework of human rights demands or if there are advantages to representing “non-Western queer desire ... in terms of Western gay identity politics” (2016, 2). As this survey shows, the answer to that question can only be complex and nuanced. As much as scholars find a wealth of African sexual taxonomies, the situation in some African countries drives the human and legal rights framework. Because individuals are harassed, arrested, or forcibly interpolated by state and nonstate actors as gay or lesbian, they unvaryingly respond to such stresses at the interface of those interpolations. Gay identity politics is consequently not always a matter of choice. Besides, the labels in the LGBTQ initialism are simply some of the multiple names circulating and adopted across various scales. Some documentary films reveal practices of code-switching as individuals switch languages, labels, and their complicated cultural constructions of sexuality.

The debates about the proper sexual taxonomies or the efficacy and purchase of the human rights frame cannot be addressed adequately in this survey. Suffice it to note that there are slippages between the representations in cinema and the multiplicity of sexual vocabularies that circulate on the African continent. Filmmakers also do not work exclusively within the rights claim-making frame, and they deploy the LGBTQ labels—even when they critique them—because these labels have become ensconced within political and cultural discourse. Even when scholars and artists prefer terms such as same-sex sexuality, they still deploy LGBTQ terminologies because cinematic representations emerge into a world in which these terms circulate even if they do not completely capture the nuances of indigenous terms and sexual subcultures. Moreover, films produced in English almost implicitly presume a target audience familiar with the LGBTQ labels. These distinctions are especially relevant for documentary film, as they underscore the proliferation and improvisation of queer identities for different audiences.

Cinematic representations fall into genre productions: shorts, feature films, and documentaries. They also follow the broad inflections of African cinema in terms of the material conditions of production, regional cinema histories, and the interplay between cinema and local theatrical and televisual cultures. South Africa’s history of colonialism and apartheid and its unique constitutional protection of sexual orientation lends its cinema a distinctive landscape. Kenya and Uganda have emerged as important sites of cinematic production in East Africa. In West Africa, Nigeria’s major cinema, Nollywood, churns out sensational melodramas that routinely offer unsympathetic representations. Nollywood is slowly being challenged, however, by activist production and the emergence of newer directors deploying nuanced scripts. Documentary film production largely responds to ongoing legal contestations and activist struggles or, alternatively, it archives LGBTQ histories. Finally, Africans living in the diaspora have started producing films about the impacts of race, migration, and economic inequalities on queer African lives on the continent and abroad.

Documenting African LGBTQ Lives

Documentaries (nonfictional films that record stories about real-world places, incidents, and people) have emerged as an important vehicle for representations of African LGBTQ groups. These films use techniques of nonfiction film to mediate the realities of LGBTQ groups, and they cover a range of subgenres with distinct aesthetic templates and themes. They record the existence of same-sex desire, discredit claims that homosexuality is un-African, archive LGBTQ histories, note the disparities between men and women, and promote the struggle against homophobia and for political rights. The distinctions between the histories of LGBTQ communities in South Africa and the rest of English-speaking Africa are most visible in documentary cinema. Whereas South African documentary is mostly produced and directed by South Africans, documentary films about the rest of anglophone Africa have been produced largely by directors and producers from outside the continent. Such films are prompted by controversies surrounding proposed repressive legislations (such as Uganda’s Anti-Homosexuality Bill and Nigeria’s Same Sex Marriage [Prohibition] Act) and the global culture wars around sexuality—that is, the intense debates over the emergence of LGBTQ demands for rights across the world and, especially, the use of LGBTQ rights as a barometer of political justice among countries (Gevisser 2015).

Outside South Africa, documentaries exhibit thematic clusters around the struggle against repressive legislation and homophobic violence, public advocacy for community support, and the formation of resource networks for LGBTQ individuals. Uganda has emerged as a hotbed of documentary filmmaking as a result of the global media coverage of the controversy surrounding its Anti-Homosexuality Bill (signed into law in 2014 but struck down as invalid by Uganda’s Constitutional Court later that year) and the support of American Pentecostal churches for anti-LGBTQ measures. Documentaries such as Africa’s Last Taboo (2010), Call Me Kuchu (2012), God Loves Uganda (2013), and And Still We Rise (2015) draw attention to the struggle of sexual minorities and the extralegal violence against them. These films capture both the vulnerability of individuals and their resilience and activism in groups such as Freedom and Roam Uganda and Sexual Minorities Uganda (SMUG). In West Africa, Born This Way (2013) and Veil of Silence (2014), from Cameroon and Nigeria, respectively, chronicle experiences in LGBTQ communities. Veil of Silence charts debates in the lead-up to Nigeria’s Same Sex Marriage (Prohibition) Act, which became law in January 2014. Born This Way records the activities of two young gay men, along with lawyer Alice Nkom’s noted legal intervention on behalf of LGBTQ individuals in Cameroon.

The Pearl of Africa (2016) extends the thematic range of existing documentaries. This film, about the transition process of the transgender activist Cleopatra Kambugu, is set against the backdrop of Uganda’s Anti-Homosexuality Bill and the popular expressions of homophobic sentiment featured in other documentaries. The film's focus on Cleopatra's life with her partner, Nelson, sets it apart from other documentaries. Its advent acutely underlines the absence of transgender experiences in existing representations of nonnormative sexualities in anglophone African cinema. The exploration of religion in Voices of Witness Africa (2009), directed by Cynthia Black and Katie Sherrod, offers a counterpoint to the virulent denunciations of homosexuality in Pentecostal churches that appear in most documentaries about LGBTQ activism in Uganda. Based on interviews with Ugandans, Kenyans, and South Africans, it explores the lives of members of the Anglican church following the debates at the Lambeth Conferences of 1998 and 2008 and the controversial split within the Anglican church on support for homosexuality.

NOLLYWOOD

Compared to other African cinemas, the Nigerian cinema industry known as Nollywood (a conflation of the words Nigeria and Hollywood) boasts a surprisingly large number of films with representations of nonnormative sexuality. This output, however, is comprehensible because Nigeria ranks second globally in terms of cinematic production. In cinema studies, scholars increasingly distinguish between Old and New Nollywood. The terms define periods and practices in Nigerian cinema history. Old Nollywood roughly designates the period from the early 1990s to early twenty-first century when straight-to-video films shot on shoestring budgets and within short time spans—about ten days—were distributed through local marketing networks on VHS cassettes and, later, DVDs. Such films are heavily influenced by Nigerian televisual production culture. New Nollywood describes the newer twenty-first-century film production with bigger budgets and improved film production values, with the films created to be projected in cinemas. New Nollywood has not superseded Old Nollywood: the two styles of cinema production now occur together.

Nollywood uses film as an interface for popular discourses, including representations of same-sex sexuality (Okome 2007). These films reflect popular discourses about sexual practices and identities that were becoming visible in public space for the first time from the 1990s onward.

Filmmakers responded to new discourses about nonnormative sexual desires by using gay and lesbian characters to flavor ready-made film templates. Therefore, most of these films can hardly be considered adequate responses to the realities of LGBTQ lives in Nigeria or serious reflections on the debates about new discourses of nonnormative sexualities. Instead, some of these films exploit the controversies around these new sexual discourses for commercial profit, while others reflect the distorted perceptions of LGBTQ groups in Nigerian popular imaginaries. Nollywood's LGBTQ representations fall within recognizable formats: the relationship or marriage melodrama in which homosexuality disrupts a relationship; the crime plot in which homosexuality is deployed for negative characterization of an individual; the miseducation plot in which an individual's homosexuality is ascribed to parental oversight; the more generic queer occult seduction narrative in which an individual succumbs to same-sex desire after being seduced by a powerful or wealthy benefactor allied with supernatural forces; and the film of queer voyeurism in which filmmakers portray sensational and titillating images of same-sex erotic practice. These films combine these routinized plotlines while also relying heavily on melodrama (Green-Simms 2012; Green-Simms and Azuah 2012; Tsika 2016).

Although Nollywood films generally demonize putatively gay and lesbian characters or portray them as psychologically disturbed, the mixed templates and doses of melodrama create ambiguous representations. Films such as Emotional Crack (2003), Women Affair (2003), Law 58 (2015), and Men in Love (2010) permit complex readings because they introduce conspicuous scenes of sexual intimacy, illuminate the flexibility of sexual desire, and show mutual support between characters before the films turn to the requisite deus ex machina resolution in which gay and lesbian characters convert to Christianity, die, or are captured by the police. Characters are consequently portrayed within social constraints that occasionally underscore the limitations placed on the uninhibited expressions of sexual desire. Women Affair, for example, suggests the potential for Nollywood representations of LGBTQ lives outside of melodrama. While the film ends with the ubiquitous queer arrest, ascribes homosexuality to failed parenting, and portrays the instigating lesbian character as manipulative, it communicates affections between lesbian couples, as well as the silence and exclusion forced on individuals with nonnormative sexuality.

Interpretations of Nollywood films with regard to nonnormative sexualities must account for Nigeria's National Film and Video Censors Board regulations, which stipulate the inclusion of condemnatory discourses in the framing of same-sex desire. The stipulations guarantee that representations of same-sex desire remain ambiguous or never end in positive resolutions. In interviews that accompanied the release of Busted in 2017, Face Onu and Lisa Onu, the film's producers, position the film as an urgent pedagogical intervention that will educate Nigerians. In a 2017 interview with the Nigerian journalist Azuka Ogujiuba, Face Onu denied knowledge of LGBTQ communities in Nigeria and suggested that the film would “help curb their activities” and change “them positively without necessarily hurting them.” While such declarations suggest that Nollywood filmmakers are against expressions of same-sex desire, they could also be marketing strategies that respond to the demands of film censors. Invariably, cinema scholars must consider restrictive censorship as one of the determining conditions that inform the aesthetic of LGBTQ representations in Nollywood. Ultimately though, Nollywood films have contributed immensely to creating a wider awareness of same-sex sexuality in Nigeria and in Africa.
South Africa’s unique history of LGBTQ activism and its contradictory coexistence of guaranteed constitutional protection and homophobic violence provide the context for more diversified documentary narratives. This body of films has attracted more critical attention than its counterparts from other African countries. Films document the history of LGBTQ history in general, with attention to life under apartheid and the activism that led to South Africa’s landmark constitutional provision. Characteristic of films documenting historical activism is Simon and I (2002), a film on the noted activists Simon Nkoli and Beverley Palesa Ditsie. While it lauds Nkoli’s pioneering role in activism, it equally identifies the marginalization of experiences specific to women within the nascent movement. Other notable films on LGBTQ history include two films by Jack Lewis, A Normal Daughter: The Life and Times of Kewpie of District Six (1997) and Sando to Samantha: Aka the Art of Dikvel (1998). In his overview of queer representations in South African cinema, Botha describes both films as “oral histories of gay subcultures in Cape Town” (2014, 74). Films such as Property of the State: Gay Men in the Apartheid Military (2003), The Man Who Drove with Mandela (1998), and Abdurrazack “Zackie” Achmat’s Apostles of Civilised Vice (2000) demonstrate the thematic diversity of apartheid-era LGBTQ experiences. Occasionally, films addressing elements of life seeming unrelated to LGBTQ matters illuminate aspects of same-sex practices. This is the case with Don Edkins’s 1992 documentary on South African mines, The Color of Gold, which documents male-male sex practices (Epprecht 2004). Some documentaries, such as Paulo Alberton and Graeme Reid’s Dark and Lovely, Soft and Free (2000), explore communities outside of activism or big urban centers in order to provide insights into quotidian lives and move beyond the focus on activism against violence in dominant representations. Achmat, the director of Apostles of Civilised Vice, is also an HIV/AIDS activist, and his activism has been the subject of two films: Brian Tilley’s It’s My Life (2001) and John Greyson’s genre-defying Fig Trees (2009).

The need to tackle sexual violence against lesbian women in South Africa has thrust political activism and community education to the forefront in representations of lesbian experiences in South African documentaries. Lovinsa Kavuma’s 2006 documentary short Rape for Who I Am introduces the key themes of such films: the impact of social inequality on the experience of nonnormative sexuality for women, the importance of campaigns and activism against sexual violence, the demand for prosecution of sexual crimes, and the emphasis on women’s support networks. A number of documentaries have been created around the work of the visual activist Zanele Muholi, who features prominently in Rape for Who I Am as a provocative artist activist. She codirected Difficult Love (2010), which presents her art and her investment in community building; it foregrounds, as well, sexual violence against lesbians. She contributed a short film to Puma’s 2013 Films4Peace initiative, and she made short contributions to larger documentary projects. Her short film We Live in Fear is part of the video project LGBT Rights Around the World, commissioned by Human Rights Watch. She also explains her work in the clip “Zanele Muholi,” which is part of a collection of shorts commissioned for the 2016 Infinity Award: Documentary and Photojournalism, sponsored by the International Center of Photography. Breaking Out of the Box (2011), directed by Busi Kheswa and Zethu Matebeni, also documents sexual violence against lesbian women; it presents the responses of lesbian individuals and their allies to such violence and forms of erasure.

Films that respond to violence and repressive legislation raise a set of questions about audience and reception because they are often made by European and North American teams that face or anticipate criticism about their relations to African activists or interest groups. These films do important work in archiving LGBTQ activism and the lives of individuals in countries such as Kenya, Malawi, Uganda, Nigeria, and Cameroon. However, they also invite critical scrutiny because the predominance of non-African producers underscores Africans’ lack of access to media technology, funds, and distribution networks. When documentaries address marginalization, well-being, and the effects of homophobic violence, they inevitably foreground the vulnerability of the participants in the films; such vulnerability remains even when filmmakers methodically counterbalance it with scenes of celebration or with narratives of success. There is a danger that the focus on activists, nongovernmental organizations, and crisis flash points in documentaries results in the selection and recirculation of the same stories, because the same individuals and their stories appear in several films. These repetitions generate numerous effects. Cumulatively, they provide layered insights into networks of African LGBTQ activism and the lives of individuals transformed by homophobic rhetoric and actions. Yet, although the emphasis on crisis and struggle is meant to showcase activism and resilience, the films may risk voyeurism or, in some cases, portray individuals through a documentary gaze complicit in the indignities inflicted on Africans arrested on suspicions of homosexuality.
Clearly, these documentaries cannot be evaluated in the immediate aftermath of their production because they emerge into arenas of cultural contestations. In some parts of Africa, the sexual identities named in the LGBTQ initialism are considered novelties. Thus, collaborative ventures produced by European and North American filmmakers and their African participants could be accused of fostering postcolonial exoticism or otherness. Alternatively, these documentaries may face the charge of summoning new confessional subjectivities professing identities and identifications promoted by neoliberal regimes of aid administration and humanitarian interventionism. It is certainly possible that some documentary participants may “benefit” materially or otherwise, but alltoo-quick appraisals of these documentaries misevaluate the complex and divergent motivations and situations of participants, the potential reception of the documentaries by different audiences, and their future place as just one component of an emerging archive that gradually includes African-produced narratives. What is clear in these documentaries is the appearance of a new set of narratives, and the Africans who appear in these films would rather have their compatriots as ideal listeners. It is the absence of indigenous ideal listeners that orients African LGBTQ individuals and spokespersons toward international audiences. As such, these documentaries anticipate a future time when the much-needed intra-African debates and representations emerge.

Documentaries that register future anticipations come with their own complexities. The microdocumentary How 2 Gay Men Live in a Country Where Homosexuality Is Illegal (2014) anticipates such a future dialogue. Although it exhibits some narrow-mindedness when it frames the United States against Ghana as the place where LGBTQ groups enjoy freedom, the film still mediates a reality away from the urgency of political debates when its participants simply state a desire for self-expression. Overall, future scholarly criticism has to address the emergence of online archives with microdocumentaries that are pitched toward articulating the presence of specifically LGBTQ-identifying Africans or those who express the anticipation of a future Africa in which all sexualities will be tolerated. None on Record is a digital media organization that started out as an oral history project collecting the narratives of Africans with nonnormative sexualities. As of December 2017, the organization maintained a growing online archive of microdocumentaries in which Africans, on the continent and in the diaspora, narrate their experiences as individuals with nonnormative sexual desires. These online microdocumentaries, virtually an archive of queer life stories, assemble nuanced narratives illuminating the complexities of living in Africa now, while also anticipating a time beyond the current limitations on LGBTQ lives.

Forbidden Games: The Justin Fashanu Story, a documentary on the life of Justin Fashanu, an openly gay British soccer star born to a Nigerian father and a Guyanese mother in London, offers a mirror site for international documentaries on African LGBTQ lives: it refracts the complex transnational contradictions present in the reception of African LGBTQ narratives through histories of colonialism, immigration, social inequality, rural versus metropolitan queer regionalisms, British conservative politics, nationalism, racism, and homophobia.
Because the film was produced in 2017, almost twenty years after Fashanu's death, the delay between his suicide and this public testimony to his experiences illustrates the point about the anticipatory element in LGBTQ documentaries. Fashanu's life was affected by an array of factors in much the same way that African narratives are not single-issue narratives. Whatever controversies Fashanu might have courted in his lifetime, the intricacies of his experience as a Nigerian British gay sports celebrity should be considered alongside African voices emerging outside Africa. By focusing on the world of sports, the film pinpoints a jointly shared terrain of intolerance that cuts across moral positions embedded within the divide between Africa and the West. The belated attention to his experience and the global persistence of intolerance in sports also negate constructions of any easy temporalities in which the West is in advance of the rest. Such complexity is much needed in representations of LGBTQ narratives.

© AF ARCHIVE/ALAMY

Movie Poster for Call Me Kuchu (2012). This documentary focuses on the legal battles of Ugandan LGBTQ activists against local tabloids that denounce individuals as gay or lesbian. Prominent activist David Kato was murdered during the filming, and reactions to his death are chronicled in the movie.

Cross-cultural documentary filmmaking poses unique challenges to filmmakers. In response, filmmakers frequently use self-reflexive narrative methods to alert audiences to the material conditions and infrastructure of documentary filmmaking: they include in the films information about the material constraints of production and uneven access to media.
technology, articulate the construction of the framing gaze within discussions, use first-person narration, and emphasize the subjective status of the countervailing opinions expressed in the film. Some films remain seemingly untouched by the dilemmas of reflexive narrative constitution. Africa's Last Taboo (2010), for example, seems caught between voyeurism and the director's desire for change. The documentary was produced for British television corporation Channel 4 as part of its Dispatches series in which investigative reporters visit political hot spots. The film follows the pattern of crisis documentary that Sorious Samura had established with his 2000 documentary short Cry Freetown, on the Sierra Leonean civil war. This crisis mode might explain the emphasis on the repressive political actions of multiple actors and the responses from LGBTQ communities.

In some cases, reflexivity is forced on filmmakers when local occurrences radically transform the contexts of filmmaking. Call Me Kuchu (2012) focuses on the legal battles of members of SMUG against local Ugandan tabloids that denounced individuals as gay or lesbian in a blatant scandal-mongering hunt for newspaper sales. It starts out documenting the tenacity of SMUG activists, but it takes an unexpected turn when activist David Kato is found murdered. The film's swerve into a landscape of grief, recriminations, and public vitriol against the LGBTQ community serves as a powerful counterpoint to accusations that LGBTQ narratives are performances choreographed for non-African audiences. As Nancy Nicol, codirector of And Still We Rise (2015), reveals, filmmakers are aware of the ethical dimensions of documentaries produced and financed by groups from the Global North (Daily Xtra 2016). According to her, Uganda has become a destination for documentary production; Western individuals perform academic research and document the dilemmas and struggles of African groups and then depart to publish articles in journals or circulate films in venues that are not accessible to African participants in such research and films.
The participants in such documentaries must clearly contend with potential negative outcomes of their public appearances and associations with homosexuality. Nicol demonstrates the efforts of filmmakers to create long-term sustainable links with documentary participants. The project website explains that all income from the film goes to SMUG. The film was also screened in Uganda at the memorial service for Kato on 26 January 2015.

Feature Films: Regions, Genres, Politics

Feature films about same-sex sexuality in English-speaking Africa address sites in South Africa, Nigeria, Kenya, and Uganda. Apart from films from the Nollywood repertoire, many of these films are international collaborations. Nollywood companies have produced the greatest number of cinematic representations. The politics and aesthetics of Nollywood productions situate them in an ambiguous zone in that the representations are often negative, stereotypical, and overlaid with symbolism drawn from the mythical, mystical/spiritual, and religious repertoire of Nigerian theater practices, from popular narratives of the occult, or from the rhetoric of late twentieth- and twenty-first-century Pentecostal evangelism.

Emotional Crack (2003) and Men in Love (2010) illustrate the prevailing conventions of Nollywood representations. In both films, the arrival of a gay/lesbian interloper disrupts a troubled marriage until the removal of said disruption reconsolidates the marriage. Emotional Crack has been recognized as the film that paved the way for a succession of lesbian-plot films in Nollywood (Green-Simms and Azuah 2012). The plot revolves around a love triangle consisting of the bisexual Camilla and the married couple Crystal and Chudi. Camilla has affairs with both Chudi and Crystal but appears most enamored of Crystal. When the latter rebuffs her for Chudi, Camilla kills herself. Men in Love relies on a similar triadic constellation that culminates in the expulsion of the homosexual threat. When Charles runs into his old schoolmate Alex, the latter’s homosexual desires threaten his marriage to Whitney. Alex first drugs and rapes the married Charles and then “enchants” him with a juju spell. The two men live as a couple until Whitney calls on a pastor to release her husband from the spell and asks the police to arrest Alex. Nollywood’s forced resolutions, its convoluted twists, and its baffling character developments manifest the tensions inherent in the production and dissemination of LGBTQ representations. Rather than condemn Nollywood directors, viewers must consider how they conform to prevailing Nollywood paradigms that use film as an interface for popular discourses (Okome 2010). That is, Nollywood filmmakers mostly responded to the emergence of public discourses about nonnormative sexual desires by interjecting gay and lesbian characters or subplots into readymade film templates. The perplexing portrayals in films focusing on gay and lesbian themes reflect the distorted apprehensions of LGBTQ communities in Nigerian popular imagination.

African directors adopting the language of international cinema are diversifying cinematic representations of same-sex desire beyond the Nollywood template. Some directors enter into collaborative ventures with filmmakers, organizations, and sponsors from outside Africa. Such films showcase a more affirmative stance to same-sex sexuality. The Nigerian filmmaker Kenneth Gyang offers a refined treatment of sexual identity in Confusion Na Wa (2013). The film allows a potentially gay character to work out his sexuality away from the public gaze. An important subplot in Nairobi Half Life (2012), directed by the Kenyan filmmaker David “Tosh” Gitonga, involves the relationship between an amateur actor and a male colleague who desires him. In a manner similar to that of Confusion Na Wa, the film situates references to nonnormative sexuality within a wider examination of social inequality and the silence about marginalized lives in society. Both films also explore same-sex desire outside of any specific identity category. Outed: The Painful Reality (2015), directed by the Ugandan filmmaker Kamoga Hassan, has received much attention online. Hassan explains, in an interview, that the film is a response to a real incident of mob violence in which a man was killed after his name appeared on a list of purported homosexuals in a Ugandan tabloid newspaper (Nichols 2016).
Kenyan filmmaker Wanuri Kahiu's 2018 movie Rafiki (“friend” in Kiswahili) is the country's first film to be nominated for an award at the prestigious Cannes Film Festival. The film tells the story of an affair between two young women who fall in love against all the social and moral conventions of the country they call home, where homosexuality is illegal. The director explained the significance of the title in an interview included in the movie's press kit: “Often when Kenyans of the same sex are in a relationship, they forgo the ability to introduce their partners, lovers, mates, husbands, or wives as they would like, and instead call them ‘rafiki’” (Kahiu 2018).

Inspired by “Jambula Tree,” a short story set in Uganda that won writer Monica Arac de Nyeko the 2007 Caine Prize, Rafiki tackles a taboo subject on a continent where thirty-four out of fifty-five countries, including Kenya, criminalize homosexuality, and only South Africa guarantees LGBTQ people rights backed by a constitution.

Set in the city of Nairobi, the film focuses on a budding romance between two teenage girls, Kena and Ziki, who are the daughters of rival politicians. Their dream of living a life other than the heterosexual marriage expected of “good Kenyan girls” is challenged by their conservative society when their relationship is discovered, resulting in backlash and even violence. The film forces its viewers to consider whether it is better to discover one’s sexuality in a loving relationship or to stay under the radar for reasons of safety.

Kahiu’s positive portrayal of a lesbian relationship resulted in the movie being banned by the Kenya Film Classification Board prior to its screening at Cannes. According to the board’s CEO, Ezekiel Mutua, the movie “legitimizes homosexuality against the dominant values, cultures, and beliefs of the people of Kenya” (quoted in Moore 2018). In getting banned at home while being feted abroad, Rafiki follows in the steps of Stories of Our Lives, a 2014 film that was a great success in representing the authentic narratives of LGBTQ Kenyans. Kahiu noted a troubling trend in the censorship in East Africa of local and international films and television shows that feature LGBTQ content: “This has muffled conversations about LGBTI rights and narrowed the parameters of freedom of speech. My hope is that the film is viewed as an ode to love, whose course is never smooth, and as a message of love and support to the ones among us who are asked to choose between love and safety. May this film shout where voices have been silenced” (Kahiu 2018).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

https://static1.squarespace.com/static/570d0acc9f72663f209ca4ad/t/5ae06fd4575d1f1f/
Short films often offer more adventurous representations or address themes disregarded in feature-length films. The Kenyan short Fluorescent Sin (2011), directed by Amirah Tajdin, depicts a female impersonator seemingly stranded at a deserted Nairobi railway station. The film begins with the individual’s voice-over, but it turns into a soliloquized reflection on the difference between the person’s desired location and the existent situation. Hell or High Water (2016) is a short film produced by the Nigerian nongovernmental organization the Initiative for Equal Rights (TIERs) and directed by Oluseyi Asurf. This didactic film may be grouped with recent work from LGBTQ interest groups using screen media to disseminate affirmative narratives about nonnormative sexual identities and practices. Stories of Our Lives (2014), directed by the Kenyan filmmaker Jim Chuchu, is a collection of short films with high production value that are based on narratives selected from an anthology of autobiographical narratives, The Stories of Our Lives, collected and edited by a group of Kenyan activists called the Nest Collective. The short films clearly aim to educate an African public while presenting a nuanced range of experiences—from sexual pleasure to homophobic violence to self-discovery. The Nest Collective anthology and film may indicate directions for future developments in African-generated LGBTQ representations.

Directors of African descent living in Europe and North America have had the freedom to produce nuanced and experimental films. Adaora Nwandu’s 2006 film Rag Tag, produced in the United Kingdom and set in Britain and Nigeria, can explore homosexuality and allow declarations of same-sex love and affection because it was produced outside Nigeria. Significantly, the film contrasts two generations’ stories of same-sex love in its two locations. It thus draws attention to the different expressions and elaborations of same-sex love and partnerships the two locations permit. Akosua Adoma Owusu, a Ghanaian American director, has produced two short films: Reluctantly Queer (2016) and On Monday of Last Week (2017). The latter is based on an eponymous short story by the Nigerian writer Chimamanda Ngozi Adichie.

Like their documentary counterparts, South African feature films that spotlight LGBTQ lives are inextricably connected to the country’s history of colonialism and apartheid, to post-apartheid life, and, more recently, to the supposed incompatibility of homosexuality with African cultural values. Botha has published significant studies in which he catalogs the production history of South African LGBTQ representations. He names two films from 1988 as the earliest cinematic representations: Cedric Sundstrom’s thriller-horror flick The Shadowed Mind and Helena Nogueira’s Quest for Love (Botha 2003, 2014). While the former locates same-sex desire within an institution for patients with sexual dysfunctions, the latter portrays lesbian lives in the context of racial apartheid. Twenty-first-century films are collaborative international productions that would qualify as part of a globally circulating queer cinema. Films such as Proteus (2003) and Skoonheid (2011) belong in that category. While both scrutinize the intersections of racial and sexual politics in South Africa, their production value, film aesthetics, and use of recognizable coming-out templates lend the films a familiarity that facilitates an outercontinental circulation.

Proteus, directed by Greyson and Lewis, is the better known of the pair and has been much studied. It explores same-sex love between a white inmate and a coloured inmate in an eighteenth-century prison on the infamous Robben Island. The extensive use of anachronisms sutures multiple layers of the South African and European histories of sexual and racial discrimination to generate a significant contemporary timbre. Skoonheid refracts attitudes toward South Africa’s sexual minorities through the eyes of a racist and “homophobic” Afrikaner; François is married to a woman, enjoys sex with white men, but vehemently rejects the public emergence of multiple nonnormative sexual identities after apartheid. The film addresses schisms within South Africa’s LGBTQ communities, and it does not shy away from the subject of male-male sexual violence. Catherine Stewart’s 2015 film While You Weren’t Looking goes much further than Skoonheid in its representation of new and persisting formations of racial and class inequalities beyond apartheid. The film deserves special attention for its portrayal of sexual violence against lesbians in South African townships. While parts of the plot may feel rushed or didactic, the film imparts an earnest preoccupation with an ongoing struggle for safer environments for LGBTQ individuals.

Some feature films are either formal adaptations or are inspired by or derived from novels and life writing. Adaptations constitute an important interface between cinematic and literary representations of African sexual cultures. Though currently understudied, this interface records tensions that attend the retelling of existing narratives and the transposition of representations from one medium into another. The varying degrees of fidelity to the source material deserve further study as signs of complex narrative circulations. Disgrace (2008) is an Australian production of J. M. Coetzee’s novel, but the film entirely expunges the lesbian elements of the novel that impart greater depth to the novel’s complicated exploration of sexuality. An amplification of the novel’s lesbian component in the film could have reinforced this filmic adaptation. The World Unseen (2007) was adapted and directed by Shamim Sarif, the author of the eponymous novel. Although the film remains firmly tethered to the novel, the elimination of a crucial role in the novel—that of the disabled sister-in-law—lends the two lead actors in the film greater emotional weight. Finally, Khalo Matabane’s The Number (2017) draws on Jonny Steinberg’s ethnography of a famous prison gang, The Number: One Man’s Search for Identity in the Cape Underworld and Prison Gangs (2005). While not primarily about same-sex desire, the film thematizes the subject of prison homosexuality, a topic that features prominently in African prison narratives. A subplot about coercive male-male sex in prison involves a new young inmate who is branded a “wife” and later raped by a prison gang leader early in the film. While the rape primarily focalizes the gang leader’s moral transformation, the inclusion of a bathroom scene in which the raped man sits under a cascading shower resonates powerfully, in this male-dominated film, as a symbol of the silence surrounding the experience of rape victims in prison.

In 2015 Netflix produced a cinematic adaptation of Beasts of No Nation, a 2005 novel by the Nigerian author Uzodinma Iweala. As a major international production directed by the American filmmaker Cary Fukunaga but featuring well-known and unknown African actors, the film exemplifies the difficulties of stringently circumscribing what constitutes African representations and of separating same-sex sexuality from the new sexual discourses that proliferate in proximity to public debates on same-sex sexuality. Iweala’s novel includes a scene in which a rebel army commander rapes a child soldier; the film hides the details of the sexual scene from the camera’s gaze but depicts its lasting impact on young boys. While this is, arguably, an American adaptation of an African novel, it flirts with discourses constructing homosexuals as pedophiles or strategically linking homosexuality to pedophilia. The latter is certainly the case in Kunle Afolayan’s 2014 film October 1, in which a serial rapist’s predilections are attributed to his childhood sexual abuse by a Catholic priest.
While hardly original, the plot, through its reliance on pedophilia, lends itself to ready association with fears of child molestation that began circulating after the introduction of politically motivated homophobic discourses in Nigeria.

Cinematic representations have become an interface for debates about emerging sexual identities in African countries. In all, these films exhibit generic themes and continuities.
Feature film productions exhibit preoccupations with sexual taxonomies, while documentary films largely work with the LGBTQ initialism. In the face of repeated repudiations of such sexual identities as being un-African, documentary films readily deploy LGBTQ terms to articulate the belonging of gay, lesbian, bisexual, transgender, and queer Africans even if they also document regional taxonomies in African languages.
Despite the focus on violence and legal repression in documentaries, the example of South Africa suggests there will be future productions of more diversified documentary representations in other African countries once those countries relax their laws against same-sex sexuality. While Nollywood productions are incredibly melodramatic, factoring in the conventions of melodrama and the restrictions of censors on what the films can and cannot represent lends depth to the tensions in the films. Feature films are contextualizing the textures of LGBTQ experiences while paying attention to the regional histories that shape them. A comparative analysis of South African films such as Proteus and Skoonheid to films such as Nairobi Half Life and Confusion Na Wa, which are not primarily about homosexuality, reveals a shared investment in the discursive constructions of sexuality, their social legitimations or contestations, and the consequences thereof in emerging African cinema. Whether overly melodramatic, sloppily rendered, or coolly understated, these films offer ever more complex and diverse representations of African LGBTQ lives. Increasingly, the films explore the forms of intimacies individuals share under whichever conditions they may live. Overall, this brief survey suggests that filmmakers are crosshatching portrayals of same-sex sexualities with attention to various forms of social inequality.

The growth of African queer film festivals can be taken as a measure of the expanding interest in cinematic representations of same-sex sexuality and an increasing cultural activism and assertiveness. Festivals in South Africa, Uganda (Queer Kampala International Film Festival), Kenya (OUT Film Festival), and Zimbabwe (Rainbow 263 Film Festival) underscore the growing significance of cinema as a tool of cultural mediation for African LGBTQ communities. The website of the Queer Kampala festival (2018) explains the importance of screen media: “Together, we can end victimization of the LGBTQ community using social justice film-making, a tested and proven effective tool in changing hearts, minds, and laws!!” This assertion is best taken as a rallying cry that predicts how cinematic representations can eventually reflect the breadth of African conversations on nonnormative sexualities. Such a future will arrive when African sponsors from within individual countries underwrite the costs of these festivals.

SEE ALSO Cinema, African (Francophone); Literature, African (Anglophone); Literature, African (Francophone)

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Matebeni, Zethu, and Thabo Msibi. “Vocabularies of the Nonnormative.” Agenda:

Nichols, James Michael. “This Powerful Film Explores the Dangers of Being Queer in Uganda.” Huffington Post, 16 May 2016. https://www.huffingtonpost.com/entry/uganda-outed-the-painful_us_5733d042e4b08f96c1823b6c

FILMOGRAPHY
Afolayan, Kunle, dir. October 1. 2014. Film.

Asurf, Oluseyi, dir. Hell or High Water. 2016. Film short.

Fukunaga, Cary, dir. Beasts of No Nation. 2015. Film.

Gyang, Kenneth, dir. Confusion Na Wa. 2013. Film.

Hermanus, Oliver, dir. Skoonheid [Beauty]. 2011. Film.

In the conservative social climate of the African continent, even movies depicting nudity or sex scenes between heterosexual characters can be subject to censorship or public disapproval, much less films dealing with taboo topics such as same-sex sexuality. Only a handful of films in French-speaking Africa south of the Sahara have dared broach the subject: Dakan (1997; Guinea), Woubi chéri (1998; Côte d’Ivoire), Karmen Geï (2001; Senegal), Sortir du nkuta (2009; Cameroon), and Born This Way (2013; Cameroon). Because of the lack of support for such films in Africa, these films are directed and funded by foreign countries and citizens who are interested in investigating African sexual identities which, it can be stated, is both a taboo and an exotic experimentation.

In ways both similar and varied, these films highlight the challenges of being LGBT in francophone Africa. In several countries, nonnormative sexualities are perceived as a social abomination that is a Western import. Being gay, lesbian, transgender, or bisexual is not considered to be part of an African identity, and an often-repressive legal system supports the perspective that LGBT individuals should be treated as criminals and outcasts. This entry looks specifically at Dakan, a fictional story of two gay Africans, and the documentaries Woubi chéri and Sortir du nkuta to explore these themes further.

Dakan (1997)

Dakan (Destiny) was the first feature film to focus on homosexuality in Africa south of the Sahara when it was released in 1997. It was directed by Mohamed Camara (1959–), a French Guinean whose productions often address social taboos. After Denko (1992), which discusses incest, and Minka (1994), about child abuse and suicide, he directed Dakan not necessarily because he views himself as an LGBT activist but in order to describe human emotions and sensibilities. The funding for Dakan was cut by the Guinean government when officials realized it was about homosexuality, and people violently protested when it was being shot (Barlet 2012). Dakan is a drama that chronicles a forbidden love between Manga and Sory, two young male students whose relationship starts in high school. The two boys are caught between two worlds: “tradition” and “modernity,” African identity and Western influence. Sory belongs to a wealthy (or at least comfortable) family, with a father always dressed in suits and who speaks only French. Manga comes from a modest background, with a single mother who often wears traditional African clothing.

When Sory reveals to his father that he is in love with Manga, the father is in total shock. He reminds Sory about the company and his social reputation that will be ruined forever, as well as the fact that his son will be treated like a criminal. As for Manga's mother, she is not any less devastated when her son asks if there is anything wrong with falling in love with a boy: "It never happens. Since time began, it's never happened." When Manga emphatically asks why, his mother literally screams, “Boys don't do that! That's all there is to it!”

In a context in which homosexuality is not accepted, the two lovers are forced to part ways from each other through the influence of both parents. Sory has to work for his father's fishing company, and Manga is sent to the bush to be “cured” of his unwanted desires. When Manga returns to the city and looks after his sick mother, now in a wheelchair, he falls in love with a young lady, Oumou, who is also caring for her mother. However, Manga does not have any erotic feelings toward her at all and continues to think about his lost male lover, Sory. He eventually finds Sory, who has deserted the family company and is established in the village with a wife and a child. The film ends with the two entering a vehicle and leaving the village. So, for both parents who had placed hope in and put so much pressure on their children in order to prevent a nonnormative relationship, the identity developed by the boys becomes a real social and emotional disaster. This family shame, central to much of African queer studies scholarship (Halperin and Traub 2009), is clearly an important trope in the representation of homosexual identity in the film.

Such shamefulness is also depicted through the choice of space used to experience gay sexuality. In Dakan, homosexual relations unfold in the dark. Camara's film, nevertheless, discreetly suggests that homosexuality is a common practice in this African society. Thus, if Manga and Sory are the only homosexual couple in the film, the mise-en-scène implies that other young men are tempted by such sexuality. In fact, Sory appears to be the star that attracts a rather considerable number of young men. At school, while Manga awaits his friend, the latter engages in a conversation with a young boy who, according to Manga, enjoys Sory's favorable attention. Furthermore, when Sory leaves to meet with his wife, a young boy waits for him at the staircase and tendentiously signals to him by winking. At a bar, while Sory awaits Manga, another young man keeps him company. They are very close to each other, and the mise-en-scène brings into action the young man’s concupiscent gaze.

Clearly, Dakan establishes the germination of homosexuality as natural, if not inevitable. Moreover, the title of the film, which translates as “destiny,” implies that, despite Sory's marriage and Manga's promising relationship with Oumou, the two men are inevitably attracted to each other. The director also implies the inevitability of maternal love. The filmmaker makes the mother a victim who is defeated and resigned forever to her fate. However, she offers to her son the same bracelet that she had previously offered to Oumou, asking him to give it to Sory. It is engraved with the words "take care of my son." Thus, homosexuality becomes established, or at least accepted.

Woubi chéri (1998)

In Woubi chéri, sexual identities are much more open and fully assumed. This documentary was directed by Philip Brooks (1953–2003; Australian) and Laurent Bocahut (1964–; French), who decided to investigate the subject of homosexuality in Africa. The documentary follows a cast of homosexuals (woubis and yossis) and travestis, but notably Barbara, a well-known travesti who is a central figure in LGBT movements in Côte d'Ivoire. Barbara is the president of the Ivory Coast Transvestites Association.

Woubi chéri is probably the most famous and also the earliest documentary on LGBT rights in francophone Africa. It shows how “gay life” in Côte d'Ivoire—and specifically in Abidjan, the nation’s largest city—is perceived in the popular imagination. It opens by discussing the issue of hiding and compares woubis to bats (chauve-souris). Like bats, woubis live in hiding but always find a way to connect with one another and, eventually, take over an entire tree. The implication here is that of loneliness that gives space to a new solidarity of shared experience in a safe place.

In discussing this film, to use the term gay would not be very useful, because sexual minorities have a specific sociolect: woubis (passive male partners; men who are the “wives”; often transvestites); yossis (active male partners who sleep with woubis; sometimes bisexuals); and toussous bakaris (lesbians). According to Barbara, woubis are effeminate boys, sometimes transvestites, who play the roles of “women.” The yossis are the “husbands” and can be married to women. In the film, Vincent is a woubi and a migrant from Burkina Faso who is adopted by Bibiche after his own mother dies. Bibiche is a travesti (a transvestite who is an effeminate, homosexual man) working as a prostitute with male customers. Jean-Jacques is a yossi who has an illuminating conversation with his lover, Laurent, about sexual identities and the shame he would bring on his family if he took Laurent back to his village. Jean-Jacques knows his relationship must remain hidden, although Laurent wishes he could go to his lover’s village and wear a wedding ring. Yet, Laurent also understands Jean-Jacques’s need to have a wife and children and says about JeanJacques, his yossi, that “he goes out with women because he needs to have a family for the future. And maybe, I’ll be able to live a family life through him.”

KARMEN GEÜ (2001; JOSEPH GAÏ RAMAKA)

Karmen Geï (2001) retells and reinvents the story of Carmen, the charismatic “bohemian” central figure made famous by the dassic opera by Georges Bizet (1838–1875), by transforming Carmen into Karmen, a bisexual Senegalese woman in modern-day Dakar. With a generous budget supported by the governments of France and Quebec, and with higher production values than most African films of the period, Karmen Geï is the first feature film of Senegalese filmmaker Joseph Gaï Ramaka (1952–). Prior to Karmen Geï, Ramaka had made several documentaries, in addition to promoting Senegalese cinema through his distribution company, Les ateliers de l’Arche, which he founded in 1997 in Dakar. In reinventing Karmen as a bisexual free woman, Ramaka intended Karmen Geï to question the notion of freedom and explore the concepts of love, morality, and sexuality.

In Ramaka’s retelling, Karmen (played by Djeînaba Diop Gaï) seduces authority figures both as a celebration of her sexual freedom and as a tool for subverting established social and political structures. The only one of her conquests to actually move her heart is Angélique (played by Stephanie Biddle), a warden at the female prison where Karmen is an inmate at the beginning of the film. Despite having used Angélique to effect her escape from the prison, Karmen continues to pine for her and grieve over Angélique’s subsequent suicide. Ultimately, the movie ends tragically when Karmen is murdered by a former lover, Lamine Diop (played by Magaye Niang).

Throughout the film, Karmen uses her sexual power to overcome external obstacles, as she refuses to conform herself to the rules imposed by society. With her lesbian sexual affair with Angélique, she affirms her critiques against the patriarchal system that has repressed women’s freedom in Senegal. Karmen uses the power of the erotic as a motivational and creative force to dismantle the structures of power that suppress her body. Nevertheless, she refuses to lose herself, either in the sad love of Angélique or in the possessive love of the police officer Lamine.

Categorized as a musical, the film replaced Bizet’s operatic score with jazz, rhythmic African percussion, pop music, and rap, featuring the penetrating voice of the famous Senegalese singer Yandé Codou Sène (1932–2010) and the melodious rhythms of the American jazz saxophonist David Murray (1955–). In a 2011 interview with the author, Ramaka spoke of being influenced by previous versions of Carmen, especially those by Bizet, Otto Preminger (1905–1986), and Peter Brook (1925–). Ramaka referred to these previous adaptations in constructing his story, incorporating into his film elements from other media, including music and dance. These connections led to a confrontation among and the superposition of different languages, cultures, and histories. The production promoted an artistic syncretism, building bridges between different artistic practices and cultural traditions. The film was shot in Dakar, developed in France, and post-produced in Canada, and it features both professional and nonprofessional actors of various nationalities. Considering these characteristics, many scholars have underlined the deeply transnational dimension of Ramaka’s project. Another salient feature of Karmen Geï is the way Ramaka depicts sexuality. The movie is one of the first African films to show an explicit erotic sex scene between two women. By so doing, Ramaka challenged the traditional representation of African women and African women's sexuality.

Upon release, Karmen Geï received mixed reviews. In Senegal, it generated a storm of controversy after religious activists prevented the film’s premiere, scheduled for June 2001, from going ahead. Ramaka was denounced for having used a religious song written by Cheikh Ahmadou Bamba (1853–1927), founder of the influential Mouride brotherhood, during the funeral scene of Angélique. In September 2001 Karmen Geï was banned in Senegal. Despite the film’s lack of popularity in Senegal, in the West it generated an overwhelming response. It was screened at many film festivals, including at Cannes, and garnered much attention as well as accolades.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Aminata Cécile Mbaye

Assistant Professor, Department of Romance Literatures and Comparative Studies
University of Bayreuth, Germany

As in Dakan, homosexuality is an essentially urban practice in Woubi chéri. Protagonists are followed and described in their various networks: at work, in the streets, at the market, in their respective families, and so on. Homosexuality in Abidjan is an exceptionally private circle, with specific codes. More importantly, all the protagonists interviewed claim to be part of what may be called a global gay network that goes beyond urban or national boundaries. Ferdinand puts it perfectly well: “Woubis have great radar. They know exactly where to find each other. Whether in Europe, America … or here in Adjamé [a district in Abidjan]. Ghettos or not, woubis always manage to have their hideouts.” It must be noted that intolerance for alternative sexualities causes LGBT characters to experience hostility and solitude as they often do not dare come out. Identifying the location of various partners is the result of a life “in hiding” full of discrimination and loneliness. For example, Avelido, Laurent’s yossi, cannot find a job. Overall, Woubi chéri is distinct in its openness. LGBT identities are fully articulated, without any remorse, fear, or disguise. The French and Australian directors, whose work and trajectories focus on marginality in culture, society, and politics, use this documentary to explore one of the last taboos in African sexuality.

Common Themes between Dakan and Woubi chéri

Dakan and Woubi chéri reproduce gender roles and identities in interesting and paradoxical ways. Both films feature biologically male characters who identify and perform as feminine. Manga, for example, laments God’s “unfairness” that he is unable to bear a child for his lover, who suggests they can adopt a child. Laurent, a pastry shop owner, comfortably cooks for his family when asked to, a role traditionally assigned to women. Thus, the dissident and subversive sexual identities systematically reproduce the norms and gender categories of the society they claim to subvert.

Finally, both films set LGBT identities and desires in divided spaces and discursive configurations: urban versus rural, Western versus African, light versus darkness, reason versus madness, local versus global. Clearly, homosexuality is an urban “madness” that parents try to cure in the village. Although Sory hopes that his village would be a sanctuary that could save them from the intolerable social aggression in the city, it is in a rural bush that Manga is sent to be “cured” from his homosexual “disease.”

Sortir du nkuta (2009)

The city as the preferred space for homosexual desires is also featured in Sortir du nkuta (2009), a documentary by another French director, Céline Metzger. After working for television, she went to Afghanistan where she filmed Sous la loi des Talibans (2001) before starting Sortir du nkuta; both first aired on French television. In Cameroon pidgin English, nkuta is a rough bag used to transport various agricultural products such as coffee or yams. Figuratively, sortir du nkuta means “coming out.” Very early in the film, Metzger notes that her camera and gear were taken from her by Cameroonian police, and she was asked to pay 1,500 euros (which she did) in order to get them back. At that time, she was with two same-sex–desiring women and was worried that if she did not pay that they would have been taken into custody. Metzger claims that charges of homosexuality are also used to blackmail individuals just as much as they are used by the tabloid press to take down politicians (Tcheuyap 2014). Like Woubi chéri, this documentary can be labeled as an advocacy film. It features Alice Nkom, a vocal and wellknown lawyer who is challenging the legality of antigay legislation and defending clients continually harassed because of their sexual identity.

The film follows Nkom as she tries to defend several men being held awaiting trial on charges of homosexuality. One key moment in the documentary is a heated exchange with a school administrator who expelled several female students from school for reported “lesbianism.” Interestingly, the school administrator admits to Nkom on camera that no adults actually witnessed the girls engaging in sexual acts. The lawyer challenges the administrator for his assertions, threatening legal action against the school on the grounds that the girls cannot be charged with homosexuality if no one witnessed homosexual behavior.

The documentary follows several brave same-sex-desiring men and women. One man interviewed who had been imprisoned for homosexuality notes the atrocities that he endured while in prison, including having his food drugged and later finding himself in another man's bed, sexually abused. There is also a man who had been imprisoned under charges of homosexuality who later moved in with his male partner and began working for an LGBT rights group in Cameroon. The film follows the lives of same-sex-desiring women as well, including a “lesbian” who runs her own bar and is involved in HIV-prevention work and a same-sex-desiring female couple. The mother of one half of this same-sex couple is also interviewed, although she says that she does not want to talk about homosexuality. She claims that it goes against the Bible but that she loves her daughter so she will continue to maintain a relationship with her. Sortir du nkuta positions itself in the same legal and social discourse with Woubi chéri. Clearly, LGBT identities remain threatened in all these narratives.

Challenged and Resisted Locally, Acclaimed and Accepted Abroad

As can be seen above, Dakan, Woubi chéri, and Sortir du nkuta illustrate in many respects the challenges of LGBT identities in francophone Africa, which are equally highlighted in Karmen Geï and Born This Way. These challenges are rooted in political and social as well as religious structures. In the case of Karmen Geï, for example, after its release, the film was not banned by Senegalese authorities but by a Mouride spiritual leader. The reason was that Joseph Gaï Ramaka (1952–), the film’s director, had used the sacred lyrics and music of Cheikh Ahmadou Bamba (1853–1927), the founder of the Mouride brotherhood, in the section of the film showing the death of a lesbian prison warden. Ramaka eventually deleted some other “problematic scenes” before the release of the version that was acclaimed at many Western film festivals. He was also booed when the film was screened at the 2002 edition of the Écran Noirs film festival in Yaoundé, Cameroon. All that further illustrates what is widely known: LGBT identities, and any representation of them, are not exactly a cultural success on the continent, although they receive more favorable receptions abroad. While African spectatorship and nations are often extremely hostile, almost all these films about LGBT identities have won awards at various festivals in the West. In 2010 alone, Sortir du nkuta won awards at three film festivals in France: the Festival International du Film Lesbien et Féministe de Paris, the Festival de Films LGBT de Toulouse, and the Escales Documentaires festival (La Rochelle). After its release in 2013, Born This Way won at least eight awards. Hostile manifestations during the shooting of Dakan, the verbal attacks against Ramaka, and the social and political censorship of Karmen
Geï provide ample evidence that LGBT films are far from being a tolerated, let alone accepted, cultural production on the continent.

Such “cultural resistance” is rooted in specific perceptions of sexuality, cinema, and society, which do not always meet those of “Western” societies. As Thérèse Migraine-George once suggested, “Homosexuality inscribes itself in the lives of people who inherit their traditional socio-cultural heritage in a globalizing world. In other words ... same-sex feelings, desires and experiences are intricately part of their everyday lives at the junction of local and global structures and ideologies” (2003, 46). While it is obvious that the “local” is rooted in repression and intolerance, the “global” seems to be an important force in the expression of nonnormative sexual identities in African urban societies. The “globalness” of the representation of LGBT identities in francophone Africa also stems from the fact that several of the films have been widely acclaimed and aggressively marketed abroad not often for their aesthetic features but because they are advocacy narratives: they are used by human rights organizations and LGBT lobbying groups to illustrate the many discriminations against sexual minorities. If one adds to all that the fact that most of these narratives were either directed by foreign nationals (Woubi chéri, Born This Way, Sortir du nkuta) or coproduced by a foreign country Dakan (France and Guinea), it becomes clear that the debate on the “Africanness” of nonnormative sexualities is not very relevant, as Africa is part of a global system with shifting, challenging, and, often, controversial values.

SEE ALSO Cinema, African (Anglophone); Literature, African (Anglophone); Literature, African (Francophone)

BIBLIOGRAPHY

FILMOGRAPHY

Camara, Mohamed, dir. Dakan. Film Du 20ème Créations Cinématographiques, 1997. Film.

Cinema, Latin American (Early Twentieth Century)

CHARLES ST-GEORGES
Assistant Professor of Spanish Denison University, Granville, OH

The influence of the Latin American film industry and film spectatorship on identity formation through the mid-twentieth century.

As posited by such film scholars as Jean-Louis Comolli, the history of cinema has been in large part the history of the twentieth century. This is particularly true in Latin America, where it has been associated with national projects of modernization following the establishment of independent republics throughout the nineteenth century. Due to the high costs of producing and distributing films, especially in the first half of the twentieth century, the trajectory of cinema in Latin America has been significantly influenced by shifting economic dynamics between the region’s larger nations and the increasingly dominant US film industry. While Paulo Antonio Paranaguá and others have described the region’s role during the early period of cinema as primarily limited to spectatorship of “imported production” (Paranaguá 2003, 33; translated by Charles St-Georges), by the mid-twentieth century, countries such as Mexico, Argentina, and Brazil had become influential producers of cinema in their own right, eventually accounting “for more than 80 percent of the region’s narrative film production” (Schroeder Rodríguez 2016, 2). Just as (as John D’Emilio has commented) the emergence of new sexual identities was a consequence of the urbanization and reorganization of space and interpersonal relationships under postindustrial capitalism in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, increased access to cinema and the development of national, regional, and international film industries played important roles in regulating and negotiating sexuality in Latin America.

Cinematic projection first arrived in Latin America in 1896 via Europe with Auguste Lumière’s visit to Mexico, where then-president Porfirio Díaz (in office 1877–1880 and 1884–1911) was eager to incorporate the new technology into his vision for national modernization. Films from primarily France and secondarily Italy dominated cinema houses in Latin America until World War I (1914–1918). The war interrupted those nations’ ability to make and export movies, and films from the United States quickly filled the commercial void. When describing this early period in Chile, Wolfgang Bongers, María José Torrealba, and Ximena Vergara note that cinema arrived “practically hand-in-hand with censorship,” as cinematic representations of modernity from other cultures and societies included elements that were deemed too controversial for local audiences at the time, particularly where portrayals of the liberated female body were concerned (2011, 57; translated by Charles St-Georges). Images of women driving cars, playing tennis, smoking, and dancing in flapper dresses provoked moral panic among conservative spectators, as well as from social and religious organizations. In this regard, cinema was feared as a foreign source of social contamination because it allowed spectators to imagine other ways of being in the world in terms of gender roles. In addition, its arrival sparked the creation of a new, democratizing mass culture that no longer distinguished between high and low art, causing some within the wealthy elite to describe it as a “prostituted” form of art (Bongers et al. 2011, 23; translated by Charles St-Georges).

It was precisely because of cinema's wide appeal, however, that the political class soon took notice of this new medium's potential for didactic and even propagandistic uses, especially when the invention of films with sound made it possible to convey messages to a general public that was, by 1920 in the case of Chile, still 50 percent illiterate (Bongers et al. 2011).

The rise of cinema in Latin America runs parallel to the rise of consumerism and its role in defining an incipient urban middle class, wherein demographic groups such as immigrants, the working class, and women could negotiate new identities through recently gained access to the burgeoning consumerist economy. Beatriz Sarlo defines the cultural spirit of this era in Argentina as “a desire for the city” due to the shared, rapidly expanding urban space within which consumer-driven capitalism and cinema as a consumer practice converged (1993, 165). Maite Conde observes that the same spirit existed in historically agrarian, colonial Brazil, and that in Rio de Janeiro, women were “crucial in the development of a consumer identity” and were “encouraged to consume [cinematic] images and indulge in the freedoms of pleasure, desire, and visuality.” They constituted “a majority of filmgoers at the start of the twentieth century” to the point that “possibilities for female spectatorship were central to the medium's success” (2012, 15–16). It is no coincidence that many of the themes mentioned in this and the previous paragraph—prostitution, women, and cinema for purposes of national pedagogy—all come together to form a recurring thematic axis within Latin America's first cinematic movements.

Gender and Sexuality in Early Latin American Cinema

By 1926, Argentina, whose culture is renowned as the most cinema-going among Latin American societies, "was the second largest US market outside Europe" and the biggest player among Latin American countries in terms of producing cinema (King 2000, 11). The self-taught director José Agustín “El Negro” Ferreyra (1889–1943) notably directed several films about prostitutes with hearts of gold, some starring famed actress of Argentine and Mexican cinema Libertad Lamarque (1908–2000). As John King notes, “Buenos Aires was a notorious centre of prostitution in the early part of the twentieth century, and it was clearly geared to the latest technology. Argentine cinema at the time rose-tinted the sordid reality” (2000, 13). Ferreyra’s films were part of a general narrative formula, prevalent throughout Latin America at the time, that explored “sexual problems faced by defenseless women in a
There were, however, important exceptions to this generally reactionary take on gender and sexuality. Aside from Soviet filmmaker Sergei Eisenstein's unfinished avant-garde film ¡Que viva México! (1931), Brazilian director Mário Peixoto's Limite (1929) is “the only Latin American silent film that radically critiques what Eisenstein called patriarchal exploitation, in this case through oblique representation of three pillars of patriarchal liberalism: marriage, capitalism, and heteronormativity,” wherein a woman is portrayed as shackled in handcuffs by marriage and “the homoerotic double entendres of” an encounter between two men “crystallize into an image of Man 1 as imprisoned by his acceptance of society’s heteronormativity” (Schroeder Rodríguez 2016, 62–63). In the same period, the stereotyped, effeminate Pocholo character began to appear on Argentine screens for mainstream audiences as comic relief, a subject of scorn and mockery. Despite never being named or legitimated as a man who desires other men, Pocholo's mere appearance constituted a public acknowledgment of the existence of such men. In Los tres berretines (1933; The three amateurs), he is portrayed as an avid cinephile who finds solidarity with middle-class housewives in a movie theater, where they can escape patriarchal impositions and imagine other worlds (Modarelli 2008). Recent scholarship has underscored the movie theater as a potentially queer space in this regard, in an era where films both reinscribed and subverted traditional notions of gender and sexuality.

Asserting and Contesting Gender in the Golden Age

This dual dynamic continued to present itself in Mexican cinema after Mexico replaced Argentina as Latin America's primary film producer in the early 1940s. In an attempt to undo some of the diplomatic damage caused by a series of violent and unpopular military and economic interventions in Central America and the Caribbean, US president Franklin D. Roosevelt (1882–1945) announced the Good Neighbor Policy in 1933. “Moving pictures were part of the Roosevelt government’s successful ... economic penetration of Latin America.... They did excellent business—and could form consumer tastes,” as well as advance a cultural and diplomatic agenda of goodwill and hemispheric cooperation (King 2000, 32). This initiative took on new urgency when the United States entered World War II at the end of 1941 and needed political and material support from Latin America to fuel its new military campaigns. Mexico was rewarded for its cooperation and was granted funding and access to celluloid and other source materials to stimulate its national film industry. By comparison, Argentina was denied access to film stock due to its stubborn policy of neutrality, thus causing a decline in national cinema production. Mexican filmmakers were eager to contest their country’s representation in Hollywood films up to that point, and Mexican politicians were keen to prescribe a unifying national identity through film in the aftermath of the highly divisive Mexican Revolution (1910–1920). According to Carlos Monsiváis (1976), Mexican audiences went to the movies during the Golden Age to learn how to be Mexican.

© AF ARCHIVE/ALAMY

Mexican Actress María Félix, 1955. Following the end of the Mexican Revolution in 1920, Mexican filmmaking validated the projection of Mexico as a virile nation by focusing on heteromasculine and hyperfeminine characters. Félix most famously embodied the latter in her various roles.

This new national identity was decidedly hetero-masculine, as heroes of the revolution such as Pancho Villa (1878–1923) were portrayed as unflinchingly macho. “The push to claim Mexico as a virile nation gained momentum in the 1920s as a strategy to counteract the alleged effeminacy of the Contemporáneos group, avant-garde poets, artists, and intellectuals, many of whom held jobs in the civil service and some of whom were homosexual” (Mora 2006, 2). In the buddy movies of stars like Germán Valdés (1915–1973; known as “Tin Tan”) and Pedro Infante (1917–1957), male friendships were triangulated through a single female love interest, thus validating heteromasculinity as inwardly competitive and outwardly objectifying, while simultaneously acknowledging the dynamics of intimacy in homosocial relationships. Several queer readings of these classics—widely consumed throughout Latin America—have been published in recent scholarship, such as Sergio de la Mora’s Cinemachismo (2006).

As for the representation of women, María Félix (1914–2002) most famously embodied hyperfemininity in her various roles. Mexican Golden Age cinema continued to reinscribe the virgin/whore dichotomy by setting female characters in brothels and dance halls (a genre known as cabareteras), in many cases redeeming them, but ultimately punishing them. An important exception is Aventurera (1950, starring Cuban-born bombshell Ninón Sevilla [1929–2015]), in which the protagonist, after being duped into a life of prostitution, “exacts revenge on all of those who have hurt her” and becomes sexually and economically independent (Schroeder Rodríguez 2016, 120). Another classical figure is the actress Sara García (1895–1980), whose uniquely memorable roles as family matriarch sealed her status as the national grandmother of Mexico despite her same-sex relationship with her lifelong companion, Rosario González (Baeza Lope 2018). As affirmed by Andrés Lima-Hincapié and Debra A. Castillo, “with the always ambiguous (but denied) sexuality of the macho/machorra (tomboy) dominating commercial cinema, Latin American film history was always a bit queer” (2015, 3).

Pornographic Films and Cinema Houses

Cinema in the region has also always shared a history with pornography, as argued by Andrea Cuarterolo in a 2015 article, wherein she observes that the first Edison camera to arrive in Brazil in the 1890s was promptly put to pornographic use, and that the oldest erotic film still in archived existence, El satario, was most likely recorded in Argentina in 1907. The genre flourished early on in Cuba, where sexual tourism from the adjacent United States provided ample demand. By 1917, pornography was already being produced and screened at a national level on 16- and 35-millimeter film in Mexico, with portrayals of same-sex intimacy being recorded and consumed over the first half of the twentieth century (Salinas Hernández 2011). Such films were screened clandestinely at brothels, at certain Mexico City hotels, and at bookstores and cinema houses such as La Tajeta and Cinema Venecia. The intensely homosocial nature of these viewing spaces would often facilitate homoerotic encounters, a dynamic at work in cinema houses such as Santo Domingo’s Cine Lido, which was transformed in 1972 from a mainstream theater into a space in which explicitly pornographic films were screened and anonymous, sexually diverse cruising occurred. In cities throughout Latin America, certain movie theaters acquired similar dimensions in terms of creating a space that was publicly accessible, yet sufficiently private for the convergence of cinema consumption and community formation for traditionally marginalized sexualities.

Throughout the middle of the century, erotic subject matter would evolve within regional cinematic genres, such as the transformation of Brazil's chanchadas—burlesque musical comedies of the 1930s and 1940s— into pornochanchadas. These low-cost, commercially lucrative films saturated national cinema markets in the 1970s to fill the void created by the 1964–1985 military dictatorship, whose censorship office had kept left-leaning Brazilian filmmakers out of business. Pornochanchadas served as escape valves for a culture of heterosexist authoritarianism, where humorous sexual (mis)adventures were framed as frivolous transgressions on the path to a person’s eventual adherence to prescribed notions of marriage and family (Filho 1995). In 1950s Argentina, “the extremely successful light pornographic team of Armando Bo and his favorite actress Isabel Sarli—known as the most hygienic actress in cinema since she was always taking her clothes off for a bath—took advantage” (King 2000, 101) of favorable economic conditions in Paraguay for filming and producing their films.

In the international trajectory of Argentine director Emilio Vieyra (1920–2010), horror films slowly became sexploitation films, as did the work of the godfather of Brazilian horror, José Mojica Marins (1936--; known by his character name of Zé do Caixão, or “Coffin Joe”). Marins had several confrontations with the censorship office of the 1964–1985 military dictatorship, even in its penultimate year, when A quinta dimensão do sexo (The fifth dimension of sex) was censored for a homoerotic scene between two men (Barcinski and Finotti 1998). After the return to democracy in countries throughout the continent in the 1980s (but especially in Argentina, as noted by David William Foster [2003]), visibility for previously persecuted sexual minorities in both pornographic and mainstream cinema became more of a sociopolitical imperative. Conserving knowledge and documentation of films produced in Latin America in the early and mid-twentieth century—as well as the films themselves—has proven to be a challenging endeavor, as discussed by Javier Villa-Flores in his 2015 article on the fire that destroyed Mexico’s Cineteca Nacional in 1982. Similar national film archives can be found in places like Montevideo’s Cinemateca Uruguaya, Bogotá’s Cinemateca Distrital, and Lima’s Cinemateca Peruana. Despite the precarious nature of films from this period and the particular challenge they can pose in terms of the (in)visibility of sexual diversity, queer scholarship on early Latin American cinema is far from impossible, as evidenced by a growing body of research.

SEE ALSO Cabaret Theater in Latin America and the Caribbean; Cinema, Latin American (Late Twentieth and Twenty-First Centuries)

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Bongers, Wolfgang, María José Torrealba, and Ximena Vergara, eds. Archivos i letrados: Escritos sobre cine en Chile: 1908–1940 [Archives and the litterate: Writings on cinema in

Salinas Hernández, Héctor Miguel. “El porno gay hecho en México” [Gay porn made in

Cinema, Latin American (Late Twentieth and Twenty-First Centuries)

VINODH VENKATESH
Associate Professor, Foreign Languages and Literatures
Virginia Tech University, Blacksburg

Six films from the late twentieth century and twenty-first century that illustrate the trajectory of LGBTQ themes and characters in Latin American cinema.

The presence of LGBTQ characters and issues in Latin American cinema, as in the region’s literature, has been slow to take shape. Given, however, the strong connection between literary production and commercial cinema in Latin America, it comes as no surprise that some of the most watched and discussed films are adaptations of bestselling novels. Included in this category are works by canonical writers such as José Donoso (El lugar sin límites, Chile, 1966) and Manuel Puig (El beso de la mujer araña, Argentina, 1976); well-known authors such as Senel Paz (El lobo, el bosque y el hombre nuevo, adapted as Fresa y chocolate, Cuba, 1993) and Reinaldo Arenas (Antes que anochezca, Cuba, 1992); and even more contemporary novelists such as Jaime Bayly (No se lo digas a nadie, Peru, 1994; La mujer de mi hermano, Peru, 2002), and Fernando Vallejo (La virgen de los sicarios, Colombia, 1994). All these films have made important advances in the visibility of LGBTQ persons in cultural and political life, in addition to increasing the visibility of Latin American cinema to a global audience.

The majority of LGBTQ-related commercial films have unsurprisingly been produced in the three major markets—Argentina, Brazil, and Mexico—although critically important movies have also been produced in Colombia, Cuba, Peru, Venezuela, and Uruguay. That being said, however, there is also a rich tradition of grassroots (films that highlight important social issues aimed at a particular constituency, often made on a low budget and with amateur actors), shorts, documentaries, and pornography featuring LGBTQ characters and issues. Although production of commercial films was relatively sparse in the second half of the twentieth century—especially when compared to US and European cinema, though perhaps more prominent than South and East Asian cinemas—the first two decades of the twenty-first century have seen a tremendous rise in the production and circulation of LGBTQ films from all over Latin America, as noted by scholars such as Jorge Ruffinelli (2010). Several of these films have gone on to win important international prizes at the Sundance, Miami, and Berlin festivals, as well as Goya Awards (Spain’s main film awards).

The differences between twentieth- and twenty-first-century productions are remarkable.
Whereas twentieth-century films tended to focus solely on gay male characters, more recent cinema is opening up to lesbian, trans, bisexual, intersex, and queer issues. This may be the result of several factors, including the broader transnational nature of contemporary cinema and the influence of global LGBTQ movements and politics. Earlier films were set in recognizable urban cities, whereas new films tend to explore sex, sexuality, and gender across a wide gamut of lived space. Most importantly, the more recent cinema from Latin America demonstrates an awareness of global LGBTQ discussions and debates, such as trans rights and gay marriage, and actively inserts itself into these conversations. While this entry largely focuses on Spanish America, it bears noting that Brazilian cinema has been at the vanguard of sexual and gender pluralities, given a history of more relaxed moral censorship and the proliferation of pornochanchadas (explicit sexploitation films) in the 1970s and 1980s. Two Brazilian films released in 2014, Futuro Beach and Hoje eu quero voltar sozinho (The way he looks), won multiple awards and received rave reviews. An understanding of current trends requires an overview of the trajectory of films to date.

El lugar sin límites (Mexico; 1978)

Arturo Ripstein's El lugar sin límites (The place without limits) is considered one of the very first Latin American LGBTQ films. The film is based on the eponymous novel by the Chilean José Donoso, an important figure both in the Latin American literary boom of the 1960s and 1970s, composed of renowned authors such as Gabriel García Márquez, Mario Vargas Llosa, Julio Cortázar, and Carlos Fuentes, and in the post-boom that was spearheaded by writers such as Isabel Allende, Elena Poniatowska, Luisa Valenzuela, and Rosario Ferré. Unlike his contemporaries, however, Donoso's novel and its protagonist, La Manuela, explicitly address LGBTQ issues in Latin American culture. The universality of Donoso's text is evidenced in the fact that Ripstein's adaptation is produced and takes place in Mexico and not Santiago. The director is known for working closely with several authors of the boom in his films, although El lugar sin límites, his fifth film, is perhaps his best known.

The plot of the movie is divided into three parts that largely follow the novel. The story chronicles the slow fall of a fictional town, El Olivo, during a period of stark economic change. El Olivo, like many other towns all over Latin America, suffers from caciquismo, or being controlled by a local cacique (local landowning politico). This character, Don Alejo, controls the local politics and economy, slowly starving the town and its inhabitants while enriching his own pockets. A large part of the film is set in the local brothel and revolves around La Manuela — a loca, or trans character, who co-owns the locale —and the violent sexual relationship maintained with Pancho, the son of a local peon who returns to El Olivo after squandering an investment by Don Alejo. There are several other details that are pertinent to this triangle of characters: it is insinuated that Pancho is Don Alejo’s illegitimate son, and the local cacique owns almost every part of the town with the exception of the brothel. Part one details the return of Pancho, the introduction of the major characters and the relationships between them, and the presentation of issues such as homo and transphobia and sexual violence. In the middle section, the plot details La Manuela's past in El Olivo and the conception of her daughter, La Japonesita, with a prostitute (La Japonesa). In the final segment, the film reaches its climax as Pancho and La Manuela are embroiled in a game of seduction that ultimately leads to the latter’s murder at the hand of Pancho and his brother-in-law, Octavio.

Starring Roberto Cobo in what will be a signature role as La Manuela, El lugar sin límites is a foundational film that brings to light important issues, such as the violence facing the LGBTQ community in both Latin America and abroad. Ripstein ends the film with La Manuela's tragic death in a climactic scene that asks the audience to pause and reflect on the very real consequences of machismo and homophobia. The death goes unresolved, an open ending, thus inviting an ethical intervention on the part of the viewer. Perhaps most importantly, Ripstein’s El lugar sin límites portrays La Manuela as a complex character with a history, feelings, emotions, and depth, in a stark departure from the vacuous and frivolous representations of LGBTQ characters previously seen in commercial Latin American cinema. That being said, El lugar sin límites is not a true queer film but “a touchstone for later films, such as Doña Herlinda y su hijo and others that, in time, will follow” (Schuessler 2005, 140).

Doña Herlinda y su hijo (Mexico; 1985)

Directed by Jaime Humberto Hermosillo, Doña Herlinda y su hijo (Dona Herlinda and her son) is an essential film in the lineage of LGBTQ cinema in Latin America. A contemporary of Ripstein and others such as Jorge Fons, Hermosillo is best known as “the first Mexican director to not treat male homosexuality as a problem” (de la Mora 2006, 191). As is the case with many other films of the genre, Hermosillo bases the plot on an eponymous text—in this case, by Jorge López Páez. In certain regards, Doña Herlinda may be viewed as an evolution of the director’s exploration of homoeroticism in previous films, such as Matinée (1976) and Las apariencias engañan (1978; Looks can be deceiving). Though produced and filmed in 1985, it was not until 1987 that the film was first commercially shown in Mexico after having enjoyed a successful run abroad in international festivals in London, New York, and Paris.
Rodolfo (left) and Ramón in Doña Herlinda y Su Hijo (1985). This Mexican film by Jaime Humberto Hermosillo is an important film in that it normalized homoeroticism as a parallel to the heterosexual relationship by means of a triangle between the characters of Rodolfo, Ramón, and Rodolfo’s fiancée Olga.

The plot is based around four principal characters in Guadalajara, Mexico, a city known at the time for its provincialism and conservative social order. Interestingly, the director includes certain well-known persons of the local blossoming LGBTQ community in the film, as well as spaces such as Los Panchos, which is a principal gay bar in urban Guadalajara. Doña Herlinda, like later films, such as Contracorriente (2009) and No se lo digas a nadie (1998), involves a love triangle among two men and a woman. Rodolfo, an upper-class man, is to marry Olga, an educated member of the same class, who also has aspirations of being more than a housewife. Rodolfo’s physique and dress reminds the audience of Mexican actor, singer, and heartthrob Jorge Negrete (1911–1953). Rodolfo is also in a relationship with Ramón, a younger and poorer university student studying music. The majority of the film thus revolves around Rodolfo’s negotiation of both of these relationships, which change as the narrative progresses.

Hermosillo’s film adds layers of complexity to this simple triangle. It is insinuated, though never clearly stated, that Olga may be lesbian, as she starts dressing very much like a man, mirroring Ramón’s sartorial choices. It is also explicitly shown that Ramón is not the pasivo, or "bottom" (i.e., the penetrated partner in anal sex), that the first sequences of the film would have us believe. In the one sex scene between Ramón and Rodolfo, it is clear that Ramón is the activo, or "top." In other words, Hermosillo breaks with the traditional representations of activos and pasivos in Mexican culture, showing the top as being more effeminate and the bottom as resembling Negrete.

The triangle is supervised by the matronly figure of Rodolfo's mother, Doña Herlinda, who is seemingly impervious to the amorous relationship between her son and his friend Ramón. She treats Ramón with kindness, welcoming him into her house. She also arranges for Rodolfo’s marriage to Olga, as he is of marrying age. After their nuptials, Doña Herlinda decides to remodel her house to include an extension for the young family and a room for Ramón, suggesting that she is aware of the triangle and wishes to maintain it behind closed doors. It comes as no surprise, then, that the film is titled after the matron, as it is her implicit complicity that allows for Rodolfo and Ramón to maintain their love.

Doña Herlinda y su hijo is an important film in the genealogy of Latin American cinema because it distinctively outs LGBTQ bodies and relationships from the brothel and other sordid, dark spaces that served as the setting in such films as El lugar sin límites. In a visible way, the film normalizes homoeroticism as a parallel to the heterosexual relationship by means of the Ramón-Rodolfo-Olga triangle. It should be noted, however, that Doña Herlinda is not a particularly queer film, as Hermosillo hesitates in fully opening up the gay relationship and does not out Olga explicitly; the three characters are allowed, by Doña Herlinda, to coexist within the house she plans to renovate.

No se lo digas a nadie (Peru; 1998)

Francisco Lombardi’s No se lo digas a nadie (1998; Don't tell anyone) also involves a love triangle between two gay men and a girlfriend/wife. The film is an adaptation of a semiautobiographical novel published in 1994 by the Peruvian writer, journalist, and television personality Jaime Bayly. Presented as a sort of bildungsroman of the upper social class of Lima, Peru, the film narrates Joaquín Camino’s (Santiago Magill) sexual maturity, from his early signs of homoerotic curiosity while attending a summer camp, to his fleeing to Miami and freedom from the social rules of home, and finally to his return to the life his parents wanted for him as a newly graduated lawyer with a fiancée who also comes from money. Like Doña Herlinda y su hijo, Lombardi’s film deals explicitly with an upper social and economic echelon that has access to material wealth and international travel.

Joaquín, much to the chagrin of his macho father, does not enjoy alcohol, prostitutes, hunting, or boxing—all traits that seemingly define masculinity. As a teenager, he begins to date Alejandra but also maintains a sexual relationship with Gonzalo, another childhood friend who is also in a heterosexual relationship. When this situation sours, he escapes to Miami, leaving behind the social norms that punished him for not being straight. Important in this film is the use of the United States—and particularly Miami—as a symbolic space that is pro-LGBTQ lives and rights. This is also seen in later films, such as Gonzalo Justiniano’s Lokas (Chile, 2008; Krazies), where the United States is shown as a place of acceptance, freedom, and safety. This portrayal of queer lives, however, is also an idealistic one, given the long and turbulent histories of queer people of color in the United States. In Miami, Joaquín reconnects with Alejandra, precipitating his return to Lima and their subsequent nuptials. Joaquín, as Bayly has noted in interviews, is bisexual and not gay, which allows for him to genuinely marry his teenage sweetheart. The film, however, does not end with the protagonist returning to heteronormative acceptability; in the final scene, Gonzalo attends Joaquín’s graduation party and rekindles their relationship.

While the novel established Bayly's reputation as the enfant terrible of the Peruvian mass media, Lombardi’s film catapulted its gay theme into the mainstream's collective conversation. While Ripstein and Hermosillo made LGBTQ-inflected cinema that was marketed first to an international audience and then through a limited local release, Lombardi’s film galvanized, amid controversy, the Peruvian capital. While the film met resistance from the moral police and conservative quarters, it successfully created a public discussion on LGBTQ issues in a society where sexual difference is very much still taboo.

XXY (Argentina; 2007)

XXY is perhaps the most important Latin American queer film of the twenty-first century. While the title is a clear reference to Klinefelter syndrome (in which a person is born with two X and one Y chromosomes), Lucía Puenzo’s award-winning film is concerned with intersex and gay issues. Upon closer examination of the title credit, the audience will note that the title is XX and a broken X. Like No se lo digas a nadie, XXY is a coming-of-age story. It is also, furthermore, a coming-of-gender story for the protagonist, Alex, the fifteen-year-old intersexed child of Néstor and Suli Kraken, an Argentine couple who reside in a quiet fishing town on the Uruguayan coast. Néstor is a marine biologist who takes his family away from Buenos Aires to escape the judgment, gossip, and harassment that Alex would face growing up.

Like many LGBTQ films made in the twenty-first century, XXY takes place in the rural countryside away from the city, where the presence of the aquatic takes center stage in the visual and sensory imagery of the film. In the case of XXY, Puenzo foregrounds the sea as a reference for the image; its sounds and textures provoke a multisensorial relationship between the viewer and the film. This is a defining characteristic of many of the more recent LGBTQ films made in Latin America. The aquatic becomes a key narrative device in which directors locate their queer bodies.

This is clear from the very beginning of XXY, as the opening credits include an underwater background.
XXV begins and ends with the visit of a surgeon (Ramiro), his wife (Erika), and their son (Álvaro) to the Krakens’ property at the invitation of Suli, who, unbeknownst to her husband, invites the doctor to visit with Alex. She wants him to evaluate Alex for possible sex reassignment surgery, to thereby allow for the character to live as a man or woman, but not as both, the idea being that an intersexed body must be surgically reconfigured to a binary idea of sex. This desire poses problems, however, as Néstor and Alex resist medical intervention.

The plot begins with Alex’s decision to stop taking the hormones that stunted her masculine traits. Raised as a female, the unmedicated body now goes through a second puberty where maleness emerges in direct opposition to Alex’s nurtured and natured femaleness. To add to this, Alex and Álvaro begin a teenage relationship that is rife with the normal travails of young love. They laugh, they quarrel, they make up; it is in one of these sessions that they engage in sex. Puenzo, however, problematizes this plot point as we see that Alex penetrates Álvaro. Although they both enjoy the tryst, they come away ashamed: Álvaro because he is a bottom; and Alex because Álvaro allowed himself to be penetrated. The latter, in fact, leads to Alex rejecting Álvaro. Puenzo also includes a violent rape scene where Alex is accosted by a group of local teenagers who want to see her genitals. The film concludes with the fallout from this scene as the surgeon and his family leave the Krakens’ household to return to Buenos Aires. The director closes with an open ending: we do not know which gender, if any, Alex will choose in adulthood. XXY thus is not a film solely about intersex issues but a studied meditation on broader LGBTQ topics. As Jeffrey Zamostny notes, “XXY would probably be a less engaging film if its sole aims were to buttress activist discourse and to indulge in a politically correct celebration of the ideals set forth by the intersex movement” (2012, 193); it is instead a complex and layered movie that provokes important discussions about LGBTQ bodies and issues in the Latin American and global context. Questions of individual agency, social prejudice, gendered violence, and fissures within the LGBTQ community are provoked by the film and merit a studied meditation.

El último verano de la Boyita (Argentina; 2009)
Julia Solomonoff’s El último verano de la Boyita (The last summer of La Boyita), like XXY, similarly delves into issues of intersexuality. Told through the perspective of Jorgelina, the film explores the blossoming of sexuality and gender at the onset of puberty. Jorgelina is a young girl who, up until the point of the start of the narrative, shares everything with her older sister, Luciana. The early scenes of the film guide the viewer through the process Jorgelina faces of coming to terms with her sister’s puberty and how this, in turn, may foreshadow her own development and maturity. Another radical shift takes place in her household as her parents divorce and Luciana and her mother decide to spend the summer at the beach. Crestfallen because she is now excluded from “big girl” activities, such as trying on bras, Jorgelina decides instead to spend her summer with her father in their country farmhouse away from their main home in Rosario. There she reconnects with Mario, the young and introverted son of the farm’s caretakers, who, like Luciana, is also going through puberty. Like Luciana, he is also beginning to menstruate; the viewer learns that Mario was born with an enlarged clitoris, and as a result raised as male. He further identifies as male, adding complexity to his sex and gender constitution. The plot thus revolves around Mario coming to terms with his difference and with the relationship he develops with Jorgelina.
Whereas in \textit{XXY} Puenzo separated the intersexed body and its issues from the social milieu of Buenos Aires where Alex grew up, Solomonoff instead situates the plot within the specific setting Mario was brought up in. It is a small farming community in the Pampas, inhabited by a mostly German-immigrant community that is steeped in gaucho culture. Gender codes are therefore strongly influenced by occupational and behavioral traits. While women are expected to work the fruit orchards and tend to the house and children, men are entrusted with maintaining the fields, horses, and herds of cattle. Masculinity, in other words, is largely defined by one’s ability to control animals—an observation that is substantiated by the very first scene of the film, as well as by Mario’s participation in a horserace. The race is a coming-of-age rite for males in the community, as by winning it, Mario would demonstrate dominance over the horse and the other riders. When his father discovers that he menstruates, the first thing that is taken from him is his horse. In locating intersex issues within this cultural substrate, the film provokes a questioning of all gender codes, asking the audience to reflect on how systems of integration affect real lived experiences.

Coproduced by Agustín and Pedro Almodóvar’s film production company, El Deseo, the film follows \textit{XXY} in dealing with intersexuality as a topic left largely unexplored in Latin American film. Like that of Puenzo’s film, \textit{El último verano de la Boyita}’s approach is measured and contemplative, provoking multifaceted conversations and points of view that escape reductionism. It comes as no surprise that Deborah Martin calls \textit{El último verano de la Boyita} a “quite unprecedented intervention on the part of Argentine cinema into international debates on intersexuality, as well as into global queer filmmaking” (2013, 35).

\textbf{Contracorriente (Peru; 2009)}

\textit{Contracorriente} (Undertow), Javier Fuentes-León’s directorial debut, recounts the love triangle of a gay man (Santiago), a closeted man (Miguel), and an unsuspecting wife (Mariela) in a quiet fishing village somewhere in Latin America. Santiago and Miguel are childhood friends who meet on the outskirts of the village. The former is an artist from the big city, whereas the latter is strongly entrenched in the local social network through his work, marriage, and affiliation with a church. When Mariela becomes pregnant with their first child, tensions flare between the two men. After one of these arguments, Santiago gets caught in the undertow, his body stuck amid rocks in the ocean floor. He comes back as a spirit, instructing Miguel to save him from purgatory by finding his body and then offering it to the sea. The film delves into issues of religion, the closet, and homophobia, all within a magical ghost story. Herein is perhaps the greatest innovation seen in \textit{Contracorriente}, as Fuentes-León successfully uses for the first time in a LGBTQ film narrative modes—magical realism and the spectral—so connected to the literature of Latin America.

Starring Colombian heartthrob Manolo Cardona as Santiago, Bolivian Cristian Mercado as Miguel, and Peruvian actress Tatiana Astengo as his wife, Mariela, the film gathers an international cast in a setting that is not easily identified. The lack of specificity regarding the location is somewhat unusual, as the great majority of LGBTQ films in Latin America have clear local markers of place. Instead, Fuentes-León crafts a sort of archetypal space that is easily translated across national borders, creating an idea of a “Latin American” space inhabited by Latin American characters and issues. It comes as no surprise that the director chooses magical realism, given its quintessential ties to a Latin American imaginary. That the plot takes place in a fishing village in close proximity to the sea is a characteristic shared with XXY and El último verano de la Boyita, where the aquatic—as substance, narrative device, and texture—becomes a sort of metaphor for queer bodies and desires (see Venkatesh 2016 for a detailed explanation of this phenomenon).

The film also explores the gendered spatiality of everyday life, demonstrating how archetypal spaces such as the home, the church, and the cantina (tavern) are both gendered and gendering. This thesis is especially furthered in the scenes wherein the ghostly Santiago interacts with Miguel. The liminality of death allows the director to clearly outline how these ubiquitous spaces influence the lived experiences of LGBTQ persons. Contracorriente lacks some of the more provocative imagery and narrative points seen in Latin American LGBTQ cinema, but the film is an important touchstone given its exploration of specific pan–Latin American issues and its use of magical realism to deconstruct dominant narratives of gender, desire, and sexual identity.

While the history of LGBTQ issues and persons in Latin American cinema may be seen as relatively limited in comparison to US and European traditions, there are several important films, directors, and movements that demonstrate how issues of sex, gender, and sexuality are at the very core of Latin American cultural production. This has been made even clearer in the early twenty-first century, as an increasing number of queer films are being produced in big and small markets fueled, in part, by the rise in independent and LGBTQ film festivals throughout the world, coupled with the possibilities of broader production mechanisms. Many of these films have won important local and international awards, demonstrating how dynamic and important LGBTQ films are within a wider Latin American cinema. Lorenzo Vigas’s Desde allá (Venezuela, 2015; From afar), for example, won the Golden Lion at the Venice Film Festival, in addition to several other prizes. Some directors (such as Solomonoff) have made one-off LGBTQ films, whereas others, such as the Argentine Marco Berger or the Mexican Julián Hernández, are developing as veritable auteurs in a series of films that have achieved critical and commercial success.

That being said, perhaps the biggest criticism one may have of films produced in Latin America is their relative lack of an engagement with queer issues; in other words, these films tend to explore difference without necessarily questioning heteronormative institutions such as marriage. Another critique may be the scarcity of representations of lesbianism, although more recent works, such as El niño pez (2009; The fish child) and Todo el mundo tiene a alguien menos yo (2012; Everybody’s got somebody but me), have made great strides in portraying lesbian bodies, issues, and desires. In these films, lesbian issues are directly addressed, as opposed to being alluded to or insinuated, which has tended to be the case in Hispanic cinema and literature. Instead, these films position lesbian love and desire at the center of their plots. With an increasingly favorable social and juridical climate, new circulation models that benefit from internet streaming services catering to local and global audiences, and the winning of several significant international awards, the sky is the limit for queer Latin American cinema moving forward. For the viewer and researcher, the field of LGBTQ Latin American cinema is booming and encourages wide participation.

SEE ALSO Antes que Anochezca (1992; Reinaldo Arenas); El Beso de la Mujer Araña (1976; Manuel Puig); Cinema, Latin American (Early Twentieth Century); Madame Satã (1900–1976)

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Zamostny, Jeffrey. “Constructing Ethical Attention in Lucía Puenzo’s XXY: Cinematic Strategy, Intersubjectivity, and Intersexuality.” In Representing History, Class, and Gender in Cisgender or Cis

KADIN HENNINGSEN
PhD candidate
University of Illinois

Cisgender, or cis, is a term used to describe people who are non-transgender. That is, cis people are people whose gender identity and gendered sense of self is congruent with the sex/gender assigned to them at birth. This definition, however, has been critiqued by some who feel it imposes and/or maintains a rigid understanding of sex and gender. Similar to race, ability, class, and sexuality, cis indicates an unmarked state that is often perceived as the assumed default marker and, thus, natural. In addition, its deployment is meant to address the often used, yet problematic, language of referring to non-trans people as “real,” “biological,” or “bio” (e.g., “a real man” or “a bio woman”). The rhetoric of “real” implies that trans men and women are not real men or women and assumes the sexed body as the location of reality and truth regarding sex/gender. It is possible to recognize the assumption that the sexed body is the location of reality/truth because of the frequent use of expressions such as “really a man” or “discovered to be female,” or even the media’s use of “born a man” or “born female,” all of which are linked to genital status (Henningsen 2016; Bettcher 2007). As such, cis “de-centralize[s] the dominant group, exposing it as merely one possible alternative rather than the ‘norm’ against which trans people are defined” (Koyama 2002). In addition, cis has some global circulation and has been translated into a number of languages, including Arabic (mutawāfiq al-jins), Catalan (cigènere), Estonian (cissoolisus), Esperanto (cisgenrulo), Korean (siseujendeo), and Spanish (cisgénero), to name only a few. In order to fully understand cis, one should consider both the history of the term cis and its political deployments, as well as its more recent circulation in a global context.

History

The prefix cis is a Latin preposition meaning “on the same side as.” It appears as an English prefix, according to the Oxford English Dictionary (OED), as early as the seventeenth century and was often used to indicate location or relationality (e.g., cis-Atlantic, meaning “on this side of the Atlantic,” as opposed to transatlantic, “across the Atlantic”). Toward the end of the nineteenth century, the cis/trans distinction had been established in the sciences, most notably in chemistry and molecular biology. For instance, in chemistry a cis-compound is a compound in which “two atoms or groups are situated on the same side of some plane of symmetry passing through the compound” (OED). In addition, compounds that do not change state when they come in contact with other media are also considered cis (Enke 2012).

The term cisgender as it is known and understood today has taken many forms over its linguistic history, yet its meaning has remained relatively consistent and mirrors the linguistic evolution of the term transgender. For instance, in the late nineteenth century sexologists used the concept of “inversion” to describe cross-gender identification, which was also associated at that time with homosexuality. Indeed, the German sexologist Karl Heinrich Ulrichs (1825–1895), in his collection of essays on “man-manly love” ([1898] 1975), used the now classic, albeit problematic, inversion formulation anima muliebris virili corpore inclusa—a female psyche confined in a male body. By the early twentieth century (1910), however, the German sexologist Magnus Hirschfeld (1868–1935) and the British sexologist Havelock Ellis (1859–1939) used “transvestitism” (as well as “eonism,” after Chevalier d’Éon [1728–1810] who was known to wear women’s clothes) as a separate category from inversion to describe both cross-gender identification and cross-dressing. It was not until the mid-twentieth century when transsexualism, defined in part by the desire for gender-affirming surgery, appeared in medical discourse, introduced by David O. Cauldwell and Harry Benjamin, who coined the English term transsexual (Meyerowitz 2002). By the 1970s, such transsexual people as Christine Jorgensen (1926–1989), began using the term transgender (or transgendered) to talk about cross-gender identity, as well as to make a distinction between sex and gender (Meyerowitz 2002). Indeed, the shift in terminology from transsexual to transgender occurred in part because of a newly articulated differentiation between sex and gender in the mid-twentieth century (Meyerowitz 2002). That is, by the mid-twentieth century, sex was, and still is, generally based on biological concepts such as chromosomes, gonads, and/or genitals, and gender is considered socially constructed and the accumulation of actions, behaviors, and roles attached to and expected of certain sexed bodies within a given culture (Henningsen 2016). This differentiation between sex and gender is in part the result of work done by the sexologist John Money (1921–2006) at Johns Hopkins University, who, in 1955, used the phrase “gender roles” as part of his research on intersex individuals, and the psychologist Robert Stoller (1924–1992) at the University of California, Los Angeles, Medical School and Gender Identity Clinic, who coined the phrase “gender identity” in 1964 (Meyerowitz 2002).

The understanding of cis has followed a similar trajectory as trans (from -vestism to -sex to -gender), although not entirely on the same time line. The cis/trans distinction as it relates specifically to sex/gender appears in the early twentieth century and is credited to the German sexologist Ernst Burchard (1876–1920). Burchard coined the term cisvestitismus (cisvestism) in contrast to transves-titismus (transvestism) in his 1914 encyclopedia of sexuality titled Lexikon des gesamten Sexuallebens (Encyclopedia of the entire sexual life) four years after Hirschfeld and Ellis put transvestite/transvestism into public circulation. Burchard writes:

*Cisvestism: the inclination to wear the clothing of another age group, ethnicity [nation], or profession [lit., working class or vocational class] of the same sex/gender for the purposes of sexual release [lit., easing of sexual tension]. Related to Transvestism (cf. “clothing drive”).

(32; EMPHASIS ADDED; TRANSLATION BY DAVID J. SELLINGER)*

What is notable about Burchard’s definition of cisvestism is the specification of sex/gender. The implication of his definition is that cisvestites derive pleasure from age-, ethnic-, or class-based cross-dressing, but not gendered cross-dressing. That is, cisvestism allows for cross-dressing in terms of age, ethnicity, or class so long as the clothing is congruent with one’s sex/gender assigned at birth. Furthermore, although cisvestism is explicitly defined as “for the purposes of sexual release,” or sexual pleasure, its relation to transvestism’s double meaning of cross-dressing for sexual pleasure and cross-gender identification paves the way for extending cisvestism’s meaning to include same-gender identification. That is, the term cisvestism could also mean identifying with the sex/gender assigned at birth, thus laying important ground work for the contemporary understanding of cis, or cisgender.

How much Burchard’s neologism circulated within sexology, and by extension psychoanalysis, remains unclear. A new variation of cis-, however, appeared in scholarship seventy-seven years later, in 1991, when Volkmar Sigusch used the term zissexuelle (cissexual), noting that zissexuelle was not a familiar term to earlier sexologists such as Hirschfeld and Burchard who used transvestitismus and cisvestitismus. Entering academic discourse almost thirty-five years after the introduction of the term transsexual by Cauldwell and Benjamin, Sigusch explains zissexuelle (cissexual) as follows:

*The Latin cis- as a prefix means “on this side of.” Thus, “zisalpin” [cissionalpine] means: (from the point of view of Rome) on this side of the Alps. The Latin trans- as a prefix means “through, across/straight through, across/over, on the other side of, beyond.” Thus, “transkutan” [transcutaneous] means: through the skin, and “transatlantic” means: transoceanic (from one’s own point of view), on the other side of the Atlantic. Cissexuals experience and define themselves (in terms of bodily sex) “on this side,” transsexuals “on the other side.”

(338, N. 7; TRANSLATION BY DAVID J. SELLINGER)
Unlike Burchard, Sigusch provides a rationale for the term by linking it to earlier uses of cis- to describe locationality, as in zisalpin. Furthermore, Sigusch's definition is the first time cis- is explicitly linked to embodiment and identity. It is important to note here that, although zissexuelle entered academic discourse in 1991, linking the origin of zissexuelle to Sigusch has been contested. For instance, an anonymous commentator on Whipping Girl, a blog maintained by the trans activist and gender theorist Julia Serano, claimed that the term had already been circulating within trans and intersex communities in Germany since the 1980s, although the commentator did not offer evidence (Serano 2014).

By the mid-1990s cisgender began circulating in online communities. For instance, in 1994 the biologist Dana Leland Defosse used the word cisgendered with no accompanying definition in a research inquiry on an online forum. Defosse does, however, discuss with A. Finn Enke why cis is an appropriate complement to trans-, rooting her rationale for cis in molecular biology and organic chemistry (Enke 2012). Independently of Defosse, the Dutch trans man Carl Buijs coined the term cis in 1995 in another online forum for trans and intersex people, writing in 1996 about how he came up with the term: “As for the origin; I just made it up. I just kept running into the problem of what to call non-T* people in various discussions, and one day it just hit me: non-trans = cis. Therefore, cisgendered.” Although Buijs does not offer an explicit definition of cisgender, other members of the forum do, using language similar to Sigusch's definition and rationale of cissexual.
In the first decade of the twenty-first century, both cisgender and cissexual began circulating more widely after Serano popularized the terms in her 2007 book Whipping Girl: A Transsexual Woman on Sexism and the Scapegoating of Femininity. Serano also notes on her online blog (2011) that she came across the term on another website by the trans activist Emi Koyama. Although the concept of cis as it relates to sex/gender has been around since the beginning of the twentieth century, Serano (2014) contends that its popularity proliferated within predominantly trans activist communities. By December 2015 cis, cisgender, cisgendered, cissexual, cisexist, and cissexism were all added to the third edition of the OED, according to each of the entries’ publisher notes. In April 2016 Merriam-Webster announced via Twitter that cisgender had been added to its unabridged dictionary, along with Mx. (a gender-neutral option for Miss/Mrs./Mr. popularized by the trans-genre artist Mx. Justin Vivian Bond) and genderqueer. The addition of cis (and its correlates) to both the OED and Merriam-Webster can, in part, be linked to its use and circulation on social media, and thus to a broader audience. More specifically, cis got widespread media attention in February 2014 when Facebook added fifty-six options for gender, which at the time of their addition were available only to US users (Dewey 2014). The widespread attention cis received from the media helps proliferate discussions about cis privilege, cisnормativity, and the problems and politics of its deployment.

Cis Privilege and Cisnornativity

As cis has become more widely used publicly, the stakes of cis have become more apparent. Most notably, because cis is deployed in order to highlight an often-unmarked state, it is possible to see how cis privilege and cisnornativity operate in society and how both contribute to anti-trans rhetoric, policies, and violence.

Cis privilege refers to the assumed and invisible advantages one receives because of being, or more accurately perceived as being, cis (Henningsen 2016). Like other forms of privilege, cis privilege is often invisible and, therefore, taken for granted. According to the online blog Taking Up Too Much Space, some of the privileges that cis people have, but are perhaps unaware of, include (but are not limited to):

- Having government-issued ID that accurately represents who you are (especially regarding name and sex/gender marker)
- Expecting your private medical information to remain private in non-health-care-related interactions
- Having access to health care and expecting that you will not be denied access because of your gender
- Expecting the privacy of your body to be respected; for instance, you are not asked about your genitals and/or body, or whether you have had gender-affirming surgeries (i.e., a “sex change”)
- Expecting access to and fair treatment within sex-segregated facilities such as bathrooms, gyms and locker rooms, homeless shelters, domestic violence shelters, drug rehabilitation programs, prisons, hostels, and juvenile justice systems
- Having your name and pronouns respected (Cedar 2008)
LGBTQ Activists Protest Heteronormativity in Majorca, Spain. Heteronormativity, or the assumption that people should desire those of the opposite sex, is closely linked to cisnormativity, or the assumption that people should identify and present with their gender assigned at birth.

Through everyday actions and experiences such as those just mentioned, cis-privilege, then, creates a double standard wherein trans is both distinct from and less legitimate than cis (Serano 2014). Moreover, one of the privileges of cis is that it “performs as the arbiter of real, true, or natural gender,” and thus, cis by definition “is rarely required to but can always legally and socially prove itself: as such, it serves to judge the realness or legitimacy of all people’s sex/gender” (Enke 2012, 66). Thus, cis privilege is the result of cisnormativity.

Cisnormativity is the assumption that all people are cis and meet (or should meet) normative expectations of masculinity and femininity based on the sexed body (Henningsen 2016). Akin to Adrienne Rich’s articulation of “compulsory heterosexuality” in her 1980 essay “Compulsory Heterosexuality and Lesbian Existence,” cisnormativity is compulsory in that it mandates that cis is the assumed default position, as well as always political and imbued with power. Furthermore, although Rich does not explicitly make a claim about cis in her essay, her articulation of compulsory heterosexuality assumes cisnormativity as a given, because cisnormativity requires that someone who is assigned female at birth, for instance, must identify and present as a woman, where it is also understood that being a woman, according to the logic of compulsory heterosexuality, means desiring men. Put another way, compulsory heteronormativity, or what Judith Butler calls “the heterosexual matrix”—the “grid of intelligibility through which bodies, gender, and desires are naturalized”—is always already cisnormative because it “assumes that for bodies to cohere and make sense there must be a stable sex expressed through stable gender ... that is oppositionally and hierarchically defined through the compulsory practice of heterosexuality” (1990, 1999, 194, n. 6). Compulsory cisnormativity can be seen being played out in early trans history where trans people were (and in some places still are) required to desire the “opposite gender.” For instance, according to Afsaneh Najmabadi in Professing Selves: Transsexuality and Same-Sex Desire in Contemporary Iran (2014), Iranian legal and medical authorities sanction “sex change” surgeries to “correct” homosexuality, although this has not yet become official state policy. In addition, in the mid-twentieth century in the United States, trans women were not considered to be legitimately women by the medical industry unless they desired men. That is, trans women could not be lesbianidentified because cisnormativity requires oppositional desire (i.e., heteronormativity). In this way, medical treatments of trans people have historically reinforced both cisnormativity and heteronormativity.

Furthermore, medical intervention, or medical transition, continues to perpetuate cisnormativity even if the medical establishment no longer requires oppositional desire of trans people. To be clear, the point is not to invalidate the experiences or desires of trans people who medically transition. Instead, it calls attention to the ways in which medical transition supports cisnormativity and thus expands cis privilege to trans people who are perceived to be cis, or “passed” as cis. For instance, using myself by way of example: because of medical transition which included hormones and gender-affirming surgeries, I am perceived by people to be not just a man but more specifically a cis man. As a result, I am afforded some privileges that come with being perceived as cis, such as access to men’s bathrooms and changing facilities (in addition to all the other privileges I receive because I am male, white, and able bodied). Even if I personally do not feel safe in those spaces, I am not considered to be “out of place,” because I am perceived by others as meeting culturally specific definitions of masculinity through such things as facial hair, a lower voice, flat chest, clothing, and so on. In this way, some trans people, like myself, benefit from cis privilege because cis privilege is not necessarily about cis or trans status or identity per se, but about how others perceive them in approximation to cisnormativity. As a result, those who do not meet cisnormative ideals of femininity and masculinity are often verbally and physically attacked. Like other forms of passing (racial, class, ability, etc.), which call attention to the instability of categories, being perceived or passed as cis destabilizes cis. That is, trans people who are passed as cis, as well as genderqueer and gender-nonconforming people who are passed as cis, call attention to the false assumption that cis “stay[s] put” (Enke 2012, 61). As a result, the use of cis has recently received considerable pushack because of the presumption that cis stays put within normatively defined gender parameters (Enke 2012).

Critiques
There are two dominant modes of critique that cis has received from both trans and cis people in the twenty-first century. The first critique of cis addresses the very instability of cis. As previously mentioned, Enke (2012) points out that despite an assumption that cis “stay[s] put,” it actually fails to do so. In order to address some of the instability of cis, some activists such as Serano (2011) and Helen Boyd (2009) have tried to make a distinction between cissexual and cisgender. Boyd specifically argues that, for instance, a butch lesbian can be cissexual, but because her gender performance is nonnormative she might not be, or might not identify as, cisgender. To that end, a femme lesbian might also be cissexual but to some degree not cisgender, because her gender is nonconforming according to cisnormativity’s (which is always already heteronormative) mandate of oppositional desire (Cole and Cate 2008). That does not, however, obscure the ways in which femme lesbians experience cis privilege or obscure the reality that many trans women also identify as lesbians. Furthermore, Serano (2016) has gone so far as to imply that a trans person who has not medically transitioned may be cissexual while also being transgender.

The cissexual/cisgender debate, however, may be unhelpful in part because cisnormativity, as mentioned previously, is not so much about cis (or trans) status or identity per se but more accurately about whether someone is perceived to be cis based on cisnormative ideologies about femininity and masculinity. Furthermore, the terminology of cissexual perpetuates a false assumption that there are two, and only two, sexes: male and female. The existence of intersex people and the prevalence of intersex conditions—one in 100 births according to the Intersex Society of North America—calls into question the very stability of cissexuality and a sex binary. Thus, if the distinction between cissexual and cisgender is unhelpful, it may be more useful to think about cis and trans as being on a field of relationality. Unlike the Kinsey scale, which positions sexuality along a spectrum that maintains a hierarchical binary and ignores relations of power, a field of relationality can account for a range of gender expressions that fall outside of a spectrum logic, such as agender, nonbinary, and, for some, genderqueer.

The second critique comes primarily from the circulation of cis within the university classroom. In their 2012 article “The Education of Little Cis,” for instance, Enke argues that while cis is useful for marking an unnamed position, especially with students just beginning to learn about trans and trans experience, in the end it ultimately reifies otherness, or positions trans as Other by setting up yet another binary in which cis is positioned as the norm. This is a problem, in part, because binaries are never horizontal and equal, but always vertical and hierarchical. As such, the deployment of cis, even in the classroom as an attempt to indicate one’s ally status, ends up not only reinforcing trans as Other but also reinforcing a hierarchical power dynamic that continues to privilege cis. Binaries are also problematic because they are confrontational and oppositional in that one needs the other to exist. A cis/trans spectrum, however, complicates a topdown power dynamic because it shows how power is always relational and always in motion.
Cis in a Global Perspective

Cis has been translated into a number of languages, and global LGBTQ communities have begun to use cis. For instance, the Chinese LGBTQ organization Tongyu (Common Language) published one of the first pamphlets translating common LGBT terminology from English to Chinese. Tongyu's translation of cis (shùn) means “confirming, or following,” according to Di Wang (2017), an activist involved with the translation and publication of Tongyu's pamphlet. That is, gender confirms or follows the sex assigned at birth. In addition, Tongyu's full explanation of cis indicates that gender presentation and expression align with normatively defined expectations of sex/gender in addition to “confirming” or “following” sex assigned at birth (Tongyu 2014). Similarly, in 2016 Argentina's Ministry of Health released a guide to sexual diversity (“Guía básica sobre diversidad sexual”) that includes císgénero and cisgenérica. In Turkey, trans activists have started using natrans (not trans) to talk about cis, or non-trans people. According to the anthropologist Dilara Çalışkan (2017), natrans began being used in the Turkish LGBT community around 2010, years before its first appearances in academic scholarship. In India, however, cis is rarely used, although it occasionally appears in academic contexts, according to Mridu Markan (2017), who has done extensive public health work with India’s hijra (third gender) communities. Markan does go on to indicate that despite its rarity, cis, when defined within an Indian context, indicates that the cis person is “straight identifying” in addition to experiencing their gender as congruent with sex/gender assigned at birth. In this way, at least in India, cis status is always heterosexual. That is, gay men and lesbians in India would not necessarily be identified as cis. Like scholars in India who use the term, cis is also being used in transnational scholarship. For instance, social psychologist Zoe Samudzi, and health economics scholar Jenevieve Mannell collaborated on a 2016 article for Culture, Health, and Sexuality about cisgender male and transgender female sex workers in South Africa.

In addition to the translation of cis into a number of languages, the term continues to circulate globally, aided in part by Western media coverage of queer and trans issues in other parts of the world. For instance, Julia Felsenthal uses the term in a 2016 Vogue magazine article about Jamaica’s “Gully Queens” (a group of gay and trans people of color, predominantly trans women, who often find shelter in Kingston’s sewer systems in the most impoverished areas of the city). Cis also circulates globally through popular and social media, as evidenced by the inclusion of cis as one of the gender options for Facebook. Although the fifty-six gender options were available only in the United States at the time of their addition, many international news sources reported on the gender options, including the Times of India. Moreover, the distribution of such popular movies about trans characters as The Danish Girl (2015) helps circulate cis on the global scale through ongoing debates about whether non-trans actors such as Eddie Redmayne (who played the Danish trans woman Lili Elbe) should play trans characters. As cis continues to circulate globally through social and popular media, it is important to keep in mind that cis is a concept that was developed in and proliferated predominantly within a Western context. As the term continues to circulate, one should be careful not to map or project cis onto other epistemologies of sex/gender outside of a Western/US context. One should resist projecting the cis/trans binary onto other modes of knowledge, in part because compulsory cisnormativity already assumes whiteness. That is, because cis operates alongside other unmarked states of race, ability, class, gender, and sexuality, the universal body is assumed to be not only cis but also white, male, able bodied, wealthy, and straight. Therefore, when talking about cis in a global context, one must “grapple with the racial and geopolitical economies and forms of governmentality that instill whiteness as the given” of both cis and trans subjects (Aizura et al. 2014, 309). Put another way, it is important to be cognizant of the ways in which mapping or projecting cis onto other epistemologies of sex/gender participates in imperialist projects that ultimately serve the interests of the Global North and West, especially the United States.

SEE ALSO Anti-gender Movement in Europe; Asexuality; Chevalier d’Éon or Mademoiselle Beaumont (1728–1810); Cross-Dressing in the West; Institut für Sexualwissenschaft; Kinsey Scale

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Buijs, Carl. Reply to “A new perspective on an old topic,” soc. support.transgendered Google Group, 16 April 1996. https://groups.google.com/d/msg/soc.support.transgendered/uQ0v7egWih0/Y4nkFd9QSI Burchard, Ernst. Lexikon des gesamten Sexuallebens [Encyclopedia of the entire sexual life].

Wang, Di. Facebook direct message to author, 10 September 2017.
For at least a millennium, the study of Greek and Roman culture has provided educated people the opportunity to discuss and analyze same-sex desire. According to Greek myth, the god Zeus fell in love with the divine hero Ganymede, as did the god Apollo with the divine hero Hyacinth, while the seer Tiresias changed sexes, experiencing the sexual act both as a male and as a female. Greek and Roman leaders, including Alexander the Great (356–323 BCE) and the emperor Hadrian (76–138 CE), reputedly had male beloveds. The love poetry of Sappho (c. 610–c. 570 BCE) delicately describes the erotic feelings women have for each other. The Symposium of the philosopher Plato (c. 428–c. 348 BCE) intricately dissects men’s love for other men. The poems of Catullus (c. 84–c. 54 BCE) salaciously depict sexual behavior between men, while in the Aeneid Virgil (70–19 BCE) gives a touching account of the love between the war heroes Nisus and Euryalus. These are just a few examples that show that it was virtually impossible to avoid same-sex and even queer desire in the study of the classics, for which reason the discipline became a safe venue for the discussion of erotic love between members of the same sex. In the field of classical studies, one could have a respectable, dignified, and even celebratory discussion of same-sex desire, despite the severe stigmatization that accompanied such desire elsewhere in society. The focus of these discussions tended to change with the needs of the times: in the Middle Ages and the Renaissance, they centered on the morality of the desire; in the Enlightenment, on the dignity of this desire and the “rights of man”; in the late nineteenth century, they were concerned with patriarchy and masculinity; and in the late twentieth century, with questions concerning the essential or constructed nature of gay identity.
The Middle Ages and the Renaissance: Ganymede

In the period from 1050 to 1150, “what might be called a gay subculture” took shape; it relied in part on classical motifs such as the story of Ganymede to communicate its ideals (Boswell 1980, 243). Ganymede continued to be a vehicle for the understanding of male-male desire, particularly in the Renaissance. Numerous well-known artists took for granted the widespread knowledge of the classics among the educated classes to discuss male-male desire in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries: Michelangelo (1475–1564) gave a drawing of Ganymede as a testament of his love to the young nobleman Tommaso de' Cavalieri (1509–1587), while Benvenuto Cellini’s (1500–1571) Ganymede clearly reflects the artist’s experience with same-sex desire. Knowledge fueled by a rebirth of classical studies helped artists articulate a “homoeroticism all'antica” (in the manner of the ancients) (Saslow 1986, 142). The phrase all'antica circulated in the Renaissance in the art world, indicating an effort to emulate the ancients; James Saslow suggests that the comprehension and appreciation of same-sex desire could also fall under the category of celebrating antiquity.

Despite the resurgence of ancient culture, Roman Catholic values remained strong in this era, and there is every indication that men who had sex with men struggled with the morality of their desires. For them, the classical tradition, with its tale of Ganymede, provided an opportunity for a discussion of the uplifting quality of their desire. Neoplatonic...
interpretations stressed the edifying aspects of the relationship: Zeus’s desire allowed Ganymede to ascend into the heavens and consort with the divine. Knowledge of the classical tradition allowed men in the Renaissance to contest rigid Christian condemnations of their relationships.

The Enlightenment: Classical Sexuality and the Rights of Man

In the Enlightenment, classical studies returned and served a new purpose for men who had sex with men, placing same-sex desire in the context of the freedom and the dignity that constituted les droits de l’homme (the rights of man). A leader in this development was the German art historian Johann Joachim Winckelmann (1717–1768), a man whose sexual interests were quite openly directed toward other men and who revitalized interest in the classics and the classical ideal. In his youth, the study of the classics had fallen into such disregard that Greek was scarcely taught in the universities of his native Germany anymore (Leppmann 1970). Winckelmann not only immersed himself in the study of antiquity but heralded the beginning of the neoclassical era with his 1755 monograph Gedanken über die Nachahmung der griechischen Werke in der Malerei und Bildhauerkunst (Reflections on the imitation of Greek works in painting and sculpture).

In the Gedanken, Winckelmann outlines a variety of factors that contributed to the beauty of Greek men, including the warm Mediterranean climate, the absence of disfiguring diseases such as smallpox and syphilis, the athleticism of the men, and the close relationship of the arts to athletics. While he does not specifically address same-sex desire in his art history texts, his audience knew that his erotic interest in other men informed his art criticism. In his 1805 essay on Winckelmann, the German writer Johann Wolfgang von Goethe (1749–1832) made clear to his readers that the classical ideal was the product of a homosexual man who developed it precisely because of his sexuality (Derks 1990).

The French philosopher Voltaire (1694–1778) expounded on Winckelmann’s ideas in his essay on “amour socratique” (Socratic love) that appeared in his Dictionnaire philosophique (1764; A Philosophical Dictionary [1932]) in an effort to explain the prevalence of male-male desire in ancient Greek culture, focusing heavily on the practice of exercising naked in the gym. The German philosopher Christoph Meiners (1747–1810) addressed many of the same concerns in his 1775 essay titled “Betrachtungen über die Männerliebe der Griechen” (Reflections on the male love of the Greeks); the essay was one of the first German-language scholarly discussions of male-male desire in ancient Greece. These same themes turn up in the multivolume treatise Venus Urania (1798), by the German art critic Friedrich Wilhelm Basilius von Ramdohr (1757–1822), which used the classics to present a strong defense of the love that could arise between two men or two women.

Enlightenment thinkers associated the classical world not only with same-sex love but also with freedom, democracy, individual rights, justice, and tolerance. Winckelmann stressed the importance of freedom for ancient Greek culture, especially in his 1764 magnum opus Die Geschichte der Kunst des Altertums (The history of the art of antiquity). The connection between same-sex desire in antiquity and the classical ideal of freedom shows up in other writings inspired by the Enlightenment. In the 1830s the Swiss writer Heinrich Hössli (1784–1864) published a two-volume treatise on same-sex desire among men in antiquity, Eros: Die Männerliebe der Griechen (Eros: The male love of the Greeks). Basing his analysis on the era’s research on the classics, Hössli couched his pleas for the acceptance of male-male love in terms of Enlightenment freedom: the separation of church and state, the triumph of rationality, and the dignity of the individual.

Similar arguments arose in England. The philosopher Jeremy Bentham’s (1748–1832) essay “Offences against One’s Self: Paederasty” (written around 1785 but not published until the twentieth century) used classical examples and evidence to make an Enlightenment case for the decriminalization of sexual relations between men. The Romantic poet Lord Byron (1788–1824) combined a personal interest in Greek love with a fervent devotion to the ideals of liberty and freedom in his support for the Greek Revolution of 1821 (Crompton 1985).

Late Nineteenth and Early Twentieth Centuries:
Masculinity, Patriarchy, and Empire

While in the Enlightenment the classical world stood for a rational, liberal, humanistic outlook, by the end of the nineteenth century classical culture came to represent a tragic, illiberal, imperial worldview (Tobin 2015). No one did more to initiate and disseminate this change of attitudes than the German philosopher and classics professor Friedrich Nietzsche (1844–1900), whose Geburt der Tragödie (Birth of tragedy), which appeared in 1872 and was later (1886) reissued with the subtitle Griechentum und Pessimismus (Hellenism and pessimism), ushered in a darker view of the classical era. This change had an effect on the use of classical studies for discussions within the homosexual community.

By the late nineteenth century, thinkers interested in both classical studies and same-sex desire began to focus more heavily on the differences between modern ideas of homosexuality and the love between men observed in the ancient world. Mainstream homosexual emancipation activists such as the German physician and sexologist Magnus Hirschfeld (1868–1935) continued to make reference to the classical tradition for its prestige, but they no longer relied on extensive analysis from the period, in part because it became clear from their studies that the ideal of same-sex love had changed between antiquity and modernity. In contrast, however, a group of men known as the “masculinists” (for their devotion to what they called “male culture”) used their knowledge of the classics to promote an alternative vision of male-male desire.
To begin with, the masculinists observed that in the classical world fixed sexual identities seemed unimportant. Whereas the modern world increasingly emphasized the difference between homosexuals and heterosexuals, men such as Benedict Friedlaender (1866–1908), author of the 1904 study Die Renaissance des Eros Uranios (The renaissance of Eros Uranios), lauded antiquity for its presumption that men would have erotic interests in both women and young men (Tobin 2015).

In addition, whereas homosexual rights activists had made a conscious effort to distinguish between pedophiles and homosexuals, the masculinists celebrated the intergenerational nature of the classical lover/beloved relationship. They relied on the scholarship of classicists such as Erich Bethe (1863–1940), whose 1907 essay Die dorische Knabenliebe (Dorian Pederasty) clearly described and vigorously defended the institution of classical pederasty. The masculinists saw male-male desire in the classical era as a generalized erotic principle that brought together all men, gay or straight, young or old. For them it was evidence that erotic male bonding could create a thriving, beautiful, and powerful society.

Whereas the mainstream homosexual rights activists were generally politically liberal or leftist and sought out alliances with women and minority groups such as the Jews, these Grecophilic masculinists tended to be conservative or reactionary and often indulged in misogyny and anti-Semitism. The example of ancient Greece, with its erotic male-male bonding, suggested for these men “an alternative to ‘Jewish,’ ‘liberal’ democracy” (Hewitt 1996, 129). While the masculinists were most organized in the German-speaking world, similar developments took place elsewhere in the West. The English writers John Addington Symonds (1840–1893) and Walter Pater (1839–1894) also promoted the cultivation of Socratic love as part of ensuring the greatness of the British Empire (Dowling 1994).

Contemporary Debates: Essentialism versus Constructivism

In more recent times, classical studies has been the scene of debates about the nature of sexual identity itself—about whether there is a gay “essence” that is transhistorical and transcultural or whether sexuality is a construct. Going back at least to the Enlightenment, many in classical studies have argued that the evidence of male-male erotic desire and behavior in ancient Greece suggested that homosexuality was a constant. These “essentialists” stress that there have always been gay people, as indicated by the subtitle of John Boswell’s groundbreaking 1980 book Christianity, Social Tolerance, and Homosexuality: Gay People in Western Europe from the Beginning of the Christian Era to the Fourteenth Century. However, others in classical studies have focused on the differences between the depiction of same-sex interactions in ancient times and modern ideals: the apparent indifference of the ancient Greeks and Romans to the sex of a person’s sexual partner; the fact that many upper-class men seem to have had sexual relations with wives, mistresses, and younger men without regard to fixed categories of sexual identities; and the emphasis on intergenerational relationships founded on a strict dichotomy between the erastes (the older lover) and the eromenos (the younger beloved). These scholars in classical studies claim that these differences show how much of sexuality is a social construct, with a historical and cultural specificity and distinctiveness (Halperin 1990). The subtlety and thoroughness of these debates demonstrates the ongoing importance of classical studies.

Beyond the Gay Male: Lesbian and Transgender Uses of Classical Studies

Because universities were exclusively male domains for many centuries, much of the conversation about same-sex desire that took place in classical studies focused on erotic relationships between men. Many of the classic texts focused on male-male relations as well. Although Sappho’s love poetry was addressed to women, it was often reinterpreted in a heterosexual light (Prins 1999).

Nonetheless, the classical tradition ensured that terms such as sapphic remained signifiers of female-female erotic desire for centuries. Eighteenth-century physicians such as Samuel-Auguste Tissot and Johann Valentin Müller referred to this classical tradition when they denounced “tribades” and “lesbians,” declaring that the vice went back to Sappho and the poems she wrote (Tobin 2000).

While the medical community appropriated the classical tradition’s representation of female-female erotic love in order to denounce lesbians, many women found support in the ancient literature. “Searching for their own roots,” the vibrant expatriate community of lesbians in Paris in the 1920s turned to “Sappho and Hellenism” (Rubin 2011, 92). Sue Schneider’s 1970 poem “Thinking Back Lesbian” concluded with the line “Sappho, you must have been a ‘Right On’ woman,” which inspired the title of the 1972 lesbian manifesto Sappho Was a Right-On Woman (Abbott and Love 1972, 7). The 1976 compendium Brouillon pour un dictionnaire des amantes (by Monique Wittig and Sande Zeig; published in English in 1979 as Lesbian Peoples: Material for a Dictionary) famously underscored the inadequacy of scholarly attention to female-female desire with the entry for Sappho, which consisted of a single blank page. Others have argued, however, that enough is known about Sappho to understand that her lyrics show a “double consciousness” of a patriarchal heroic heterosexual Homeric worldview and a private matriarchal homosexual resistance (Winkler 1993). In her aptly titled 2009 study Sapphistries: A Global History of Love between Women, Leila J. Rupp returns repeatedly to Sappho and her poetry, focusing on both the historical Sappho and the role of her image in subsequent lesbian culture.

Classical studies have also been a source of inspiration for the analysis of intersexuality and transsexuality. Although Winckelmann’s classical aesthetics might seem to endorse normative gender categories, in fact he favored androgynous figures such as Bacchus (MacLeod 1998). The figure of Tiresias, who transformed from man to woman and experienced sex from both perspectives, provided the structure for works by such modernist authors as T. S. Eliot (1888–1965) and Djuna Barnes (1892–1982) (Madden 2008). The transgender activist Kate Bornstein (1948–) has found Tiresias to be an important exemplar of transgender history (Bell 1994). Despite the heavy emphasis in classical studies on male-male desire, the examples of Sappho and Tiresias show that the lesbian and transgender communities have been able to rely on the classics for their purposes as well.

SEE ALSO Homoerotic Poetry of Abū Nuwās; Literary Discourses in the Ottoman Middle East (1500–1900); Sappho, Nineteenth-Century Rediscovery of

BIBLIOGRAPHY

The medical and cultural view of this female sexual organ, its role in sexual pleasure, the ways it can be modified, and its relation to intersex and trans bodies.

While it is undoubtedly safe to assume females have long known about the existence of their own clitoris, the origin of the word itself is unclear, though some claim it first appeared in ancient Greece (Cohen 1978). The Italian anatomist Realdo Colombo (c. 1516–1559) credited himself with the discovery of the clitoris in the fifteenth century; however, recorded anatomic descriptions of the organ had existed for centuries (Lowry 1978). The Greek physician Galen (129–c. 199 CE) wrote about the organ, as did the first-century physician Rufus of Ephesus and the second-century physician Soranus of Ephesus. The eleventh-century Persian physician Avicenna (Ibn Sina) used Galen’s ideas when he wrote about the organ, and Renaissance-era physicians also described the organ (Blackledge 2004).

The visible external glans is what is most often referred to as the clitoris. The glans is positioned above the vaginal opening and connects to the labia minora. The clitoris, however, is mostly an internal organ. Thinking of a wishbone, the externally visible part (the glans) would be the joining part of the wishbone at the curve. The internal body of the clitoris then extends up from the glans (like the top single point of the wishbone) and then extends down, with the sides of the wishbone (representing the crus of the clitoris) existing beneath the vulva. On the inner sides of the crus are the bulbs (Pauls 2015). In his 1672 drawings, the Dutch physician Regnier de Graaf presented this internal, wishbone structure of the organ (Blackledge 2004). The anatomist Georg Ludwig Kobelt in the mid-nineteenth century is often credited with providing the most detailed views of the external and internal structure of the clitoris up to that time; he also noted that the glans of the clitoris contains an extensive amount of dorsal nerves—perhaps three to four times as many as those in the penis (Kobelt 1978). In their 2005 work challenging the often overly simplistic descriptions of the clitoris found in many textbooks and subsequently calling for more details of the full internal structure of the organ, the urologists Helen E. O'Connell, Kalavampara V. Sanjeevan, and John M. Hutson credited the work of Kobelt and de Graaf as being richly descriptive.

Sexual Function

Just as anatomical descriptions of the organ have existed for centuries, so have physiological understandings of its role in sexual arousal for women. The Renaissance-era physician Pietro d’Abano noted that rubbing it brought about female orgasm, and de Graaf stated that the purpose of the clitoris was sexual sensitivity (Blackledge 2004). Colombo in 1559 similarly described the sexual purpose of the organ: it should, he wrote, “be called the love or sweetness of Venus” (quoted in Stringer and Becker 2010, 131). Western physicians fairly consistently recognized the organ as “the seat of pleasure during coition,” as William Harris did in 1839 (314). Over a century later, in their 1966 book Human Sexual Response, William H. Masters and Virginia E. Johnson called the clitoris unique, its only purpose sexual. The findings of Masters and Johnson—based on their watching and measuring as women masturbated and/or had penetrative, vaginal intercourse with men—provided physiological evidence to support the long-held contention that the clitoris was central to female sexual response. Masters and Johnson focused on women’s responses during heterosexual, vaginal sex, but in their research Alfred C. Kinsey (1894–1956) in the 1950s and Shere Hite (1942–) in the 1970s found that while the organ was exquisitely sexually sensitive, many women in their studies needed direct stimulation of the clitoris to reach orgasm—something women often did not receive from heterosexual penetrative sex alone (Lloyd 2005).

Clitoral Size and Hypersexuality

The clitoris and the penis have the same embryonic origins, and this is reflected in the clitoris often being described in anatomy texts as a smaller version of the penis (Pauls 2015; Rodriguez 2014). Physicians started recording the actual size of the glans in the twentieth century. In 1925 the physicians Robert Latou Dickinson and Henry H. Pierson found the average size of the glans clitoris to be 4.4 millimeters (0.17 inches) in traverse diameter, a measurement confirmed by another study in 1992 (Verkauf, Von Thron, and O’Brien 1992). Dickinson, a gynecologist, measured and drew the genitals of hundreds of his patients and wrote in his 1949 book Human Sex Anatomy that the clitoris varied considerably in size, with perhaps 20 percent of women having what he described as a large clitoris. Masters and Johnson in 1966 noted variation in the anatomic structure of the clitoris, stating that the glans typically measured 2 to 3 millimeters (0.08 to 0.12 inches) in traverse diameter, but that a clitoris measuring 1 centimeter (0.39 inches) would still be “within normal anatomic limits” (47).

The externally visible glans of the organ can vary in size, with some more prominently visible than others. Size, however, has been seen as important because the size of the organ has been tied to ideas about sexual behavior; physicians for a long time regarded an “enlarged” clitoris as indicating the woman either masturbated or had sex with other women. Both masturbation and homosexuality were seen as forms of hypersexual, and thus masculine, behavior. Some physicians speculated whether the enlarged clitoris was a sign of or caused the hypersexual behavior. Regardless, though, some physicians expected women of color and lesbians to have clitorises that were enlarged because these women were thought to be inherently hypersexual—and with this hypersexuality inscribed on their bodies by the size of their clitoris (Rodriguez 2014). Such racialization similarly occurred regarding black men and penis size during this time. Some clinicians, then, sought to characterize the bodies of women of color and lesbian women’s bodies (regardless of color) as different and, importantly, less developed (physically and morally) than white, heterosexual women’s bodies (Somerville 1994). This was the basis of a study conducted in the 1930s in the United States that attempted to confirm whether there were any measurable physical differences between heterosexuals and homosexuals—physical differences that included measuring the external genitals of both men and women, in particular between women, and in particular the size of the clitoris (Terry 1999).

Regarding lesbians, the idea (and, for some, fear) was that women would use a larger-than-typical clitoris for penetrative vaginal sex with another woman—essentially using it as a penis. The French anatomist Pierre Dionis (1643–1718) described the clitoris as sometimes becoming “as big and long as a Man’s Yard,” and when this occurred, women with the “big and long” clitoris “may abuse it, and pollute themselves with other Women” (quoted in Rogers 1973, 25, 26). The idea that a woman would use an enlarged clitoris to have intercourse with another woman continued into the twentieth century, as suggested by the American physician Frank S. Caprio, who wrote in his 1954 book on female homosexuality, “Some lesbians with an unusually elongated clitoris have been known to insert the end of the clitoris into the vagina[s] of their partner” (20). Such beliefs reinforced the narrow idea of sex as only heterosexual and only penetrative, as well as the idea that two women engaged in sex would seek to replicate such behavior.
Clitoral Size and Ambiguous Sex

Although an “enlarged” clitoris was sometimes regarded as a sign of sexual behavior, in the nineteenth century, the “abnormal enlargement” of the clitoris could also be regarded as "congenital rather than acquired”—meaning the enlargement was not brought on by either masturbation or homosexual sex but instead was a condition of birth.

Regardless, concerns still arose about a woman’s glans becoming large enough "to resemble a penis,” as the physician Robert Barnes wrote in 1874 (761). When Barnes wrote this, he and many of his peers in North America and Europe sometimes labeled people with genitals that seemed not to align with their gender as hermaphrodites—the female patient with the clitoris resembling a penis, per the concern of Barnes. This labeling was followed in the early twentieth century by the concept of intersex, a term intended to describe individuals with sex characteristics—be they chromosomal, gonadal, and/or anatomic—seen as discordant with their social sex (Dreger 1998; Fausto-Sterling 2000; Reis 2005). Physicians sometimes removed a clitoris that was seen as overly large—and thus more like a penis—to align a patient's genital appearance with their feminine social sex.

The protocol for when to perform clitoral removal surgeries for babies with congenitally acquired enlarged clitorises originated at Johns Hopkins University in the 1930s. Justification for the surgeries was soon supported by the belief that babies were gender neutral for the first year and a half of their lives, and that, if genitalia were made to reflect the given gender assignment, the child would develop as that gender and be attracted as an adult to a sexual partner of the opposite gender (Eder 2010; Minto et al. 2003). This surgical protocol—the removal of both the corpora and the glans—was the standard protocol through at least the 1980s, conducted in support of this theory of gender (Minto et al. 2003).

By the 1990s, however, these surgeries, and the concept of gender neutrality at birth, began to be challenged, in particular by those who had undergone the surgery as children (Angier 1997). In 1993 the Intersex Society of North America was founded, and this organization, as well as concerned others, began to challenge the surgical standard of care that removed sensitive tissue and organs (Matthews 2000; Feder and Dreger 2016). Though initially dismissed by some practitioners as unreasonable, the push to end these elective surgeries on children grew over the following decades, assisted by questions about there being little long-term evidence to support the necessity, safety, or efficacy of the procedures (Feder and Dreger 2016). Indeed, one study published in 2003 focusing on individuals who had undergone the standard surgery because of a congenitally large clitoris found that they were more likely, compared to those who had not undergone the surgery, to have difficulty in achieving orgasm (Minto et al. 2003).
Removing All or Part of the Clitoris

In 2018 the World Health Organization (WHO) estimated that more than 200 million living women and girls had undergone the removal of all or part of their external genitals. The WHO defines such practices as female genital mutilation (FGM). FGM includes removing the prepuce/foreskin of the glans (female circumcision) or all of the glans of the clitoris (clitoridectomy). The WHO in 2018 listed the practices as most commonly performed in parts of Africa (concentrated in the eastern, western, and northeastern areas), as well as in parts of the Middle East and Asia. The organization also stressed, however, that the practice is a concern beyond these boundaries, as sometimes immigrants from these areas take the practice with them. The WHO stressed the lack of medical benefit or need and the potential health complications of the procedures, including, potentially, sexual ones. Although there had been international efforts earlier, in 1997 the WHO, the United Nations Children’s Fund, and the United Nations Population Fund issued a joint statement condemning the practices. As of early 2018, the practice was illegal in over forty countries, including in Guinea since 1965, Sweden since 1982, the United Kingdom since 1985, Burkina Faso and the United States since 1996, Senegal since 1999, South Africa since 2000, and Denmark since 2003 (United Nations Population Fund 2018).

Although European physicians who traveled to parts of Africa and elsewhere in the world where all or parts of the female genitals were removed as part of initiation rites knew about these practices, it was not until the 1970s that the popular press in Europe and the United States began discussing them. The North American activist Fran Hosken (1920–2006) is often credited with bringing the practices to public attention in Europe and North America, as well as encouraging a change in calling all the practices (which can also include the removal of parts of the labia) “female genital mutilation” rather than “female circumcision.” The former term, while still used by the WHO, is charged, and some—both those who argue for respecting the cultural right to the practices and those who argue the practices should not be tolerated—question its use. Instead of female genital mutilation, some use the term female genital cutting, and others have called for the use of the term female genital surgeries (Johnsdotter and Essén 2010; Public Policy Advisory Network 2012).

Some physicians in the United States as well as in Europe used clitoridectomy as a medical therapy for treating masturbation from the nineteenth through at least the middle of the twentieth century. American physicians also used female circumcision to stop a woman or girl from masturbating, often at the request of the woman herself or of the girl’s parents. In addition to removing a clitoral hood to stop masturbation, some physicians in the United States beginning in the late nineteenth century also used female circumcision to enable a woman to better respond sexually during vaginal penetrative intercourse. The idea behind each surgery was that the clitoris needed correction; masturbation or an inability to respond sexually was tied to the state of the clitoris—a state that female circumcision could surgically correct (Rodriguez 2014).

Removing the foreskin of the glans clitoris to enable orgasm during penetrative sex continues to be performed in the early twenty-first century, although the procedure is more often called clitoral unhooding rather than female circumcision (Rodriguez 2014). There is little evidence to support the contention that this surgery can help enable orgasm during vaginal sex; indeed, it appears to conflict with established ideas about how the clitoris reacts during sexual response, per the work of Masters and Johnson (1966), who noted that the glans of the clitoris retracts under the hood just prior to orgasm, since the organ is particularly sensitive at that moment. In addition, some have challenged the seeming acceptance of clitoral unhooding (as well as other elective surgeries on the vulva labeled female genital cosmetic surgeries) in Western countries as legal and ethical, whereas in those same countries female genital mutilation/female genital cutting is illegal and considered unethical to perform (Johnsdotter and Essén 2010).

Creating a Clitoris

Surgeries have been developed to reconstruct the anatomy and sexual function of the clitoris when it has been removed through clitoridectomy by using the residual internal clitoral shaft (Foldes 2006). Surgeries were also developed over the course of the twentieth century to create a clitoris as part of the surgical transition from male to female. When male-to-female transition surgeries began to be sought and developed in the 1940s and 1950s, the focus was on creating a neo-vagina. As techniques advanced, however, both patients and physicians sought to create a functional and aesthetic neo-clitoris. Although this surgery has proven to be challenging, by the early twenty-first century most surgeons who perform clitoroplasty create a clitoris from the glans of the penis (Ettner 2016).

The Politics of the Clitoris and Female Sexuality

Despite a long recognition of the clitoris as the principal organ of sexual response for women, this has not been without controversy. Because the organ is so tied to female sexuality, some have tried to play down its importance to female sexual response. Most famously, the Austrian neurologist Sigmund Freud (1856–1939) and some of his followers in the first half of the twentieth century argued that healthy and mature women had vaginal, not clitoral, orgasms, thus reinforcing the ideal of heterosexual, penetrative, and, potentially, reproductive sex and labeling women who failed to so perform as unhealthy and immature. Kinsey in the 1950s disparaged the vaginal orgasm as a “biological impossibility” (Kinsey et al. 1953, 584), though it remained a popular idea. In their work published in the following decade, Masters and Johnson similarly considered that physiological evidence did not support the idea of there being a vaginal orgasm as distinct from a clitoral one. Indeed, in their 1966 book Human Sexual Response, Masters and Johnson devoted a whole chapter to the clitoris and, based on their research, wrote that “the human female now has an undeniable opportunity to develop realistically her own sexual response levels” because of knowledge gained about the importance of the clitoris to female sexual response and about how the clitoris responds during orgasm (138).

In many ways, the work of Masters and Johnson solidified centuries-old physiological ideas about the clitoris as the central sexual organ for women, and, in their work, they encouraged masturbation as a means to develop sexual self-knowledge. However, because Masters and Johnson were primarily concerned with assisting heterosexual couples having difficulties regarding intercourse, sex for them remained heterosexual and existing within long-term, married relationships (Robinson 1976).

Notwithstanding Masters and Johnson's narrow view of sex, their work on the clitoris inspired and supported ideas about the potential of female sexual response and behavior both within and outside of married, heterosexual, penetrative sex. Anne Koedt's 1968 article “The Myth of the Vaginal Orgasm” became a foundational text for North American feminists as they considered what sexual pleasure meant for women in a patriarchal society, as well as what it could potentially mean if not contained within the boundaries of motherhood and heterosexuality. The clitoris became, for many women in the 1970s, an organ of political and sexual revolution (Gerhard 2001). In an effort to better comprehend their sexual bodies, some North American women came together and looked at their own and each other's vulvas, seeking to understand their external and internal genitals, including the clitoris (Murphy 2004).

This popular embracing of the sexual potential of the clitoris—and the perceived need to educate about not just its sexual potential, but even its location and internal anatomical structure—continued through the late twentieth century and into the twenty-first in such books as Rebecca Chalker's The Clitoral Truth (2010), in such projects as Cliteracy, and in the life-size, free model of a clitoris, designed in 2016 by French engineer and sociologist Odile Fillod, that one can download to print on a three-dimensional printer (Russo 2017).

SEE ALSO Orgasm and Orgasmology; Penis

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Blackledge, Catherine. The Story of V: A Natural History of Female Sexuality. New Brunswick,

The development of the concept of this term for homosexuals who have not publicly identified with their sexuality and its application in various cultures.

The closet, briefly defined, is a condition produced by discourses that create a normative set of social rules that identify and render certain nonnormative genders and sexualities unspeakable, a secret, and a source of shame. The concept of being in or out of “the closet” is contingent on the recognition of “the homosexual” as a discrete type of person—a distinction European sexologists began to draw as early as the mid-nineteenth century. Yet this concept did not become widespread in North America and Western Europe until the middle of the twentieth century and has spread unevenly across the globe since World War II (1939–1945).

In his 1978 book The History of Sexuality: An Introduction, the French philosopher Michel Foucault (1926–1984) outlined the deep history of the expert theorizing reaching back to the Enlightenment that helped produce the stigmatization and closeting of forms of nonnormative gender and sexual expression and identity in many modern, Western societies. Experts, such as psychiatrists, educators, and doctors, became increasingly interested in studying the issue of sex and in classifying individuals as “good” or “bad” on the basis of their sexual desire and expression.

Although it does not actually mention the term explicitly, Foucault’s discussion in The History of Sexuality about the issue of silence provides an early conceptual framework for understanding what “the closet” is. Once homosexuality became what Oscar Wilde’s lover Lord Alfred Douglas called “the love that dare not speak its name” in his 1894 poem “Two Loves,” it set the preconditions for the interplay of secrecy and disclosure that characterizes the closet. With Foucault, it is also evident that the closet is not just an individual-level phenomenon, but also a political one. Foucault elucidates the intrusion of the state into the personal and sexual lives of the individual (what he termed “biopower”). Through expert discourses and social norms, biopower works to define differences between “good” and “bad” sexuality, and to consign the sexuality on the “bad side” to silence and censorship. “Silence itself—the things one declines to say, or is forbidden to name, the discretion that is required between different speakers—is less the absolute limit of discourse, the other side from which it is separated by a strict boundary, than an element that functions alongside the things said, with them and in relation to them within over-all strategies” (Foucault 1978, 27).

Along these same lines, the queer theorist Michael Warner argues that the closet is not just an individual-level experience of shame and secrecy, but the product of norms governing sexuality that are enacted through social interactions. According to Warner, “Queers understand, at some level, that the closet was built around them, willynilly, by dominant assumptions about what goes without saying, what can be said without a breach of decorum, who shares the onus of disclosure, and who will bear the consequences of speech and silence” (1999, 180). The sociologist Erving Goffman describes what this looks like at the interactional level through his concept of the “careful work of disattention”—all the anxious activity and effort that closeted people put into passing and concealing their queerness in keeping with the strictures mandated by “normal” society (1963, 41).

At the same time, the closet’s injunction to silence can afford opportunities for queer social life that enjoy a certain amount of protection because they are not being subjected to public scrutiny. The case of the Middle East illustrates this point. In his 2005 study of homosexuality in Arab-Islamic culture between 1500 and 1800, Khaled El-Rouayheb examined the textual strategies that writers used to discuss homosexual desire “under the radar,” without drawing the ire of official prohibitions on homoeroticism. El-Rouayheb finds that there was a profusion of writings about male homosexuality on the part of Ottoman urban elites during this period. Their literary milieu concentrated especially on “pederastic” relationships between adult men and feminized male youths. Some authors wrote negatively and dismissively of such relationships through the use of the phrase “he inclines to boys.” But others, El-Rouayheb argues, “resorted to a different vocabulary, a different way of speaking” to give expression to homoerotic desire by using coded or circumspect language that evaded such stigma (2005, 51).

The notion of the closet has a specific logic and conceptual foundation, or what the queer theorist Eve Kosofsky Sedgwick calls the “epistemology of the closet” in her 1990 book of the same name. Sedgwick argues that most Western discourses about homosexuality have been characterized by a particular formation of knowledge that conceptualizes homosexuality in a bipolar fashion. On the one hand, homosexuality is thought to be unremarkable, quotidian, something in which potentially anyone might engage, and not definitive of a distinct type of deviant subject. She calls this the “universalizing view” (1990, 1). On the other hand, homosexuality is thought to be a characteristic shared by a discrete, small, and contained minority of individuals. Sedgwick calls this the “minoritizing view”: the understanding of homosexuality as a discrete identity and kind of person, providing the conceptual foundation on which individuals could go “in the closet” in the first place (1).

Valerie Traub translates Sedgwick’s framework into historical terms to describe what might be called the epistemology of the lesbian closet in seventeenth-century England. At the beginning of that period, she finds, female-female eroticism—“the sharing of beds, kissing and caressing, and exclusive friendships”—was “considered chaste” and “represented as unexceptional” (2002, 19). Over the course of the seventeenth century, however, “the intertextual circulation of anatomy books, midwiferies, travel narratives, obscenity, and other imaginative literature led to increasing suspicion about those forms of female intimacy,” which began “to be construed as immoral, irrational, a threat to other women as well as to men” (Traub 2002, 19). In other words, by the end of the seventeenth century, there emerged a minoritizing concept of “the lesbian” as a discrete type of person who could now be identified, stigmatized, marginalized, or closeted.

The Invention of the Modern Closet

From the 1850s onward, industrialization and the expansion of cities around the globe gave many people a newfound anonymity that allowed them to live at least part of their lives as openly queer for the first time. As the historian John D’Emilio has argued, gay men and lesbians living in urban areas “began to invent ways of meeting each other and sustaining a group life” (1983, 105). Between about 1890 and 1930, George Chauncey echoes, New York City was home to a “highly visible, remarkably complex, and continually changing gay male world” (1994, 1). In 1896 in Berlin, the editor Adolf Brand (1874–1945) began publishing the first-ever gay political journal, Der Eigene (“a marvelous word suggesting ‘self,’ ‘same’ [sex], and ‘different’” [Steakley 1975, 23]), while the Jewish physician and sexologist Magnus Hirschfeld (1868–1935) helped found the world’s first gay rights organization, the Wissenschaftlich-humanitäres Komitee (Scientific-Humanitarian Committee) the following year. In Paris, a “growing commercial world that catered to homosexual men comprising bathhouses, bars, and restaurants had emerged by the early 1900s” (Sibalis 1999, 25). Similarly, London was “the site of a vibrant, extensive, and diverse queer urban culture. Overlapping social worlds took hold in parks, streets, and urinals; in pubs, restaurants, and dancehalls; in Turkish baths; in furnished rooms and lodging houses” (Houlbrook 2005, 3).

Working through notions of secrecy and disclosure, the closet often depends on the idea that there is a discrete minority of queer subjects who inhabit their own “closeted” world, hidden from the mainstream public. Although such secrecy and disclosure can work to protect queer spaces and sexual expression, they can simultaneously be used to motivate moral panic, repression, and the suppression of queer identities by the state and other actors. Thus, in early twentieth-century Japan, as the historian Gregory M. Pflugfelder argues, journalists depicted urban gay subcultures as a secret that they needed to expose through their writing. “Popular writings construed the male-male erotic subculture of the contemporary cityscape as a shadowy and secret world, the existence of which was barely known to or even suspected by outsiders” (1999, 320).

Similarly, the visibility of queer subcultures in Europe and the United States led to a series of antihomosexual campaigns between the 1920s and the 1950s. These new forms of state surveillance and regulation of same-sex identities and environments helped codify the notion of “the closet.” The early homosexual emancipation movement in Germany was brought to a violent and premature end by the rise of the Nazi Party in the 1920s and 1930s. In the United States, Chauncey argues, “the state built a closet in the 1930s and forced gay people to hide in it” through new sex offender legislation that targeted homosexuals, the vigorous enforcement of that legislation, and new regulations punishing and suppressing queer bars (1994, 9). In the 1950s, the US federal government expelled hundreds of employees from the civil service in what the historian David K. Johnson (2004) calls the “Lavender Scare,” a corollary of the parallel “Red Scare,” or crackdown on suspected communists.

On the other end of the spectrum, such single-sex environments as prisons—where so-called situational homosexuality occurs—have produced forms of queering that do not always reflect the minoritizing notion of the closet. Instead, they typify the coexistent universalizing mode in which same-sex intimacy is common, unremarkable, and widespread. As the historian Regina Kunzel finds, “Marked by the participation of putatively ‘normal’ or otherwise heterosexual people in same-sex sex, prison sexual life failed to synchronize with dominant notions of sexuality—tracked by historians as emerging in the nineteenth century and solidifying in the twentieth—which held sexual acts and desires to be expressions of sexual identity” (2008, 1–2). In his 2017 work on the “forging [of] Gulag sexualities” in early twentieth-century Russia, Dan Healey similarly reveals how prison produced its own distinct mode of gay subjectivity, sexual practice, and culture.

The military is another institution where forms of repression and expression/identity-formation went hand in hand. As the historian Allan Bérubé finds, World War II produced a collective “coming out under fire” by mobilizing huge swaths of people in same-sex environments.

Once they left the constraints of family life and watchful neighbors, many recruits were surprised to find that military service gave them opportunities to begin a “coming-out” process.... Gathered together in military camps, they often came to terms with their sexual desires, fell in love, made friends with other gay people, and began to name and talk about who they were.

(1990, 6)

In the postwar period, however, the US military created a special category of “blue” discharge for servicepeople dismissed for homosexuality, giving them a mark of disgrace that followed many of them for the rest of their lives (Bérubé 1990). The historian Margot Canaday agrees in The Straight State (2009) that a crackdown on lesbians in the military early in the Cold War led many women to come out for the first time—both to others and to themselves: “State repression was productive of identity in complicated ways—women's attempts to manage the antilesbian apparatus within the military frequently led them to articulate a lesbian identity in much sharper terms” (202).

The culture industry has also played a key role in spreading ideas of the closet. For much of the twentieth century, American film and television censored queer characters and themes in movies, stereotyping such characters as “deviant” and “dangerous,” and using plotlines to kill them off. The gay activist and scholar Vito Russo called this the “celluloid closet” in his 1981 book of the same name. (Celluloid is a type of plastic formerly used to make film.) In the 1920s and early 1930s, it was common for popular films to include explicitly queer content. In 1930, however, the Motion Picture Producers and Distributors of America instituted new guidelines for moral standards in Hollywood films that targeted homosexuality in particular by including the prohibition of explicitly queer characters (Russo 1981).

At the same time, queer writers, artists, and activists responded to this repression by voicing their experiences and contesting their marginalization through the notion of the closet. In 1958, the gay poet Frank O'Hara (1926–1966) published a poem titled “Ode: Salute to the French Negro Poets” that marks the first known instance in which a writer used the metaphor of “the closet” to describe the disqualification and silencing of gay life (Abelove 2015). O'Hara wrote the poem as an homage to Négritude, the Paris-born movement in the 1930s and 1940s of black intellectuals who explored questions of black identity and politics and challenged their marginal place in society. In the process of paying tribute to these intellectuals, “Ode” draws an analogy between the marginalization of people of color and the suppression of gay life in the United States. The poem dreams of a day when > utter disparagement turns into praise as generations read the message of our hearts in adolescent closets who once shot at us in doorways or kept us from living freely because they were too young then to know what they would ultimately need from a barren and heart-sore life

(1958, 305)

The metaphor of the closet gave O'Hara a way to describe the culture of repression and silencing that “traduced” gay love and forced gay people into lives of “reticence.”
In the wake of O'Hara's early use of the term in the “Ode” poem, in the 1960s gay activists worldwide popularized the idea that people should “come out of the closet,” thereby transforming that notion into a political strategy aimed at constructing gays and lesbians (and, later, LGBTQ+ people more broadly) as a discrete and identifiable minority and as a political force. As Barry D. Adam, Jan Willem Duyvendak, and André Krouwel emphasize, the emergence of the modern LGBTQ+ rights movement was global in scope: “Contemporary movements trace their origins to Amsterdam, Copenhagen, Paris, and Los Angeles, where a few brave individuals renewed efforts in the 1950s to carve out small gay-friendly spaces in the chilly climate of post-war reconstruction” (1999, 1). The gay rights organizations of the 1950s were relatively circumspect in the context of the culture of antigay repression in which they were operating, but in the 1960s a new cohort of gay “liberation” activists ushered in a new era of the movement by popularizing the ethos of gay visibility and coming out. A flyer advertising a protest in the early 1970s organized by the Los Angeles chapter of the Gay Liberation Front described how “Lonely men, young and old, have come from Los Angeles, from Bakersfield and Jacksonville, from Chicago and Berlin [to come] out of the closets and into the streets” (“Come Out” flyer).

With the growth of queer audiences, the “comingout” narrative also developed into a crucial genre for LGBTQ+ literature in the West, enveloping works as diverse as Rita Mae Brown's 1973 novel Rubyfruit Jungle, Jan Morris's 1974 trans autobiography Conundrum, Edmund White's 1982 novel A Boy's Own Story, and John Fox's 1984 young adult tale The Boys on the Rock. The AIDS crisis that began in the 1980s also gave rise to a kind of double closet and new kinds of coming-out chronicles, such as Oscar Moore's A Matter of Life and Sex (1991) and Colm Tóibín's Story of the Night (1996).

Gay liberation activists’ strategy of calling for queer people to come out of the closet combined the newer metaphor of “the closet” with an older notion of “coming out” that was already in widespread use. In the early twentieth century, gay men drew on the cultural tradition of a young woman “coming out” at a debutante ball, which signified her newfound eligibility for courtship and marriage, adapting it into a way of revealing themselves as queer to their peers at drag balls in places ranging from the historically black Harlem neighborhood of New York City to the dance hall at the Magic-City amusement park in Paris (Chauncey 1994; Sibalis 2002). As Henry Abelove (2015) argues, gay liberation activists “transformed the meaning of coming out” by extending it beyond the context of the gay balls to “the shedding of life-denying reticence in the face of the public at large.” This activism also led to the proclamation of the first National Coming Out Day (NCOD) in the United States on 11 October 1988, on the anniversary of the second National March on Washington for Lesbian and Gay Rights a year earlier. NCOD is now sponsored by the LGBTQ+ rights organization Human Rights Campaign. The LGBTQ+ charity Stonewall sponsors NCOD in Britain.

Yet it would be a mistake to view the closet as always or necessarily liberating because even if a person does come out, they might still be punished for “lying”—for not disclosing earlier that they were queer. “As Sedgwick points out in Epistemology of the Closet, the subject can be faulted for not disclosing enough rather than disclosing too much about her or his sexuality. This disclosure is ‘at once compulsory and forbidden’” (quoted in de Villiers 2012, 3). In a court case originating in Maryland in 1973, an eighth-grade earth science teacher named Joseph Acanfora was transferred to a position that did not involve teaching after the school district in Montgomery County learned that he was gay. When Acanfora went public with his homosexuality by appearing on such news programs as 60 Minutes to discuss his case, the district refused to grant him a new contract at all. Ultimately, the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals ruled in favor of the school district, arguing that Acanfora, when he applied for the teaching position in the first place, should have disclosed the fact that he had been an officer of a student homophile organization in college (Acanfora v. Board of Education of Montgomery County 1973). As Sedgwick finds in her analysis of the case, “The rationale for keeping Acanfora out of his classroom was thus no longer that he had disclosed too much about his homosexuality, but quite the opposite, that he had not disclosed enough” (1990, 69). In the Acanfora case, the closet’s logical incoherence—he was damned if he did come out, and damned if he did not—provided an institution (the school district) with a flexible device with which to stigmatize and marginalize a queer person. As David M. Halperin has argued, “Homophobic discourses operate strategically by means of logical contradictions” (1995, 34).

As the Acanfora case suggests, making one’s gay identity public could have far-reaching personal consequences; the same thing was true at the level of politics through “outing,” or the practice of taking down a political opponent by outing them as gay. Nowhere is this more evident than in the so-called Eulenburg affair in the German Reichstag. As James D. Steakley explained in his work on the affair, “From 1907 to 1909, imperial Germany was by turns amused and mortified by a series of journalistic exposés, libel trials, and Reichstag speeches, all of which turned upon the alleged homosexuality of the chancellor and of two distinguished members of the entourage of Kaiser Wilhelm II” (1983, 20). In a kind of “reverse McCarthyism” (New York Times, quoted in Sedgwick 1990, 243), Hirschfeld testified against one of the entourage members by outing him, in his scientific opinion, as a homosexual. Reflecting on the affair in 1933, Hirschfeld wrote that the outcome was “no more and no less than a victory for the tendency that ultimately issued in the events of the World War” by ousting Kaiser Wilhelm and supplanting his government with a militaristic and pugilistic regime (quoted in Steakley 1983, 21). As Sedgwick argues, the Eulenburg affair demonstrates how powerful and virulent the minoritizing view of “the homosexual” can be when wielded as a weapon in the sphere of politics: “It is by the homosexual question, which has never so far been emptied of its homophobic impulsions, that the energy of their construction and exploitation continues to be marked” (1990, 246).

Whither the Closet?
The Polish novelist Michal Witkowski’s Lubiewo (2005; Lovetown [2010]) also explores the idea that silence, repression, and closeting afforded LGBTQ+ people certain opportunities and personal freedoms in the past that are no longer available. The novel tells the story of two older, swishy gay men or “aunties” named Patricia and Lucretia who reminisce about queer life in the “bad old days” before the fall of communism in 1989, the subsequent Westernization of Poland, and eventually the expansion of LGBT rights. Queer men in precommunist Poland may have lacked official legitimacy and civil rights, but they enjoyed a robust queer subculture in places such as Lovetown, a fictive beach resort on the German border that once served as a vibrant gay male cruising locale. For these bitter old queens, the closet was not simply or only bad: the social and sexual opportunities that such historical spaces afforded for queer sex and social life were actually superior to the ones available to them under the new, ostensibly queer-friendly regime. Like the Ottoman writers described by El-Rouayheb (2005) who created ways to talk about male homoeroticism “under the radar” in the context of official prohibition, in Lovetown, repression (both general political repression and repression directed at queer communities in particular) was likewise a productive site that fostered the elaboration of a queer subculture.

The opportunities for flourishing that the closet can afford have led some critics to celebrate its utility, or in some cases even call for queer people to “get back in the closet” (Yiannopoulos 2015). The scholar Francesca Stella conducted research on Soviet and post-Soviet lesbians, many of whom lived a double life involving both lesbian and straight relationships. These women were not focused on being “out,” but rather “on managing one’s identity appropriately across different social contexts, which is associated with rules of propriety and risk-assessment” (Stella 2015, 106). As the historian Healey argues, “For Stella, this necessitates a rethinking of the ‘closet’ in the Western sense of a burden of inauthenticity and oppression for same-sex loving people; the closet, in the lives of her subjects, becomes a place of safety and possibility” (2017, 21).

In sinophone cultures, scholars have debated strategies of “coming out” versus “coming home.” In the late 1990s and the first years of the twenty-first century, the sociologist Wahshan Chou argued that the Western model of coming out of the closet is an imperialist notion that conflicts with Chinese cultural values of “non-conflictual harmonious relationships” and “a healthy personality that is not centered on sex(uality)” (quoted in Liu and Ding 2005, 30). According to Chou, the Chinese family kinship system is the central feature distinguishing “Chinese” from “Western” forms of homosexual identity and sociality. Based on interviews conducted in Hong Kong, he concluded that tongzhi (a Chinese term for lesbigay people) rejected what he viewed as the individualist, confrontational politics of Western-style coming out in favor of a strategy of “coming home,” whereby “such tongzhi would introduce a same-sex partner into the parental home where she or he would be tacitly integrated into the family circle, without the topic of the couple’s same-sex relationship ever needing to be directly broached” (Martin 2015, 37).
Although this formulation of “coming home” speaks to the specificities of Chinese cultures and grants people agency within their cultural contexts, it has also proved controversial, not least because Chou has repeatedly categorized ancient China as “a world without homo-hetero duality,” unlike the West. As Hongwei Bao notes, “His China/West dichotomy risks essentializing cultural differences in a globalizing world where ‘hybridity’ is the norm” (2018, 75). Such other scholars as Day Kit-mui Wong have argued for “a hybrid array of practices that reconfigure and subvert, at least as much as they reproduce, dominant family values” (Martin 2015, 38). As Jen-peng Liu and Naifei Ding argue, “Paradoxically, [Chou] write[s] of an ‘essentially’ nonhomophobic Chinese culture…. The question we would like to ask is, in what ways might the residual and reconfigured ideology of reticent tolerance actually enable or facilitate the workings of an unfamiliar ‘gentle’ homophobia” (2005, 31–32).

Scholarship on LGBTQ+ politics and culture in the Middle East has similarly produced controversy about the globalization and global applicability of the closet. Joseph A. Massad argues that the closet and the imperative to come out that attends it are oppressive notions being imposed on Egyptian queer men by the globalization of Western LGBTQ+ activism and culture. In 2001, for example, “the Egyptian authorities … crack[ed] down on Cairo locations where Westernized Egyptian gay-identified men and their European and American tourist cohorts congregate” (Massad 2002, 380). Such political repression would not happen, Massad argues, if queer Egyptians were left alone by Westerners and left to their own devices, because Mediterranean men have traditionally avoided homophobic repression by having gay sex “under the radar.” Nevertheless, as Dina Al-Kassim argues, while LGBTQ+ globalization does entail real problems, Massad “reifies cultural difference to such a degree that he winds up arguing for the clarity and distinction of the East/West divide in ways that resonate with the very Orientalism he critiques” (2008, 304).

The closet has implications for the politics of and public health institutions involved in HIV prevention. In northern Nigeria, where homosexuality is strictly forbidden by Islamic religion, culture, and law, gay sexual networks flourish underground in “the carefully concealed culture that surrounds sex among men” called harka—a word that carries the in-group meaning of “homosexual” only among Hausa-speaking men who are “in the know” (Tocco 2014, 313). As anthropologist Jack Ume Tocco argues, the “code of silence” governing homosexual relations in northern Nigeria makes it particularly difficult for institutions to intervene with men who have sex with men to curb the spread of HIV/AIDS. “There is no obvious or ready-made path towards addressing the AIDS epidemic among masu harka [men who have sex with men], but the best chances for intervention will entail drawing on pre-existing social-sexual networks and on the dexterity masu harka have with discretion and euphemism” (2014, 332).

The idea of “coming out” is a stereotype that describes an individual’s transformation from a condition of shame and secrecy to one of self-knowledge and disclosure—which is to say, a transformation of an individual’s identity. But as the sociologists Héctor Carrillo and Jorge Fontdevila have argued, the coming-out model of sexual-identity formation reveals little about the specific means and processes that make it possible for young people to start having sex in the first place. Carrillo and Fontdevila contend that “sexual initiation is not a topic that figures prominently in the English-language academic literature about sexual minority youth. The focus has been instead on the broader topic of sexual identity formation, which subsumes discussion of youths’ first experiences of same-sex sexual interaction into models of the so-called coming out process” (2011, 1241). Carrillo and Fontdevila find that boys and young men in Mexico become sexually active with other males by means of three distinct modes or “patterns” of sexual interaction. In the first, “gender role sexual initiation,” the young person would play the “bottom,” feminized role in oral or anal sex with another male, usually at least two years his senior, who plays the “active,” insertive, top role (1244). “Homosocial sexual initiation” refers to “sex play” among non-gay-identified boys in the same age group, while “object choice sexual initiation” involves same-sex activities among people who have already formed a gay identity and have “come to believe that what makes a man gay or homosexual is his sexual attraction toward men” (1247–1248). By shifting the lens from sexual-identity formation to sexual initiation—from identity to sex—Carrillo and Fontdevila show that these understudied cultures of gay sex play a key role in the coming-out process.

Forms of new media, especially the internet, have created new opportunities for adolescents and even older people to come out of the closet and thereby fashion themselves as agentic sexual and queer subjects. Video technology and such sites as YouTube and TEDx have enabled young people to come out publicly and to family members online, across geographic distances, and in parts of the world or environments where nonnormative sexualities are still stigmatized and/or illegal. Websites such as the It Gets Better Project and Not Only Voices provide users with models for being agentic sexual and queer subjects and facilitate access to support services. New media have also greatly widened access to information about coming out for people who identify as trans, gender nonbinary, genderqueer, gender fluid, intersex, and asexual.

For young people in particular, the internet is not without risks, but as the science and technology scholar Danah Boyd comments, instead of trying to enforce “digital celibacy,” parents should allow their teenage children to construct their own private lives in online social spaces and platforms. She notes that “many teens are developing innovative solutions to achieve privacy in public” (2014, 59). In her 2009 book Out in the Country: Youth, Media, and Queer Visibility in Rural America, Microsoft researcher Mary L. Gray argues that the internet is changing the meaning of coming out of the closet by giving adolescents a space in which they can not only make themselves visible as queer, but also fashion and elaborate queer lives. In one memorable example, Joe, one of her teenaged research subjects, “tossed out the idea of heading over to neighboring Springhaven—20 minutes due south—to do some drag at the Wal-Mart” (Gray 2009, 88).
The closet remains a pervasive feature of social life for many “bad” queer people, ones whose sexual lives or gender presentation place them outside of widely accepted social and legal norms that define “good” or acceptable conduct. The queer theorists Halperin and Traub call this “gay shame,” or sex and gender that mainstream discourses about LGBTQ+ rights find uncomfortable and exclude from their ambit—“those queers whose identities or social markings make them feel out of place in gay pride’s official ceremonies: people with the ‘wrong’ bodies, sadomasochists, sex workers, drag queens, butch dykes, people of color, boy-lovers, bisexuals, immigrants, the poor, the disabled” (2009, 9). For the most stigmatized queer people and practices, the closet continues to enable their flourishing underground while, paradoxically, at the same time marking them with an official stigma of shame and secrecy.

SEE ALSO Blackmail; Coming-Out/Coming-In Discourses in the Middle East; Cruising and Cruising Grounds; Foucault, Influence of; Homoerotic Poetry of Abū Nuvās; Lavender Scare; Military Law and Policy in the United States; Ottoman and Persian Miniature Paintings; Scandals in Europe; Situational Homosexuality; Treason and Queerness; Urban Queerness

BIBLIOGRAPHY

University Press, 2014.

The Cold War was an era of geopolitical tension that developed between former allies the Soviet Union and the United States following the end of World War II in 1945. The two countries, with their oppositional economic and political ideologies—capitalist and democratic (United States) versus centralized and communist (Soviet Union)—developed a fierce rivalry in their quest for supremacy. While the Cold War never resulted in an actual war between the two superpowers, the conflict affected many of the countries over which the United States and Soviet Union exerted, or desired to exert, influence. Each side hoped to reduce the global influence of its opponent by imposing its political and economic system on developing countries, particularly in Asia and Latin America. Given its geographic proximity to the United States, Latin America became a special focus of US efforts to prevent the spread of communism in the world by propping up virulent anticommunist, authoritarian regimes. While this entry will discuss one such regime (in Brazil); conservative dictatorships backed by the United States emerged across the region, from Nicaragua’s Somoza dynasty (1936–1979) to Augusto Pinochet’s terrifying reign in Chile (1973–1989). This entry’s other focus is the Cuban Revolution, which developed in reaction to that country’s own US-friendly autocrat, Fulgencio Batista (r. 1933–1944, 1952–1959).

The Cold War coincided with, and in part caused, a massive expansion of state apparatuses, notably in the rise of security states on both sides of the global divide. Combined with governments’ and societies’ ongoing interest in gender, sexuality, reproduction, and reproductive labor, this expansion enabled the unprecedented intrusion of states and state prerogatives into the intimate lives of everyday people. Such intrusion occurred across Latin America, making this a period in which sexuality became ever more the province of state surveillance, admonishment, and other attempts at control. In general, states’ and societies’ approaches to sexuality tended to adhere to previously determined iterations of desirability and undesirability. Standards for sexual and gender behavior remained based in the normative prescriptions of traditional heteropatriarchy. Yet as Cold War strategists developed theories of the conflict as “total war,” sexuality and morality took on additional political and cultural weight, as they were presumed to affect and reflect national security.
Sexual Nonconformity as “Subversion”

Sexual deviance, in other words, retained the stigmas of bygone days, but it also came to signify security risk: communist subversion to the anticomunist governments that ruled much of the continent, or bourgeois decadence, when viewed from the Left side of the Cold War. Manifestations of new sexual cultures—for example, liberalized discourses about premarital sex and less restrictive clothing—did emerge throughout the Americas, yet neither side of the global struggle sanctioned these. Sexual unconventionality did not necessarily correlate with the political Left, much of which remained at least as traditionalist in its approaches to sexuality as the Right. Just as “communists and queers” became a persecutory mantra in the United States, so sexual nonconformity became a marker for presumed enmity—toward state and society—across Latin America, from Brazil to Cuba to Mexico. Traditional gender and sex roles, and especially “the” traditional family, took on new conceptual importance as cultural reservoirs and cultural weapons in a monumental war for control of humanity. To quote one Brazilian right-wing pundit, writing in 1971, many perceived the “dismantling of customs, the ascension of pornography, … and the downfall of the family” as Cold War stratagems rather than complex cultural processes (Corção 1971, 2). Furthermore, sexuality in Cold War Latin America became not just a terrain of suspicion and persecution, but a deliberate, state-sponsored tool, weaponized via institutionalized sexual torture.

Perhaps the most acute deployment of sexuality as a lynchpin of Cold War paranoia and strategizing occurred at the crossroads of authoritarianism and anticommunism, in military dictatorships that dominated the region in successive waves throughout the period. Brazil’s dictatorship, lasting from 1964 to 1985, was the longest of the South American cluster that arose across the continent in the 1960s and 1970s. The military administrations that ruled Latin America’s largest country for twenty years exemplified a combination that blanketed the hemisphere, to varying degrees: institutionalized military-authoritarian government, vehement anticommmunism, ongoing state violence, and conceptualization of the “subversive” enemy as all-encompassing and likely most active in the terrain of culture, especially gender and sexuality.

Brazil’s military rulers, from the five high-ranking officers who took over the presidency to the uniformed and civilian ministers of state to the everyday bureaucrats and even the fearsome enforcers of dictatorial security, shared a vision of sexual unconventionality (especially pornography and other perceived insults to moral orthodoxy) as a critical means of communist subversion. Theories of subversion by sexual means were elaborated at the exalted Escola Superior de Guerra (ESG; National War College), the principal think tank of national security and the ideological and institutional home of much of the organizing that led to the 1964 coup. (In)famously technocratic, the ESG sought to rationalize the realms of morality, intimacy, and cultural expression. The “experts” at the... school included juridical and medical professionals, alongside nabobs from other fields, who together cemented the notion that “fundamental changes” to gender and sexual behavior were occurring in Brazil, that these were undermining the twin goals of national security and development, and that they were doing so at the behest of a shadowy “International Communist Movement.” True to technocratic form, ESG moralists classified their concerns using a set of categories: “the youth problem,” the “global village,” “women’s liberation,” and the “disaggregation of the family.” More importantly, they doctrinalized these categories as canonical theaters of what they called guerra revolucionária (revolutionary war), a theoretical denomination for communist-inspired unconventional warfare based in French counterinsurgency doctrines.

The dictatorship’s planners, henchmen, and adherents, far beyond the ESG, also came to subscribe to these principles. Throughout the institutions of statecraft, policy making, and military training and strategy, experts and functionaries alike reproduced the idea that, in the words of Justice Minister Alfredo Buzaid (1914–1991), “Communism destroys the family by means of wild propaganda of sex, Free Love, and obscenity” (Buzaid 1972, 13; translation by Benjamin A. Cowan). This meant that military journals published articles about the risks to youth of sexual subversion; training manuals in military institutions warned of immorality as the “greatest reason for generalized insecurity” (Escola Superior de Guerra, 231) and ministers of state publicly decried “moral disaggregation” (da Silva Muricy, para. 41) as a conspiracy “to destroy what they call ‘bourgeois morality,’ to prepare the way for the advent of communism” (da Silva Muricy, para. 41)

Even in the dungeons of the regime, this logic ruled: when the state’s shadowiest agents set out to do the work of violence, they did so attuned to the sexual, gender, and moral practice of suspected “internal enemies.” Some went so far as to outline cultural cues for identifying subversives, indicating that nonconformity could justify repression—an ironic and ineffective approach to policing a Left that likewise eschewed sexual and stylistic unconventionality. Thus, one of the regime’s most notorious architects of brutality, Carlos Alberto Brilhante Ustra (1932–2015), listed the aesthetic cues to the female subversive in terms that foregrounded lack of femininity: “a fiery girl,” betrayed by her “unkempt hair,” lack of makeup, and disinterest in manicures and shopping (Ustra 2006, 426; translation by Benjamin A. Cowan). Academics, too, could wander into the crosshairs of such cultural policing; among other archetypes of subversion identified by secret police was the professor who putatively enticed students into Marxism via “impromptu parties … where homosexuality and the ingestion of drugs and hallucinogens occur, and [the professors] seek to demonstrate the absolute naturalness of these things, so as to corroborate what they have said in the classroom and, at the same time, gain the confidence of the students, decisive factors in the success of their work in recruitment” (Centro de Informações da Aeronáutica 1977; translation by Benjamin A. Cowan).

These ideas were shared, too, by critical sectors of civil society. A coalition of conservative moralists conceived of the authoritarian government as a means to simultaneously remoralize Brazil and rid it of suspected communism. Alarmed at changes—real and perceived—in youth and in popular and family culture, these moralists brought morality to the center of discussions about national security. Everyday citizens also got into the spirit. Well-heeled women from São Paulo, presenting themselves as “concerned mothers,” demanded censorship of public entertainment to protect the nation from a subversive-wrought crisis of immorality. And when neighbor denounced neighbor to the secret police, accusations of sexual misconduct cropped up as “proof” of subversion. Such accusations, as one historian has noted, could be used to “confirm’ the charge of communism” as “sex was always used by intelligence forces to disqualify the ‘enemy’” (Fico 2001, 102; translation by Benjamin A. Cowan).

The Political Policing of Sexuality

The dictatorship’s military and civilian elite resorted to a wide variety of measures to address this perceived threat. Direct policing was perhaps the most obvious and most dire one. This included reading the aesthetic cues previously noted, but also the interpretation of multiform sexual behavior as evidence of involvement with treasonous plotting. Civilian police and intelligence agents in São Paulo, for example, considered possession of pornographic material to be enough reason to arrest a suspected subversive. Female suspects faced particular stigmatization for even the slightest displays of gender or sexual unconventionality, but men and women alike came into the security state’s crosshairs based on imputations of “moral irregularities” that became a staple of police reports. More preventively, the state sought to revamp education to interdict the development and spread of perceived sexual subversion. Students across Brazil in this period found themselves required to take classes in Educação Moral e Cívica (EMC; Moral and Civic Education). Conceived of as a “weapon” in the anticomunist arsenal, EMC explicitly linked communist plotting and individual sexual behavior, and sought to sanitize the latter in the name of national security.

Perhaps the most thoroughgoing means of policing sexuality was censorship, a central pillar of the dictatorship’s repressive apparatus. Introducing comprehensive censorship legislation, the minister of justice assured the public that he meant to ban “obscene publications” expressly to inhibit “the attempts of the agents of international communism to use radio and television to exercise subliminal influence in the bosom of our families” (Buzaid 1971, 34; translation by Benjamin A. Cowan). The bureaucracy of censorship ballooned during the regime, as media, from major journalistic outlets to lavish telenovelas, cinemas, and minor public entertainments, were subjected to cuts, prevented from being published, or prohibited from exhibition. Censors’ evaluation reports objected to all manner of sexual representation in media, from nudity to “free love” to “guys visiting women after 11 pm.”—and kept such material off the air because it would “assault” family morality and thus “harm ... national dignity or interest” (Divisão de Censura de Diversões Públicas 1975; translation by Benjamin A. Cowan).

The political policing of sexuality, guided by the notion that sexual and gender deviance were markers of subversion, had an even more sinister and directly violent variant in sexual torture. Counterinsurgent warriors combined their mandate to stamp out the “internal enemy” (however insignificant that reality) not just with moralism but with antifeminism and sexual sadism. The dungeons and torture centers of this regime, like those across the region, routinely engaged in sexual abuse of prisoners—from the psychological to the brutally physical, including rape and the mutilation of genital organs and other erogenous areas of the body. Institutionalized violence of this species might have been seen as instrumentalist, given widespread counterinsurgent misconceptions that torture could extract reliable information, but it also reflected the conservative gender and sexual politics of these regimes and their enforcers, who sought to subjugate male and female prisoners via sexual abasement and humiliation. Perhaps more often and more systematically, atrocity perpetrators thought to return women detainees to their proper “place” and restore the patriarchal parameters ruptured by such women’s alleged public and political agency.

Left-Wing Social Moralism

Ironically, left-wing forces in Brazil adhered to patriarchy and traditional sexual and moral regimes just as strictly as their rightist, anticommunist antagonists. Socialist moralism, or at the very least chauvinism, remained the rule among even the most radical opponents of the dictatorship. A wide variety of cultural and sexual behaviors, newly available via mass media and consumption, inspired infinite combinations of individual attitudes toward the hot-button political, social, and aesthetic issues of the late 1960s and early 1970s. Yet it is clear that among those who dreamed of revolution and who took up arms against the state, sexual nonconformity seemed a “distraction” from the “real” problems of class struggle. Brazil’s most ardent revolutionaries were willing to sacrifice safety, security, and even life itself for the proletariat—but ignored or disdained liberationist sexual agendas.

Indeed, a core of leftist activists drew a distinction between those who fought for the cause and those who engaged in various modes of sexual and cultural experimentation. For though its extent is difficult to measure, innovation in the arts, in fashion, in gender roles, and in individual sexual and moral choices did emerge in this period in Brazil, as elsewhere in the region, and most notably among the burgeoning ranks of middle-class young people. Rightists looked on with disproportionate alarm at the rise of rock music, miniskirts, and hippies—alarm that perceived these and other phenomena as much more widespread than they likely were. Left-wing purists, meanwhile, referred to the broad array of new practices and attitudes as desbunde or even esquerda festiva (the “party Left”), terms that dismissed such behaviors as unimportant and irresponsible. These terms also, however, reflected the emergence of a new sensibility focused around all-encompassing and (at the time) radical individualism, a rejection of systems past that could be as much, or more, sexual and moral as political. This was particularly true of desbunde, a pejorative that has no direct translation but indicated challenges to traditional art forms, religious orthodoxy, heterosexuality, patriarchy, and even masculinity itself.

Such rejection may not have extended beyond a relatively small and privileged coterie of middle- and upper-class young people in Brazil and elsewhere; yet popular culture and conservative moral panic vis-à-vis new attitudes and practices brought it to the attention of mass audiences. Thus, even if there were very few hippies, and even if the sexual revolution remained limited, for most, to lurid curiosity or timid imaginings, people across the Americas grew acquainted with the idea of these phenomena as meaningful realities. Unfamiliar modes of artistic, sexual, and gender expression drew attention, interest, adherence, and condemnation from Argentina (where parents and religious officials fretted about longhaired rockers) to Chile (where new-age spirituality questioned traditional approaches to religion and the self) and to Mexico (where unconventional behavior encompassed rock music, hippies domestic and foreign, and experimentation with psychedelic experiences).

In each of these places, conservative forces mobilized to oppose such changes, however demographically insignificant. In each case, unconventionality was associated with subversion and the greatest fears of anticommunist state and society—a cultural “assault” on the West. Ironically, however, the left-wing orthodoxy outlined above reflected the realities on the other side of the so-called Iron Curtain, even as it extended beyond Eastern Europe and into the Caribbean. The Soviet establishment, famously moralistic for most of its history, may or may not have set the tone for worldwide “socialist morality.” Certainly, however, sexual moralism was reflected not only among those doomed rebels who struggled against Latin America’s right-wing dictatorships; it also found a home in the pulsing heart of the region’s revolutionary fears and dreams, in Cuba.

The Sexual Culture of the Cuban Revolution

Much ink has been spilled analyzing the Cuban Revolution, the focus of left-wing admiration, right-wing paranoia, and scholarly fascination since its inception in 1953. The sexual culture of the revolution has drawn attention in part because it permits easily accessible criticisms of the regime, particularly in terms of the revolution’s notable homophobia and certain failures of its gender and sexual policies. That said, the Cuban government both (1) set lofty goals and achieved some measure of success in terms of gender equalization, and (2) persecuted deviant sexualities, promoted traditional families, and especially demonized homosexuality in ways and for reasons that mirrored those of the security states on the opposite side of the Cold War. If, as at least one preeminent scholar of the revolution has noted, gender and sexual policy reflected not just traditionalism but the state’s desire to consolidate power, build the economy, and reinforce essentialist ideas about responsible/productive citizenship (Guerra, 2010, 271), Cuban approaches were quite of a piece with those of anticommunist states. All retained the normativities of bygone decades and pre–Cold War societal prescriptions, and yet did so in ways that conformed to the new exigencies of national security as a paramount concern.

This was nowhere more evident than in the poignant irony of emigration and immigration policies that sought to exclude homosexual (or even just homosexual “seeming”) men not only from Cuba but from its great antagonist, the United States. When, in 1980, homosexuals were allowed and even encouraged to leave Cuba as “counterrevolutionaries,” they faced exclusion from the fabled land of refuge for Cuban émigrés, based on the long-standing idea—spanning not only the 90-mile strait between Florida and Cuba, but apparently the hemisphere—that sexual deviants were undesirable and a security risk. Those suspected of homosexuality eventually faced detention in Georgia—an ironic twist for those whose sexual presentation had gained them detention in the Cuban Revolution’s forced work camps known as the Unidades Militares de Ayuda a la Producción (UMAPs; Military Units to Aid Production). In Cuba, such camps were populated by those arrested for such offenses as “looking gay” and “having foreign friends” (Ocasio 2002, 81). Perhaps the most famous victim of these policies was the novelist Reinaldo Arenas (1943–1990), whose persecution, flight from Cuba, and death in New York were chronicled in his autobiography, Antes que anochezca (1992; Before Night Falls [1993]) and its subsequent film adaptation.

In Cuba, as throughout the hemisphere, the quotidian realities of sexual behavior and custom are much more difficult to measure than the reactions of conservatives and moralists. In some ways, the aphorism “se dice nada, se hace todo” (nothing is said, but everything is done) illustrates a disconnect that transcended Cuba and even Latin America itself—a contradiction between, on the one hand, the strict policing of sexuality based on Cold War prerogatives and, on the other, the florescence of sexual practices that represented both continuity with older modes of unconventionality and innovation in the kinds of radical individualism that informed sexual behavior. The marshalling of hearts, minds, and bodies for productive and reproductive service to state and society, a paramount goal of all the states in the region, was seen to be threatened by the emergence of increased autonomy, increased desire, increased creativity, and more pluralistic sexuality, especially in the fabled and ubiquitously invoked realm of “the nation’s youth.” Yet such autonomy did exist, in practice, in public consciousness, and in right- and left-wing mythmaking and demonization. Sexual revolution may not have taken Latin America by storm in the 1960s and 1970s, but there, as elsewhere, its emergence into public and political consciousness during the Cold War made it a critical battleground, imbuing the developing culture wars with the gravity, and the obsessive mania, of national security debates.
SEE ALSO Antes que Anochezca (1992; Reinaldo Arenas); Central American Solidarity Movement; Communism and Queers in Europe; The Cuban Revolution and Homosexuality; Human Rights and Activism in Latin America; The Nicaraguan Revolution de Guerra, Departamento de Estudos, 1975.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Ustra, Carlos Alberto Brilhante. A verdade sufocada: A história que a esquerda não quer que o Brasil conheça [The suffocated truth: The history that the Left does not want Brazil to know]. Brasília, Brazil: Ser, 2006.

The exact meaning of “colonialism” is disputed in Africa and among scholars of Africa. For some, it began with the Spanish and Portuguese conquest of the islands off the Atlantic coast in the fifteenth century, followed over the sixteenth century by the forts and forays that launched the transatlantic slave trade. To Cheikh Anta Diop (1960), it really began with the violent intrusion of “European” power deep into the continent: the Moroccan conquest of the Songhai Empire in western Africa in 1591. Others mark the extension of white settlement from Cape Town in present-day South Africa into the near interior in the late seventeenth century. Yet the vast majority of the continent remained outside of colonial rule until the end of the nineteenth century, and even then colonialism took a wide variety of forms with distinctive political, economic, social, and demographic footprints, including “overseas provinces,” settler colonies, communes, protectorates, mandates, crown colonies, “free states,” a condominium, and concessionaires, not to mention an African American republic under direct US financial management.

It is also debated when colonialism ended. Formal colonial rule began to unravel with the granting of independence to Sudan in 1956, then proceeded apace through the 1960s. The transition to democracy in South Africa in 1994 is commonly held to be the end of the decolonization process. But how significant were these transitions when Europeans and increasingly Americans maintained or even strengthened control through neocolonial means? Indeed, some take colonialism to include all forms of Western domination up to the present, including cultural domination through the influence of donors, corporations, academics, immigration bureaucracies, media, nongovernmental organizations, and solidarity groups.

“Homocolonialism,” for example, a term used by Momin Rahman (2014), applies the concept to the export or imposition of Western norms of homosexual identity and politics to contemporary Africa—an ongoing concern among sexual rights and health activists on the continent.

For the purposes of this entry, colonialism is defined conservatively by its main distinguishing feature: territorial rule by Europeans or settlers of European descent. By that definition colonialism is relatively recent and was of short duration for most of the continent. Brief and complicated as it was, however, the colonial period so defined set the stage for the emergence of many of today’s most pressing problems. Conflicts over sexuality and gender identities and expressions are unquestionably among those problems, much discussed in the broader scholarship on women’s rights and HIV/AIDS (McClintock 1995; Arnfred 2004; Kalipeni et al. 2004; Tamale 2011). Meticulous historical research on same-sex sexuality in the colonial period has yet to be done for most the continent, but the existing research suggests strong links between colonialism, hostile public attitudes, and state repression against sexual minorities. What follows is an assessment of some of the bigger claims in circulation in the historiography and in popular discourse.

Same-Sex Relations between European and African Men

The discussion begins with one of the most inflammatory accusations. It must be acknowledged that colonial conquest likely involved instances of male-male rape and the sexual exploitation of African men and boys by powerful European men. This claim has been made in general terms to politicize homophobia as patriotic African nationalism. Diop (1960), notably, claimed that the Moroccans (and their many Spanish soldiers) corrupted black African morality and in particular introduced sodomy to Africa in their brutal sacking of Songhai. In another case, attested by an Egyptian general in Sudan in the 1880s, one of the reasons for the success of the Mahdist jihad was that it tapped into popular anger at the pederastic practices of Sudan’s Egyptian and Turkish rulers (Jacob 2005). Others have identified an erotic element in white men’s power over black men (Fanon 1967; Lane 1995), or in isolated cases of white homosexual men abusing or exploiting Africans for sex. Stephanie Newell (2006), for example, speculates on a self-described English “Uranist” living with young African boys in 1930s Nigeria, Heike I. Schmidt (2008) describes a male brothel in German colonial Dar es Salaam, and Richard Phillips (2006) records Krio protests against British immorality in Sierra Leone. Numerous fictional accounts depict white men as a homosexually corrupting influence in Africa (Maddy 1973; Everett 2018).

It needs to be stressed, however, that the evidence does not sustain the claim that this was a systemic feature of colonialism. On the contrary, the main era of colonial conquest coincided with an era when homosexuality was being pathologized in science, culture, and ideologies of national or racial fitness. European settlers and missionaries in the colonies, thus, brought intense intolerance of homosexuality with them. Not only was such intolerance important to the performance of their personal respectability, it was also often directly linked to the cause of nation and empire building. Homosexuality was equated with effeminacy and weakness in men, whereas a virile masculinity was needed to confront the enemies of the nation/empire. The dangers of lesbianism were also implicit in the belief that European women were needed as mothers to raise the next generation of imperial patriots and to settle the wild African frontier. Penalties enacted by colonial courts, and ostracism imposed by colonial society, on European men caught in sexual relations with African men could be extreme, and certainly out of proportion to penalties enacted on African men caught with other African men (about whom the state was mostly ambivalent; see, e.g., Lorway 2015). The merest accusation of interracial homosexual desire when laid against political enemies could create enormous scandal (see, e.g., Southey 1997 on 1860s Orange Free State and Schmidt 2008 on pre-1914 German East Africa). As Daniel J. Walther concludes in his analysis of the deportation of accused white homosexuals from German colonies, white male desire for black men was a “crime not only against the state but against whiteness” (2008, 24).

That noted, there is no doubt that European travelers, missionaries, and settlers were often fascinated by African sexual and gender mores, and it is these figures who are responsible for the bulk of documented evidence testifying to historical African sexualities. This included some cases of traditional same-sex relationships and rituals (cf., e.g., Evans-Pritchard 1970). Yet these exceptions aside, much of that documentation was imbued with a racist ideology that tended to construct Africans as “primitive” and primordially heterosexual. The Orientalist gaze that eroticized “the Arab” as homosexually desirable and available, and in the dying decades of French colonialism gave rise to a kind of homosexual tourism in North Africa (Aldrich 2003), did not extend to the peoples south of the Sahara. Instead, that Orientalism tended to support the proposition that Africans needed protection from concupiscent Arabs, south Asians, Chinese, or other workers imported to fill gaps in the emerging local economies (see, e.g., Harries 1990, 1994 on the Chinese laborers in the South African gold mines; see also Epprecht 2014). Virile northern Europeans would also protect Africans from the morally corrupting influences of southern Europeans, such as the Portuguese or itinerant Greek traders.

Same-Sex Practices in the Male Migrant Labor System

Much more impactful on gender and sexuality in Africa than homosexually lusty white men or other immigrants were the many dramatic changes introduced by colonial regimes in the political economy, legal systems, and culture. In the first instance, the core question was how to profitably exploit a colony’s natural resources when the investments needed to do so were so great: the rapid construction of infrastructure across vast spaces and technically challenging terrain; the clearance of forests, swamps, and wild animals to make room for commercial crops, cattle, and white settlement; and the cost-efficient extraction of mineral or other wealth from the land. By the end of the nineteenth century slave labor could no longer be countenanced, so other means to attract or coerce Africans to do these tasks had to be organized. Indentured labor was one way (long-term contracts, wages payable on completion); alcohol as a recruiting tool was another. However, the requirement for Africans to pay taxes in cash was probably the most effective incentive to get African men to sign up for wage labor. Thus was put in motion large-scale male migrant labor and the structured dismantling of African family norms. The male migrant labor system required keeping women and children in the rural areas where they could feed themselves at their own expense while the men were away. An added savings was that the use of male migrant labor meant that the colonial regime could avoid having to provide a normal urban infrastructure with family homes, schools, and hospitals in the industrial or commercial centers.

The male migrant labor system did indeed prove effective in getting capitalism to work for colonial interests. Yet it also very quickly gave rise to a sexual economy that engendered new costs. In the labor camps and growing urban centers, a modern architecture of control was erected, including police, askaris (African mercenaries), and "boss boys" who acted as intermediaries between white managers and black workers. In addition to maintaining discipline among the men and boys who came to work on colonial projects, African police were essential to the task of keeping African women out of town altogether. In the settler colonies of eastern, central, and southern Africa, the colonialists were especially successful in that endeavor, achieving cities where 80 percent or even 90 percent of the population was male. The few women who were there commonly survived by selling beer and sex in negotiated relationships. So-called loose women, or femmes libres, and their many partners in turn gave rise to an epidemic of sexually transmitted diseases, the most feared of which was syphilis. With no effective treatment available until the 1950s, infection condemned people to infertility, social disgrace, and death—not unlike HIV in the 1980s and 1990s.

Colonial regimes tried different strategies to address these moral and public health concerns. The French allowed their African conscripts (tirailleurs sénégalais) to bring wives and children along on military campaigns, for example, while the Belgians invested in "stabilizing" an African urban labor force, providing model homes, recreation facilities, social welfare, and a complex bureaucracy that allowed a small percentage of the African population to settle with family in town. Prisons, closed industrial compounds, juvenile workhouses, and psychiatric hospitals (which scarcely differed from each other in the early days) also provided new institutions for the containment of the social and heterosexual unruliness that urbanization fomented. But the new instruments and strategies of control also gave rise to new disapproved and disruptive behaviors, such as through criminal gangs. Young men’s ability to earn cash wages freed them from a sense of obligation to parents and community and threatened the fraught social compact. One response to this was the formation of new forms of male-male sexual relationships, the best documented of which were the so-called mine marriages between men and boys in the industrial compounds of Johannesburg (Harries 1990, 1994; Moodie and Ndatshe 1994).

The mine marriage (or inkotshane) phenomenon was already entrenched in the migrant labor compounds by the early 1900s and was thought to have remained pervasive, if not dominant, until the 1970s. Migrant men away from their families for months, or even years, at a time, who were afraid to engage in relations with unattached women in town, took younger men or boys as servants and “wives” for the duration of their contracts so that they could return home healthy and unencumbered by the expenses of a town family. The younger partner gained a patron in a dangerous place and would, once he had acquired his own financial independence and urban savvy, graduate from the wife to a husband role. The sex was between the thighs and nonreciprocal; hence, there was no danger of sexually transmitted infection or gendered social hierarchies. An irony not entirely lost on colonial officials and corporate managers was that such homosexual (and often borderline pedophilic) relations were disdained in the ideology of the civilizing mission but appreciated for keeping labor costs lower and stabilizing heterosexual marriages.

Impact of Laws and Governance on Same-Sex Practices

New laws were imported to the colonies and refined to catch the new offenses that arose with racial capitalism. The Portuguese were the first to criminalize “the nefarious sin,” as they called it in the sixteenth century, followed by the Dutch at the Cape in the seventeenth century.

Penalties could be harsh; an African male “transvestite” transported as a slave to Mexico was burnt at the stake in 1585 (Sweet 1996, 186), while torture and execution were typical fates of those convicted of sodomy in Cape Town (Newton-King 2002). It was the British, however, who emerged as the most zealous lawmakers in this regard. In Zimbabwe, for example, they extended the old Roman-Dutch law from the Cape to cover new offenses as the frontier moved northward; in Uganda they simply copied a law developed in another of their colonial possessions (India) that criminalized an act of penetration “against the order of nature” (Lennox and Waites 2013; see also Schmidt 2008 on German law). Over the decades they added new terms such as “indecent assault,” “gross indecency,” “soliciting,” and “crimen injuria” in order to extend the reach of the law to catch consenting, private, and nonpenetrateable acts that the state disapproved of.

It should be stressed that these laws were not aggressively applied to Africans during the colonial era; there were more pressing policing matters to attend to (and female-female relations were never criminalized). For one thing, Africa remained overwhelmingly rural, and most Africans overwhelmingly fell under some form of codified customary (or “Native”) law, largely invisible to the colonial state. Where the new laws were applied it seems to have been more for political demonstration purposes than a determined campaign to repress male-male sexual relations. Robert Lorway (2015) argues, for example, that there were virtually no cases of male-male sexual crime under German rule in what became Namibia, but that Boer-controlled South Africa introduced and enforced antisodomy laws in the period between 1917 and 1930. This was part of South Africa’s campaign to discredit German colonialism (German settlers being the principal target) and to manage public relations around the migrant labor system. Ironically, the courts provided a venue for African men to articulate their disgust with colonialism by performing an idealized heteronormative traditional culture in opposition. That element of anticolonial resistance may explain why the number of cases fell again in the 1930s, as indeed also appears to have happened in colonial Zimbabwe (Epprecht 2014). The laws remained on the books, however, to be inherited by independent national governments. In some cases these laws were actually modernized, postcolonialism, to become more repressive (for example, by finally criminalizing lesbianism). As such, they have been a major negative legacy of British and South African colonial rule.

The impact of colonialism and racial capitalism on female-female sexuality is less well documented and understood. There were no laws specifically prohibiting female-female sex acts, for example, probably because the colonial officials were unaware, unconcerned, and unbelieving that African women were capable of such things. With important exceptions, discussed below, prevailing attitudes among officials and missionaries held that African girls and women were entirely subordinated by the patriarchal kinship structures that demanded fecundity and submission to male desire. There was simply no room for nonheterosexual behavior, if Europeans even allowed that African women had the imagination for that. But if African women's preternaturally heterosexual concupiscence was held in check by customary controls, then colonialism, capitalism, and Christianity had a tendency to unleash it, especially in the growing urban centers. Colonial states, missionaries, and many Africans across the continent were deeply concerned about the health effects of African women's growing sexual "looseness," evident in the rise of women selling sex to men on a short-term basis, high rates of sexually transmitted infections, and low birth rates. That lesbian-like relations might emerge in this context was scarcely imagined or, if noted in (for example) girls' boarding schools (Blacking 1959), was denied as being sexual. They were, instead, thought to be romantic in nongenital ways that would quickly fade as the girls matured to their heterosexual vocation. Judith Gay's 1986 study of Basotho girls and young women was groundbreaking in that respect. The "mummy-baby" relationships she described were also mostly transient in nature and understood as a way to safely practice modern forms of courtship with boys and young men. They could be genital, however, and they were evidently connected to the absence of so many men from the rural areas on account of male migrant labor, possibly extending back to the colonial era.

The exceptions mentioned above primarily involved elite Muslim women in purdah (isolation with the other wives and female servants) and royal princesses within grand polygynous households such as those found among the Azande (Evans-Pritchard 1970). In those societies, the culture of masculine honor was such that a woman risked death for committing heterosexual adultery regardless of how neglected or abused she was by her husband. Yet it was understood that the women still had needs to satisfy beyond waiting patiently for their turn with the lord of the household, and that sexual relations between women might occur with no harm done, provided no one spoke of it. The impact of colonialism on these types of relationships was primarily felt through the ideological sphere, whereby they acquired the stigma of being primitive. Modern women aspired instead to monogamous, heterosexual, companionate marriage, so that female-female sexual relations among the elite tended to wither away (see Gadelrab 2016 for this process in colonial-era Egypt).

Colonial modes of governance had other indirect and unintended consequences for sexuality and gender in Africa, often highly contingent on African agency or collaboration. Indeed, even after Europeans militarily crushed African resistance and divided the continent up into vast empires suiting their own convenience, they crucially depended on Africans to keep the system afloat. The British (in hindsight) called this system “indirect rule,” but the other powers had similar techniques for using Africans to do much of the dirty work of colonialism: gathering taxes, enforcing labor recruitment, policing, and carrying out the many other unpleasant tasks needed to shore up foreign powers to the profit of foreign corporations. This is not to detract from the crimes of European colonialists and their looting business practices. It is just to say that one needs to consider the ways that Europeans incorporated African elites into the system, inventing “traditions” first, if need be, to provide a veneer of legitimacy. These had several long-term consequences for attitudes and practices around same-sex sexuality.

First, rulers in Africa had traditionally had checks and balances against abuse of power. In many cases there had been no chiefs at all but government by consensus of the elders, the latter including postmenopausal women. Consensus was achieved through long debate, but also by close consultation with ancestral and other spirits through mediums adept at the art of selling compromise. Women could sometimes assert power in this way, notably when possessed by the spirit of a venerated male ancestor. Such a woman could hardly marry a man, and might instead take a younger woman as her wife. Under colonial rule, instances of female leadership or genderbending tended to be suppressed in favor of clearly enunciated masculine authority. Many traditional constraints on local power were removed. Co-opted (or created) male chiefs (or commandants de cercle) were given extensive new powers as local enforcers or bureaucrats with little need or interest in abiding by the secondhand opinions of the ancestors. The “native administration” was also given positive incentives from the colonial authority to squeeze their people for personal gain (for example, by “tax farming”—the more taxes you collect, the more you get to keep personally). Along with cooperative imams, emirs, and other Muslim leaders, locally empowered chiefs were freer than before to indulge themselves without regard to old standards of consensus, morality, or restraint. Such was the case in Belgian-ruled Rwanda in 1931 when King Musinga, its central instrument in the native administration, was removed from office after his flagrant moral breaches brought the church and Belgian colonial rule into disrepute in the eyes of its enemies (Germany, especially, from whom the Belgians had recently taken Rwanda). Musinga’s moral breaches included his alleged sexual affairs with young men and boys at the royal court (Des Forges 2011).
Second, the new colonial masters needed to keep subjugated peoples from becoming politicized or forming a common front to oppose the system. Divide and rule by ethnicity was one favored tactic. In addition, the colonialists sought to minimize unrest by “scientifically” managing existing social relations, religious beliefs, and the practice of law. Customs and practices that were offensive to European sensibilities (witchcraft and child marriage, notably) were banned outright, and the most serious crimes were referred to European courts. But otherwise, Africans who remained in the rural areas were basically allowed to keep their old ways. The problem was how to know what the “real customs” were in order to write them down with scientific confidence. Who were the real custodians of knowledge about these matters? And how could the new chiefs be squared with the old, or, to put it another way, how could colonial authorities find and promote traditions that were useful to justifying a bureaucratized local authority or other expedient adaptations? This was where anthropology came in—a new scholarly discipline that flowered in the 1920s and 1930s.

The Impact of Anthropology and Ethnopsychiatry

Once famously referred to as the “handmaiden of colonialism,” anthropology supplied the information needed to legitimize a patriarchal tribal authority that served the new system while continuing to provide a cultural buffer for people against the stresses created by an increasingly cash-based economy and the related breakdown of the moral economy of honor (Vaughan 1991; Schumaker 2001; Lyons and Lyons 2004). For the first few decades, the anthropology (and ethnopsychiatry, another new and closely related “science”) was not very sophisticated. Find the man who looked like the chief, or who said that he was the chief, and ask him (through an interpreter) what the customs of his people were. Sometimes the nearest missionary might have to suffice. When it came to matters of sexuality—inherently difficult to research, but all the more so in societies that value discretion on such matters—salacious rumor, second- or third-hand translation, speculation, and self-interested opinions often had to fill in the knowledge gaps. These were then written down as the law to be referred to in all future cases applying to all the people in the area who seemed to speak roughly the same language, or who the chief said belonged to him. This was then used to block African-controlled innovations that might disturb colonialist prerogatives.

From those crude beginnings, and with slow-improving sophistication, a body of expertise was built up to define exactly who each tribe was, who and what they prayed to, and how they married, raised their children, and buried their dead, among other day-to-day concerns, including how they had sex. The research was so convincing that by the 1950s it was not uncommon for European experts to lecture African chiefs on what their “real customs” were. In the process, however, flexible, negotiable traditions were codified as inflexible customary or “native” law. Ambiguities in African cultures around gender and sexuality were sorted into more easily managed either/or categories. Subtleties in the language were given explicit names and definitions, while meaningful silences became proof of nonexistence or noncomprehension.

The Role of African Educated Elites in Colonialism

A third big change brought by the colonial system is that it stimulated the rise of a small class of mixed race and/or culturally assimilated, literate Africans sometimes called (including by themselves) progressives, modernizers, educated elites, tea drinkers, and ama-respectables. In the case of the French, African assimilés could become French citizens with the right to vote and even to sit in the French parliament. Educated elites everywhere played an important role in the developing colonial bureaucracy, school systems, and urban social welfare systems. For the most part, however, they were largely frozen out of the power structure. Their ability to establish themselves as an economic bourgeoisie was meanwhile undercut by legal restrictions on property ownership, by discriminatory pricing for agricultural products and low salaries, and by structures that favored non-African minorities' stranglehold on capitalist trade. Perhaps even more frustrating, educated Africans were commonly subjected to humiliation at the hands of racist and/or paternalist whites, often tarred with the brush of Africans' supposedly unbridled or primitive heterosexuality (as proven by the biased ethnography). Small wonder that men and women from this class grew restive, and indeed very angry in some cases, at the restrictions, injustices, and slanders ranged against them. They became the core of the African nationalist movement for independence from colonialism.

Yet at the same time, educated Africans were deeply influenced by the colonial ideology of modernization and respectability. The generation that emerged as political leaders in the 1930s to the 1950s was often the second or third to be educated in the mission school system. European, Christian, middle-class values were part of their family upbringing and something they often very profoundly admired. This was especially so when those values were set against either the retrograde and thuggish chiefs promoted under native authority, or the culture of alcohol and freewheeling sexuality among the working class in the cities. African progressives may have been furious at the racism and hypocrisy of European individuals in Africa. But the ideology of respectability as a marker of modernity and progress remained powerfully attractive to those Africans hoping to rise above both the crumbling traditional moral economy on the one side and rampant urban indiscipline on the other. Similarly, colonialist homophobia clearly had white supremacy close to its heart. As an ideology, however, it otherwise fit very well with African middle-class aspirations to assume leadership of the colonial state. In the Rwandan scandal noted previously, for example, the Belgians were said to have been secretly informed of Musinga's behavior by African Christians who were his rivals in the court.
The Struggle for Liberation

The appeal of the colonial ideology is also evident in its continuity from “tea drinkers” to radicals in the emerging African nationalist movement. Some of the most influential voices from the 1930s made precisely that point: homosexuality was a threat not just to the survival of the African family, but to African dignity against the affronts of colonial racism. To the extent that it existed among blacks at all, they argued, homosexuality was introduced to Africa by whites—one more reason to reject European rule and culture. Jomo Kenyatta ([1938] 1961) was the first African intellectual to explicitly express this view, holding up his people’s “normal” sexuality (heterosexual missionary position only) as a source of pride when set beside confused and perverse Europeans. Even more influentially, Frantz Fanon argued in the 1950s that a revolutionary movement in Africa needed black men to stand up against European men’s hatred of blacks arising from their (not always) “repressed homosexual” desires. In the Cold War era, hardline Marxist-Leninists and Maoists joined in the refrain, characterizing homosexuality as a symptom of Western, capitalist, bourgeois decadence, and a betrayal of Africa’s toiling masses. The alleged homosexuality of the last French governor of Cameroon, and his alleged affair with the first president of the independent nation, became a metaphor for continuities between colonial and neocolonial exploitation and humiliation (Nyeck 2013).

Homosexuality was never a major or explicit theme in the liberation struggle. Instead, it was more like a footnote, a few scattered letters to the editor, or a subtle subtext in pro-independence politics. Rudolf Pell Gaudio (2009), for example, found denunciations of the same-sex practicing 'yan daudu, as well as denunciations of lewd dances and prostitution, in letters in newspapers from the 1950s. These practices were linked to criticism of the emir (a British puppet) for not defending northern Nigeria’s good Muslims against corrupting colonial and southern influences. From retrospective comments by a wide range of nationalist leaders from that generation, the deep roots of politicized homophobia can also be inferred in the nationalist project. That includes the obvious, explicitly homophobic denunciations by such leaders as the Tanzanian anticolonialist Julius Nyerere (Dunton 2008). But it was also subsumed within the culture of womanizing, or “warrior” masculinity, performed by leaders such as Kwame Nkrumah of Ghana, Idi Amin of Uganda, and Nelson Mandela of South Africa. The theme crops up as well in a genre of African nationalist fiction from the era, wherein heroic male African characters consume women sexually, and white women in particular, as if in rebuke to white men’s condescension. It was a masculinity that allowed no room for doubt about African heterosexuality lest such doubt feed into the colonial propaganda of African indiscipline and immaturity (Dunton 1989).

As it happened, outside of southern Africa formal colonial rule collapsed much faster than almost anyone had expected. In the euphoria of independence, and amid all the frustrations and calamities that so often followed quickly afterward, anxieties about the theoretical dangers of homosexuality to the body politic took a backseat to other, more immediately obvious and pressing concerns. By numerous accounts, this enabled a small flowering of gay or gayish urban scenes in the early postcolonial period—a short-lived “heaven” in the case of Namibia in the early 1990s, according to one LGBTI activist (Currier 2012, 45; see also Le Pape and Vidal 1984 on the Abidjan milieu in the 1960s and 1970s). But for the majority population, disappointment with the fruits of independence under neocolonial conditions and conditionalities was quick to settle in. Frustration with the economic and political malaise in the 1980s and 1990s fueled a hunger for easy answers that might be found in fundamentalist religion and political demagoguery, including through the creation of scapegoats. Tribal or ethnic violence has been a frequent, tragic result. The legacy of colonialism in fomenting homophobia also weighs heavily in that respect.

SEE ALSO Anthropology in Africa South of the Sahara; Cape Town: Ethnopsychiatry;
Imperialism and Colonialism; Language in Africa; Marriage, Woman-Woman, in Africa:
Neoliberalism in Africa; Offences Against the Person Act (1861); Section 377 and Section 377A; Sex Work/Sex Tourism/Sex Trafficking in Africa

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Currier, Ashley. Out in Africa: LGBT Organizing in Namibia and South Africa. Minneapolis:

Des Forges, Alison Liebhafsky. Defeat Is the Only Bad News: Rwanda under Musinga, 1896–

Africaine, 1960.

Dunton, Chris. “‘Wheyting Be Dat?’: The Treatment of Homosexuality in African Literature.”

Dunton, Chris. “Face to Face.” In Unspoken Facts: A History of Homosexualities in Africa, edited by Gays and Lesbians of Zimbabwe, 156–160. Harare, Zimbabwe: Gays and Lesbians of Zimbabwe, 2008.

The Combahee River Collective was an organization of black lesbian feminists created in 1974 out of the Boston, Massachusetts, chapter of the National Black Feminist Organization. Its founding members were Demita Frazier, Beverly Smith, and Barbara Smith, among other African American feminists. The name of the collective refers to an 1863 Civil War campaign during which former slave and Union spy Harriet Tubman (c. 1820–1913) helped free 750 slaves near the Combahee River in South Carolina (Breines 2002). The Combahee River Collective was the only black lesbian feminist organization in the Boston area at the time of its founding and was thus at the forefront of establishing the parameters of a new politics of black feminism (Springer 1999).

In 1977 the organization released the Combahee River Collective Statement, one of the most influential documents of radical black feminism (Breines 2002). The statement articulates a strong opposition to sexism in black liberation movements and to racism in white feminist movements in the United States. It calls for the dismantling of interlocking sociopolitical and economic systems of oppression, such as capitalism, patriarchy, and racism: “We believe that sexual politics under the patriarchy is as pervasive in Black women's lives as are the politics of class and race. We also often find it difficult to separate race from class from sex oppression because in our lives they are most often experienced simultaneously.”

The statement argues that all forms of oppression are linked and cannot be separated or prioritized. It declares an active commitment to the fight against racial, sexual, heterosexual, and class oppression and to “the development of integrated analysis and practice based upon the fact that the major systems of oppression are interlocking.” It states that the amalgam of these oppressions creates the conditions of black women and black lesbians. The statement articulates how marginalized women are impacted by multiple forms of oppression and how black feminism is the sole logical political movement for African American women to combat the multiple and simultaneous oppressions—whether due to race, class, gender, or sexuality—that women of color face. The Combahee River Collective Statement represents an attempt at consciousness-raising and political engagement in the effort to liberate all oppressed people. It is a call for intersectional... organizing across race, gender, class, and sexuality.

Oppression experienced by black women, and black lesbians in particular, is centered in the statement, which pledges to confront homophobia. Barbara Smith noted in 2017 that “we cannot underestimate the impact of homophobia, specifically anti-lesbian homophobia on the history of our organizing. We were not just dismissed because we were black feminists. We were dismissed because we were traitors to the race” (Gosztola 2017). The Combahee River Collective was a socialist, nonsectarian organization that embraced internationalism. Its members considered themselves “third world women” who are “internally colonized” (as they claim an attachment to third world nations and immigrants of color in the United States) and, as such, organized in solidarity and in struggle with all third world people (Gosztola 2017). The collective was built on a nonhierarchal distribution of power within the group, which reflects the women’s vision for a revolutionary society.

Black Feminists and the Mainstream Women's Movement

As one of the most influential black feminist organizations of its time, the Combahee River Collective articulated a black lesbian, socialist, feminist politics. Some primarily white socialist feminist organizations and issue groups, such as the Committee to End Sterilization Abuse, worked alongside Combahee (Breines 2002). Frazier spoke of one of the reasons behind the lack of unity among feminists at the time as a matter of conflict in ideals and priorities: “Many of us were refugees from other political movements—civil rights, the antiwar movement, the labor movement—where we found ourselves in conflict with the lack of a feminist analysis and, in many cases, we were left feeling divided against ourselves” (Frazier 1995, 12). She explains that in some of their allied feminist political groups, they were branded as “troublemakers, brainwashed by the ‘man-hating white feminists’” (12). As for the reason black women felt alienated in primarily white feminist movements, she explains that white feminist analysis did not address with enough depth issues of race and class, which created tension and frustration among African American feminists.

Black feminists viewed the axes of gender and race as inseparable from their experiences as black women in an inherently capitalist, sexist, and racist American society. At the founding of the National Black Feminist Organization in 1973, feminist, editor, and civil rights activist Margaret Sloan (1947–2004) noted that black feminist activists “will remind the Black liberation movement that there can’t be liberation for half of a race” (quoted in Campbell 1973). And, as later articulated in the Combahee River Collective Statement, it was their “experience and disillusionment within these liberation movements” as black feminists and black lesbians, “as well as experience on the periphery of the white male left,” that led to the establishment of the Combahee River Collective out of their need for a new anti-racist and anti-sexist politics that addressed the needs and realities of African American women at the time.

During the 1970s, Boston was going through a busing crisis, during which black students were transported by bus to white schools and white students to black schools under court order in an effort to redress segregated education. Racial tension was high, and the African American population found itself in a threatening and frightening environment (Breines 2002). The members of the Combahee River Collective, who founded a local battered women’s shelter, among other efforts to aid African American women and children during that fraught period, found it difficult to lead and organize black feminist and lesbian initiatives when they had no black female role models (Guy-Sheftall 1995). That period soon saw the publication of works by iconic black women, such as Toni Cade Bambara, Toni Morrison, Audre Lorde, and Shirley Chisholm, which initiated a literary awakening of sorts among African American women and signaled “the beginning of a clearly defined black women’s liberation movement that would have priorities different from those of white feminists, and generate considerable debate, even hostility, within the black community” (Guy-Sheftall 1995, 14–15). Although the Combahee River Collective built on The Black Woman (1970), an anthology edited by Bambara, and the works of other radical black women writers, such as Ella Baker, Fannie Lou Hamer, Lorraine Hansberry, and Pauli Murray, they nonetheless remained self-conscious of their unique position and their aloneness as they engaged in a new kind of politics.

Barbara Smith, One of the Founders of the Combahee River Collective, in 2018. Smith was inspired by the first regional meeting of the National Black Feminist Organization, which she attended in 1973 in New York City, and soon after met with her twin sister Beverly Smith and Demita Frazier to form the Combahee River Collective. The three of them later wrote the statement that was widely circulated as an assertion of black women’s rights to participate in political struggle and their rights for sexual visibility.

Founding Members
Although the Combahee River Collective included many members, three African American feminists were responsible for founding the group: Frazier, Beverly Smith, and Barbara Smith. Barbara Smith was inspired by the first regional meeting of the National Black Feminist Organization, which she attended in 1973 in New York City, and she soon after met with her twin sister Beverly Smith and Frazier to form the Combahee River Collective. The three women later wrote the statement that became widely circulated as an assertion of black women’s right to participate in political struggle and their rights for sexual visibility.

Frazier is a feminist, writer, teacher, and activist who maintains that black women are still not free, which is why it is important for black feminists in the United States today to continue to remember and learn from the Combahee River Collective (Taylor 2017). Beverly Smith is a health advocate, writer, academic, and activist. She is an instructor of women’s health at the University of Massachusetts in Boston, and her writings on racism, feminism, identity politics, and women’s health, such as “Face-to-Face, Day-to-Day: Racism Consciousness Raising” (1982) and “The Wedding” (1983), have been extensively published and taught in universities across the United States. Barbara Smith was involved in the Black Panther movement before forming the Combahee River Collective and remains an essential voice in feminism today. Smith has been credited by many for playing a significant role in building and sustaining black feminism in the United States (see Gosztola 2017; Taylor 2017). Since the early 1970s, she has been active as a lecturer, author, scholar, and publisher of black feminist thought and has taught at numerous colleges and universities. She wrote and edited many works, including several anthologies and essays with her sister, such as “Across the Kitchen Table: A Sister-to-Sister Dialogue” (1981). Her other writings include The Truth That Never Hurts: Writings on Race, Gender, and Freedom (1998) and Yours in Struggle: Three Feminist Perspectives on Anti-Semitism and Racism (1984, written with Minnie Bruce Pratt and Elly Bulkin).

While there were also bisexual and straight women in the organization, the majority of the founders of the Combahee River Collective were lesbians or in the process of coming out (Breines 2002). This was because “in that era, many heterosexual black women did not want to work with open lesbians,” seeing how they had already risked the contempt and the marginalization of their community by coming out as feminists (Mansbridge and Smith 2000, 32). During that era of nationalism when the black community and heterosexual values were idealized, black lesbian feminists were excluded and marginalized by many groups.

Intersectional Identity Politics

The Combahee River Collective was one of the first political groups to address intersectional identity politics within their statement. Their focus on African American women’s oppression is embodied in the concept of identity politics, and they assert in their statement that the “most profound and potentially the most radical politics come directly out of our identity.” They also declared racial solidarity with progressive black men and did not advocate the fractionalization that their white feminist counterparts demanded. The women of the collective believed that their situation as African Americans necessitated a solidarity around race, which white feminists did not need to have with white men, “unless it is their negative solidarity as racial oppressors.” They thus claimed solidarity with black men against racism while they struggled with black men about sexism. The Combahee members felt alienated by, and were thus critical of, the lack of effort among white feminist organizations to understand racism in the mainstream feminist movement and fight against it. As they argue in their statement, “Black, other Third World, and working women have been involved in the feminist movement from its start, but both outside reactionary forces and racism and elitism within the movement itself have served to obscure our participation.”

Mistrust of White Feminists and Black Nationalists

Racism within the white women’s liberation movement led to the development of black feminism, by both black and white feminists alike. According to E. Frances White, black feminists entered alliances with white feminists assuming that a raised consciousness of women’s oppression would eventually lead to a constructive awareness of other forms of subordinating oppressions (2001, 47). They eventually felt betrayal and disappointment when many white feminists remained blind to class and racial differences affecting women of color: “Racism abounds in the writings of white feminists, reinforcing white supremacy and negating the possibility that women will bond politically across ethnic and racial boundaries” (hooks 2000, 3). Women of color, and especially lesbian women of color, were excluded from mainstream feminist analyses and practice. Thus, black feminists began to question notions of sisterhood, in which “the sister” seemed to always be white and middle class. As a result, early black feminists simply rejected the notion of forming coalitions with white feminists (E. F. White 2001).

Black feminists were also mistrustful of mainstream feminism’s and white socialist feminists’ employment of Black Power as a model for their own autonomy. Women liberationists, for instance, attributed their inspiration for political activity to the Black Power movement, which enabled them to argue for the validity of women organizing around their own oppression and defining the terms of their struggle (Echols 1989). According to Paula Giddings, black feminists viewed the rise of the mainstream women’s movement, which coincided with the deterioration of the black movement, as capitalizing on the accomplishments of the black movement: “It appeared that the predominantly White women’s movement was going to reap the benefits that the Black movement had sown…. Comparing the status of women to that of Blacks was particularly upsetting” (1984, 308). Women’s liberation was thus viewed by many black feminists, activists, and scholars as not only attaching itself to the black movement but also as doing so “with only marginal concern for Black women and Black liberation” (Giddings 1984, 308). Thus, the Combahee and other black feminists became wary of the women’s liberation movement for what they considered as the exploitation of Black Power.

Therefore, during the establishment of the Combahee River Collective, African American feminists found themselves alienated and silenced: “Those years from 1966 to 1970 during which Black Power and Women’s Liberation flowered were also the years in which the political and philosophical weight of the black woman was either erased or divided between black men and white women, who then proceeded to go their separate ways pulling her apart in the process” (Wallace 1990, 170–171). The exclusion of black feminists from the two liberationist discourses of the period—the black nationalism and the women’s liberation movements—is conveyed in the book All the Women Are White, All the Blacks Are Men, but Some of Us Are Brave: Black Women’s Studies (Hull, Bell Scott, and Smith 1982). Cowritten and coedited by one of the founding members of the Combahee River Collective, Barbara Smith, the book states that whether black women had gone their separate ways or whether they were excluded from the two liberation movements, black feminists saw no other resort but to work independently to create a safe space to develop black feminist politics. Feeling alienated by white feminists and the black nationalism movement and being deeply influenced by the Black Power movement but still being marginalized by its hypermasculinity, the Combahee River Collective developed a feminism of their own.

Enduring Influence

The collective has influenced many organizations, including, more recently, the Black Lives Matter movement, which was mostly impacted by “the way [the collective] talked about the importance of not just looking at gender in a vacuum” (Hobson and Jolna 2017, 50). Alicia Garza, one of the founders of Black Lives Matter, explains the persistent need for the black feminism of the Combahee River Collective in the United States today: “When we talk about what’s happening in low-income communities, often we find that it’s women—black women, women of color, and immigrant women—who are concentrated in poverty, who [are] disproportionately impacted by environmental racism or housing issues” (Hobson and Jolna 2017, 50). The Combahee River Collective also focused on coalition-building, where feminist activists and academics of different races and sexual orientation work more comfortably with each other in the recognition of their differences and the strength of collective power.

SEE ALSO Anti-racist Activism in Europe; Black Freedom Movement and Sexuality; Daughters of Bilitis; Dyketactics!; Human Rights Campaign; Lavender Menace

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Hull, Gloria T., Patricia Bell Scott, and Barbara Smith, eds. All the Women Are White, All the Blacks Are Men, but Some of Us Are Brave: Black Women's Studies. Old Westbury, NY: Feminist Press, 1982.

Many theorists have addressed the fallout of the employment of the Western concept of “coming out” within postcolonial societies. Queer pride, as an epistemological stance, has dominated queer history and Western queer discourse and identity. Not subscribing to queer pride is to be left with “the proverbial closet of shame” (Georgis 2013b, 240), which represents a life without freedom or without a future as a queer person. To have queer pride is to dare to live one’s life visibly; pride is, thus, a speech act. As Michel Foucault argues in The History of Sexuality (1980), “What characterizes modern sexuality is that it is a truth to be discovered and, once knowable to the self, it becomes incumbent upon the self to confess it to the outside world, even a priest or a doctor” (34). The demand to confess one’s queer sexuality or homosexuality is done both privately and publicly. It does not suffice to come out to one’s self; coming out to your family is what is expected, then coming out to your friends, and gradually to your society. Once you come out to yourself, you are then expected to come out to the world. Queer pride is about sharing with others the part of your identity that has perhaps excluded you from your community and your family; “the ethos of pride has certainly won rights—rights I would not want to lose. But this very ethos is now implicated in a colonial discourse that fails to see that the right to come out and the right for legal changes are not the only strategies for queer becoming” (Georgis 2013b, 240).

The historian George Chauncey (1994) locates the concept of coming out of the closet in the early twentieth century, when young women would be formally introduced into society on reaching the age of maturity. He establishes, however, that the coming-out narrative focuses on the space left behind as opposed to the new world that gay individuals are entering. Chauncey also maintains that gay men in the United States, specifically in New York, “organized cultural events that sustained and enhanced [their] communal ties and group identity” (1994, 15) before the adoption of the pride narrative. The coming-out model, nonetheless, is widely used today by Western LGBT communities in their discussions of queer sexual identities and the legal rights of their counterparts in queer communities around the world. This renders the discourse of LGBT and human rights in the international context very specific and opposing to alternative LGBT discourses, such as the “coming-in” narrative, which challenges the concept of publicly declaring and expressing one’s identity as critical for the success and advancement of global LGBT rights. “To come in” is to be gay and not “out” to one’s parents and extended conservative families; it is the choice to selectively introduce close people into your private life and to the layers of your identity without being met with shame and expectations from society. In the case of the coming-in narrative, identities are not immediately recognized, and sexual behavior and the adoption of a sexual identity become a personal choice rather than an essential political instrument to building a community as it is rendered by the pride narrative. In the case of many LGBT individuals residing in the Middle East, coming in provides them with an alternative to increased visibility as a formula for combating homophobia, while also rendering them safe from violence and discrimination.

Pinkwashing and the Gay International

Israel has strived since the beginning of the twenty-first century to brand itself as a haven for LGBT individuals in the Middle East and a progressive democratic state that is tolerant of LGBT rights. It has adopted Western liberal queer discourses as it shames Arab states for their violent and oppressive behaviors toward their LGBT communities. But while branding Arabs as barbaric and backward and positioning its claims within international human rights discourse, Israel offers no protection for or support to Arab queers (Georgis 2013b). The term pinkwashing has thus become synonymous with the State of Israel, as it represents itself as gay friendly in order to play down the negative aspects of its reputation in regard to its occupation of Palestinian land. Israel employs a queer activism organized around visibility and coming out of the closet, and instead of offering protection to Arab queers, the state depends on Western queer narratives to “[marginalize] and cast as ‘premodern’ or ‘unliberated’ queer Palestinians, and explain their supposed inability to come into (Western/Israeli) gayness as a result of the irredeemable pathology of Palestinian (or ‘Arab’) culture” (Ritchie 2010, 560). Jasbir K. Puar (2007) uses the term homonationalism to refer to such positioning where a heteronormative nation uses global gay rights to shape the views of Western democracies, turning them against Muslim-majority nations.

Homonationalism has thus subtly encouraged Western states to pursue wars in order to protect and save Middle Eastern LGBT individuals from their repressive cultures and violent states without really providing them with sanctuary. “Liberating” gay people in the Middle East has thus grown to be key in the discourse of neocolonialism (Georgis 2013a), which results in highly damaging consequences for Arab queer communities. In the Palestinian context, for instance, LGBT people are jeopardized on both fronts, from within their own culture and from the Israeli occupation. As on the personal level, the pride narrative imposes coming out on Arab LGBT individuals who are not accustomed to living with LGBT identities (Georgis 2013b).
The spread of global LGBT rights has been critiqued by Arab and Western scholars. Joseph A. Massad (2007) condemns the idea of an openly gay identity in the Arab world, particularly with regard to the promotion of LGBT rights. He establishes that the advancement of global gay rights in the Middle East is but a “missionary project” by Western imperialist nations through which Arabs are forced to subscribe to a heterosexual/homosexual binary (12). These missionary projects and the discourses and organizations that produce and represent them are what Massad calls the “Gay International,” which “heterosexualizes” the Arab man, for, when faced with this binary, he is forced to choose being exclusively heterosexual because homosexuality entails a deviation from the cultural norm (13). Because of the Gay International, Arabs have internalized Western Victorian attitudes toward sexuality that privilege heterosexuality and devalue all nonnormative sexual expression or desire. Thus, while based on a corpus of Orientalist representations of Arab masculinity and sexuality, Western queer ideology is used to “liberate’ Arab and Muslim ‘gays and lesbians’ from the oppression under which they allegedly live by transforming them from practitioners of same-sex contact into subjects who identify as ‘homosexual’ and ‘gay’” (162).

Many scholars and activists have warned against the severe repercussions of the globalization of Western queer identity. Judith Butler, in a speech she made declining the Civil Courage Award from Berlin Pride in 2010, emphasized the vulnerability of gay politics and its current employment by the West to serve homophobic ethnonationalist and homonationalist racist agendas. The closet becomes a more subtle, postmodern power technique, and the struggle to come out of it as citizens in a respectable queer society protects the state from liability and frames it as a neutral authority to be called on to amend laws and protect citizens, “rather than ... [being] invested with the power to injure” (Brown 1995, 27). For, while coming out of the closet represents a dream for many queer Israelis to acquire full citizenship and motivates their activism to achieve national belonging, the violent reality of checkpoints and the rejection of citizenship for many queer Palestinians, along with other countless reminders of the impossibility of belonging, shape the nature and discourse of the Israeli state. The logic of the closet as a mechanism thus not only “allows for [a normalized] homosexuality to be included in the national discourse ... [and] reproduces and perpetuates oppressive heteronormative practices” (Ritchie 2010, 562), it also simulates and sustains oppressive racist practices that are indispensable to the nation’s anatomy. Queer pride is limited to the right to come out of the closet into the dominant society as respectable queer citizens, while its potential as a radical tactic of opposition to repressive discourses and practices has been substituted by the vocabulary of visibility, which has become a key term in gender and sexual identity politics. It is not shocking, therefore, that queer Arabs are rejecting certain ideologies and practices of mainstream Western gay activism and seeking to articulate a politics of social change that disrupts the normalization of the queer visibility project (Ritchie 2010).

Alternative Discourses

Arab LGBT communities dream of a future not unlike that which has been seen in the West: full citizenship rights, political representation, and public visibility. Their strategies are also similar in that its members are rendering themselves visible, not by coming out to their societies but by coming in to friends and reaching out to LGBT communities around the world by blogging their experiences and taking part in global feminist movements. Such is the case with the Lebanese LGBT community, which collaborates with feminist organizations, such as KAFA (meaning “enough” in Arabic), in their efforts to obtain further rights and recognition. For the time being, however, Arab LGBT people engage in what Hassan El Menyawi (2006) calls “activism from the closet,” by which advocates can push for the strengthening of privacy rights while also attempting to broaden the discussion about sexual identities in the Arab world to include models that are more relevant to the region. The activism from the closet approach does not involve explicitly advocating for LGBT rights, but rather advocating for issues that, while they are not categorically “gay rights” issues, will greatly benefit LGBT people and those who participate in same-sex sexual acts. Thus, this alternative model is a more subtle approach to gay rights advocacy because it attempts to persuade people of issues that indirectly advance LGBT agendas. This model most notably focuses on heightened privacy protections, as it does not directly articulate concepts of gay rights and LGBT identities, which would have received opposition from mainstream Arab societies. This method of activism presents LGBT people with a safe space as it does not involve being “out.” Thus, rather than becoming a target for the government or other nonstate actors, “the closet, fluid, protean and hidden, becomes a safe locus for collective strategizing—a place from which LGBTQ groups can engage in activism” (El Menyawi 2006, 7).

Another alternative discourse to the Western coming-out narrative involves an activism that aims to create a community based on a “common identification with a radical democratic interpretation of the principles of liberty and equality” (Mouffe [1993] 2005, 70) rather than to organize around a common identification as “gays” and “lesbians.” Such a collective strives to hold the liberal state to its democratic ideals, instead of demanding that it accept and protect its queer citizens (Georgis 2013a). The closet as space, and to be out of the closet, demands entry into a dominant social space, which some Arabs reject as a solution. The goal of such an activism would be not to unite international LGBT communities under an out-of-the-closet narrative that places them into a space recognized and protected by the state, but to create a space outside of the reach of the state and its regulations where bodies could inhabit, regardless of their subscribed identities and sexual desires.

For the time being, Middle Eastern LGBT communities are attempting to broaden the discussion of sexual identities and LGBT discourses to include models that are more relevant to their regions. As framed by Dina Georgis, must the struggle of homophobia in the Middle East “be compromised by the racism of Western liberalism? Can we not instead contextualize present-day homophobia in a history of colonialism that once shamed the Arab world for being ‘too free’ in its sexual promiscuities and now shames it for not being free enough?” (2013b, 238). Gloria Anzaldúa (1987) calls for the reclaiming of the borders that have been set up to divide as transitional spaces where unity can take place. Anzaldúa describes the border as an “[open wound] where the Third World grates against the First and bleeds. And before a scab forms, it hemorrhages again, the lifeblood of two worlds merging to form a third country, a border culture” (3); she envisions transforming the border into a space where transnational feminist and queer coalitions could meet and collaborate. As a lesbian, she unites herself with the struggle of all women and LGBT individuals internationally: “We come from all colors, all classes, all races, all time periods” (84). She highlights the importance of contributions made by minorities in the homosexual community: “Colored homosexuals,” she writes, “have always been at the forefront ... of all liberation struggles ...; have suffered more injustices and have survived them despite all odds” (85). Only by working to document the sexualities and the experiences of LGBT people across borders living with shame and their efforts to understand and define themselves within the global queer discourse, will the discourses produced for collaborating with and supporting the LGBT communities in the Middle East be beneficial and productive for LGBT communities internationally.
SEE ALSO The Closet; The Gay International and Mideast LGBTQI Organizations; Pinkwashing

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Comité d'Urgence Anti-répression Homosexuelle (CUARH)

DAN CALLWOOD
Research Associate, School of History
University of Strathclyde, United Kingdom

An umbrella activist organization of gay and lesbian groups operating in France between 1979 and 1986.

The Comité d’Urgence Anti-répression Homosexuelle (CUARH; Emergency Committee against Homosexual Repression) was founded in Marseille, France, in July 1979. The group was founded as an umbrella organization to coordinate and energize the vestiges of France’s gay liberation movement with the aim of protecting gay men and lesbians against homophobic discrimination.

By the close of the 1970s the French gay liberation movement found itself in a weakened and fragmented state. Many of the Groupes de Libération Homosexuelle (GLHs; Homosexual Liberation Groups) that had appeared all over the nation since 1974 had disbanded, including the largest group, based in Paris. Initiative and innovation were to be found outside the capital. The GLH Marseille organized a “summer university,” bringing together over 300 people involved in activism from France and beyond. There, it was decided that a new organization should be created to ensure a coordinated, national response to homosexual discrimination. The federative CUARH was born, encompassing the remaining liberation groups, alongside existing lesbian groups and gay Christian organizations. Notable driving forces included the activists Jacques Fortin and Mélanie Badaire, the journalists Hervé Liffran and Catherine Gonnard, the poet Geneviève Pastre, and Jan-Paul Pouliquen, who later was a pioneer in the area of gay civil partnership.

Early Years and Initial Successes

The CUARH was distinct from its predecessors in its move away from a focus on sexual liberation achieved through socialist revolution. Since the founding of the Front Homosexuel d’Action Révolutionnaire (FHAR; Homosexual Front for Revolutionary Action) in 1971, gay liberation groups had been driven by a utopian, socialist vision of liberation rather than a focus on pragmatic action. The CUARH, however, had more moderate horizons, concentrating on defense and legal reform.

These aims were influenced by the sense that gay men and lesbians were increasingly under threat from discrimination. Well-publicized incidents included a police raid on Paris’s Le Manhattan bar in 1977 and the removal of a municipal administrator, Marc Croissant, from his job after he complained to the communist newspaper L’Humanité about an article equating homosexuality and pedophilia. Incidents such as these, amplified to a national scale by a more confident gay media, suggested the need for self-defense.

As a symbol of legal inequality, the age of consent was the predominant issue in the CUARH’s early years. Since 1945 the penal code had discriminated with regard to “acts against nature,” setting different ages of consent for heterosexual and homosexual activity: twenty-one for homosexual acts and fifteen for heterosexual acts, the former lowered to eighteen in 1974. To encourage reform, and support for a bill that was bouncing between the assembly and senate, delegates from the CUARH met members of the recently installed François Mitterrand administration in 1981. This was an early example of cooperation with state power, to which liberation groups had previously been averse. Public demonstration was also used by the CUARH in aid of equalization. In April 1981 the group staged the largest march of gay men and lesbians that France had yet seen, claiming that over 15,000 had demonstrated in support of “the rights and freedoms of homosexuals” (Girard 1981, 5; translation by Dan Callwood). Such actions hastened a process that was already underway and the age of consent was equalized at fifteen in August 1982.

In its attempts to influence government policy, the CUARH began to find its own political voice beyond its existence as an umbrella organization. This voice was most forcefully articulated in its journal Homophonies. First published in November 1980 from an initiative within the Parisian CUARH subgroup, the journal’s first issue declared that “through this journal the CUARH wants to bring an original contribution to associations and individuals … and effectively combat repression” (“Editorial” 1980, 1; translation by Dan Callwood). The editorial team wanted to put the journal to practical use, alerting its readers to homophobic action by the police, government, and employers, and advising them on how to defend themselves. By 1982 the journal was distributed through news kiosks nationwide. A media outlet with national reach became the CUARH’s main political tool.

Division and Decline

From the outset, the CUARH was unusual in its coalition of gay male and lesbian groups. Despite the group’s initial energy and purpose, the CUARH was divided, however, over the issues of gender and the place of pedophilia in the movement. These fractures, present from the group’s inception, became more pronounced as external pressure from the HIV/AIDS crisis began to bear on the organization. Although gay liberation movements were initially a mixed-gender phenomenon, arguments over sex and cruising and an atmosphere generally hostile toward women had caused lesbians to split off and form their own groups. This separatist form of organizing had persisted throughout the 1970s until the CUARH’s attempt at a mixed-gender movement. In this aim the CUARH had some success, as its federative structure allowed for a more flexible approach that encompassed different interest groups. But the CUARH soon began to suffer from the older instinct toward separatism. Frequent expressions of misogyny pushed women away from the CUARH and into expending more energy in nonmixed projects, such as the Mouvement d'Information et d'Expression des Lesbiennes (Movement for Lesbian Information and Expression), founded in 1981, and the magazine Lesbia (1982).

The issue of pedophilia and the age of consent also divided the CUARH. The struggle over the age of consent had sparked debate over the place of pedophilia in the wider gay liberation movement. Some CUARH members, including Gérard Bach-Ignasse and the Groupe de Recherche pour une Enfance Différente (Research Group for a Different Childhood) advocated the abolition of the age of consent entirely, calling it a “legal fiction.” Others disagreed. At a debate on pedophilia held by the CUARH, women on the panel questioned a child’s ability to consent and the uneven power relations inherent in an intergenerational relationship. Ultimately, claims for the abolition, or further lowering, of the age of consent went nowhere, only serving to reveal continuing divisions in the movement over the limits of sexual liberation.

By the mid-1980s the CUARH was in decline as a political force, with a dwindling number of adherent groups. The field of activism had shifted to confront the threat of the growing HIV/AIDS crisis. Although Homophonies often discussed the epidemic, groups combating the virus had grown up outside the structure of the CUARH. The focus of activism had shifted. The group slowly dissolved and eventually disappeared on the release of the final issue of Homophonies in February 1987, after an attempt to relaunch the title failed.

Although the CUARH was short lived and is less remembered today than its more radical forebears, the group has an important place in the history of French LGBT organizing. The CUARH’s embrace of coalition politics, its focus on antidiscrimination and legal reform, and its willingness to interface with the state provided a blueprint for later struggles over civil partnership and marriage equality.

SEE ALSO Frente de Liberación Homosexual; Friendship Societies in Europe; Groupe du 6 Novembre; Lesbiennes Issues du Colonialisme, de l’Esclavage et de l’Immigration; Grupo de Trabalho Homossexual and LES; Grupo Gay da Bahia; Human Rights in Europe; Spectra Project; Strange Fruit

BIBLIOGRAPHY

The LGBTQI community has historically had a fraught relationship with communism and the Left more generally. Although communist politics and ideology, with their call to end oppression and inequalities, have long offered queer people and social reformers the promise of change, this rhetoric has not always matched reality. On the one hand, socialist revolutionaries such as the Russian ambassador Aleksandra Kollontay (1872–1952), the German politician August Bebel (1840–1913), the German women's rights activist Clara Zetkin (1857–1933), and the Polish-born German antiwar activist Rosa Luxemburg (1871–1919) forged a platform for the inclusion of women's rights and the freedom of sexual expression in socialist politics. Communists in Germany and even the Soviet Union supported the pioneering advocacy of the German sexologist Magnus Hirschfeld (1868–1935), one of the earliest advocates for gay rights in Europe. The revolution of 1917 even brought the decriminalization of homosexuality in Russia. On the other hand, however, European communist regimes and politicians have used homophobia to vilify and violently punish individuals. During the Cold War, gay men in both the West and East were targeted and surveilled as potential subversives. Communist movements have also upheld heteronormative and patriarchal binaries, seeing gender nonconformity as a threat and challenge to ideals of citizenship, loyalty, and belonging. Examining the treatment of queers under communism and by communists reveals how anxieties surrounding sexual dissent are often more concerned with upholding and enforcing norms of gender performance than with sexual practice.

Queers and Communism before World War II

In the late nineteenth century, communism was gaining increasing traction as a political movement in Europe. At this time, whereas France, Italy, and the Netherlands had decriminalized sodomy, sex between men was illegal in Great Britain, Portugal, Germany, and the Austro-Hungarian and Russian empires. Despite this mixed legal environment, the predominant view, espoused by the medical and legal profession in Europe, was that homosexuality was unnatural. The Austro-German psychiatrist Richard von Krafft-Ebing (1840–1902) espoused the prevailing view of sexologists of his day when he argued in his landmark work Psychopathia sexualis ([1886] 1892; Sexual psychopathy) that biological sex imbued men and women with specific traits, including heterosexuality. Accordingly, signs of gender nonconformity, such as same-sex desiring or male effeminacy, were defined by medical experts as abnormal and as indicators of social and moral decay.

Against this trend, however, was the work of a Berlin-based sexologist and committed socialist, Hirschfeld. In 1897 Hirschfeld and two colleagues formed the Wissenschaftlich-humanitäres Komitee (Scientific-Humanitarian Committee) to lobby the Reichstag to amend Paragraph 175 of the German criminal code, the provision that criminalized sex between men. In 1919 Hirschfeld cofounded the Institut für Sexualwissenschaft (Institute for Sexual Science), a private research center and medical clinic that continued advocating for the decriminalization of homosexuality alongside providing information on contraception and sexually transmitted diseases and treating the latter. The center also called for women’s emancipation and for the acceptance of transgender people, even performing the world’s first sex reassignment surgery. In spite of this important work, Hirschfeld’s understanding of homosexuality is markedly different from contemporary ones. Hirschfeld believed that homosexuals constitute a “third sex,” biologically different from heterosexual men and women. He argued that because homosexuals were born with this physiological difference they should not be persecuted.

At this same time, leftist and social democratic circles in Europe were discussing the possibilities of life under socialism, including the role of sexuality in the future socialist society. Historian Dan Healey (2001) has shown that two dominant schools of thought developed on this subject. While some subscribed to a libertarian view and believed that sexual life should be free of the influence of church, state, and bourgeois morals, others believed that sexuality needed to be harnessed for socialism. Although the Russian communist leader Vladimir Lenin (1870–1924) belonged to this latter group, seeing sex and reproduction as a social issue that needed regulation, German socialists supported Hirschfeld’s work and the decriminalization of sex between men. August Bebel, the leader of the Sozialdemokratische Partei Deutschlands (SPD; Social Democratic Party of Germany), was even one of the first signatories of Hirschfeld's petition for decriminalization. Bebel also amended his treatise Die Frau und der Sozialismus ([1879]; Woman under Socialism [1904]) to reflect Hirschfeld’s views that homosexuality was a biological condition (Healey 2001).

Hirschfeld’s work and Die Frau und der Sozialismus found receptive audiences in revolutionary Russia. Hirschfeld’s institute was even visited by Soviet representatives, including the Soviet health commissioner, Nikolai Semashko (1874–1949), in 1923. The delegation was particularly interested in Hirschfeld’s work on the educative film Anders als die Andern ([1919]; Different from the others), which centered on the persecution and blackmail that homosexual men were subject to in Weimar Germany (the interwar period in Germany, between 1918 and 1933, named after the city in which the new republic’s constitution was signed). Hirschfeld himself was a supporter of the Russian Revolution of 1917 and a “fierce enthusiast” (Mancini 2010, 118) of the Bolsheviks, who seized control after the revolution and established the Soviet Union. (Bolsheviks was the name for members of a faction within the Russian Social Democratic Workers’ Party, established during a party split in 1903; that faction later became the Russian Communist Party.) This was not only because of the Soviet stance on women’s rights but also because sex between adult men over the age of sixteen had been decriminalized in the Soviet Union through the new criminal code introduced in 1922. Sodomy also remained decriminalized in the revised criminal code of 1926. Significantly, these new codes were also gender neutral.

However, in spite of the law reform and the praise that Russian advancements found in international socialist and sex reform circles, the belief that sexuality is a force to be channeled for the betterment of socialism was gathering support inside Russia. In particular, following the introduction of the first five-year plan in 1928, efforts to remake Russia and build communism intensified, and everyone was harnessed to the task. This meant that the ability to discuss and research queer sexuality and gender identity was limited, as doctors who had previously examined the biological causes of sexuality were encouraged by the regime to pursue work of more immediate importance. Throughout the late 1920s and early 1930s, as the drive to meet the goals of the plan increased, people identified as unproductive social outsiders, such as prostitutes, beggars, and the homeless, were targeted for social intervention through work camps and reeducative efforts. In 1933 homosexual men were included in these social cleansing efforts because of the fear that homosexual cliques acted as spies, working to reduce the morale of the workers.

The question of homosexuality and communism was also becoming more prominent at this time because of the rise of fascism and the tension between the Soviet Union and Nazi Germany. On both sides, allegations of homosexuality were used to challenge the honor and strength of the other system. For example, in Germany, Ernst Röhm (1887–1934), the leader of the Nazi paramilitary group Sturmabteilung (Storm detachment), was homosexual, a fact that the SPD exploited. Even the Kommunistische Partei Deutschlands (Communist Party of Germany), despite supporting Hirschfeld’s decriminalization campaign, eventually supported these attacks on Röhm, using the allegations to bring the Nazis into disrepute.

However, following the Nazi seizure of power in 1933, communism and homosexuality in Germany were violently repressed. Paragraph 175 was radically strengthened, and Hirschfeld’s institute was destroyed and its materials burned. A year later, in 1934, the Soviet leader Joseph Stalin (1878–1953) recriminalized sex between men in the Soviet Union, seeing homosexuality—and the related issue of male effeminacy—as a symbol of Western capitalist degeneracy. Subsequently, queer men in the Soviet Union were arrested, imprisoned, sent to the gulag (a system of labor camps), and even executed. The fact that this law did not address lesbians or gendernonconforming women did not mean that queer women’s sexuality was unproblematized. Instead, these women were typically dealt with by the medical system, where they were diagnosed with “sluggishly manifesting schizophrenia” and given treatments that included drugs, supervision and confinement, sex reassignment surgery, and even shock therapy (Essig 1999, 28).

While the 1930s and 1940s were a dark period in the history of queer life in Europe, historian Dagmar Herzog (2011) has also highlighted the opportunities that World War II (1939–1945) presented for homosexual experimentation, with soldiers stationed for long periods in homosocial environments. It is estimated that between 10 and 20 percent of returning soldiers had experimented with homosexuality during the war (Evans 2010). Similarly, women’s same-sex desiring remained largely hidden during the war, often seen as the result of the lack of available men on the home front.

The end of the war in 1945 brought significant changes for both queers and communism. Not only did the boundaries of communism in Europe grow and become more fixed, but a rise in sexual conservatism across the West and East had significant consequences for queer-identifying people.

Queers and the Cold War

In the aftermath of World War II, anxieties surrounding the corruption of male youth, already endangered through the war, politicized homosexuality once again, with various European countries upholding consent laws that differentiated between same-sex and heterosexual sex. In France, reforms implemented by the French government based in Vichy during the German occupation that increased the age of consent for homosexual sex to twenty-one (the age of consent for heterosexual sex being eighteen) were maintained following liberation. Similarly, while the Netherlands removed the Nazi-era laws on homosexuality, the age of consent for male same-sex sex remained twenty-one. Indeed, in the postwar era homosexuality in the Netherlands was closely policed, with castration and imprisonment common punishments. In Germany, despite removing other Nazi laws, the Allied occupation forces (Great Britain, France, the United States, and the Soviet Union) retained the 1935 revision of Paragraph 175. Indeed, the Nazi version of Paragraph 175 remained on the books in West Germany after the Cold War division of the country in 1949. In the socialist East Germany, however, the pre-1935 version of Paragraph 175 was restored following a 1950 Court of Appeals decision. As Jennifer Evans (2010) has shown, throughout the 1950s, not only did a Ministry of Justice commission recommend homosexuality be decriminalized, but prosecution under Paragraph 175 became less common. Moreover, Hirschfeld’s work was taken up by the East German psychiatrist Rudolf Klimmer (1905–1977), who called for decriminalization on the basis of privacy and sexual choice.

At the same time, Nazi provisions surrounding male prostitution and a higher age of consent for homosexual sex (Paragraph 175a) were maintained in East Germany. In particular, following the workers’ uprising of 1953 and the subsequent consolidation of socialism, Paragraph 175a was increasingly used to “criminalize all acts of homosexual incitement and desire involving minors” (Evans 2010, 557). Homophobic rhetoric surrounded the purging of the ruling Sozialistische Einheitspartei Deutschlands (Socialist Unity Party of Germany), as heteropatriarchal sexual conservatism was implemented as a way of legitimizing and solidifying socialist rule at a time of political turmoil.

The year 1953 also brought the death of Stalin and the ascension of Nikita Khrushchev (1894–1971) as leader of the Soviet Union. Following Khrushchev’s “secret speech” in 1956, in which he denounced Stalinist repression, a slow process of liberalization began in the Communist bloc. Alongside increasing access to the oral contraceptive pill and abortion, by the late 1960s and 1970s homosexuality in European communist regimes was largely decriminalized. In Hungary, homosexuality was decriminalized in 1961; in Czechoslovakia, decriminalization came in 1962; East Germany revoked Paragraph 175 in 1968; and finally, Bulgaria legalized homosexual sex in 1968. However, male same-sex intercourse remained criminalized in the Soviet Union and Romania.

However, this legal reform did not necessarily equate with social acceptance. Across the communist bloc, homosexuality continued to be seen as a medical condition, with ongoing policing of gay men. In Hungary, the age of consent for homosexual sex was twenty, whereas it was fourteen for heterosexual sex. This would be equalized only in 2002. Furthermore, despite criminalization, Hungarian police continued to surveille homosexual men, keeping registries of their names. For many Hungarians, homosexuality remained a “medical aberration,” and gay men were particularly stigmatized for perceived effeminacy (Kurimay and Takács 2017, 589). In East Germany, while some social organization was tolerated (such as the Homosexuelle Interessengemeinschaft Berlin [Homosexual Interest Group Berlin], which was officially recognized in the mid-1980s), gay men received death threats into the 1980s. One group of lesbians and gay men was subjected to group therapy, during which they were weighed and measured and had samples taken as doctors attempted to find a biological cause for their homosexuality. In the Soviet Union, meanwhile, many gay men and lesbians continued to be subjected to extreme medical measures that masqueraded as therapy. Electroconvulsive, or shock, therapy, sedation, hypnosis, and hard labor continued to be used to “treat” queer-identifying people. Similar therapies to “cure” homosexuality were also used in Czechoslovakia prior to decriminalization. Indeed, the failure of these methods to convert queer men to heterosexuality is one of the reasons Czechoslovak sexologists called for the decriminalization of homosexuality in the 1950s.

As in the 1930s, homophobic rhetoric and homosexual persecution took on greater political significance in the context of Cold War tensions. In both communist and Western countries, homosexuality and male effeminacy were taken as signs of potential subversion and a threat to national security. In the United States and Canada, harsh and often pseudoscientific measures were taken against gay and lesbian public servants. From the 1950s to the 1970s, gays and lesbians were deemed unfit for public service because of perceived links between homosexuality and communism, in particular the fear that homosexuals were more susceptible to blackmail and therefore easy targets for communist spies. Gay men and lesbians were systematically fired, with an estimated 600 federal employees dismissed, or simply denied employment to begin with (Johnson 2004). In Canada, a homosexual screening program was introduced in the federal public service in 1959. The Canadian government also funded research on the construction of a machine designed to accurately detect queer people. Meanwhile, the East German secret police both demonized gay men and lesbians as threats to socialism and saw them as ideal informants, able to gain the trust of both men and women.

In spite of this persecution, queer people across communist Europe were able to find each other. Gay rights organizing was active well before the fall of the Berlin Wall in 1989.
Indeed, throughout the 1970s and 1980s there were more and more opportunities for queer men and women to come together and lobby socialist regimes for the recognition and acceptance of their existence. Since the collapse of communism in Europe gay rights have largely continued to be recognized in law, thanks not only to ongoing activism but also to the work of the European Union in entrenching legal norms. However, the legacy of communism, particularly the connections made between heterosexuality, gender conformity, and ideas of health, morality, normalcy, stability, and security, has continued to affect queer life in Europe. Throughout eastern Europe the transition from communism to democracy often went hand in hand with a revival of conservative heteropatriarchal values.
This meant both a loss of the rights awarded to women under socialism and a solidification of gender and sexual conformity, resulting in a rise in virulent homophobia in many postcommunist countries—in particular, Russia.

SEE ALSO Blackmail; Chechnya, Detention Camps in; Cold War and Sexuality in Latin America; Human Rights in Europe; Lavender Scare; Nationalism and Sexuality in Europe; Scandals in Europe; Treason and Queerness

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Engelstein, Laura. The Keys to Happiness: Sex and the Search for Modernity in Fin-de-Siècle

Essig, Laurie. Queer in Russia: A Story of Sex, Self, and the Other. Durham, NC: Duke

Evans, Jennifer. “Decriminalization, Seduction, and ‘Unnatural Desire’ in East Germany.”

New York's 1969 Stonewall riots hold a central, yet heavily mythologized, status as the beginning of the modern LGBT rights movement. Stonewall, however “did not start everything” (D'Emilio 2002, 148). A different form of mythology, the “myth of isolation” (Chauncey 1994, 3), has obscured much of the history of pre-Stonewall life. According to the myth, entrenched societal hostility toward gays blocked formation of any substantive gay culture, either social or political. Yet some gays and lesbians did actively seek structural change. They did so, however, by attempting to seem nonthreatening and by working within established social and political systems. Nevertheless, several key instances of militant collective resistance predate, and have been overshadowed by, the Stonewall riots.

In 1965 discriminatory treatment against gay and transgender patrons led to a series of sit-ins at Dewey’s Lunch Counter in Philadelphia (Hall 2008; Stein 2000). A New Year's Eve 1966 raid on the Black Cat, a gay bar in Los Angeles, led to protests and court challenges to state authority (Los Angeles Advocate 1968b; Faderman and Timmons 2006). On New Year's Day 1965, San Francisco police terrorized a ball organized by the Council on Religion and the Homosexual that was held at California Hall. With photographing the attendees being a key goal, “police clearly intended to intimidate the crowd rather than regulate lawful behavior” (Boyd 2003, 233–234). The anger that the police actions triggered within the community has led some to refer to that event as “San Francisco's Stonewall” (Carter 2004; Hughes 1989).

Most prominent, however, among the pre-Stonewall examples of collective community resistance that historians have rediscovered is a different San Francisco event. In the summer of 1966, transsexual women, drag queens, and gays collectively and violently responded to police harassment at Compton’s Cafeteria in the city’s Tenderloin area (Stryker 2008b). Occurring at the intersection of civil rights movements based on gender, sexuality, race, and economic disempowerment, the Compton's riot stands apart as not only being the product of organized activism but also itself producing change that benefited the societally disfavored residents of the Tenderloin who participated (Stryker 2008a).
A Confluence of Disfavored Sexualities and Economies

In the early 1960s there was an increase in gay political activity in San Francisco. Aided by a favorable court ruling, owners of gay bars successfully challenged a policerun protection racket. On the heels of this success, drag queen José Sarria ran for a seat on the city’s Board of Supervisors, albeit unsuccessfully. However, the gay political activity in general spurred other forms of harassment by the police. This included forcing evidence of gay life, including a well-established drag scene, from the waterfront to areas whose inhabitants already were at the edge of acceptable culture. One of these was the Tenderloin, which was already regarded as a “human dump heap” teeming with “social outcasts” (Members of the Gay and Lesbian Historical Society 1998, 350, 351). Indeed, for most of the twentieth century the Tenderloin was a district synonymous with sex work (Stryker 2008a).

In the 1960s business elites and city planners also engaged in much broader efforts to reshape San Francisco. Gone would be an economy that revolved around the city’s port, one that had been on the decline since the end of World War II (1939–1945). Replacing it would be an economy focused on culture, technology, and tourism. A significant physical manifestation of this urban vision involved the destruction of many black and working-class neighborhoods, as well as the relocation of the residents of other neighborhoods. Beyond its connection with sex work and other societally undesirable activity, the Tenderloin was more generally “the last remaining enclave of affordable housing in downtown San Francisco” (Stryker 2008a, 69; Silverman and Stryker 2005).

The incoming displaced residents themselves displaced many of the Tenderloin’s transgender sex workers. However, the effect of the population shifts on the neighborhood went beyond its sexual minorities. In 1965 residents sought to take advantage of economic opportunities available under the Lyndon B. Johnson administration’s War on Poverty. This mobilization within the Tenderloin also led to the formation of Vanguard, the earliest-known youth-oriented queer organization in the United States (Stryker 2008a). A “haven for radicalism in central San Francisco” (Meyerowitz 2002, 229) with atypical ministries and outreach, the Glide Memorial United Methodist Church sponsored the organization (Members of the Gay and Lesbian Historical Society 1998). Its magazine, also named Vanguard, “served as an important instrument in creating and shaping the new political consciousness that both gave rise to and coalesced around the riot” that would transpire in the Tenderloin (Worley 2011, 52). The organization itself spoke to a constituency that saw its “civil liberties imperiled by a hostile social order in which all difference from the usual in behavior is attacked” (Stryker and Van Buskirk 1996, 49).

Vanguard held its meetings at Compton’s Cafeteria, at the corner of Turk and Taylor in the Tenderloin (Stryker 2008a). Compton’s was known for having affordable food, and the night manager was a gay man who did not mind if the queer street youth hung out at the cafeteria. When that manager died, however, his replacement was far less friendly to that clientele (Worley 2011). To offset any lack of purchases by those who would gather, management established a “service charge” during the summer of 1966 and applied it discriminatorily. More importantly, enforcement of this new policy came via private security guards and calls to the police (Stryker 2008a; Worley 2011).

The eventual response to the maltreatment was a picket against Compton’s by a combination of Vanguard members, Glide ministers, and members of the city’s homophile organizations (Stryker 2008a). This 18 July 1966, action resulted in no satisfactory resolution of Vanguard’s grievances against Compton’s. However, it “seem[ed] to have consolidated the youths’ sense of collective injury” (Worley 2011, 48). Elliott Blackstone (1924–2006), a San Francisco Police Department sergeant, attempted to ease the tensions between management and the queer youth that had arisen from the “service charge” implementation. His efforts were unsuccessful, setting the stage for the riot that occurred at the cafeteria approximately a month later (Members of the Gay and Lesbian Historical Society 1998).

In part because the event escaped mainstream media coverage, the exact date of the riot is not known (Luther Hillman 2011; Stryker 2008a; Hughes 1989). Even a 1972 description of it having occurred on a “hot August night” does not correspond to contemporaneous weather reports (quoted in Kost 2016). It is known, however, that on one night in August 1966 a call by Compton’s management to the police to remove one table full of gender-nonconforming youths resulted in an officer grabbing one of them in an effort to drag her away.

Not unlike the New York police who arrived at Stonewall three years later, San Francisco’s police were used to being able to treat sexual minorities violently without resistance.
The queen whom the officer was attempting to drag out threw her coffee in his face, triggering a barrage of eating utensils aimed at the police. In turn, this led to a larger-scale disturbance in and immediately outside the cafeteria. Customers turned over tables, smashed the cafeteria’s plate-glass windows, and then took their anti-police furor into the streets. The police called for reinforcements, but the queens fought back with weaponized deployment of purses and heels. Eventually, the violence led to the vandalizing of a police car and the burning of a newsstand (Stryker 2008a).

Progress Away from the Street Fighting

Following the Compton’s riot, the availability of critical services to trans women and other Tenderloin sexual minorities increased. In addition, relations with the police eased somewhat. While these changes did occur in the wake of the riot, Susan Stryker cautions that it is impossible to determine conclusively that the riot sparked these developments (Kost 2016).

Much of the change that did occur emanated from the office of the Central City Anti-Poverty Program, which opened a few months after the riot. An accomplishment unto itself, as it was the product of organizing across lines of both race and sexuality, the program led to greater positive interaction between the police and trans people. Blackstone was assigned to be the program’s community relations officer (Stryker 2008a). In this capacity he was able to interact with the trans inhabitants of the Tenderloin on much friendlier terms than the swarms of police who engaged in the hated practice of “sweeping” the streets of sexual minorities (Worley 2011; Members of the Gay and Lesbian Historical Society 1998). Perhaps most importantly, when presented with the opportunity to educate himself on the subject of transsexuality he readily did so (Stryker 2008a). By 1968 San Francisco was perceived in Los Angeles as being devoid of police harassment, with the difference between the two being as stark as between Amsterdam and Moscow (Los Angeles Advocate 1968a).

Blackstone became familiar with the recently published book The Transsexual Phenomenon (1966) and met with its author, the German-born American endocrinologist and sexologist Harry Benjamin (1885–1986), who maintained part of his practice in San Francisco. Many Tenderloin trans women were his patients (Members of the Gay and Lesbian Historical Society 1998; Silverman and Stryker 2005). Funding from wealthy trans man Reed Erickson (1917–1992) via his Erickson Educational Foundation aided Benjamin while he wrote the book. The Transsexual Phenomenon in turn not only enhanced Benjamin’s credibility but also provided a substantive rationale for moving transition-related health care out of the legal shadows and for universities to establish genderidentity programs. Johns Hopkins University established the first such formal program in 1966, soon followed by the University of Minnesota and Stanford University (Luther Hillman 2011; Meyerowitz 2002).
Concurrently, some trans activists began working with the Center for Special Problems (CSP), a division of the city’s Department of Public Health, while others met at Glide, eventually forming Conversion Our Goal, possibly the nation’s first trans peer-support group. Less influential was the California Advancement for Transsexuals Society. Together, however, the groups and the individuals therein “formed an interlocking network of transgender activists, allies, and services” (Stryker 2008a, 75). The CSP even provided gender-appropriate identification cards for transsexuals, greatly aiding the goal of many to find employment outside of the sex industry (Stryker 2008a; Members of the Gay and Lesbian Historical Society 1998).

The city-connected elements of the trans-related services continue to exist, but the grassroots organizations eventually fell apart as a result of differences in style, the personalities of the key players, and their visions for trans life. Aided by the Erickson Educational Foundation, the National Transsexual Counseling Unit (NTCU) was more successful. The NTCU was able to have two fulltime peer counselors, although it funneled most of its clients on to the CSP. On par with Erickson’s financial backing was the NTCU’s relationship with the ultimate symbol of establishmentarian authority: the police. In an unusual administrative arrangement connected to his liaison position, Blackstone actually managed the NTCU’s office. There was a limit to what any one individual or organization could accomplish, but the tapestry created by civic, community, and outside financial forces had made San Francisco “the unquestioned hub of the transgender movement in the United States” (Stryker 2008a, 81).

A Recovered Moment in LGBTQ History

After 1966 the Compton’s Cafeteria riot quickly became all but invisible to critical historical analysis. A lack of mainstream coverage severely limited the opportunities for reflective engagement with the event. When it finally did receive mention, it came only from an aside in a 1972 column commemorating not the riot but Compton’s Cafeteria itself when it shut its doors for good (Kost 2016). Martin Duberman noted the existence of the riot as a potential alternative to Stonewall as ground zero for modern activism but surmised that why Stonewall prevailed “will always be a mystery” (1994, 4).

Three decades after the riot, Stryker began the historical recovery of the event when she encountered a recollection thereof in a 1972 gay pride program. She was unsure whether the recollection was even of an event that actually had occurred. The account did contain some inaccuracies, but it was the starting point from which she was “able to connect the location and timing of the riot to social, political, geographical, and historical circumstances in San Francisco in ways that the Stonewall story had never connected gay liberation discourse to similar circumstances in New York” (Stryker 2008b, 152). Stryker sufficiently succeeded in her goal to make the Compton’s Cafeteria riot “enter historical memory” (quoted in Kost 2016) that, when marking pride month in 2016, President Barack Obama mentioned it in the same breath as, and placed it on equal footing with, Stonewall.

SEE ALSO Stonewall Riots, International Effects of

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Members of the Gay and Lesbian Historical Society of Northern California. “MTF

FILMOGRAPHY

Confessional Manuals in Colonial Latin America

CANDY HURTADO
PhD candidate
Florida Atlantic University, Boca Raton

ZEB TORTORICI
Associate Professor, Department of Spanish and Portuguese Languages and Literatures
New York University

Confessional manuals as religious guides used by priests to teach indigenous peoples the meaning of “sin” in relation to bodily desires and lustful thoughts.

Among Catholics, confession is meant to be one of the most private, intimate, and potent aspects of religious life. Yet, the question of how to administer the sacrament of confession to indigenous peoples in the Spanish colonial Americas, many of whom had been only recently converted to Catholicism and spoke neither Spanish nor Latin, as well as to newly arrived, largely unacculturated slaves from Africa, gave rise to many practical problems in terms of translation and mutual comprehension. Indeed, how to translate the fundamental concepts of heaven, hell, sin, redemption, and, at times, even God, in ways that indigenous peoples could understand was a far greater challenge than several early missionaries initially imagined. In this context, confessional manuals or confessionarios—essentially, how-to guides for priests to properly administer the sacrament of confession to their parishioners in their own vernacular languages—came to be viewed as important tools in the conversion of indigenous peoples. In early modern Spain and Portugal, confessional manuals were typically penned in Latin, Spanish, or Portuguese, and occasionally included translations in local languages, such as Catalan, Galician, or Basque. In colonial Latin America, however, these manuals were most commonly bilingual, penned in both Spanish (or Latin) and some American indigenous language (Nahuatl, Zapotec, Mixtec, Purépecha, Mixe, or Maya in New Spain, Quechua or Aymara in the Andes, or Tupi and Guaraní in and around colonial Brazil), often with one column written in Spanish and the other in the native language.

Throughout colonial Latin America, the confessional manuals took on particularly heightened meanings because they were envisioned by the Catholic Church and by religious missionaries as one of the most potent tools for converting native peoples throughout the Americas starting in the early sixteenth century. Confessional manuals are especially interesting to analyze in terms of what they do (and do not do) to shed light on the history of sexuality in colonial Latin America. What is perhaps more interesting about the genre of bilingual confessional manuals for the history of sexuality are their attempts to identify, name, and codify different types of sin related to sexual desire and to what the Catholic Church in early modern Spain termed luxuria (lust), especially in relation to the sixth commandment (“Thou shall not fornicate”). In fact, colonial confessional manuals in their obsessive attempts to typify and subsequently eradicate the sins of lust among native penitents paradoxically might have done just the opposite by spreading an explicitly Western knowledge about bodies and desires in indigenous languages.

This entry first briefly traces the history of confession and confessional manuals in medieval and early modern Europe. It then moves on to colonial Latin America, describing and analyzing a few key confessional manuals from the viceroyalties of New Spain (in what is today largely Mexico, Central America, and the Philippines) and Peru (in what initially encompassed most of South America with the exception of Brazil but after 1718 was made up of what is today largely Peru, Ecuador, and Bolivia). It next discusses recent theorizations of confession as well as the current state of research on confessional manuals. Finally, it focuses on points of convergence, mistranslation, and confessional confusion, especially as they relate to questions of sexuality, desire, “homosexuality,” and third-gender subjectivities (such as ritual transvestism in the Andes). These confessional confusions were produced, in part, by the Spanish missionaries’ necessarily imperfect translations of the tenets of Catholicism—and even the very concept of confession, which had some resonance with preexisting indigenous rituals both in New Spain and the Andes—into many of the native languages throughout the Americas.

Brief History of Confession and Penitential Texts

Also known as confessionaries or penitential texts, the corpus of texts known as confessional manuals included comprehensively written works with detailed instructions for priests on how to administer the sacrament of confession to their parishioners. They became popular in Europe throughout the Middle Ages as the practice of confession became a rite of the sacrament of reconciliation in the Catholic Church. Its inception was a practical response from Celtic monks in Ireland in the sixth century regarding the need of followers to confess their sins in a nonpublic forum to receive penance and absolution. Their goal was to guide priests in auricular confession, developing a grammar of sin, teaching confessors how to ask questions, and educating the penitent to articulate their sins to the parish priest. This ideal dialogue between priest and parishioner was complicated greatly by the very colonial context of Spain and Portugal’s overseas possessions in which bilingual confessional manuals were conceived, penned, and, for the most part, printed.

Most penitents in the medieval European world confessed their sins to a priest irregularly, and many never at all. In an attempt to address this, in 1215 Pope Innocent III (1160–1216) convoked an ecumenical council of the Catholic Church, known as the Fourth Lateran
Council, which sought, among other things, to change the interaction between the priest and the congregation by requiring Catholics to confess their sins annually to qualified priests, usually during Lent. Yet, even after the Fourth Lateran Council, evidence suggests that the masses remained largely ignorant of the precept that mandated yearly confession (Haliczer 1996). While the Fourth Lateran Council institutionalized the sacrament of private confession among Catholics, it was not until the Council of Trent (1545–1563)—called to address the challenges posed by the Protestant Reformation—that “people were encouraged to confess frequently, even daily, and then take Communion in an attempt to build up ‘grace’ and shorten time in purgatory” (Harrison 2014, 8).

In the sixteenth century, with the overlapping European projects of colonizing the New World, the use of bilingual confessional manuals came to be viewed by priests and missionaries as an essential tool for converting indigenous populations to the Catholic faith and, working closely with the Crown and subsequent viceroyalties, for fostering the general imperial plans of Spain and Portugal. In theory, their function was to cure souls and to help priests absolve the sins of their penitents, but the confessional manuals also may have symbolically enforced colonial power structures, ultimately seeking to cultivate Christian morality by translating the very tenets of Catholicism into indigenous languages for the purposes of catechizing native populations. The extent to which they were successful is much debated among scholars who research and write on the history of religion of the Iberian Atlantic world. Perhaps most importantly, the manuals were intended not only to define, classify, and codify sin and guide atonement but also to help extirpate beliefs and practices that the Catholic Church deemed superstitious or idolatrous. By examining some of the content of specific texts, we can glean some of the preoccupations of the Catholic Church in its colonial conversion project that attempted, above all, to conquer the souls of the natives (alongside the African, mixed-race, and even European inhabitants of the Americas).

Finally, it is worth noting that as fascinating as the genre of confessional manuals is, as historian Stephen Haliczer notes, “The fundamental problem with all these works is that they deal with confession from the standpoint of theologians, who wrote to instruct confessors how to carry out their responsibilities. By the very nature of their sources ... [they] can tell us little about confessional practice and still less about the relationship between individual confessors and their penitents” (Haliczer 1996, 6). Yet, as opposed to confessional manuals produced in the Iberian Peninsula, the structure of bilingual confessional manuals written in the Americas makes them invaluable sources for researchers because it offers a window into the missionaries’ preoccupations, their tactics for evangelization, and their particular logics of translating particular bodies, acts, and desires as sinful. In the words of Vicente Rafael, writing on the Spanish colonial Philippines, the priest’s “drive to overpower the penitent therefore is inextricably bound up with the desire to know of his most intimate acts and desires” (Rafael 1993, 106).
Bilingual Confessional Manuals in New Spain

The papal bull of Pope Alexander VI (1431–1503), known as the Inter Caetera of 1493, declared that “barbarous nations be overthrown and brought to the faith itself,” thereby not only demarcating the geographic right of the Spanish and Portuguese Crowns over the peoples and territories of the New World, but also entrusting these monarchies with the Christian conversion of the natives (Davenport 1917, 61). The conquest, therefore, came to be legally justified as a salvation that required natives not only to be catechized but also to be confessed in their own languages, often by missionaries who had dedicated many years to learning native tongues to such an end. Realistically, however, many priests and missionaries had familiarity with, but were far from fluent in native languages, which made confessional manuals all the more valuable but also inherently problematic due to the sheer number of mistranslations and misunderstandings that could take place between priest and penitent. The royal patronage and papal bulls of the late fifteenth century also gave the Spanish Crown jurisdiction over the land and the right to name bishops in the New World, which concentrated the power of the state over church matters and over the colonies. The Cédula Magna of 1574 and subsequent decrees by King Philip II (1527–1598) emphasized the Spanish Empire’s goal to incorporate indigenous languages in the evangelization of the native peoples of the new continent. These policies required that indigenous parishes be led only by those who fluently spoke the respective indigenous languages, which resulted in the massive proliferation of translations of pastoral texts from Latin and Spanish into native tongues.

The bilingual question-and-answer format of confessional manuals was established during the early colonial era and remained relatively unchanged until the end of the colonial period (Arias González and Vivas Moreno 1993). The question-and-answer structure of the confessional manuals followed European ecclesiastical literature, and the questions themselves touched upon each of the Ten Commandments, sometimes followed by the seven deadly sins. Following the Council of Trent, the Catholic Church in Latin America became a more bureaucratic, structured, and invasive institution. Most importantly, it encouraged the use of vernacular languages in the administration of the sacraments. In the Americas, this ultimately promoted the use of the native languages, and so pastoral literature was translated locally into indigenous languages at a much faster pace than envisioned. This included “unofficial” translations of brief, instructional literature known as cartillas. It also included catechisms, dictionaries, grammars, and confessional manuals in sometimes extremely remote indigenous languages, such as the Jesuit Luis de Valdivia’s 1606 Doctrina cristiana y cathecismo, con un confesionario, arte y vocabulario breves en lengua Allentiac (Christian doctrine and catechism, with brief confessional, dictionary, and vocabulary in the Allentiac language), which was written in the now-extinct Allentiac language of Patagonia (a region shared by present-day Argentina and Chile). Confessional manuals also serve, to an extent, as a record of indigenous languages that are no longer extant, as in the case of the Jesuit Pedro Marban's 1702 grammar and catechism in the now-extinct Moxa language of Bolivia, Arte de la lengua moxa: con su vocabulario, y cathecismo (Art of the Moxa language: with its vocabulary, and catechism).

The proliferation of these manuals fostered, in more ways than one, a system of irregular, unstructured evangelization, especially in and around the missions where missionaries sought to be comprehensive in their conversion efforts, but never were. At the same time, the sixteenth-century Council of Trent specifically defended the sacrament of penance and highlighted its importance, defining it as a core necessity and establishing forgiveness as a God-given right to confessors, noting “that the power of forgiving and retaining sins was communicated to the apostles and their lawful successors, for the reconciling of the faithful who have fallen after baptism” (Waterworth 1848, 93). The advent of the printing press in the New World also helped produce and spread pastoral literature and allowed it to be more readily available to missionaries in remote locations. However, all in all, the church had an insufficient number of clergy to catechize remote areas and their native inhabitants. As King Ferdinand II of Aragon (1452–1516) emphasized of the indios in the Laws of Burgos of 1512–1513, “The principal obstacle in the way of correcting their vices and having them profit by and impressing them with the doctrine is that their dwellings are remote from the settlements of the Spaniard” (Simpson 1960, 12).

As a genre, the confessional manuals from New Spain are a rich set of texts, full of detail and description. Missionaries, who dedicated years or even decades of study to attain fluency in one or more native languages, penned the vast majority of the confessional manuals. They often based these writings on their own experiences catechizing and confessing native peoples in the region. The manuals themselves appear to have seemingly lurid interests lurking behind their structure and content, especially in relation to the sixth commandment, “Thou shall not fornicate.” The confessional manuals seem to indicate that the missionaries’ interest in and focus on the sins of lust increased substantially over a relatively short period. The lengthy anonymous Confessionario para los curas de indios (Confessional for the priests of Indians), printed in Seville, Spain, in 1585, listed only twenty-two questions in relation to the sixth commandment. In contrast, Juan Pérez Bocanegra’s Ritual formulario (Formulary ritual), printed in Lima, Peru, in 1631, dedicated some 231 queries to the sins of lust (Harrison 2014). The passage of time was not the only factor in the difference; overall, confessional manuals written in Spain and Portugal focused far less on the vast range of the sins of lust than did their American counterparts.

The following examples taken from Mexican and Andean confessional manuals clearly illustrate the Catholic priests’ attempts to name and codify the sins of lust. Yet they also point to the potential for mistranslation that always lurks behind such endeavors. The first, taken from Franciscan friar Juan Baptista’s 1599 Confessionario en lengua mexicana y castellana (Confessional in the Mexican and Castilian language), written in both Nahuatl and Spanish, demonstrates the intimate nature of the questions that Nahua male and female confessants in and around central Mexico were to be asked in relation to the sixth commandment:

> Perhaps you had sex with some married woman, a single woman, a female relative of yours, or a young, unmarried maiden? To what degree [of consanguinity] was the female relative, or that of your wife? Perhaps you have desired, with determination, to join another woman if you could? Perhaps you did something filthy and dirty with yourself, or with another man? Have you fornicated, committed adultery with, or known a consanguineous relative of yours, or of your wife? Perhaps you stole her virginity, corrupting some young, unmarried maiden? Perhaps you have touched yourself with pleasure? Have you dressed yourself or adorned yourself in order to be desired? Did you kiss or hug some woman, touch her breasts, lasciviously play, or force her? Do you live with your wife, or perhaps you left her alone, or by treating her badly you made her flee? The times that the Devil reminds you of your filthy pleasure, perhaps you discard such thoughts with haste, or you delay a long time in doing so, or you give in? Have you experienced pleasure awaking from a dream that you dreamt? Did you deceive yourself and say dishonest words to provoke another to sin [with you]? When you join with your wife, do you guard the natural order, or perhaps you joined with her from behind, or perhaps in that act you had other ways [which are] dishonest and unworthy of being named here? Perhaps you had your wife when she was with her custom [i.e., menstruating]?

Questions for women. Perhaps some man had sex with you, was he married or single, or was he your relative or the relative of your husband? To what degree [of consanguinity] is he related to you, or to your husband? Perhaps you desired some married man, a single man, your relative, or that of your husband, and in what degree, say it. Perhaps you shaved, adorned yourself, or wore makeup so that men would desire you? Perhaps you caressed another, or had yourself caressed? Perhaps you yourself did something on your body to please yourself? Perhaps you committed the nefarious sin with another woman? Perhaps once with anger and wrath you denied your husband the [conjugal] debt, and did not admit him?

(BAPTISTA 1599, TRANSLATION BY ZEB TORTORICI)

Mestizo priest Bartolomé de Alva's slightly later 1634 Nahuatl-Spanish Confessionario mayor, y menor en lengua Mexicana (Large and small confessional in the Mexican language) goes even further than Baptista's manual, more explicitly phrasing questions to native parishioners about a litany of lustful sins including sodomy, bestiality, masturbation, incest, witchcraft, rape, prostitution, pimping, and drunkenness. This manual, like most, also focuses on the extirpation of idolatry, warning the natives against it in its admonition and in the detailed questionnaire on the first commandment. With regard to the sixth commandment, Alva—in addition to taxonomizing the sins of lust for Spanish missionaries and Nahua penitents alike—offers priests the following questions to guide their own confessional encounters with Nahuatl-speaking parishioners:

Have you had concubines? Have you licentiously enjoyed yourself? Have you given yourself over to earthly sin and lust? Or did you have sexual relations and sin with one [woman] or a few? Married women? Widows? Single women? Or completely virgin maidens? Is one of them your relative or relation or your older sister, your sister-in-law, your niece, or your relative or offspring within the first, second, [or] third degree [of consanguinity]? When you had sexual relations with your relatives, were you drunk or not? Did you repeatedly force her? Did you have sexual relations with her by means of fear and terror? How many times did you have sexual relations with each one of the women you mentioned? How many married women have you had sexual relations with, and how many times? Perhaps when you got drunk and lost your sense you fell into the abominable sin of sodomy, having something to do with another man? Perhaps you were responsible for the frightful sin, unworthy of being done, of having sexual relations with a four-legged animal or a beast? Did you sometimes touch your body thinking of some woman? Did you then spill your semen, you thinking that it was just as if you had really had sexual relations with that person? Did you deceive some woman? And if it is a woman, she will be asked: did you deceive some man, putting something on your body so that he caught some illness when you had sexual relations with him or he had sexual relations with you? When you had sexual relations with your wife or some other woman: was she menstruating? Was she with her monthly periods? Answer. Yes/no.

Here is what the women will be asked. Were you menstruating sometime when your husband or some other man had sexual relations with you? Did you repeatedly feel your body, thinking of a man, and wanting him to sin with you? Did you do it to yourself with your hands, bringing to a conclusion your lust? When your husband was drunk: did he have sex with you where you are a woman, or sometimes did he do the disgusting sin to you [i.e., sodomy and likely oral sex]? Did you restrain him? Were you responsible for dirty words with which you provoked and excited women? When you cohabited with some woman: did you show and reveal what was bad in front of those who had not yet seen the sin? Did you ever pimp for someone? On account of you, did they know themselves through sin, you yourself provoking a woman for whom you had summoned someone? Did you know the failings of your mother or your father, your children and your relatives, your household dependents, that they were cohabiting, and you did not restrain them? When they were drunk and intoxicated in your home, there committing before you sins unworthy of doing: didn’t you restrain them? Did you just look at them?

(ALVA 1999, 105–109)

While Baptista says that his indigenous penitents must “guard the natural order,” and that acts falling outside of that order include male-female anal sex as well as other acts that are “dishonest and unworthy of being named here,” Baptista’s questions for men oddly assume a female partner in sodomy, whereas his questions directed to women broach the “nefarious sin” between two females. Alva assumes that a lack of judgment and a loss of the senses—here caused by drunkenness—is a precondition for two men to engage in the “abominable sin of sodomy.” Alva, in contrast to Baptista, asks women about their husbands having sex “where you are a woman” and about their having “cohabited with some woman.” Alva also frames the “frightful sin” of bestiality as the worst, for it is “unworthy of being done.” These examples, taken from a handful of Mexican bilingual confessional manuals, should not be seen as guides to what individual Nahua penitents were doing in their private lives, but rather as a record of the Catholic Church’s concerns embedded in the personal and theological interests, as well as the anxieties, of each individual author.

Recent and forthcoming research on the colonial confessional manuals and on the administration of the sacraments sheds much light on how confession was carried out both in practice and in theory (Alva 1999; Burkhart 1989; Christensen 2014; Gruzinski 1989; Klor de Alva 1991; Pardo 2004; Rafael 1993; Sigal 2005, 2007). This is shown especially in the 2017 scholarly forum on (and original translation of) the late eighteenth-century Mexican Advertencias para los nuevos confesores (Advice and warnings for new confessors), written by a disicalced Carmelite friar and priest (see Melvin and Sellers-García 2017, 185–256). Recent studies on the crime of priestly solicitation of sexual favors during confession in early modern Spain (Haliczer 1996) and in colonial Mexico do some of this work as well (Chuchiak 2007; González Marmolejo 2002; Tortorici 2018; Lavrin 2008). While much research has already been conducted on the confessional manuals from the vast reaches of New Spain—from Guatemala to California, from the Philippines to the Yucatán Peninsula—much more still needs to be done in many other indigenous languages.

Bilingual Confessional Manuals in the Andes
In the Andes, as in New Spain, the practice of confession also served partly as a means of collecting information about the indigenous peoples and their so-called superstitious practices and beliefs. Most Christian missionaries were convinced that prior to the Incas, Andeans had been monotheistic and had practiced confession with ychuris (native confessors); this was reported in the instruction section, penned by Polo de Ondegardo, of one of the earliest confession manuals in the Andes, in 1585. As a result of one of the most important ecclesiastical province councils, the 1583 Concilio Provincial Limense (Provincial Council of Lima), summoned by Archbishop Toribio de Mongrovejo, pastoral materials including confessional manuals were to be created in Spanish and then translated into the two general languages of the indigenous Quechua and Aymara. The council subsequently published a confessional manual titled Confesionario para los curas de Indios—con la instrucción contra sus ritos y exhortacion para ayudar a bien morir y suma de los privilegios y forma de impedimentos del matrimonio (Confessional for priests of Indians—with instruction against their rites and exhortation to assist the good death and the sum of privileges and the nature of impediments to marriage). This confessional manual focused primarily on a more organized evangelization of the natives that encouraged the extirpation of idolatries and the collection of information regarding Andean religious rituals and beliefs. In 1603 Franciscan friar Luis Bolaños translated the text into the Guarani language in colonial Paraguay. In its introduction, the confession manual of the third ecclesiastical council known as the Concilio Limense demonstrated a more than superficial understanding of Andean religious beliefs, expressing concerns about the degree of conversion of indigenous peoples and how to use confessions to gauge this and ultimately to extirpate these idolatries. There is also special attention to the hechiceros (spell-casters or witches) and Andean priests and the continuing influence they seemed to have in Andean society at the time. In the resulting Quechua text, translators had to adapt Andean concepts of religion and morality to fit their narratives, but as they did so, as Regina Harrison has posited, these texts “retained traces of Andean modes of thought despite the repetitious didactic lessons in Quechua preached from the pulpits and in the plazas” (2014, 18). There are several other texts from the Andes and even the Southern Cone, including Andres Febrés’s mid-eighteenth-century Arte de la lengua general del reyno de Chile (Art of the general language of the kingdom of Chile).

As in New Spain, in the Andes controlling sexuality was a major concern of the discourse of confessional manuals, with strongly worded condemnations of fornication and all types of other sexual transgressions, often referred to as “nefarious sins,” including trial marriages, adultery, bestiality, and sodomy. The questions regarding the sixth commandment in the 1585 Confesionario para los curas de indios are extensive. While the Spanish-language column refers to male “voluntary pollution” (i.e., masturbation), the Quechua-language column is more forthcoming: “Do you cause your sperm to arrive? Touching your shameful part [pencai] do you enjoy it?” (quoted in Harrison 2014, 138). Pérez Bocanegra’s 1631 Ritual formulario is even more explicit, guiding its readers with the following Quechualanguage questions to be addressed specifically to women: “Do you touch your genitals with your hand? Item, your hands, how many times do you reach out to your genitals, place your [hand], until you make your sperm [sexual fluid] come?” (quoted in Harrison 2014, 139). He similarly interrogates male penitents: “Have you ejaculated while you were sleeping, because you have seen some women whom you have desired when you were awake or because you ate food that was too hot, which encouraged you to sin because you have eaten it or drunk too much or slept too long?” (quoted in Harrison 2014, 139). The confessional manuals are thus concerned with sinful acts committed as well as thoughts and dreams that rose up around the sins of lust.

The twenty-fourth sermon in the Spanish-, Quechua-, and Aymara-language Tercero cathecismo y exposicion de la doctrina christiana por sermons (1585; Third catechism and exposition of the Christian doctrine by sermons) not only defines fornication and adultery as a mortal sin, but also specifically links them to both sodomy and bestiality as the ultimate sins: “Above all these sins is the sin that we call nefarious, vile, and sodomy, which is to sin man with man, or with a woman in the incorrect orifice, and above all this is sinning with beasts, with sheep and dogs or with mares, which is a grave abomination” (quoted in Harrison 2014, 144). The author of the manual continues, “If there are among you men who commit sodomy sinning with other men, or with boys, or with beasts, know that for this sin fire and brimstone fell from the sky and turned to ash the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah” (quoted in Horswell 2005, 291).

Pérez Bocanegra in his 1631 Ritual formulario presents a series of questions in Quechua for his penitents: “Seeing a dog intertwined, animals one on top of the other, do you see [it] with desire?” (quoted in Harrison 2014, 139); “Have you used the vile sin with someone? Have you committed bestiality with an animal?”; and “Whom do you enter from the rear? With a llama, with anything, do you sin using the rear?” (quoted in Harrison 2014, 145). Pérez Bocanegra also cautions other priests working in the Andes to administer confession in the Quechua language:

In regard to the sins of dishonesty (because they are so frequent) of masturbation [poluciones], sodomy, bestiality, it is very necessary to ask them [Indigenous penitents] the questions listed below: for men as well as for women, whatever their civil status, and age (varying the items a little) because I have found from experience that there are many adults stained with such sins that they have never confessed; some from ignorance, others because of forgetfulness, and other from shame, and other for whatever reason they have never had to confess them. And because their confessors have not asked them in any confession about those sins.
From the nature of these questions in confessional manuals from both New Spain and the Andes, it would seem that nothing—from menstruation, masturbation, love potions, abortion, infanticide, adulterous relationships, and rape to incest, sodomy, and bestiality—was outside of the realm of the confessor’s interest. The invasive and all-encompassing nature of such questions in colonial confessional manuals has led some historians to overemphasize both priestly power and the sexualized aspect of the dialog between confessor and confessant. This sometimes happens under the assumption that the priest almost perfectly transcribed the confessional manual into actual practice.

As Harrison notes in her study of Spanish-Quechua penitential texts in the Andes between 1560 and 1650, “When confronting so many questions asking for explicit sexual detail, we may wonder if in fact the church was not serving to disseminate knowledge of sexual pleasure. Perhaps these acts had never occurred among their newly converted Quechua-speaking parishioners” (2014, 137). Similarly, Rafael in his study of Spanish-Tagalog translation and Christian conversion in the Spanish colonial Philippines emphasizes how “the confessor’s questions tended to take on the twists and turns of the very sins they sought to quell” (Rafael 1993, 104). This leaves us with the central paradox of the confessional manuals: they are invaluable historical sources, but they ultimately tell us far more about the anxieties (and perhaps even desires) of the Catholic priests and missionaries than they ever could about the native peoples they were supposedly about.

Finally, it is important to briefly show how the Quechua- and Aymara-language colonial confessional manuals gesture toward otherwise largely absent traces of Andean notions of gender prior to the arrival of the Spaniards. We see this especially in regard to what some scholars have called “third-gender subjects” in the Andean world. For literary studies scholar Michael Horswell, it was in the colonial era that the church’s mission to regulate indigenous Andeans by controlling their bodies constructed the figure of the “sodomite” out of third-gender subjects through a discourse that became naturalized in Europe during the Enlightenment (Horswell 2005, 236). Horswell traces the liminal third-gender subject rituality in the Andes to the depictions of Moche erotic pottery, colonial chronicles, dictionaries, and the analysis of modern ethnographies. Ultimately, he asserts, colonization resulted in the “transculturation of indigenous gender and sexual norms,” as opposed to a mere imposition and internalization of Christian notions of sin and morality (237). Relying on an excerpt from Pedro Cieza de León’s sixteenth-century chronicle of the conquest of Peru that describes in some detail an Andean religious ritual involving cross-dressing men and “homosexuality” in the Yungas region, Horswell and others cite it as evidence of Andean third-gender subjectivities that do not easily map onto Judeo-Christian conceptions of gender and the body. The ritual describes the cross-dressed guards of the Yungas temples and how they were chosen as boys to dress and perform “as girls” from an early age. Furthermore, during festive days, important men in the community committed sodomy with these guards (Cieza de León 1553, 222). The excerpt also mentions that Cieza de León’s informant, the Jesuit friar Domingo de Santo Tomas, punished two of these cross-dressed guards for their sins and spoke to them in detail about their acts, which likely occurred during some type of confession with the friar.

Irene Silverblatt in her study on the effects of the Spanish conquest on the place of women in Andean society reveals that, in contrast to the traditionally subordinate role of women in the Catholic Church, Andean women (prior to the Spanish conquest of the Americas) had significant roles as priestesses and, thus, as keepers of Andean religiosity. For that reason, Andean women became one of the primary targets of the campaigns to extirpate indigenous idolatries, which led to a decidedly more constricted and subordinate role for women in colonial society (Silverblatt 1987). Horswell argues that this new subaltern role of women also served to even further diminish and obliterate the role of a third gender in the colonial Andes. In this sense, we cannot view the bilingual confessional manuals in isolation from broader religious, political, and economic goals of the Spanish colonial enterprise. Recent studies on Quechua-Spanish translation and on confessional discourse in the Andes have shed light on the local dynamics of confession—perhaps most interestingly in relation to the traditional knotted-cord system known as the khipus as a means of documenting memory and recording sin (Durston 2007; Harrison 2014; Urton 2017; Charles 2007).

Confused Discourse and Mistranslation

Historically speaking, the power of confession, and of confessional manuals, as an instrument of control—especially of the conscience—has been overstated by scholars. Historian Henry Charles Lea in his 1867 account of the Inquisition posited that "the power of the confessional, one of the most effective instrumentalities invented by the ingenuity of man for enslaving the human mind, was peculiarly liable to abuse in sexual matters" (Lea 1907, 251). Lea’s language reflects centuries of Protestant propaganda about confession, but his remark does reflect a theme that was later theorized by Michel Foucault in the first volume of The History of Sexuality: “One does not confess without the presence of a partner who is not simply the interlocutor but the authority who requires the confession, prescribes and appreciates it, and intervenes in order to judge, punish, forgive, console, and reconcile” ([1978] 1990, 61). Hence, it seems that Foucault’s notion of the “confessing animal” of the West would have been a fundamental instrument in the colonization of the consciousness in the New World (59). This, however, was not necessarily the case.

Several historians of colonial Latin America, too, have perhaps overemphasized the power of confession under Spanish colonialism. Historian Serge Gruzinski, for example, has argued that confession—a “refined tool of ideological subjection and of domination over the individual”—in New Spain “went beyond the spiritual sphere to become a complex enterprise of domination and control over bodies and minds, an enterprise of ‘determinitorialization’ that alienated the individual from his culture and his environment and imposed upon him an explanation of sorrow and sin” (1989, 103). Other scholars make similar claims, speaking of the “control mechanisms” bound up in the penitential discipline and confession of native peoples in colonial Latin America (Klor de Alva 1991, 3). Yet, these same scholars complicate our understanding by simultaneously analyzing forms of indigenous agency by and through—or even resistance to—confession. Such formulations help us theorize the cultural and religious significance of the sacrament of confession in colonial contexts, but they nonetheless overdetermine confession as the primary site of sexual encounter between colonizers and colonized.

Much to the dismay of disconcerted priests (especially if we are to believe their reports), many indigenous people evaded questions, gave equivocal answers, feigned contrition, and failed to fully grasp some of the intended meanings of confession due to mutual mistranslation. Friar Alva, for one, lamented,

You natives, even though you are cohabiting for two [or] three years already with a woman and sinning with her every day and every night, when the priest and confessor questions you about how many times you have sinned with her, you just reply: “Two times, three times.” And you all make the same statement, and with this you really damage your confession.

(ALVA 1999, 46)

In his Spanish-Quechua Sermones de los misterios de nuestra Santa fe catolica, en lengua castellana y la general del Inca (Sermons of the mysteries of our Holy Catholic Castilian faith and the general [faith] of the Inca), printed in Lima in 1648, Fernando de Avendaño wrote that after a pregnant indigenous woman asserted in confession that she was a virgin, he bemoaned, “When you hear this, how can you explain this? This is why we are saddened, and we priests cry in our hearts, seeing that you are going to hell, because you hide your sins in confession” (quoted in Harrison 1994, 148). Priests also reported that some “Indians” feigned ignorance of the confessor's language, be it Spanish or a local indigenous language, in order to avoid confession.

Ultimately, both confession and the bilingual confesñonarios upon which they were based—theologically, conceptually, and linguistically—are marked by profound ambivalence. In addition to the issues outlined above, the notion of Catholic confession resonated with indigenous rituals of expiation that existed well before the arrival of the Spaniards. In central Mexico, the Nahuatl term that the Catholic missionaries chose to signify the church's sacrament of confession was neyolmelahualiztli, which literally translates to “straightening one's heart” (Burkhart 1989, 181–182). The Catholic sacrament of confession appears to have presented Nahua indigenous people with a unique opportunity to cure internal disruptions and all types of ills, both moral and material, in ways that may have differed from what priests and friars had in mind. Similarly, in the Andes, early Catholic missionaries used the Quechua term hichuni (or ichuni/ychucuni) to mean “to confess” (Harrison 2014, 71). The verb, however, was lexically related to the straw grass—the ychu—that indigenous shaman-priests used to evaluate ceremonial confessions and prescribe due ritual penalties. For all of these reasons and more, conceptual mistranslations and hybridizations abounded through the confessional manuals.

Confession in colonial Latin America was perhaps less an efficient tool of domination than a “confused discourse in which priests and penitents negotiated meaning through their different interpretations of language and symbols” (Sigal 2005, 580). The confessional manuals’ translation of the Catholic tenets into native languages, especially in penitential texts and sermons, required the semantic recodification of indigenous concepts, which was always only partly successful. Writing of the Andean confessional manuals, Harrison tells us that their very “discourse is hampered because of lexical disparities between Quechua and Spanish referents and augmented further because of the distinct sexual codes of each society” (Harrison 2014, 121).

Equally important, such conceptual mistranslations persevere well into the present through the terms and categories often used to name particular identities—be they lesbian, gay, homosexual, trans, queer, or something else—that coalesce partly around a politics of desire. But when Baptista asked his Nahuatl-speaking penitents in 1599, “Perhaps you did something filthy and dirty with yourself, or with another man?,” or when Pérez Bocanegra asked his Quechua-speaking parishioners in 1603 “if there are any among you who commit sodomy sinning with other men, or with boys, or with beasts?,” were they speaking about what we call homosexuality and bestiality, or about some other desires that remain partly illegible to us today? Do so-called third-gender subjectivities and ritual ceremonies in Mexico or the Andes that mediated between the masculine and the feminine relate to sodomy, hermaphroditism, cross-dressing, transsexuality, or some variant of transgender? Do the “pollutions” that resulted from “doing something dirty” equate to what we think of as masturbation?

In translating particular acts and desires in the confessional manuals (and during the act of confession itself), the Spaniards translated Judeo-Christian religious concepts into native practices and native moral value systems. In doing so, they attempted to dictate morality partly by reorganizing indigenous concepts regarding what might to us, in retrospect, appear to relate directly to gender, sexuality, and LGBTQ desires. Harrison rightly tells us that “the interrogations of the confessional read like a modern sex manual because of the European obsession with procreation and fulfilling the marital debt within the sacrament of marriage” (2014, 150). Yet, the desires of the past also complicate those of the present, calling into question how the sins of lust mentioned in the sixth commandment have been historically defined, named, and moralized. Moreover, these acts of naming are inseparable from the racializing legacies of colonialism and their attendant representations of indigenous peoples throughout the Americas, both past and present.

SEE ALSO Conquest and Sodomy in Latin America; Florentine Codex and Nahua Sexuality; Moche Pottery; Sins against Nature in Colonial Latin America

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Baptista, Juan. Confessionario en lengua mexicana y castellana: Con muchas aduertencias muy necesarias para los Confessores [Confessional in the Mexican and Castilian language]. Santiago Tlatilulco, Mexico: Melchior Ocharte, 1599.

Confessionario para los curas de indios, con la instruccion contra sus ritos: y exhortación para ayudar a bien morir y summa de sus privilegios y forma de impedimentos del matrimonio [Confessional for the priests of Indians with instruction against their rites: and exhortation to help achieve a good death and a compendium of their privileges and impediments to marriage]. Lima, Peru: Antonio Ricardo, 1585.

Doctrina cristiana, y catecismo para instruccion de los indios, y de las demas personas, que han de ser enseñadas en nuestra sancta fé: con vn confessionario, y otras cosas necessarias [Christian doctrine, and catechism for the instruction of the Indians, and of the other persons, who are to be taught in our holy faith: with a confessional, and other necessary things]. Lima, Peru: Antonio Ricardo, 1584.

Febrés, Andres. Arte de la lengua general del reyno de Chile, con un dialogo chileno-hispiano muy curioso: que se añade la doctrina christian, esto es, rezo, catecismo, coplas, confesionario, y pláticas; lo mas en lengua chilena y castellana: y por fin un vocabulario hispano-chileno, y un calepino chileno-hispiano mas copioso [Art of the general language of the kingdom of Chile, with a very curious Chilean-Hispanic dialogue: that the Christian doctrine is added, that is, prayer, catechism, couplets, confessional, and discussions; the most in the Chilean and Spanish language: and finally a Spanish-Chilean vocabulary, and a more copious Chilean-Latin]. Lima, Peru: Oficina en la Calle de la Encarnación, 1765.

Harrison, Regina. Sin and Confession in Colonial Peru: Spanish-Quechua Penitential Texts,

Silverblatt, Irene. Moon, Sun, and Witches: Gender Ideologies and Class in Inca and Colonial

A letter dated 10 July 1519 purportedly written by the Spanish conquistador Hernán Cortés (1485–1547) and addressed to Emperor Charles V opens by recounting his movements in the royal service from Cuba to Mexico. Cortés describes Mexico as a land of gold like “that from which Solomon is said to have taken the gold for the temple” (1986, 29), but he maintains his distance from the “deformed” people he finds there. He claims they practice self-mutilation and human sacrifice and describes them as being clothed like Moors and living in houses designed “in the Moorish fashion” (30). A summary judgment is offered: “They are all sodomites and practice that abominable sin” (37). This claim was frequently repeated: Tomás Ortiz, in 1525, like explorer Christopher Columbus before him, believed the native population practiced cannibalism; this led him to effortlessly link cannibalism and sodomy as if they were the same thing, writing that they “were sodomites more than any other race” (quoted in Guerra 1971, 53). The charge is reiterated by Gonzalo Fernández de Oviedo (1478–1557) a year later: “The Indians eat human flesh and are sodomites” (quoted in Guerra 1971, 55). Even the Spanish friar Bartolomé de Las Casas (1474–1566), defending the innocence of the native population and condemning the greed and rapacity of the Spaniards, nonetheless acknowledged the practice of both cannibalism and sodomy among the indigenous population, claiming that only a minority of the population indulged in such behavior that would warrant their extinction.

What does “sodomy” mean in these contexts? The tendency today is to think of it as a sexual practice (as anal intercourse performed by men), but these and similarly worded claims by Spaniards in the New World do not describe scenes of sex between men. They are blanket condemnations of the indigenous population, and they follow the model offered by Sodom and Gomorrah in the Old Testament as worthy to be destroyed for sins that are declared but never shown. Indeed, thinking of Mexico as a land like the one Solomon mined for booty, and for the adornment of his temple, suggests this kind of transportation of examples fueled by religious fervor and racial stigma, as does the comparison of natives to Moors. The conquest of the New World, after all, followed upon the conclusion of the Reconquista of the Moors and the expulsion of the Jews from Spain in 1492. “Sodomy” does not name a set of sexual practices so much as it sexualizes differences that justify conquest.
and annihilation: people who sacrifice other people (men who sacrifice other men or men who practice self-mutilation) are people who should be sacrificed. “Sodomy” is a discursive category that attempts, through that word, to summarize all the justifications for conquest. As the crime not to be named among Christians, it is not defined by any particular acts, extending to all sexual sins that do not result in marital procreation; as anti-Christian, it extends to acts performed by non-Christians (or to the wrong kind of Christian) that are seen as politically threatening. As Michel Foucault famously wrote, it is an “utterly confused category” (1978, 101).

Projection and the Appearances of Native Men

One primary confusion lies in the uncanny resemblance of the natives to their conquerors. As Peter Hulme (1986) has pointed out, the claim first made by Columbus in 1492 and repeated by others, that the natives who needed to be exterminated (the natives, that is, who resisted conquest) were cannibals, represents them as parodic Christians. (Christianity, after all, is based on human sacrifice and its ritualistic repetition in the Eucharistic eating of Christ’s body and drinking of his blood.) At the very least, the violence of the conquerors is projected onto native violence. Also projected onto the natives is a version of how the male-male order that characterized European society was organized. Cortés vied with his fellow conquistadors in what eventually came to be known as Mexico, but he also attempted to consolidate relations with those above him by sharing a bed with them, as Francisco López de Gómara (c. 1511–c. 1566) reports in his life of Cortés about his master’s experiences in Cuba.

The Spanish conquistador Diego Velázquez (c. 1465–1524), alarmed when Cortés appeared ready to attack him, was assured by Cortés that he wished to be “his friend and servant. So they shook hands and after a long talk lay down together in the same bed” (Gómara 1964, 13). In an important essay published in 1990, Alan Bray argued that the charge of sodomy seized on forms of male-male intimacy that in other contexts were the normative ways in which men consolidated their social standing. Kings had bedfellows.

When Vasco Núñez de Balboa (1475–1519), days before arriving at the Pacific Ocean in 1513, killed the leader of the indigenous people in the Panamanian village of Quarequa along with hundreds of his followers, he chose forty of them to be fed to his dogs to punish their sodomitical behavior. The event is described by Pietro Martire d’Anghiera (1457–1526) in 1516: “[Balboa] found the house of this king infected with most abominable and unnatural lechery. For he found the king’s brother and many other young men in women’s apparel, smooth and effeminately decked, which by the report of such as dwelt about him, he abused with preposterous Venus” ([1555] 1966, 89v; translation modernized by Jonathan Goldberg). In this passage, sodomy is first described as if it were a sexual disease (for it “infected” these and other men). The use of the term abominable picks up on the lexicon of condemnation to be found in biblical and patristic contexts, while unnatural (that is, contra natura, or "against nature") suggests what makes sodomy the worst of sins: it is against God’s command to be fruitful and multiply. Sex that should be procreative is supplanted by acts that are not. The use of the phrase “preposterous Venus” indicates such a reversal of sex as enjoined upon Adam and Eve, substituting the anus for the vagina. Under the aegis of a Venus whose lovemaking is “backward” (the literal meaning of “preposterous”), the men involved in these acts do not seem to be men at all. Yet even here, no eyewitness account of sexual behavior is offered; instead, a rumor of such activity is credited as evidence. If it is true that Balboa heard such reports, it might testify to a division among the natives and suggest that sodomy accusations were not just European inventions.

It is not known what made some native men appear to be less than entirely masculine. Perhaps some were cross-dressed, a prerogative in some native groups, and a sign of their special status, taken as a challenge to assumptions about gender binarism. However, similar practices could be found in some European cultures (and Asian ones as well) where boys, for instance, played women’s roles on stage. (This practice did not occur in the Spanish theater, where only married women were allowed to act; their marital status supposedly guaranteed the sexual purity that might otherwise have been in question by the mere fact of female public performance, or by boys playing women’s parts.)

The gender hierarchies of his age are evident in what Balboa saw: it is specifically young native men who are accused of sodomy—royal siblings and their followers who might threaten Spanish rule. Native “courts” are mirrors of Europe. Unruly young men (like the European conquistadors) are equated with the insubordination of female subordinates. When Balboa fed forty sodomites to the dogs, he was also depending on the association of sodomy with bestiality to justify the punishment. Las Casas insists that “the Spanish fell like ravening wolves upon the fold, or like tigers and savage lions who have not eaten meat for days” (1992, 11). He might have seen the dogs as extensions of Spanish rapacity rather than as cannibalistic creatures devouring cannibalistic sodomites.
Sixteenth-Century Engraving by Theodor de Bry Depicting Cannibalistic Practices of the Indigenous Population of the New World. European participants in the conquest of the New World often depicted those they subjugated as savages engaging in cannibalism in letters and illustrations sent back to Europe. The practice of cannibalism was often linked to the practice of sodomy in the minds of these European observers.

A Mirroring of Conquest and Sodomy

In her groundbreaking essay “Can the Subaltern Speak?” Gayatri Chakravorty Spivak pithily summarizes a justification of colonial conquest that can be applied to the use of “sodomy” as a pretext: “White men are saving brown women from brown men” (1988, 296). The “brown women” in the Balboa episode are the sodomites. (Elsewhere they are men clothed in Moorish robes or men whose bodily piercings break the carapace of the supposedly impenetrable male body.) In Spivak’s succinct formulation the brown men and women supposedly saved by the white men are violated by them; one form of patriarchal domination is replaced by another. Women are pawns in the violent contentions for male power. Brown men are the white men’s rivals. The elimination of “sodomites” in the name of normative sexual relations furthers the subordination of native men and women to colonial rule. The supposedly good conqueror rescues the supposedly evil and corrupted natives who need to be saved from their own culture. Sodomy confuses these distinctions, as is evident when Bernal Díaz (c. 1495–1584), a soldier who participated in the conquest of Mexico and wrote an account of it, describes the relationship of Cortés to Montezuma (1466–1520), the ruler of Tenochtitlán, the future Mexico City; their friendship raised no suspicious because the Aztec ruler himself “was quite free from sodomy” (1963, 225). Cortés binds himself to Montezuma by giving him his pageboy, exclaiming, “How right I am, Lord Montezuma, to love you as dearly as I love myself” (quoted in Díaz 1963, 250). Such love, with the boy as go-between, is the socially acceptable form of brotherhood that sodomy mirrors. Even when Montezuma died because of the Spaniards he continued to affirm his love for Cortés, or so Gómara (1964) claims. Conquest looks like what the conquistadors called “sodomy.”

Perhaps the most stunning instance of this mirroring is offered in the report that Alvar Núñez Cabeza de Vaca (c. 1490–c. 1560)—who explored what is today Florida, Texas, and the Gulf of Mexico—sent to Charles V, which was published in 1542. Separated from his fellow conquistadors after the failure of the 1527 Narváez expedition to Florida, Cabeza de Vaca wandered the American Southwest, often assuming the shamanistic powers and garb of the natives with whom he traded. By the time he was “rescued” by fellow Spaniards, he had learned to condemn their treatment of natives without ever himself fully “going native.” In his in-between state, Cabeza de Vaca describes himself undertaking roles that sometimes are those of native women, sometimes those of native men. At the same time as he himself played both parts, Cabeza de Vaca condemned the “diabolical practice” of native men who lived with “emasculated” men: “Eunuchs go partly dressed, like women, and perform women's duties, but use the bow and carry very heavy loads. We saw many thus mutilated. They are more muscular and taller than other men and can lift tremendous weight” ([1961] 1983, 100). “Diabolical practice” is as close as Cabeza de Vaca comes to saying “sodomy,” and no wonder, because the men/women he describes occupy his own indeterminate position.

SEE ALSO Confessional Manuals in Colonial Latin America; Florentine Codex and Nahua Sexuality; Sins against Nature in Colonial Latin America

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Conversion Therapy in China

HONGWEI BAO
Assistant Professor in Media Studies
University of Nottingham, United Kingdom

The use of medical, psychological, and psychiatric treatment to “convert” LGBTQ individuals to heterosexuals in China.

The practice of conversion therapy, otherwise known as reparative therapy (niuzhuan zhiliao in Mandarin Chinese), involves the use of medical, psychological, and psychiatric means to change LGBTQ people’s sexuality and has been insufficiently documented in Asia. Most Asian countries do not have state legislation and professional guidelines to protect LGBTQ rights and to regulate the practice of conversion therapy. These inconsistencies in LGBTQ rights and public health regulation among different countries, together with complex social, cultural, and religious factors in each country, provide space for institutions and individuals to practice conversion therapy legally and illegally. In India, for example, homosexuality was still a criminal offense based on Section 377 of the Indian penal code as part of the British colonial legacy until India’s Supreme Court struck it down in September 2018; LGBTQ people suffer from intense stigma and discrimination and are sometimes sent to doctors for conversion therapy (Patra 2016).

A few places in Asia have explicitly banned conversion therapy. In 2012 the Hong Kong Psychological Society published the “Position Paper for Psychologists Working with Lesbians, Gays, and Bisexual (LGB) Individuals,” stating that homosexuality and bisexuality are not mental illnesses and that there is no scientifically proven evidence to support the attempts to change one’s sexual orientation, thus making it the first professional body in Asia to explicitly state its position on conversion therapy. In 2016 Taiwan’s Taichung City banned the practice of conversion therapy in the city. The following year, Taiwan’s Ministry of Health and Welfare issued an amendment to the Physicians Act (Yishi fa) banning conversion therapy (Pride Life 2017).

This entry focuses on the conversion therapy practices and the debates surrounding them in the context of the People's Republic of China, as the topic has received widespread national and international publicity in the twenty-first century (Channel 4 2015). In so doing, the entry aims to provide a picture of the challenges and opportunities that LGBTQ people face in Asia in fighting against conversion therapy and for LGBTQ rights.
Members of the Beijing LGBT Centre Protest Conversion Therapy outside the Haidian District Court, 2014. Xiao Tie, executive director of the Beijing LGBT Centre, pretends to inject a patient with a giant mock syringe in front of the courthouse where hearings were being held in a landmark case involving plaintiff Peng Yanhui, who successfully sued the Chongqing Xinyu Piaoxiang Psychotherapy Centre after he received conversion therapy there.

Overview

Homosexuality is widely considered to have been depathologized in China. However, such “depathologization” is only partial. The third edition of the Chinese Classification of Mental Disorders (CCMD-3), published in 2001 and still in effect as of 2017, declassifies homosexuality as a mental disorder but still includes “sexual orientation disorders,” which refer to “psychological disorders such as unwillingness, hesitation, anxiety, depression, and pain” resulting from one’s “sexual development and sexual orientations” (Beijing LGBT Centre 2014, 30). Based on this, the CCMD-3 distinguishes between two types of homosexuality: “egosyntonic,” or “self-congruous” (ziwo hexie) homosexuality (i.e., those who feel comfortable with their sexual identity) and “egodystonic” homosexuality (i.e., those who do not). The CCMD-3 stipulates that egosyntonic homosexuality is considered normal and needs no treatment; however, those who feel “anxious, depressed, conflicted” about their sexual identity and those who “seek change of gender and sexual identity through treatment” still need medical, psychological, and psychiatric intervention (Zhou 2009, 125; translation by Hongwei Bao). Although this CCMD-3 article is designed to address some mental health issues that afflict both gay and straight people, in reality, it has often been used to provide policy justifications for gay conversion therapy.

The practice of using conversion therapy on LGBT people in China has been widely documented, including by two Queer Comrades webcast documentaries (Wei 2010, 2012), a 2014 report from the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) and the US Agency for International Development (USAID), a Beijing LGBT Centre report (2015), and a British television documentary (Wells 2015). The Beijing LGBT Centre documented the practice of conversion therapy by both private and public hospitals and clinics in ten Chinese cities (Asia Catalyst 2015). In a 2005 book on homosexuality in China, one of the authors, Lu Longguang, a neurologist from Nanjing Medical University, documented case studies of treating homosexuality by injecting gay “patients” with apomorphine, a drug that induces nausea (Liu and Lu 2005; Bao 2012). According to the account, Lu advised 2,534 gay “patients” from 1987 to 1997. Among the 1,000 gay “patients” he treated with his “guided corrective psychotherapy,” 79.8 percent came to him of their own accord, and 20.2 percent were referred by others, including by family members and relatives. Among the 82 gay men he treated and with whom he conducted a one-year follow-up study, 13.5 percent had “overall recovered”; 13.5 percent made “significant progress”; 39 percent made “some progress”; and 34 percent “showed no sign of change” (Liu and Lu 2005, 277). According to a 2015 report published by the Beijing LGBT Centre, 116 people interviewed went through conversion therapy, and none of them reported a change in their sexuality; in some cases, the treatment inflicted pain and harm on participants and had negative and longlasting effects on their physical and psychological health.

Reasons

The medical, psychological, and psychiatric treatment of homosexuality in China results from the deeply rooted belief that homosexuality is an illness or a mental disorder. This idea had its origins in the translation of Western theories of psychology and medical science in the Republican era, the Maoist understanding of homosexuals as “hooligans” (liumang) incompatible with socialist governmentality, and the post-Mao Chinese intellectuals’ obsession with a highly selective body of works in Western psychology, psychiatry, and medical science. The governance of nonheteronormative sexuality is not only an issue of public health, with its agenda of producing modern and healthy citizens, but also a concern for the state to establish a heteronormative, family-oriented, and conservative moral and social order.

The practice of conversion therapy also reflects structural problems in China’s health-care system. China’s ongoing “health-care reform” (yigai), which was launched in the 1980s, is marked by the privatization and deregulation of China’s health-care system. Not every Chinese citizen is entitled to the same medical care in the public health system, and many must resort to private health care for sensitive issues such as gender identity, sexual orientation, and sex change (UNDP and USAID 2014). Increasingly, as a result of shrinking public funding, public hospitals are required to be financially self-sufficient and even make a profit to support themselves. The provision of psychological counseling is seen by many hospitals and clinics as a move to generate extra income. In a country where health-care resources are unevenly distributed, the health-care sector is poorly regulated, and many health professionals are insufficiently trained, the provision of conversion therapy for LGBTQ people becomes possible. The economic incentive of conversion therapy is alluring: a treatment course costs an average of 20,000 yuan ($3,000), and the cost usually spirals upward as doctors encourage more sessions and repeated courses, but without a firm promise of results (Haas 2016).

The continuing existence of conversion therapy also reflects the worrying situation of LGBTQ psychological and mental health in China. The Beijing LGBT Centre’s 2014 report on the mental health of LGBT people in China found that nearly one-tenth of the 1,600 LGBT respondents had sought conversion therapies previously; their main motivation was “gaining acceptance from parents and relatives,” followed by “conforming to society” and “difficulty of living as an LGBT person” (Beijing LGBT Centre 2014, 41). Most LGBTQ individuals seek conversion therapy voluntarily; some are brought for treatment by their families. There are instances of LGBTQ individuals being sent by force to mental hospitals by their family and relatives (see the Zhumadian case below).

Methods

Hospitals and clinics typically offer LGBTQ people treatment programs lasting two to twenty-one weeks; most of these programs involve a combination of psychiatric evaluation, counseling, medication, and physical therapy. Typical methods include “psychoanalysis, self-examination (neiguan) therapy, cognitive insight therapy, problem-solving therapy, aversion therapy, hormonal therapy, medication, hypnosis, and electroconvulsive therapy” (Beijing LGBT Centre 2014, 30). In the case of physical therapy, encouragements and incentives are given in heterosexual scenarios, while discomfort, disgust, or even pain is induced to create negative associations with homoerotic thoughts. Individuals have reported the use of ammonia water as an aversion stimulus, the snapping of a rubber band against the wrist, electroshock (Beijing LGBT Centre 2014; Xinjingbao 2015), and the injection of apomorphine when looking at homoerotic images (Liu and Lu 2005).

Western medical methods are usually used in the treatment. They include prescribing antidepressants, tranquilizers, and sleeping pills; injecting apomorphine or collagen; and giving electroshock. A gay man described his experience of receiving electroshock therapy in the following account:

There was a TV set in the room. He (the therapist) asked me to sit down on a chair with some wires and needles attached. Then he showed me some gay porn videos. He gave me a mild shock when I felt a bit turned on. When I was aroused, he gave me stronger shocks, which made me feel a bit dizzy. At first, I jumped up immediately as I got a shock; I refused to continue and cooperate. He tried to persuade me by saying that this was part of the therapy and I had to accept it or the therapy would fail. “Just think how your life will be a lot easier if you get back to being heterosexual.” He said things like this to get me back into the chair. He added that if I really could not bear this he could use a belt to strap me down. He said that the shock would only last a few seconds but I needed not worry, as there would be no real danger to my life.

(BEIJING LGBT CENTRE 2014, 56)

Traditional Chinese medicine has also been used. A 1994 article published in the Zhongguo xinli weisheng zazhi (Journal of Chinese psychological health) reported the use of two types of assorted herbal medicine, named “secret semen-boosting soup” (mijing tang) and “five-herb posterity-preserving soup” (wuzi yanzong tang) (Fang 1995). The Beijing News reported in 2015 the use of an herbal soup made up of ginger, dates, astragalus, and longan (Xinjingbao 2015). A 2015 Global Times article reported on an exorcism ceremony performed by a Taoist monk:

In a 20-square-meter house located in a traditional hutong [alleyway] in Caishikou, Beijing’s Xicheng district, a man lit incense, prayed to Buddha and whispered some spells. He acted like an exorcist, pushing his hands toward Chen Wei (pseudonym) from a distance or giving him hard slaps on the back. The so-called master claimed that Chen was possessed by evil spirits and that dispelling the evil could rid him of his homosexuality.

None of these methods has proven to be efficacious.

Legal Cases and Community Activism

There have been several legal cases surrounding conversion therapy in China, two of which have been well reported nationally and internationally: the 2014 Beijing case and the 2017 Zhumadian case. In both instances, China’s LGBTQ community has lent support to the rights of individuals.

The 2014 Beijing case involved Peng Yanhui, a gay activist who sued the Chongqing Xinyinu Piaoxiang Counselling Centre after he received conversion therapy there. The Beijing Haidian District People's Court ordered the center to pay the plaintiff 3,500 yuan ($560) in compensation and issue a public apology on its website (Guardian 2014). China's LGBTQ community supported the case strongly from beginning to end, thus bringing China's first court case surrounding conversion therapy to a successful conclusion.

The lack of clarity on LGBTQ issues in Chinese law and the discrepancy in health-care practices in different parts of China meant that the Beijing case would not be the last court case concerning conversion therapy in China. In 2015 Yu Hu, a gay man from Zhumadian, was forced into a mental hospital by his wife and her family when he requested a divorce from her. Yu was involuntarily kept there for nineteen days, strapped to a bed and forcefully medicated. The Zhumadian Yicheng District People's Court ordered the hospital to publicly apologize to Yu and pay 5,000 yuan ($735) in compensation (BBC News 2017). PFLAG China and other LGBTQ nongovernmental organizations rescued Yu from the hospital and took the case to the court.

China's growing LGBTQ community organizations have played a positive role in fighting against conversion therapy. Shenglai tongzhi (Cures that kill), a 2010 documentary on conversion therapy made by the Beijing Gender Health Education Institute, has been widely used for community and public education, as well as in the training of health professionals. The Beijing LGBT Centre has worked with the LGBTQ community and the media to raise public awareness of the harm of conversion therapy and the importance of LGBT mental health (Asia Catalyst 2015).

SEE ALSO Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders (DSM); Human Rights in Asia; Medicine, Complementary and Alternative; Psychoanalysis in Argentina; Rape, Corrective, in Africa

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Côte d'Ivoire

CHRISTOPHE BROQUA
Centre national de la recherche scientifique, France

A historical and contemporary look at sexual and gender minorities in this West African nation.

Côte d'Ivoire is considered to be the country most tolerant toward sexual and gender minorities in West and Central Africa and in French-speaking Africa. Established as a French colony at the end of the nineteenth century, it maintained privileged relations with France after the proclamation of its independence in 1960. During the so-called Ivorian miracle in the 1960s and 1970s, the country experienced economic growth linked in particular to the increase in the price of the raw materials it produced (coffee and cocoa). Unlike neighboring countries, it was politically stable, and it became a showcase for postcolonial Franco-African relations.

It was likely this context that gay life in Côte d'Ivoire experienced some development, since it seemed to flourish at the beginning of the 1980s. An article published by two sociologists in 1984, when literature on homosexuality in Africa was practically nonexistent in French, testified to the tranquility enjoyed by Abidjan's gay people who blended into the city: "No specific police repression, no stigmatization by public opinion: the homosexual fact mainly arouses curiosity" (Le Pape and Vidal 1984, 115). According to the authors, there was no commercial establishment attended exclusively by gays, but some places nevertheless were preferred by the "milieu," to use the expression in force at that time and still today. In the next decade, more exclusively gay bars were established.

The two sociologists also witnessed an important and relatively rare mediatization of the gay issue, concerning a drag queen who had imitated a famous Ivorian female singer on television. Originally from Mali, Oscar was a well-known hairdresser and a milieu figure of the time. The press coverage of his homosexuality, if less brutal than a media case a few years earlier that concerned lesbians, signaled the emergence in Côte d'Ivoire of a new regime of truth about sexual orientations (Nguyen 2005).

WOUBI CHÉRI (1998; PHILIP BROOKS, LAURENT BOCAHUT)

Woubi chéri (1998), a French-Ivorian documentary directed and produced by Philip Brooks and Laurent Bocahut, is one of the first films to feature the LGBT community on the African continent. It focuses on the daily lives and struggles experienced by gay, lesbian, and transgender people in Abidjan, Côte d'Ivoire, an urban and cosmopolitan setting shaped by global dynamics and local traditions. Barbara, one of the main protagonists and the president of an organization called the Ivory Coast Transvestites Association, explains how members of the Ivorian LGBT community both subvert and reproduce traditional gender norms: woubis are “effeminate” boys, sometimes transvestites, who play the role of “women” in their relationships with men. Their “husbands” are yossis, men who can be bisexual and married. A toussou bakari is a lesbian, and controus are people who do not accept the nonheterosexual lifestyle. Laurent, who is a woubi, says about his yossi, Jean-Jacques, that “he goes out with women because he needs to have a family for the future.” “And maybe,” says Laurent, “I’ll be able to live a family life through him.” The protagonists claim their place in a global queer community from which they derive a sense of support and belonging while identifying the challenges they face in a postcolonial society ridden with economic problems, social inequalities, and neocolonial power structures. Some cross-dressing men featured in the documentary engage in commercial sex work.

This award-winning documentary has been featured at various film and documentary venues around the world. It paved the way for subsequent films and documentaries, such as Call Me Kuchu (2012) and Born This Way (2013), that critically address both homophobia and transphobia in various African countries, as well as some African leaders’ contention that homosexuality is “un-African.” However, LGBT organizing on the African continent has facilitated wider representations of same-sex desire in African literatures and cultures. In Woubi chéri, Barbara and her friends express their need for acceptance and the importance of carving out new spaces of difference and inclusion in African societies, while celebrating same-sex relationships as legitimate modes of pleasure and commitment. Their quest for identity can also be seen as representative of contemporary African societies’ own quest for self-definition at the junction of indigenous sociocultural heritages and the often dehumanizing impact of Western influences. Tatiana, who is a transvestite, states, “Without the right to be different, Africa is going nowhere.” Barbara declares, “You have to be creative, live life like an artist. You can’t always be down-to-earth. Tradition is fine but you have to be in-between. I think that’s what the third millennium will be all about ... a mix of modern and traditional, different ways of life and sex.” The documentary ends with a djémé, a type of traditional feast, in Bingerville, a suburb of Abidjan. Dressed in beautiful boubous, woubis are shown dancing for a varied community of families, couples, and children who have gathered to partake in the festivities: a community made of many differences but also of renewed social interactions.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Born This Way. Directed by Shaun Kadlec and Deb Tullmann. Los Angeles: Good Docs, 2013. DVD.
The bipolarization of sexual identities was then a salient fact in the milieu and in same-sex couples. Among men, the woubi are the “feminine” partners, while the yossi are the partners who conform to the dominant norms of masculinity.

In Abidjan during the 1990s, and no doubt before, there were many “transvestites” (in French travestis, i.e., drag queens), whose leader was Barbara (Brooks and Bocahut 1998). The division between woubi and yossi still exists today, and there is still a significant presence of transvestites, as evidenced, for example, by the regular “Miss Woubi” contest. But while dual-gender identifications among both gay men and lesbians have remained for decades, sexual identities also evolved over time. This has been the case particularly among men since the first decade of the twenty-first century, with the use of internet dating sites and the internationalized categories that these sites popularize referring more to position in the sexual relationship (top/bottom) than to gender role (Broqua 2013).

Another evolution of this period concerned gay politics in a global African context that was becoming increasingly hostile. An organization (not officially registered) of transvestites in Côte d’Ivoire was created in the 1990s, but it was within the framework of the fight against AIDS that gay mobilizations appeared during the first decade of the twenty-first century, even if some gays were already engaged before then. Indeed, one of the main organizations fighting AIDS in Côte d’Ivoire was created in the 1990s by gay men who saw their relatives fall ill or die (Nguyen 2005), as was the case with the early organizations in some North American and European countries. But it was in 2003, a few years after the country entered a cycle of repeated political crises and wars, that the first officially recognized gay organization to fight AIDS, Arc-En-Ciel Plus, was created, although the registered statutes were initially discreet on its gay dimension. It was one of the first of its kind in French-speaking Africa, where the gay movement was almost everywhere initiated as part of the fight against AIDS. Following a split within Arc-En-Ciel Plus, another organization was created in 2010, Alternative Côte d’Ivoire, which enjoyed greater success and developed rapidly while increasing international attention was being paid to “key populations” in the fight against AIDS in Africa, including men who have sex with men (but do not necessarily identify as gay). Because this mobilization was linked to AIDS, it mainly concerned men, but lesbians also were important in the development of same-sex social forms during the first and second decades of the twentyfirst century, when they played a predominant role in the organization of the system of gay and lesbian bars.

At the same time that gay mobilization was on the upswing, controversies and violence of unprecedented scale broke out during the first half of 2010 (Broqua 2015). There had long been violence against transvestites, particularly prostitutes (Thomann and Corey-Boulet 2017), but beginning in 2013 violence spread to other targets. In the wake of publicity surrounding the French embassy's grant funding to Alternative Côte d'Ivoire and the signing of an agreement between the two, there was an extraordinary public backlash against homosexuality. To counter rumors, President Alassane Ouattara himself had to publicly state that same-sex marriage would not be legalized. In 2014 the controversy redoubled when Alternative Côte d'Ivoire and a gay bar were violently attacked in an incident mingled with anticolonialist sentiment; because France had just legalized same-sex marriage the year before, protesters believed the former colonial power would attempt to impose its sexual norms on Côte d'Ivoire.

During the second half of 2010, as the situation calmed down, there was a proliferation of specialized organizations for lesbians, trans and intersex individuals, gay drug users, and other sexual and gender minorities. There is competition among these organizations over the content of their mobilizations (i.e., their target groups) and funding, which, stemming from the fight against AIDS, is given mainly to senior organizations. One of the main issues the movement faces concerns the link between the fight against AIDS, which draws most of the funding, and the defense of sexual and gender minorities' rights independent of health issues.

SEE ALSO Activism in Africa South of the Sahara; Christianity in Africa: Anglican; Christianity in Africa: Roman Catholicism; Cinema, African (Francophone); Internet in Africa; Religion and Same-Sex Behaviors: Christianity; Religion and Same-Sex Behaviors: Islam

BIBLIOGRAPHY

FILMOGRAPHY

Cross-Dressing in the West

ALBA BARBÉ I SERRA
Research Group on Social Control and Exclusion/Catalan Anthropology Institute
University of Barcelona

Cross-dressing is characterized by a gender contemplation and expression not persistent in time or space. It implies presenting one's own body, and so one's own gender, depending on social context, especially among those assigned and read as men, mostly identified as heterosexuals. It reveals the dynamic experience of identities and the flexibility of categorizing, as well as the complex situations in which one can live regarding gender identity or expression in modern Western societies.

To place cross-dressing in a contemporary context one must examine the emergence of discourses on sexuality in legal, religious, and medical circles in northern Europe starting at the close of the nineteenth century. This trajectory enables one to understand the cultural and symbolic circumstances relating to the representation of the "cross-dresser" and shapes a set of relations between homosexuals, transexuals, and, later on, drag queens and transgenders. These form the basis from which people have created the specificity of cross-dressing: through not seeing themselves as part of the genealogy of groups that have become visible and have made a public appeal to the collective experience.

The Transvestiten before World War II

The German sexologist Magnus Hirschfeld (1868–1935), in Die Transvestiten (1910), introduced the transvestiten category. To cross-dress had previously been understood in two ways, with the first being an activity that includes the interaction between two “same-sex” persons. The German psychiatrist Carl Friedrich Otto Westphal (1833–1890) coined the phrase Die konträre Sexualempfindung in his 1869 paper of the same name—a phrase that is usually translated as “the contrary sexual feeling” (translation by Alba Barbé i Serra) —and he presented both a male and a female case. Second, it was connected to the idea of a “fetish,” as illustrated in Psychopathia sexualis (1886; Sexual psychopathy), by the Austro-German psychiatrist Richard von Krafft-Ebing (1840–1902). Krafft-Ebing drew on Le fétichisme dans l'amour (1887; Fetishism in love) by the French psychologist Alfred Binet (1857–1911), building on the relationship between using female clothing and sexual arousal in heterosexual men.
It is through Havelock Ellis and John Addington Symonds’s Sexual Inversion (1897) that the relationship “inverted sexual role = homosexuality” is understood today. They regarded homosexuality as an expression of nature with its roots in instinct (Ellis and Symonds, 186). They spearheaded the debate that had commenced in 1850 in medical circles, where innate sexual traits had been separated from those acquired. If the inverted reversed sexual desire, sexual roles established immutably in nature needed to be reversed too. If the difference was genetic, people could not be punished. This had a great impact in the northern European climate of criminalization of homosexuality.

Hirschfeld considered “monism” (Lombardi-Nash, 18) to be an inherent, perennial presence of both sexes in the individual. Thus, no inversion against nature existed. He propounded his “doctrine of sexual intermediary stages” (Lombardi-Nash, 215). Taking as indicators external genitalia, physical traits, sexual desire, and emotional characteristics, he concluded that there were 43 million possible combinations. In a footnote in the 1915 edition of his Drei Abhandlungen zur Sexualtheorie (1905; Three Essays on the Theory of Sexuality [1949]), the Austrian neurologist and psychoanalyst Sigmund Freud (1856–1939) had sketched his preoedipal notion explaining a feminine component in boys. Freud hypothesized that humans are bisexual, with coexisting masculine and the feminine parts.

Historians date the first use of the word cross-dressing as a category to 1911, crediting that use to the English philosopher Edward Carpenter (1844–1929). Literature had used it as a verb yet never as a specific category. Carpenter claimed to be moving away from the theories from the end of the nineteenth century centering on the “third sex” (174) or the uranist. In The Intermediate Sex (1921), he pointed to the large number of existing intermediate stages “in which the body may be absolutely feminine while mind and feelings are entirely masculine, or vice versa” (247). This characteristic was useful in different societies. This copresence remained unified in the depths to subsequently bifurcate into male and female. Such a stand was close to that of Hirschfeld. The transvestiten moved from a sexual inversion to an inversion in sexual role. It was still being theorized as part of nature, but at the same time cross-dressing was regarded as a cultural phenomenon.

The Split between Transvestism and Transsexualism

In his 1966 book The Transsexual Phenomenon, the German American endocrinologist Harry Benjamin (1885–1986) popularized the transsexual-transvestiten dichotomy. He intended to resolve the confusion around psychosexual inversion and solve the genuine transvestiten mystery. Benjamin classified three types of transvestite. Type 1 involved mostly heterosexual men who dress up as a way of alleviating emotions despite the possibility that discovery could result in the breakups of their marriages. Type 2 involved emotionally affected patients for whom dressing up begins as a sexually exciting act and gradually loses intensity, becoming emotionally gratifying. Type 3 included those who completely identify with the “opposite sex.” Benjamin established transsexualism as a matter of identity and transvestism as a perversion entailing the seeking of sexual pleasure. Transvestites were placed squarely in the realm of fantasy, neurosis, and compulsiveness, relegating them to the world of paraphilia (intense and persistent sexual interest). More recently, however, the American Psychiatric Association's Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders: DSM-5 (2013) differentiates all “paraphilic disorders” (685) as atypical erotic interests, abandoning the umbrella of paraphilias found in previous editions of the manual.

Contemporaneously a great number of “cases” were described that claimed to shed light on the differences. The Welsh psychiatrist John B. Randell (1959) differentiates two groups: transsexuals in the homosexual group and “obsessive-compulsive” (1451) patients in that of transvestites. According to Randell, transvestism is not an inversion but an obsession and is pertinent to “exhibitionism” (1451)—a legacy from the French physician Charles Lasègue (1816–1883). In the DSM-5, this mixture remains grouped under the umbrella of paraphilic disorders as “exhibitionistic disorder” (685). In 1960 Vernon W. Grant issued “The Cross-Dresser: A Case Study” in the Journal of Nervous and Mental Disease, highlighting again the connection between transvestite and fetishism and insisting on high heels as a phallic symbol, an idea often found in psychoanalysis. His goal remained finding the adequate classification: fetishist or transvestite? Grant suggested that the person was a fetishist transvestiten. This set a trend that left its influence on the DSM-IV (1994), DSM-IV-TR (2000), and DSM-5 (2013).

The American psychoanalytic theorist Robert Stoller (1971) describes transvestiten as heterosexuals, following the zeitgeist. He introduces the awareness of the phallus under the dress as part of the pleasure of cross-dressing. Ethel Person and Lionel Ovesey (1978) explained that transvestites are characterized by their inconstancy, beginning in childhood or adolescence and sometimes persisting as an antidote against anxiety. The conceptualization of anxiety is relevant because of its effects on, among other things, the medicalization of this presumed disorder during that time. For example, John P. Fedoroff, in a 1988 article, reported on the use of buspirone hydrochloride, a relaxant against anxiety, to treat “transvestic fetishism” (408). A patient had visited Fedoroff’s clinic as a result of his wife's insistence that he got sexually aroused only when wearing female clothes. Such exclusiveness remains relevant in differential diagnoses.

The “first” works by cross-dressers appeared in the Anglo-Saxon world. Janet Thompson (1956) wrote about the “transvestite secret.” In the 1960s Virginia Prince, the American founder of the Society for the Second Self for male heterosexual cross-dressers, proclaimed cross-dressers were heterosexual men trying to express the “woman within.” She excluded women from cross-dressing, contending that they could convey a wide range of emotions and dress up free of stigma. Certain researchers had claimed that women cannot be sexually aroused by wearing men's clothes despite the “weird” cases of fetishistic cross-dressing in women reported by the Polish American psychiatrist Emil Gutheil (1930) and Randell (1959). In 1961 the first cross-dresser organization, Hose&Heels, started up in Los Angeles, becoming shortly after the Foundation for Full Personality Expression (FPE). The American sexologists Vern L. Bullough and Bonnie Bullough (1993) point out that evidence of a “transvestite’s consciousness” (280) did not exist until the FPE’s creation—a statement that must be challenged considering the existence of such works as Memoirs by the French transvestite abbé de Choisy (François Timoléon, 1644–1724), or the poems and novels of Radclyffe Hall (1880–1943), who described himself as a congenital invert. The Beaumont Society (named for the famous eighteenth-century French cross-dresser known as Mademoiselle de Beaumont) was later founded in England in 1966, where urban clubs called Molly Houses had been part of the “same-sex subculture” of the early eighteenth century.

Since the 1970s research has been characterized by a psychologistic bias. The aim seems to be understanding an “incongruous” behavior. Sexological history reveals a weakness in the classification of social practices guided by a positivist basis in which classificatory systems become central. The resulting categories that people identify themselves with are inseparable from the processes that constitute them.

Contemporary Reads

Today, from ethnographic studies limited to a single territory to transcultural comparatives, one finds nonnormative gender practices all over the world. Citing what appears to be an “anthropological constant,” the authors justify the lack of consistency of the dichotomous ontological model of Western society. Although, historically, disciplines such as anthropology have certainly borne witness to the diversity of gender identities and expressions and to sexualities in indigenous and tribal societies, it is important to be aware of the arbitrary and deliberate use of the relationships between practices and categories. Some of the studies are based on exotic (often “exoticized”) ethnographic “evidence,” with an intention akin to that of the US sexual liberation movements in the 1960s, putting, according to Ned Katz, “the anti-homo-sexuality of modern Western society in a perspective that is socially and historically relativistic” (quoted in Cardín 1989, 17; translation by Alba Barbé i Serra).

It is tempting to consider temporary gender expressions different from the continuous logic “sex–gender–sexual practice–desire” (Butler 1990, 8–10) as the symptom of a change that is taking place in modern industrial societies. The first reactions, both from academia and the transgender community, go in two directions. First, crossdressing is understood as an integral part of the “transgender” horizon, thus finding a theoretical and political model in which imageries and enticements can be unified yet with a tendency to make the category universal. A large part of the references to this are found in a North American context, including berdaches in Native American culture. References in other cultures include xanith in Oman, hijras in South Asia, and warias in Indonesia and Papua. These references also do this by watering down the act of cross-dressing to a prerequisite to be under this umbrella for which no consensus exists.

Second, the performance of the gender of those who practice cross-dressing is read as reproducing the heteronormative pairing, according to the dose of stereotyped “femininity” or “masculinity” it seems to contain and which does not pertain to an ideal of “transgression.” The main theoretical influence in the approach to the tension between transgression and reproduction is the discussion contained in two of Judith Butler’s works (1990, 1993). Her critical approach to “performative identities” (1990, 33) is influenced by Esther Newton (1972), who wrote the first ethnography of female impersonators in the United States. Butler emphasizes that the performative reiteration of gender acts produces a process of reasserting oneself that allows going from that which has been established about the gender to that which establishes. That is, the performance or dramatization is transgressive in itself (“subversive discontinuity” [Butler 1990, ix]). After all the criticism she received for her viewpoint on this, Butler explained that this reasserting oneself is not political in itself and specified that the political nature of performativity stems from a commitment to a radical democratic practice (1993). This means Butler needed to understand the role of economic and political systems of oppression in the shaping of persons’ and groups’ identities—a direct heir to the framework of intersectionality. Such a tension, nevertheless, is a key point in all literature on cross-dressing. Two different examples can be found in the work of Marjorie Garber (1992), in which cross-dressing is interpreted as a force that bursts in and subverts, and Annie Woodhouse (1989), who questions cross-dressing’s tendency to fall repeatedly into rigid stereotypes.

Beyond the interpretations that can be made from different disciplines, cross-dressing raises an essential issue: the deeply cultural nature of temporality (the very quality of that which is temporary). Cross-dressing serves as a mediator in differentiating those lives that can be apprehended from those that one cannot apprehend. Thus, the direct impact in modern society of its way of interpreting makes it harder or impossible to inhabit the gender outside of a time rule guided by linearity, unidirectionality, and constant progress.

SEE ALSO Chevalier d’Éon or Mademoiselle Beaumont (1728–1810); Elbe, Lili (1882–1931); Institut für Sexualwissenschaft; Transvestites/Transsexuals

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Grant, Vernon W. “The Cross-Dresser: A Case Study.” Journal of Nervous and Mental Disease

Cruising for sex has been integral to gay culture since its advent, and in a very real sense existed even before homosexuality emerged in the nineteenth century as an identity that one might claim. At its most simple, cruising is the act of looking for sexual partners in public spaces such as parks, restrooms, shopping malls, or train stations, or in such semipublic spaces as bathhouses and bars. It can be as simple as exchanging glances (i.e., “eye tag,” or what the Brazilians call o jogo dos olhos, “the game of eyes”), or it can incorporate in-group communication cues such as donning red neckties to mark oneself as gay, or bandannas of various colors worn in certain locations to indicate preferences for particular sex acts and positions (i.e., “flagging,” or “the hanky code”). While a complete global history of cruising could fill several volumes, this entry offers a brief survey of examples from different times and places. Today, cruising has been diminished by apps such as Grindr and Scruff, which mimic many cruising behaviors and can fulfill similar functions (e.g., locating sexual partners in the area). Despite the proliferation of apps, there are still online guides for gay male cruising, as well as printed travel guides such as Spartacus International Gay Guide (Bedford 2016), which lists specific streets, bathrooms, and parks in every midsize and major city in the world, along with times of day the activity occurs. It is also important to note that while most of the literature and historical examples refer to gay male culture, cruising has been deeply important for cisgender women and the development of lesbian subcultures, and for transgender and gender-nonconforming people.

France

Cruising is well documented in European history, with some of the more colorful stories coming from the early eighteenth century in Paris. Police archives from 1700 to 1750 make it possible to identify the Tuileries and Palais-Royal gardens and the Champs-Élysées as areas where noblemen, middle-class men, and some students, servants, and craftsmen cruised for sex (Rey 1987). These same groups also used public squares and river embankments. Public spaces (anywhere with a ditch, a thicket, or an alleyway) were actually more private than many homes during this period. In the Luxembourg gardens, Sundays and holidays (especially in the warmer months) from 10 AM to noon and 7 PM to 9 PM were the most popular times. In very visible public places a man might ask another the time or for a pinch of tobacco, then they would discuss pleasures in general before alighting on more specifically acknowledged homosexual desires. At night and in darker places, one could be more certain why the parties were present. Historian Michel Rey documents that police wrote in detail about the signals involved in these encounters. One policeman noted “[a man] having come up to me, making all the signals to me which these infamous types are accustomed to, in order to speak to me,” “having approached me, staring me in the face several times,” [staring] “with affectation,” and “having pissed ... in front of me several times.” Another policeman wrote that a man cruising him showed him his penis, saying, “I'm sure you prefer that to a pinch of tobacco.” One of the more clever exchanges went as follows: “As I was about to let flow, [he] asked me what time it was according to my cock (vit) and said that according to his it was high noon” (1987, 181).

England

In nineteenth-century London there were several notable cruising grounds: the Markets in the Royal Exchange, Moorfields, Lincoln's Inn, the south side of St. James Park, and the arcades of Covent Garden (Norton 1992). These were areas also known as heterosexual prostitution zones, thieves' haunts, and molly house districts. Mollies were gay men who formed a subculture in the early 1700s that had its own taverns, called molly houses, which often accommodated drag and cross-dressing. Mollies cruised for sex near the molly houses, the most notorious of which, Mother Clap’s, was in Field Lane, Holborn, northwest of St. Paul’s Cathedral, with the actual house now lying underneath present-day Charterhouse Street or the Holborn Viaduct (Norton 1992). The mollies took “maiden names” such as Primrose Mary (a butcher in Butcher’s Row), Aunt May (an upholsterer), Princess Seraphina (another butcher), Kitty Cambric (a coal merchant), and Lady Godiva (a waiter). Court records show that during the Whit Monday holiday in 1732, a person named John Cooper (better known in the area as Princess Seraphina) and one Thomas Gordon (a man of some means) drank three hot pints of beer together, then proceeded to a walk in Chelsea Fields and in a secluded grove of trees Cooper pulled a knife and ran away with Gordon’s clothes (Norton 1992).

In a tract called Hell upon the Earth (1729), a moralist complains that “it would be a pretty Scene to behold them in their Clubs and Cabals, how they assume the Air and affect the Name of Madam or Miss, Betty or Molly,” and quotes one “affected Lady” warning another, “Where have you been you saucy Queen? If I catch you Strouling and Caterwauling, I’ll beat the Milk out of your Breasts I will so; with a great many other Expressions of Buffoonry and ridiculous Affectation.” The author notes that these men have also their Walks and Appointments, to meet and pick up one another, and their particular Houses of Resort to go to, because they dare not trust themselves in an open Tavern. About twenty of these sort of Houses have been discovered, besides the nocturnal Assemblies of great Numbers of the like vile Persons, what they call the Markets, which are the Royal-Exchange, Lincolns-Inn Bog-Houses, the South-side of St. James’s-Park, the Piazzas of Covent-Garden, St. Clement’s Church-Yard, &c.

(QUOTED IN NORTON 2000; EMPHASES IN ORIGINAL)

This tract points to the important connection between mollies, molly houses, and cruising for public sex in the early 1700s.

Sometimes, homosexual acts may have arisen more out of convenience or necessity, as in the many cases where British Navy sailors (also notorious for cruising) were convicted of buggery. Navy men successfully cruised one another onboard ships despite the fact that was often punished by death, so cruising gone awry could have fatal consequences. One officer reported,

Homosexuality was rife [on the ships], and one could see with his own eyes how it was going on between officers. I have been told that in some services (the Austrian and French, for instance), nobody ever remarks about it, taking such a thing as a natural proceeding.... Sodomy is a regular thing on ships that go on long cruises. In the warships, I would say that the sailor preferred it.

(GILBERT 1976, 133)

The British kept unusually detailed records, including testimony from one young man who found James Bryan’s belly to Martin Billin’s back and for some reason, yanked Bryan’s penis out of Billin. He said to the court, “I cannot tell whether there was any emission but my hand was moist after handling it.... As I laid hold of part of his yard, the other part came out with a spring, as if a cork had been drawn out of a bottle” (Gilbert 1976, 74). It is not clear whether Billin and Bryan and others would have participated in the molly subculture that existed back in London or they were having sex with other men merely as a result of their circumstances. Today there is a growing sense that gay-identified men have moved online to find sex through apps such as Grindr, leaving the public cruising grounds to older gays, closeted and/or married men, men who are “discreet” or “on the down low,” and men who want sex with men but do not identify as gay, bi, or queer, per se. Yet the historical records show that the complicated question of sexual identity in cruising for casual sexual encounters has been present in public sex scenes for more than 300 years.

United States

New York City’s cruising grounds are equally storied, especially prior to clean-up efforts in the 1990s. Moral reform societies in the 1920s classified homosexual “perversion” as a discrete social problem, identifying Broadway, Riverside Drive, Fifth Avenue, and Central Park West as primary areas of gay male cruising and socializing (Chauncey 1994). The city’s parks were the most popular and secure cruising sites because it rarely aroused suspicion to see a young man ambling about, taking in nature. Cruising for sex was also a primary way for a newcomer to the gay scene to become initiated into the subculture (Chauncey 1994).

The heyday for gay male cruising may have been the 1970s, when the community had been buoyed by the gay liberation movement and not yet been decimated by and made terrified of HIV/AIDS. In perhaps the most famous memoir about what it was like cruising during this time in New York, Samuel R. Delany’s Times Square Red, Times Square Blue (1999) takes readers back to the seedy days of porn theaters, male prostitution, and public sex. Delany argues that rather than a social ill, the thriving sexual culture of Times Square was a rare site where people crossed racial, economic, and sexual boundaries, encouraging complicated and nuanced relationships. Delany’s essays depict a halcyon era of cruising interrupted by HIV, a theme that also appears in the diaries of a young gay black man named Gary Fisher, which the queer theorist Eve Kosofsky Sedgwick published as Gary in Your Pocket (1996). These diaries follow Fisher from childhood into college as he moves from questioning his sexuality to acting on his desires by cruising in the library restroom at the University of North Carolina and eventually having regular group sex in public parks. Fisher uses cruising and public sex to work through his fantasies about BDSM, race-based fetish play, and master-slave role play, but he also becomes romantically involved with nonconsensually abusive white men. Fisher candidly describes his fear of HIV and then his eventual knowledge that he has contracted the virus, yet he continues to have sex in parks. He chronicles his own decline in poignant detail, writing until the end of his short life.

Perhaps the best-known novel about cruising in the United States is John Rechy’s Numbers (1967), which chronicles the exploits of Johnny Rio, a man aging out of his youthful good looks who wants to reconfirm his desirability by racking up a large number of sexual contacts in a ten-day period. The book is devoted to richly describing the theaters, beaches, and parks of Los Angeles’s gay cruising areas—especially Griffith Park—and the sex that gay men have there. The description of the sexual odyssey is so explicit that it was heavily censored and difficult to publish in foreign countries, but the book is now critically acclaimed as a landmark in gay literature.

The most famous academic study of gay male cruising is almost certainly sociologist Laud Humphreys’s Tearoom Trade (1970), in which Humphreys misrepresented his identity and intentions as he visited public bathrooms where men had sex, posing as a voyeur. Although he made the somewhat progressive argument that men who “tea-room” (cruise in public toilets) came from diverse backgrounds and led otherwise conventional lives, and that about half did not perceive themselves as gay, the book is most famous for its ethical violations: Humphreys did not get consent from his research participants, and he even tracked the men through license plates, ambushng them at home in disguise and interviewing them under false pretenses.

Although the glory days of cruising have passed, there are still telling moments of conflict when straight and gay worlds collide. One notable example is the ongoing controversy over the Magic Hedge at Chicago’s Montrose Beach, a popular site for gay cruising and also bird-watching. As the Chicago Tribune reported, “Luis Munoz, an avid bird watcher of 12 years, has seen a remarkable range of rare winged creatures this fall migration season.... He also has come face to face with one species he hopes never to encounter again but knows he will: the Chicago cruiser” (Noel 2007). As Munoz says, “It’s bad, dude, real bad.... I’ve seen a few things happening. Like guys in the middle of some things” (quoted in Noel 2007). Competition between the binocular-bearing birders and the cruisers—who work together to warn each other of encroaching bird lovers—has continued for years, with some moral crusaders pleading for more policing while the city’s only openly gay alderman advocated for leaving the men in peace and focusing on serious and violent crimes.

Brazil

Another country with a rich cruising scene is Brazil, where cruising is known as paquerando or fazendo pegação, or in the case of sex in public restrooms, banheirão. Anthropologists have noted that cruising is localized in certain areas, such as Ibirapuera Park in São Paulo and the bohemian district of Lapa in Rio de Janeiro, but is also widely practiced practically everywhere in public in the major cities. As one interviewee in a study said, cruising happens “on the corner, buying groceries at the supermarket, people are always cruising.... Anyone who feels horny ... just has to go down [from the building where they live] to the street to pick someone up” (quoted in Parker 1999, 55). Shopping malls are also an especially important site for pegação in many Brazilian cities and towns (Teixeira 2009). Others report that in Aterro de Flamengo in Rio, cruising picks up at dusk when the activity changes from daytime pickups and on-site masturbation to nighttime oral and anal sex in the bushes as men head home after work (Parker 1999). One popular gay folk etymology for the word viado (faggot) in Brazil is that it derived in the early twentieth century from veado (deer), because that is what men cruising in the parks at night looked like when police startled them and they bolted (Green 1999). In Brazil the social norm is for young men to live with their parents well into adulthood, sometimes until they marry, and consequently, finding places for sex indoors is difficult and often requires renting an hourly motel room, making public sex more convenient, cheaper, and actually more private.

Lesbian Cruising

