Multiple Israeli films developed story lines focused on LGBT Jewish characters; one example is the awardwinning Yossi & Jagger, a 2002 drama from the acclaimed director Eytan Fox (1964–) about a love affair between two Israeli soldiers serving along the Israel-Lebanon border. That film was a darling of art house cinemas worldwide and of the international Jewish film festival circuit, sparking conversations on LGBT and Israeli identities in Jewish communities globally. Fox, often working with his romantic and creative partner, Gal Uchovsky, has continued to produce films and television series focused on gay characters that have won critical acclaim in Israel and worldwide, including Walk on Water (2004), The Bubble (2006), Tamid oto chalom (retitled Mary Lou when released in the United States and the United Kingdom in 2011), Yossi (a 2012 follow-up to Yossi & Jagger), and Bananot (2013).

Transgender Jewish characters were less visible until the 2014 launch of the awardwinning Amazon series Transparent, centered on the transgender journey of the show’s main character, Maura Pfefferman (portrayed by Jeffrey Tambor). Jewish gay, lesbian, and queer characters have become increasingly common in mainstream films and television, but until Transparent, transgender bodies had been nearly invisible in Jewish culture, Jewish-themed media, and Jewish texts. Transparent has been called the most Jewish series in contemporary media, but it is also among the queerest.

SEE ALSO Anti-Semitism and Zionism; Anti-Semitism in Europe; The Bubble (2006; Eytan Fox); Einayim Pkuhot (2009; Haim Tabakman); Pinkwashing; Religion and Same-Sex Behaviors: Christianity; Religion and Same-Sex Behaviors: Islam

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Sònia Rescalvo was born in Cuenca, Spain, in 1946. At the age of sixteen, she ran away from her family so she could live her gender identity as a transsexual woman. Around the 1970s she arrived in Barcelona, where she worked as a cabaret dancer in the theaters on Avenida Parallel. By 1991 she was homeless and working as a prostitute, with no contact with her family.

In the early AM hours of 6 October 1991, Rescalvo and her friend Doris Romero, also a transsexual, were sleeping in the bandstand of Ciutadella Park in Barcelona. Around 3:00 AM, six neo-Nazis happened on them and, after seeing that they were transsexuals, beat them up. Rescalvo died from a barrage of kicks to the head and a blow to the chest with a stick. Romero was badly injured but survived.

In 1992 the Mossos d’Esquadra (the police corps of Catalonia) detained the six men who murdered Rescalvo, all of whom were sixteen or seventeen years of age. They were accused of the crimes of premeditated murder, attempted murder, and grievous bodily harm. In 1994 the trial was held in the Provincial Court of Barcelona. The detainees were sentenced, collectively, to 310 years in prison. Subsequently, in 1997, Spain’s Supreme Court reduced the sentences by half and changed the offense from murder to manslaughter.

The brutal murder of Rescalvo and the police repression of sex workers in the context of the urban reforms prior to the 1992 Olympic Games in Barcelona led to the creation of the Col·lectiu de Transsexuals de Catalunya (Catalan Group of Transsexuals), after eleven years without any association of transsexual people in Barcelona. For Bea Espejo, founder of the association, Rescalvo’s murder and the police repression marked a “turning point” because “although they are two very different events, they highlighted how the ailment of prejudice affected or could affect our lives” (2008, 53; translation by author). The police investigation was a turning point for the treatment of hate crimes and discrimination in Catalonia, leading to the creation of a public prosecutor’s office that specialized in LGBTphobia, the setting up of an antidiscrimination office in the framework of LGBT activism, and a greater awareness about this topic among the media. (It was the first case of LGBT-phobia with a real media impact in Catalonia.) As a consequence, the number of reports of LGBT-phobic crimes increased from that point on.

In 1993 LGBT activists erected a commemorative plaque in the bandstand where Rescalvo was killed. In 2013, under pressure from activists, the Barcelona City Council renamed the bandstand “Glorieta de la Transsexual Sonia” (Bandstand Dedicated to the Transsexual Sonia), positioning a new and more visible plaque. Among other transphobic aggressions and murders that remain invisible, the memory of Rescalvo's murder is still vivid because of the persistent efforts of LGBT activists. Once a year people gather to honor her memory in the bandstand named after her, one of the few public monuments in the world devoted to the memory of a victim of transphobia.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Mejía, Norma. Transgenerismos: Una experiencia transexual desde la perspectiva

The development and culture of various resorts around the world that cater particularly to an LGBTQ+ clientele.

LGBTQ+ resorts are bounded geographical areas that are predominantly occupied and visited by LGBTQ+ persons. They vary in size, density (relative to their general, “straight” counterparts), and services offered. Such areas often contain concentrations of bars, dance clubs, saunas, cinemas, LGBTQ+-only accommodations, beauty salons, and beaches catering to an LGBTQ+ clientele. LGBTQ+ resorts provide a point of community where like-minded people come together and share a feeling of fellowship and common interests, as well as a sense of belonging and solidarity (Vorobjovas-Pinta 2018). Furthermore, LGBTQ+ resorts provide a space where LGBTQ+ people can feel safe from discrimination, bullying, and animosity (Vorobjovas-Pinta and Hardy 2016). Lastly, LGBTQ+ resorts attract people who are interested in romantic relationships and sexual encounters (Melián-González et al. 2011). Historically, many such resorts were known to have spots for outdoor cruising and “recreational sex” opportunities (e.g., the Dunes at Fire Island) (Hughes 2006; Newton 1993).

Gay travel has a long history. For many generations privileged gay men, or men who desire sex with men, have traveled across the globe seeking sex and excitement; early examples were northern European men’s grand tours seeking sex in Mediterranean countries and North Africa (Aldrich 1993; Boone 1995; Hildebrand 2013; Holcomb and Luongo 1996; Hughes 2006; Vorobjovas-Pinta and Hardy 2016). Homosexuality has long been associated with itinerant men, and due to societal censure, law enforcement, and a fluid population, historically, gay venues and beats likewise did not remain rooted for long (Hildebrand 2013).

Gordon Waitt and Kevin Markwell (2006) have observed that resort towns for gay men, such as Fire Island Pines and Cherry Grove developed in symbiosis with large nearby cities—in this case, New York City. Other world-famous gay resorts have emerged in the seaside areas close to big metropolitan cities, including Brighton near London, Sitges near Barcelona, Itararé-São Vicente near São Paulo, Provincetown near Boston, Russian River near San Francisco, and Palm Springs near Los Angeles. In other cases, they have arisen within or adjacent to seaside metropolitan areas themselves, blurring the boundaries between resort and "gayborhood." These include Miami Beach in Miami, North Bondi Beach in Sydney, and Clifton in Cape Town.

Inland places such as the Rainbow Mountain Resort in Pennsylvania and Guerneville and Palm Springs in California extend the LGBTQ+ resort beyond the seaside to the mountains and deserts. In addition to year-round LGBTQ+ resorts, numerous ski resorts host "gay ski weeks" to cater to an overlapping clientele; Queenstown in New Zealand, Aspen in Colorado, and Arosa in Switzerland are notable examples. Often, gay ski weeks coincide with local pride events, where LGBTQ+ locals and travelers enjoy winter sports and the après snow culture in an inclusive environment (Pitts 1997; Thorpe 2012).

Gay cruises also could be considered a form of LGBTQ+ resort. They traverse destinations that might not welcome a fixed LGBTQ+ resort, and this has led to tensions in the Cayman Islands and Jamaica, for example (Waitt and Markwell 2006).

LGBTQ+ resorts are strongly associated with male travelers, but there are resorts and travel destinations that specifically cater to lesbian guests. Examples include Olivia’s all-lesbian resort weeks and cruises, Springhill Farm in Ohio, Pagoda on the Beach in Florida, Bambu Lesbian Resort in Spain, Lesvos island in Greece, Asheville in North Carolina, and Northampton in Massachusetts.

Prominent LGBTQ+ Resort Towns

The dynamics that shaped American LGBTQ+ resort towns—Provincetown, Massachusetts; Fire Island Pines and Cherry Grove in New York; and Rehoboth Beach, Delaware, among others—were very similar to those that shaped such more famous urban LGBTQ+ enclaves as the Castro neighborhood in San Francisco (Krahulik 2006). These places offered an alternative to heteronormative everyday life for the performance of sexualities on weekends and summer breaks. First an artist’s colony, Fire Island gained its reputation as a gay men’s destination in the 1940s and built momentum (and a commercialized gay infrastructure) in the postwar decades, eventually abetted by the reach of gay media across the country in the 1960s (Waitt and Markwell 2006). The island’s township of Cherry Grove is of especial interest to queer studies because of the writings of Esther Newton, whose 1993 work Cherry Grove, Fire Island: Sixty Years in America’s First Gay and Lesbian Town sketched the community as a libertine lesbian and gay utopia, a home in an unwelcoming world. Newton’s book portrays the evolution of the Grove from an isolated gay and lesbian summer community with a few cabins to a flourishing, commercial, and highly visible LGBTQ+ town with Mafia-run discos, police raids, and endless parties.

Provincetown, along with Fire Island Pines and Cherry Grove, is one of America’s oldest LGBTQ+ resort towns. Karen Christel Krahulik (2006) outlines the racial dynamics and socioeconomic displacements that shaped and transformed the place, charting its emergence in an unexpected exchange and alliance between Portuguese American women, then constructed as foreign, and gay men and lesbians. She traces this development to the 1930s and 1940s, and to Provincetown’s identity as an artists’ colony in earlier decades, when visitors coded as “confirmed bachelors” and “maiden ladies” from the northeastern United States, Canada, and Europe stayed in boardinghouses run out of homes in the local Portuguese community. In some cases, the relationships that formed, cultivated over years of repeat visits, became familial (Krahulik 2006). Provincetown’s emergence as an LGBTQ+ resort town was in no way incompatible with, or alien to, its other touristic identities. As Krahulik notes, “By the mid-1940s Provincetown was fast on its way to becoming a gay resort mecca—a reputation coexisting with its other incarnations as an ‘exotic’ Portuguese seaport, eclectic art colony, and quaint ‘colonial’ village” (2006, 194). Krahulik recounts the administrative and community ambivalence—even in the mid-twentieth century—with some people repulsed by the LGBTQ+ culture and others wanting to profit from it.

HOUSEBOYS AT RESORTS

The term houseboy arises out of colonial history, where colonized peoples worked in household roles in places such as Australia (Martínez and Lowrie 2009). In the United States this term was applied to the enslaved African men and former slaves who worked as domestic servants. In the gay community, a houseboy is typically a young, submissive male domestic worker who cleans, cooks, does washing, and performs other housework duties for financial compensation or their own pleasure. Erotic and/or sexual acts normally are part of the service, and often they are the primary reason for the houseboy’s employment. From the 1960s, houseboys were a traditional part of gay male culture in US resorts such as Fire Island and Provincetown, where they worked either in gay households or bed and breakfasts. College students often held these positions over the summer season. Memorializing Fire Island Pines in the 1960s, Midge Decter wrote of the “young men who had recently arrived in the East from their hometowns in the Midwest and were living temporarily under the protection of an older, or anyway more established, ‘friend’” (1980, 36).

Houseboys in these gay resorts also have been immortalized in LGBTQ+ literature and film. The 1995 film Lie Down with Dogs, directed by Wally White, centers on Tommie, a young man who leaves Manhattan for Provincetown, where he seeks work as a houseboy for the summer. In 2015 Dominic Ford launched a series of gay porn films, Fire Island: House Boy. Edmund White’s novel Our Young Man (2016) and Matthew Lopez’s two-play cycle The Inheritance (2018) also explore this phenomenon.

Popular gay media suggests that sometimes houseboys work for no financial reward; they are entrenched in BDSM subculture in the role of a sex slave (McKeown 2016). As illustrated in a Gay Times advertisement from 1996, houseboys usually are employed by older gay men who seek control in the relationship and can provide a high degree of solvency in exchange for companionship and sexual/erotic encounters: “Strict, but caring uncle type, 46, seeks compliant nephew/houseboy type. If you're 18–30, straight acting, slim/medium build, and looking for a permanent, secure relationship, write with photo” (quoted in Thorne and Coupland 1998). Often the successful candidate can move in and live with his “employer” full time—even if just for a season—or is expected to come serve the employer on a regular basis. Houseboys have also been depicted as party promoters and entertainers in popular gay resorts such as Cherry Grove (Sunderland 2015).

This type of work is seen as temporary as well as pleasurable, as it affords the opportunity to engage in sexual encounters.

A body of research characterizes houseboys in a globalized context as predominantly from nonwhite backgrounds—mainly Asia (Eguchi 2011; Han 2005; Kong 2002). Richard Fung (2005) and Hoang Tan Nguyen (2014) have explored the long-standing paradigm of the Asian/Asian American “passive houseboy/bottom” in American cinema and pornographic film. Travis Kong (2002) and Martin Manalansan (2003) explain that the role of a houseboy is often depicted in terms of an encounter or a relationship between an older Caucasian and a younger Asian man. Such a relationship often develops during the Caucasian man’s holiday in Phuket, Bali, the Philippines, or another Asian destination (Law 2013), and it is often associated with an opportunity for the younger Asian man to gain legal access to a Western country. This suggests that the compensation for being a houseboy is not always a direct financial transaction.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

These insights provide essential context to the development of the LGBTQ+ resort town, which is in part economic. In later decades, more mainstream beach destinations tried to profit from LGBTQ+ tourism, with LGBTQ+ travel media from the 1970s charting an emerging Florida LGBT+ tourist economy. Advertisements for gay resorts and clubs in magazines of the period lured gay men to Fort Lauderdale and Key West with the promise of sun and sex (Hildebrand 2013). Briavel Holcomb and Michael Luongo (1996) note that in its more modern incarnations, LGBTQ+ travel as a sector has become especially “recession-proof.” Krahulik’s (2006) analysis foregrounds LGBTQ+ resort placemaking—that is, the repositioning and reconstruction of places around an LGBTQ+ clientele and market—which even in its earliest incarnations could cause harm and displacement in its socioeconomic effects. This reveals a tension between lines of sexuality, gender, race, and class that are still manifested in gay resorts, even as they are imagined in often utopian terms.

In the broader context of social change and progress, these resorts have been memorialized as places of historical significance by LGBTQ+ communities, although until recently, few have gained official recognition as such. The Cherry Grove Community House and Theatre, for instance, is one of only a handful of queer sites added to the US National Register of Historic Places. In its citation of the site, the register describes the venue as part of “one of the first and, for many years, the only gay and lesbian influenced geography in the United States.” Its importance is situated in the “turbulent social and political upheavals [during] our nation’s response to the pre- and early days of the homosexual liberation movement” (National Register of Historic Places 2013).

Islands as LGBTQ+ Havens

The homosexual history of Mykonos dates to ancient Greece. Perhaps because of the idealized Hellenic past and stories portraying the island as an inclusive, open-minded, and free-spirited place, Mykonos became a gay mecca in the 1950s and 1960s, attracting travelers from northern and western Europe. By the 1970s Mykonos had a worldwide reputation for nightlife, drug culture, and sex. Pola Bousiou observes, “Mykonos became the island of freedom and of illegal substances and, as a place which mainly attracted the haute bourgeoisie, it remained for a while free of special attention from the ‘forces of law and order’” (2008, 42). Mykonos became a must-visit destination for homosexual men (Bousiou 2008; Waitt and Markwell 2006). The success of Mykonos as a gay resort is strongly associated with the arrival of Italian artist Pierro Aversa and the launch of his gay bar, Pierro’s, which offered an escape to an alternative artistic and gay culture free of prejudice, animosity, and dayto-day heteronormative realities.

Today Mykonos is known as a gay “sun, sand, and sex” destination. It offers a large variety of beaches, two of which—Super Paradise and Elia—are exclusively gay. Waitt and Markwell (2006) call Mykonos a European “clubopolis,” a gay utopia with gay club culture is at its core. Themed circuit parties are often frequented by (semi)naked gay porn stars and are infused with a cosmopolitan, loose, fun, and safe vibe. Gay pornography is linked with the reconstruction of Mykonos as a gay space that offers the possibility of having a sexual encounter with readily available, young, white, fit men: “The heteronormative is displaced through the erotic imagery of homosocial gatherings of young white men sunbathing who then participate in outdoor same-sex activities” (Waitt and Markwell 2006, 118).

Phuket is an island destination in the Andaman Sea in southern Thailand. Unlike Cherry Grove, Provincetown, and Mykonos, Phuket is not a predominantly gay resort, but it contains pockets of gay areas, including Paradise Complex in Patong. Historically, Patong is known for its nightlife, gay sex workers, and ladyboy cabaret shows. A famous Phuket gay festival takes place every April.

The majority of research on gay tourism in Phuket explores the intersection of gay tourism and the HIV/AIDS pandemic (Gallagher 2005; Khawcharoenporn et al. 2017). Phuket is indeed severely affected by HIV, where 17 to 31 percent of men who have sex with men are infected with the virus (Khawcharoenporn et al. 2017). Phuket is perceived as a sex tourism destination where Western gay men seek casual sexual encounters with young Thai men; in the same manner, it is also viewed as a heterosexual sex tourism hotspot. Chris Beyrer elucidates the difference between the homosexual and heterosexual commercial sex scenes in Phuket, and in Thailand in general: “The [male] workers are not trafficked and not, by and large, debt-bonded. The sex is considerably more expensive, the pay better for workers. Even in the flesh trade, it’s a man’s world” (1998, 170).

A more sophisticated and Western-oriented gay scene in Phuket started to emerge in the late 1970s and early 1980s, evidenced by the proliferation of commercial gay bars, gay saunas, and discos. Peter A. Jackson and Gilbert H. Herdt note that this brought a degree of cultural clash, as Western patrons sometimes misunderstood “the willingness of barboys to please and ‘take care’ of their customers as indicating a similar degree of liberality in the world outside the gay bar” (1995, 13). Like Mykonos, Phuket today is marketed as a sun, sand and sex destination, but there are no gay or nude beaches because public nudity is not socially accepted or even legal in Thailand (Gay Patong 2017). Sex is usually offered for money. The gay destination website Gay Patong suggests,

> Please remember that most of the Thai-men you will meet in the bars of Paradise Complex are working men and your satisfaction and happiness is their income. If you talk with a man for a while in the bar, buy him a drink, leave him a tip, or both. Because of the lack of an institutionalized pension system in Thailand young working generations usually have the burden to provide support for their old parents and sometimes extended families. (GAY PATONG 2017)

Phuket is also known for its ladyboy culture (Jackson 1995; Kang 2012). The term ladyboy refers to trans women and is primarily used in Southeast Asia (Kang 2012). It is often taken to be an English translation of the Thai term kathoey, which is not a term commonly used by trans Thais themselves. Ladyboys are associated with cabaret performances, beauty pageants, bar-based sex work, and tourism. In the past, the assumption was that gay tourism consumers in Phuket were farangs (white people), but there is an increasing amount of research exploring intra-Asian gay travel and cultural exchange. For example, Dredge Byung'chu Kang’s research explores the impact of a significant intra-Asian gay travel market, locating Bangkok as the “heart of gay Asia”; Kang situates Thailand “as a zone of interaction between South East and East Asia” (2017, 197, 203).

SEE ALSO Gay European Tourism Association; Sex Tourism in Asia; Sex Tourism in Latin
BIBLIOGRAPHY

Khawcharoensarn, Thana, Anucha Apisarnthanarak, and Nittaya Phanuphak. “Active

Rituals and Same-Sex and Trans Experience

SETH PALMER
Predoctoral Fellow, Carter G. Woodson Institute
University of Virginia, Charlottesville

The complex concept of “ritual” and its expressions in various LGBTQ+ communities globally.

Ritual is, as Elizabeth A. Povinelli has provocatively suggested, “arguably the heart of culture and cosmology in the classical anthropological imaginary as well as in mass media accounts of cultural difference” (2006, 122). As an object that has continually sustained scholarly attention, ritual and its theorization have fostered both the development of and fruitful cross-fertilization between several academic disciplines—namely, sociocultural anthropology, religious studies, and the relatively budding field of performance studies. One of the most influential arguments about ritual—that it proceeds through phases that correspond to shifts in an individual’s life stage, first termed “rites of passage” by Arnold van Gennep ([1909] 1960)—became a mainstay within classical anthropological theory. Anthropologists interested in symbolism, perhaps most famously the British sociocultural anthropologists Mary Douglas (1975) and Victor Turner (1969), later drew on van Gennep’s work. Armed with structural-functionalist theories that addressed the complex ways in which social institutions, including ritual practices, uphold social structures and norms, and theories of symbolism that attempted to uncover the deeper meaning behind said rituals, anthropologists have contended that, like language, ritual is both universal and unique to the human experience. This entry first provides a cursory genealogical examination of how ritual has been understood in relation to same-sex desire/behavior and gender nonconformity, both as ritual participants and officiants, and in its alliance with the ongoing articulation of an anthropology of gender and sexuality. Thereafter, the entry considers what role ritual practice plays in sustaining and transforming contemporary North American LGBTQ+ publics, countering the fixed ethnocartographic gaze placed on the non-West in older literature (Weston 1993).

“Ritualized Homosexuality” in Melanesia and Its Critics

Ethnographic accounts of “ritualized homosexuality” composed one branch of early literature in the then fledgling subdiscipline of the “anthropology of homosexuality” in the 1980s (Blackwood 1986). Scholarship on Melanesian male initiation rites in Papua New Guinea became a particularly powerful reminder to the West that same-sex sexual behaviors needed to be disentangled from identity categories, the argument famously articulated by Michel Foucault (1978) in his charting of the creation of the modern “homosexual” type. The most celebrated work on “ritualized homosexuality,” a category that described the process through which semen was transferred orally or anally (depending on the culture) by unmarried men to their young male initiates, was undoubtedly Gilbert H. Herdt’s seminal Guardians of the Flutes (1981). Herdt’s work became a paradigmatic case study in how gender and sexuality were conceptualized differently outside of the West, and it was regularly taught in university courses on the anthropology of gender and sexuality. That work was followed by Herdt’s edited volume Ritualized Homosexuality in Melanesia (1984). In its introduction, Herdt scrupulously depicts how ritualized homosexuality fit within the gendered symbolic worlds of the Sambia (pseudonym) people of Papua New Guinea with whom he had conducted ethnographic fieldwork. Herdt further explains his decision to use the term ritualized homosexuality “despite its ambiguous and exotic connotations” in order to denote that these encounters are often connected to male initiation rites, maintain “religious overtones,” and often involve “age-ranked, asymmetrical status relationships” (1984, 6–7).

While ritualized same-sex semen transfer between men in Melanesia has since largely ended, partly as a result of missionization and Westernization, the debates surrounding the canonization of an anthropological literature in ritualized homosexuality persisted long after. Among the most often cited scholars who contested the “ritualized homosexuality” framework, Deborah A. Elliston argued that it assumes a Western notion of both the “erotic” and the “sexual,” treating both as “pancultural or precultural universals” (1995, 861). Erotic acts that may be deemed “sexual” and, thus, “homosexual” by the anthropologist, Elliston contended, may not be conceived in such a way by their interlocutors. Elliston pushed Herdt’s (1984) social-constructivist critique of “homosexuality” to include deconstruction of the very category of “sexuality” itself. Melanesian “semen practices” thus reveal more about the resedimentation of age- and gender-based hierarchies through the ritual exchange of bodily substances than the “sexual” or the “erotic” necessarily. Therefore, while Herdt (1984) recognized that what he termed “ritual homosexuality” could not, and indeed should not, be mapped onto contemporary Western constructs of homosexuality, critical interventions on the part of Elliston (1995), Bruce M. Knauf (2003), and others effectively showed how, by rhetorically framing these exchanges as “ritualized homosexuality,” Western anthropologists reinstated their own assumptions about male same-sex desire—namely, that semen practices should be seen as “erotic” simply “on the basis of their resemblance to the Western domain of the ‘sexual’” (Elliston 1995, 862).

Two-Spirit, Hijra, and Other Figures

Alongside ritualized male same-sex bodily encounters in Melanesia, two “queer” subject positions regularly described in terms of their ritual practice and expertise—the hijra identity category of South Asia and the two-spirit people of Native North America—have since become anthropological figures in their own right. In the late 1980s and early 1990s a wave of important revisionist literature emerged around two-spirit precolonial histories, many of which celebrated their roles as shamans or ritual officiants, at the same time that a nascent “gay/lesbian anthropology” was developing (Williams 1986). Scholars drew on historical records and archives, but also earlier anthropological scholarship that acknowledged how two-spirit persons were warmly accepted in their respective societies, and how they were understood in relation to ritual and religious life (Kroeber 1940; Devereux 1937). As with literature on “ritualized homosexualities,” this research on two-spirit identities was later criticized, perhaps most poignantly by Evan B. Towle and Lynn M. Morgan (2002), who argued that revisionist scholarship romanticized the experiences of two-spirit persons and other “third-gender” categories and, furthermore, falsely imagined them as residing wholly outside of societal constructs of the gender binary. Scott Lauria Morgensen also challenged this earlier academic work, which was largely produced by white gay/lesbian scholars (mostly anthropologists). Morgensen questioned the ways in which the two-spirit figure and its authenticating ritual expertise became an “anthropological object” through which “white settler descendants” in North America could achieve a sense of national “belonging” on otherwise indigenous land (2011, 63).

The idea that gender-variant and same-sex–desiring natives were celebrated for their difference and that this difference provided them with unique connections to religious and ritual life (whether valid or not) was and continues to be a compelling source of inspiration for North American queer settler descendants, perhaps most provocatively illustrated in the Radical Faerie movement. Harry Hay (1979, 1980) and other early homophile activists originally organized Radical Faerie communities as a way to affirm and celebrate their same-sex desires and male effeminacy. During healing retreats, usually held on rural land outside of big cities where these homophile movements and their members were based, Radical Faeries (predominantly white gay men) drew on and appropriated Native American rituals and spiritual practices. Their ritual retreats continue to draw crowds in the present (Morgensen 2011; Povinelli 2006). Radical Faerie communities have expanded to settler colonial contexts outside North America, including Australia, where they adopt indigenous ritual knowledge and practice in order to celebrate queer male subjectivities in ways that are complicated at best and implicitly violent at worst. Work by queer indigenous scholars in the twenty-first century has shifted discussions of two-spirit identity away from the relatively apolitical accounts of their ritual roles in early anthropological literature to overtly political acknowledgments of the points of contention and solidarity between queer of color communities/scholarship and queer indigenous experience (Driskill 2010).

Like the two-spirit figure, hijra in South Asia have played a dominant role in anthropological interpretations of the relationship between nonconforming genders and sexualities and religious practice. Earlier literature often reinstated the romanticized vision of hijra as transhistorical, “third-gender” ritual specialists (Nanda 1986). Newer ethnographic work on hijra provides a more realistic, ethnographically grounded, and holistic representation of the complexity of their experience. In her nuanced ethnography of a hijra community in Hyderabad, India, Gayatri Reddy (2005), for instance, charts hijra’s search for izzat (respect) and movingly and hauntingly describes the AIDS-related deaths of several interlocutors and the consequential disbandment of their small encampment. Far from reducing the complexity of hijra lives to viral load or to an agendered, liminal status as “neither man nor woman,” Reddy urgently illuminates how earlier work on hijra subjectivity ignored some of the more troubling aspects of their lives, including stigma and gendered forms of violence.

© MIKE KEAR/ALAMY
A Group of Radical Faeries Perform an Equinox Ritual at the Green Park Tree Circle in London. Harry Hay and other early homophile activists originally organized Radical Faerie communities as a way to affirm and celebrate their same-sex desires and male effeminacy. During healing retreats, usually held on rural land outside of big cities where these homophile movements and their members were based, Radical Faeries (predominantly white gay men) drew upon and appropriated Native American and other non-Western rituals and spiritual practices.

The list of ritualized gender-variant and same-sex-desiring identities and experiences that have captured academic and popular Western imagination also extends to those (illegal) transgenerational relationships that form between an older male patron and a young “beardless” boy known as bacha baazi in northwestern Pakistan and Afghanistan. A deeply historical practice, like Melanesian forms of “ritualized homosexuality,” bacha baazi is an expression of male same-sex desire based on age hierarchies (de Lind van Wijngaarden and Rani 2011).
In its contemporary manifestation, poor boys are purchased to entertain older male patrons through ritual forms of dance, as well as sex; the institution gained renewed global attention during the US-led war in Afghanistan when media reports of this form of sexual exploitation/abuse/slavery garnered international headlines. Given that the ritual institution of “dancing boys” is deeply rooted in disturbing power differentials between the entertainer and the entertained, it now figures into current debates over moral and cultural relativism.

Alongside “ritualized homosexuality” and the two-spirit, hijra, and bacha baazi figures, one lesser-acknowledged thread in the global genealogy of ritual and its attachment to queerness in the anthropological archive resides in the literature on spirit mediumship and shamanism. Much of this early twentieth-century ethnographic scholarship is problematically described in the coded language of “transvestism” or “passive homosexuality” and attempted to illustrate how “transvestites” or “homosexuals” were accepted in their respective societies. The literature has largely concentrated on the Afro-Atlantic world, and Brazil in particular (Allen 2012; Fry 1985; Landes 1940; Lescot and Magloire 2002; van de Port 2005; Wekker 2006). Ethnographic accounts of sex/gender alterity and spirit possession span across the globe, however, to other locales as diverse as Southeast Asia (Ho 2009; Merrison 2001; Peletz 2011; Sinnott 2004), East Africa (Giles 2015; Larsen 2008), and beyond. Depending on the cultural context, the form of spirit mediumship usually assumes a disconnect between medium and possessing spirit; through ritual acts, human hosts often lose consciousness when under possession of a spirit being. Depending on one’s perspective and the local articulation, mediums (albeit temporarily) effectively embody a gender, sex, age, ethnicity, or other identity marker that they otherwise cannot. Thus, spirit mediumship is a fascinating and notable site from which ethnographers and area studies specialists have attempted to understand local sex/gender systems. Surprisingly, few scholars have brought this literature into conversation with work in queer anthropology or literature in transnational/global sexualities (cf. Wekker 2006). While most of this scholarship privileges male-bodied mediums, several feminist scholars have begun the critical work of breaking down the androcentric bias that permeates the field by showcasing how female same-sex sexualities are negotiated through mediumship as well (Allen 2012; Sinnott 2004; Wekker 2006). In her work, Gloria Wekker (2006) describes working-class Afro-Surinamese women who engage in the social institution known as mati work (composed of both female same-sex erotic partnerships and spirit possession practice). These women do not conceive of their same-sex desire as a form of identity but, rather, as a kind of work that has incorporated spiritual labor into its fold. Those women “who dress and act like men [are understood to] have a strong male Apuku” spirit, for instance (Wekker 2006, 116).

North America
Ethnohistorical fascination with ritual practice in same-sex-desiring and gender-variant communities was, and continues to be, largely fixated on either indigenous North America or faraway places in relation to the North American or European academy. This setup, of course, does not reflect the reality of the situation, for while the language of “ritual” is more likely to be mapped onto non-Western spaces, ritualized performances and ceremonies are no less integral to contemporary North American queer communities. In part this misrepresentation is based on the epistemological assumption on the part of Westerners (invested as they are in the language of secularism) that ritual is a wholly “religious” object.

Scholarship in religious studies and the anthropology of religion has now long shown that the category of religion is itself a Western construct, one largely born out of an Abrahamic, and especially Christian, framework rooted in the concept of “belief” (Asad 1993; Lambek 2013). Like the category of “religion,” scholars typically consider ritual to be a religious object, yet like religion, ritual bleeds into all realms of human experience, evading definite categorization as religious. Such ritual practices as pilgrimage and marriage, explored below, extend well beyond the boundaries of religious studies proper, into the topics of tourism and mobility, citizenship and rights, and capital and identity. Stated differently, while ritual is popularly understood to occur within sacred realms of human experience, rituals are, as Michael Lambek points out, “equally a part of the ordinary realization and reproduction of social life, the way that life in human worlds unfolds” (2013, 20). The reproduction metaphor notwithstanding, this aptly applies to same-sex–desiring and gender-variant publics, whose participants have integrated ritual practices into their own worldings and life-sustaining endeavors or whose gender/sexual alterity automatically positioned them in the role of ritual officiant.

The best contemporary scholarship on ritual at the intersection of religious studies and trans/queer studies resists the romanticization of “third-gender” figures and their ritual roles, as once again poignantly discussed by Towle and Morgan (2002), but likewise resists what Jasbir K. Puar (2007) has termed the “queer secularism” that pervades much Eurocentric, white LGBT agendas. In its aversion to the religious, queer secularism implicitly smugles a white, liberal, avowedly secular LGBT subject at the center of its analysis, thereby “leaving to the side the women of color and transnational feminisms whose relationships to religion have historically been far more complex and variegated” (Pellegrini 2009, 208; see also Seitz 2017). Even emerging religious studies scholarship on Christianity—the religious tradition that resides at the very heart of Western institutions—has illuminated how its ritual practices and historical trajectories are tethered to gender nonconformance and same-sex sexualities in both the past and in contemporary reconfigurations (Wilcox 2003, 2018).

More capacious definitions of ritual may allow for a fuller appreciation of how North Americans adopting LGBTQ+ monikers are consistently compelled by ritual’s call. The most paradigmatic of all such rituals for LGBTQ + communities in North America has been the performative gesture of “coming out” to one’s kin. Its becoming a salient form of personal ritual was possible only after the “homosexual” became a recognizable form of personhood and identity category rather than simply a set of sex acts (Foucault 1978). As documented by Kath Weston, the process of coming out among gays and lesbians in the San Francisco Bay Area in the 1980s allowed them to gain a “sense of wholeness by establishing congruence between interior experience and external presentation, moving the inner into the outer” (1991, 50). Coming out is always articulated as an intersectional experience in which gender and sexuality are articulated in relationship to one’s class, racial, and ethnic background. It is an experience that, as Martin F. Manalansan (2003) has noted, does not seamlessly translate to other cultural contexts, as is the case with the queer Filipino immigrants in New York that he listened to. Nevertheless, “coming out” has become a global phenomenon, and one that has radically shifted now that the ritual may be performed on social media sites, such as YouTube, especially for LGBTQ+ persons residing in rural geographies (Gray 2009).

Ritual-as-performance is another vibrant cultural elaboration developed within North American LGBTQ+ communities. The staged, patterned performances of drag kings and queens, for instance, have been described as a kind of ritual for both performers and audiences alike (Newton 1972). Similarly, the ball events that form the centerpiece of ballroom culture (flourishing primarily in Latino and black queer male communities in the urban United States) are not necessarily ritual proper, yet as Marlon M. Bailey (2013) attests, much of their repetitive “performative labor” is ritualized. Balls are always organized in a T-shaped layout that separates the audience, judges, and the performative space. All balls feature a call-and-response format between the commentator and audience, and are characterized by the participatory role of audience members. Both drag performances and balls could be described as a kind of theater, a form that Esther Newton (2000) describes in relation to the early gay and lesbian community on Fire Island. While Newton does not describe the place of theater in gay and lesbian lives in terms of “ritual,” their continual return to this performative art form and its ability to produce a liminal space-time apart from reality for the audience can easily be interpreted in this way. Newton’s (2000) provocative description of theater for gays and lesbians as an “anti-church,” while understandable given evangelical demonization of same-sex relationships in the United States, is a misnomer given the parallel collective affinities and affective pulls that both theater and church—and performance, generally—may elicit in participants. Other adaptations to religious rituals have been made by faith communities hoping to erase the LGBTQ+ subject from their ranks after their coming out, such as the Orthodox Jewish practice of sitting shivah or the Mormon or Jehovah’s Witnesses practice of being disfellowshipped from a congregation (Itzhaky and Kissil 2015).

The language of ritual is also used by ethnographers to describe nonconforming sexual communities in North America, such as leather or BDSM (bondage, discipline, sadism, masochism) communities, which may include but are not necessarily reduced to same-sex erotics. Deploying the language of ritual is a way to legitimize such communities as distinct cultures worthy of recognition, as when Tim Dean asserts that “like any culture, this one [barebacking culture] has its own language, rituals, etiquette, institutions, iconography, and so on” (2009, x). For instance, the Catacombs, which was a critical site for gay men’s S/M fisting (anal penetration with one’s appendage) in San Francisco from the mid-1970s to the onset of the AIDS crisis, was described by Gayle S. Rubin as a place where “twentieth-century sexual heretics could practice their own rites and rituals in a situation that was insulated, as much as possible, from the curious and the hostile” (2011a, 224). In her broader discussion of the development of BDSM communities in San Francisco, Rubin contends that “sadomasochism is not a form of violence, but is rather a type of ritual” (2011b, 258), following her observation that the secrecy of gay sex parties, such as those at the Catacombs, provided a liminal space outside of the public sphere for practitioners to fulfill their individual fantasies through connection and belonging to a larger public. The same applies to barebacking culture, in which gay men embrace, not avoid, the risk of contracting HIV from a sexual partner. As Dean notes, barebacking culture is centrally organized around the “breeding ritual,” a sexual encounter in which HIV is purposefully transmitted to another or, at least, that risk is left open. Because HIV transmission is understood in generational terms, “these rituals provide a structure that enables transmission of the culture (or subculture) from one generation to the next” (2009, 130). Here, sexual ritual, which bridges across generational divides, connects the individual to a broader, even transhistorical community. Along these lines, Dean asks the following: “What would it mean for a young gay man today to be able to trace his virus back to, say, Michel Foucault?” (2009, 89). The development and increasingly popular use of preexposure prophylaxis (PrEP) drugs, which prevent the spread of HIV, will likely continue to change the dynamics of this ritual exchange. Like the fisting parties at the Catacombs, as well as their secret, liminal space and the activities that occurred there, breeding rituals may seem bizarre or even terrifying to outsiders, as rituals often do in the eyes of noncommunity members. Rubin provides a reminder that, like decontextualized descriptions of “ritualized homosexuality” deployed as a pedagogy of stupefaction or bewilderment rather than as a cautious pedagogy of cultural relativism, “torn out of context, S/M material is upsetting to unprepared audiences and this shock value has been mercilessly exploited” (2011b, 258). Aside from the rite of passage into nonconforming sexual communities signified in attending one’s first sex party, for instance, the purchase of sex toys has also been described as a ritualized practice that signals such an entrance (Weiss 2011). As Margot Weiss (2011) explains, however, social anxiety over the loss of group authenticity emerges when rituals can simply be purchased by wealthy practitioners. Here as elsewhere, the anthropological insight that ritual can both solidify the social structure while also potentially enacting cultural change is upheld.

Literature in ritual studies is rife with work on pilgrimage, a form that plays a critical role in both instilling belonging and revealing disbelonging within LGBTQ+ communities.
Pilgrimage to San Francisco has been depicted as playing a role in the subject formation of LGBTQ+ Americans, who may queerly find “home” not in their place of regular residence but at the pilgrimage site (Howe 2001). Likewise, queer tourists could also be said to engage in the ritual of pilgrimage during other LGBTQ+ events, such as regional, national, and international pride parades, in all their (homonational) complexity. As annual events forged from a shared ideology celebrating, even idealizing, individual expression and (exhaustively tyrannical) positive affect, pride marches are ritual practices in their own right.

Finally, as one of the most recognizable rituals, marriage is a ceremonial practice that is integrated into not just the (Judeo-Christian) religious fabric of society, but also into the political and economic structures that organize private property and its transference. In the case of the American nation-state, marriage signals normative moral codes about “family values” and productivity, as embedded in both the Protestant work ethic and hetero(re)productivity. Since the right to marriage was extended to same-sex couples throughout the United States, many queers and their spokespersons in the academy, including Michael Warner (1999), Lisa Duggan (2008), and others, have rightly questioned marriage’s servitude to capitalism and cis(hetero)patriarchy (privileges historically only afforded to cisgender, heterosexual men). Others, however, have embraced commitment ceremonies, then marriage, as a ritual that they had previously been unjustly deprived of (Lewin 1998). The ritual of marriage is not the only way that same-sex–desiring and gender-variant persons have forged kin bonds, however. Ballroom communities in the United States are organized into “houses,” which individuals enter into and with each house effectively functioning as its own kinship system (Bailey 2013; Butler 1993). Like hijra communities described by Reddy, which prioritize the ritual act of “putting a rit” (2005, 58) by entering a particular hijra “house,” in both instances individuals who live outside of heteronormative structures have found a way to, as Kath Weston (1991) once put it, create “families we choose” beyond traditional marriage, both within and outside North America.

Transgender communities continue to invent their own novel ceremonial rites of passage and to reconfigure existing ones, as in transgender naming rituals that provide a ritualized transition into one’s desired gender. Mass-mediated accounts of transition, such as those displayed on social media platforms, also provide transgender identities with the ability to agentively define and curate their experience for a broader audience (Horak 2014). “Transitioning,” the rite of passage so intimately tied to the transgender identity category, is reconfigured through acts of self-representation provided by digital media platforms or those made necessary by medicolegal structures, as cogently described by Afsaneh Najmabadi (2014) in the case of Iran.

More capacious considerations of ritual—in terms of ritualized labor, performance, and play—may allow for a reinvigoration of ritual studies in scholarship on LGBTQ+ communities and provide a basis for rethinking ritual’s power to renegotiate belonging between the self and its relations. The increasingly popular (and deeply problematic) terminology of “secular ritual” is but one way to describe those rituals developed within LGBTQ+ communities. Although some of these practices may not be perceived as ritual in the traditional anthropological or religious studies sense of the term, those symbolic experiences that embody a shared set of values and a sense of communitas ought to be considered to reside at the heart of this ever-dynamic and deeply relevant cultural phenomenon.

SEE ALSO BDSM (Bondage and Discipline, Domination and Submission, Sadism and Masochism); Hijras; Pacific Island and Pacific Island Diaspora Identities; Pride Parades and Marches; Two-Spirit; Witchcraft/Occult in Africa

BIBLIOGRAPHY

FILMOGRAPHY

Roopbaan

ADNAN HOSSAIN
Research Fellow in Social and Cultural Anthropology, VU University Amsterdam, Netherlands Affiliated Researcher, Amsterdam Research Centre for Gender and Sexuality, University of Amsterdam, Netherlands

Bangladesh's first gay magazine in Bengali, published in 2014.

Roopbaan became the first gay magazine published in Bengali in Bangladesh when its first issue appeared in 2014. The term Roopbaan literally denotes a handsome man and also refers to a popular Bengali folk character. Roopbaan became publicly linked to same-sex sexuality and LGBT rights after one of its cofounding editors, Xulhaz Mannan, along with his colleague Mahbub Rabbi Tonoy, were brutally murdered on 25 April 2016 at Mannan's residence in Dhaka (the capital of Bangladesh). A local Islamist outfit with links to al-Qaeda claimed responsibility for the killing. The killing of these two activists brought homosexuality into the mainstream public view in Bangladesh for the first time in history, as the media reported the death with explicit reference to same-sex sexual activism and LGBT rights. Previously unintelligible to the mainstream populace, the initialism LGBT is now often transliterated in Bengali media reporting. Although the murder of these two gay rights activists may be seen as part of a series of killings by various Islamist outfits that have targeted atheists, secular social media bloggers, and religious minorities, there is also a distinct context of gender- and sexuality-focused activism, in which Roopbaan emerged as a platform for advocacy for gay rights.

Roopbaan, according to an editorial in its first issue, was intended to establish and assert the existence of somopremi, which literally means "same-sex loving" in Bengali. The choice of somopremi—an expression that emphasizes affect in same-sex relations rather than sex (the latter often captured in the Bengali expression somokami)—was a strategic move that considered love as a culturally more appropriate framework to advocate for same-sex sexuality. The espousal and appropriation of Roopbaan as a moniker to denote same-sex attracted or gay men itself can be read as an attempt to indigenize same-sex sexualities that are otherwise popularly construed as Western and, therefore, nonlocal in origin. While same-sex sexuality exists in various forms in Bangladeshi society, including in the public health discourse as MSM (men who have sex with men), what was different in the case of Roopbaan was its explicit aim of casting same-sex sexuality through an identity-based rights approach. Valobashte dao more (Let me love) was the message on the cover page of the first issue of the magazine alongside the picture of a tied-down man symbolizing the struggle of gay men in Bangladeshi society.

HIJRS IN BANGLADESH

_Hijra_ is a publicly institutionalized subculture of working-class feminine-identified people who are often assigned a male gender at birth. Popularly conceptualized as a third gender or a third sex both in South Asia and in international media, hijras are part of the mainstream Bangladeshi public culture. People in Bangladesh typically consider the hijra to have been born with missing or ambiguous genitals. Hijras also reinforce such a view in their encounters with the mainstream public. In reality, however, there are both hijras with a penis and hijras who ritually remove their penises (Hossain 2013). Both of these groups are indispensable to the smooth conduct of _hijragiri_, the ritual occupations of the hijra (Hossain 2012).

In 2013 the government of Bangladesh legally recognized this long-standing cultural category as the legal category “third gender.” The legal recognition has paradoxically necessitated a concurrent mobilization of a discourse of disability in the construction of the hijra. In this new official framework, a hijra is a person born with missing or ambiguous genitals. Under this fixed definition, hijras are often required to undergo a medical examination to prove their hijra status before being able to access certain government benefits. Thus, what was previously a trope of disfigurement based on putative genital status has now been transformed into a mainstream discourse of disability in official discourse—an unprecedented development that further disenfranchises the hijra in Bangladesh (Hossain 2017). Under this new regime of recognition, self-identified hijras are not allowed to be hijras anymore. A focus on the hijras in Bangladesh not only challenges the spatio-intellectual hegemony of India in studies of hijras in South Asia but also allows researchers to complicate the existing conceptualization of the hijra from the slant of the overlooked location of Bangladesh (Hossain 2018).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Ironically, the adoption of either an affect-based approach or even of indigenous folk figures did very little to counter the popular public perception of Roopbaan as Western propaganda devised to corrupt the social fabric of Bangladesh. Mannan’s affiliation with the US Agency for International Development and his former employment with the US embassy did not help his efforts to de-Westernize homosexuality in Bangladesh, at least in public perception. The use of LGBT—a foreign initialism in popular Bangladeshi media at least since his death—ironically further reinforces the preexisting trope of same-sex sexuality being foreign in Bangladesh.

Although same-sex sexuality is a criminal offense in Bangladesh under the penal code of 1860, a British colonial legacy, the law has rarely been used in the history of Bangladesh. MSM-focused nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) started work in the late 1990s to address the sexual health needs, especially HIV/AIDS prevention, of the working-class male population engaged in same-sex sexual activity. Gay groups emerged in Bangladesh at the start of the twenty-first century mainly using online platforms to cater to English-speaking, middle-class, urban, same-sex-loving and attracted men. Roopbaan built on these existing resources at least since 2011 and sought to establish an offline and physical presence for gay men. Roopbaan also organized rights-themed workshops outside Dhaka to reach out to nonmetropolitan members of the LGBT community.

A significant event under the banner of Roopbaan was the launching of a rainbow rally in 2014 as part of the Bengali New Year celebration. The idea of the rally was not to send any explicit message to the wider society about the presence of the LGBT community. Instead, it was intended to be part of the wider celebration of the new year, an annual event held to mark the Bengali New Year. Yet the rally brought Roopbaan into mainstream view after an online news outlet reported the event as a “gay parade,” giving rise to vitriolic public reactions and death threats to many associated with Roopbaan and the rainbow rally. Significantly, the rally drew not only gay-identified men, but also members of other nonnormative groups, including some NGO-affiliated hijra (transgender) people. The rainbow rally took place again the following year but had to be canceled in 2016, as the police refused to grant permission to the organizers on account of the former’s inability to provide security in the face of credible extremist threats. On the morning of the Bengali New Year on 14 April, despite the police directive to cancel the event, a group of men gathered at designated area to form the rainbow rally but were later arrested by the police. Both Mannan and Tonoy visited the police station and actively worked to obtain the release of their detained colleagues, exposing themselves to further risks. Eleven days later, Mannan and Tonoy were killed.

The printing company that published the first issue of Roopbaan refused to publish the second issue because of putative threats from Islamist groups, bringing the magazine to a halt. The murder of these two gay rights activists sent shockwaves through the wider LGBT community and significantly dampened gender, sexuality, and LGBT-focused rights work and activism. Several activists, practitioners, and academics were forced to leave Bangladesh and seek asylum abroad, while those remaining in Bangladesh continued to live in hiding. Remarkably, there was very little protest against the murders of these two gay rights activists from either the wider society or the civil societies concerned with alternative gender, sexualities, or rights work. That no feminist organizations or even pro-LGBT NGOs or civil society protested against the murders brings into view the general reluctance of people and organizations in Bangladesh to be publicly associated with same-sex sexuality or “LGBT” rights.

SEE ALSO Hijras

BIBLIOGRAPHY

In the early 1900s, Anna Rüling (1880–1953) became one of the first German women to speak out publicly on behalf of gay and lesbian rights and to do so from a position of self-identification. She also wrote short stories featuring lesbian lovers who did not die at the end of the tale, a rare outcome for early twentieth-century gay and lesbian novellas. Yet Rüling was not immune to broader historical forces: she took a nationalist turn during World War I (1914–1918) and, unlike many of her early contemporaries in the German gay rights movements, continued living and working under Nazi rule.

“Anna Rüling” was actually a pseudonym for the Hamburg-born journalist “Theo” Anna Sprüngli, born in 1880. In the first decade of the twentieth century, Rüling was significantly involved in writing and activism for gay and lesbian rights. In 1911 she became one of only four female “chairmen” of the Wissenschaftlich-humanitäres Komitee (Scientific-Humanitarian Committee), an organization founded in 1897 to fight for the decriminalization of sex acts between men and to advocate for gay rights more broadly. Before becoming a “chairman,” Rüling delivered a now famous speech to a meeting of the committee on 9 October 1904, titled “Welches Interesse hat die Frauenbewegung an der Lösung des homosexuellen Problems?” (What interest does the women’s movement have in solving the homosexual problem?). In this speech (later published in 1905), Rüling centered on the figure of the Urninde, a same-sex-attracted and gender-nonconforming individual whom she marked out as deserving special rights. Drawing on contemporary sexological concepts such as “sexual inversion” and the “third sex,” Rüling outlined a unique subjectivity for the Urninde that many believe formed the basis for modern understandings for lesbianism; her definition of the Urninde was in fact later taken up by sexologists such as Albert Moll (1862–1939). Defiantly describing the Urninde as “both noble and fine” (Rüling 1997, 148), Rüling characterized this subject as more suited for public life and occupations typically held by men because of her greater masculinity. In the process of the speech, Rüling subtly “outed” herself as belonging to the group for whom she advocated.

Rüling’s speech is notable for offering a positive representation of a queer female subject and for vociferously demanding greater public rights and status on her behalf. It also demonstrated the ways in which politically active women such as Rüling made significant contributions to sexological thinking by redefining sexual subjectivity from an “insider’s” perspective. Yet Rüling’s advocacy for the Urninde came at the expense of heterosexual women. She suggested that most “normal” women would be satisfied with their supposedly natural roles as wives and mothers. She also drew on contemporary eugenic arguments to assert that the Urninde should be liberated from these very roles because her children tended to be “defective.” While Rüling’s arguments may have been strategic and pragmatic, they did nothing to dispel the existing connection between homosexuality and pathology. Moreover, in her strong insistence on the Urninde’s greater masculinity, Rüling’s conceptualization of queer female subjectivity elided femme or maternal iterations of this identity. To her credit, Rüling in her other work refused to accept the dominant cultural narrative that same-sex love was doomed to end in failure. Her 1906 short story collection Welcher unter euch ohne Sünde ist (Which among you is without sin?) featured love stories between women with happy endings.

Rüling’s legacy becomes further complicated by the fact that, over the course of World War I, she became an ardent German nationalist and conservative, ultimately joining the Düsseldorf branch of the Flottenbund deutscher Frauen (Naval Association of German Women) and the right-leaning Reichsverband deutscher Hausfrauenvereine (National Federation of German Housewives Associations). In so doing, she seemingly disavowed her earlier political activism. Rüling, in fact, continued working as a journalist during the Third Reich and World War II (1939–1945), although it does not appear that she was a member of the Nazi Party. In 1953 she died in Delmenhorst as one of Germany’s oldest female journalists.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Rüling, Anna. “What Interest Does the Women’s Movement Have in the Homosexual
Rural Queer Communities, US

KENT W. PEACOCK
PhD candidate
Florida State University, Tallahassee

The experience of LGBTQ individuals in rural US communities, both historically and in modern times.

Until recently, scholars habitually neglected queerness in the rural United States. Judith (now Jack) Halberstam (2005) identified this thinking as metronormativity—the constructed dichotomy where urban signifies progressive and modern places tolerant of queerness, and rural signifies backward and traditional places intolerant of and antithetical to queerness. This produces the impression that “real” queers can visibly live and build communities only in urban spaces, making rural queer lives depressingly isolated or closeted. The long history and proud present of rural queerness—meaning any form of gender nonconformity or nonheterosexual desire—debunks this assessment.

Debunking Metronormativity

The economic and spatial realities of rural space created queer expressions, identities, and communities different from, but not inferior to, those in urban spaces. Rural queers’ lives and histories challenge the perceived lack of queer acceptance in rural places leading to rural-to-urban migration and the liberation narrative of oppressed minority “coming out” and organizing visible, political communities centered on an identity politics of queerness. Some found communities that tolerated their queerness as an open secret or accepted their public queer identity. Examples of this ranged from migratory male labor communities, such as loggers, farmworkers, miners, or hobos, to permanent queer residents (Shah 2011, E. Johnson 2012). Others, such as truck drivers or middle-class businesspeople, kept queer desires a closely guarded secret, acted on them only when traveling away from home, and/or never wanted to maintain a connection with a queer community or identity.
Gay Couple on Their Ranch in the Rural Florida Panhandle, 2014. LGBTQ individuals have existed throughout the history of American rural spaces despite the stereotype that equates “rural” with patriarchy, heterosexuality, and white nuclear families.

Many rural queers stress positive connections to their rural lives and communities, proclaiming themselves as “one of them,” not an “outside menace.” They do not reject their queerness but participate in actions Scott Herring (2010) calls “queer anti-urbanism” by not seeing urban queer culture as a model to aspire to nor wanting to relocate to urban spaces and orient their lives and relationships primarily around queerness. To emphasize being “one of them,” and because of limited resources and smaller concentrations of queer people, rural queers “queer” everyday spaces through sharing space with nonqueers, whether in bars or churches, or by, for example, putting on impromptu drag performances at Walmart, a corporation whose marketing stresses its “rural values” (Gray 2009). They might choose to connect with queer communities by traveling to queer events in rural or urban spaces, such as Pensacola Pride on the Gulf Coast’s “Redneck Riviera” or the Michigan Womyn's Music Festival, a women-only celebration held in a rural area from 1976 to 2015. Rural spaces have drawn individuals from urban spaces, too. This has included lesbian-separatist, also known as landdyke, land movements, especially in Oregon and Northern California, and the Radical Faeries, a movement for man-loving men emphasizing spirituality, the natural world, and rejection of competitive and nonemotional masculinity. Each, beginning in the 1970s, saw freedom in rural space to create queer communities separate from and challenging American capitalist, patriarchal, individualist, and materialist culture.

Rural queers can experience isolation, depression, and physical violence because of the lack of queer communities in rural spaces, but it was not until the 1970s and 1980s that they faced more targeted oppression in reaction to the sexual revolution, an ascendant neoliberal and robotics-based economy, the civil rights movement, and the visibility of the LGBT movement. Queerness went from tolerated oddity to threat imported from urban spaces, as the sociologist Arlene Stein (2001) documented in a small Oregon town’s debate over nondiscrimination laws during the 1990s. In response, queer-specific political, social, and health organizations in rural spaces increased in number. Rural queers have also overcome physical distance via online chat rooms and social networking apps that allow networking—though still possibly secretive—between those with queer desires. Television and other media have also provided positive knowledge of livable queer possibilities.

The Historical Context

Rural queerness existed long before the modern heterosexual/homosexual binary, even if persons’ sexual behaviors or identities were not fully understood or discussed. Some Native American cultures, particularly in the Great Plains and Southwest, allowed for individuals in a third-gender or two-spirit (berdache) category—typically men who performed female roles, might have sex with men, and held a special place in indigenous religions. Early nineteenth-century Vermont was home to Charity and Sylvia, two respected white women who lived in a community-recognized, marriage-like relationship (Cleves 2014). Augustus Baldwin Longstreet’s 1835 short story “A Sage Conversation” included a household headed by two males as a nonchalant, if humorous, possibility in antebellum Georgia. While one partner in these couplings took on the roles, but not the appearance, of the other sex, others included one partner who more consistently cross-dressed, such as Nellie Pickett who became a lover of Billy the Kid and a notorious outlaw in the Southwest (Boag 2011).

Some rural individuals solely queered gender norms. This is particularly evident for rural women whose labor, both economic and reproductive, strained their bodies and their abilities to maintain the appearances that fit urban feminine beauty norms. These “hard women,” memorably captured in Great Depression-era photography or more recently on “redneck” reality television, rarely challenged heteronormativity (C. Johnson 2013). Women who remained unmarried, cross-dressed for economic opportunity or mobility, and/or took traditionally male jobs also challenged domestic, subservient, wifely norms of femininity. Gender nonconformity could be more fleeting, such as the entertainment of men donning women’s clothing in school and community theatrical performances (Thompson 2010).

Other scholars trace conscious efforts to around the beginning of the twentieth century to erase queerness from rural spaces. Teaching reproductive heterosexuality, eugenics, feminine beauty, and domesticity via livestock breeding science, 4-H fairs, and mass consumerism all helped produce heteronormativity in rural spaces (C. Johnson 2013). Queerness was also “darkened” as it became defined as a “premodern” condition that would disappear as the “frontier closed” and civilization arrived, along with the increased policing of nonwhite and immigrant individuals (Boag 2011; Shah 2011).

Diversity of Rural Queer Experiences

The fluidity of sexual desire, gender, and identity has meant that rural queer experiences are incredibly diverse, or, as John Howard (1999) characterized it, there are “men like that,” men “who liked that,” and others in-between. Differentiations in class, gender, and race influenced access to space, materials for performing queerness, and the economic capital needed to circulate to locate other queers, to find safer spaces to perform queerness, or to migrate out of rural space—all producing diverse rural queer lives. For example, African Americans, whether men in Mississippi or women in Asheville, North Carolina, found limited access to white queer spaces because of white privilege and racism, remaining closely tied to African American, not queer, communities (Howard 1999; Gray, Johnson, and Gilley 2016).

Rural is just as expansive a descriptor as queer. Rural space varies from forested mountains to cornfields to “main street” towns. Dominated by agricultural or extractive economies, rural areas are also home to factories and transportation nexuses. Scholars also masquerade “rural” under regional labels, such as the South or West, collapsing those regions’ variety of rural and urban spaces, or not always interrogating how space affects people's opportunities and actions. These definitions of queer and rural, the circulation of individuals, and the fact that public queer communities are few in number or dispersed all make finding rural queerness challenging. Microhistories, oral histories, biographies, and “naturalistic” fictional literature are common methods of telling rural queer stories, with one example standing in for larger, frequently undocumented rural queer histories and possibilities.

Laws and vocal critics strongly condemning queerness have existed in rural areas, but the vastness of rural space and a disconnect between prescription and practice allowed individuals throughout history not only to perform queer behaviors and adopt queer appearances in a fleeting manner but also to live in queer relationships and take on queer identities in a more permanent way. Rural spaces were never devoid of queerness, and they were not bastions of patriarchy, heterosexuality, and (white) nuclear families, as conservative pundits have imagined in a type of historical amnesia.

SEE ALSO Rural Queerness; Urban Queerness

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Rural Queerness

ROHIT K. DASGUPTA
Lecturer, Institute for Media and Creative Industries
Loughborough University, United Kingdom

Scholarly debate regarding the state of queer individuals in rural spaces globally, including depictions in movies and literature.

Studies of queer identities and queer spaces have had somewhat of an urban bias. Ethnographic works on queer lives in the West by scholars such as Sharif Mowlabocus (2010), as well as new works on queer lives in the Global South, such as Elisabeth Engebretsen's Queer Women in Urban China (2015) and Naisargi Dave's Queer Activism in India (2012), provide fascinating accounts of queer lives in the city but overlook queer experience in rural areas. In one of the early studies of rural lesbian and gay lives, David Bell and Gill Valentine (1995) argue that studies on American ruralism, while encompassing issues of gender, class, and ethnicity, neglect sexuality. In fact, when rural queers are discussed, their experiences are problematized through the lens of repression that needs to be left behind for the purposes of queer emancipation. But as Bell and Valentine note in their article, lesbians and gay men do live in the countryside, and they also visit to make use of the various resources those spaces have to offer. The rural offers an important lens for addressing issues of queerness and sexuality that have not been fully explored. It should also be noted that there are men having sex with men and women having sex with women who do not necessarily see themselves as queer and for whom, consequently, queer emancipation might not be an issue. Thus theorizing and interrogating rurality and sexuality requires a different set of tools and conceptual frameworks. This entry engages with a range of interdisciplinary scholarship and visual/literary texts on the rural queer from a global perspective to analyze how queerness and rurality are imagined, experienced, and lived.

Rural Queer Lives

Geographical identity clearly shapes the lived experiences of LGBTQ individuals, leading to migration, dislocation, and “sexual exiles.” Colin Johnson, Brian Gilley, and Mary Gray (2016) have argued that rural does not necessarily mean isolated. In fact, they cite the American countryside to demonstrate that new communication technologies and transportation have radically transformed these spaces. Alexis Annes and Meredith Redlin in their study of masculinity and gay men in rural France and the United States (2012) also argue that the lack of role models and the low visibility of homosexuality was a major factor in many rural gay men turning to digital media. Popular culture artifacts such as television shows and movies became a source of information about queerness for many of these men but also caused confusion because they did not recognize themselves in these discourses.

Rurality in the context of queer lives might be better understood not just as material space but also as symbolic imaginaries (Gorman-Murray et al. 2012). Scholars such as David Shuttleton (2000) have invoked the concept of the “gay pastoral” to draw attention to the rural as a site of belonging. Shuttleton argues that it is in the nonmetropolitan areas that sexual politics can go further, where it could critically transform not only sexuality rights but also, more fundamentally, sexuality. The rural in this context is not the repressed closet but rather escape and retreat from the consumerist, hypersexualized urban gay male culture. Shuttleton invokes Raymond Williams's classic work The Country and the City (1973), in which Williams argues that the British literary imagination depicts the city as a site of capitalist production and labor, with a loss of romanticism; by contrast, the countryside is viewed as natural, unadulterated, and romantic. Williams rejects such a dualistic explanation and mythologization of the city and countryside, arguing that both are inextricably linked to cultural and romantic imaginaries. Moving to contemporary Britain, Kath Browne and Nick McGlynn, in their study of the equalities landscape in rural Sussex (2012), illustrate the complexities of implementing LGBT equality legislation in the countryside. They question the narrative of a progressive agenda enacted only by “liberal urban communities” and show how communities in “hostile” rural areas can do the same. They argue that although much of the earlier literature on rural sexualities tended to focus on the recurring issues of availability of services for sexual minorities, more recent scholarship such as theirs has challenged the narrative of the “intolerant” rural space.

Queer lifeworlds are often represented through a rural to urban migration. As Kath Weston (1995) argues, city life is contrasted with rural queer existence in a binary where the urban space is represented as a “beacon of tolerance.” Gray's 2010 study of rural lives in America suggests that discovering one’s queer self requires three things: privacy, a visible social community, and a safe space. Another factor identified by Bernadette Barton in her 2012 study of the largely rural Republican-majority US states was the role of the church around which communities have grown. Barton argues that because most of these churches construct homosexuality as sinful, lesbians and gay men must choose between staying in what she calls the “toxic closet” (5) or risking rejection and ostracism from the people who supposedly care for them the most: their families, friends, and neighbors. This leads to problems with self-esteem, according to Barton. Not only must gay individuals hide their sexuality, they also must endure sermons branding them sinners and, in extreme cases, calling for their deaths. There is also a racialized dimension in this, where the countryside is perceived as a “white landscape.” Barton notes that for many respondents, this life of being “othered” gives them a unique position that they described as “the view from the margins”; thus, she argues, rural queers foster stronger friendships and kinship ties, leading to “enduring friendships and increased happiness” (237).
There are many complicated issues related to rural queer lives and the ethics of doing such research. The global push toward a visibility politics that demands recognition and political currency related to being “out and proud” comes with its own set of problems. As Bell and Valentine (1995) so eloquently ask in their essay, whom does this kind of research benefit, and whom might it harm?

John Howard’s 2007 essay “Homosexuals in Unexpected Places” offers a strong critique of doing gender and sexuality research beyond the metropolis. Howard argues that while it is important to ensure that private spaces such as malls and superstores in small towns respect freedom of speech, it is also imperative to pay attention to the ways in which gay men and lesbians are reappropriating the most conservative and unaccommodating spaces to assert their identity. Howard’s critique situates itself within the scholarship on non-Western sites, which argues that the rural needs to be reimagined as something other than just a space of isolation and repression and that it is important to recognize the many gay men and lesbians who are carving out different ways of living, survival, and celebration within that place.

Rural Queer Spaces

One of the consistent characteristics of these studies involves questioning the narrow definition of queer visibility/invisibility. What most of these studies demonstrate is that there are varying levels of visibility exhibited by rural queer men and women and an expectation to be “functionally invisible” (Gray 2010, 96). The tensions around family expectations, religion, and community shape public visibility in rural settings. Katherine Schweighofer (2016) argues that the rural closet depends not only on identifying as gay but also on gayness being a major factor of one’s identity. It could be argued that visibility politics and queer urban liberalism have also led to feelings of incompatibility for many rural queers who centralize other parts of their identity, such as parenthood or professional roles. Weston’s 1995 study found that a large number of queer men and women from the countryside often returned to rural living as a result of feeling incompatible with urban queer cultures.

Andrew Gorman-Murray, Barbara Pini, and Lia Bryant (2012) observe that there is another flow of queer migration, in which city-born queer people move to rural areas for personal and political reasons. The best-known are lesbian separatist groups in the United States, the United Kingdom, and Australia, who have formed lesbian communes around feminist and ecofeminist politics. The rural space offers an alternative to the consumerist capitalist society of the cities, and in these instances also signifies a rejection of heteropatriarchal powers. Gorman-Murray, Pini, and Bryant, citing David Bell’s earlier work, also note that semiseparatist communities of gay men called Radical Faeries have also established rural lives in a rejection of the heteropatriarchal capitalism of the city.
Studies of rural/semiurban queer spaces in India have presented some interesting examples too. Maya Sharma’s 2007 work on working-class lesbians in rural India, for example, presents portraits of women who navigate their subjectivity around compulsory marriage with little access to the metropolitan gay rights movements that are popular in contemporary India. Other important work has focused on the Launda community in India. Launda dancers are groups of poor trans women who migrate during the wedding season in spring and summer to perform in the rural belt of Uttar Pradesh and Bihar in India. Sexual exploitation is rife among Launda dancers, with many of the boys forced into prostitution. At the same time, ethnographic research in this community has yielded interesting observations about kinship and friendship arrangements. Most of the young dancers have found village life isolating and at times violent, but they also have formed intimate bonds with each other and with sympathetic individuals; in fact, many dancers have claimed that they prefer the strong friendship bonds they develop during these brief periods in rural India with other laundas over the daily anonymity they face in the city. A study by Paul Boyce and Rohit K. Dasgupta of small towns in India describes them as places with “room to breathe” (2017, 220). Several gay men who were interviewed found the queer culture in the city “excessive,” with the constant media intrusion described as a panopticon placing them under continual surveillance. For many of these individuals, the small towns of India offered greater anonymity and safety than cities.

Studies of rural southeastern China have also challenged the narrative of rural spaces as sexually repressive. In her study on Huian, Sara L. Friedman (2000) argues that premarital socializing and even sexual activity are not completely unknown. Friedman’s research shows that there has been a liberating shift from the dominant discourse of identifying sexuality primarily with reproduction and marriage to recognizing a more diverse range of sexual pleasures and identity.

Rural Queer Narratives

Fictional and narrative representations of queer identities have associated the urban with being “out and proud,” while the rural is seen as closeted and homophobic. Through the framing of rural as incompatible with queer lifestyles, a binary division is created where queer visibility is thought to be impossible outside the city.

Radclyffe Hall’s The Well of Loneliness (1928) traces the progress of its protagonist, Stephen Gordon, from isolation on her country estate to finding love in the urban queer community of Paris. The novel maps a pattern re-created in most queer fiction throughout the nineteenth and twentieth centuries that the construction of lesbian and gay identities requires the abandonment of the rural/country home to find a community in the city or abroad. In the case of Stephen, she was forced to leave not just her country home but the entire country to find happiness abroad, which is later described as a queer revelation. Stephen and her partner Mary revel in the anonymity of the diverse global city—a far cry from the claustrophobic existence of their rural backgrounds—and befriend queer couples from the Scottish Highlands and the rural United States who have also made their way to Paris to experience freedom. In the English countryside, Stephen had thought she was the only one of her own kind, but after her migration to the city she realizes there are many more queer people like her who are all looking for community and kinship.

In sharp contrast to Hall’s novel is Farm Boys, Will Fellows’s 1996 collection of first-person accounts of gay men living and working on US farms. Fellows’s ethnographic study of the lives of gay men growing up on farms during the twentieth century offers a different perspective to urbancentric gay narratives. Fellows argues that within the plainspoken narratives of these men one can find illuminating candor, insight, and a sense of humor. As he rightly points out, popular culture in the United States, as elsewhere, has expanded to include more varied perspectives and representations of gay men and lesbians, but these still neglect the rural queers who are made to believe that their country roots are irrelevant and embarrassing. A similar book is Michael Riordon’s Out Our Way (1996), which is based on interviews with over 300 gay men and lesbians in rural Canada. The sixty narratives depict individuals’ struggles to fit into small communities, to deal with the harshness of isolated existence, and to come to terms with a life that has often been imposed on them.

Of the various films and visual narratives about queer lives in the country, Ang Lee’s neo-Western drama Brokeback Mountain (2005), based on Annie Proulx’s 1997 short story, is perhaps the best known. It is a groundbreaking tale set in the rural idyll of Wyoming, where two cowboys find romance and sexual satisfaction with each other, only to be parted by societal heteronorms and internalized homophobia. The film, though controversial, was a huge critical success and prompted open discussions of sexuality, homophobia, and hate crimes in rural America. The book Beyond Brokeback: The Impact of a Film (2007) collected deeply moving stories, sparked by the film, of the fears, aspirations, and resilience of the rural queer community. Christopher Pullen in his 2009 study of web forums set up after the film’s release tells us that although most of the discussions centered on the film and the book, eventually discussion of the film died down and participants’ personal stories came to the forefront. He noted that the audience’s need for an outlet for their responses to the film was evidenced by the 50,000 to 100,000 users who visited the forums every month. These users were not only reading the contributions but also engaging with them and using the film to explore their own issues of living as queer people in rural America.

Outside the United States, representations of the rural in queer narratives remain scarce. Many of the celebrated queer films from the United Kingdom—including Weekend (2011), My Beautiful Laundrette (1985), and My Brother the Devil (2012)—have mostly dealt with queer politics, romance, and coming out in the inner-city estates of London or other big cities such as Manchester and Nottingham. A detour was taken in Stephen Beresford’s historical drama Pride (2014), which tells the true story of lesbian and gay activists from London who organized to raise money for families affected by the 1984–1985 UK miners’ strike. The organizers (who were later called Lesbians and Gays Support the Miners [LGSM]) and the residents of a small mining village, Onllwyn, strike up an unlikely friendship. The film depicts the villagers’ anxiety over the lesbian and gay activists coming into their midst, but despite some early hostilities, the miners come to realize that the activists genuinely care about building solidarity between the two groups, both under attack from Margaret Thatcher’s government and the police. This was a politically significant moment, as the 1985 pride march in London honored this alliance with the miners leading the march, and the National Union of Miners pressured the opposition Labour Party to incorporate queer rights into their party platform. The film dispels the notion of the countryside as inherently homophobic or even heteronormative and demonstrates that commitment to queer social justice transcends the urban/rural divide.

More recently, Francis Lee’s God’s Own Country (2017), set in rural Yorkshire, tells the love story of a young sheep farmer and Romanian migrant worker. An emotional narrative of queer kinship and love on a farm, it is one of the first British queer films set entirely in a rural location. The year 2018 saw the revival of the play The York Realist, first performed in 2001, which tells the story of a love affair between a rural farm laborer, George, and a production assistant director, John. While viewed as a classic tale of the intersection of class and sexuality, it is also rooted in the tension between metropolitan London and rural Yorkshire.

There are also some interesting rural queer narratives from non-Western countries. Zanele Muholi, a South African visual artist and activist, has used photography to document the lives of black queer people from South Africa and neighboring countries. In Faces and Phases (2006–2014), she celebrates the lives of black LGBT people and confronts the politics of racism, homophobia, and exclusion. Her subjects are positioned in suburban or rural settings, reclaiming and visualizing queer spaces of belonging. According to Muholi, the portraits encourage individuals to occupy public spaces and defy negative portrayals. Similarly, Zandile Nkabinde’s (2008) autobiography describes her life as a lesbian sangoma (healer) in rural townships of South Africa. She describes how her Zulu culture helped her explore her sexuality because of her relationship to male and female ancestors. Nkabinde describes traditional African healing practices and rituals and offers personal accounts of the hardships faced by queer people in South Africa. In Asia, Apichatpong Weerasethakul’s film Tropical Malady (2004) tells the story of a soldier and a country boy who pay regular visits to a Thai jungle. In this surreal story, the countryside and the jungle are framed as a queer space that protects their “secret” sexuality and allows their romance to blossom. Another interesting film is Yudho Aditya’s Pria (2016), which portrays the complexity of being a queer male and Muslim in rural Indonesia. The film underlines the remoteness of rural isolation as the teenager wrestles with his Islamic duty to marry and his nonconformist sexual identity.

The Filipino comedy-drama Bwakaw (2012), directed by Jun Lana, is a simple story about celebrating life, set in a small town. It tells the story of Rene, an older gay man in his seventies, and his friendship with a dying dog. The film explores how the concepts of love and belonging are understood through a form of “queer” interspecies kinship arrangement. The rural setting, which helps Rene discover love and queer belonging, is also a place of refuge in the Argentine film XXY (2007), which follows Alex, an intersex person who moves from the city to a small village in Uruguay to avoid societal discrimination and gender expectations. The film shows how rurality inflects and challenges hegemonic and urban-centric constructions of queer subjectivity and transformation in a space of queer refuge and welcome.

India has also seen an increase in queer films in the twenty-first century, though almost all of them are set in the city. An exception is Sridhar Rangayan’s Yours Emotionally (2007), which begins in a village in India where Ravi, a young Indian man from England, heads to an all-night gay party. The film has a nonlinear story line with surreal sequences. The village seems to exist outside conventional Indian sociocultural norms; with magical realism, it is framed as a queer utopia, with exalted scenes of defying tradition while embracing acceptance and compassion.

A review of the available literature on rural sexualities shows a remarkable shift over the years, from exploring the troubled and closeted lives of rural gay men and lesbians to focusing on how the rural itself has been fundamental in the development of gay and lesbian identities. The narratives of isolation and concerns about safety and tolerance are giving way to newer research that points to positive experiences of sexual minorities in rural spaces. While queer visibility plays an important role in political activism, the strategic representational politics of queer people living in the countryside offers new ways of imagining how to make social and political progress.

SEE ALSO Brokeback Mountain; Lesbian Lands, Women’s Lands, and Separatist Communes; Rural Queer Communities, US; Urban Queerness

BIBLIOGRAPHY

FILMOGRAPHY

Weerasethakul, Apichatpong, dir. Tropical Malady (Sud pralad). Anna Sanders Films and Thoke+Moebius Film, 2004. Film.
Russian Gay Propaganda Law

DAN HEALEY
Professor of Modern Russian History and Director, Russian and East European Studies Centre
University of Oxford, United Kingdom

Law passed in 2013 that makes it illegal to promote nontraditional sexual relations among minors in the Russian Federation.

Article 6.21 of the Code of the Russian Federation on Administrative Offenses (i.e., noncriminal offenses against public order) punishes so-called propaganda for nontraditional sexual relations (hereafter, “gay propaganda”) directed at minors. It was adopted on 30 June 2013. The debate over this law in early 2013 was Russia’s first national conversation in the media and online about the status of LGBTQ citizens, and it revealed a society deeply uneasy with homosexuality and gender variation. Such a reaction after a quarter century of postsocialist “sexual revolution” against a backdrop of painful economic decline and capitalist redevelopment was hardly surprising. Yet it also compelled many Russians to discuss queer sex and gender with unprecedented frankness, and it forced LGBTQ Russians to speak more assertively about their rights. The debate and adoption of this law had a significant impact internationally, positioning Russia as a promoter of conservative “traditional” values against a supposed Western revision of values contrary to nature and religious teaching. The Russian government has used the law not only to cultivate domestic political appeal but also as a theme in its anti-Western geopolitics, whether aimed at the republics of the former Soviet Union or targeting more distant allies in Europe and the Muslim world.

History of the Gay Propaganda Law in Russia

The law targeting gay propaganda had both long-term and immediate causes, and it emerged almost exactly twenty years after Russia’s decriminalization of male homosexual activity in April 1993 (Healey 2017). In the late 1980s, under the policies of glasnost (openness) and democratization adopted by the last leader of the Soviet Union, Mikhail Gorbachev (1931–), the official taboo on media discussion of sexual matters dissolved. Once the Soviet Union and Communist Party rule ended in late 1991, unrestrained freedom of speech prevailed in the media and society. Soviet citizens had had little exposure to any sex-related media content; Russians now experienced a presumed sexual revolution in public speech. For a brief time in the 1990s, sex overwhelmed media and cultural life with its power to make content appear fresh, democratic, and non-Soviet (Borenstein 2008). Old boundaries were destroyed, with little thought given to what new boundaries, if any, society needed.

At the same time, this sexual revolution enabled the emergence of vibrant, self-confident Russian LGBTQ voices after a long gestation in underground urban subcultures in the old Soviet Union. Russia’s LGBTQ voices of the 1990s and first years of the twenty-first century did not download the scripts of Western activists. Their voices were “made in the USSR” ([Healey 2017, 109]), and their publications were distinctively Russian, fusing traditions of highbrow literary culture with effusive dashes of erotica in poetry, fiction, and the visual arts ([Baer 2009; Moss 2013]). After decades of silence, a renaissance of Russian queer print media bloomed in the so-called democratic interval of the late 1980s and 1990s ([Healey 2017]).

For the average heterosexual, the new presence of LGBTQ voices was just another feature of this sexual revolution. The Russian economy was in transition from relatively self-contained state socialism to private market relations and global capitalism. The transition was profoundly unequal, with a few oligarchs seizing ownership of the national economy. Public faith in democracy was undermined by the economic unfairness and political instability of the transition to capitalism. For some conservative and nationalist politicians—beneficiaries of the capitalist transition—the shocking sexualization of the public sphere became a useful theme for attracting voter attention and support. Demographic decline, family poverty, and the unboundedness of global online media were new worries that could be tied to an emerging politics of traditional values.

Thus, between 2002 and 2009 conservative politicians spontaneously made several failed bids to enact a law banning gay propaganda. They were emboldened by the arrival into power of Vladimir Putin (1952–) as president in 2000; his vocal concern for the demographic crisis ([Rivkin-Fish 2006]) and his “hypermasculinity” and gendered theatrics ([Wood 2016]) appealed to a public longing for national stability and assertiveness ([Sperling 2015]). Russian conservatives were also apparently influenced by similar laws concocted by the religious right in the United States, as well as Britain’s Section 28 amendment, which banned the promotion of homosexuality in local services. The early Russian propaganda laws failed on technical grounds: the draft laws sought to put a total ban on the promotion of homosexuality in the criminal code, and legal authorities dismissed them as contravening judicial and human rights standards.

Conservative politicians sought more sophisticated legal instruments in regional government. One test bed was the province of Ryazan, where in 2006 a local ordinance punishing “propaganda for homosexuality among minors” was passed ([Healey 2017, 2]). Gay and lesbian activists launched a legal challenge after being arrested for carrying pro-LGBTQ signs outside a school and a children’s library. In 2010, however, the nation’s Constitutional Court ruled that the authorities had not infringed on the activists’ rights. The court's approving analysis of the law used the tendentious terms “traditional [versus] nontraditional marital relations” and embedded them in Russian jurisprudence (Muravyeva 2014). In 2011 and 2012 several other regions adopted similar bans on gay propaganda, possibly with central coordination.

The relaunch of Putin’s presidency in 2011 and 2012 was the immediate trigger for the 2013 national gay propaganda law. Putin’s return to the top job was not popular with the educated urban middle class, who were suffering from the economic crisis. Their street demonstrations for democratic reform destabilized Putin’s authoritarian system in late 2011 and early 2012. To restore order, the Kremlin divided the democratic opposition (Sharafutdinova 2014). One soft target was Pussy Riot, feminist punk rockers who protested in the country’s main Orthodox cathedral in February 2012. State-owned media presented the trial and prison sentences of Pussy Riot members for “hooliganism” as a fight against Western feminism: a threat to Russia’s traditional values as symbolized by the Orthodox Church (Wilkinson 2014). By giving the green light in late 2012 to a Siberian proposal for a nationwide ban on gay propaganda, the Kremlin kept controversial democratic and Western gender politics in the public eye. With a fierce debate about LGBTQ speech rights, Putin’s administration tapped deep fears of difference in the broad public beyond globalized metropolitan Russia.
In January 2013 the proposed national law was originally tabled as a ban on “propaganda for homosexualism” among minors (Healey 2017, 12). Its chief sponsor was Yelena Mizulina (1954–), a member of parliament known for traditional values campaigning. She duplicitously presented the bill in the parliament and to the media as an anti-pedophile measure when, in fact, the bill said nothing about pedophilia. Such misrepresentations pressured LGBTQ activists and their allies in the democratic opposition to explain why they were apparently defending child abusers. The child abuse spin fueled months of vicious homophobic attacks in the media; meanwhile, physical attacks on LGBTQ citizens, or those perceived as LGBTQ, jumped and remain high (Kondakov 2017). The murder of Vladislav Tornovoi in May 2013 on homophobic motives was a turning point: after fierce denials from Mizulina that her rhetoric was responsible for the tragedy, the law was discreetly redrafted and returned to the parliament as a ban on so-called propaganda for nontraditional sexual relations among minors. Adopted in June 2013, it punishes infractions with fines for Russian citizens from 4,000 to 100,000 rubles ($70 to $1,750). Foreigners can be punished with similar fines, plus a jail term of up to fifteen days’ administrative detention, followed by deportation.

Impact of the Law

In contrast to Britain’s Section 28, which was never used (and was eventually repealed), Russia’s gay propaganda ban was deployed almost immediately. The law has reportedly been used hundreds of times against private individuals; against individuals running websites, such as Deti-404, a site devoted to supporting LGBTQ children and teenagers; and against journalists and teachers (Kondakov 2017). Young Dutch human rights workers were arrested and deported in July 2013, among the first targets of the new law. More alarming is the spike in homophobic violence following the launch of the public debate on the law in January 2013. LGBTQ citizens in Russia have no protection from hate crimes. Aleksandr Kondakov (2017) demonstrates from keyword searches of state-court sentencing records that cases of violence against LGBTQ victims tripled between 2010 and 2015, with the years 2011 to 2013 showing steep rises as local and then national debates over gay propaganda took off. Since 2013, murders of LGBTQ victims for their orientation have been 2.5 times more frequent per capita in Russia than in the United States: Kondakov concludes that this must be a result of the 2013 debate and the media persecution of queer Russians.

Traditional Values in Putin’s Political Ideology

So-called traditional values are part of Putin’s conservative populism in domestic politics and international relations. After the collapse of Soviet atheism in the 1980s, ever-closer ties between the state and the Orthodox Church, stressing Russia’s exceptionalism, have provided Kremlin strategists with an alternative national ideology. In his speeches, Putin has contextualized the gay propaganda ban as part of Russia's assertion of its own tradition against "Euro-Atlantic countries [which] are actually rejecting their roots, including the Christian values that constitute the basis for Western civilization" (quoted in Healey 2017, 16). He has also promoted traditional values among Russia's Muslim nationalities (Bedford and Souleimanov 2016); murders and violence against gay men in Chechnya followed in 2016 and 2017. In the struggle between the European Union and Russia over Ukraine, russophone media and activists have promoted traditional values against the European Union “imposition” of LGBTQ rights. Similar soft-power political disputes over LGBTQ rights between parties oriented toward either Europe or Russia occur in other former Soviet republics. Russia has supported conservatives in eastern and western Europe opposed to equal marriage and LGBTQ equality (Kuhar and Paternotte 2017), and in the Middle East and Africa, Putin's allies and trading partners share similar antihomosexuality agendas (Thoreson 2015). Russia led a campaign to get the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights to recognize traditional values as the fundamental basis for human rights, against the existing principle of the universality of rights, with support from these allies (Wilkinson 2014). The traditional values agenda offers Putin’s government a soft-power basis for leadership in the international community of countries that resist LGBTQ rights as Western inventions, rather than universal human rights.

SEE ALSO Anti-gender Movement in Europe; Chechnya, Detention Camps in; Nationalism and Sexuality in Europe

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Sacred Band of Thebes

DAVID D. LEITAO
Professor and Chair, Classics Department
San Francisco State University, CA

An ancient Greek battalion supposedly consisting of pairs of male lovers and their beloveds.

Of all the positive models of same-sex desire from the ancient Greek world, the tradition of a military band at Thebes composed of 150 pairs of lovers and their younger boyfriends has proven particularly attractive, for it suggests that same-sex desire is not inconsistent, at least for the Greeks, with virility and virtue. But behind this idealized tradition is a reality that is more complex.

The Tradition

The Sacred Band (Hieros Lochos in Greek) was formed in the early 370s BCE. Its members originally fought at the front lines of the Theban army, but the Theban general Pelopidas later reorganized them as a separate elite battalion. (A different tradition credits the band’s formation to the general Epaminondas.) The band won victories over larger Spartan armies at Tegyra in 375 and, most famously, Leuctra in 371, ushering in a period of Theban hegemony over the ancient Greek world. There is almost nothing more about the battalion until its final defeat a generation later, at Chaeronea in 338 BCE, at the hands of the Macedonian king Philip II and his son Alexander the Great. The remains of the lion monument that ancient sources say was erected over the burial site of “the Theban dead” there was rediscovered in 1818, and archaeologists later found 254 skeletons buried beneath. Many scholars have assumed that this was the burial site of the 300 members of the Sacred Band of Thebes (and not that of other Thebans who also fought that day), but this cannot be confirmed.

One strand of the ancient tradition about the Sacred Band attributes to it an erotic composition. The Greek biographer Plutarch (c. 46–after 119 CE), writing more than 400 years after the battalion’s demise, notes that “some say that this band was composed of lovers and beloveds” (1917, 383), the founders apparently believing that both lover and beloved would fight more bravely in the other’s presence. After the Sacred Band was cut down at Chaeronea, Philip II, “on learning that this was the band of lovers and beloveds, burst into tears and said ‘Perish miserably they who think that these men did or suffered anything disgraceful!’” (Plutarch 1917, 387; translation slightly adapted by David D.
Leitao).

The tradition of an erotic Sacred Band was a natural fit for Thebes’s well-known reputation for the love of boys. The mythical Theban king Laius, father of Oedipus, was said to be an “inventor” of Greek pederasty (paederastia, literally meaning “love of boys”). And the Theban hero Iolaus was said by some to have fought by Heracles’s side as his beloved, and they point to a tradition at Thebes of lovers and beloveds pledging their commitment to each other at Iolaus’s tomb.

Band of Lovers?

But what does it mean that the Sacred Band of Thebes, as some Greek sources suggest, was composed of lovers and beloveds? Were these fighting pairs involved in an ongoing sexual relationship? Or were they at a later stage in the relationship, after the sexual element had ceased? The Greeks, confusingly for modern scholars, frequently used the words lover and beloved to describe such pairs even at this later, postsexual phase.

© HERCULES MILAS/ALAMY

The Lion of Chaeronea, Funerary Monument to the Theban Dead. Archaeologists found 254 skeletons buried beneath this monument to the Thebans killed at the Battle of Chaeronea. While ancient sources noted that the monument honored “the Theban dead” generally, many modern scholars have assumed this to be the burial site of the Sacred Band of Thebes specifically.
Most scholars assume that the Theban pairs were still sexually involved, but this does entail some challenging chronological assumptions. Ancient Greek pederasty was age structured: it typically paired a young man (the “lover”), perhaps in his twenties or early thirties, and an adolescent male (the “beloved”), usually in his late teens. Such a relationship ended, normatively, when the adolescent grew a full adult beard, around the age of twenty; as an adult, the young man would eventually marry and could, if so inclined, court boys in his own right. It was also around the age of twenty that a young man became eligible to serve in the army, so that being a beloved and being a member of the army ought generally to be mutually exclusive (Leitao 2014; Ogden 1996). If the Sacred Band was composed of pairs engaged in an ongoing sexual relationship, its members would be eligible for a rather brief time (unless Thebes was unusual in allowing adolescents to serve), and one wonders how effective an army with so transitory a membership could have been.

The possibility that the Theban fighters were pairs of young men whose relationship had ceased to be sexual is no less attractive. This is certainly the case of the Greek philosopher Socrates and the Athenian general Alcibiades, one of the most famous same-sex couples of antiquity: Plato makes it clear that this lover and beloved served together in battle (at Delium and Potidæa) after the sexual phase of their relationship had ended (and Plato insists, perhaps implausibly, that only Alcibiades, the beloved, felt sexual desire and that the relationship was never consummated). A postsexual phase of the relationship may also be the context in which to understand the mythical figures Achilles and Patroclus, fellow soldiers during the Trojan War, whose friendship in Homer was later reinterpreted as an explicitly pederastic relationship (Leitao 2014). Young warriors bound by love (if no longer by sex) would be no less motivated to fight bravely in the presence of each other.

Same-Sex Desire and Greek Armies

While the age protocols of Greek armies and of pederastic courtship mean that active sexual relationships would have been unusual, if not nonexistent, same-sex desire was nevertheless frequently felt in military life. There are stories of soldiers who kept young male captives (not necessarily soldiers themselves) for sexual pleasure, and of one Episthenes, who once assembled a battalion of young men distinguished for their beauty (Leitao 2014). This does not mean that Episthenes was involved sexually with any of these youths (even in the past); it points instead to the inevitability, in a society where pederastic relationships were tolerated and even valorized, that some boyish new recruits (ones still lacking a full beard) may have been attractive to other men in the unit.

Sometimes feelings of desire in military contexts were extended into utopian fantasy. In Plato’s Symposium, the character Phaedrus wonders “if we could somehow contrive to have a city or an army composed of lovers and their beloveds” (1967, 103; translation slightly adapted by David D. Leitao). And in the Republic, Socrates advocates that, in his ideal state, boys and adolescents would accompany the army to war and that soldiers who distinguish themselves in battle would be rewarded with the chance to kiss or be kissed by the young man of their choice \textit{(Plato 2013)}.

Controversies, Ancient and Modern

Phaedrus’s fantasy of an army or city of lovers in Plato’s \textit{Symposium} provokes an interesting response by Xenophon. The character Socrates in Xenophon’s own \textit{Symposium} alleges that Plato’s Pausanias (it was in fact Plato’s Phaedrus), in defense of those who wallow in lasciviousness, has said that the most valiant army would be one recruited of lovers and their beloveds.... He adduced as evidence in support of his position both the Thebans and Eleans, alleging that this was their policy. He said that though sharing common beds they nevertheless assigned to their beloveds places alongside themselves in the battle-line. But this is a false analogy: for such practices, though normal among them, with us are banned by the severest reprobation. My own view is that those who assign these posts in battle suggest thereby that they are suspicious that the objects of their love, if left by themselves, will not perform the duties of brave men.

\begin{quote}
\end{quote}

\textit{(1968, 627; TRANSLATION SLIGHTLY ADAPTED BY DAVID D. LEITAO)}

Xenophon’s Socrates is much more skeptical of the moral value of pederastic relationships, in the military and elsewhere, than Plato or his Socrates are. It is often forgotten that the institution of pederasty was not universally embraced in ancient Greece: it was often mocked, especially in democratic Athens, as an indulgence of the aristocracy (\textit{Hubbard 1998}), and even some members of the elite, including Xenophon, were uncomfortable with carnal expressions of same-sex desire. This debate over the social utility of same-sex desire, including in military contexts, is implicit in Philip II’s defensive praise, as reported by Plutarch (\textit{1917, 387}), of the fallen members of the Sacred Band at Chaeronea and his rebuke of those “who think that these men did or suffered anything disgraceful.”

To many scholars, the passages from the symposia of Plato and Xenophon are important in providing contemporary evidence for the existence of an erotically constituted Sacred Band of Thebes. It is curious that Plato does not locate Phaedrus’s fantasy in Thebes and that neither author refers to the Theban force by name. But this objection is not decisive: the dramatic date of both works was the late fifth-century BCE, while Socrates was still alive, and thus before the Sacred Band was even created, so it is possible that both authors wished to allude to an erotically constituted Sacred Band without committing the anachronism of mentioning it by name.

Perhaps more troubling is that apart from these two fourth-century texts, which present a fantasy of an army or city of lovers (Plato) and a criticism of this fantasy and the Theban evidence allegedly used to support it (Xenophon), the earliest explicit references to a Sacred Band composed of lovers and their beloveds are found in Plutarch’s biography of Pelopidas, written more than 400 years after the band was wiped out at Chaeronea; a handful of other sources for an erotic band are even later. All these texts are from what might be called “moralizing” genres of literature; the more properly historiographical texts that describe the exploits of the Sacred Band, some dating from as early as the fourth century BCE, say nothing of any erotic composition.

One is left with two interpretive options. The first is to embrace an impressionistic picture of an erotically constituted Sacred Band, even though this requires relying on texts of widely divergent periods and quality (Ogden 1996; Davidson 2007). The alternative is to suppose that an erotic Sacred Band was more of a fantasy, built on a combination of some kernels of truth (e.g., the existence of a nonerotic band of this name at Thebes, certain erotic traditions at Thebes) and the utopian philosophizing on the part of Plato and others within the Socratic circle, who sought to defend their aristocratic pederastic practices at a time when the democratic mob was more hostile to the pursuit of boys (Leitao 2002). Whatever one chooses to believe about the reality of the fourth century BCE, the later tradition of an erotic Sacred Band, from at least the first century CE on, was very real.

Reception

The practices, myths, and traditions from ancient Greek pederasty have been enormously influential on modern homophile and gay liberation movements from the later nineteenth century to the present, and the tradition of the Sacred Band of Thebes certainly played its role. In Victorian England, the erotic elements of the tradition were rediscovered, aided by the work of classical scholars, and the Sacred Band came to be taken up by homophile activists as historical evidence for the salutary effect of male erotic bonding on the social fabric. The criminologist and sexologist George Cecil Ives (1867–1950), in the 1890s, created the Order of Chaeronea, a homophile secret society inspired by the setting of the last stand of the Sacred Band in 338 BCE (Cook 2003). The socialist Edward Carpenter (1844–1929) featured the Sacred Band prominently in his Iolaus: An Anthology of Friendship (1902), whose title invokes the famous Theban beloved of Heracles. These British homophile activists may have been anticipated, in part, by the American poet Walt Whitman’s (1819–1892) “love of comrades,” which itself may owe inspiration to new awareness of the erotic tradition of the Sacred Band. In “When I Peruse the Conquer’d Fame,” one of the Calamus poems originally published in 1860, Whitman describes how unmoved he is by the “victories of mighty generals,” but that “when I hear of the brotherhood of lovers, ... I am ... fill’d with the bitterest envy." Given the martial context of this poem, it is difficult not to see an allusion to the Sacred Band of Thebes, which is in fact how the English critic John Addington Symonds (1840–1893), one of Whitman’s earliest commentators, interpreted this and other Whitman poems (Cook 2003). A similar embrace of the Sacred Band existed among homophile activists in Germany, beginning with the sexologist Karl Heinrich Ulrichs (1825–1895) in the late nineteenth century.

Only in the later twentieth century did the Sacred Band of Thebes play a role specifically in debates about integrating gays and lesbians in modern military forces and, more recently still, in debates about the rights of transgender people to serve. Modern reception of the ancient Sacred Band accurately captures one key element of the ancient tradition: its idealization. There is no awareness of the skepticism of some, such as Xenophon’s Socrates, about the value of carnal couples fighting together in battle, not to mention any concern about the nature of the existing historical sources for an erotic band. It preserves only the utopian vision of Plato and the later panegyric tradition of an erotic band of lovers and beloveds at Thebes.

SEE ALSO Classical Studies; The Order of Chaeronea; Sappho, Nineteenth-Century Rediscovery of

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Samoan Faʻafafine

JOHANNA M. SCHMIDT
Senior Lecturer
University of Waikato, New Zealand

Samoans who are biologically male but whose gendered behaviors are significantly more feminine than is normative for men in Samoan culture.

The Samoan word faʻafafine literally translates as “in the manner of” or “like” (fa’a) a woman (fafine; plural fāfine). Faʻafafine are Samoans who are biologically male but whose gendered behaviors are significantly more feminine than is usual for normatively gendered men in Samoa. Faʻafafine have been a constant presence within Samoan cultural history, and in contemporary times they exist in both American Samoa and the Independent State of Samoa, although the different histories and cultural contexts of each locale have led to some variances; this entry focuses on the Independent State of Samoa.

There are similar “feminine male” identities across the Pacific; while not a homogenous group, these identities have marked similarities, especially in comparison to trans populations in various non-Pacific cultures. Some analyses of transgender identities see them as a means of repositioning homosexuality within a more “heterosexual” framework by rendering men who are sexually attracted to other men “feminine.” However, faʻafafine femininity is not the result of preexistent “homosexuality” but develops in much the same way as normative femininity. In the traditional Samoan context, gender-specific labor is adopted by boys and girls at around the age of ten (Besnier 1993; Poasa 1992; Schmidt 2010). In line with the collective ideals of the culture, this marker of gender is about contributing labor for the good of the group (usually the extended family or village), rather than being based on individual attributes such as embodiment. Faʻafafine children generally evidence a preference for feminine labor at a similarly young age, and this is usually the first indication that they are not “boys.” Faʻafafine also have a feminine demeanor and tend to prefer the company of young women over young men (Hansen-Reid 2011; Schoeffel 2014). In Samoa unmarried adolescents are socially segregated on the basis of gender, but faʻafafine are accepted as appropriate companions for young unmarried women because they are not understood as “men.” The fact that, in traditional Samoan contexts, faʻafafine are not generally marked in terms of their appearance (but rather their behavior) may explain their relative invisibility in early accounts of Western contacts with Samoa (Feuʻu 2017).

Although faʻafafine’s femininity is not the result of a specific sexual orientation, it does have implications relating to sexuality in that faʻafafine are potential sexual partners for normatively masculine men (Schmidt 2017). Within traditional understandings of sexuality in Samoan culture, the notion of “homosexual” as either a category of person or a specific practice does not exist. Consequently, sexual relations between faʻafafine and masculine men have no impact on the identities of either party. Young, unmarried, masculine men often engage in sexual acts with each other, and these experiences similarly have no consequences for their identities (Bartlett and Vasey 2006; Keene 1978; Mageo 1992). Within Samoan culture, however, reproduction is highly valued and a marker of maturity, meaning that masculine Samoan men are unlikely to remain in relationships with faʻafafine, but that they eventually marry women and father children (Schmidt 2010). The prioritizing of family within Samoan culture has meant that, historically, it seems that some faʻafafine also married women and had children (Dolgoy 2000).

Globalization has meant that Western understandings of the relationship between gender and sexuality have become more common in Samoa and in diasporic Samoan communities. This has led to changes in the ways in which gender is enacted, especially by younger Samoans (Schmidt 2010). Normative femininity and masculinity are no longer understood as being primarily related to the contribution to the collective good, but have become more focused on the individual body and linked to sexuality (Schmidt 2010). For young Samoans, this has resulted in expressing gender in ways that are more sexualized, and this is also the case among faʻafafine, many of whom draw on Western beauty and/or erotic ideals to mark themselves as definitively “feminine.” This may be exacerbated by drawing on Western models of transgender, such as drag, especially among younger faʻafafine, although this is not universal and is often limited to contexts such as public performances or socializing in bars and clubs.

However, Samoans of older generations frown upon these sexualized expressions that focus attention on the individual. Concepts of homosexuality have also entered the Samoan cultural lexicon, bound up with a strong cultural affiliation with Christian religions that, for the most part, have eschewed same-sex sexual relations (Schmidt 2010). As there are no obviously “gay men” within traditional Samoan culture, faʻafafine have become targets of the homophobia that has accompanied the widespread adoption of various forms of Christianity, with some churches being more marked in this aspect than others. Many churches simultaneously accept the service of faʻafafine that is based on their feminine work and reject any overtly sexualized expressions of faʻafafine identity that they associate with “homosexuality.” Westernization and globalization have thus had some outcomes that faʻafafine experience as beneficial, but there is also an increased level of marginalization. In both contemporary Samoa and the diasporic context, this has resulted in faʻafafine developing a more political voice through such organizations as the Samoa Faʻafafine Association. This association engages in local events—such as beauty pageants that raise funds for the local rest home, reflecting the Samoan ideal of caring for the elderly—while also agitating for faʻafafine rights at a political level and thus echoing LGBTQIA+ politics. from overseas contexts (Dolgoy 2000; Schmidt 2010). Fa’afafine identities continue to shift in response to changes in their social environment but remain embedded in the foundation of Samoan culture.

SEE ALSO Pacific Island and Pacific Island Diaspora Identities

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Schoeffel, Penelope. “Representing Fa’afafine: Sex, Socialization, and Gender Identity in
The association of the ancient Greek poet with lesbian desire in the nineteenth century, with a particular focus on the Sappho-inspired work Long Ago by Michael Field.

The figure of Sappho signified multiple meanings to a nineteenth-century audience. For many, she was the greatest lyric poet and the ultimate embodiment of the “poetess”: a Romantic, lyre-strumming figure, immortalized in Madame de Staël’s influential novel Corinne (1807). Other “fictions of Sappho” (DeJean 1989) include the myth of Sappho’s suicide, derived from Ovid’s “Sappho to Phaon” in which Sappho takes the Leucadian leap as a result of unrequited love for the fisherman Phaon. This inspired many nineteenth-century women poets to compose their own “last songs,” with the implication that love and learning were, at least for women, mutually exclusive (Reynolds 2003). This story was also frequently represented in nineteenth-century visual culture, with painters such as Théodore Chassériau (Sappho Leaping into the Sea from the Leucadian Promontory [1840]) and Charles Mengin (Sappho [1877]) depicting Sappho poised despairingly on a cliff edge with her lyre in hand.

In the latter half of the nineteenth century Sappho became increasingly associated with female homoerotic desire. This is partly a result of her works becoming available in a faithful English translation that left the female addressees of her love lyrics intact: Henry Thornton Wharton’s Sappho: Memoir, Text, Selected Renderings, and a Literal Translation (1885). Wharton followed the German scholar Theodor Bergk (in his Latin translation Anthologia Lyrica [1854]) by reproducing the female pronouns of Sappho’s love poems. Prior to Wharton’s volume, only poets with strong classical abilities such as Charles Baudelaire and Algernon Charles Swinburne envisioned Sappho as a homoerotic figure, translating these visions into scandalizing poems such as “Lesbos” (Les Fleurs du mal, 1857) and “Anactoria” (Poems and Ballads, 1866). These erotic visions of Sappho also manifested in visual culture; for example, the Pre-Raphaelite artist (and friend of Swinburne) Simeon Solomon depicts Sappho and Erinna in a Garden at Mytilene (1864), while the lasting influence of Baudelaire on Félicien Rops is exhibited in his Sapho (c. 1890), an engraving of women engaged in cunnilingus. By the fin de siècle, the terms Sapphism and lesbianism, the latter derived from the name of the Greek island of Lesbos where Sappho lived, came to designate erotic love between women, gradually replacing the term tribadism, used during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries (Wahl 1999). These new terms appeared in the sexological works of the period; for example, in Psychopathia sexualis (first published in German in 1886), Richard von Krafft-Ebing wrote of "the mysteries of Lesbian love" (1900, 417), while The National Medical Dictionary in 1890 defined "Sapph'ism" as "the Lesbian love; the sensual desire of women for persons of their own sex" (491).

Lesbian Sappho was also an effect of the broader cultural climate of the fin de siècle, including factors such as female educational reform and Victorian Hellenism. During the 1870s and 1880s, women gained access to Greek and Latin texts at the new women’s colleges such as Girton and Newnham Hall at Cambridge and Bedford College in London. This formidable language of philosophy, law, science, and sex had long been a privileged male preserve (Hurst 2006). Reading such languages allowed women direct access to classical texts that openly discussed same-sex relations. This environment also provided a female-centered space that resembled Sappho’s supposed school for girls (Parker 1996), echoing the pedagogical model of male homoerotic relations propounded by Victorian scholars of ancient Greek culture such as John Addington Symonds (A Problem in Greek Ethics, 1883). Symonds himself translated Sappho’s “Hymn to Aphrodite,” which was published as an appendix to his Studies of the Greek Poets (1877). His translations of sixteen fragments from Sappho were also included in Wharton’s pivotal volume, along with other “selected renderings.”

Wharton’s volume had a huge influence on one poet in particular. Katharine Bradley was among the first women to study at Newnham College, Cambridge. She later formed a lifelong collaborative and romantic partnership with her niece Edith Cooper, writing together under the pseudonym “Michael Field.” The publication of Michael Field’s volume of lyrics inspired by Sappho, titled Long Ago (1889), marks a key moment in Sappho’s reception. Long Ago opens with a preface explaining the “audacious” idea behind its genesis: “When, more than a year ago, I wrote to a literary friend of my attempt to express in English verse the passionate pleasure Dr. Wharton’s book had brought to me, he replied: ‘That is a delightfully audacious thought—the extension of Sappho’s fragments into lyrics’” (Field 1889, n.p.).
By the latter half of the nineteenth century, Sappho became increasingly associated with female homoerotic desire.

Long Ago is a complex, influential response to Wharton’s volume. Michael Field insert their lyrical poems into the “gaps” in Wharton's text. Far from lamenting the incompleteness of the fragments of Sappho’s poetry offered by Wharton, Bradley and Cooper imagine the possibilities of what is left unsaid. Wharton’s presentation of the fragments, with the Greek text juxtaposed with the English translation, followed by selected “renderings” from other poets, creates a space for Bradley and Cooper to inscribe their own version of Sappho. Yopie Prins refers to this space of possibility and inspiration as a metaphorical “field” that enables their collaboration to take place (1999).

The sixty-eight poems in Long Ago (not counting the unnumbered first and last poems) portray Sappho as a complex, multifaceted figure. Poem 1 introduces the idyllic world of Sappho and her maidens, plaiting garlands and learning “Love's golden mysteries / Of young Apollo” (Field 1889, n.p.). The volume is structured around Sappho’s shifting, ambisexual desires: for her maidens Erinna, Mnasdica, Gorgo, Dica, Atthis, Anactoria (all named in the original fragments); for mortal men Phaon and Alcaeus; and for deities such as Apollo, Aphrodite, and Eros. Michael Field use the natural spaces of Sappho’s island home to forge their own sensuous aesthetic, incorporating imagery of flowers, plants, fertile grottoes, and the seashore to reflect the harmonious pleasures of Sappho and her maidens. Virginity recurs as a central theme throughout, with Sappho praising the self-sufficiency that enables her creativity to flourish.
The diversity of Long Ago’s range of subjects, its desires mingling the hetero- and homoerotic, is echoed in its complex multivocality. In an act of ventriloquism, several of the poems are “spoken” by Sappho in the first person, while others are narrated by a distant yet intimate speaker who repeats Sappho’s words. In several poems, there is slippage between the voice of the speaker and the voice of Sappho, as the two merge—recalling Sappho’s own famous “Ode to Aphrodite” in which the goddess addresses the speaker in the final stanza, asking “Who, O Sappho, is wronging you?” (Sappho 2003, 3). This intermingling of voices echoes Bradley and Cooper’s own collaboration, which they would continue to develop in their later volumes, publishing well into the twentieth century.

Though Michael Field conclude their volume with Sappho’s desperate leap, their version of Sappho’s sexuality radically revises the heterosexual narrative that cast her as the tragic lover of Phaon. Their poems proved inspiring to the next generation of women poets who sought to create their own visions of Sappho, including the decadent poet Renée Vivien and the American imagists H. D. and Amy Lowell.

SEE ALSO Aestheticism and Decadence, Nineteenth-Century; Boston Marriage and Women’s Romantic Friendships; Classical Studies; The Order of Chaeronea

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Scandals in Europe

GEOFFREY J. GILES
Emeritus Associate Professor, Department of History
University of Florida, Gainesville

Major scandals involving same-sex relationships within European government in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries.

Alleged homosexual behavior has long been used as an excuse for political retribution, accompanied by the shocking implication that homosexuals always engaged in the most abominable of sins: anal intercourse. In England, the Buggery Act of 1533 required proof of actual penetration for a conviction on the grounds of homosexual activity, which was not easy. However, as the unsettling issue of homosexual identity was emerging toward the end of the nineteenth century, the Criminal Law Amendment Act of 1885 permitted prosecution for the much vaguer term of "gross indecency." It was under this law that the famous Irish writer Oscar Wilde (1854–1900) was convicted in 1895. Widely reported in the popular press, this represented the most significant sexual scandal of the Victorian age. The seduction of supposedly innocent and naive young men played a central role in the homophobic typecasting of the homosexual (Foldy 1997).

Same-sex relationships were neither uncommon nor taboo among the upper-class elites of Europe, but any perceived influence on a person in government by a homosexual paramour was viewed with suspicion and resentment. Thus, it was not so much the barely concealed crush of King Charles I of Württemberg (1823–1891) for the American Charles Woodcock (1850–1923) in 1883 that caused offense, but the way in which the latter began to exercise a decisive influence over matters of state. The prime minister forced Woodcock's removal, and the king found a new boyfriend in the court theater (Dvorek 1988). Interference in state affairs was also what prompted the German journalist Maximilian Harden (1861–1927) to pursue his relentless campaign against the homosexual coterie around Wilhelm II (1859–1941), the German kaiser. Harden was not homophobic, and his magazine, Die Zukunft, published articles favoring the decriminalization of homosexual offenses (under Paragraph 175 of the German penal code). Yet he was the main protagonist in a series of sensational libel trials between 1907 and 1909, in which witnesses were found who claimed to have been seduced into having sex with Philipp, Prince of Eulenburg (1847–1921), the closest friend and adviser of the kaiser. Other members of this inner circle were tarnished as well, and Eulenburg, though never found guilty, was a broken man, wheeled into court on a stretcher. The picture drawn in the press of the privileged, wealthy elite taking advantage of poor young men strengthened the image of the homosexual as relentless seducer (Winzen 2010).

The Homosexual as Predator or Pansy

The German leader Adolf Hitler (1889–1945) chose to suppress his distaste about the private life of the talented chief of his Nazi storm troopers, Ernst Röhm (1887–1934). But the latter’s proclivities became embarrassingly public when political opponents published letters, written a few years earlier from Bolivia, in which Röhm pined for the gay bathhouses in Berlin and requested nude photographs of men. He was too effective a leader of the Nazi paramilitary wing to be dismissed during the bitter election campaigns of the Weimar Republic. In June 1934, however, Hitler succumbed to pressure from the army to remove his loyal associate. He used the Night of the Long Knives to have some 200 other alleged enemies murdered, along with Röhm. This was a purely political move on his part, but for the public Hitler stamped Röhm with the well-tried trope of a sexual predator, claiming that it was necessary to make the Hitler Youth a safe place for mothers to send their sons. The bloodbath reverberated throughout the world's press, but in Britain Hitler won praise for cleaning up his party and removing the thugs, with less attention paid to Röhm’s sexuality (Gritschneder 1993; Evans 2005).
homosexual assaults on young men. Though never found guilty, he was so broken by the scandal that he had to be wheeled into the court on a stretcher. The affair made headline news worldwide, from this French newspaper to the New York Times.

The swashbuckling Röhm, his face disfigured with battle scars from World War I (1914–1918), could never be accused of effeminacy. But Britain in the 1930s saw a number of what the press called “pansy cases.” A 1932 police raid on a Holland Park ballroom in London netted some sixty people, mostly men in drag. The Daily Mail stoked prejudices by referring to the “revolting, foul and foetid particulars” and describing the defendants' hysterical demeanor in court, weeping and fainting just like women (Houlbrook 2002, 32).

An 1898 scandal in Cádiz, Spain, centered on male prostitutes catering to other men. Homosexual relations were not explicitly banned in Spain but were sometimes prosecuted under indecency laws. There were fears that the Cádiz brothel might reflect badly on Spain's international reputation, but the focus of reporting in the press lay less on sexual perversion than on the effeminacy of these male sex workers (Cleminson, Fernández, and Vázquez García 2014).

Despite a certain pragmatic tolerance for same-sex activity among the military, there was a growing perception of actual homosexuals as cowards. Immediately after the evacuation of British soldiers from Dunkirk in 1940 during World War II (1939–1945), a British newspaper published an article titled “Pacifists and Pansies” implying that homosexuals were pacifists and vice versa, and that they were not only unpatriotic but damaging to the war effort (Vickers 2013). The homosocial isolation of frontline duty caused senior officers everywhere to turn a blind eye to a certain amount of stress-relieving homoerotic and even sexual activity in the ranks. German and British military records reveal that most court-martial cases involving homosexual offenses focused on an abuse of rank, where a noncommissioned officer had assaulted a private soldier (Giles 2005; Vickers 2013).

Blackmail and Treason

Pulling rank in terms of class was a major issue in scandals of the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. But the real problem, according to the Berlin police chief, was blackmail. His main target, therefore, was not the otherwise respected men who had engaged in same-sex flings but the young male prostitutes who were fleecing them, and not infrequently driving them to suicide (Tresckow 1922). As long as homosexual acts remained illegal, blackmail was a concern in diplomatic circles. The fear that homosexually inclined men with access to sensitive state papers could be pressured to reveal them to other countries seemed to be confirmed in 1913 when the Austrian colonel Alfred Redl (1864–1913) was found to be passing military secrets to the Russians (Spector 2007). During World War II and into the early 1950s, the graduates of Cambridge University known as the Cambridge Five, who passed top-secret information to the Soviets and recruited other spies, reinforced a perception that homosexuals were untrustworthy (Hamrick 2004). In the case of Jeremy Thorpe (1929–2014), the Liberal Party leader in Britain, his downfall in the 1970s was caused not so much by the affairs he had engaged in with other men as the allegation that he had tried to have one partner murdered in order to save his reputation. In the public’s view, here was another example of the depths to which a homosexual would apparently stoop (Preston 2016).

The sensational conviction of Lord Montagu of Beaulieu (1926–2015) and two friends for sexual offenses in 1954 quickly led to a parliamentary inquiry into the justification of the law, as a result of which the Wolfenden Report recommended the legalization of homosexual acts between consenting adults (Montagu 2000; Lewis 2016). The decriminalization of homosexual offenses in most European countries has led to fewer scandals, but the homophobia fueled by these tropes lives on.

Lesbian Scandals

There are two reasons for the relative absence of scandals involving lesbians: their exclusion from mainstream public affairs posed a lesser threat to the stability of society; and the more open and physical expression of affection by women made it difficult to identify actual lesbians. No one seems to have raised an eyebrow when, upon the death of the archbishop of Canterbury in 1896, his widow, Mary “Minnie” Benson (c. 1841–1918), promptly invited into her bed every night for the next two decades the daughter of the previous archbishop of Canterbury (Goldhill 2016). Lesbian couples were certainly active in the campaigns for women’s emancipation that began around the end of the nineteenth century, but it was their politics more than their sexuality that made them targets. In Germany in 1905, the activist Anna Rühling (1880–1953) was the only woman to publicly describe herself as a lesbian. Otherwise, even current scholars admit that “we can only speculate about the nature of these relationships” (Pieper 1984, 117; translated by Geoffrey J. Giles). Even the exchange of passionate-sounding letters is inconclusive, given the florid conventions of the times. A famous pioneer of women’s rights, Marie Stopes (1880–1958), remained adamant that lesbian “aberrations” were no substitute for heterosexual relations (Dijkstra 1996). The best-known scandal came about through the dogged insistence of a British journalist, James Douglas, in 1928 to bring charges against Radclyffe Hall (1880–1943) for publishing an obscene novel, The Well of Loneliness. Although the book was compassionate rather than sexually explicit, the courts ruled in two trials that all copies should be withdrawn. The involvement and support of many prominent intellectuals gave the case notoriety, and Hall the status of a heroine in lesbian circles that has endured to the present day (Dellamora 2011).

SEE ALSO Blackmail; Rühling, Anna (1880–1953); Treason and Queerness; The Well of Loneliness (1928; Radclyffe Hall); Wilde Trials, International Significance of

BIBLIOGRAPHY

...

Lewis, Brian. Wolfenden's Witnesses: Homosexuality in Postwar Britain. Basingstoke, UK:

Since its inception in the early twentieth century, Scouting has exhibited two conflicting impulses. The first is inclusive, committed to spreading Scouting to all youth; the second is exclusive, vigilant in policing the boundaries separating virtuous members from a morally suspect society. In Scouting for Boys, the movement’s foundational treatise, first published in 1908, Robert Baden-Powell (1857–1941) envisioned a movement that would include all of Britain’s youth, particularly the lower classes who were in danger of becoming “hooligans” and “wasters” (Baden-Powell 2004, 299). The aim of the Boy Scouts, Baden-Powell explained, was to “pass as many boys through our character factory as we possibly can” (quoted in Rosenthal 1986, 6) so as to produce the self-disciplined and robust men needed to sustain a proud empire. Initially, Scouting was aimed at boys between the ages of eleven and fifteen, but Baden-Powell rapidly expanded the movement’s scope to include younger boys (Cubbing began in 1916), as well as girls (the Girl Guides date from 1910). And he delighted in Scouting’s remarkable diffusion across the globe, including to the United States, where the Boy Scouts of America (BSA) was incorporated in 1910. Today, Scouting counts around 30 million members in some 200 countries.

Inclusivity did not mean an embrace of diversity. Baden-Powell’s aspiration to spread Scouting to “the whole of our youth” (2004, 299) stemmed from his profound unease with difference and an insistence on social control and obedience. “We are very like bricks in a wall,” he wrote in the 1912 Handbook for Girl Guides (quoted in Rosenthal 1986, 285), and the purpose of Scouting’s character factory was to prevent “rotten bricks” (10) from bringing down the wall. Baden-Powell’s profound confidence in Scouting’s capacity to manufacture sturdy, reliable bricks out of disparate materials coexisted with a deep anxiety about the rotten bricks, the “indifferent citizens,” the Socialist “faddists,” and the thousands of “pale, narrow-chested, hunched-up, miserable specimens” who did not measure up to his masculine ideal (2004, 297–298).

Baden-Powell’s aspiration may have been to make Scouting “a mass movement with no barriers to membership” (quoted in Rosenthal 1986, 6), but inherent in Scouting’s strongly prescriptive code of conduct was a warrant to exclude those who were unable or unwilling to live by Scouting's precepts or who threatened the group's identity. Atheists, for instance, have often been excluded from Scouting because they cannot promise to "do my duty to God," as required by the Scout Oath, penned by Baden-Powell. Scouting has been particularly unwelcoming to nonbelievers in the United States, where since 1911 the BSA Scout Law has included the requirement that a Scout be “reverent toward God” and “faithful in his religious duties.” Even in the less religious United Kingdom, it was not until 2014 that the Scout Association provided nonreligious boys the option of an alternative Scout Promise “to uphold our Scout values”; the year before, the Girl Guides had gone much further in dropping the promise “to love my God” in favor of having all girls pledge “to be true to myself and develop my beliefs.” Scouting also has a complex history of racial exclusion and segregation, particularly in British colonies, where Scouting was initially restricted to whites through a British nationality requirement (see, e.g., Kua 2011), but also in the United States, especially in the South (Macleod 1983).

The most controversial exclusion in contemporary Scouting has involved LGBTQ youth and adult leaders in the BSA, which after more than three decades of legal battles and cultural contestation finally lifted its ban on gay youth in 2013 and on gay Scout leaders in 2015, almost two decades after the UK-based Scout Association first announced, in 1997, that it would accept gay Scout leaders. During the first sixty years of its existence, the BSA, like other Scouting organizations across the globe, had no official policy about sexual orientation. The lack of such a policy did not mean that the BSA (or Scouting in other parts of the world) was accepting of homosexuality. Instead, it signified that the powerful social stigma against homosexuality backed by the criminalization of same-sex relations enabled the national organization to avoid having to address the question of whether to exclude gay and bisexual youth and adults. Only as individual Scouts became open about their sexuality, backed by the prospect of lawsuits and adverse media publicity, did the BSA feel compelled to formulate an explicit policy about homosexuality.

The earliest known documents in which the BSA expressed a view on the incompatibility of homosexuality and Scouting were written in 1978 in response to an incident in which two Scouts, aged seventeen and sixteen, were kicked out of a Scouting group because of their homosexuality. The first notable legal challenge to the Scouts' policy of excluding “avowed or known homosexuals” (Ellis 2014, 41) was lodged by Eagle Scout Tim Curran, whose application to be an assistant scoutmaster in a local council was rejected in 1980 when the BSA learned of a recent news story showing the eighteen-year-old Curran holding hands with a male high school prom date. The resulting court case, which did not go to trial until 1990, hinged on the question of whether applying California's civil rights laws to the Boy Scouts violated the Scouts' constitutional rights of expressive association. Pressed to defend their discriminatory policy in court, the BSA insisted that the Boy Scout Oath, specifically the promise to be “morally straight,” as well as the Scout Law's commandment to keep “his body and mind fit and clean,” demonstrated that homosexuality was incompatible with Scouting’s core identity (Ellis 2014, 42).

There is scant evidence that either “clean” or “morally straight” had ever been understood as referring to homosexuality. The many editions of the BSA’s handbook never explained the term morally straight in terms of sexuality. Instead, the BSA taught that it meant being a person of strong character who is “honest and open” about his relationships and who respects and defends “the rights of all people” (BSA 1990, 551). The directive to be “clean” derived from language (“clean in thought, word and deed”) that Baden-Powell added to the Scout Law in 1911, but while Baden-Powell clearly had sexuality in mind, he had in mind not homosexuality but the temptations of masturbation and “dirty” women (Jeal 1989). “Decent Scouts,” he explained, “look down upon silly youths who talk dirt, and they do not let themselves give way to temptation, either to talk it or to do anything dirty” (Baden-Powell 2004, 351–352). Moreover, whatever Baden-Powell’s original understanding of the term clean, the BSA could point to nothing in its own voluminous literature that linked cleanliness to homosexuality.

© ALEX WONG/NEWSMAKERS/GETTY IMAGES
Former Eagle Scout James Dale outside the US Supreme Court, 2000. The Boy Scouts dismissed Dale as a scoutmaster after learning he was gay, claiming that his homosexuality was inconsistent with the values they were trying to instill in young people. The US Supreme Court upheld their right to dismiss Dale in Boy Scouts of America vs. James Dale (2000).
Ultimately, though, courts in the United States were hesitant to second-guess the BSA leadership’s interpretations of its precepts. In the landmark case of Boy Scouts of America v. James Dale (2000), which stemmed from the dismissal of a nineteen-year-old assistant scoutmaster, the US Supreme Court settled the constitutional question, ruling that the First Amendment gave the BSA a fundamental constitutional right to exclude on the basis of sexual orientation because being compelled to include “avowed homosexuals” would undermine its moral teachings.

The BSA’s efforts to justify its discriminatory policy in courts across the nation had pushed its leadership, beginning in the 1990s, to define itself publicly—and become defined in the public mind—not as an inclusive organization open to all boys but as an organization dedicated to serving particular kinds of families who believed in “traditional family values” (Ellis 2014, 48). At the very historical moment that Scouting organizations in much of the rest of the world, as well the Girl Scouts of the USA (GSUSA)—which as early as 1991 issued a statement that explicitly rejected “sexual preference” as a membership criterion—were taking constructive steps to include gay and lesbian youth, the BSA became ever more deeply entwined in the “culture wars” that Republican social conservatives were waging against gay rights. A marker of the growing divergence between the BSA and most of the rest of the Scouting world was that in 1999, while the BSA honed its legal case to exclude individuals based on their sexual orientation, Scouts Canada welcomed the formation of the first entirely gay and lesbian Scout troop.

Although the US Supreme Court’s ruling in Dale vindicated the BSA’s constitutional right to exclude, it brought the BSA no respite from controversy over its exclusionary policy. Nonprofits, granting agencies, and private businesses came under mounting pressure from advocacy groups to withdraw funding from an organization that unapologetically discriminated on the basis of sexual orientation. Public entities, including schools, cities, and the military, which had long sponsored Scouting units or provided free (or virtually free) access to public property, began severing their long-standing ties to Scouting. The result was to make the BSA ever more reliant on conservative religious institutions, especially the Mormon Church. At the time that James Dale was kicked out of Scouting in 1990, about half of Scout troops were chartered by religious organizations, but two decades later seven in ten Scout troops were chartered by religious organizations, and the Mormon Church alone sponsored one-third of all Cub Scout packs and Boy Scout troops. In contrast, in the United Kingdom, for instance, only about one in ten Scout troops are sponsored by religious organizations. Between 2000 and 2012, while the BSA experienced a more than 20 percent drop in membership, membership in Mormon-sponsored packs and troops remained robust, largely because every Mormon boy, at the age of eight, was enrolled in the Cub Scouts, and every Mormon congregation (or ward) had its own Cub Scout pack and Boy Scout troop. The BSA’s reliance on socially conservative religious groups, especially the Mormon Church, the BSA’s single most important stakeholder, explained much of the divergence between the BSA and Scouting in the rest of the developed world.

After Dale, the BSA's national executives found themselves in an increasingly untenable position, caught between the socially conservative attitudes of much of its membership and leadership and the rapidly evolving attitudes about homosexuality. Public pressure on the BSA intensified in the summer of 2012 after the formation of Scouts for Equality (SFE) and the decision of GLAAD (formerly the Gay and Lesbian Alliance against Defamation) to enlist its public relations professionals in the battle to end the BSA's discriminatory policy. SFE focused on persuading corporate donors to withdraw support from the BSA, a campaign that was stunningly successful, in part because SFE found a receptive audience in the many corporate boardrooms that had come to pride themselves on their inclusivity toward lesbian, gay, bisexual, and transgender employees.

The loss of financial support from major donors such as Intel Corporation and the prospect of more corporations and foundations following suit alarmed the BSA national office and strengthened the hand of those within the organization who were pressing for change. In May 2013, less than a year after having publicly reaffirmed its ban on “open or avowed homosexuals” as “absolutely the best policy” (quoted in Ellis 2014, 233), the BSA reversed course, lifting the ban on gay youth. The change was hailed by gay rights groups, but the new policy also earned the grudging support of the Mormon Church because the language of the new policy drew a clear distinction between sexual conduct and sexual orientation that dovetailed with the church’s teaching that “the attraction itself is not a sin, but acting on it is.” While the new BSA policy affirmed that no youth could be denied membership “on the basis of sexual orientation or preference alone,” it also stated that “any sexual conduct, whether homosexual or heterosexual, by youth of Scouting age is contrary to the virtues of Scouting” (quoted in Ellis 2014, 252–253). Thus, homosexual conduct remained grounds for terminating Scouting youth. And, crucially, the new policy left in place the ban on homosexual adult Scout leaders.

The compromise was enough to secure a majority vote by the BSA National Council, but it was not a sustainable policy. The tipping point had been reached, and in July 2015 the BSA finally lifted its ban on homosexual adult leaders. Eighteen months later, in January 2017, the BSA announced that it would allow transgender youth to enroll in the Boy Scouts, following a trail the Girl Scouts had blazed in 2011 when they welcomed a seven-year-old transgender child, Bobby Montoya, into a Colorado Girl Scout troop. Some LGBTQ advocates criticized the BSA policy changes for not going far enough, first because they permit local Scouting units to select adult leaders without regard to sexual orientation but do not prohibit a troop from proscribing an individual on the basis of sexual orientation and, second, because they allow religiously chartered Scout programs to opt out based on their religious beliefs.

Notwithstanding these religious exemptions and the generous space provided for local autonomy, these policy changes alienated many religious conservatives, who argued that by sending a message of inclusion toward LGBTQ populations the BSA’s national office had taken sides in “a gender-theory culture war” and thereby undermined the organization’s heteronormative purpose (Smith 2017). Similarly, the Girl Scouts’ inclusion of transgender youth “on a case-by-case basis” drew sharp criticism from Christian conservative groups such as the American Family Association, which called on the Girl Scouts to stop “using young boys as pawns in the culture war” (quoted in Bolton 2015). Some religious conservatives responded by withdrawing from Scouting and gravitating toward faith-based quasi-Scouting organizations. The GSUSA’s greater inclusivity spurred the creation and growth of American Heritage Girls (AHG), which promotes what it considers to be a more “traditional” Scouting movement that “embraces Christian values.” Likewise, the BSA’s 2013 decision to open its doors to gay youth prompted the creation of Trail Life USA (TLUSA), an “unapologetically Christian” alternative to the BSA that vowed not to admit boys “who are open or avowed about their homosexuality” or “who wish to dress and act like girls” (quoted in Payne 2013). The membership of these faith-based Scouting groups remains tiny: the number of girls in AHG is about 2 percent of the 1.8 million girls in GSUSA, and the number of boys in the TLUSA is only about 1 percent of the number of boys in the BSA. Of much greater significance was the Mormon Church’s decision, announced in 2018, to entirely sever its relationship with Scouting.

The BSA’s decisions between 2013 and 2017 to accept gay and transgender youth—followed by its decision in 2018 to admit girls (and to change the name of its flagship program from the Boy Scouts to Scouts BSA)—contributed to a belated convergence between Scouting in the United States and in other advanced industrial societies. But just as the BSA national office struggled for decades to accommodate and reconcile the sharply divergent views among the roughly 270 local councils in different regions of the United States, especially the very different ideas about LGBTQ rights among Scouting councils in more conservative southern states and those in more liberal states in the Northeast and on the West Coast, so the World Organization of the Scout Movement (WOSM) has struggled to legislate a position on LGBTQ inclusion that is acceptable to, let alone binding on, the many countries that are part of the diverse global Scouting movement, particularly those Scouting units that operate in one of the almost seventy-five countries in which LGBTQ relations are still illegal. So long as Scouting aspires to shape the minds and bodies of young people, Scouting will remain a key locus of contestation about social relations and cultural biases.

The inclusive cast of contemporary Scouting in North America and Europe—so well reflected in the “Scouting without barriers” campaign launched in 2016 by the European Scout Region of the WOSM—faithfully embodies Baden-Powell’s original aspiration to include “the whole of our youth” in Scouting. However, the strong dissents from LGBTQ-inclusive policies in the United States and other parts of the world, as well as the proliferation of alternative, faith-based Scouting organizations and the steady decline in Scouting membership over the last several decades, suggest that fully realizing that inclusive aspiration is as challenging for Scouting today as it was for Baden-Powell more than a century ago.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Smith, Mitch. “Conservatives Alienated by Boy Scouts' Shift on Transgender Policy.” *New
The history of, and efforts to overturn, British colonial penal codes against same-sex sexual activity in both Britain and its former colonial holdings.

Throughout the nineteenth century, England established antisodomy statutes throughout its colonial holdings around the world. Same-sex sexual activity was criminalized under two main provisions of British colonial law: carnal intercourse and gross indecency. Carnal intercourse pertained to anal penetration and oral sex but did not specifically target same-sex relations. It included heterosexual relations and bestiality but did not cover sexual activity between women. Gross indecency, by contrast, specifically targeted same-sex sexual activity between men.

The legacy of British colonial laws criminalizing same-sex sexual activity continues to have global consequences in the present day. Despite a global trend since the 1960s to decriminalize same-sex activity, and long after it was largely decriminalized in England with the Sexual Offences Act of 1967, antisodomy prohibitions remain intact in the majority of the former British colonies, even after independence.

Historical Background

Though a part of ecclesiastical law for centuries, the criminalization of same-sex sexual relations was codified into English secular law with the Buggery Act of 1533, as part of King Henry VIII’s (r. 1509–1547) break with the Roman Catholic Church. Under that law, the “abominable vice of buggery” applied to all forms of anal penetration with woman, man, or beast and was punishable by death (25 Hen. 8, c. 6 [1533]). Though briefly repealed in 1547 and restored to Roman Catholic ecclesiastical jurisdiction during the reign of Mary I (r. 1553–1558), the antisodomy law was reenacted in 1562 during the reign of Elizabeth I (r. 1558–1603). The law in this form became the foundation of the colonial laws prohibiting same-sex sexual relations. In England, the Buggery Act was replaced by the Offences Against the Person Act of 1828, which still criminalized sodomy as an offense punishable by death. It remained a capital offense until the enactment of the Offences Against the Person Act of 1861, which reduced sodomy to an offense punishable by imprisonment.
Carnal Intercourse and Section 377 of the Indian Penal Code

British colonial authorities drafted legislation with the intention of protecting the European Christian morality of the colonizer population from presumed sexual corruption from the colonized populations, as well as exercising colonial control over the sexual behavior of the colonized populations. As miscegenation with natives became a growing concern in the colonies during the nineteenth century, authorities and the media demonized the colonized populations as threats to the health and virtue of white settler families. Thus, the British colonial government imported Victorian norms regarding sexuality into the colonies. The settler population needed to be protected from contamination by foreign cultures both racially and morally, which became the justification for colonial regulation and control. In this respect, British regulation of the colonized populations’ sexuality advanced the enterprise of empire, where conquest and domination was rationalized as bringing British enlightenment to those the British deemed to be savage populations (Whitehead 1995; Levine 2007).

For example, the Cantonment Act of 1864 and the Contagious Diseases Act of 1868 criminalized prostitution in order to protect British soldiers stationed in the colonies from venereal disease. Under these laws, though it was often British troops and personnel of the colonial administration who frequented brothels, they never became the object of scrutiny and regulation. Instead, it was the native prostitute who remained subject to surveillance and discipline, just as similar laws disciplined the bodies of prostitutes in garrison towns back in Britain.

The British colonial government also deployed antisodomy statutes to regulate the native population. The first antisodomy law used in the colonies was designed by Mountstuart Elphinstone (1779–1859) in 1827 as part of his governance of Bombay (Asal and Sommer 2016). Later, Thomas Babington Macaulay (1800–1859) and the Law Commission of India were tasked with drafting a penal code for India as the first comprehensive criminal code designed for mass implementation in the colonies. The resulting Indian Penal Code of 1860 incorporated and adapted the British Buggery Act as Section 377, which read:

Whoever voluntarily has carnal intercourse against the order of nature with any man, woman, or animal shall be punished with imprisonment for life, or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall be liable to fine.

Explanation—Penetration is sufficient to constitute the carnal intercourse necessary to the offence described in this section.
“Carnal intercourse against the order of nature” originally meant anal intercourse but was expanded through judicial decisions to include oral sex, attempts, conspiracies, and solicitation (Khanu v. Emperor, AIR 1925 High Court of Sind 286). However, Section 377 was deemed to require penetrative, nonvaginal sex. On its face, Section 377 did not differentiate between the gender of the perpetrators. Thus, the law could be applied to same-sex sexual activity between men or opposite-sex nonvaginal sexual activity between men and women. Because Section 377 required penetration, however, same-sex sexual relations between women could not be prosecuted because women lacked penises. Families who disapproved of lesbian relationships, however, would make criminal kidnapping reports to prevent their daughters from entering into relationships. With respect to same-sex male offenders, Section 377 equated same-sex sexual activity to violent sexual offenses, which applied regardless of consent or the age of the participants. Even if a victim claimed to have consented to the action, the act was regarded as a crime against public safety and welfare.

English colonies that inherited a form of Section 377 include Australia, Bangladesh, Bhutan, Botswana, Brunei, Fiji, the Gambia, Ghana, Hong Kong, India, Kenya, Kiribati, Lesotho, Malawi, Malaysia, Maldives, Marshall Islands, Mauritius, Myanmar (Burma), Nauru, New Zealand, Nigeria, Pakistan, Papua New Guinea, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Solomon Islands, Somalia, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Swaziland, Tanzania, Tonga, Tuvalu, Uganda, Western Samoa, Zambia, and Zimbabwe. Although parts of South Africa fell under British colonial control as early as 1806, it retained an antisodomy statute inherited from Dutch rule, even though English common law also increasingly applied. Other parts of the British Empire, including the Caribbean and the Americas, directly imported versions of the Buggery Act of 1533 or the Offences Against the Person Act of 1861, which was enacted in England a year after the Indian Penal Code.

Gross Indecency and Expansions of Colonial Antisodomy Laws

In 1885 Henry Labouchère (1831–1912), a member of the British Parliament, introduced legislation to expand the antisodomy law to include the charge of gross indecency, largely to prosecute cases where there was no witness to the sexual act. The Labouchère Amendment provided the following:

> Any male person who, in public or private, commits, or is a party to the commission of, or procures or attempts to procure the commission by any male person of, any act of gross indecency with another male person, shall be guilty of a misdemeanour, and being convicted thereof shall be liable at the discretion of the court to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour.

(CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT ACT, 1885, 48 & 49 VICT., C. 69, SEC. 11)

The Labouchère Amendment expanded the law so that both individuals caught in the act of sodomy, including the “passive” partner, were guilty of the crime. The amendment also extended the scope of enforcement to make it easier to prosecute private actions, including those that did not involve penetration. The amendment introduced the new term gross indecency to describe relations short of penetration and was dubbed the “blackmailer’s charter” because a conviction could be obtained based on testimony alone. The Irish writer Oscar Wilde (1854–1900) is perhaps the most famous figure prosecuted under the Labouchère Amendment.

The Labouchère Amendment was also expanded into the colonies. It was integrated into Sudan’s version of Section 377 in 1899 and was introduced as an amendment to the existing Section 377 provisions in Malaysia and Singapore in 1938. Also in 1938, Section 377 of the Singapore Penal Code was bifurcated into Section 377, which pertained to heterosexual sexual activity, and Section 377A, which specifically pertained to same-sex sexual activity. Section 377A read as follows:

Any male person who, in public or private, commits, or abets the commission of, or procures or attempts to procure the commission by any male person of, any act of gross indecency with another male person, shall be punished with imprisonment for a term which may extend to two years.

The Labouchère Amendment also became the basis of a more expansive provision included in the Queensland Penal Code of 1901, which was drafted by Samuel Walker Griffith (1845–1920) for Australia in 1899 and became another model code during the British colonial expansion. The antisodomy provision of the Queensland Penal Code was contained in Section 208, which provided as follows:

Any person who—

1. Has carnal knowledge of any person against the order of nature; or
2. Has carnal knowledge of an animal; or Consistent with the Labouchère Amendment, the Queensland Penal Code punished both the active and passive partners in the act of sodomy. It also criminalized attempts, which broadened the scope of behaviors and sexual contact that could be prosecuted under the law. The Queensland Penal Code was adopted in Papua New Guinea and Nigeria and subsequently was used as a model to replace the Indian Penal Code in Kenya, Uganda, and Tanzania. Other African nations that retain characteristics copied from the Queensland Penal Code include Botswana, the Gambia, Malawi, Seychelles, and Zambia.

Decriminalization

In 1954 David Maxwell Fyfe (1900–1967), the British home secretary, commissioned the Departmental Committee on Homosexual Offences and Prostitution to reevaluate the continued existence of the sodomy statute. In 1957 the committee published the Wolfenden Report, which concluded that the criminalization of homosexual behavior in private between consenting adults was an infringement on civil liberty and “should no longer be a criminal offence” (Home Office and Scottish Home Department 1957, 24). At the time, however, the cabinet opposed implementation of these recommendations. A decade later, the Sexual Offences Act of 1967 decriminalized sexual conduct in private between consenting male adults above the age of twenty-one. This change applied first to England and Wales, followed by Scotland in 1980 and Northern Ireland in 1982. However, by the time homosexuality was decriminalized in England, many of the former colonies had gained independence, often with the colonial sodomy laws still intact. Most former colonies that had adopted a version of Section 377 and the Labouchère Amendment have retained their antisodomy statutes. Australia, New Zealand, Hong Kong, and Fiji had removed antisodomy provisions from their criminal statutes as of 2017.

Australia Decriminalization of same-sex sexual relations in Australia began in 1975 with the removal of the sodomy provisions from the Crimes Act of 1900. The reform first applied to South Australia in 1976. Reform of the law in the Australian Capital Territory followed in 1984. One at a time, the other states of Australia amended their criminal laws by parliamentary action to remove “unnatural offences” as a crime. Among the last to make the change were Western Australia (1989) and Queensland (1990). Tasmania was the very last Australian jurisdiction to decriminalize. A United Nations Human Rights Committee decision, Toonen v. Australia (1994), which found sexual orientation to be a protected status under the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, led to the Parliament of Australia enacting laws to overturn Tasmania’s sodomy law, thereby eliminating antisodomy laws from Australia entirely.

New Zealand In New Zealand, the Homosexual Law Reform Act of 1986 removed the sodomy provisions from the Crimes Act of 1961 and decriminalized consensual sexual relations between men over the age of sixteen.

Hong Kong While still under British rule, the Hong Kong government, through the Crimes (Amendment) Bill in 1991, decriminalized male homosexual conduct in private between two consenting adults who were at least twenty-one years old. The law, however, still prohibited anal intercourse where one of the parties was under twenty-one, “gross indecency” with a man under the age of twenty-one, and sexual activities between men of any age when more than two parties are present. These last provisions were struck down in Leung T. C. William Roy v. Secretary for Justice (2006), after the handover to China.

Fiji The antisodomy statutes of Fiji were struck down in Dhirendra Nadan and Another v. State (2005). Subsequently, in February 2010, Fiji became the first Pacific island country with colonial-era sodomy laws to formally decriminalize sex between men, when it passed the Fiji National Crimes Decree, which removed all clauses about “sodomy” and “unnatural acts” and uses gender-neutral language in the remainder of the sexual offenses section.

Recent Reform Attempts

There have been a few challenges to Sections 377 and 377A in former British colonies in the late twentieth and early twenty-first centuries.

Zimbabwe In 1997 Canaan Banana (1936–2003), who had served as president of Zimbabwe from 1980 to 1987, was arrested on charges of sodomy, indecent assault, common assault, and committing an unnatural offense in relation to sexual advances he had made on male subordinates during his time in office. He was convicted in 1998 and appealed based on a constitutional challenge to the antisodomy statute. In Banana v. State (2000), the Supreme Court of Zimbabwe ruled that the law criminalizing consensual sodomy between male adults in private was not discriminatory. The court reasoned that the protected classifications of “sex” and “gender” under the Constitution of Zimbabwe were not applicable to discrimination on the ground of sexual orientation. The court also emphasized the role of public opinion in upholding the law, remarking that Zimbabwe was conservative in matters of sexual behavior and that change should come from the legislature.

Botswana In 1994 a gay man, Utjiwa Kanane, was arrested and charged with committing an unnatural offense and committing indecent practices between males. Kanane challenged the constitutionality of the antisodomy laws. In 1995 Botswana’s High Court ruled against Kanane and upheld his conviction. In Kanane v. State (2003), Botswana’s Court of Appeal affirmed the High Court decision. Citing Banana v. State, the majority decision similarly reasoned that the court could not upend public opinion and that societal attitudes on homosexuality in Botswana had not changed as to demand decriminalization.

India In 2001 the Naz Foundation, a nongovernmental agency that promotes HIV/AIDS awareness in India, challenged the constitutionality of Section 377 on the grounds of violating equal protection, free speech and expression, protection of life and personal liberty, and freedom from sex discrimination. In Naz Foundation v. Government of NCT of Delhi (2009), the Delhi High Court limited Section 377 of the Indian Penal Code to make it constitutional, effectively decriminalizing consensual sexual acts between adults in private. The court ruled that the Constitution of India supports a fundamental right to privacy and to dignity and that these rights protect private, consensual sex acts between adults. The court also found that Section 377 discriminated against gay individuals and violated their constitutional right to express this core aspect of their identities. Although it recognized that Section 377 might reflect public morality, the court ruled that public morality alone is not a compelling state interest that can allow the restriction of a fundamental right. after an appeal by various religious groups on behalf of public morality.

Following the decision, the government elected not to appeal. Instead, an appeal was brought by Suresh Kumar Koushal and various religious groups who maintained that they had standing to challenge the decision because of harm to their religious sentiment and on behalf of public morality. In Suresh Kumar Koushal v. Naz Foundation (2013), the Supreme Court of India upheld Section 377 as constitutional and suggested that it was the role of the Parliament of India to amend or eliminate the law as it deemed fit.

In August 2017 the Supreme Court of India ruled in Justice K. S. Puttaswamy v. Union of India that all Indians have a fundamental right to privacy. In the decision, the court noted, “Sexual orientation is an essential attribute of privacy. Discrimination against an individual on the basis of sexual orientation is deeply offensive to the dignity and self-worth of the individual.” This decision paved the way for the Supreme Court to rule that Section 377 cannot be used to prosecute consensual gay sex on 6 September 2018.

Singapore As mentioned above, Section 377 of the Singapore Penal Code was bifurcated into Section 377, which pertained to heterosexual sex, and Section 377A, which pertained to same-sex sexual relations. In his justification for creating a separate code section with 377A, Charles Gough Howell (1894–1942), the attorney general of Singapore at the time, argued that stricter laws were necessary to protect the settler population against a perceived epidemic of licentious sexuality among the colonized population that was invading private spaces. Although private action was what Howell brought up to justify the importation of 377A, the statute historically has not been used to prosecute private, consensual sex acts. In 1955, however, following the decolonization of Singapore, both Sections 377 and 377A were legislated into the Singapore Penal Code by the Legislative Council. Even in postcolonial era of Singapore, enforcement of Sections 377 and 377A was usually reserved for cases involving force, coercion, or public indecency and very scarcely applied to cases of private, consensual sex.

In 2007 the Singapore Parliament moved to repeal Section 377 of the Penal Code, with the reasoning that societal values had changed regarding consensual oral and anal sex between heterosexual adults (Singapore Parliament Debates 2007). Subsequently, there was a concurrent movement to also repeal Section 377A. After lengthy debate, the Singapore Parliament removed Section 377 from the Penal Code but retained Section 377A. Advocates for the repeal of 377A had suggested that Singapore, as a postcolonial nation, no longer be bound by an old colonial law (Singapore Parliament Debates 2007). Lee Hsien Loong (1952–), the nation’s prime minister, affirmed that Singapore was a conservative society with traditional views on family, different from the West (Singapore Parliament Debates 2007). He also noted that although other parts of the world were becoming increasingly accepting of same-sex relationships, Singapore was different. Lee suggested an informal compromise where Section 377A would continue to remain the law but that the Singaporean government would not be proactive in enforcement against private, same-sex sexual conduct.

Because the culturally conservative majority was cited as the reason for retaining the law, gay rights advocates in Singapore adopted an incrementalist approach of increasing positive visibility of the LGBTQ population in hope of securing greater acceptance from the majority population. They adopted a strategy that the legal scholar Lynette J. Chua (2014) describes as “pragmatic resistance,” characterized by embracing Singaporean cultural tenets of nonconfrontation, social stability, and abiding by the laws. The public relations campaign culminated in the creation of Pink Dot, a rally held in Hong Lim Park that has occurred annually since its inception in 2009 to promote cultural inclusiveness of same-sex relationships.

This approach, however, has been coupled with constitutional challenges in the courts. In March 2010 a gay man, Tan Eng Hong, was arrested for having oral sex with another man in a shopping mall restroom stall and charged under Section 377A. Tan subsequently challenged the constitutionality of Section 377A. The gay community reacted with mixed feelings, with many viewing Tan’s challenge as possibly subverting the advances made during the interim years. For many gay activists in Singapore who wanted to challenge the stereotypes of gays as sexual deviants with campaigns such as Pink Dot that sought to normalize gay relationships in society, Tan represented the image of stereotyped sexual deviance they were seeking to avoid. Rather than rally behind Tan’s constitutional challenge, gay activists presented a more publicly sympathetic test case through Gary Lim Meng Suang and Kenneth Chee, a committed gay couple of over fifteen years who became the positive face of gay rights in Singapore. Lim and Chee brought a separate action challenging the constitutionality of 377A as a matter of equal protection. In April 2013 the High Court of Singapore issued a decision in the Lim case upholding Section 377A as not violating equal protection, and in October 2013 they issued a similar opinion upholding Section 377A in the Tan case. In October 2014 the Court of Appeal upheld both decisions on consolidated appeal, stating that overturning Section 377A would be more appropriately done by the legislature rather than the judiciary.

Malaysia Malaysia also retains Section 377. There are also parallel state-level Islamic laws that prohibit same-sex sexual relations. The leader of the Pakatan Rakyat opposition party, Anwar Ibrahim (1947–), was convicted on charges related to Section 377 in two separate cases, in 1999 and 2014, after he was accused of committing sodomy with his wife’s driver and a party aide, respectively. Prior to the accusations, Anwar had been considered a strong candidate to contend for the position of prime minister against the ruling United Malays National Organization, leading some to conjecture that the accusations were politically motivated (Ives 2016). Anwar’s appeal efforts in both cases focused on due process and the political motivations of the prosecution rather than the constitutionality of the law.
SEE ALSO Australia and New Zealand; Botswana; Dissidence in Singapore; Homonationalism in Africa; Human Rights; Malaysia; MSM (Men Who Have Sex with Men) in Asia; Naz Foundation International; Section 377 in South Asia; Wilde Trials, International Significance of; The Wolfenden Report; Zimbabwe

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Section 377 in South Asia

NISHANT SHAHANI

Associate Professor, Women’s, Gender, and Sexuality Studies Program, Department of English
Washington State University, Pullman

The impact of this British colonial code used to prosecute same-sex sexual practices specifically in South Asia.

Section 377, part of the criminal code most closely associated with antisodomy laws and the persecution of LGBT populations in postcolonial contexts, has complex and varied genealogies that date back to its colonial codification in the nineteenth century. In the South Asian context (which includes Bangladesh, Sri Lanka, Pakistan, and Bhutan), the Indian nation-state dominates conversations around Section 377 not only because of visibility around contemporary decriminalization efforts but also because of its first introduction through the Indian Penal Code by the British colonial state in 1860, which became the basis for its subsequent application in various Asian and African countries.

Drafted by Lord Thomas Babington Macaulay (1800–1859), the chair of the first Law Commission of India, Section 377 was part of the broader colonial mission to systematize and codify a set of laws without dissent, unimpeded by the contingencies of public opinion by colonial subjects.

Colonial Context

The formation of the Indian Penal Code and the codification of Section 377 foregrounds how the preservation of colonial power was dependent on discourses around sexuality and its putative transgressions. The supposed sexual abundance and irrepressible libido of colonized subjects became grounds for the importance of laws and jurisprudence that would function as a regulative and appropriate antidote. The unbridled sexuality of the colonial subject came to stand in for the unruliness of legal governance prior to colonial intervention. Macaulay offered the justification for the uniform penal code by referring to the “chaos with which the legal system was afflicted in India,” which could only be attended to via the process of codification (Report of the Indian Law Commission on the Penal Code [1837], quoted in Puri 2016, 55). Macaulay attributed this chaotic legal system in part to the lack of uniformity in governance prior to the consistent rationality of British codification—that is, the legal systems “introduced by conquerors differing in race, manners, language, and religion” (quoted in Puri 2016, 54). Criminal law of “the Hindoos” and “Mahomedans” thus had to be superseded via a kind of objective and modern secularization that was ostensibly lacking in local branches of law.

Even while Macaulay's own words on codification foreground the centrality of the penal code's civilizing mission, various historical accounts have suggested that such modernization imperatives could be overdetermined and, in fact, obscure how the colonies served as testing grounds to overhaul the criminal system back in Britain. David Skuy's history of British law prior to the codification of the Indian Penal Code contends that Macaulay's emphasis on juridical uniformity and certainty betrays drastic periods of upheaval and overhaul in the English criminal justice system from 1820 to 1860. Skuy thus suggests that the consolidation of the Indian Penal Code should not be simply framed as an attempt to reform its colonial subjects, but as a way for Britain "to modernize its own primitive criminal justice system" (1998, 517).

Definitions/Descriptions

In 1837, prior to its codification, Macaulay introduced clauses 361 and 362—drafts of what would eventually become Section 377. Exemplifying the inextricability of speech/silence binaries, Macaulay articulated in elaborate detail why "as little as possible should be said" about this "odious class of offences ... either in text or in the notes." Referring simply to the sexual acts covered by the clauses as a "revolting subject," he warned against any "public discussion" around the matter that ostensibly could not be named since it resulted in "injury" to "the morals of the community" (Report of the Indian Law Commission on the Penal Code [1837]; see Puri 2016, 57).

But despite the apparent proscriptions against discourse on sexual behavior, Macaulay's clauses eventually laid the foundations for Section 377, the final version of which appeared in the Indian Penal Code of 1860 under a section on "Unnatural Offences." It read:

Section 377: Unnatural Offences—Whoever voluntarily has carnal intercourse against the order of nature with any man, woman or animal shall be punished with imprisonment for life, or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend 10 years, and shall be liable to fine.

Explanation: Penetration is sufficient to constitute the carnal intercourse necessary to the offence described in this section.

(INDIAN PENAL CODE OF 1860; SEE PURI 2016, 52)

Despite his wariness in offering detailed descriptions of "unnatural offences" due to concerns over community morality, Macaulay still expanded on the specificity of what acts would come under the purview of Section 377. To illustrate the scope of the law, he wrote in the “general comments” portion of Section 377: “This section is intended to punish the offence of sodomy, buggery, and bestiality. The offence consists in a carnal knowledge committed against the order of nature by a person with a man, or in the same unnatural manner with a woman, or by a man or woman in any manner with an animal” (Indian Penal Code of 1860; see Puri 2016, 52–53).

Historical Usage and Illustrations

Even though, in contemporary contexts, the repeal of Section 377 has acquired political currency as a way to challenge “sodomy laws” centered around LGBT disenfranchisement, its history reveals prosecution for a variety of sexual offenses, most often around cases that involve the sexual assault of children by adult men. For example, in one of the earliest recorded cases, Government v. Bapoji Bhatt (1884), a higher court in Mysore overruled a conviction handed down by a sessions judge due to lack of evidence, specifically around the unreliable corroboration of events from a minor. Additionally, even while the appellant, who was charged with having oral sex with the minor, was tried under Section 377, the court dismissed the case on grounds that the “unnatural act” under consideration did not include the violation of sodomy.

This tethering of Section 377 to sodomy, however, did not hold up in the later case of Khanu v. Emperor (1925), which broadened the purview of the law to include the criminal offense of oral sex. Tried in Sindh (in present-day Pakistan but pre-partition British India), the case involved the coercion of oral sex between an older man and a minor. The case is also significant in that it explicitly contradicted Macaulay's purported secular motivations, revealing its Judeo-Christian investment in the insistence on procreation. The ruling stated that “the natural object of carnal intercourse is that there should be the possibility of conception of human beings, which in the case of coitus per os is impossible.” In placing “coitus per os” (oral sex) in the same criminalized vicinity as “coitus per anum” (anal sex), the court concluded that “the sin of Gomorrah is no less carnal intercourse than the sin of Sodom” (Khanu v. Emperor 1925).

Perhaps the most oft-cited illustration of Section 377’s mobilization in colonial India was the Allahabad case of Queen-Empress v. Khairati (1884). The case is particularly noteworthy for the ways in which it symbolically linked act to identity, setting the stage for Section 377’s subsequent association with what Michel Foucault (1926–1984) called a form of “personage” or the “specification of individuals” (1978, 42–43). Khairati, a “eunuch” who had been under surveillance by the police, was accused of the offense of sodomy and identified in the case as being apprehended while “singing in women's clothes.” The case offers a detailed medicalized description of Khairati’s unhealthy body in attempting to suture criminality to disease and flawed physicality. Khairati thus is described as a having “the characteristic mark of a habitual catamite—the distortion of the orifice of the anus into a shape of a trumpet—and also to be affected with syphilis in the same region in a manner which distinctly points to unnatural intercourse within the last few months” (Queen-Empress v. Khairati 1884, ILR 6 ALL 204).

The presence of this corporeal marker links the stigma of the “habitual catamite” (i.e., a young boy in a sexual relationship with an older man) to the stain of criminality played out decades later in Sindh in the case of Noshirwan v. Emperor (1935), in which a neighbor spying on the accused witnessed an act of attempted sodomy. Even while the case was dismissed on grounds that the about-to-take-place criminal act was interrupted and therefore technically did not actually occur, the judge castigated one of the accused as being a “despicable” character who had indulged in the “vice of a catamite” (quoted in Arondekar 2009, 68).

These early instantiations of Section 377—with all their conflations, elisions, and contradictions—became the rhetorical and ideological models through which the law was mobilized in a number of British colonies across the globe, with the Indian Penal Code serving as the original blueprint. In the context of South Asia, Bangladesh, Pakistan, Sri Lanka, and Bhutan inherited Section 377 as a legacy of the postcolonial condition, even as England decriminalized homosexual behavior in 1967. In many instances, Section 377 became the broader framework that functioned as the basis to indigenize laws and taboos around sexual behaviors considered “unnatural.”

Postcolonial Adaptations

In Pakistan, the Islamification of law was institutionalized through the Offence of Zina Ordinance (1979)—part of the Hadood Ordinance initiated by General Muhammad Zia-ul-Haq (1924–1988) as a way to connect existing law to the dictates of the Qur’an. The Zina Ordinance (zina referring to the Islamic legal term for illegal sexual intercourse) purported to punish persons who indulged in “unnatural lust.” More specifically, it was framed as an offense if a man and a woman “willfully have sexual intercourse without being married to each other. Explanation: Penetration is sufficient to constitute the sexual intercourse necessary to the offence of Zina” (Offence of Zina [Enforcement of Hudood] Ordinance, Ordinance No. VII of 1979). The rhetoric of “unnatural lust” clearly draws on the language and underlying logic of Section 377, as does the qualifying explanation of penetration as central to the offense of zina, which lifts its language directly from Section 377.

The Offence of Zina Ordinance was mobilized in the case of Muhammad Din, in which two men were charged when they were caught sexually assaulting another man at a railway station in Lahore. The court rejected the claim on grounds that the victim revealed physical characteristics of a subject who had already been habituated to sodomy. The language used by the court—that the victim’s anus was “moderately funnel shaped and [that] he appeared to be a habitual passive agent” clearly echoes the medicalized “evidence” of the Khairati case almost a century earlier. Significantly, when the offense of zina was dismissed, the case was retried under Section 377 in Muhammad Din v. the State (1981, All Pakistan Law Decisions, Federal Supreme Court, 191).

The legacy of the Khairati case, which consolidated the association of “deviant” sex with a particular kind of body through “empirical” logics of medical examinations, reverberates even in twenty-first-century contexts. In 2006 a judge in Faisalabad, Pakistan, issued an arrest warrant for Shumail Raj and Shahzina Tariq, a married couple whose relationship was legally and medically scrutinized because Raj was a transgender man. When the couple was forced to appear before a high court in Lahore, Judge Khawaja Muhammad Sharif arranged for a court-mandated forensics team to ascertain the “true” nature of Raj's sex to determine the legality of the marriage. While Tariq’s father initially approached the police, invoking Section 377 with its potential sentence of seven years or life in prison, the judge ultimately decided not to try the couple through its legal parameters, given the framing of Raj and Tariq as a lesbian couple, and the perception that penetration, which was supposedly absent in their sexual relationship, might preclude it from the purview of Section 377. After forcing the couple to apologize to the court, the judge sentenced them to a three-year prison term.

As in the case described above, the impact of Section 377 can often shuttle back and forth between material and symbolic consequences. Thus, even while actual convictions of LGBT people in contemporary contexts based on Section 377 might be relatively rare, the symbolic force it wields against sexual- and gender-nonconforming subjects has often made it a focal point as a site of social injury and disenfranchisement. In many instances, a wide variety of other laws that operate within the performative vicinity of Section 377 exacerbate its symbolic force, even if it is not the actual judicial procedure through which “unnatural” sexual behaviors and gender expressions are policed and criminalized. In the context of Bangladesh, for example, more than Section 377, other laws, such as Section 54 of the Criminal Procedure Code or Section 86 of the Dhaka Metropolitan Police Ordinance, are wielded as state-sanctioned ways to police loitering of gender-variant subjects or to legally detain those who appear “suspicious.” Such laws disproportionately target hijras (the vernacular term for colonial “eunuchs” or India’s “third sex”) and sex workers.

Similarly, Section 399 of Sri Lanka’s penal code, which prohibits “cheating by personation,” also illustrates the postcolonial endurance and expansion of Section 377 (or the anomalously numbered Section 365A in the context of Sri Lanka) into a variety of different decrees around sexual governance and gender politics. While ostensibly intended to punish those guilty of forgery, the law has been used to detain and harass butch lesbians, as well as transgender men and women, for acts of gender “deception.” Amendments to Sri Lanka’s Section 365A have also aimed to expand the scope and degree of punishment. In 1995 the maximum duration of punishment for “carnal intercourse” and “gross indecency” was expanded from ten to twenty years. Furthermore, the language of Section 365A was changed from the offending sexual acts between “male persons” to the more genderneutral “any person,” effectively broadening the scope of the law to criminalize “unnatural” sexual behavior between women.

Efforts to Repeal/Decriminalize

While both colonial legacies and postcolonial mobilizations of Section 377 foreground historical and material realities of oppression, the law has also become the locus of repeal and resistance since the mid-1980s. The earliest attempts to repeal Section 377 were instigated in 1994 by the AIDS Bhedbhav Virodhi Andolan (ABVA), a nongovernmental organization (NGO) based in New Delhi, India. Even while the ABVA was responding to concern over increasing rates of HIV transmission and the lack of condom distribution in public or state-governed contexts like jails, the attempt to repeal Section 377 was framed in one of the organization’s publications as the need to “recognize the right to privacy as a fundamental part of the citizen’s right to life and liberty, including the right to his/her sexual orientation” (ABVA 1991). The ABVA challenged Section 377, arguing that it violated Articles 21 (the right to privacy) and 14 (the right to equality) of the Indian constitution. The ABVA also, as Naisargi Dave has pointed out, drew on problematic “shaming strategies” in suggesting that India would be in the “backward company of Pakistan” in its refusal to repeal the antisodomy statute (2012, 173).

While the ABVA’s petition languished in Delhi’s High Court for several years, the next significant challenge to Section 377 came in the form of a public interest litigation filed by the Naz Foundation (another NGO that worked on sexual health) in 2001. Like the ABVA’s petition, the Naz petition argued that “no aspect of one’s life may be said to be more private or intimate than that of sexual relations” (Naz Foundation v. Government of NCT of Delhi and Others). In attempting to limit rather than repeal Section 377, the Naz petition focused on decriminalizing consensual sexual activity between adults, since the law’s existence had been justified by the need to prosecute child-abuse offenders. The Delhi High Court dismissed the petition on purely technical grounds, claiming that since Naz did not represent an individual petitioner, it was not a matter of public interest, and therefore Naz had no locus standi in the case.

After various legal struggles and the filing of a special leave petition, India’s Supreme Court ordered the Delhi High Court to revisit the Naz petition, culminating in the landmark 2009 case Naz v. Government, which effectively entailed the decriminalizing of homosexuality. The legal victory was not simply a consequence of progressive shifts informing Indian jurisprudence; it was informed by emerging LGBT activism engaging the state. Groups like Voices against Section 377 and the Lawyers Collective were active in setting the stage for Naz’s efforts. A writ submitted by Voices against Section 377 to the High Court supporting the Naz petition stated: “In the social climate fostered by Section 377 it becomes difficult, if not impossible, to publicly own and express one’s sexuality, thereby silencing a core aspect of one’s personhood” (quoted in Puri 2016, 130).

The challenge to Section 377 as the central site of LGBT activism has also been complicated by activists and scholars who have warned against the unintended regulatory effects of collapsing social justice with a narrowly conceived understanding of jurisprudence. South Asian feminist critiques of the state, for example, have pointed to the long history of how the demand for protective legislation has only ended up working against the best interests of women, given the long history of gendered state violence. In a similar vein, LGBT activists have also drawn attention to the limits of an investment in legal reform prior to the wider mobilization of social movements—what Arvind Narrain has called the “over-juridification of social struggle” (2007, 255). Finally, the emphasis on the right to “private” consensual sex meant that decriminalization would only impact those whose sexualities were cordoned off from this privileged zone of intimacy, leaving sex workers, kothis (a vernacular term for effeminate men who have sex with or desire other men), and gay men harassed for having public sex still vulnerable to state criminalization and pathologization.

The risks of an overdetermined faith in jurisprudence were materially manifested in the 2013 case of Koushal v. Naz Foundation when the Supreme Court of India overturned the Delhi High Court case, effectively reinstating Section 377 of the Indian Penal Code. In 2017 the upholding of the right to privacy by India’s Supreme Court under Article 21 of the Indian constitution renewed hope for LGBT activists attempting to challenge Section 377. The Supreme Court ruling explicitly foregrounded the place of sexual politics within the realm of privacy rights by stating, “Sexual orientation is an essential attribute of privacy. Discrimination against an individual on the basis of sexual orientation is deeply offensive to the dignity and self-worth of the individual” (Justice K. S. Puttaswamy v. Union of India). The right-to-privacy judgment led to the Supreme Court’s landmark ruling on 6 September 2018 that Section 377 could no longer be used to prosecute same-sex sexual activity.

SEE ALSO Family Law in Asia; Naz Foundation International; Offences Against the Person Act (1861); Section 377 and Section 377A

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Situated along the Atlantic coast of western Africa, Senegal borders Mauritania to the north, Mali to the east, and Guinea and Guinea-Bissau to the south. It also completely surrounds the Gambia. Historically part of the Senegambia zone, Senegal has always been a point of contact between diverse cultures. The Portuguese were the first Europeans to explore the African coast. After their arrival in the fifteenth century, the region became an important trading center in West Africa. During the nineteenth century, Senegal was a French colony. It became an independent republic in 1960. Although it has a Muslim-majority population (more than 90 percent), Senegal has developed a strong tradition of secularism. The country's official language is French, but Wolof is more broadly spoken. In Senegal, legal repression of same-sex sexuality is predicated on article 319 of the Penal Code, according to which those found guilty of such acts can be imprisoned for up to five years and fined up to 1,500,000 CFA francs (approximately $2,500–$3,000).

Traditional Senegalese Cultures and Homoerotic Relationships

Cross-dressing was traditionally accepted in Senegal. Menwomen (in Wolof, goorjigeen), who dressed in women's clothes and filled female-gendered roles, were integrated into the political, cultural, and social lives of Senegalese society. Goorjigeen helped rich and influential women (dryanké) to organize ceremonies such as baptisms, weddings, and circumcisions. Cheikh Niang (2010) asserts that during the 1960 election campaign of Léopold Sédar Senghor (1906–2001), the first president of Senegal, goorjigeen accompanied him to Saint-Louis, a town located along the Senegal River in the northwest of the country that was the capital of Senegal until the beginning of the twentieth century. Ndèye Ndiagna Gning (2013) also reports on the goorjigeen's significant social position, which was similar to that of the geewel or griot (transmitters of tradition and collective memory), since both figures were in charge of organizing important ceremonies.

Goorjigeen also play a major role in selected spiritual ceremonies. Among the Lebu, a fishing community situated in the Yoff district of Dakar, the men in charge of restoring the physical, social, and ecological harmony of the group during a ndēp ceremony wear female outfits and mime feminine gestures. Niang (2010) argues that many of these male leaders have had sexual intercourse with other men. Therefore, goorjigeen could be perceived as male transvestites. They embody a sort of “male femininity” (Boellstorff 2007, 82) and show the complexity of same-sex practices within the African continent, which cannot always be labeled homosexual. Today, the term goorjigeen has become derogatory because of the social stigma against homosexuality, and it is nowadays understood as a form of homosexuality.

Homoerotic Relationships during the Colonial Period

Western authors have written several narratives about homoeroticism in Senegal. However, rather than providing a clear picture of same-sex intimacy in Senegal, these accounts rely mostly on exotic representations of “African” or “black” people. The expansion of colonization in the nineteenth century brought to the region a wide range of disciplines, practices, and discourses that contributed to categorizing and establishing a hierarchy of race within a frame of developing racial theories. Western texts mentioning homosexuality in Senegal are contradictory (M’Baye 2013), since some recognize the existence of same-sex practices in the country while others deny their existence.

The writings of Doctor Jacobus X— a pseudonym adopted by several writers in France and England, including the French writer Louis Jacolliot (1837–1890), who was famous for his popular science books— illustrate how Western scholars have argued that same-sex practices in Senegal, and more generally in Africa, did not exist. Jacobus X relied in his 1893 L’amour aux colonies (Love in the colonies) on observations he had made among several ethnic groups in Senegal, including the Wolof, and stated that neither black man nor black woman could be a homosexual or lesbian. Jacobus X pointed out that he had encountered only one case of homosexual practices during his stay in Senegal. He identified two Senegalese riflemen (tirailleurs sénégalais) whose same-sex practices were caused by a lack of women. Jacobus X’s perspective on same-sex sexuality in Senegal echoed his own theory on sexuality, according to which sexual intercourse was only possible between people of the same “race,” and an analysis of sexual practices was a way to evaluate the so-called inferiority or superiority of a cultural group. Therefore, according to Jacobus X, the lack of same-sex practices among Senegalese people attested to their proximity to nature; sex for Africans was intended only for procreation.

At the same time, Armand Corre (1841–1908), a doctor working in the French navy, mentioned having met men dressed as women in the company of a Senegalese prince and several griots in Saint-Louis (Corre 1894). However, Corre argues in the same text that homosexuality was a new phenomenon in Senegal, brought by foreigners. Similar narratives date to later in the twentieth century. Geoffrey Gorer (1905–1985) and Michael Crowder (1934–1988) both mentioned the existence of the goorjigeen. However, they argued that the presence of the goorjigeen shows the emergence of a process of Westernization in Senegalese society.

Legal Prohibition of Same-Sex Sexuality

The Senegalese Penal Code and article 319 came into force in 1965, when President Senghor undertook reform of the Senegalese legal system after independence. Despite this process of transformation, Senegalese laws have remained in line with French judiciary legislation. The decision to maintain and nationalize the judiciary legislation of the former colonial power was intended to provide a stable basis of rules upon which a “modern” legal system could be built. In addition, following a Western judiciary system prevented the government from having to choose one local cultural interpretation over another or one religion over another. The enactment of article 319, proscribing “an improper or unnatural act with a person of same sex,” followed the French prohibition of same-sex sexuality. It is important to remember that homosexuality only became legal in France in 1982.

From 1965 to 2008, article 319 was rarely enforced. Fatou Kiné Camara (1964–) mentions one case in 1992 in which a Senegalese driver tried to extort money from a French hitchhiker on the road. After a fight, the two men were brought to the police station and the Senegalese man revealed that they had had sexual intercourse. The hitchhiker received a two-month prison sentence and was banished from Senegal. However, in 2008 there was a shift in Senegalese legal discourse. In February 2008 Icône, a Senegalese tabloid, published about twenty photos of a gay marriage and identified suspected or alleged homosexuals. Directly after this publication, the Division of Criminal Investigation arrested about ten people who had attended the wedding. In December 2008 nine members of an HIV/AIDS outreach association accused of having engaged in homosexual acts were taken into custody and ultimately sentenced to eight years in prison. Although the men were finally released after the United Nations and other international bodies objected to their treatment, the initial sentence had great significance in that it reflected a new social discourse and the rise of homophobic violence in Senegal.

Social Condemnation of Same-Sex Relationships

Many religious groups, in particular, discussed these incidents at the time. Imam Massamba Diop, who was responsible for the religious affairs of the Djamra (Jamra), an Islamic nongovernmental organization (NGO), denounced the United Nations’ intervention calling for the release of the nine prisoners. Imam Mbaye Niang, president of the Mouvement de la Réforme pour le Développement Social (Reform Movement for Social Development), an Islamist and reformist party, organized a Collective of Islamic Associations in Senegal (of approximately fifteen Muslim organizations) to “fight against homosexuality.” These reformist groups have been particularly visible since the beginning of the 1980s. Some run their own newspapers and television channels, through which they call for a return to scriptural sources and earlier practices of Islam. They also often criticize the Westernization of Senegalese society, which they believe has led to drug use, prostitution, and homosexuality.

LGBTQ Struggles and Recognition

The Senegalese legal prohibition of homosexuality inevitably makes it difficult to publicly address political claims. However, since the beginning of the twenty-first century, LGBTQ people have been increasingly organizing for the purpose of HIV/AIDS prevention. These groups have been working with doctors, as well as with such national and international NGOs as Enda Santé (Enda Health) and the National Alliance against AIDS. Within the scope of their activities, gay men involved in these associations use the term MSM (men who have sex with men), although they do not identify with this term among themselves (Niang 2010). Through Senegalese LGBTQ associations, LGBTQ leaders may gain a voice within Senegalese society; one such association has already been legally recognized.

However, HIV/AIDS prevention efforts in Senegal tend to ignore lesbians, despite the fact that several local LGBTQ associations include both male and female members. Furthermore, the wave of homophobia that swept Senegal in the last half of the first decade of the twenty-first century, as well as the creation of MSM associations, has contributed to a change in status for the goorjigeen within the society. Although some men still act as “traditional” goorjigeen, especially by contributing to the organization of social ceremonies, they publicly position themselves as MSM and prefer to stand with MSM associations when it comes to addressing political claims. Therefore, trans activism is not yet recognized as a social phenomenon in Senegal, since MSM organizations are not publicly tackling social issues related to transgenderism.

SEE ALSO Benga, François "Féral" (1906–1957); Cinema, African (Francophone); Literature, African (Francophone)

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Camara, Fatou Kiné. “Ce délit qui nous vient d'ailleurs: L'homosexualité dans le code pénal...

Isidore Lisieux, 1893.
Sex reassignment surgery (SRS) is usually undertaken by those who identify themselves as transgender or the third sex. On occasions, however, intersex people also undergo SRS when they feel that the gender they were assigned initially does not match their gender identity. There is also the issue of “regret,” in which someone who has previously identified themselves as transgender or as the other gender and has undergone SRS regrets the decision after the surgery; in such a case, such individuals often disown their transgender or cross-gender identity. If a broader concept of SRS (detailed below) is adopted, cisgender people such as eunuchs could be said to have undergone SRS within its historical context.

Unlike gender reassignment surgery, which includes both genital and nongenital surgical procedures (e.g., facial feminization surgery and breast augmentation for male-to-female individuals, mastectomy for female-to-male individuals), SRS refers to genital procedures that reshape one’s genitals from one gender to another. Examples include penile-scrotal reconstruction, metoidioplasty, and vaginectomy for female-to-male individuals and vaginoplasty, clitorolabio-plasty, penectomy, and orchidectomy for male-to-female individuals (Selvaggi and Bellringer 2011; Selvaggi et al. 2012). Thus, SRS is often considered a kind of genital surgery (Monstrey, De Cuypere, and Ettner 2007). Other terms that refer to similar procedures include gender realignment surgery and gender-confirming surgery, and they are often used interchangeably with the term SRS. However, the terms realignment or confirming, according to Gennaro Selvaggi and Simona Giordano (2014), imply that there is a “real” gender, which is innate to one, and that one can realign one’s body to it. Although the criteria for all breast/chest and genital surgeries set by the World Professional Association for Transgender Health do not presuppose an innate gender that is misaligned to one’s body, qualified mental health professionals are required to document the persistent gender dysphoria (a conflict between one’s own gender identity and one’s assigned gender, which causes significant distress due to the discomfort derived from one’s body and/or the expected roles of one’s assigned gender) the patients have experienced.

The earliest case of SRS, in the modern sense of the procedure, was reportedly performed in 1931 in Germany (Pauly 1968). The first country to conduct SRS in Asia was probably the Republic of China (Taiwan) as the news of an intersexed soldier, Jianshun Xie, made headlines in 1953. Xie had successfully been converted from male to female by native doctors and was considered to be the “first” Chinese transsexual (Chiang 2017). Nevertheless, perhaps because of a lack of awareness of Xie's news in other Asian countries or perhaps as a marketing ploy, when Singapore conducted its first SRS in 1971, it was also reported as the first case of SRS in Asia (Tsui, Kok, and Long 1977; Yue 2017). Through the leadership of the surgeon, S. S. Ratnam, who performed this first SRS, Singapore became the center for SRS in Asia (before Bangkok took its place for medical tourism), and about half of the 500 SRSs conducted were performed on foreigners (Yue 2017). Shortly after Singapore’s success in performing its first SRS, Thailand reported its first case, in 1972 (Grossman 2009), and Hong Kong’s first came much later, in 1981 (Ng et al. 1989).

Broader Concept of SRS

All these “first cases” were reported based on the description of SRS outlined earlier, but this does not mean that genital procedures prompted by one’s gender identity were not performed at earlier times. Hijras in India, for example, are “an alternative gender, neither men or women” (Nanda 1990, 13), and they have been mentioned in ancient texts such as the Kama Sutra (Chakrapani 2010). Many hijras undergo the ritual of emasculation (to remove the penis and testicles but without the construction of a vagina) in order to join the hijra community (Nanda 1990). Most of them, however, could not afford to pay for the kind of SRS understood by modern medicine and must resort to unqualified medical practitioners for such risky procedures (Chakrapani 2010; Winter 2009).

The hijra example brings out several points worth noting. First, if one defines SRS more broadly, as procedures to reshape one’s genitalia in order to identify oneself (or to be identified) as the “reassigned gender,” which may or may not be within the framework of the binary gender, then SRS, in the broader sense of the term, dates back thousands of years in Asia, given that the presence of the hijra in India and the eunuch in imperial China have thousands of years of recorded history (Chiang 2012). Second, the reassigned gender may be that of male, female, or gender identifications other than male/female. Whether in the West or in Asia, it is quite common for those who have suffered from gender dysphoria and have undergone SRS to identify themselves as male or female of the reassigned gender as opposed to a gender category other than male/female. However, as noted with the case of hijras, which “are an institutionalized third gender role that has its roots in ancient India” (Nanda 1990, 144), the ritual of emasculation can render those who have undergone it into the gender category of hijra.

Indeed, the notion of a “third sex” or gender identifications other than male/female is not uncommon in other parts of Asia, and similar to hijra, some are being ritualized, institutionalized, and/or culturally recognized. In Thailand, for example, kathoey is known as a third sex (nowadays, the term often refers to those who are trans women). According to Peter A. Jackson (2004), in premodern Thailand, kathoey is an intermediate category of phet (a Thai term meaning “sex,” “gender,” or “sexuality”). The first two types of phet are normatively feminine women and normatively masculine men, whereas the fourth type of phet are Buddhist monks who were thought to be asexual. Similarly, among the Bugis ethnic group in Sulawesi, Indonesia, in addition to cisgender males and females, they also have the bissu (someone who fuses all aspects of genders and has a ritual role in their culture), calabai (someone who is biologically male but lives as a woman), and calalai (someone who is biologically female but lives as a man) (Idrus 2016; Wieringa 2013). Unlike their Bugis counterparts, quite a number of kathoeys and hijras opt for SRS or the emasculation ritual in order to become “full kathoeys” and “full hijras,” respectively (Totman 2003). This phenomenon also raises other issues (addressed below): the popularity and availability of SRS among transgender people in Asia, the differences in legal status in different Asian countries and regions for those who do or do not opt for SRS, and the ramifications of such legal differences for those individuals.

JIANSHUN XIE: THE “FIRST” CHINESE TRANSSEXUAL

In 1953 news of the successful surgical transformation of a man into a woman by native doctors made headlines in Taiwan. The story first came to public attention on 14 August, when major newspapers surprised the public by announcing the discovery of an intersex soldier, Jianshun Xie, in Tainan, a city on Taiwan's southwestern coast. Within a week, the characterization of Xie in the Taiwanese press changed from that of an average citizen whose ambiguous sex provoked uncertainty and anxiety to that of being considered the “first” Chinese transsexual.

A native of Chaozhou, Guangdong, the 36-year-old Xie had joined the army when he was 16, lost his father at the age of 17, and lost his mother at 18. He came to Taiwan with the Nationalist Army in 1949. “At the age of 20,” a Lianhebao (United daily news) article from 1953 explained, “his breasts developed like a girl, but he had hidden this secret as a member of the military force rather successfully. It was finally discovered on the 6th of [August], upon his visit to the Tainan 518 Hospital for a physical examination due to regular abdominal pains and cramps, by the chair of external medicine Dr. Lin” (translation by author). Treating Xie first in Tainan and then in Taipei, doctors performed a series of “sex change” operations. By the end of the 1950s, according to media reports, Xie had been visited by Soong Mei-ling (the First Lady of the Republic of China), famous celebrities, and innumerable supporters; had assumed, after nine surgeries, a female persona; and had begun working at the Ta Tung Relief Institute for Women and Children under the new name Shun Xie.

Xie was frequently dubbed the “Chinese Christine.” This allusion to the contemporaneous American ex-GI transsexual icon Christine Jorgensen (1926–1989) reflected the growing influence of American culture on the Republic of China at the peak of the Cold War. As was the case with Jorgensen in the United States, extensive popular press coverage in Taiwan of Xie’s transition shifted common understandings of sexuality and gender, introduced the concept of transsexuality as something distinct from intersex conditions, and amplified the roles of both medical science and mass media in the construction of modern identity.

Of significance in both national and transpacific contexts, Xie’s experience made bianxingren (transsexual) a household term in Sinophone (Chinese-speaking) cultures of the 1950s. She served as a focal point for numerous news stories that broached the topics of changing sex, human intersexuality, and other atypical conditions of the body. People who wrote about her debated whether she qualified as a woman, whether medical technology could transform sex, and whether the two “Christines” were more similar or different. These persistent comparisons of Taiwan with the United States, through the comparisons of two versions of transsexuality, became an important arena for articulating a sense of Sinophone difference from Anglophone culture, as well as of Taiwanese nationalism. Xie’s story highlighted issues that pervaded postwar Sinophone society in Taiwan: the censorship of public culture by the state, the unique social status of men serving in the armed forces, the limit of individualism, the promise and pitfalls of science, the relationship between military virility and national sovereignty, the normative behaviors of men and women, and the boundaries of acceptable sexual expression. Xie’s saga, and that of other reported cases of sex change that followed in her wake, attest to the emergence of transsexuality as a modern form of sexual embodiment in Sinophone society.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

“Nanshi faxian yinyangren jiangdong shoushu bian nannü” [A hermaphrodite discovered in Tainan: Sex to be determined after surgery]. Lianhebao [United daily news], 14 August 1953.

Howard Chiang

Assistant Professor, Department of History

University of California, Davis

Popularity and Availability of SRS in Asia

According to Sam Winter (2009), compared to the number of transgender people in the West who approach medical professionals for a gender identity disorder or a gender dysphoria diagnosis and subsequent SRS, their Asian counterparts who approach medical professionals constitute only a small minority of transgender individuals. Indeed, in Asia, large numbers of transgender people do not undertake SRS, nor do they show a desire for it.

Thailand, for example, has a large population of kathoeys, and it is probably the most popular “medical tourism” destination for this kind of procedure. Its capital, Bangkok, has been dubbed the “mecca” for SRS (especially for male-to-female procedures) (Aizura 2009, 2010). Nevertheless, despite SRS being more readily available and affordable in Thailand, only 28 percent of Winter’s sample of Thai trans women had undergone SRS, and 12 percent indicated no desire to do so (Winter 2006). The ratio is greater in other Asian countries. For example, in Winter’s Laos sample, only 1 out of 214 trans women surveyed had undergone SRS; similarly, in his Philippines sample, only 1 out of 147 had gone through the procedure, while 29 percent had no desire for SRS (Winter 2009).

One of the possible reasons for the lower rate of transgender people opting for SRS is the lack of free or affordable SRS in many Asian countries. As noted earlier, most hijras cannot afford to pay private plastic surgeons for SRS, and the Indian government does not provide free SRS (although the state of Tamil Nadu does). Thus, the majority of hijras are deprived of access to free or affordable SRS. For those who have recourse to unqualified medical practitioners, many suffer from postoperative complications, such as urological problems, as a result of faulty surgical procedures (Chakrapani 2010).

Compared to other Asian countries, Malaysia is perhaps the most hostile country toward transgender people. There, according to Yik Koon Teh (2002), SRS is forbidden for transgender people and surgeons who are Muslim. An anonymous transgender source from Malaysia informed the author that no one (regardless of religion or ethnicity) is allowed to have SRS there, and for Malaysian Muslims who have SRS outside Malaysia, they may be prosecuted by a shari’a court (a court based on Islamic law) upon their return; yet, some transgender people manage to do it under the table by getting surgeons to operate on them under the guise that they are intersex, which is permitted there.

The situation in Malaysia is in sharp contrast to that in Hong Kong, where SRS and relevant nongenital procedures are paid for by the government. After the shutdown of Hong Kong’s first gender identity team at Queen Mary Hospital (which is a government hospital) in 2005, many transgender patients found the service provided by regional hospitals inconsistent, as many health-care professionals lacked experience in treating gender dysphoria (Cheung 2010). In 2016, however, a new Gender Identity Disorder Clinic was established at Prince of Wales Hospital (another government hospital) to serve individuals who have gender dysphoria. The clinic includes a multidisciplinary team that offers integrated services ranging from psychiatric assessments to the administration of hormones to SRS and other relevant nongenital surgeries (Leung 2017).
Legal Status

While the popularity of SRS in a country is somewhat dependent on its availability and affordability, the ways in which the law and policy operate in each country may also affect the desire for SRS. In countries such as Thailand and the Philippines, post-SRS individuals are not allowed to change the gender markers on their legal documents, and this undermines their chances of employment as they have to present such documents when applying for a job (Winter 2009). In countries where individuals are required to undergo SRS before they can change the gender marker on legal documents, this may be one of the factors transgender people consider when deciding to opt for SRS. For example, anonymous sources who have undergone SRS in Hong Kong have noted being partly swayed by this consideration as they, especially trans women, found it extremely difficult to find work or to stay in a job when their gender expression is of one gender whereas the gender marker on their legal documents is of another gender. Yet, none of them expressed regret about having the procedure (Cheung 2011).

Similarly, in the People's Republic of China, one has to undergo SRS in order to change one's gender marker on one's hukou (household register) document; unlike in Hong Kong, there is no legal battle being fought for the rights of transgender people in the People's Republic of China, and it is merely a bureaucratic procedure to make such a change of gender marker on one's legal document (Guo 2014). According to a trans activist, however, in the People's Republic of China one cannot change one's name and gender marker on one's academic certificates after SRS; this leaves postoperative trans individuals in the predicament of either finding employment without the support of their academic certificates obtained before SRS or revealing their gender history when showing their academic certificates.

The requirement of SRS as a prerequisite for changing the gender marker on one's legal document makes one wonder whether it is humane to pressure transgender people to undergo SRS in order to make such a change, or whether it amounts to torture, as it is an indirect way to coerce people to undergo surgical procedures that the patients may not feel are entirely necessary even though they are living and identifying themselves in a gender that is different from their birthassigned gender. In countries such as Taiwan and Korea, SRS is not a prerequisite for changing the gender marker, which is a move other countries may consider in order to provide a trans-friendly space for transgender people whether or not they feel SRS is what they really want.

SEE ALSO Conversion Therapy in China; Sex Reassignment Surgery in Iran; W v. Registrar of Marriages (2013)

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Winter, Sam. “Cultural Considerations for the World Professional Association for Sex Reassignment Surgery in Iran

ALIREZA KORANGY
President, Societas Philologica Persica
New York, NY

The religious rationale that allows Iranians to undergo sex-change operations in a country where same-sex sexual behavior is illegal.

Behind only Thailand, Iran has the second-highest number of sex-change operations per capita, according to data from 2008 (Barford 2008). This statistic may seem strange given that nonnormative sexual expressions are punished severely in Iran in accordance with shari’a (Islamic law); men convicted of homosexual intercourse can receive the death penalty, and women may be flogged for same-sex sexual acts (Bearak and Cameron 2016). Yet, Iran’s position on sex-change operations is rooted in the religious belief that such surgery might be necessary in order to rectify the discord between the gender of one’s soul and one’s physical body. Therefore, Iranian religious leaders freely condemn homosexuals for trespassing sexual boundaries in engaging in same-sex sexual practices but give license to those who attempt to function within those boundaries by aligning their gender with their sexuality through surgery.

Background on Sex and Its Nuances in Iran

The time line and variations involved in the progress and eventual acceptance of sex changes for transsexuals have encompassed a labyrinth of issues within the rigorous and stern cultural and religious circumstances regarding sexuality that have existed in Iran for centuries. The beginnings of the crux of the poetics of this matter, in terms of social cognizance and tolerance, can be traced to an opaque understanding of sexuality as conveyed in a tradition that spans around a thousand years of literature and a cultural canon that revolves almost solely around a complex and nuanced relationship between a lover and a beloved whose sex has been disguised by the poet’s figurative language. Consequently, the opaque social standing and cognizance of a lover and a beloved have greatly influenced sex and sexuality to this day in Iran.

The opaque and nuanced parameters of sexuality, scrutinized within the vertical axis of Persian poetics (poetry), have always presented an enigma that has yielded a complex set of tools in its hermeneutics—for example, are they boys or are they girls with mustaches? It is mainly the social understanding of homosexuality that has in turn affected the contemporary understanding of transsexuals—almost always blurring the lines between being a homosexual and a transsexual. It should be understood that sexual neutrality (khwājagī) has been part of Iranian folktales and history, and this nuance (of neutrality) has been at times exploited to no end. The literature of Iran has always been vague about the sexuality of a beloved, and the intricate figurative language of the poetry of Iran has further complicated the matter. In fact, love in Persian literature is really homoerotic love, and this is especially true post-twelfth century with the strong influence of theosophical treatises on both literature and the society that was its audience. Epic romances such as Laylī va Majnūn, Farhad va Shirin, Yusuf va Zulaykha, and Vamiq va ʿAdhra are truly rarities in a monumental corpus of love lyrics. Even prior to this, the image of the softer sex was molded into the figure of a Turkish beloved who was white and tall and had a soft, barely sprouted mustache.

With the establishment of Shiʻism in fifteenth-century Iran, discussion of sex and sexual encounters became taboo; however, the image of what is beautiful became even more opaque. In fact, the concept of a mustache was one of the major factors in deeming a woman beautiful beginning with, and even prior to the period of the Qajar dynasty (1794–1925). Furthermore, as the historian Afsaneh Najmabadi has stressed, many of the old vagaries of love lingered into social parameters that highlighted sex and sexuality for many Iranians: “Qajar Iran began with a concept of love embedded in Sufi allegorical associations. Love and desire in this discourse were intimately linked with beauty and could be generated in a man at least as easily by a beautiful young man as by a young female. In early Qajar art, for instance, beauty was not distinguished by gender” (2013, 4). Najmabadi further observes that it was only at the end of the nineteenth century that “a highly gender-differentiated portrayal of beauty emerged, along with a concept of love that assumed heterosexuality as natural” (4). That said, sex obscurity is something that Iranian culture can relate to and has been able to relate to for centuries. However, transferring the figurative unto the realm of the real is another matter.

Religious Rulings

The role of sex and sexuality in the Persian-speaking world and then eventually in what was to become Iran has been extraordinarily nuanced, first in terms of cultural-historical dogma and later on by the Shiʻatization of Iran. “The earliest non-intersex sex change surgery reported in the Iranian press dates back to 1973, and by the early 1970s, at least one hospital in Tehran and one in Shiraz were carrying out such procedures. But in a 1976 decision, the Medical Association of Iran ruled that sex change operations, except in intersex cases, were ethically unacceptable” (Terman 2014). The greatest impact on the legality of sex-change operations in Iran came about through a fatwa (religious decree) by Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini (1902–1989). The first of these fatwas (1964) yielded no change in terms of the medical and legal status of the operation until Khomeini came to power in the Islamic Revolution of 1979. Khomeini’s fatwa deemed being a male and having female tendencies, or vice versa, a medical condition; this ruling removed, on paper, the taboo of having a morality disorder, which in Shi‘ite Iran can yield cruel rulings against an individual, especially under the auspices of an Islamic state modus vivendi. When he reissued this fatwa in 1985, it was canonized.

Regardless, there are no gray lines that one can speak of with regard to differences between homosexuality and transsexuality in Iran to this day, and the moral questioning of the individual endures. Nonetheless, the laws that now allow and even fund sex-change operations see transsexuality as a psychological disorder, and homosexuality a moral deviance punishable, often, by death. In Iran, the options between a homosexual existence and a transsexual existence offer little real choice, as many in the homosexual community have opted for sex changes to facilitate their state of being within that society. There is an irony with regard to the legality of sex change in Iran. The syllogism that legitimizes sex change in accord with shariʿa contains a considerable flaw, and to better understand this irony in Iran, it is best to first consider its jurisprudential parameters, as this will also give a clear understanding of the reasons behind the legal acceptance.

There are acute and nuanced differences between change in sexuality (taghir dar jinsiyyat) and sex change (taghir-i jinsiyyat). These two “general” categories function under the rubric of four different types of desire by the individual in accordance with the Islamic canon of Iran. Under the auspices of Islamic jurisprudence, the caveat for sex change is complicated and socially and philosophically compartmentalized as follows:

1. those who are not “sick” and yet want to change their sex;
2. those faced with emotional and physical confusion, are considered “sick,” and are striving psychologically to pinpoint their sexuality for a more satisfactory modus vivendi;
3. those who are intersex with distinguishable features, whence making the change would bring about the dominant identity;
4. those who are intersex (neuter) with nondistinguishable features, making the determination dubious at best.

The first is not permissible as there are no diagnoses deeming the person “ill,” and so the person’s intent to exercise this right in the form of an experimentation to lead them to a better lifestyle is considered an error in judgment and, hence, is a nonstarter. Those individuals’ desire, according to Islamic law, is to perform a “sex change,” which is haram (forbidden) as it implies questioning God’s providence. The second change in sexuality is allowed, however, because it is not considered a sex change but rather a change from a complete sex (jins-i kāmil) to an incomplete and nondistinct one (jins-i nāqis), as it is firmly believed such changes are at best superficial. The third is considered prudent, as the discrepancy in the identity hinges on body parts that are dominant yet not complete. The fourth is one of obscurity, as Islamic jurisprudence asks for caution in making decisions... with regard to it. These are situations where a definitive determination cannot be made about the dominant sex (dominant body parts) in an intersex individual.

In the first scenario, the Islamic law of Iran alludes to Qur’anic verses that deem any change to God’s intended creation an act of sin that yields another sin—and that which is burdened by a further sin of hurting oneself to achieve it and implies an inclination to neutrality rather than having a distinct sexual identity. There are legitimate chains of hadith (sayings of the prophet Muhammad) that behoove pondering into the technicalities interwoven into the fabric of modern-day interpretations in this regard: “God cursed men who resemble women, and women who resemble men” (Rāżī 1969b, 550; translation by Alireza Korangy). The act of dressing as the opposite sex implies—in accordance with Islamic logic (man?iq)—that God made a mistake in his creation, simply an unacceptable position. This understanding persists today, but there is an exception that has spurred the extraordinary number of sex-change operations in Iran, and which was likely considered by Khomeini in his fatwa: namely, that under the auspices of a religious amendment, when there is danger of injury to self in following a certain religious decree, exceptions can be made. The Qur’an, in Surat al-Ḥajj, alludes to a concept that has been adopted into the legal philosophy of Islam. Iḍṭirār wa ṭaraj, once applied to the sex-change operations, translates into a linguistic rhetorical coordination that implies that no one should be forced into a state of despair in performing his or her religious duties. The first part of a verse in that sura (chapter) clearly states, “And strive for Allah with the endeavor which is his right. He hath chosen you and hath not laid upon you in religion any hardship” (Surat al-Ḥajj, 22:78; translation by Alireza Korangy).

Maryam Khatoon Molkara

The first person to bring worldwide attention to the issue of sex-change operations in Iran was Maryam Khatoon Molkara (1950–2012), who was instrumental in Khomeini’s fatwa decreeing these operations as necessary. At a time when transsexuals and homosexuals were experiencing the same trials for acceptance, she secured a meeting in 1970 with Ayatollah Behbahani, who was considered a complete religious authority (vilāyat-i faqīh). In a protocol religious act, istikhāra (seeking prudence), the ayatollah apparently opened up the Qur’an at this fortuitous meeting and the book opened to the Surat Maryam (Sura 19), which refers to the Virgin Mary. This implied for the Ayatollah that Molkara would have struggles similar to those of Mary, and, therefore, it was ordained that he (at the time named Fereydoon) should change his sex to better face what was deemed for him from above—that is, God. It was also decided, however, that he should consult Khomeini, who was at that time in banishment in Iraq. Khomeini deemed it necessary for Molkara to undergo a sex-change operation because, as a religious individual, it was essential for him to have, once and for all, ascertained his identity in order to better perform his religious duties. It must be noted that Molkara, because of his struggles with his sex, had turned to religion most devotedly. This seems to be one of the main reasons why he was granted a hearing with both Ayatollah Behbahani and Ayatollah Khomeini.

Society and Sex Change Today

Psychologically, it is still quite difficult to live in Iran as a transsexual, as acceptance is rare at best. The social taboo surrounding the lifestyle underscores the severely stagnating social conditions for these individuals regardless of the religious allowances outlined above. Most of these cases of discrimination essentially start at a very basic family level where, for example, some who have had the psychological recommendation and have already been approved for an operation, deeming them otherwise suicidal, have faced physical abuse and even death at home at the hands of their fathers, who abide by a paternal code of machismo. And in a society where machismo stems from very strong cultural and religious dogmas, legality does not supersede social norms that have been doggedly embedded within the minds of Iranians for centuries.

On a more positive note, another interesting trajectory is included in Najmabadi's 2014 book Professing Selves: Transsexuality and Same-Sex Desire in Contemporary Iran. Najmabadi argues that the trans movement in Iran has been quite distinguishable from, say, the feminist movement, as the former is no longer a quest for rights per se. Transsexuals' battles on the field of social justice fall under the rubric of the pragmatic and not the philosophical or the religious—although the religious can, of course, influence some of those issues as well. Transsexuals focus their efforts on such matters as “negotiation and lobbying for needs” (211)—for example, entitlement to health coverage by insurance companies or state hospitals. Their major concerns were long addressed within the paradigm of Khomeini’s fatwa. Because they have won the sympathy of the clergy, transsexuals’ vulnerability in their dogmatic society is of a different kind from that of women. With the success of such organizations as the Iranian Society for Supporting Individuals with Gender Identity Disorder, the first legally registered trans advocacy group, this becomes ever more clear.

SEE ALSO Sex Reassignment Surgery in Asia; Shifting Sexual Norms in Nineteenth-Century Iran; Transgender Identity in Iranian Cinema; Transgendered Subjectivities in Contemporary Iran

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Sex Tourism in Asia

SHUCHI KARIM
Researcher, Gender and Diversity Centre
Radboud University, Netherlands

The status and impact of LGBT tourism to Asia.

Asia is the world’s largest and most populous continent, with regions that are diverse not only in their respective cultures and traditions but also in their histories of political and economic evolution. Colonialism and its aftermath continue to have a crucial impact on the emergence of sexuality, both as a discourse and practice, through its influences on religions, social norms, and legal provisions (especially through criminalization of homosexuality), making the contemporary lived realities of sexual subjects extremely heteronormative. Heteronormativity and dominant patriarchal structures of societies pave the way for discrimination and oppression of any identities or practices that are outside the boundaries of heterosexuality. Sexuality continues to be a highly politicized and divisive issue across the continent, especially when it comes to questions of sexual diversity and rights.

There are two broad challenges to achieving an understanding of sexuality in Asia, especially in the context of sex tourism and its impact on LGBTQ issues. First, the definition of Asia, as commonly used or understood, is increasingly the subject of political and academic critiques: is Asia a geopolitical concoction, a cultural notion, or a fictitious idea generated from the colonial past—a creation of Western forces, Asian elites, and/or imperialists within Asia? So, Asia as a term is highly political and not very innocent (Wilson 2006). Second, discussing sexuality, especially queer discourses in Asia, also remains highly problematic because of the fluidity of the location/s but also because, in general, in the Global South there is increasing critical analysis of sexuality that challenges the long-established Western hegemony and belief that queer subjectivities are solely Western exports that mimic the West. In reality, it is the result of regional inter-Asian influences and exchanges of economy, flows of people, and complex cultural interactions that are shaping sexual subjectivities and reinterpreting the various circuits, sites, and processes of informing sexuality (Kang 2017; Wilson 2006). For example, Thailand is a zone of interaction between Southeast and East Asia, and Southeast Asian regionalism and the growing impact of East Asian capital, media, and tourists are paramount to understanding Thai gender and sexuality (Kang 2014).

Sex tourism is tourism for commercial sex purposes, which is most commonly understood and interpreted as tourists from developed and/or Western countries traveling to developing countries to obtain sexual pleasure. As mentioned above, the role and influence of intra-Asian or regional sex tourism have expanded since the latter decades of the twentieth century. Critics point out that according to intersectional analysis of sex tourism, and often from the perspective of host nations, the process is more complex than simply procuring sexual gratification through commercial encounters, because it brings together political economy and culture, material relations and representations (Kang 2017; Wilson 2006; Truong 1983; Oppermann 1999; Pettman 1997; Pritchard and Morgan 2000; Chow-White 2006; Grewal and Kaplan 2001). Sex tourism in Asia is a product of a development process involving multiple factors: changes in international air travel, tourism, and the hospitality sector; feminized migrant labor; and the sexual vulnerability of poor women and children in particular. The struggling poorer nation-states, often newly decolonized and independent, chose to promote tourism as a development strategy, seeking foreign exchange in the face of growing indebtedness, trade liberalization, and pressure from international financial institutions to open up their economies (Truong 1983; Pettman 1997; Mason 1999). Western Europe, the United States, Japan, and Australia were noted for sending sex tourists to countries such as Thailand and the Philippines beginning in the 1960s, as these were significant sites for prostitution that catered to military bases—for example, the US air bases in Thailand and Vietnam (Truong 1983; Pettman 1997). Sex tourist destinations in these Asian locations were promoted and represented as exotic and erotic, creating the classic colonial image of the “Other” through feminization and sexualization of former colonies and their people (Truong 1983; Pritchard and Morgan 2000).

Nina Rao (1999) analyzed the complex dynamics Asian countries faced at the turn of the twenty-first century when countries had to make uneasy and difficult choices between economic vulnerability and globalized markets. Tourism is a symbol of liberalization, and consumption of sexual pleasure is seen as a privileged class experience. In the context of globalization this privilege is understood as a selective and ideological process that exploits and abuses the poor and the vulnerable—both individuals and countries at the receiving end of the free market. As developing countries, such as those in South Asia, for example, come under pressure to modernize and globalize, the market forces are seen as maintaining a conspiracy of silence regarding issues of sex tourism (Rao 1999). Sex tourism is predicated on differences in gender, class, and nation. Sex tourism in Asia has survived on a sustained construction and maintenance of performative identities in gender roles and sexuality that privilege dominant masculinity (of the consumer tourists, who are predominantly males of certain classes and nationalities) over the docile subjugated femininity of women, children, and gay/transgender bodies.

Sex tourism has had profound effects on the discourses of gender and sexuality, mostly through reproducing heteronormativity in host regions (Leheny 1995). The long history of sex tourism in different Asian countries has impacted sex and sexuality mostly in a negative way. The trafficking of women, sex slavery, child prostitution, and the spread of HIV/AIDS are commonly seen as direct outcomes of sex tourism. Child sex tourism is a significant part of sex tourism in Asia, especially in poorer countries that are also new entrants in the sex tourism industry, such as Nepal, Sri Lanka, Cambodia, and Vietnam, which are increasingly becoming a hub for international pedophile networks (Rao 1999; Bauer and McKercher 2003; Hodgson 1994; Cotter 2009).

With the rapid socioeconomic growth in Asia, robust attitudes toward nationalism, a renewed focus on preserving what are perceived as traditions and cultures, and the increasing influence of religious politics, many countries are becoming more conservative and radically heteronormative. Therefore, it is not surprising that a country such as Thailand that once used sex tourism as its flagship economic opportunity to earn foreign exchange is beginning to develop national strategies and policies for rebranding to shed the sexualized image of the state, its culture, and its people. In contrast, countries such as China, Hong Kong, Taiwan, and Singapore are adopting different strategies of combining their robust economies, modernization, and indulgent and inclusive aspects of sexualities in offering services and facilities more often associated with general tourism than with sex tourism specifically. The influence of sex tourism in Asia is perhaps more evident in regard to issues of sexual diversity and LGBT cultures, activism, and rights.

LGBT Sex Tourism

The majority of Asian countries have traditional societies and are heteropatriarchal in their normative practices and laws, which means homophobia, criminalization of same-sex practices and unions, and discrimination based on gender and sexual identities are common. Two reports from the International Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, Trans and Intersex Association (ILGA), “Sexual Orientation Laws in the World—Overview” (ILGA 2017) and State-Sponsored Homophobia: A World Survey of Sexual Orientation Laws: Criminalisation, Protection, and Recognition (Carroll and Mendos 2017), show that twenty-three Asian countries have made same-sex sexual activities illegal, while five countries have legalized same-sex sexual activity. In addition, thirteen countries prohibit the establishment or registration of sexual orientation–related organizations such as nongovernmental organizations. In two Asian countries (Pakistan and Afghanistan), the death penalty is codified in law but not implemented for same-sex sexual activities specifically. On a positive note, there are countries that have constitutional prohibitions on discrimination based on gender and/or sexual orientation, including Nepal, or prohibitions on discrimination in employment (South Korea, Taiwan, and Thailand).

Sex tourism and its impact on sexuality, especially in the areas of “gay friendliness,” rights, and activism, need to be understood in these socio-legal contexts. Perspectives from South, East, and Southeast Asia show that across the regions there was a period of dramatic and rapid transformation in the last decades of the twentieth century and the beginning of the twenty-first century in relation to new gender/sex categories and sexual and erotic cultures. This was a result of multiple influences, including economic, social, and technological transformations in the context of globalizing market capitalism; hybridization of local and global culture and discourses; and increased rates of human movement through tourism, which contributed to the expansion of a human rights agenda on gender and sexuality rights (Jackson 2001).

Circuit parties (annual events that take place on the same weekend in the same location, attended almost exclusively by gay men) are gay spaces that have become increasingly popular in Asia. Moving away from their origin in the West, circuit parties emerged in East Asian gay-friendly cities (e.g., Bangkok, Seoul, Hong Kong) in the early twenty-first century (Westhaver 2005). Circuit parties are a subject of debate because, on the one hand, they provide a space that allows gay communities to openly express their sexual orientations and sexualities and can serve as a platform for asserting their sexual rights from sociopolitical positionality. On the other hand, research has shown that circuit parties may play a role in the rise in HIV among men who have sex with men (MSM) in Asia.

International travel and sex tourism facilitated the spread of HIV and sexually transmitted diseases (STDs) across the globe, and Asian host countries are therefore vulnerable to HIV/STD epidemics among MSM residing in and traveling to these destinations (Cheung, Lim, and Guadamuz 2015).

LGBT tourism is a multibillion-dollar industry, and the tourism industry has been quick to embrace the “pink” travel economy that caters to LGBT travelers. Critics point out that even though many Asian countries remain anti-LGBT in their legal frameworks and have been trying to avoid LGBT identity–based rights issues, countries such as Singapore, Taiwan, and South Korea have embraced some form of “pinkwashing” or homonationalism for economic gain, especially from the early twenty-first century onward. Approximately 35 million overnight visitors who traveled to international destinations around the world in 2015 were part of the LGBT community, and more than 8 million of them traveled to Asia and the Pacific, accounting for $12.5 billion in tourism receipts (Henry-Biabaud 2016). These travelers tend to be white, affluent, educated, and bourgeois. Selling a gay-friendly tourist market destination endorses the (homo)sexualization of the nation and the city, as well as the gendering and sexualization of the tourist body that are embedded in particular politics, economies, and subjectivities. But the asymmetrical transnational power relations between the Western homonormative gay tourist consumers and the tourism workers in the host countries also include possibilities for new sexual identities, expressions, and networking that contribute to battling homophobia and other social taboos (Waitt, Markwell, and Gorman-Murray 2008; UNWTO 2012).

Dredge Kang (2014) discusses the transnational element in Thailand’s ever-changing and evolving “genderscapes,” or the terrain of gender and sexuality. The traditional categories are grounded via the repetition and ritualization of routine practices in everyday life, but at the same time they remain fluid in their intentions and interpretations, especially in their performances—and these are the result of historical transformations and the localization of foreign influences. What is more fascinating is that the local gender variations, rather than being usurped by modern Western forms, continue to expand in Asia. Dana Collins (2009) argues that in the Philippines, for example, although the common perception is that Western LGBT tourists and expats influence Asian queer identities along the lines of a more Western global discourse, especially through identity politics, it is also undeniable that the interactions between gay hosts and international (mostly Western) guests allow for the development of new strategies of hybrid and emergent sexualities, activism, and discourses, which result not just from commodified sexual relations with Westerners. Moreover, the employment of working-class gay men in LGBT tourism, sexual or otherwise, enables them to achieve middle-class status, satisfying their need for social mobility and visibility, as well as to formulate a resistance to class polarization and heteronormativity.

Collins's research in Asian contexts (2009) shows how gender and sexuality are both transformed and troubled through transnational relations of mobility. The author offers a theorization of homonormative mobility to explain discourses of normative gender, race, nation, and desire in gay travel. Specifically, she says that expatriates describe their mobility as an escape from the heteronormative controls they face at home, allowing them to acquire masculine access to freeing places in “foreign” playgrounds and to have a desirable experience that builds their own self-confidence.

Gay tourism often depicts travel destinations as spaces of global gay consumerism, both materially and erotically. At the same time, it depicts Western gay tourists as representing freedom of sexual identities and rights, which produces strong beliefs about a supposedly universal (and the only acceptable) model of gay identity and practices, which all cultures and contexts should deliver. Often these travels are attempts to escape from heteronormative controls and regulations at home. Tourists and expats embark on their journeys in the belief that foreign destinations can serve as playgrounds for establishing masculinity by creating homo-Orientalist desire for the men in Far Eastern destinations, and by doing so, they reproduce homonormativity and normalize masculinities through sexual adventures, racialization of the host men, and naturalization of Western gay identity abroad (Puar 2001; Collins 2009). The Global Report on LGBT Tourism (UNWTO 2012) observes that many consumers of LGBT tourism are becoming highly receptive to the ethical side of tourism, which promotes products and services that are socially and environmentally responsible. The consumer can become an actor in social change by either contributing money or participating in actions in host countries.

Lesbians and Sex Tourism

Research on female consumers of sex tourism is less prolific and principally focuses on heterosexual and mostly white female tourists from Europe and North America. Female sex tourists, like their male counterparts, also employ fantasies of Otherness and class and race privilege. Studies of female sex tourism show that although they acknowledge some economic elements and material transactions, including exchanges of money, female sex tourists prefer to refer to their encounters as “romance tourism” (Jeffreys 2003). Information on female sex tourism in general, and lesbians’ “pink tourism” in particular, is very limited. Julia O’Connell Davidson (1998) notes that although heterosexual female sex tourism is a far rarer phenomenon in terms of numbers compared to male sex tourism, it is not uncommon for Western lesbians to engage in sex tourism (see also Jeffreys 2003). One of the reasons cited for the limited knowledge on the subject is the markets’ own prejudices and lack of interest in lesbians as consumers compared to gay men (Hughes 2006). Some studies have found that lesbians tend to be low-maintenance travelers and more likely to be interested in adventures rather than services. The stereotype of lesbians as low-budget and frugal tourists contributes to lesbian invisibility in LGBT tourism landscapes because they are not seen as lucrative consumer target groups, though studies show that lesbian women are actually frequent travelers and have as much disposable income as gay men (UNWTO 2012).

It is not only lesbian tourists who are invisible, according to Alexander, who points out what is essentially problematic about Western gay tourism discourse: it is deeply colonial and depicted as white and male, and it denies women, bisexuals, and native queers. In other words, white gay capital follows the path of white heterosexual capital, excluding queer women, queers of color, and postcolonial lesbian and gays implicated in the process (1997, 1998). Jasbir Puar (2002) links the dearth of lesbian tourist accounts and research to differences in gendered relations to globalization and tourism. Though there is not much focused work on lesbian sex tourism in Asia, Annette Pritchard and colleagues’ 2000 article “Sexuality and Holiday Choices: Conversations with Gay and Lesbian Tourists” analyzed the distinct differences between gay men and lesbian women as tourists. They found that gay vacations are defined (by both gays and lesbians) in relation to sex, while lesbian holidays lacked the strong associations with sex and the body. Also, lesbians preferred to be more cautious in terms of their visibility for safety reasons and to avoid attention from the mainstream heterosexual population (Pritchard et al. 2000b).

Influence of Sex Tourism on LGBT Subcultures, Visibilities, and Activism

Critical scholarship has pointed out the ways that LGBT tourism can influence the local cultures of diverse sexualities. Transgender communities across Asia and the Pacific are more visible than LGB communities, and though there are varied degrees of social acceptance and tolerance of transgender people in most Asian societies, nevertheless they still face marginalization and discrimination that often result in very limited access to resources, amenities, and basic civil rights such as education, employment, and housing.
From legal perspectives, it is still a mixed bag for transgender rights; for example, Malaysia prosecutes people whose gender identity differs from the sex assigned to them at birth. Legal recognition is somewhat possible elsewhere in Asia, including in Bangladesh, India, and Nepal. In Japan, Singapore, South Korea, Taiwan, Hong Kong, and China, legal recognition of one’s preferred gender is possible but often requires irreversible and invasive procedures. Sometimes, legal processes involve discriminatory and humiliating diagnoses of mental illness. Interestingly, Thailand is the first country in Asia to pass a nondiscrimination law to protect gender expression, and it and has become the regional hub for sex-reassignment surgeries, although it does not have a legal gender recognition policy (Health Policy Project et al. 2015). Marginalization of transgender people (both socially and economically) is nevertheless common, and they are often the most visible segment of a sex industry. Researchers like Witchayanee Ocha and Barbara Earth (2013) show, for example, that sex tourism and related sex industries in Thailand facilitate the emergence of new third-gender identities (among sex workers). Ocha and Earth indicate that the sex industry helps transgender/transsexual sex workers to finance procedures that align their physical bodies with their preferred gender identities.

One of the major criticisms of LGBT sex tourism has to do with its tendency to reproduce colonial hierarchies, Otherness, and homonormativity (Alexander 2005; Puar 2002). The making of gay-friendly tourist markets contributes to the constructions of global and local sexualities, as these spaces create communities through encounters between hosts and guests. On a broader scale, the pink economy operates through the workings of governance and capitalism, and the outcome of this can be contradictory: the government can maintain heteronormativity at the national level by denying rights or recognition to certain gender and sexual identities/practices, but at the same time it can normalize gayness within the neoliberal market economy of the state by promoting gay-friendly destinations at the local level (Puar 2002).

The United Nations World Tourism Organization (UNWTO) issued its Global Report on LGBT Tourism in 2012, highlighting new destination countries that are starting to compete with more established countries by promoting their gay friendliness in terms of tolerance or their large resident LGBT communities. Many countries have begun to realize that human rights considerations have positive effects on their economies and to actively promote LGBT tourism as a result. Tourism companies and boards in Asian countries such as South Korea promote their countries as the new destinations for LGBT travelers by showcasing emerging LGBT civil rights movements and cultural events, including pride festivals, LGBT film festivals, and similar gay-friendly events. In the UNWTO report, Ryan Choi, the International Gay and Lesbian Travel Association ambassador to South Korea, touts LGBT tourism to South Korea as an opportunity for travelers to serve as “goodwill LGBT ambassadors” who can “leave a positive impression on South Korea to inspire change” (2012, 26). Similarly, the Indian ambassador, Abhinav Goel, invites LGBT tourists to become a part of a “rare opportunity to experience this historic birth and transformation among the LGBT community” in India (2012, 27).

Promoting gay-friendly spaces by marking areas within cities as sexualized and eroticized as well as “safe” or “tolerant” (e.g., neighborhoods with gay bars, clubs, cruising areas, and restaurants that make up the “gay scene”) actually creates a stricter heterosexual/homosexual dualism, thus naturalizing heteronormativity beyond the borders of these spaces (Jackson 2001). Studies on Singapore note the emergence of creative and often contradictory ways of making these boundaries less confrontational or operating through binaries of nonrecognition and acknowledgment of queer existence (Yue and Leung 2017; Yue 2007; Lim 2005). Audrey Yue and Helen Hok-Sze Leung (2017) analyze how Singapore invented itself as a queer city attracting global gay tourism in the context of events elsewhere in East and Southeast Asia, such as the commerce-led boom of queer Bangkok, the rise of middle-class gay consumer cultures in Manila and Hong Kong, and thriving underground LGBT scenes in Shanghai and Beijing. In the case of Singapore, where same-sex sexual practices are still illegal, it has created spaces for representations of homosexuality through a creative economy built on cultural institutions (film, theater, nightlife), allowing new sexual subjects and expressions to thrive. Queer mobility and sexual recognition without addressing sexual rights in Singapore is an outcome of three factors: migration, gay tourism, and sexual assimilation. Gay tourism is materialized through urban and home affairs policies at the state level, as well as on the ground through activism that ensures planning and management of spaces such as parks and neighborhoods that are known for activities that center on or cater to LGBT interests. In the process, homonormative activities such as pride parades become indicators of gay friendliness as well as assertions of visibility for LGBT communities at the local level.

These visibilities, outcomes of glocalization (the simultaneous occurrence of both universalizing and particularizing tendencies in contemporary social, political, and economic systems) of queer activism, can produce different consequences in different nations. On the one hand, these events can assert strong political symbolism, as was the case in Taiwan’s 2017 progression toward sexual rights and equality; on the other hand, backlash can result in the persecution of activists, as was the case in Bangladesh in 2016 when two LGBT activists were hacked to death by Islamist militants, or in China, where pride parade organizers were detained in 2013. Especially since the middle of the first decade of the twenty-first century, while many countries in Asia have battled over laws around sexuality and LGBT rights in particular (including India, Bangladesh, Indonesia, and Mongolia), other countries have advocated gay friendliness as part of their national branding (including South Korea, Hong Kong, Singapore, China, and Taiwan). A 2016 study by the Pacific Asia Travel Association examined the way the treatment of LGBT people impacted economic development in thirty-nine emerging economies, including China, Taiwan, India, Indonesia, Malaysia, Pakistan, the Philippines, and Thailand. The results show a positive correlation between per capita gross domestic product and LGBT rights. China, India, Vietnam, and Cambodia currently rank among the Asian destinations most popular with LGBTQ tourists [Henry-Biabaud 2016].

Sexuality in the context of Asia is complex, to say the least, with its socioeconomic and cultural contexts of inclusivity, as well as exclusivity politics at various historical points from the precolonial or premodern era to contemporary times. Social integration and acceptance of nonnormative gender and sexual identities and practices, discrimination and violent backlashes against the same identities, and the rise of rights movements are all part of the complex and often contradictory constructions of sexuality discourse. It is more than a struggle between “tradition” and “modernity,” because these are not exclusive to each other, at least not in this region.

The role of sex tourism in this complexity of sexuality discourses is, therefore, highly interesting. Sex tourism in many ways contributes to sustaining gender discrimination, the gender hierarchy, and the patriarchal nature of the political economy of sex through sexual violence, exploitation, and oppression. Yet, age-old strict norms and regulations on heterosexuality that preserve gender roles of masculinity and femininity are changing because of greater interaction between cultures, which includes reverse tourism as large numbers of Asians are now traveling to and residing in Western countries in a much more fluid way, and with stronger monetary power. Sex tourism and sex tourists are not that influential in altering discourses on sexuality and gender, except that they maintain certain colonial and/or imperial notions of the “Other” through race power relations. Interestingly though, LGBT tourism, of which sex tourism is a prominent part, increased as a market as part of a global queer travel culture and has had contradictory influences on LGBT positions in Asia, including gay subcultures, activism, and rights issues. LGBT (sex) tourists continue to engage with local LGBT communities beyond the power of their pink economy and contribute to bringing the global to the local.

SEE ALSO Cruising and Cruising Grounds; Gay European Tourism Association; Resorts; Sex Tourism in Latin America and the Caribbean; Sex Tourism in the Middle East; Sex Work in Asia; Sex Work/Sex Tourism/Sex Trafficking in Africa; Travel/Travelogues on the Middle East

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Sex Tourism in Latin America and the Caribbean

AMALIA CABEZAS
Associate Professor
University of California, Riverside

MZILIKAZI KONÉ
Lecturer
University of California, Riverside

The state of queer sex work in various countries in Latin America and the Caribbean, as well as of organizations that support queer sex workers.

Although most of the research on sex tourism analyzes relations between heterosexual men from the Global North traveling to purchase sex from women in the Global South, same-sex and gender-nonconforming paid encounters between tourists and locals have a long history dating back to at least the nineteenth century (and likely much earlier). Most academic studies documenting nonheterosexual sex tourism focus on same-sex relations between men. Queer studies of lesbian and transgender sex tourism are largely absent from the scholarship.

The phenomenon of male and female sex tourists journeying from North America and Europe to Latin America and the Caribbean is not new, but the growth of mass tourism as a strategy for economic development, combined with increased disposable income in the Global North, has intensified sexual economies linked to foreigners. Nations in the region must outcompete each other in an effort to offer “authentic” cultural experiences to tourists. Arguably, the expansion of tourism in the region should be helpful to the growth of the local economy, but as many scholars have noted, the bulk of the benefit in the tourist industry is aimed toward transnational companies rather than the workers. The growth of the international tourist industries, frequently packaged as “all-inclusive” resorts, has led to the employment of multitudes of workers, though they tend to be low-waged and unskilled laborers. A prevalent critique of the mass tourism industry is that, while serving as an important source of income for impoverished countries, it does not provide sufficient opportunities for locals to thrive.

In the tourism sector, low wages and high demand for erotic services account for many of the locals participating in the sex trade, not just as sex workers but also as procurers, taxi drivers, and restaurant and bar employees. Everyday laborers want to access the resources that result from foreign tourism and increasingly must do so through the informal sector.
The economic result for people in Latin America and the Caribbean causes them not only to migrate to areas known for tourism but also to become involved in sex tourism and the informal labor sector in order to make money and perhaps even secure a ticket out of the country by establishing a relationship with a customer. Thus, travel and tourism have changed the face of prostitution, as ideas of romantic love blur the lines of the sex trade and international migration.

Queer sex tourism denotes the commodification of sex for money, but these sexual encounters also include gifts and other material and economic benefits attached to relationships that can evolve over time into romance, companionship, friendship, and queer kinship. The notion of sex tourism is ambiguous and difficult to define because of the flexibility and transformations inherent in the encounters between hosts and guests. Tourist-foreigner liaisons, for instance, are fluid in nature. These liaisons can free people to negotiate identities and relationships. For example, it is not uncommon for heterosexually identified tourists to seek sexual adventures with queer folk while on holiday. Within the queer enclaves of tourist sites, there are also many heterosexually identified men performing as gay sex workers.

While informality, fluidity, and spontaneity are characteristics of sex tourism—with encounters taking place on beaches and in discos and bars—queer sex tourism is also formally promoted via gay travel guides, websites, social networks, and organized tours. High levels of disposable income in the gay male communities of North America have generated many different tourist services promoting travel opportunities for sexual minorities.

Colonial Power Relations of Race

Sex tourism is conceptualized primarily as people from the Global North (former empires and current wealthier nations) traveling to destinations in the Global South that are not only poverty-stricken but were geographically inscribed as exotic and erotic destinations. What is understood as queer sex tourism is a field of study layered and crossed with power dynamics that include gender, racial, sexual, and class hierarchies constructed within historical relations of imperialist domination (and reinforced in the nineteenth century, during the era of independence from Spain and the processes of nation-building). There are many different dynamics occurring in sex tourism relationships, including an imbalanced economic exchange challenging locals to adjust to the new dynamics, racialized fantasies of the exotic “other,” and the use of a specific aesthetic to signal authentic local identity and desire (Kempadoo 2001). For instance, the combination of essentialist perceptions of black sexuality with stylistic aesthetics, suggested by markers like dreadlocks and black skin, works alongside notions of the heightened sexuality and vigor of the “native” people (Pruitt and LaFont 1995). These ideas reanimate and reconstruct relationships of domination between the North American and European tourists within the context of travel to Latin America and the Caribbean.

The racialized perceptions and desires of tourists, and the accompanying marketing of sexual and erotic escapes, allow people with the financial means to drive the labor and romantic decisions and practices of people in the countries visited. In the context of research focusing on queer sex tourism to the region, studies frame a generalized idea about race, based on colonial constructs, between the Global North and South. The research on queer travel in the twentieth and twenty-first centuries portrays vacationers to Latin America and the Caribbean as primarily white, and the partners in Latin America and the Caribbean as brown- or black-skinned people. There are complex racial identities throughout the region, but what seems persistent is the browning of the racialized “other” in Latin America and the Caribbean. This, however, ignores some important points, like the presence of queer people of color as tourists, the presence of South Americans who visit the Caribbean or other parts of Latin America for sex, and the presence of white Latin Americans who also sell sex.

There are unspoken histories between racialized groups as they come together through the tourism experience. Even as strangers seek to meet for both romance and sex, there exist weighted histories of exotification of the sexual other. For example, the discourse describing black men and women as more natural, primitive, aggressive, sexual, and primal exposed in contemporary ethnographies on sex tourism reflects the historical thread connecting racialized perceptions of black sexuality from the past to the present (Hill Collins 2004; Kempadoo 2004; Saunders 2010). Kamala Kempadoo notes the way these historical perceptions play out in the tourism market: “Caribbean men and women alike were constructed in tourist imaginations as racialized-sexual subject/objects—the hypersexual ‘Black male stud’ and the ‘hot’ Brown or Black woman—whose main roles were to serve and please the visitor. Both women and men represented ‘the exotic’ to the tourist” (2001, 50). It is clear, moreover, that the exotification of black men and women by tourists, combined with a self-essentializing language around race, sexuality, and sexual vigor, is used to attract partners and clients, suggesting that the exotic “other” can reap economic and personal benefits by playing up ideas of an essential sexuality connected to blackness. Affirmations about one’s own hotness, virility, and strength seek to attract tourists while holding firm on what ultimately amounts to stereotypes about black and mixed-race sexual prowess (Allen 2007). In his work on Cuba, Jafari Sinclaire Allen notes how this affects relationships:

The demands and perceived preferences of these visitors drive supplies of old Cuban music, old Cuban costumes, old Cuban racial hierarchies, and old macho structures of feeling and gender/sex roles—this is in no way to say that these are “false” or obsolete, but certainly unreconstructed, if not emotionally and sexually satisfying for the partners. Sex laborers exploit this, mostly in a very self-conscious way. The market for male sex laborers is driven by strongly held notions of hyperactive Cuban masculinity (machismo), romance, and sexual organs of legendary proportions.

(2007, 197)

Tourists are attracted to locked hair, for example, as exuding virility, wildness, strength. This reflects broad perceptions of sexuality as related to race. Ideas of racial differences posit the “natives” as black virile men with lots of sexual energy and large penises, black women as hypersexual and aggressive, and mixed-race women as exotic mulattas (Arrizón 2002; Kempadoo 2001; Fernandez 1999; Phillips 1999; Pruitt and LaFont 1995). These highly gendered and racialized perspectives on sexuality are often passed off as fact.

It is significant that most academic investigations on queer sex tourism have taken place in the Caribbean islands and in Brazil and Mexico. While there have been investigations into, for example, male sex work in other countries, they seldom identify the gender and sexuality of clients. Some of the studies hint at or mention in passing the presence of queer and transgender women, but generally there is an absence of research for these populations. We detail these findings on queer sex tourism below and conclude with an assessment of the sex-worker movement in Latin America.

Queer Sex Work in Specific Countries

The following section examines some of the major studies conducted by scholars working in Latin America and the Caribbean. This review primarily lists investigations published in English and Spanish.

Cuba Historians and other scholars have uncovered sex tourism and queer geographies in cosmopolitan cities such as Havana, Cuba’s largest city and historically the most urban space of the Caribbean. As the capital and principal port of Cuba, Havana had extensive connections to Europe and North and South America. This meant that travelers—whether merchants, sailors, industrialists, immigrants, tourists, or military occupational forces—were exposed to Cuba’s vibrant nightlife. The colonial area of nineteenth-century Havana had public locations, such as the Parque Central, that were widely known as queer meeting spaces. In the late nineteenth century, queer sex workers could be found working in the brothels of the red-light district of Havana. In the early twentieth century, sex-oriented businesses included male brothels, adult cinemas, and countless bars catering to male same-sex desires, such as Dirty Dick, Johnny’s Bar, and the Barrilito, where tourists and locals could socialize day and night. After the Cuban Revolution of 1959, the United States severed relations with Cuba and imposed a trade embargo, effectively ending Cuba’s tourist industry.

Since the late nineteenth century, Havana's sex industry has served as an enclave for gender nonconforming individuals who labored, for example, selling heterosexual sex. Cuba's sexual markets of the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries included lesbian sex workers who provided erotic services to men. These patterns continue in present-day Havana, with queer women working as both brokers in the sex trade and laborers who provide sexual service to men and women.

In Havana and other Cuban tourist destinations, sexual markets declined with the Cuban Revolution, but they resurfaced with the rise in poverty exacerbated by the end of the socialist-trading bloc and Soviet subsidies beginning in 1989. As a result, present-day Havana has attracted scholarly attention for its large, visible, and vibrant sex trade, particularly its queer erotic laborers. New identities have emerged that partially advertise sex practices, such as the pinguero (shorthand for one who works with his penis). The term jinetera/o, which respectively refers to a female or male hustler, distances sex workers from terms (or “identities”) that carry the stigma of prostitution. Jineteras/os hustle foreigners for dollars to acquire necessities and luxuries or to gain access to spaces that are otherwise too expensive for denizens.

There is also a vibrant community of transsexuals and transvestites, many of whom make a living with foreigners, in Havana and other large Cuban cities. House parties, bars, nightclubs, cinemas, beaches, parks, and cafés connect foreigners with Cubans and mingle transvestites, pingueros, and jineteros. Although gender-nonconforming people experience considerable harassment, violence, incarceration, and prosecution by state authorities, there are now also queerer public spaces and queer-friendly discos that are tolerant of gender-nonconforming Cubans and their foreign clients. While sex work is not illegal in Cuba, transgressing and offending socialist sensibilities can be fined and criminalized according to the subjective judgment of the police. This gray area of the law means that the police have discretion to harass and extort participants in the sex trade.

Queer sex work has a long history in Cuba. Even though it has attracted scholarship since the late 1990s (Barron 2015; Fosado 2005; Hodge 2001, 2005, 2014; Allen 2007, 2011; Stout 2008, 2014), further studies are needed to elucidate the dynamics of the sex trade and the lives of all the participants. For instance, we need further accounts of the history of queer commercial sex, including the hazards and benefits experienced by participants, their romantic partners, communities, and families. Further investigations are also needed on how the domestic sex trade works, how commercial sexual settings operate in tourist destinations outside of Havana, how the formal tourist economy is connected to queer sex work, the possibilities for state recognition of sex work as a form of labor, and organizing for queer and sex-worker rights.
Dominican Republic Another Caribbean country with a history of queer sex tourism is the Dominican Republic. Male sex workers known as sanky panky, a word play on hanky panky, are popular with both male and female travelers looking for sexual adventure. Since at least the 1970s, young black men in the Dominican Republic have provided sexual services to tourists from North America and Western Europe. Gay male sex tourism was popular in the 1970s, with gay specialty cruise ships arriving in Puerto Plata, on the north coast of the Dominican Republic, on a regular basis. However, with the rise in homophobia associated with the spread of HIV/AIDS and an increase in the number of women travelers in the 1980s, some male sex workers started to perform sexual services primarily with women. Consequently, it is common for male sex workers to offer romance, companionship, and sex to both male and female visitors.

A sanky panky interviewed by anthropologist Mark Padilla revealed that he was initiated into sex-for-money exchanges with tourists by a friend who told him, “Look, a lot of American guys come here. Here they pay you. You have a good piece [pedazo, meaning penis] between your legs. With that you can make a lot of money.’ So, he educated me in what the search [la busqueda, roughly, sex work] is, because he had been in that environment and he knew how things worked there” (Padilla 2008, 786). This informant went on to specialize in providing sexual services to gay tourists. Contacts with gay business owners and a wealthy foreign clientele eventually led him to start an “agency” of sex workers who serve international queer visitors (Padilla 2008). While most of the sex-worker population is involved in sex tourism in direct sex-for-money exchanges, Padilla (2007, 2008) uncovered long-term romantic arrangements between young Dominican men and their older “Western Union daddies” from abroad. “Western Union daddies” refers to queer men who send financial remittances to their Dominican love interests. Ambiguous and complicated sexual-romantic relations mark these affairs, as participants seek affectual and queer kinship relations that challenge ideas of “casual sex.” Further research is needed to examine trans and women’s involvement, as well as that of Haitians and Haitian-Dominicans who participate in commercial erotic encounters with travelers.

Barbados The homoerotic social scene in Barbados presents a niche that attracts not only men traveling from the United States, Canada, and Europe but also intraregional tourists. Young black men—referred to as beach boys, hustlers, or beach bums—meet older tourists at gay bars and hotels, beaches, and local dance clubs. Barbadian “queens,” meaning effeminate gay men and trans women, are also visible in the sex trade. As David Murray (2012) details in an incisive analysis of queer life in Barbados, the diverse homoerotic social and sexual life on the island does not easily conform to Euro-American notions of gay identity. The idea that Murray expounds is that “Bajan” desires and sexual practices disrupt Western categories of “gay,” “queen,” and “transgender.” Unaware of cultural differences, foreigners assume stances of cultural superiority and “gay liberation” in relation to local populations. Nevertheless, economic necessity is, at times, the driving force for paid relations with transnational tourists, as working-class queens were involved in such occupations as gas-station cashiers, hairdressing, and dressmaking that did not cover the cost of living (Murray 2012). Murray’s scholarship is a welcome exploration of the power dynamics at play in the ways in which “gay tourism may re-inscribe other modernist themes of progress, liberation, and individual freedom that reinforce political and economic inequalities between citizens of Euro-American and post-colonial nations” (2012, 56).

Brazil’s famed beaches attract both gay-identified and heterosexual men interested in sex. Queer sex tourism is widespread, not only in the touristic southeast cities of Rio de Janeiro and São Paulo but also in the Northeast and the Amazon rain forest. Historian James Green (1999), who has written extensively about queer life in Brazil, has documented the development of male same-sex communities in cities such as Rio de Janeiro. Men seeking other men during the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries used public parks, bars, cabarets, theaters, and music halls to find and build connections. By the mid-twentieth century, queers appropriated the yearly Carnival celebration and its attendant activities to create a space in Brazilian society and global culture on the margins of heteronormativity. In the 1970s, it was obvious that the Rio Carnival, for example, had become a rich spectacle that presented an opportunity for queer socializing and sexual economies, as the festivities became one of the most visible markers of gay life in Brazil. Carnival was attracting gay tourists from the Global North and queer porn filmmakers.

Another significant transformation in the 1970s was the visibility of michês, or garotos de programa, as young male hustlers are known. The michês are heterosexual or gay and perform queer commercial sex to escape their economically disadvantaged backgrounds. They perform hypermasculinity in the gay brothel-style saunas, as well as at beaches, parks, and other outdoor spaces. Prostitution is a way to make a living accompanied with the possibility for international migration and long-term financial support. Tourists originate primarily from the United States and Europe and are diverse in age, political affiliation, socioeconomic status, and race. Racialized sexuality, in particular, is a central attraction for tourists regardless of their background, with many of the vacationers preferring darker-skinned rent boys.

Prior to the 1990s, hustlers tended to work the street corners and train stations selling sex to openly effeminate gay men and to closeted married men. The growth in gay tourism during the 1990s channeled garotos into indoor venues with foreigners because of the enhanced financial rewards and safer working conditions. Long-term connections with clients have created queer forms of kinship, with garotos hosting their benefactors on yearly visits and crafting fictive families of “uncles” and “godfathers.” Clients tend to be generous and attempt to “save” michês from sex work by funding shopping sprees, education, housing, and family expenses. Regular clients also arrange for vacation travel and visas to Europe and the United States. For those who identify and otherwise perform heterosexually, these associations support heterosexual marriages, children, and consumerist lifestyles.

In Brazil, sex-working _travestis_ have received attention from scholars. _Travestis_ refers to homosexual men who cross-dress. Starting in the 1970s, the advent of hormone therapy made it possible for men to modify their bodies, adopt women's names and linguistic pronouns, and use hormones and silicone to transform their bodies, emulating women's shapes (_Kulick 1998_). However, Don Kulick affirms that _travestis_ are not trying to be women and do not consider themselves transsexuals. Rather, as Kulick explains in his ethnography of the Bahian city of Salvador, they are “males who ardently desire men, who fashion and perfect themselves as an object of desire for those men” (_1998, 6_). Sex work for them is a profession that supplies a source of livelihood, pleasure, and personal worth. It is a valued aspect of a _travesti_'s life. Working in the streets, beaches, pornographic cinemas, or through agencies, _travestis_ sell sex primarily to other Brazilians and not to foreigners. Kulick clarifies that _travesti_ sex workers try to evade problems from the tourism police, who tend to protect tourists from sex workers. Further research is needed to ascertain if the exclusion of tourists as customers is still the practice in the twenty-first century.

Mexico Next to the United States, Mexico receives the largest number of international tourist arrivals in the Americas. Port cities like Veracruz have a long history of sexual commerce between tourists and natives. Other major cities, such as Guadalajara, Monterrey, and Tijuana, are known for their gay enclaves. These cities, along with beach resorts, such as Puerto Vallarta, Acapulco, Cozumel, and Cancún, have well-established male sexual economies. Since the late 1990s, a number of studies have illuminated the lives of these workers (_Cantú 2002; Córdova 2010; Howe, Zaraysky, and Lorentzen 2008; López López and Van Broeck 2010; Mendoza 2014_).

In Veracruz, for instance, the colloquial (and often derogatory) term _mayate_ denotes a male sex worker. Anthropological studies of _mayates_ during the late twentieth and early twenty-first centuries indicate that there is a consumer preference for Afro-mestizos, as Veracruz is a region of Mexico with a large community of people of African descent. Here, heterosexual men and trans women work in the historic city center as streetwalkers. Erotic services are readily available in a wide array of settings, such as parks, hotels renting by the hour, bars, nightclubs, beaches, strip shows, live gay sex shows, and bathhouses. Print media also publicize massages and escort services aimed at men. _Embarcados_ (embarkers) form a niche of the homoerotic market connected to maritime personnel who visit the port for temporary stays. Sailors, cabin boys, and other ship personnel who visit from Latin America and the United States are the sexual consumers of the ports. Whether on a full-time, part-time, or ad hoc basis, _mayates_ earn higher incomes participating in homoerotic services connected to foreigners than in other income-earning activities. Although some of the _mayates_ connected to foreigners identify as gay or homosexual and accept these labels within the queer enclaves, they also characterize themselves as heterosexual or bisexual in other contexts.
“Beach boys,” informal sex workers, hang out looking for sex-for-profit opportunities in the coastal beaches, such as Cozumel, Cancún, and Acapulco. Some beach resorts, such as Acapulco and Puerto Vallarta, have long established reputations for having queer-friendly businesses and accommodations. Because there are queer-friendly enclaves in these locations that are often advertised in international gay travel guidebooks, there are also opportunities for indoor monetized sexual connections. Linkages between consumers and erotic laborers can be made via discotheques and bars, or by phone and the internet. In the public spaces of cities, such as in Guadalajara, contact is made via a discreet codified set of gestures, whereas in the queer districts transactions are more direct.

Since the late 1980s, epidemiological studies have documented the HIV/AIDS prevalence among sex workers and intravenous drug users in border cities, such as Tijuana and Juárez, that receive sex tourists from the United States (Bautista-Arredondo et al. 2013). Vibrant sex markets attract tourists who cross the international border for a few days or sometimes for a few hours of recreation in sexual economies. Investigations into border sexual economies, as well as those in Mexico City, have brought us insights into the lives of male and trans sex workers, even if they are in narrowly focused epidemiological studies of sexually transmitted infections (STIs) and injection drug use. Nevertheless, the scholarship for Mexico City and the US-Mexico border confirms that travestis, transgenders, and transsexuals are the most affected population with regards to stigma, discrimination, and violence. Violence can come at the hands of the police, gays, or clients.

Investigations into sexually transmitted infections in Mexico City have shed light on the working conditions, risks, and poverty facing transgender and transsexual sex workers. Here, as on the US-Mexico border, there is little information about the race, citizenship, age, and socioeconomic class of the clients. Given that Mexico City is a major cosmopolitan destination for Latin America and that Mexico received 35 million foreign tourists in 2016, we can surmise that not all of the clients of trans sex workers are conationals. Furthermore, Annick Prieur’s 1998 anthropological study of gender-variant homosexuals and cross-living vestidas from the economically marginal municipality of Mexico City known as Nezahualcóyotl and César O. González Pérez’s Travestidos al desnudo: Homosexualidad, identidades, y luchas territoriales en Colima (2003; Naked transvestites: Homosexuality, identities, and territorial struggles in Colima) offer ethnographic insights into the lives of trans folk in Mexico. These studies do not include North-South tourism but are important in the ways they illuminate the lives of trans sex workers.
Sex for pay is a survival tactic for many transgender women in Latin American and Caribbean society.

Peru

Peru’s homoerotic and transgender sex-work practices are heterogeneous. Most of the market is composed of male consumers, although a recent study mentions a small percentage that also includes heterosexual women clients. In large cities, such as Lima, and near jungle locations like Iquitos and Pucallpa and other tourist attractions, men seek clients in public spaces, gay saunas, theaters, nightspots and taverns, and via classified announcements and agencies. Indeed, there is a considerable sexual economy connected to the internet, with chatrooms for homoerotic sex and porn clubs. The term flete indicates gay and non-gayidentified men from marginal economic sectors of society who sell sex in and around parks and other public spaces. Escorts or strippers are men of higher income who publicize their expertise through agencies. In Iquitos and Pucallpa, young men participate by offering sex to foreign travelers on Amazon riverboats. Some studies on Peru focus on the public health issues of men who sell sex to men, but studies that take a more holistic approach to queer erotic markets (see Cáceres et al. 2015) are also starting to emerge.

Remunerated sex is a survival tactic for men and transgender women from the lower socioeconomic echelons of Peruvian society. But a higher income group with more education is entering the trade through the internet and international websites. This has transformed the market by offering more security. International travelers contact websites through web portals personalized with standard information about the sex worker and the services offered. Social observers indicate that, for men of higher socioeconomic and educational status, with other occupational profiles and income sources, the sex trade is used as a means of pleasure and to satisfy curiosity.

Sex-Worker Organizations

There are organizations throughout the region that focus on empowering sex workers.

Regional Networks One such organization, the Red de Mujeres Trabajadoras Sexuales de Latinoamérica y el Caribe (RedTraSex; Network of Women Sex Workers of Latin America and the Caribbean) headquartered in Argentina, connects organizations in fourteen nations throughout Latin America and the Caribbean (Argentina, Bolivia, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, the Dominican Republic, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras, Mexico, Nicaragua, Panama, Paraguay, and Peru) and effectively organizes sex workers around a variety of issues, including health, violence, and access to safe working conditions. Sex-worker organizations in the region recognize the interconnected stigmas that sex workers face, including stigmas around sexuality, gender presentation, and their status as sex workers. The majority of sex-worker organizations in Latin America and the Caribbean cater to women and transgender women sex workers regardless of their sexual preference. One of RedTraSex’s training workshops highlights perceived normal behaviors that have the effect of stigmatizing queer and trans people: “In the workshop we discuss that sexual preferences of each person aren’t ‘normal’ or ‘abnormal.’ ‘Normal’ is a rule that society imposes that won’t let us be free” (RedTraSex, 108; translation by Amalia Cabezas and Mzilikazi Koné). The training critiques the notion of “normal” as a concept imposed by a restrictive society.

Sex-worker organizations often struggle to achieve visibility in public as a response to acts of violence, sometimes perpetrated by the state, and in an effort to normalize their presence in their communities. These organizations work on a variety of intersecting issues related to sex work, such as HIV/STI transmission, the experience of violence, self-determination, and human rights. Organizations are more likely to receive funding if they emphasize issues of health and HIV/STI prevention rather than solely working to empower their communities through other avenues, like human rights education or improved working conditions for sex workers. Consequently, the majority of organizations that receive international funding typically focus some portion of their work on HIV prevention strategies, either targeted at female sex workers or at homosexual men.

Smaller regional networks include the Caribbean Sex Work Collective, launched in 2011 with membership from the English-, Dutch-, and Spanish-speaking countries in the region and Plataforma Latinoamericana de Personas que Ejercen el Trabajo Sexual (PLAPERTS; Latin American Platform of People Who Exercise Sex Work), started in 2014. The Caribbean Sex Worker Collective includes queer sex-worker organizations, such as Caribbean Regional Trans in Action, among others. Their work focuses on safety as well as sexual and health rights. PLAPERTS is an organization of sex workers of all genders from seven countries in Latin America (Ecuador, Peru, Colombia, El Salvador, Nicaragua, Mexico, and Brazil) that was organized to exchange information about sex-worker safety and rights.

Further research is needed to ascertain the efficacy of these organizations, whether they impact the health and safety of their members, and to what degree they influence government policies and attitudes in society and culture toward queer sex workers.

Transgender Organizations REDLACTRANS (Network for Latin American and Caribbean Trans) is a network of trans organizations in sixteen nations throughout Latin America and the Caribbean, with headquarters in Buenos Aires, Argentina. There are a number of trans women’s organizations across the region, including the Sindicato Nacional Independiente de Trabajadoras Sexuales Travestis, Transgéneras, y Otras “Amanda Jofré” (National Independent Union of Sex Workers Transvestites, Transgender, and Others “Amanda Jofré”), a Chilean organization established in 2004. This organization helped establish a network of trans groups in Chile called Alianza Trans Chile (Trans Alliance Chile). Trebol (Clover), a network of trans organizations in Bolivia, works to highlight intersecting issues facing trans women, including incidences of violence.

In El Salvador, Fraternidad Sin Fronteras (Fraternity without Boundaries), established in 2000, was initially a gay male organization but the demographics of the group shifted as it became predominantly trans women sex workers. While Fraternidad Sin Fronteras remains open to gay men whether or not they are sex workers, transgender sex workers run the group. This organization focuses on gender identity laws, discrimination, and issues facing sex workers. Organizations like Fraternidad Sin Fronteras offer training to community members on issues ranging from combating transphobia and homophobia, preventing HIV, and organizing politically to rally support to change laws that discriminate against the gay and trans community.

The growing presence of these organizations since the late twentieth century may be in part due to changing laws and norms around gay rights throughout the region. Though there has been increasing decriminalization of homosexuality throughout Latin America and the Caribbean—including the recognition of gay civil unions in Uruguay in 2007, the granting of marriage licenses to gay couples in Mexico City in 2009, and the legalization of gay marriage in Argentina in 2010—acts of violence committed against the queer, transgender, and sex-worker populations continue. Trans sex workers are at particular risk of violence due to their location at the intersection of various stigmatized and criminalized identities related to sexuality and gender nonconformity.
While much of the research on queer tourism and sex work in the region focuses on queer men, the majority of sex-worker organizations involve primarily women and trans women sex workers. This may be because the international community continues to see sex workers as predominantly women. Male sex workers do express a desire for organizations, as noted in a study in Córdoba, Argentina, where gay male sex workers called for an advocacy organization that would focus on sexual health, decriminalizing sex work, and interacting with the police (Disogra et al. 2005).

Conclusion

For Latin American sex workers, sex tourism offers the possibility of making a living through love, friendship, companionship, or sex with tourists (Cabezas 2009; Piscitelli 2007). Additional studies are needed that enhance understanding of queer sexual economies, including ethnographies of customers, research on sex-worker organizations, and investigations into the histories of sexual markets. More investigation is needed into lesbian sex work, diversity of sexual practices, racial identities and politics, age, migration, clients, significant others, and the socioeconomic class of both sex workers and customers.

Vek Lewis asks a crucial methodological question: “How can queers, afeminados, and transgendered persons be represented without reproducing and reiterating the violence of their culture’s productions which inscribe them in sometimes abject, othering and generalizing ways?” (2006, 87). An additional question would be, when will the scholarship on sex tourism include the self-representations of queer subaltern Latin American and Caribbean sex workers? Finally, should the notion of queer sex tourism be expanded to include the experiences of migrant, undocumented trans sex workers who circulate between Brazil and Spain and Mexico and San Francisco?

Angelique Nixon has called for activist-informed scholarship: “The future of Caribbean feminist and sexual minority work relies upon our ability to prioritize decolonization that is centered upon sexual freedom and the rights of sex workers, sexual outlaws, women, domestic workers, migrants, and sexual minorities to determine livelihood and live freely with the rights and protections deserved by all people” (2016, 121).

SEE ALSO Gay European Tourism Association; Neoliberalism in Latin America; Resorts; Sex Tourism in Asia; Sex Tourism in the Middle East; Sex Work/Sex Tourism/Sex Trafficking in Africa

BIBLIOGRAPHY

As could be reasonably expected from the Orientalist tropes of the Arab gay man as both polymorphously perverse and hypersexualized, sex tourism that capitalizes on the ubiquity of these tropes and that seeks to profit from them is found in the Middle East, often created by people from these countries in a manner that can be described only as “self-Orientalization.” Some of the countries in the Middle East where sex tourism is more established and that are discussed in this entry are Lebanon, Israel, and Morocco. It is important to note that pinkwashing discourses (discourses in which gay rights are championed as a way to distract attention from discrimination against other groups) play a major role in the construction of sex tourism in both Lebanon and Israel, as the technically ongoing war between the two countries has spilled over into contests of modernity that include gay sex tourism. This aspect of sex tourism in the region is also discussed in this entry, as is the role that Orientalist tropes have played in constructing gay sex tourism in Morocco.

Orientalism, Globalization, and Sex Tourism

In his 1978 book Orientalism, while analyzing the nineteenth-century French novelist Gustave Flaubert’s description of his travels to the Middle East, Edward Said observes that

The ways in which Orientalism has influenced the sex tourism industry, with a particular focus on the countries of Lebanon, Israel, and Morocco.
While Said declares the realm of sexuality to not be “the province of [his] analysis,” Joseph A. Boone in his 1995 article “Vacation Cruises; or, The Homoerotics of Orientalism,” takes that very task on himself, observing that even in the late nineteenth century and the early twentieth “the number of gay and bisexual male writers and artists who have traveled through North Africa in pursuit of sexual gratification is legion as well as legend” (90). He cites the examples of Andre Gide, who “lost his virginity on the dunes of Algeria in 1893 (where Oscar Wilde served as his procurer two years later), and E. M. Forster[, who lost his] on the beaches of Alexandria in 1916” (90). Since that period, the Middle East has been seen and constructed as a place of sexual possibility for people in the West, particularly gay men—a situation that has allowed the gay sex tourism industry to develop there.

The development of sex tourism in the Arab world, along with many other factors, has resulted in a process of the globalizing of sexual identities being undertaken throughout the world, as has been observed by thinkers such as Joseph A. Massad (2007) and Dennis Altman. Altman, in his 2001 book Global Sex, observes that “[sex] tourism has become the most significant and visible arena of global sexual inequality” (106) and that tourism is “a significant factor in globalization, both economic and cultural [,which] has become on some measures the largest single employer in the world” (107). He further observes that the “growing commercialization of sex is often the unintended consequence of opening up an economy to the larger world” (109).

It is important to note at this juncture that while sex tourism can involve the explicit payment for sex with a specific person, it does not necessarily always involve prostitution. Owing to the illegal nature of prostitution, the more institutionalized forms of sex tourism as industry usually involve bringing tourists to places and situations where meeting someone for (sometimes commercial, sometimes not commercial) sex is likely to take place or is easily accessible. One country in which both forms of sexual commerce take place in the Middle East is Lebanon.

Lebanon and Sex Tourism

Gay men sometimes visit Lebanon independently and use apps such as Grindr to find others to have sex with there or have assignations with escorts who frequent gay dance clubs in Beirut, as Lebanon is heavily advertised in Western gay media and on LGBT travel websites, such as Purple Roofs and BestGayTravelGuide.com, as a gay tourism destination. On Purple Roofs, the writer for the Lebanon page observes that “there is something special about this emerging gay scene, which has been long lost in Europe and America. The genuine ‘joie de vivre’ electrifies” (Bedford 2012). BestGayTravelGuide.com (2010) claims that “you will realise in Lebanon that you get invited always. For tours, for after-parties, for dinner and—of course—sex.”

Until about a year after the beginning of the Syrian Revolution in 2011 and subsequent civil war, after a ninemonth-long peaceful popular revolution against the regime of Bashar al-Assad, Lebanon, uniquely in the Arab world, had a gay tourism company that facilitated the majority of organized gay travel and tourism in the country. The company, LebTour, was run by Bertho Makso, who now leads Proud Lebanon, an organization that provides assistance to LGBTQI refugees in Lebanon (Proud Lebanon 2017). While the website for LebTour is now defunct, a copy of the home page from September 2013 shows that the website advertised the organization as “leading unique adventure tours for gay men and open-minded friends and family who enjoy tours with a gay flair” (LebTour 2013a).

Bear Arabia The best-known event hosted by LebTour, however, was the Bear Arabia contest, the center of the Bear Arabia tour. From an archived copy of a page from the LebTour website, the event is described as follows:

```markdown
Can you hear the Bears of Arabia roar, for this summer’s hottest event?

This year’s Bear Arabia Special Trip is bringing you the magic of Istanbul mixed with the aromatic Lebanese spots.

The Arabian Bears are calling you to start your tour in Beirut, visit Baalbeck, Byblos, Ksara [sic].

In Lebanon, you will be part of the MEGA party pageant and you will vote for the sweatiest, sexiest bears and cubs, where only two will be granted the titles Mr. Bear Arabia and Mr. Cub Arabia.

After 5 days in magical Lebanon, we will proceed to Turkey ... [where] we won’t miss the magical Hammam [bathhouse] stops where we locals and foreign participants will mingle and socialize....

Be sure that there will be lots of hot men to meet!

(LEBTOUR 2013B)
```

In his 2011 article “Hairy Chest, Will Travel: Tourism, Identity, and Sexuality in the Levant,” Jared McCormick describes the typical participant in the Bear Arabia tour as someone looking for an experience that “would put him in contact with ‘Arab men’ and ensure him safe passage with a group of friendly likeminded gay individuals. Perceptions of sexuality and desire were an impetus for him to enter that which he viewed largely out of his reach alone: the ‘new gay Middle East’” (72). The allure of this “new gay Middle East” and the Orientalist tropes alluded to in this statement are things that Israel has also attempted to capitalize on in developing a sex tourism industry.

Israel and Sex Tourism

While marketing toward tourists during the early years of the modern state of Israel initially focused on the religious and historical aspects of travel to Israel, the nation’s Tourism Ministry in 2006 began a campaign to “raise the profile of Israel ... as a leisure tourist destination” through a campaign that featured “scantily clad women” and sold “Israel as a place to party” (Krawitz 2006). This marketing of Israel as a sexually charged leisure destination has also included the global LGBTQI community, and private-sector marketing of Israel to the gay community has been more direct in advertising the sexual possibilities and availability and attractiveness of Israeli men to gay men visiting the country.

In 2011 Israel was voted the “world’s best gay travel destination” in a survey administered by GayCities.com and American Airlines (Haaretz 2012). The status of Israel as a premier gay tourist destination has been particularly promoted by the Spartacus International Gay Guide, which was responsible for making gay Israeli model Eliad Cohen the unofficial face of gay Israeli tourism after putting him on the cover of the 2011–2012 issue of the guide, which catapulted him to the status of one of the most famous gay models and tourism promoters in the world (Halutz 2014).

Cohen is particularly notable for promoting the Arisa party in Tel Aviv, which according to the Electronic Intifada correspondent Benjamin Doherty (2012) has been marketed as “the world’s first gay Middle-Eastern party.” Doherty mentions that one of the most controversial advertisements for the Arisa party involves a video depicting Israeli model Eliad Cohen brutally beating Yekutiel [a Mizrachi Israel drag queen] who appears as a feminized orientalist caricature, and this violence is meant to amuse. It's not the only video that features abuse and violence. In another video for Eilat Pride 2011, Yekutiel announces his departure to Eilat but when the flight is cancelled, Cohen turns violent and cruel.

As a Mizrachi Jew whose ancestors came from the Arab world and spoke Arabic, Yekutiel in this video functions as an embodiment of the trope of the effeminate gay Arab. Further underscoring the Orientalism inherent in the first violent video are the Orientalist tropes of the Arab both as feminized and hypermasculinely violent. (While not Mizrahi, Cohen looks Middle Eastern and not European.) Implying that Israelis can still enact these tropes in a more Westernized setting, the beating is done to the tune of "a hebraized version of the Arabic song 'Ya ma sawa' composed by the Rahbani Brothers and made famous by Georgette Sayegh" (Doherty 2012).

Morocco and Sex Tourism

While the sexual potentialities presented by Israel’s gay tourism industry have been absorbed into legal and socially presentable channels, this has not been the case for other countries in the Middle East. One of the clearest examples of this is Morocco and its underground sex tourism industry. While Morocco was particularly famous as a sex tourism destination for gay men from the beginning of colonialism, as has been described in depth by Said and Boone, it also served during the 1950s and 1960s as a place of refuge for gay men from Europe and the United States, such as William S. Burroughs, Joe Orton, Allen Ginsberg, and Paul Bowles, who found a more tolerant environment than that of their home countries. (Tangiers, in fact, formed the backdrop for Burroughs’s 1959 novel Naked Lunch.) While this aspect of Morocco as refuge does not fit neatly with the mechanical application of the trope of the "Orient" as a place of sexual perversions that cannot be had elsewhere by Westerners, the dynamics of privilege and power between Westerner and Moroccan still held sway, and soliciting of male prostitutes by Westerners in Morocco was quite common in that period (Hamilton 2014; Boone 1995).

While the tolerance that existed in Morocco at that time is no longer present, and homosexuality is officially criminalized by the Moroccan government, an underground sex tourist industry that traffics in males and females—both adults and those under age—is reported by the media as extant in the country, which has led the government to crack down on gay travelers to Morocco, regardless of whether they were soliciting prostitutes or not (Forrester 2017; France24 2011). In 2014 Ray Cole, a British tourist, was arrested in Marrakech, Morocco, after he was discovered to be having a consensual, noncommercial liaison with a Moroccan man in the city. Cole, age sixty-nine at the time, was sentenced to four months in prison and served three weeks of his sentence before he was released as a result of a public campaign in Britain (Strudwick 2014).

While the construction of the “Orient” as a place of sexual potential is an Orientalist trope that stems directly from colonialist discourses surrounding the region, forces of global capital have resulted in the self-Orientalization of the tourist industries of the countries of the Middle East. Sectors of tourism that focus on sex, whether gay or not, have not been immune to these economical and discursive forces. One can see as well that even in a region where homosexuality and gay sex are both frequently considered legally problematic, these same economic forces have found ways not only to render legible and legitimate gay sex tourism in the region but also to incorporate this same industry into discourses of modernity and Westernization that circulate powerfully throughout the region and that do not deal with sexuality alone but attempt to globalize sexuality as well.

SEE ALSO Gay European Tourism Association; The Gay International and Mideast LGBTQI Organizations; Orientalism in Gay Pornography about the Middle East; Pinkwashing; Resorts; Sex Tourism in Asia; Sex Tourism in Latin America and the Caribbean; Sex Work/Sex Tourism/Sex Trafficking in Africa

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Halutz, Avshalom. “At Home with Eliad Cohen, Israel’s Top Gay Icon.” Haaretz, 8 June 2014.

Peim, Benjamin. “Beirut, Tel Aviv Battle It Out for ‘Pink Dollars.’” Jerusalem Post, 26 October 2010. http://www.jpost.com/Travel/Travel-News/Beirut-Tel-Aviv-battle-it-out-for-pink-Wynn, L. L. Pyramids and Nightclubs: A Travel Ethnography of Arab and Western Imaginations of Egypt, from King Tut and a Colony of Atlantis to Rumors of Sex Orgies, Urban Legends about a Marauding Prince, and Blonde Belly Dancers. Austin: University of Texas Press, 2007.

Sex Work in Asia

SVATI P. SHAH
Associate Professor, Women's, Gender and Sexuality Studies, University of Massachusetts Amherst
Research Associate, African Centre for Migration and Society, University of Witwatersrand Terminology and gender in studies of “queer and trans sex work” in Asia.

This entry provides an overview of the issues, problematics, data, and debates that characterize academic research on sex work in Asia, with a focus on LGBTQI sex workers. There is no single literature that examines sexual services sold by queer and trans people in Asia. Instead, works that address the intersections of queer and trans identities and sex work are present throughout scholarship on HIV/AIDS, sex work, and queer and trans politics and communities. The relative lack of legibility of sex workers who are not cisgender women in studies of “sex work,” per se, is in part a result of the reification of women and girls as victims of trafficking within mainstream discourses of sex work and prostitution throughout the world. Most of the research in Asia, and elsewhere, that does account for sex workers of other genders or, for sex work where the client and sex worker are of the “same” gender, focuses on people who were assigned male sex at birth and who sell or trade sexual services to cisgender men. Although there is anecdotal evidence that cisgender queer women and trans men also sell sexual services, and that cisgender queer women and trans men have also been harassed on the basis of vagrancy, anti-trafficking, and anti-prostitution laws, there is as of yet little data on individuals or communities where this would be the case. This entry therefore restricts itself to the contours of the existing literature on sex work in Asia where gay men, men who have sex with men, and trans women are legible as sellers and traders of sexual services.

Politics of Terminology

Debates on how to understand the exchange of sexual services and money or other goods or services have been waged from at least the late nineteenth century onward (Kempadoo and Doezema 1998; Levine 2003). These debates have revolved around whether sex work should be understood primarily as a livelihood strategy, and therefore read through an economic lens, or whether it should be understood mainly as a manifestation of violence against people who sell sex, where the selling of sexual services is gendered female. This gendering of sex workers as victimized women and girls has a number of consequences for the ways in which sex work is understood, acted upon, and, in most countries, criminalized to varying degrees (Global Commission on HIV and the Law 2011).
The conflation of the sale or exchange of sexual services with human trafficking and violence against women has become dominant in policy and juridical discourses in many parts of the world. This has been the case since the rise of the contemporary discourse on human trafficking, in the late 1990s. This discourse on trafficking has numerous historical antecedents, including fears of “white slavery” in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries in the United Kingdom (Levine 2003) and the United States (Pilley 2014). However, unlike the discourse on “white slavery,” which was a discourse on prostitution, the contemporary discourse on human trafficking aims to consolidate a number of economic sectors and conditions of migration and unfree labor within a single rubric. The rise of this contemporary discourse on trafficking is rooted in “Western” feminist debates on pornography (in the United States, Australia, and the United Kingdom) that took place in the 1970s and 1980s. In these debates, feminists disagreed about whether pornography was equivalent to violence against women or whether it was a complex economic and social sector that produces a range of experiences and working conditions. The campaign waged by some feminists to legally ban pornography in the United States failed during that time. However, the networks, critiques, and infrastructure that those campaigns produced provided the basis for some antipornography feminists to shift their focus to “prostitution.” In this particular feminist context, both pornography and “prostitution” were seen to be the worst symbols of gender-based inequality, thereby rendering them both targets for eradication (Shah 2012).

The idea that sexual commerce and trafficking are essentially the same phenomenon informs the term sex trafficking; this idea is disputed and complicated by a wave of social science research on sexual commerce and other areas of work currently being read through the lens of human trafficking. While international policy now defines trafficking in relation to a host of labor activities, the ways in which the terms trafficking and prostitution evoke one another indicates a long-standing set of debates about whether prostitution is equivalent to violence against women. Some recent scholarly works on third-gender sex workers in Asia, as well as numerous media reports, also participate in this conflation when referring to transgender women and other “third gender” people who sell sexual services (Rizvi 2015).

Activist sex workers, sex workers’ rights organizations, advocates, scholars, and feminists with a different perspective on sexual commerce to that which conflates sex work and human trafficking have been producing a rigorous critique of the dominant policy discourse by arguing that, while doing sex work may entail exposure to violence, this exposure is uneven and usually produced within the conditions of criminalization and social stigma deployed against sex workers (Global Commission on HIV and the Law 2011; Hor 2012) rather than by the exchange of sexual services and money per se. The disagreement over what constitutes violence in the context of sexual commerce, and what to do about it, is at the heart of debates on how governments and attendant legal apparatuses should act with regard to sexual commerce.
The terminology associated with the exchange of sex and money reflects the disparate juridical and political positions on sexual commerce. Terms such as trafficking and prostitution, when used uncritically or without qualification, tend to espouse and advance a perspective that frames sexual commerce in the terms of violence. Terms such as sex work and sexual commerce advance a perspective that does not eschew the question of violence but repositions it in the terms of livelihood and economic informality. In this context, the term prostitution should be used when historically appropriate, as in references to a time or place wherein people used that term to describe sexual commerce. Otherwise, when used uncritically, it often indicates a perspective on sexual commerce in which sex workers have little value or power, such as when the passive voice—prostituted—is deployed. While no strictly “neutral” or descriptive term exists for the exchange of sexual services and money, the terms sex work and sexual commerce are accepted by those seeking to understand the exchange of money and sexual services in relation to questions of survival, migration, violence, and economic informality.

Gendering of Sex Work and “LGBTQI” Sex Workers

Putting aside the debate on sex work and human trafficking, a great deal of definitional instability is seen to be embedded within the term sex worker and within the idea of who may be categorized as “selling sex.” This is apparent when one considers the gendering of the sale of sexual services. Sellers of sex are primarily framed as women, girls, or people who inhabit feminine gender expression within mainstream policy and media discourses on sexual commerce. This is not because masculine-spectrum people do not sell sex, but because regnant notions of selling sex are theoretically informed by the idea of powerlessness as vested in the female gender, especially among Asian women (Doezema 2001). The rhetoric of protection subsequently produced within anti-trafficking campaigns that seek to “rescue” sex workers is an effect of the gendering of “sex worker” as female and, therefore, in this formulation, as a being without access to her own power or “agency.” There are indications that the humanitarian impulse to “rescue” people from sex work, even against their wills, also informs policy and policing practices targeting transgender and third-gender sex workers (Human Rights Watch 2010).

Raid and rescue operations in the brothels that still function in some Asian cities exemplify this. Brothels are where sex workers, mostly female, live and work, and they provide a clear target for rescue operations that are undertaken by anti-trafficking organizations and local police. These efforts have mixed effects and are often experienced by sex workers as extrajudicial detention, because sex workers are taken, sometimes forcibly, from brothels and sent to government remand homes (places of detention) for “rehabilitation,” sometimes indefinitely (GAATW 2007). While transgender sex workers may also live and work in brothels or red-light areas, transgender and male sex workers who solicit clients are more likely to do so from streets, parks, or other public spaces, as well as from brothels.
Sex workers throughout Asia, as elsewhere, have incorporated digital platforms as a way to solicit clients as well, as red-light districts and brothels have declined in the face of urban gentrification (Shah 2014) and the criminalization of sex work (McLelland 2005).

The normative gender politics of the dominant discourse on sex work is somewhat misleading because sex is sold and traded by people of all genders all over the world. This is in part because studies of sex work that focus on cisgender men or transgender women selling sex are usually published under the auspices of studies of HIV/AIDS (Keshab et al. 2014; Lahiri and Kar 2007), rather than within the scholarly literature on “sex work.” The fact that people of all genders can and do sell sexual services in Asia, as well as in the rest of the world, has two effects on the dominant discourse of sexual commerce. First, this “multigender” perspective on sex work serves to decenter femaleness in relation to sex work. Second, this perspective “queers” sex work by considering the sale and trade of sexual services as undertaken by transgender people and cisgender men. When cisgender men sell or trade sexual services, this sale or trade is sometimes not recognized or categorized as “sex work,” as the exchange may include favors, money, housing, or other forms of remuneration. Much of the literature on cisgender men selling or trading sexual services is found under the heading of “men who have sex with men” (MSM) in studies that focus on Asia (e.g., Kong 2014).

Because women who sell sexual services are more legible as “sex workers,” there is far more data on cis women who sell sex than on people of other genders who do so. What is clear is that, regardless of gender, people sell and trade sexual services for a number of reasons. While poverty is not always a contributing factor in the decision to sell sexual services, the economics and conditions of paid work are contributing factors for almost anyone who sells or trades sexual services.

Legal Discourses of Sodomy and “Prostitution” in “Asia”

Queer and transgender sex workers face arrest and harassment from local authorities via a number of legal regulatory mechanisms. The three main vehicles for police harassment and arrest of queer and transgender sex workers are anti-prostitution laws and antisolicitation clauses within those laws; antisodomy laws, which abet the targeting of gender-nonconforming people by police for arrest and extortion; and antivagrancy laws, which aid police in targeting anyone using the space of the street for commercial activity. Most of the harassment and arrests that queer and transgender sex workers experience occur in the process of their soliciting clients for sex, rather than occurring in the process of selling sexual services, or by virtue of identifying as a sex worker. Regulatory contact with local authorities most often results in extortion by the police for money, demands for “free” sex, sexual assault (PUCL-K 2003), or bailable detention. Few of these encounters result in criminal prosecutions or imprisonment, although a number of people who were “rescued” by anti-trafficking activists from doing sex work have described their subsequent mandatory stay in a government-run remand home as “extrajudicial detention” (GAATW 2007).

The debate on how to legally regulate sex work is highly varied across Asian countries. Most places retain laws that reflect an earlier understanding of the relationship between sexual commerce and public space. These earlier laws, which stem from regulatory priorities set in the late nineteenth century, were intended to contain sex work within certain geographic zones, such as red-light districts in major cities, rather than to eradicate it altogether. The politics of containment also drive many of the ways in which these laws are enforced against queer and transgender sex workers. It is important to note here that the utility of the term Asia to describe and compare specific juridical, spatial, affective, political, and economic conditions under which sexual commerce is transacted is extremely questionable. “Asia” describes too vast a set of regions and histories for it to serve as an organizing rubric for localized or regional critiques of sex work. Many of the examples in this entry draw on the politics of sex work in South Asia, particularly in India. Any comparisons or general comments made about Asia in this entry are deployed alongside a number of important caveats; with respect to sex work, the primary caveat is simply that juridical regimes vary widely across the continent, making simple comparisons impossible. That said, some comparisons can be made with respect to the financialization and gentrification of urban spaces in general, including those in Asia. This phenomenon has affected the existence of red-light districts in cities as diverse as Mumbai (Shah 2014), Seoul (Cheng 2013), and Amsterdam (Aalbers and Sabat 2012), where brothels are being replaced in urban centers by much more expensive, and lucrative, residential and commercial real-estate development. While it is difficult to say how this phenomenon affects queer and transgender sex workers, one can, from the existing literature, surmise that, as more and more people seeking a basic livelihood from street-based solicitation are being displaced from centrally located urban red-light districts, queer and transgender people who solicit from the street will also be affected by these changes.

When cisgender men and transgender women who sell sex are targeted by local authorities, this is generally done via laws that regulate their existence in public space rather than by anti-prostitution laws, because of the ways these laws frame gender. In other words, and in legal terms, queer and transgender sex workers are “regulated” relatively idiosyncratically (Aggleton 1999; Jackson 2011). For example, laws that criminalize homosexuality, including antisodomy laws, and laws that regulate public space are the primary vehicles for queer and trans sex workers experiencing arrest or other forms of legal regulation while soliciting clients. At the same time, some Asian countries are, at this writing, either considering passing laws that explicitly criminalize sex work, as in the case of India, or they have already done so, as in the case of Korea. These developments have proceeded in light of the US State Department’s Trafficking in Persons Report (2017), which ranks all countries according to their efforts to “combat trafficking.” While economic sanctions have never been enacted because of a poor ranking on this report, the possibility of the US government doing so is a part of the report’s legal mandate, and how it exerts pressure on foreign governments’ domestic policies in this arena. The explicit criminalization of the exchange of sex and money will continue to reify cisgender women as sellers of sex, and cisgender men as their clients. This is an example of how the law works in ways that are contradictory and, at times, at cross purposes. As laws are made that will increase regulations on sex workers, laws that criminalize homosexuality are being explicitly challenged, as is the case with the antisodomy law in India. This means that queer and transgender sex workers may soon enjoy expanded rights with respect to their sexuality and gender identities but reduced rights with respect to their livelihood options, where those options include selling sexual services.

In addition to the varied legal context that characterizes sex work in “Asia,” the context of the vast economic space known as the “informal sector” is salient in thinking of any legal, semilegal, or illegal work that operates through day wages or temporary contracts. The informal sector, or “informal economy,” generally describes legal work that is done for cash, as in day wage labor, or work that is untaxed and unsalaried. The structure of economic informality cannot be understood in isolation from questions of migration and what has been called “neoliberalism.” Neoliberalism refers to a range of economic policy changes that were undertaken in many countries and is generally pegged to have begun with the passage of a number of regional free-trade agreements. With reference to sex work, neoliberalism might more specifically be understood as the abdication of the state from providing certain social services, such as education or health care, thus necessitating that people pay for these things themselves or try to do without them. The abdication of government support for people who are impoverished is directly linked with the increasing need for many to migrate for paid work (Mai and King 2009).

If sex workers are properly understood as working in informal economies, they must also be properly understood, by and large, as migrants. This is especially true of women doing sex work. Many impoverished people who migrate for work must do so by borrowing money and repaying it with enormous interest. The obligation to repay a debt to a brothel keeper, to a broker for migration, or to a broker for work in a particular sector, such as agriculture, is legible within scholarly and juridical discourses as “debt bondage.” Much more is known about migration and debt bondage in relation to women working as sex workers than is known among people who are not cisgender women who sell sexual services. It is clear, however, that people of all genders who migrate for work may be subject to working in conditions of debt bondage because of the economic necessity to migrate. Even if migrant workers are repaying such a debt while they work for meager wages and income, the lion’s share of these migrant sex workers also send remittances to family members living in their places of origin. The level to which rural areas in Asia are dependent on remittances for their economic sustainability is another factor in understanding the contours of sexual commerce in the region (Manalansan 2006).

Money Boys in China and the Category of “Asia”

In North America and Europe, Asia is often used as a shorthand term for East Asia in general, and China in particular. This entry has used the term Asia as a provocation to focus on the legal regimes and politics of South Asia in general, and India, in particular, with respect to queer and transgender sex work. Interest in comparing India and China substantively grew in light of the BRIC (Brazil, Russia, India, and China) phenomenon, which marked these four countries as a potentially new set of economic players in the “world economy,” especially in the years leading up to the 2008 financial crisis. BRICS (South Africa was added in 2010) as a category of analysis was roundly criticized as well, in part for its potential to reify the expansion of “free-trade” agreements and the phenomenon of “neoliberalism” that these agreements augured (Armijo 2007). Evoking the example of “money boys” in China at the end of this entry in no way indicates an uncritical adoption of the BRICS rubric, nor does it indicate a broad endorsement of “neoliberalism” as a blanket rubric for understanding new ways in which “sexuality” is being consolidated outside of the idea of “the West.” Instead, the example of money boys is included here as both an important aspect of “queer” sex work and as a phenomenon that shows that some of the ways in which sex work is practiced and regulated in Chinese cities resonate with the ways that sex work is described throughout this entry. The following passage, by Travis S. K. Kong, published in English, is from one of the most detailed ethnographic critiques to date of men who solicit paid sex from other men in China:

The emergence of contemporary male prostitution can be understood in the context of the reconfiguration of the “capitalist” market and the “socialist” party-state in reform China, which has generated new forms of possibility and control on both the societal and individual level (Rofel 2007; Wang 2003; Zhang and Ong 2008). First, as I argue elsewhere (Kong 2012), the state’s opening to the global economy has boosted the labor market, which has created enormous job opportunities and attracted many rural-to-urban migrants to work in the cities. Second, the state’s promotion of the market economy coincides with the resurgence of a sex market that encourages the commodification of the body. This has provided an alternative way to earn quick and easy money, especially for migrant workers, who often hold the hardest and most underpaid jobs. Third, the state has made efforts to lessen control over private lives, especially homosexuality. This can be seen in the removal of hooliganism from the 1997 revised criminal law, and the removal of homosexuality from the Chinese Psychiatric Association list of mental illnesses in 2001. These changes have led to the emergence of lesbian, gay, bisexual, and transgendered (tongzhi) communities, which have long been suppressed, especially in rural areas, thereby providing an increased demand for male prostitution.

(2014, 322)

A significant difference between the ostensible “literature” on queer and trans sex work in India and in China is that much of this literature necessarily focuses on the rapid economic transitions in China initiated in the 1980s. Unlike China, India did not experience this kind of rapid, systemic economic transition, although it did adopt economic reforms aimed at integrating India’s economy with an emerging post–Cold War world economic order, reforms that are also referenced as “neoliberal.” The above passage from Kong’s work is relatively laudatory about the impacts of those reforms in China. While the legal reforms that Kong lists do not mirror those in India, there is some resonance between domestic labor migration, expanding urban labor markets, and the ways in which sex work is both solicited and policed between major Indian cities and the cities at the heart of Kong’s study (Beijing, Shanghai, and Shenzhen) in China.

“Asia” and “sex work” are both too varied and vast to be contained within a singular understanding of how they may conceptually relate to one another. This entry summarizes major problematics and debates that inform this relationship in scholarship, in policy discussions, and in legal discourses. Rather than outlining the facts of sex work in the region, this entry summarizes key concepts and questions that characterize contemporary scholarship on “sex work” in “Asia,” outlining the problematics of each term, and explaining why differently gendered sex workers may be differently legible within various literatures. The entry begins with a general discussion of the politics of sex work, including the contrasts between the terms sex work/er, prostitution, trafficking, and sexual commerce. It then reviews the politics of gender in relation to sex work and goes on to discuss six major themes that inform studies of sex work in Asian cities: economic informality, migration, urbanization, debt bondage, violence, and trafficking-related interventions. Sex workers’ organizing has been discussed less than these other themes mainly because LGBTQI sex workers organizing as queer and trans sex workers is a relatively new phenomenon at the local level, particularly with respect to queer sex workers. Trans sex work has been visible as a distinct organizing space in some places. In India, these include hijra (a third gender recognized in South Asian countries), kothi (someone assigned male sex at birth whose gender expression is feminine, and who is the penetrated partner in sex with cisgender men) and other female-spectrum trans sex workers’ caucuses in sex workers’ organizations like the Durbar Mahila Samanwaya Committee (DMSC; Unstoppable Women’s Coordination Committee) in Kolkata, Veshya Anyay Mukti Parishad (VAMP; Prostitute’s Council to Stop Injustice) in southern Maharashtra, and in gay rights organizing spaces like Humsafar Trust in Mumbai. Trans sex workers have also been visible in regional networks, such as the Asia Pacific Network of Sex Workers (APNSW). The entry has emphasized how local regimes governing sexuality in general, and sex work in particular, have necessarily reflected a set of socially accepted norms rather than the specific letter of the law. Hence, regulation is often contradictory, in purely legal terms, wherein one aspect of queer or transgender sex workers’ existence (e.g., their identity) may be “legal,” whereas their livelihood, where it involves sex work, may be illegal. These complexities are ultimately legible with respect to local histories, politics, and discourses of gender and sexuality throughout Asia.

There are a number of ways the writing of such an entry may be approached; this entry has emphasized contemporary work on sex work and migration, the discourse on sex work, and juridicism. Others may have taken a more historical approach, reflecting, for example, on the status of homoerotic love and sex in earlier periods and the ways in which these became marked as deviant or pathological in relation to the normativizing engines of “modernity” and late advanced capitalism. Whereas there is a growing body of literature in this vein, on sex as transacted between men, in China (see Kang 2009; Sommer 2007), historical work on sex work in South Asia has tended to focus more on female courtesans during the Mughal period (early sixteenth to mid-eighteenth centuries; see Waheed 2014). Given the extremely polarized nature of contemporary discourses on sexual commerce, this entry has offered the reader a way of understanding the question of queer and trans sex work in light of broader debates on sexual commerce, while indicating that other ways of addressing this topic (e.g., via the historiography of sex work in Asia) are also vital to understanding why discourses and debates on sex work are changing rapidly.

SEE ALSO HIV/AIDS in South and Southeast Asia; Sex Tourism in Asia; Sex Work/Sex Tourism/Sex Trafficking in Africa

BIBLIOGRAPHY

McLelland, Mark. Queer Japan from the Pacific War to the Internet Age. Lanham, MD: Rowman and Littlefield, 2005.

Sommer, Matthew H. “Was China Part of a Global Eighteenth-Century Homosexuality?” In

Sex Work/Sex Tourism/Sex Trafficking in Africa

MEHAMMED AMADEUS MACK
Assistant Professor of French Studies
Smith College, Northampton, MA

Africa, particularly North Africa, as a destination for European sex tourism, and Europe as a hub for the sex trafficking of Africans, with a particular focus on gay sex workers.

Because of Europe's long-standing history of sexual projections in the direction of its south, Africa, and especially North Africa, have long been sites of sexual tourism and commerce of varying kinds. Precolonial traces exist, of course, in the form of concubinage on the African continent, although sex work may be an anachronistic term to describe what took place. For example, royal concubines in Nigeria proved instrumental to the development of the state from the sixteenth to the twentieth centuries (Nast 2005). The Zulu emperor Shaka used concubines to manage his many homesteads, which also served as bases for his military regiments; fearful of heirs, he never married and executed any concubine who became pregnant by him (Ngwane 1997). The king of Buganda was said to have as many as 2,000 concubines, and he additionally chose women from among his subjects/servants and invested them with responsibilities as he saw fit (Kyeyune 2012).

Colonial Period

The first European colonists in Africa were primarily men, and thus the problem of companionship presented itself: these early white settler societies watched closely over their own communities to ward off the chances of "going native" and adopting African customs and, "worst" of all, marrying the indigenous and begetting mixed-race children (Shadle 2005). Yet, Nharas (or signaras), or mixed-race women from West Africa, played a key role as intermediaries in the Portuguese and French slave trades. In a masterful study of the way the French state organized and regulated heterosexual sex work during the colonial period in North Africa, Christelle Taraud (2003) explains how the French state actually instituted bordellos for military campaigns (BMCs) as early as the 1830s, during the military conquest of Algeria. She concludes that the state was deeply involved in the regulation of sex work, but that it occurred quite differently in the colonies in comparison with metropolitan France. This type of regulation departed from precolonial North African customs of sex out of wedlock, which were limited to courtesanship and domestic concubinage and servitude.
In the colonies, the French embarked on a strict hygiene campaign that sought to segregate indigenous sex workers from European ones by restricting European sex workers to maison closes, or brothels, whereas indigenous sex workers were relegated to the streets and special “reserved” quarters. All underwent weekly medical controls to screen for venereal disease aimed primarily at protecting the white settler population (Taraud 2003). Military-organized brothels were also widespread during World Wars I and II and were used as a way to provide troops with not only sexual release but also companionship (Trouillard 2014). As Taraud (2003) explains, segregation extended to metropolitan France in wartime, with indigenous soldiers who fought on the side of France directed to BMCs mainly populated by indigenous women.

THE QUIET VIOLENCE OF DREAMS (2001; K. SELLO DUIKER)

The Quiet Violence of Dreams is the second novel by South African author K. Sello Duiker (1974–2005), following the award-winning Thirteen Cents (2000) and preceding the posthumously published The Hidden Star (2006). It won the 2002 Herman Charles Bosman Prize and was adapted into a play by Ashraf Johaardien in 2012.

While it can be read as a coming-out narrative or a coming-of-age story, K. Sello Duiker’s The Quiet Violence of Dreams is more complicated than that, offering readers an intercut series of first-person narratives with multiple flashbacks focused on the journey of its central protagonist, Tshepo, through the worlds of postapartheid South Africa. Duiker is frequently heralded as one of the most important postapartheid or post-anti-apartheid South African writers by South African literary luminaries like Zakes Mda and Lewis Nkosi. The novel is perhaps best known for its partially redemptive representation of “gay” sex work. Tshepo—after leaving a mental hospital, Valkenberg, where he had been diagnosed with “cannabis-induced psychosis,” and after a brief stint as a waiter—chooses the name Angelo when he begins working at a gay brothel, called Steamy Windows, in the Sea Point neighborhood of Cape Town. The interior of Steamy Windows is decorated with reproductions of paintings by the Pre-Raphaelite brotherhood. He discovers that his fellow workers take these nineteenth-century painters as inspiration for using sex and sex work to reimagine the possibilities of relations between men. Sebastian, the sex worker who explains this vision to Tshepo/Angelo, concludes: “Our commitment to being sexual visionaries with the fervor of artists is the secret badge, the unspoken password that makes us part of something bigger” (Duiker 2001, 286).

During interactions with the men who come to Steamy Windows, Tshepo/Angelo has many conversations about the history of homosexuality in Europe and in precolonial Africa. In an important conversation with an African American client, he broaches the differences between Africans and African Americans. The novel thus offers an important fictional reworking of the ongoing debate about the putative “un-Africanness” of homosexuality and the politics of sexual and racial identities more generally.

Tshepo half falls in love with a coworker, West, who is an Afrikaans man from Hermanus, near Cape Town, in a way that could prompt a reading of their relationship as something like an allegory for national reconciliation in the postapartheid era. The partially reparative representation of sex work in The Quiet Violence of Dreams powerfully contrasts with the graphic representations of sexual violence elsewhere in the novel— both Tshepo and his mother survive brutal rapes—and the depictions of child sex abuse in Thirteen Cents.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Neville Hoad

Associate Professor of English

University of Texas at Austin

---

Increasing Sex Trafficking and Other Trends

More recently, with the opening up of transnational networks along the Mediterranean, there has been a significant increase in the sex trafficking of African women to Europe, a trend exacerbated by the migration crisis that began in 2015. According to the United Nations' International Organization for Migration (IOM), Nigeria has been hit especially hard: the sex trafficking industry operating between that country and Italy (for over three decades now) has seen a boom in numbers. For instance, during just the first half of 2016, 3,600 Nigerian women arrived in Italy by boat from Libya, with the IOM estimating that 80 percent of the women were destined to be trafficked into prostitution (Kelly and Tondo 2016).

While heterosexual men’s sex tourism is more prevalent and widely studied, heterosexual women have also had an impact on local societies in sub-Saharan Africa. For example, in Kenya white female sex tourists sustained economic and sexual relationships with local men they eroticized as their very own Masai warriors (Meiu 2009). On the coasts of the Gambia, beach boys locally known as “bumsters” cater to white visitors both heterosexual and homosexual, a commerce that drums up the mythology of, on the one hand, African male sexual potency and, on the other, plundered wealth concentrated in the West, a wealth that can be (re)accessed only via the toubab, or white tourist (Nyanzi et al. 2005).
Personal and Documentary Accounts

Gay male sex work was and is still widespread in North Africa, beginning in the late nineteenth century and really taking hold in the first half of the twentieth with the development of Euro-American tourism there. A 2005 book by Frédéric Mitterrand, formerly the French minister of culture, provided a very frank account of what drives middle-aged gay men to pursue sexual opportunity abroad, having to do with the greater availability of young men who might otherwise reject them in Europe and the rampant ageism that has led to an alarming social isolation among older gay men in the “West.” He was taken to task, however, for the unacknowledged privilege inherent in this rhetoric of sexual availability, casually divorced from considerations of inequality and seeming to place hedonism and the fulfillment of self above all. Maxime Cervulle and Nick Rees-Roberts (2010) view the controversy surrounding Mitterrand as a missed opportunity for the gay community to reflect on its penchant for exoticism and Orientalism, both of which drive sex tourism. The Moroccan writers Abdellah Taïa (2006) and Rachid O. (1995) have given witness accounts recounting the passage of European travelers in North Africa who were there in search of sexual opportunities unavailable (or even illegal) in Europe, the authors describing a fixation on adolescents. Joseph Allen Boone (1995) talks about the way that past gay travelers to North Africa signed up for a kind of “vacation cruise,” selectively picking which parts of North Africa to see and which to ignore: travelers refrained from grappling with the inequalities inherent in tourism, because that would have disturbed the process of their self-discovery and the comfort of the hedonistic enterprise.

In counterpoint to this view, however, other thinkers have described the ways in which tourism, including sex tourism, is fundamental to homosexuality itself, explaining that the “fulfillment or achievement of gay identity often involves travel” (Hughes 1997, 5) and that homosexuals have historically been more engaged with difference than heterosexuals as a result of their social marginalization (Dollimore 1991). The filmmaker Nouri Bouzid exposed the male “gigolo” business in 1990s Tunisia, visually depicting a sex tourism economy targeting Westerners, Tunisians striving to obtain visas for Europe, and the sexual fluidity of bisexual hustlers, as well as the contrasting moralities they upheld at home with fiancées (rigid) and outside with tourists (unrestricted) (Bouzid 1992; Videau 1992). Jasbir K. Puar (2002a, 102) has spoken of the necessity of critiquing the patterns of “gay and lesbian consumption” inherent in “queer tourism,” beyond simply speaking in positive terms of the potent purchasing power of white gay men.

The gay sex-work economy has more recently extended across the Mediterranean to the North African diaspora in Europe. The films Un fils (2003; A son) and Miss Mona (1987) showed how sex work can be pursued by immigrants, as well as their descendants, for reasons of economic distress and social alienation, leading to tragic results. Trans sex work, often involving women of color, has also been the focus of feature films (Bégéja 2001; Lifshitz 2004). The documentary Welcome Europa (2006) exposed a culture of poverty involving male sex work, in which refugees and migrants (fleeing North Africa, eastern Europe, and the Middle East), after failing to find jobs or stable living situations, reluctantly resorted to sex work. Humiliated, respondents spoke of no longer being willing to contact family members back home out of shame, hurt in their sense of “manhood” because they were unable to secure status as providers or find heterosexual connection and implantation in Europe (Ulmer 2006).

SEE ALSO Involuntary Servitude and Same-Sex Sexuality in Africa; Sex Tourism in Asia; Sex Tourism in the Middle East; Sex Work in Asia

BIBLIOGRAPHY

FILMOGRAPHY

Sexology in Asia

KUMUD RANA
PhD candidate
University of Glasgow, United Kingdom

The study of sexual science and its impact on queer subjectivities in the Asian context.

Although the terms sexual science (scientia sexualis) and sexology are often used interchangeably, the former is understood as including the Anglo-American idea of “science” as well as the humanities and social sciences (Fuechtner et al. 2018; Bauer 2009). Veronika Fuechtner and colleagues (2018) explain further that sexology, by contrast, refers to the post–World War II emphasis on medicalization, particularly sexual pathology, but also the popularization of scientific knowledge about sexuality since the nineteenth century. However, the two terms continue to be used interchangeably, especially in studies that emphasize a Foucauldian analysis of power and governmentality in relation to sexuality. Although sexology as a discipline emerged in Europe in the late nineteenth century, the term itself came into use in the early twentieth century and was firmly established by the 1960s in the Western world—mainly Western Europe and the United States. Sexual science has had significant implications for the emergence and subjugation but also the emancipation of queer subjectivities in these parts of the world, with ripple effects in other regions, such as Asia. But even before that, sexology also had an influence particularly in its selective use in nationalist and modernizing projects after independence from colonial rule.

This entry highlights these processes, focusing specifically on Asia, and discusses the gendered nature of these projects in both Western and Asian contexts. It begins with an overview of the sexological emergence of homosexuality and its subsequent appropriation by homosexual rights activists. It goes on to discuss the gendered nature of sexology and how this assisted in nationalist debates in non-Western contexts. Finally, it briefly reflects on a different path that transgender—more specifically, third gender—activism has taken in resource-poor South Asian contexts, moving away from the sexological focus of early queer activism and scholarship toward new forms of governmentality around sexuality still situated within the health paradigm (e.g., HIV/AIDS), though assisted by new institutions and experts.

Sexological Emergence of Homosexuality
Anglo-American academic understandings of sexuality have been shaped largely by American and selected European perspectives, although scholars based in Central Europe and Australia have also made significant contributions to the history of sexuality (Bauer 2009). Howard Chiang (2010) traces two turning points in the conceptualization of sex, gender, and sexuality in Europe and North America that significantly contributed to the emergence of the category of “homosexuality” and subsequent gay rights activism in these regions. The first was the development between 1880 and 1920 of the psychological understanding of gender that theorized homosexuality as a form of gender or sexual inversion, as opposed to a pathological and biological condition, as medical sexologists believed. The second turning point came in the mid-twentieth century with the theorization of gender roles and identities as separate from sex, and Alfred Kinsey's (1894–1956) work challenging the psychological interpretation of homosexuality as a mental illness.

Scholarly “rediscovery of sexology” in North America and Europe followed the rise of the gay rights movements of the 1960s and 1970s and the growing interest among activists in constructing a history and tradition of same-sex desire, with significant intellectual contributions from French philosopher and social theorist Michel Foucault (1926–1984), whose work made sexuality central to the construction of a modern self (Bauer 2009). But although Foucault's History of Sexuality (1979) is often seen as the pioneering work on the emergence of the homosexual category in nineteenth-century medicalization, the foundation for this idea, as Jeffrey Weeks (2000b) argues, had already been laid by the British feminist and lesbian and gay rights activist Mary McIntosh (1936–2013) in her groundbreaking essay “The Homosexual Role,” published in 1968, before Foucault’s work. McIntosh’s work helped Weeks critique the liberal sexological tradition from which derived the liberal sexual ideology of gay rights activism in the 1970s. Reflecting on gaps between behavior and identity categories that were obscured by the assumption of a distinctive homosexual condition, McIntosh argued that the concept of this separate category itself is a product of “transhistorical patterns” that helped organize same-sex activities, and that this process dated back no earlier than the late seventeenth century (quoted in Weeks 2000b, 6). Later, Foucault argued that the formation of sexual science in the late nineteenth century and the related emergence of new vocabularies marked a shift in Western modernity from religion to science that produced a modern sexual subject defined on the basis of desires and bodily acts. However, it was McIntosh who first argued that psychologists and psychiatrists, far from being “objective scientists of desire” or “decoders of the laws of nature,” are instead “diagnostic agents in the process of social labelling” (quoted in Weeks 2000c, 60). This is most evident in the role of sexual science in the subordination of female sexuality since early sexological texts, which is discussed in the following section.

Women and Sexology
English sexologist Havelock Ellis (1859–1939) was trapped in the conservatism of his biological theories, most significantly displayed by his attitude to lesbianism. He stressed that although “male homosexuals were not effeminate ... lesbians were inclined to be masculine” (quoted in Weeks 2000a, 34). Ellis devoted only one chapter of Sexual Inversion (1897) to lesbianism, which in turn relied on only six proper case histories. This was partly due to the dearth of easily obtainable material because there was “no visible subculture in Britain for lesbians until later in the twentieth century, unlike the situation of male homosexuals” (quoted in Weeks 2000a, 34). Thus, much of the early historical work on homosexuality—carried out predominantly by male sexual scientists and medical professionals—focused on men.

Feminists have pointed out the gendered nature of sexological texts that mainly focused on issues pertaining to heterosexual relationships (e.g., fertility, contraception, abortion, vaginal orgasm through penile intercourse), which resignified gendered roles. In relation to this, Paula Nicolson (1993) argues that classic sexological texts positioned heterosexuality and heterosexual sex as “natural,” which relied on women taking a passive/responsive role and men an assertive/active role (e.g., Ellis, Studies in the Psychology of Sex [1905]; Sigmund Freud, Female Sexuality [1933]; John H. Gagnon and William Simon, Sexual Conduct [1973]). These sexological discourses also posited orgasm through penovaginal sex as the ultimate goal of sexual intercourse, labeling failure to have an orgasm a sexual “dysfunction,” which led to the pathologization of female sexuality.

Moving away from the analysis of how sexology was gendered, Heike Bauer's (2009) focus is on the discursive context within which new sexual vocabulary emerged in different contexts in order to understand the construction of female sexuality within sexology and the ways in which women theorized sex within feminism (Bauer 2009). Bauer shows how within the context of nineteenth-century European histories of modern nation-states, female same-sex desires were mostly invisible and were treated as an afterthought in investigations of male sexuality. Furthermore, Bauer argues that from the 1880s, there was a shift to a more institutionalized organization of the study of sex, as in Psychopathia sexualis (1886), by Austro-German psychiatrist Richard von Krafft-Ebing (1840–1902), which considered female same-sex sexuality only in relation to male sexuality, where the “female invert” was an “expository device” used to argue against the criminalization of male same-sex sexuality in the new German Empire of 1871 (quoted in Bauer 2009, 93–94). This was carried on in the engagement of the text in Britain. As Bauer points out, the 1902 English translation by Francis Joseph Rebman of the twelfth and final edition of Psychopathia Sexualis omitted five out of seven pages of Krafft-Ebing’s text on the legality of female same-sex practices; Rebman deliberately tailored his translation to suit a British readership that at that time associated legal discussions of same-sex sexuality with the 1895 trial of Irish writer Oscar Wilde for “gross indecency.”

Sexological discourses on female sexuality were debated not only in the West, as discussed by anthropologist Sanjay Srivastava (2007) and historian Sanjam Ahluwalia (2018). Srivastava (2007) discusses the work of A. P. Pillay in India, who wrote extensively on sexual matters from the late 1930s until his death in 1956. Although he was deeply influenced by the writings of Ellis and sex educator and activist Margaret Sanger (1879–1966) and propounded eugenicist arguments, Pillay’s focus was on a science of pleasure as it applied to both men and women. For Pillay, an equal capacity for pleasure provided him with a theory of equality (Srivastava 2007). Pillay considered masturbation among women as well as homosexuality as possible avenues of achieving this equality in pleasure. However, Srivastava also points out that the involvement of women from the “educated class” in the birth control movement in India since the mid-1930s turned the movement toward the poor and “uneducated,” leaving discourses around sexual knowledge and pleasure to be discussed by the “educated classes” (Srivastava 2007, 50). In the postindependence period during the 1950s and 1960s, speaking about sexuality was considered “modern” and the perceived silence was seen as "backward." This designation of the “cultural” as “backward” is discussed in more detail in the next section on modernity and nationalism in colonial and postcolonial periods in India and China.

Ahluwalia (2018) provides a closer look at Pillay's radical contribution to modern sexology as it pertained to women's sexuality through a close textual reading of the pages of a journal he edited, the International Journal of Sexology (IJS), published in Bombay, India, in 1947. Ahluwalia points out that Pillay fought hard with his publishers to base the journal in India as opposed to Europe or the United States. Pillay had debated female sexuality and orgasm in the IJS before American sexologist Kinsey did in his 1953 Sexual Behavior in the Human Female, which is recognized as having initiated public debates about female pleasures in the United States. The "scientific gaze" of sexologists as well as of laypeople who read the IJS constructed women as bodies capable of having different and hierarchic orgasmic abilities on the basis of their race, class, gender, and national location, including “medico-scientific readings of pregnant bodies as orgasmic bodies; feminine anorgastic bodies as reproductively sterile bodies; and the role of breastfeeding as orgasmically auto-generative” (Ahluwalia 2018, 359).

Ahluwalia points out that in the introductory volume of the journal, a medical doctor from New York, Edmund Bergler, discussed female “frigidity,” defined on the basis that “frigid” women did not undergo a “typical sequence of events” during sex. According to Bergler, the central feature of frigidity was the absence of vaginal orgasm, and "neurotic women never achieve orgasm in the vagina and reach one, if any, only at the clitoris after prolonged massage.... He regarded cunnilingus and masturbation as deviant forms of sexual gratification among masochistic women” (Ahluwalia 2018, 360). Pillay, in response, questioned Bergler’s “scientific” deduction of frigidity as a neurotic condition. He challenged the hierarchical categorization of clitoral versus vaginal orgasm and argued that labeling “frigid” women neurotic would add to their misery and inferiority complex because vaginal orgasms are difficult for most women. However, as Ahluwalia goes on to discuss, both Pillay and Bergler confined female sexual pleasure within heterosexual and reproductive matrimony.

Although the engagement of sexologists with sexological discourses might have been heterocentric in the context of India, feminist engagements with the same in Japan took a different form. Michiko Suzuki (2006) points out that prewar female writers and feminists also played a role in the production and dissemination of sexological discourse in the country. Suzuki takes the example of the works of Nobuko Yoshiya (1896–1973), an author who developed the genre of girls’ fiction in Japan and who received the most attention as a writer of female same-sex love. Suzuki argues that Yoshiya both appropriated and subverted “sexological truths” about same-sex love in her girls’ fiction and, later, in her adult fiction. Female same-sex love gained public attention from the early 1900s with the rise in women’s higher education, mostly among students attending higher girls’ schools. “Adolescent romantic friendships” between girls in such schools was considered by Japanese sexologists a harmless and sometimes even a useful human developmental process. The older girl mentoring the younger was seen as a step to the emotional maturity of girls and as “a kind of rehearsal for entry into ‘real’ sexuality—that is, heterosexual maturity and motherhood” (Suzuki 2006, 580). Hence, such love was considered a “transitory phenomenon” and “normal,” and it was expected that girls would grow out of this phase once they left school. However, as Suzuki emphasizes, in Yoshiya’s girl fiction series Hana monogatari (1916–1924; Flower tales) the author never lets the characters “grow up” and move on to heterosexuality. But even though adolescent romantic friendships were narrated as normal by Yoshiya herself, her adult fiction used sexological discourses around “abnormality” to define same-sex love. Using Ellis’s conceptualization of “truly inverted women” who reject men as “sexually abnormal,” Yoshiya emphasizes in her later adult novels, written after 1920, that such women, although abnormal, are still natural.

Sexology, Race, and the Modern Nation-State

If the heterosexual conservatism of sexology was its defining feature since its conception, it was also paramount for the propagation of a masculinist construction of nation and citizenry that was always in opposition to the racial Other. Kate Fisher and Jana Funke (2018) and Ralph Leck (2018) argue that the integration of anthropology with sexual science permitted an interdisciplinary view of sexuality, gleaning insights from non-Western societies that helped challenge conceptions of deviant sexualities in Europe, as in the work of Foucault, Ellis, and German sexologist Magnus Hirschfeld (1868–1935). Fuechtner and colleagues (2018) take this further by asserting that while European and North American scholars and activists sought inspiration outside the “West” in their pursuit of knowledge, validity, and new audiences for sexual science, these projects also became central to “civilizing” missions of modernity in the context of decolonization. This is illustrated in an earlier paper by Fuechtner (2013) on Hirschfeld’s visit to India as part of his world tour in 1931, describing his engagement with Indian sexologists and general audiences composed of both British expats and members of the Indian elites. Hirschfeld came to India at a moment when sexology was threatened by the Nazi rise to power in Germany but thriving in India, with widespread belief among the educated Indian middle class that “science would be the basis of national progress, modernization, and possibly independence” (Fuechtner 2013, 113). However, Hirschfeld in his account of travels in India in his book Men and Women: The World Journey of a Sexologist (1935) does not engage with “contemporary Indian sexology, its proponents, and their arguments,” but rather “develops an alternative account of ancient Indian sexology that establishes India as the birthplace of sexology” (Fuechtner 2013, 120). While sexologists in India engaged with Western sexology and shared similar professional interests as Hirschfeld, he does not engage with them at the theoretical level but rather uses them as “exhibit pieces in his ethnographic narrative” (Fuechtner 2013, 120). Hirschfeld posits himself as the catalyst who will play a vital role in encouraging a sexological renaissance in India, rendering Indian sexology a “native” science that needs to be modernized by Western science.

As discussed later by Fuechtner and colleagues (2018), transnational critiques of Foucault and sexual science in general highlight how global interactions with what was considered an unscientific ars erotica of the East was necessary for the formation of the modern scientia sexualis of the West. This oversimplified binary between “scientific” and “unscientific” perspectives around sex has limited understanding of how conceptions of sexuality developed outside Europe and how they were vital to sexological understandings within Europe. In response to this, the authors highlight Chiang’s pioneering work emphasizing the global dimensions of scientia sexualis through the adaptation of a Foucauldian approach but also through the rejection of Foucault’s understanding of non-European approaches to sexual matters as an ars erotica. Chiang (2009) asserts that the concept of sexuality and the scientific turn to sexual understandings not only stemmed from new methodologies of investigation in Europe but also depended on Orientalist scholarship and ethnology, especially from China and India. Chiang argues that an East Asian scientia sexualis in the early twentieth century bears striking similarities to discourses in late nineteenth-century Europe. Chiang does so by differentiating two opposed epistemological characterizations of same-sex desire in China’s transition from an empire to a nation: “culturalistic” and “nationalistic” styles of argumentation. The culturalistic argumentation described same-sex desire, specifically between men, as a “symbol of cultural refinement” (Chiang 2010, 56). This style of argumentation was replaced by the nationalistic style in the twentieth century.

In a later article, Chiang argues that the comprehensibility of homosexuality in republican China—and not just in the postsocialist era—depended on a “nationalistic style of argumentation that arose from the interplay between the introduction of a foreign sexological concept and the displacement of an indigenous paradigm of same-sex desire”
Chiang (2010) discusses two prominent figures in republican Chinese sexology: Jingsheng Zhang (1888–1970), popularly known as Dr. Sex, and Guangdan Pan (1899–1967), considered a pioneer in the introduction of Western sexology to China. Zhang was a university professor and a sex educator who drew significantly from Ellis's work. As opposed to the traditional or cultural expressions of love and intimacy through literature, Zhang's sexological project introduced a modern methodology derived from Western sexology of seeking the “truth” about sex through documenting life histories. However, Zhang focused almost exclusively on heterosexuality.

Pan, by contrast, delved more widely into “deviant” sexual practices in his writings, lectures, and translations of Western sexological texts. Pan reiterated Freud's five-stage understanding of psychosexual maturation, delegating homosexuality to an “underdeveloped” stage that people pass through on the way to a more “mature” stage of sexual physiology and psychology that he believed characterized heterosexuality. He referred to the one case of female homosexuality discussed in Ellis’s Psychology of Sex to illustrate this process of psychosexual development (Chiang 2010, 643). These understandings were also shared by other medical and scientific experts, especially those who had trained in European and US institutions. While Chinese sexologists did not view homosexuality as necessarily curable, they constructed same-sex desire and behavior as undesirable, equating it to other kinds of “sexual perversion,” such as sadism, fetishism, and bestiality. Homosexuality was also seen as something that could be acquired through “unhygienic” social environments and habits, especially in unisex social settings such as schools, factories, military camps, and prisons. This expression of same-sex desire was characterized as “immature or temporary homosexuality” that would disappear once people left these settings, or that could be cured through more opposite-sex social interactions (Chiang 2010, 645). While traditional Chinese medicine in imperial China did not single out any sex act or object of desire as pathological, this new Western psychiatric style of reasoning introduced the category of homosexuality as “sexual perversion and psychopathology” (Chiang 2010, 646).

The association of homosexuality with perversion and pathology during the republican period also contributed to the reframing of same-sex desire and cultural expressions of homoeroticism “as an indication of national backwardness” (Chiang 2010, 647–648). This nationalistic style of argumentation on same-sex desire stood in opposition to the culturalistic style of argumentation wherein homoeroticism—at least for men—existed alongside heterosexual marriage and was even considered an expression of a man's high social status. Chiang concludes that the “epistemic alignment” of homoerotic expressions in the imperial period with the foreign notion of homosexuality prevalent during the republican period was due to the appropriation of Western-style sexology in the latter period. In China, then, “there is no such thing as homosexuality outside epistemic modernity” (Chiang 2010, 650).
In this way, Chiang (2010) contextualizes sexological debates in republican China within the larger evolving context of the development of “scientific,” “Western,” or European sexology as a new marker of modernity. Chiang argues that Chinese sex scientists introduced, “on the level of epistemology, a new style of reasoning about sexuality, and in the social domain, an unprecedented forum for intellectual debates that defined their project as culturally relevant, socially legitimate, and disciplinarily independent” (2010, 642). This is the context within which the category of homosexuality absorbed the dominant frame of thinking about same-sex desire in twentieth-century Chinese culture. Chiang describes this process as “epistemic modernity,” wherein

[it] does not merely denote a system of knowledge; rather, it is a set of ongoing practices and discourses that mediates the relationship between systems of knowledge (for example, Chinese or Western medicine) and modalities of power (for example, biopower) in yielding specific forms of experience (for example, sexuality) or shaping new categories of subjectivity (for example, homosexual identity).

(CHIANG 2010, 633)
An Elephant Advertises Birth Control as Part of a Government Campaign to Control India’s Population Growth. Indian sexology during the late 1920s and early 1930s was focused on a strong birth control movement and the emergence of scientifically framed disciplines of sexology and eugenics as intrinsically connected with the nationalist movement.

Similarly, Liat Kozma (2013), Srivastava (2007), and Fuechtner and colleagues (2018) emphasize the agentic but “unruly appropriation” (Fuechtner et al. 2018) of sexological discourses in the service of national projects of modernity within the power imbalances of colonial and postcolonial times. Writing in the context of Egypt, Kozma explores written Arabic scientific discussions of sex from the 1880s to World War II—a period considered the “heyday of [European] scientific sexology”—to argue that talking about sex did not stop with the colonial silencing of Ottoman sexual discourses but rather that the discourses were “profoundly transformed” (Kozma 2013, 428). Kozma elaborates that while Ottoman medical discourses on sex highlighted sexual desire and pleasures, and men’s desires for both women and “beardless men” had been the subject of literary and poetic productions, it was the regulation of sex that became the focus of debates beginning in the late nineteenth century. Kozma asserts that this was due to the growth of the urban middle class and the subsequent adoption of “bourgeois rules of propriety and respectability” defined by “modernity.” Women’s rights were an important part of these debates, although the need for the regulation of “male conduct and selfhood” was considered of utmost importance for the overall health of the nation (Kozma 2013, 429).

Fuechtner and colleagues (2018) provide other examples of how European sexual science and its contributions to masculinist constructions of nation-states found important interlocutors outside of colonial Europe through “unruly appropriations” by sexologists and nationalists in these countries. The authors use the term appropriation instead of “Western influence” to emphasize that elements of sexual science were selectively and actively integrated into local modernizing projects in an unruly manner that “escaped the intentions and logic of the field’s canonical figures” (Fuechtner et al. 2018, 14) — that is, in fostering state power but also in contesting this power. These modernizing projects included “challenges to ‘traditional’ mores associated with patriarchal, religious, and colonial authorities; attempts to promote nationalism through eugenics; and state efforts to develop alternative disciplinary regimes” (Fuechtner et al. 2018, 14).

Other examples are found in Shrikant Botre and Douglas E. Haynes (2018), which illustrates the selective use of Western sexual science by Indian sexual scientist and birth-control advocate R. D. Karve (1882–1953) in the first half of the twentieth century. Karve challenged Indian conceptions of sexual science popular during that time that promoted nationalist theories of brahmacharya (sexual selfconstraint) as essential to the regeneration of Indian masculinity and the nation. However, Srivastava (2007) argues that although Indian sexual reformers in colonized and postcolonized India were influenced by Malthusian perspectives on control of such “subraces” as the “poor and middling classes,” they diverged from this perspective in two distinct ways: through their emphasis on contraception as a tool to modernize Indian society, and through the conjoining of sexual reform with upper-caste nationalism. The latter was likely because of increasing non-upper caste assertion in many parts of southern and western India (Srivastava 2007, 44).

Such transnational and multidirectional influence of sexual science and sexual politics has also had profound implications on sexual subjectivities in the Global South, although in different ways. The following section focuses on third-gender activism in South Asia to show how HIV/AIDS medical intervention work since the early 1990s played a more salient role than classical Euro-American sexological texts in defining the parameters of activism in this context.

Third Gender or Transgender in South Asia

Sexological texts in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries initially put all gender- and sexually variant people under the category of “inversion.” Krafft-Ebing considered homosexuality a form of gender variance; that is, “He considered a man who loved a man to be more like a woman; conversely, he considered a woman who loved a woman to be more like a man” (Stryker and Whittle 2006, 21). German jurist Karl Heinrich Ulrichs used the term Urnings for homosexuals whom he categorized as a “third sex” that was neither fully male nor female, which gave rise to the notion of sexual inversion used extensively in early sexological discourse to define same-sex desire (Chiang 2010). But gay rights activism and the feminist sex wars in the 1970s and 1980s resulted in distinguishing the meaning of “transgender” from “homosexuality,” “casting the former in terms of what the latter negated” (Chiang 2012, 5). In the 1990s transgender studies emerged as a separate area of research pioneered by transgender activists and academics in the United States and Europe (Stryker 2006). Even while these academics, activists, and writers were still negotiating the meaning of the category “transgender” (Chiang 2012), their ownership of scholarship in this field was facilitated by the sophistication already gained by feminist and queer theories on gender and sexuality, their critiques of early sexual science, and the depathologization of homosexuality by the American Psychiatric Association in 1973. As a result of this, transgender studies was able to move away from a sexological framework, although it has mostly been limited to North American and European academic circles, albeit with some anthropological studies on the limits of Western-centric gender dimorphism through work on Native American and Southeast Asian societies (e.g., Gilbert Herdt’s Third Gender, Third Sex: Beyond Sexual Dimorphism in Culture and History, 1994).

In opposition to theoretical work intertwined with activism on transgender issues in the Global North, it is HIV/AIDS intervention through which this category has gained prominence in Asia. Although the AIDS crisis opened space for debates and studies on sexuality in the West from the 1980s on (Weeks 2000b), it also opened up formal spaces for trans and gay rights activism in Asia through the establishment of nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) working on HIV/AIDS intervention since the 1990s. This, in turn, has partly facilitated the emergence and/or consolidation of new subjectivities relating to sexual orientation and gender identity (Boyce 2007). An example of this is the legal recognition of the “third gender” identity category in such countries as, Nepal (2007), Pakistan (2009), Bangladesh (2013), and India (2014). This stands in sharp contrast to the criminalization of same-sex practices in Pakistan and Bangladesh through a British colonial law under Section 377 of the penal code (Human Rights Watch 2008). The “third gender” identity category often includes and/or conflates transgender, intersex, hijra, kothi, meti, and other subjectivities, most of whom constitute key populations for HIV/AIDS intervention due to their high risk of infection. Hijras are “an institutionalised subculture derived from both Hindu and Muslim religious/cultural practices of feminine-identified male-bodied people” who might or might not undergo “emasculati（Hossain 2012, 495）. Kothi is a term of self-identification used by male-assigned (Dutta and Roy 2014), feminine-identifying (Boyce 2007), or gender-variant (Dutta and Roy 2014) people in India who enact “passive” sexual roles (Boyce 2007). Meti is an equivalent term used in Nepal. Metis and kothis might or might not identify as transgender/trans women. In Nepal, some metis also identify as tesro lingi, or “third gender/sex.”

In South Asia, international AIDS intervention assistance paved the way for the proliferation of NGOs working for these key populations who were mostly male-assigned, feminine-identifying people then categorized under a broad category of men who have sex with men (MSM). Lawrence Cohen (2005) argues that with the expansion of HIV/AIDS intervention projects, kothi became an “emergent reality” in India as community mobilizers hired by these projects interpolated more people into the category. Others, including Aniruddha Dutta and Raina Roy (2014), argue that it was more a consolidation and expansion of the networks of kothis than a new social emergence. Similar processes explained by Cohen (2005 and Paul Boyce (2007)) in the context of India can also be seen in the consolidation of meti, and more specifically the third gender category in Nepal. Nepal was the first country in Asia to recognize a third-gender category, through a Supreme Court decision in 2007. However, there have been various contestations as to what this category actually comprises. In Nepal, the third-gender category has also been closely—although contestedly—associated with sexual identities in such a way that lesbians, gay men, and bisexual people are identified as belonging to this category.

As Susan Stryker (2006) notes, collapsing many types of gender variance into “transgender” holds both peril and promise. Third-gender activists—along with feminist and queer scholars and activists—in South Asian countries have relied on culturalist arguments to emphasize the historical existence of people of the “third nature,” as well as depictions of same-sex love in Hindu and Muslim texts (Reddy 2006; Vanita and Kidwai 2001). This has contributed to better social and legal recognition of this category in the Indian subcontinent, especially in comparison to the ambiguity about—and often hostility toward—homosexuality. However, when addressing the state through public interest litigations (legal actions to address issues of broad public concern, especially pertaining to minority or disadvantaged groups), as in the case of Nepal, activists have also contradicted this when using the language of international human rights by pointing out that “customs” and "traditions" are obstacles in the path of this “truth” of human rights (Tadie 2016).

Sexology has been a contested terrain for both feminist and queer scholars and activists in the Global North as well as the Global South. The emergence of homosexuality as a category of identity and lived subjectivity can be traced to early sexological texts that were used to pathologize but also eventually depathologized this group of people. The integration of anthropology with sexual science permitted an interdisciplinary view of sexuality, gleaning insights from non-Western societies that helped challenge conceptions of deviant sexualities in Europe, as in the work of Foucault, Hirschfeld, and Ellis. However, feminist critiques of this field of study have pointed out its gendered nature since it mainly focused on issues pertaining to heterosexuality that subordinated female sexual pleasure to sexual responsibility, at the same time considering female same-sex sexuality only in relation to male sexuality.

Sexology developed through transnational exchanges and appropriations not just by the West from the East, but also vice versa. European sexual science, for example, found important interlocutors outside of colonial Europe through “unruly appropriations” of selective elements in postcolonial nations, particularly in projects of modernizing the nation-state. Hence these projects also became central to “civilizing” missions of modernity in the context of decolonization. Feminist and postcolonial critiques of sexology have thus been effective in exposing its role in the masculinist construction of nation and citizenry that has also always been formulated in opposition to racial Others. Additionally, such transnational and multidirectional influence of sexual science and sexual politics has also had profound implications for sexual subjectivities in the Global South, although in different ways. However, it has also lent credence to “local” discourses of sexual/gender identities, such as the third-gender identity category, without necessarily granting them equal access to resources and sites of knowledge production (Dutta and Roy 2014).

SEE ALSO Section 377 and Section 377A

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Hossain, Adnan. “Beyond Emasculation: Being Muslim and Becoming Hijra in South Asia.”

https://www.hrw.org/sites/default/files/reports/lgbt1208_webwcover.pdf

Kozma, Liat. “‘We, the Sexologists …’: Arabic Medical Writing on Sexuality, 1879–1943.” Journal of the History of Sexuality 22, no. 3 (September 2013): 426–445.

Sexperts and Sex Education in the West

ANNA E. WARD
Independent scholar
Sacramento, CA

The impact of sex research, advice, and education on perceptions of nonnormative sexualities, both historically and in the twenty-first century.

Sexual behavior has long interested cultures across the globe, generating a wealth of thought on the social, moral, religious, political, economic, and national meanings of sex. However, in the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries sexual behavior increasingly was viewed as requiring systematic scrutiny and rigorous study, and new fields of knowledge production and expertise were dedicated to elucidating sexual behavior as a core aspect of individual, cultural, and national identity. Sexual behavior became subject to the attention of “experts” from a range of disciplines and professions who positioned themselves as uniquely capable of understanding sex and determining “normal” or “healthy” sexual behavior. LGBT individuals and communities—understood through a variety of historically specific frames such as the homosexual, the lesbian, the sex invert, and the sex variant—were central to this newly emerging focus, with both positive and negative consequences for LGBTQ+ people. As these expert discourses filtered out beyond specialized audiences to more general audiences, they had a tremendous impact on popular perceptions and influenced the political and legal rights of LGBT individuals across the world.

Sexology's Influence

The nineteenth and early twentieth centuries saw the rise of the public sexual health expert in the West and increased state scrutiny of sexual behaviors. Issues such as prostitution, venereal disease, masturbation, illegitimacy, and interracial sex have a long history of attracting social, religious, and state attention (Luker 1998). Sexology, a field dedicated to the study of sexual behavior and sexuality, initially had focused on scrutinizing aberrant or abnormal sexual behavior but increasingly sought to understand sexual behavior more generally and to redraw the boundaries of sexual normality. Sexologists Havelock Ellis (England), Richard von Krafitt-Ebing (Germany), and Magnus Hirschfeld (Germany) wrote extensively on homosexuality and participated in public debates on the status of the homosexual in society. Some of their ideas fueled mistaken assumptions about homosexuality; nonetheless, they all became outspoken in their belief that the homosexual and so-called sex invert was not a threat to society and should not be criminalized (Terry 1999). Hirschfeld, for example, helped form the Wissenschaftlichhumanitäres Komitee (Scientific-Humanitarian Committee) in 1897, which advocated on behalf of homosexuals, including organizing opposition against Germany’s Paragraph 175, which criminalized sexual relations between men. International conferences such as the Internationale Tagung für Sexualreform auf Sexualwissenschaftlicher Grundlage (International Meeting for Sexual Reform on a Sexological Basis), held in Berlin in 1921, included researchers from across western Europe, the United States, China, Japan, and Argentina. The World League of Sexual Reform, formed in 1928, brought together an international community of doctors, scientists, and reform activists to champion the study of sex and advocate for more humane policies and laws informed by academic research rather than solely based on religious or moral grounds. The league was not without internal conflicts, however, as disagreements about homosexuality, in particular, often divided members (Matte 2005).

Researchers specializing in the study of sex and sexuality continued to have a tremendous impact on public perception well into the late twentieth century. Alfred Kinsey's research on sexual behavior in the 1940s and 1950s was widely influential and familiarized mainstream audiences with the idea that sexuality exists on a continuum rather than in discrete and mutually exclusive categories of “heterosexual” and “homosexual.” Kinsey’s work, as well as that of William Masters and Virginia Johnson in the 1960s and 1970s, also challenged the idea that penile-vaginal penetration was the primary means of pleasure for women, emphasizing the role of the clitoris and highlighting the possibility of pleasure for women outside of heterosexual sexual relations (Irvine 2005). Masters and Johnson also published Homosexuality in Perspective (1979), presenting their findings of a sample-based study of the sexual response patterns, behaviors, and fantasies of gay men and lesbians. Shere Hite’s survey-based research in the 1970s and 1980s further contributed to the recognition of women’s sexual pleasure.

Marital Advice Literature

The notion that the sexual self requires knowledge, scrutiny, practice, and mastery began to emerge in the early twentieth century in the United States and Britain, with a boom in the circulation of marital advice manuals reflecting a growing concern over a perceived marriage crisis attributed to a range of causes, including women’s changing roles in society, modernization and urbanization, the liberalization of divorce laws and rising divorce rates, growing acceptance of premarital sex, and changing courtship norms. Perhaps the most compelling aspect of this period’s marital advice literature is how forcefully authors such as Marie Carmichael Stopes, Margaret Sanger, and Isabel Emslie Hutton argued that sexual relations were the cornerstone of marriage, determining its success or failure. Hutton argued, “There is no doubt that, if the truth were known, the great majority of unhappy marriages are due to abnormalities in sex life, some of them dating from the earliest days of marriage” (1932, 92). The need for information about “normal” sexual relations was supported by an argument that sex cannot proceed from instinct alone; it must be learned, cultivated, and practiced, with the help of expert advice (Lewis and Brissett 1967). “No man or woman should leave to chance or the play of blind instinct the most complex of all human ties,” argued Sanger (1926, 19). To proceed without sexual knowledge is akin to an “oranguotang [sic] trying to play a violin” (21).

While marital advice literature arose specifically to reinforce and support heterosexual marriage, it also served to expand the repertoire of sexual acts deemed acceptable in public discourse. Authors described in detail techniques of arousal other than penile-vaginal penetration, particularly direct clitoral stimulation, and defended their propriety (Laipson 1996). In an effort to shore up heterosexuality, they gave credence to a broader range of possibilities for sexual pleasure and satisfaction, particularly for women. It is important to note, however, that they rarely encouraged clitoral stimulation as the sole means of stimulation or an ideal. Marital advice literature of this period evinces a persistent anxiety about lesbianism in particular. Stopes, one of the most prominent and prolific marital advice authors of time, went so far as to argue in Enduring Passion (1931) that semen is a physiological necessity for women if they are to remain physically and mentally healthy. Stopes also warned that women who were sexually unfulfilled in their marriages would resort to other means, including infidelity and lesbianism (Stopes 1931).
Although marital advice literature was focused on shoring up heterosexual marriage, the proliferation of these texts signaled a marked shift away from a purely procreative and naturalized understanding of sexual relations, opening the door to considerations of nonheterosexual sexual relations and a more experimental sexual ethic. Post–World War II anxiety over gender relations, changing family structures, and the perceived threat of communism slowed the momentum of this shift, however, as advice manuals advocated a return to more traditional heteronormative dynamics. Cold War–era fears about “male softness” and homosexuality, as well as the increasing influence of US variants of Freudian psychoanalysis that viewed homosexuality negatively (Hale 1995), had a significant effect on 1950s marital advice manuals (Neuhaus 2000).

Dating and Sex Advice Literature and Media

In the 1960s and 1970s there was a gradual emergence of sex-advice literature that focused not on promoting healthy marriages but on experimentation and personal satisfaction, with more attention on LGBT communities (Seidman 1989). Sex and relationship advice literature increasingly emphasized sexual life as an issue of self-awareness, authenticity, and identity formation. These texts emerged in the same era that therapeutically oriented approaches to sexual life also became more influential. They were also increasingly authored by nonprofessional “experts” who claimed insight into sexual matters by virtue of personal experience; Helen Gurley Brown’s Sex and the Single Girl (1962) and Terry Garrity’s The Sensuous Woman (1969) are notable early examples. Garrity states clearly, “I am not a psychiatrist, psychologist, gynecologist, trained researcher, or any other kind of expert…. This is definitely an ‘unofficial’ book by a laywoman (if you’ll excuse the pun)” (190–191). This “do-it-yourself” perspective became commonplace in sex advice media and positioned it within a growing self-help market in the United States.

Sex-advice texts of the late 1960s and 1970s were much more like manuals in their specificity, often including detailed suggestions for experimenting with different sexual behaviors and techniques, particularly nonprocreative sexual activities such as oral sex. Garrity’s The Sensuous Woman and M’s The Sensuous Man (1971) both extol the pleasures of oral sex and provide detailed instructions for orally pleasuring men and women, respectively. While neither text discusses nonheterosexual sex, their attention to and positive regard for nonprocreative sexual behaviors helped widen the scope of acceptable sexual behavior and encouraged a broader view of the sexual pleasures of the body.

Alex Comfort’s The Joy of Sex (1972), one the most successful sex manuals of all time, was firmly entrenched in a pleasure-for-pleasure’s-sake paradigm, representing a “libertarian sex ethic” (Seidman 1989, 310). Comfort argued that “any sex behavior is normal which (1) you both enjoy, (2) hurts nobody, (3) isn’t associated with anxiety, (4) doesn’t cut down your scope” (1972, 78). While Comfort’s comments regarding gays and lesbians were not always positive, his libertarian view and the wide variety of sexual behaviors he espoused Advice columnists were also important voices in educating the public on issues of sexuality. Abigail Van Buren’s popular syndicated advice column “Dear Abby” (1956–2000), for example, featured columns addressing homosexuality as early as 1967, and she consistently gave advice that counteracted negative assumptions about homosexuality and homosexuals (Johnson and Holmes 2017). Her columns encouraged concerned parents to accept their gay and lesbian children and counseled gay men and women to be themselves.

In the late twentieth century “pop” sexologists and “sexperts” educated mainstream audiences in an effort to shape prevailing ideas about sex and sexuality. Dr. Ruth Westheimer, in addition to authoring numerous books and articles, hosted the popular New York City radio show Sexually Speaking (1980–1990) and several television shows (Melody and Peterson 1999), including the 1993 Israeli television show Min tochnit (literally, “kind of a program,” but a play on words because min means sex and gender in Hebrew). Susie Bright, Pat/Patrick Califia, Tristan Taormino, Dan Savage, and Violet Blue all developed wide readerships both in print and online, and they devoted significant attention to LGBT sex and relationship issues.

Lesbian-Feminist Interventions

Feminist analysis of gender roles and sexuality had a marked impact on discussions of sexual behavior across the globe throughout the twentieth century. Feminist writers and activists actively pushed back against sexist and homophobic accounts of women’s sexuality and championed the work of such researchers as Kinsey. For some feminists in the United States, the emphasis on the clitoris in sexology research on women’s pleasure came to represent sexual pleasure freed from a heterosexual imperative. The clitoris became a symbol of the possibility that women did not require sexual relationships with men or with anyone at all; they could tend to their own sexual needs through masturbation and focus their relational energies on nurturing meaningful, and political, connections with other women. One proponent, Betty Dodson, traveled around the United States beginning in the late 1960s giving intensive workshops that taught women about their sexual anatomy and how to masturbate (Queen and Comella 2008).

Feminists movements in the United States also championed a do-it-yourself ethic similar to that in 1970s relationship and sex-advice literature, encouraging women to explore their own sexuality through consciousness-raising (CR) and gynecological self-exam (Boston Women’s Health Collective 1970; Tuana 2006). One result of CR was attention to culturally taboo sexual practices. Through CR sessions, women began to talk to one another about sexual fantasies and practices that were deemed “deviant,” not just by society at large but also by many feminists. These often dealt with the role of power and difference in sexuality.
Issues such as sadomasochism, role-playing (particularly butch/femme role-playing in lesbian relationships), the use of sex toys, such as vibrators and dildos, and the consumption of pornography by women were discussed in feminist circles as potentially positive outlets for sexual expression. These taboo practices were central in the so-called feminist sex wars of the 1980s in the United States and led some lesbians to identify more strongly with gay men than with heterosexual women (Rubin 1998; Gerhard 2001).

BDSM (bondage and discipline, dominance and submission, sadism and masochism) organizations such as Samois and magazines such as On Our Backs made space for a diversity of sexual practices in lesbian communities and often provided advice and detailed discussions of sexual techniques. Susie Bright, also known as Susie Sexpert, authored a sex-advice column in On Our Backs focusing on lesbian sexuality. Feminist adult retailers such as Eve’s Garden, Good Vibrations, and Babeland opened women- and LGBTQ-friendly establishments selling sex toys and erotica and offering advice and workshops.

HIV/AIDS

The appearance of HIV/AIDS in gay male communities in the 1980s in the United States led to a focus on public health and sexual ethics, raising questions about sexual practices, sexual health, and sexual expertise. In the early years, when it was not understood what was causing these illnesses that affected gay men disproportionately (though not exclusively), critical dialogues emerged regarding sexual practices and their relationship to LGBT identities and communities. In an influential article published in New York Native in 1982, “We Know Who We Are: Two Gay Men Declare War on Promiscuity,” Richard Berkowitz and Michael Callen positioned gay male promiscuity as both the source of AIDS and the site of its solution. They favored what was then known as the “overload theory,” or the multifactorial theory of AIDS, championed by Dr. Joseph Sonnabend. Sonnabend theorized that it was not a mysterious new virus that caused AIDS but rather an accumulation of factors that produced immune deficiencies in populations at risk, including repeated exposure to sexually transmitted infections (STIs) and to the presumed immunosuppressive effects of semen (Sonnabend et al. 1984). Berkowitz and Callen, both patients of Sonnabend, avidly supported his theory and warned against the consequences of gay male promiscuity in gay periodicals. In 1983 they published How to Have Sex in an Epidemic: One Approach, one of the first “safer sex” manuals, which was widely circulated.
The links they made between “lifestyle” and AIDS, however, did not go unopposed, sparking intense backlash and debate over sexual practices in gay communities. For example, the Canadian newspaper The Body Politic published several articles in their November 1982 issue critiquing Berkowitz and Callen’s argument.

With the discovery in 1984 of the virus that came to be known as HIV and its modes of transmission, the multifactorial theory of AIDS was firmly discredited. Nonetheless, the response that Berkowitz and Callen had championed—“safer sex” techniques, particularly the use of condoms during anal penetration—was widely adopted as the primary means of combating HIV transmission. Safer sex by way of consistent condom use and personal responsibility became the message. Douglas Crimp (1987) argued that promiscuity allowed for an understanding and appreciation of the range and diversity of sexual exchange, and that it was this understanding that allowed gay male communities to respond so rapidly to the AIDS crisis despite tremendous social and political stigmas and the lack of institutional and government response.

Whereas Berkowitz and Callen, as well as many health professionals and state officials, took a harsh tone in combating HIV, other voices emerged that took a different tack and became important sources of sex education in LGBT communities. The Sisters of Perpetual Indulgence, for example, produced and distributed such pamphlets as Play Fair! (1982) and Cum Clean (n.d.), which used humor and direct language to educate gay men on STI prevention techniques (Brier 2009). Advertising campaigns by advocacy organizations used sexual imagery to draw people’s attention and emphasize that safer sex can also be sexy. Erotic and pornographic videos were also produced to instruct LGBT communities in safer sex techniques. In the early 1990s videos aimed at lesbians, such as Well Sexy Woman (1992), She’s Safe! (1993), and Safe Is Desire (1993), helped to educate and to eroticize safer sex practices (Milliken 1999).

Public advocacy and health campaigns specifically targeting gay men struggled to reach men who had sexual contact with other men but did not identify as gay or bisexual for a variety of social, cultural, and political reasons. The new term men who have sex with men (MSM) attempted to disentangle sexual acts from sexual identification in order to more effectively respond to a growing public health crisis and to prevent stigmatizing sexual minorities (Young and Meyer 2005). The challenges of developing a public health response to HIV/AIDS forced communities to think carefully about sexual identities and practices as contextually dependent and evolving. This became even more apparent as such international organizations as the World Health Organization, as well as transnational advocacy groups, struggled to develop HIV prevention and treatment solutions attentive to the needs of different communities.

Sex Education in Schools

The sexual education of children and young adults remains a controversial topic in countries worldwide, particularly when the content incudes discussions of LGBTQ+ issues. In the United States, sex education in schools arose out of the progressive education movement of the nineteenth century. Initially focused mostly on reproduction and personal hygiene, sexual health courses in the 1950s began to address dating and sexual activity, and to tackle such taboo subjects as pedophilia, STIs, and homosexuality. Social guidance manuals and videos aimed at schoolchildren represented same-sex attraction as immature and misguided (Campbell 2017) and warned children that homosexuals were dangerous (Ides 2014).

As challenges to sexual conventions spread throughout many countries in the 1960s and 1970s, more schools began broadening their curricula and discussing issues pertinent to LGBT communities. For example, Peel County in Ontario adopted a sexual health curriculum in 1977 that included discussion of homosexuality, bisexuality, and transsexualism. With the emergence of the HIV epidemic, more schools around the world added discussion of a broader range of sexual behavior, but inclusion of LGBTQ+ issues is still more the exception than the rule. In the United States, some localities and states began explicitly forbidding the inclusion of LGBTQ+ content in curriculum. In 1995 Merrimack, New Hampshire, made headlines with its Prohibition of Alternate Lifestyle Instruction policy designed to prevent teachers and counselors from allowing any discussion or activity that portrayed homosexuality positively (Irvine 2000). According to the Guttmacher Institute (2018), only twelve states in the United States require that sexual orientation be discussed as part of sex education, and three of them (Alabama, Texas, and South Carolina) require that the information on homosexuality be negative. Arizona requires that if HIV prevention education is included in a school’s curriculum, homosexuality cannot be promoted or depicted positively. While LGBT content in US schools is still a controversial subject, other countries have repealed anti-LGBT education policies and, in some cases, have adopted an LGBT-positive curriculum. In 2003 Britain repealed its controversial Section 28 of the Local Government Act 1988 that forbade the promotion in schools of homosexuality or of homosexuality as a family form. Germany, Sweden, and the Netherlands have all adopted state-sanctioned sex curricula that include positive discussion of sexual and gender diversity.

Adolescents increasingly use the internet and other new media forms as a source of information about sex and sexuality. LGBT adolescents, in particular, report seeking information online to supplement heterocentric and/or abstinence-focused sexual health curricula (Pingel et al. 2013), citing a lack of offline resources and the relative privacy of online-information seeking as significant motivators (Mitchell et al. 2013). New media is more likely than school-based curricula to provide information regarding sexual pleasure—an issue that adolescents report having a strong interest in (Holstrom 2015). LGBT adolescents also report seeking sexual information via new media in order to find a sexual community, to learn from the sexual experiences of others who share their identity, and to find affirmation of their sexual interests (Flanders et al. 2017).
SEE ALSO BDSM (Bondage and Discipline, Dominance and Submission, Sadism and Masochism); Clitoris; Higher Education and LGBTQ+ Communities in the United States; HIV/AIDS; Institut für Sexualwissenschaft; Kinsey Scale; Penis; Pornography

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Pingel, Emily Sweetnam, Laura Thomas, Chelsea Harmell, and José A. Bauermeister. “Creating Comprehensive, Youth Centered, Culturally Appropriate Sex Education: What Do Young Gay, Bisexual, and Questioning Men Want?” Sexuality Research and Social Policy 10, no. 4 (2013): 293–301.

Sanger, Margaret. Happiness in Marriage. New York: Brentano’s, 1926.

Sexual Revolution in Europe

SVANUR PÉTURSSON
Adjunct Lecturer
Rutgers University, Newark, NJ

The impact on the LGBTQ community of the mid-twentieth-century shift of European attitudes about sex and greater sexual freedoms.

In the decades following World War II, Europeans were dealing with not only the direct legacies of the war in the form of a political division between East and West but also a renewed and revitalized Americanization in the form of increased consumerism. Eventually, there was an economic boom in the 1950s in much of the West, but in the immediate postwar period there was an increased sexual conservativism in attitudes to premarital sex and sexual minorities. This was in some respects a backlash response to the 1920s, which had seen increased debates surrounding birth control, eugenics, women’s rights, and sexual reform (led to a great extent by the work of Magnus Hirschfeld’s Berlin-based Institut für Sexualwissenschaft [Institute for Sexual Science]); indeed, many scholars see this period as the first sexual revolution. But it was in the 1950s that the ground was prepared for what later would be called the sexual revolution in Europe, a period of greater sexual liberation that culminated in the late 1960s sex wave. The sexual revolution saw a significant shift in sexual mores, not only in terms of changing legislature but more generally in changing attitudes toward sex and sexuality. The sexual revolution was not an uncontested affair, however, as both conservative politicians and religious authorities decried it as symptomatic of a general collapse of morality, especially when it came to attitudes about premarital sex. However, the revolution was driven forward by new modes of communication, especially mass media—which could not easily be censored, at least in the more democratic and liberal West.

Although the sexual revolution has largely been portrayed as a heterosexual affair, LGBTQ individuals also benefited from many of its developments. Increased belief and interest in sexological research, legislative changes, and the impact of mass media, consumerism, and leisure all benefited heterosexual individuals but also built the framework from which LGBTQ individuals could argue for greater rights and visibility of their own. In that sense, the sexual revolution was in many ways delayed for sexual minorities, not gaining momentum really until the late 1960s and reaching its height in the 1970s before the AIDS epidemic brought with it a renewed backlash.

The End of the War and the Postwar Economic Boom
The defeat of the Third Reich saw Germany occupied and later divided into east and west parts, and Europe divided politically and ideologically between Communism in the east and capitalist democracies in the west. In both halves there was a renewed conservatism when it came to sexual values, with a greater focus on family values. In both cases, those attitudes were a reaction to the supposed sexual excesses of the war and a need to return to normalcy after six years of fighting. This focus on rebuilding was particularly aimed at heterosexual individuals who were automatically viewed as the future of each nation. Although much was done legally to address the excesses and crimes of the Nazi movement all over Europe, LGBTQ individuals were generally left out when it came to redressing their experiences. For example, although West Germany reversed the vast majority of laws passed during the regime of the Nazi Party, a 1957 constitutional court ruling upheld the legality of a Nazi addition to Paragraph 175 that made even sexual glances between men grounds for arrest. Even though homosexual men had been particularly targeted by the Third Reich not only in Germany but also in occupied territories, their victimhood was not recognized after the war until the late 1960s. Paradoxically, the Nazi movement itself had been portrayed both before and during the war as a movement filled with homosexuals, which would explain somewhat the negative view of homosexuality in the first decades after the war, especially in the east, which prided itself on having defeated fascism.

The political division of Europe was manifested in the economic differences that defined the 1950s and 1960s, and these differences furthermore defined how the sexual revolution evolved in each part. The Western democracies of Europe experienced rapid economic growth throughout the 1950s and into the 1960s, spurred originally by the US Marshall Plan (an influx of economic aid to Western Europe, named for its architect, US Secretary of State George Marshall) but later maintained by access to cheap oil and labor. Along with the Marshall aid came increased Americanization and consumerism. In many ways, it was greater access to leisure and mass media that drove the sexual revolution in Europe. Challenges to the sexually conservative attitudes of the 1950s mainly came from mass media in the form of films, magazines, and newspapers, all of which were generally protected by anticensorship laws in the Western democracies. Although there were some limits to this freedom, in most cases national governments did not censor the press or ask for films to be banned. However, most countries did limit access based on age in order to protect youth from material that could endanger their moral upbringing. Thus, many sexually explicit films and articles, both heterosexual and homosexual in nature, were not necessarily censored but kept out of the hands of youth.

The Kinsey Reports and the Popularization of Sexology

The publication of Alfred C. Kinsey’s reports on American sexual behavior, Sexual Behavior in the Human Male in 1948 and Sexual Behavior in the Human Female in 1953, sent shockwaves throughout the United States and also the American-influenced Western democracies of Europe. Even though the subjects of Kinsey’s studies had been American, Europeans viewed the reports as a valid scientific sexological study broadly applicable to humans in general. Although immediately available in Great Britain, it would be a number of years before they were translated into other major European languages, but the major findings from Kinsey’s reports were immediately published in all major European newspapers and excerpts from the reports could be found in illustrated magazines. The prevalence of premarital sex and same-sex sexual activity, which was much more common than most people expected, were the most widely cited findings of the reports, and activists used these findings to argue for greater leniency in sexual legislation. While the Kinsey reports dramatically increased the visibility of sexological research throughout Europe and prompted many national sex surveys, the majority of European sexological research was still aimed at identifying, pathologizing, and further stigmatizing sexual minorities. In that sense the influence of eugenics was still felt throughout the 1950s and into the 1960s in most European countries. For example, in 1959 the Deutsche Gesellschaft für Sexualwissenschaft (German Society for Sexual Research) published Die Kriminalität der lesbischen Frau (The criminality of the lesbian woman), followed by Die Kriminalität des homophilen Mannes (The criminality of the homophile man) the following year, both written by the German criminologist Hans von Hentig.

The popularization of sexology was largely driven by illustrated magazines and weekly news magazines. Knowing that sexual information sold well, countless magazines published Kinsey’s findings and later commissioned from leading sexological research centers studies on sexual behavior in their own nations. By the late 1960s, in addition to stories about celebrities, popular music, and films, magazines also offered “scientific” reports on sexual behavior, advice columns on sexual questions, and even computerized dating services. At the height of the so-called sex wave, covers of magazines were filled with images of topless women, and some serialized what they called encyclopedias of sexuality with alphabetical entries on everything from bisexuality to fetishism to pornography. However, despite the increased openness and curiosity about anything sexual, sexual minorities had to battle continued stigmatization from sources of so-called sexual expertise, such as David Reuben’s book Everything You Wanted to Know about Sex (But Were Afraid to Ask), published in 1969 in the United States and later excerpted and serialized in many European magazines.
Differences between the East and West/North and South

Detailing how the sexual revolution differed in each country in Europe is beyond the scope of this entry, but there are a few basic differences that point to the role that politics and religion played in the sexual revolution. As highlighted above, the sexual revolution in the West was largely driven by mass media publications and films that both informed and titillated their audiences. Laws that forbade outright censorship allowed magazines to push the envelope in terms of what passed as acceptable material; the media in the Communist East did not enjoy the same privilege. Relationships between men and women were often considered to be more equal in the Communist East where the equality of the sexes was actively promoted, and in certain respects the East rivaled or even outdid the West in contraceptive and abortion policies. For example, in Poland, contraceptive clinics were set up in major cities in the early 1950s and the family-planning organization Towarzystwo Swiadome Macierzynstwo (Society for Conscious Motherhood) was founded in 1957; in contrast, Italy had no contraceptive laws until the 1970s. In Czechoslovakia, important aspects of sexual liberation were already underway in the 1950s, when abortion was legalized and the female orgasm became a focus for sexual experts. In contrast to trends in many other European countries, the late 1960s in Czechoslovakia saw an increased focus on family values and a renewed expectation that women should be caring mothers and docile wives. However, the sex wave of the late 1960s did not emerge in the East as it did in the West. A sort of sexual revolution occurred in parts of eastern Europe in the later 1970s, but those changes were nowhere near as radical as those that landed after the fall of communism in 1989 when the East was flooded by the consumerist sexuality of the West.

The major differences between northern and southern parts of Europe revolved around religion. The Protestant Scandinavian countries in the north led the way when it came to greater sexual openness. Sweden served as a role model for many other countries in introducing compulsory sex education in schools, and it also produced many “scandalous” films such as Ingmar Bergman’s Tystnaden (1963; The Silence) and Vilgot Sjöman’s Jag är nyfiken—en film i gult (1967; I Am Curious: Yellow). Denmark was one of the first countries to legalize pornography, in 1967, which created a booming export industry for Danish pornography throughout Europe. In the predominantly Catholic south, the church had a much stronger hold over ideas of marriage; although marriage rates remained high in the north despite the sexual revolution, premarital sex was more widely accepted than in countries such as Italy and Spain. Everywhere in Europe there was a greater focus on the idea of good sex within marriage, which was popularized and spread largely by illustrated magazines and marital guidebooks.

Decriminalization and the Importance of Mass Media

Although LGBTQ individuals were stigmatized and discriminated against everywhere in Europe in the immediate postwar period, same-sex relations were not criminalized everywhere. In fact, it is difficult to link criminalization and decriminalization to a specific religion or political system. For example, all references to homosexuality had been removed from the 1791 French criminal code as far back as the French Revolution (1789–1799), and during the Napoleonic Wars (1803–1815) homosexuality was decriminalized in various territories that came under French control, including many German territories and the Netherlands, which later became a central location for gay liberation. Unified Germany recriminalized homosexuality in 1871, whereas recently unified Catholic Italy’s first penal code in 1889 contained no laws against private, adult, and consensual homosexual relations. The Soviet Union decriminalized homosexuality in 1917 but recriminalized it under Joseph Stalin in 1933. Under the fascist states of Nazi Germany, Vichy France, and Francisco Franco’s Spain, homosexuality was targeted and criminalized in various ways. Research since 2010 points to a general trend toward decriminalization of homosexuality throughout Europe in the postwar years, influenced by leading national sexologists inspired by Kinsey. This is evidenced by the United Kingdom’s Wolfenden Report, which recommended decriminalization in 1957, but decriminalization did not materialize until 1967. In the Communist East, homosexuality was decriminalized in 1932 in Poland, in 1961 in Czechoslovakia and Hungary (coming into effect in 1962), and in 1968 in both Bulgaria and East Germany. It was not until 1977, however, that the majority of the Yugoslavian states (Croatia, Slovenia, Montenegro, and Vojvodina) followed suit, and Serbia waited until 1994. Despite these differences among countries in the legal status of homosexuality, what was common to most was a continued stigmatization of same-sex relations, both gay and lesbian.

Where same-sex relations were criminalized, homophile and other LGBTQ rights organizations remained hidden or under the radar. In Switzerland, where homosexual relations were decriminalized in 1942, the gay magazine Der Kreis (The circle) was published until 1967. It was the most widely read gay magazine in Europe in the 1950s, with sections in German, French, and English; at its height it had a bimonthly print run of 1,900 copies and 700 subscribers throughout Europe and the United States. Der Kreis was important not only for its open promotion of the legal and social rights of gay men but also because it connected and brought together gay men from across Europe. Every reader was offered membership in Der Kreis-Club, which held weekly meetings in Zurich where readers could gather and discuss current affairs. The club’s annual international ball in Zurich attracted hundreds of gay men from across Europe. Although the magazine’s popularity dwindled in the 1960s as its younger readers found it too conservative, its methods of bringing readers together were replicated by other gay publications, where they could be legally published.

The importance of mass media, and magazines in particular, was especially evident with the decriminalization of homosexual relations in West Germany in 1969. While homosexuality had been discussed and debated in political venues and in mass media publications before the decriminalization, publishing a gay-oriented magazine was not feasible until after decriminalization. Before 1969, any gay-themed magazine would most likely be placed in the index of publications considered to be endangering to youth. Although these publications had not been censored, they could not be sold openly in magazine kiosks, making them commercially nonviable. However, immediately after decriminalization went into effect on 1 September 1969, the first West German gay magazine, du & ich (You and I), was published. Within a year, two more magazines, Him applaus and Don, were also in circulation and available throughout West Germany. These new gay publications were modeled not on previous gay magazines, such as Der Kreis, but on regular illustrated magazines aimed at a mass audience, and they used similar methods to engage their readers.

The consumerism inherent in mass media publications aimed at heterosexual audiences and crucial to the spread of the heterosexual sexual revolution quickly became part and parcel of the new gay magazines. The new magazines were often political in nature, but the majority of their content was stories about gay celebrities, reviews of gay-themed literature and films, and serialized novellas and short stories. The magazines also included advice columns and readers’ personal ads. Like other illustrated magazines, the new gay magazines highlighted the consumerist focus on leisure by organizing cruises for its readers and offering advice on where to go on vacation, and within a few years they were also offering a dating service where readers were matched with other readers through the help of a computer. In a sense, the consumerist focus of the sexual revolution in Europe did not really extend to same-sex–loving individuals until illustrated gay magazines became available. Although some of the new gay magazines tried to appeal to both same-sex–loving men and women, the vast majority of them were aimed exclusively at gay men, especially masculine-presenting men. Those that did include material for lesbian women did so with the best intentions, seeing a commonality in the struggle for acceptance for all LGBTQ individuals, but women never graced the covers of those magazines, and most of the content was aimed at a gay male readership. Eventually, most gay magazines reverted to an all-male focus. The marginalization of feminine-representing and trans individuals in most gay magazines, and even within the gay male community, was common throughout most of the 1970s.

In terms of the content, the attempted alliance between gay men and lesbians in the period was reflected in the uneasy alliance between the two when it came to gay rights organizations. Like many heterosexual women, many lesbians felt that the real beneficiaries of the sexual revolution were their male counterparts. Sexual imagery predominantly featured women and was created for the heterosexual male gaze. The result was a split between feminists and many of the radical male sexual revolutionaries of the period. Similarly, lesbian-identified women felt a closer kinship to other feminist women than to their gay male counterparts when it came to fighting for their rights and acceptance. Throughout Europe, lesbian-focused magazines and periodicals did not emerge until the second half of the 1970s—in most countries not until the 1980s—and they were not as widely distributed as the gay male–oriented publications.

At the height of the sexual revolution in the late 1960s and early 1970s, discussions of sexual matters could be found in movies, music, magazines, and eventually also on television. Same-sex–loving relationships did not appear in mainstream cinema for most of the 1960s in Europe. Same-sex characters were mainly found in British “kitchen sink dramas,” such as Tony Richardson’s A Taste of Honey and Basil Dearden’s Victim, both from 1961. It was not until the advent of openly gay directors, such as Rainer Werner Fassbinder (1945–1982), Pier Paolo Pasolini (1922–1975), and Rosa von Praunheim (1942–), that gay characters were depicted in a complex and positive, yet often critical, light. Some of their films were later shown on television, but because television was the most directly state-controlled medium throughout Europe until the 1980s, same-sex–themed films rarely made it to the home screen. This became especially evident with the debates surrounding the airing of von Praunheim’s Nicht der Homosexuelle ist pervers, sondern die Situation, in der er lebt (1971; It is not the homosexual who is perverse but the society in which he lives) on West German television in 1973. Throughout the 1970s, same-sex–loving individuals seen on television appeared mainly in documentaries and news reports on their place in contemporary society. Nonetheless, these appearances were invaluable to making LGBTQ individuals visible not only to the rest of society but also to other LGBTQ individuals unaware of the existence of like-minded people. Thus, the otherwise heterosexual revolution that was so prominently reported in every available medium eventually allowed a similar opening for LGBTQ individuals, especially in the consumerist West.

SEE ALSO Butt Magazine; Communism and Queers in Europe; Kinsey Scale; Sexperts and Sex Education in the West; Sexual Revolution in the United States; The Wolfenden Report

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Starting in the 1950s, gaining momentum in the 1960s, and concluding in the early 1970s, nearly every person living in the United States experienced a significant shift in the values and expectations around sex and sexuality, resulting in a more open, accepting, and experimental approach to sexuality than previously. Race, class, sex, gender, sexuality, and geographic location informed the new sexual norms contested and created during this period and also determined the extent of change individuals experienced. This sexual revolution extended into nearly every facet of life within the United States, from culture and politics to science and business. A response to the intense policing of sexuality that occurred in the late 1940s and 1950s that was symptomatic of larger Cold War fears and concerns, the sexual revolution embodied shifting sexual norms as much as it did a rebuke of existing political discourses, an embrace of new medical possibilities and understandings, and a commitment to greater legal equality. Although often portrayed as a largely heterosexual sexual revolution, in fact, the events and changes in this period either directly affected gender and sexual minorities or laid important foundations on which gender and sexual minorities built to gain acceptance and political ground. This sexual revolution resulted from significant medical, political, legal, and cultural developments, each explored here, and created unprecedented opportunities for members of the LGBTQ communities to claim legitimacy and visibility.

Kinsey and the Pill

Science and medicine fueled these shifting sexual norms, with two specific events acting as the scientific engines for the sexual revolution: the publication of Alfred C. Kinsey's (1894–1956) Sexual Behavior in the Human Male in 1948 and the approval of the first oral contraceptive by the US Food and Drug Administration in 1960. A zoologist initially specializing in fruit flies at Indiana University, Kinsey and his colleagues compiled vast and in-depth research on human sexuality, offering the general public its first mass accounting of sexual experiences and practices in the population through an extensive survey, impressive in its breadth and depth. The resulting publications, Sexual Behavior in the Human Male (1948) and Sexual Behavior in the Human Female (1953), sent shock waves through the public as they showed that both premarital sex and same-sex sexual activity... were much more common than existing sexual norms would suggest or allow. Of the two texts, Sexual Behavior in the Human Male earned much more widespread media attention and had a more lasting impact on society as a whole. While the majority of medical and scientific research, writings, and practice of the time worked to stigmatize and pathologize gender nonconformity and nonmonogamous heterosexual sexualities, the Kinsey reports provided research and evidence validating the practices and experiences of individuals from a full spectrum of gender and sexual identities. In this way, Kinsey and his colleagues gave members of these communities "proof" that they were neither alone nor as deviant as the existing social norms and medical attitudes would suggest. Kinsey himself and his research came under attack, with many of his research methods being proved unethical and some of his findings questionable. However, the gay liberation activists of the 1970s and the larger LGBTQ political movements that emerged decades later clung to some of the statistics in the study to demonstrate that sexual minorities existed in significant numbers and were therefore worthy of rights, destigmatization, and depathologization. In many ways, Kinsey's work proved groundbreaking, but for members of sexual minorities it offered two important contributions to their eventual legitimacy: it acknowledged their existence, and it did not assign stigma or judgment to their behavior.

The approval of the first oral contraceptive in 1960 also altered the sexual norms in the United States in ways that would allow sexual and gender minorities to lay claim to rights and validity. "The pill," as it quickly came to be known, gave women the medical ability to control their own fertility in unprecedented ways. Although it unknowingly posed significant health threats to women initially owing to the extremely high dosages of estrogen in the early version of the medicine, it also became highly sought after by women both in and outside of wedlock who wanted greater control over their fertility rather than reliance on condom use by male sexual partners. As the pill became increasingly available over the course of the decade, bolstered by US Supreme Court decisions discussed below, it became the most widely used prophylactic in the United States. Consequently, both the expectation for sex before marriage and the stigma around sex before marriage (that did not result in pregnancy) shifted dramatically over the 1960s and 1970s. Premarital sex became less taboo because its consequences diminished. This loosening of sexual prohibitions and renegotiations of sexual norms did not initially include acceptance of same-sex sexuality or gender nonconformity, but it created a sexual landscape in which these activities were no longer invisible or impossible. LGBTQ politics and identities took root in these medical and scientific spaces of possibility and flourished to create a national gay medical infrastructure in the 1970s that lobbied successfully for the removal of homosexuality from the American Psychiatric Association's Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders as a diagnosable mental illness in 1973.

Political Movements
The political atmosphere of the 1960s and 1970s also played a pivotal role in the sexual revolution. The civil rights movement of the 1950s and 1960s and the beatnik counterculture movement of the same period demanded a rethinking of social norms with regard to race and class. The anti–Vietnam War and student movements that took shape in the waning years of the 1960s extended the questioning of existing norms and the challenging of the wisdom and authority of previous generations with regard to foreign policy, capitalism, interracial sex and marriage, and sexual norms. In this way, the sexual revolution appears as only one part of a larger social and political reordering. The younger generation doubted the acumen of their elders who had led them into the protracted war in Vietnam, the inequality of segregation, and the social unrest that resulted. As the politics of the older generations failed them, the younger generation also questioned their social norms, particularly around sexuality.

The hippies are perhaps the most iconic example of this challenge to existing norms. With their communal living, sexual freedom, and deep commitment to peace, the hippies often embodied the social and sexual revolution they hoped would transform the entire country. However, the reconsideration of social and sexual norms undertaken by the younger generations of the late 1960s extended far beyond the hippies' center in the Haight-Ashbury district of San Francisco. With more lax attitudes toward premarital sex, in part fueled by anxieties over young men being drafted and sent to Vietnam, sexual experimentation became more openly accepted and expected in ways that, again, provided an important backdrop to the increasing visibility and legitimacy of nonheterosexual sexual experiences and identities. As newscasts covered the so-called Summer of Love in 1967, images of sexual experimentation and hypersexualized culture appeared in living rooms across the country. On college campuses nationwide, students protested against and overturned parietals, the strict etiquette rules around women on campus designed to protect women's virginity.

Key Legal Cases

A series of legal rulings not only exemplified the sexual revolution of the mid-twentieth century in the United States but also facilitated it. The first of these Supreme Court cases, Roth v. United States (1957), dramatically redefined obscenity and expanded the sexual content protected under the First Amendment of the US Constitution. Early LGBTQ political and social networks relied heavily on newsletters and publications that were often targeted by police and prosecuted under a strict definition of obscenity set by what remained of the Comstock Law. Enacted in 1873, the Comstock Law broadly defined obscenity as a way to police and criminalize aspects of the suffragette and women’s movement. The Roth ruling, however, strengthened the constitutional protection of the vast majority of these publications and led directly to an increase in their number, while also resulting in greater access to nonheterosexual and gender-nonconforming information, an increase in declared state laws barring interracial marriage unconstitutional—a significant win for both the civil rights movement and sexual freedom. Though not directly related to sexual or gender minorities, this ruling signified the shifting sexual norms of the period and laid the legal foundation for future court rulings related to sexual civil rights cases. The Griswold v. Connecticut ruling of 1965 and Eisenstadt v. Baird of 1972 both expanded access to birth control—first to married women and then to all women, regardless of marital status. Combined with the Roe v. Wade decision in 1973 to grant women access to abortion, these legal rulings created a new legal topography for sexuality and sexual norms in the United States—one that was much more open about sexuality and ripe, both socially and legally, for an emerging gay liberation movement.

Cultural Changes

The economic boom that followed the end of World War II (1939–1945) led to the increase of public spaces designed for courtship, entertainment, and the exploration of sexuality beyond the home and the watchful eyes of family members, whether in cities or in the growing suburban landscape. These ranged from drive-in movies to pornographic bookstores and from bathhouses to soda shops. As an increasing number of women grew more financially independent and postponed marriage to pursue college or careers, the sexual norms around courtship and marriage shifted as well. The roaring economy also increased access to spending money, particularly in stark contrast to the Great Depression and war years that preceded the period. As a consequence, there were greater options for and increased acceptance of exploring sexuality that spilled beyond strictly heterosexual interactions. Cities, in particular, became more open, providing venues and communities in which, like their heterosexual and gender-conforming counterparts, gender and sexual minorities could gather, mingle, date, and organize. Greenwich Village in New York City and the Castro in San Francisco became the most iconic and alluring destinations for gay men in particular.

During the sexual revolution, sex and discussions about sex also began to seep more obviously into culture through television, movies, music, and writings, which provided spaces for depictions and discussions of sexual variance within both heterosexual and nonheterosexual sexualities. As television became an increasingly ubiquitous technology in homes, the depictions of sexual norms and sexualities became hotly contested and constantly negotiated by producers, actors, and consumers. The shift in sexual norms in this period is perhaps most easily illustrated by comparing the depiction of a married couple’s bedroom in 1950s television sitcoms, each in complete sets of pajamas in their own single-sized bed, to the portrayal of sexuality in early 1970s television that not only acknowledged that people had sex but often depicted some form of it. Moviegoers of this period also witnessed a decrease in censorship around sexuality and, in films such as The Graduate (1967), saw more open discussions of sex outside of marriage, including, as in The Boys in the Band (1970), nonheterosexual sexuality. Musicians of this period, including Janis Joplin, Jimi Hendrix, and the Beatles, also became revered icons of not just music but sexuality as well, as they offered the soundtrack to the sexual revolution and embodied it personally. These cultural forces molded the landscape of the sexual revolution, paving the way for significant shifts in sexual norms that proved more welcoming to sexual and gender minorities.

Although the sexual revolution of the mid-twentieth century in the United States is often associated almost exclusively with heterosexuality, it in fact played a pivotal role in the increased legitimacy and visibility of gender and sexual minorities and thus laid the foundation for the modern LGBTQ communities. The sexual revolution forged important shifts in medicine, politics, law, society, and art that pulled gender and sexual minorities in from the furthest margins of society and permitted them to lay future claims in each of those arenas in ways that would allow LGBTQ identities to form and communities to grow. Thus, the sexual revolution provided a launching pad for many of the organizations and historical figures that constitute LGBTQ communities nationally today, from the Log Cabin Republicans to the Radical Faeries and from Marsha P. Johnson to Andy Warhol.

SEE ALSO Kinsey Scale; Sexual Revolution in Europe; Stonewall Riots, International Effects of

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Sharaf (1997; Sunʿallah Ibrahim)

HANAN HAMMAD
Associate Professor and Director of Middle East Studies Texas Christian University, Fort Worth

Novel that connects homosexuality with globalization to suggest that both entail a loss of honor for the average Egyptian man.

Sharaf (1997) is the sixth novel by the Egyptian author Sunʿallah (or Sonallah) Ibrahim (1937–) and his first published by a state-owned publishing house. The opening chapters of Sharaf were serialized in the state literary weekly Akhbar al-Adab a few months before the novel’s publication in 1997. The novel’s title communicates a double meaning: the literal meaning of sharaf is “honor,” but it is also the name of the protagonist, Sharaf. (The full name of the protagonist is Ashraf ʿAbd al-ʿAziz Sulayman, but he goes by his nickname, Sharaf.) The novel chronicles Sharaf’s realization that it is impossible to keep his sexual honor because all Egyptians have already lost their collective national honor under globalization, which is served by local political repression and economic corruption. Because Sharaf’s limited education does not allow him to understand the integration of Egypt in the global economy or the effect of globalization on Egyptian politics, the story is told by a third person who communicates the author’s perspective.

The novel follows Sharaf, a lower-middle-class young man who fetishizes imported trademarks and designer labels in an intensely globalized and classed Cairo. After falling prey to a Western seducer, Sharaf ends up in a prison awaiting trial for murder. The threatened and eventually lost honor of Sharaf and of Egypt animates the novel as the author laments the socioeconomic and political conditions in Egypt and its subordination by global market forces. Although Ibrahim had used the metaphor of sexual impotence for national defeat in his previous works, Sharaf equates homosexuality with the loss of all kinds of honor—sexual, professional, and national. Without problematizing homosexuality as a possible sexual orientation, Ibrahim represents same-sex desire and practices as a deviance that mirrors Egypt’s degeneration under corruption and subordination to exploitative globalization.

Born in 1974, Sharaf graduated from high school but never attended university. His unfulfilled heterosexual desire and his sense of material deprivation dominate his thoughts, monologues, daydreams, and conversations with peers. Sharaf roams downtown Cairo, coveting the city’s designer brands, fashionable clothing, and rich women in miniskirts driving expensive cars, while he himself cannot afford an inexpensive meal out. Sharaf despises spending time at home, where he lives with his family, including a divorced sister and her children. Suffering, like many others, from the national housing problem, his parents, their children, and their grandchildren share a one-bedroom apartment in a Cairo slum. The broken sewage system frequently overflows, making the smell in the entire slum unbearable year-round. Sharaf prefers to escape his home to avoid dealing with his frustrated father, who talks with a mix of pride and anger about his heroic efforts to make his modest monthly salary of 340 pounds stretch to the family needs of 800 pounds. Like that of most Egyptians, the family’s income has steadily declined under globalization and privatization policies in the late twentieth century.

SOURCE: DAR AL-HILAL

Cover the First Edition of the Novel Sharaf (1997) by Sun’h Ibrahim. This cover was drawn by Bahgat ʿUthman, one of the most important caricature artists of the 1980s and 1990s. It mocks authoritarianism and political corruption in Egypt in its depiction of a puppet show in which a policeman puppet (representing the state) beats a prisoner puppet (representing ordinary people). The illustration refers to a puppet show script in the novel but is also a reference to the traditional use of street puppet shows as a covert form of protest against repression and injustice.

Sharaf’s life goes from bad to worse after he encounters a blond foreigner named John who claims to be Australian but is actually English. Sharaf accepts John’s offer of a free movie ticket, and after the movie, his invitation to his luxurious apartment in the upscale Zamalik neighborhood for a drink. John plies Sharaf with fancy food, drinks, hashish cigarettes, and a gold necklace before attempting to seduce him. When Sharaf rejects John’s sexual advances, John attempts to rape him; in the course of their struggle, Sharaf accidentally kills him. Sharaf explains to the police that he was defending his honor, but because he has John's necklace the police conclude that he killed him during a robbery attempt; after Sharaf is tortured under interrogation, he signs a confession to that effect. Sharaf becomes more confident that he will be found not guilty after he witnesses the court releasing a man who had killed his sister for engaging in premarital sex, on the grounds that he committed the crime defending the honor of the family. Although the Egyptian legal code contains no reference to honor killing (murder committed by a male family member against a female family member perceived to have brought dishonor on the family), judges often treat such perpetrators with maximum leniency. Sharaf hopes for the same sympathy, but the court dismisses his claim that he killed the Western man in defense of his honor. Sharaf’s imprisonment proves the inferiority of Egyptian masculinity as Sharaf’s sexual honor does not have any value, and his sexual services become a subject of negotiation among guards and inmates, including an Israeli spy. Sharaf’s entire life in jail becomes a journey toward his complete emasculation as he eventually accepts the role of a penetrative passive partner. Ibrahim’s Sharaf is a statement that the emasculation of Egyptian men was started by the colonial West and completed by the Egyptian authoritarian state.

Prison as a Model of Society

The novel details Sharaf’s progress from police interrogation to police detention, and to temporary prison awaiting trial. In prison Sharaf lives in a rigidly divided world where the “haves” keep all their privileges and the “have-nots” are stripped of their basic human rights and dignity. The power structure within the prison mirrors Egypt itself, which was divided in the 1990s between the fat cats (who accumulated wealth from corruption and shady business) and the violent Islamists. In prison, convicted drug dealers, pimps of supermodel prostitutes, and state personnel convicted of bribery can afford to continue their lifestyle behind bars, while Islamist prisoners wield power by threatening group violence against other prisoners and demanding that authorities remove anything deemed immoral or Western. The prison authorities themselves are thoroughly corrupt, selling supplies intended for prisoners, embezzling their wages, and taking bribes from them and their families. Having no connections, power, or money, Sharaf finds himself on the lowest level of the hierarchy: he must sleep next to the urine bucket, contend with bullying and rape, inform on his cellmates, and eventually rent his rectum to hide drugs.

Sharaf’s situation is vividly demonstrated when he is nearly raped by a nabatchi, a violent recurring offender whom the prison administration has selected to keep order inside the cell. One night Sharaf wakes to find the nabatchi on top of him, holding a razor blade in one hand and trying to strip off his underwear with the other. The attempted rape is interrupted when another inmate switches on a light, but rumors about what happened or could have happened stigmatize Sharaf as “the boy whom the nabatchi fucked.” Blaming victims of sexual assault rather than offenders is part of the culture both inside and outside prisons. All of the novel's characters view homosexuality as a lack of masculinity, and the author employs it as a metaphor for the nation's degeneration, making Sharaf a strong denunciation of homosexuality.

The novel intertwines this theme with a condemnation of globalization, which is communicated from the viewpoint of another prisoner, Dr. Ramzi. Ramzi is a pharmacist who began his career dreaming of social justice but ended up working for a Swiss transnational drug company, where he witnessed the destructive effects of globalization on national economies and health. When he was chosen to manage the company's branch in Egypt, he could not keep silent about its dirty business practices that destroy local production and market harmful drugs. To get rid of Ramzi, a retired police general working for the company used his connections to frame Ramzi for bribery. While in prison awaiting trial, Ramzi composes his legal defense with evidence of how the economies, public health, and security of many countries are compromised to serve the few individuals who control global politics via a small number of mega transnational companies. Ibrahim uses Ramzi's voice to denounce the global economy that operates to concentrate wealth in a few hegemonic transnational companies that then destroy the economies of Third World nations including Egypt.

The reading of Dr. Ramzi's files shifts the novel's first-person narrative from Sharaf to Ramzi to better articulate the author's sophisticated critique of globalization. Ramzi echoes the views of Ibrahim himself—views that Sharaf would not be able to articulate, given his limited understanding. With Ramzi's papers, which constitute one-third of the novel (making it Ibrahim's longest), Ibrahim employs his creative trademark intertextuality to produce his best-integrated documentary narrative. Beginning with his second novel, Najmat Aghustus (August's star) in 1974, and continuing with al-Lajna (1981; The committee), Beirut Beirut (1984), and Dhat (1992; Self), Ibrahim has incorporated documentary material in his fictional narratives. These documents, or the “docu-fictional,” to use Samia Mehrez's (2014) expression, are an integral part of Ibrahim's work and often are equally if not more dynamic than the traditional narrative sections; his use of this structure has made Ibrahim a leader in one of the modern trends in the Arabic novel.

Ibrahim speaks through Ramzi as he attempts to warn others about the structural dangers of globalization even when they are not willing to listen. He does the painstaking work of documenting how a few transnational companies expand their businesses in different fields of production and services around the globe. Eventually, they drive local companies out of business, impose monopolies over local markets, concentrate global wealth in the hands of a few, undermine all systems of checks and balances, and enjoy a free hand to distribute harmful products, including medicines and foods that spread diseases rather than good health.
Ibrahim has tackled these themes in his previous works al-Lajna and Dhat, but in Sharaf he flatly equates subjugation with global economic forces and national degeneration with male homosexuality. In his view, as the national economy serves outsiders and their local agents, Egyptian men lose their honor and masculinity. In one scene, a puppet show staged by Ramzi to celebrate the anniversary of the 1973 Arab-Israeli War explicitly uses male rape to represent the destructive impact of globalization on Egyptians and depicts the global economy as primitive, bloodsucking tribes. Although presumably he means to drop the mask of modernity to expose how exploitative forces operate in the advanced West and to demonstrate their vicious inhumanity, Ibrahim portrays those tribes as African, so the metaphor, as Joseph Massad reads it, synthesizes antiblack African racism (Massad 2007).

Homoerotic Elements in Sharaf

The female body and heterosexual desire preoccupy Sharaf outside the prison, but in captivity the images of women fade away while the male body captures his attention and that of most of his fellow inmates. The stories of inmates are embedded in the collective demoralization and degeneration embodied in the tendency toward homosexuality and the homoerotic. Early in his journey in captivity, Sharaf fetishizes power and beauty as performed by the controlling police officers. He enviously gazes at “their whiteness, handsomeness, and elegance: white cap under the armpit, short-sleeve white shirt, and white tight pants revealing details of thighs and butt” (1997, 37; translation by Hanan Hammad). He also stares at a young Lebanese inmate whose black shorts reveal his healthy white thighs covered with blond hair.

These homoerotic gazes throughout the novel express not only sexual frustration but also unsettled ideological tensions. Mr. Tamir, an operator of a supermodel prostitution network, exercises in revealing, tight shorts in the colors of the American flag, drawing Sharaf’s gaze as well as the ire of the Islamists. The connection of the shorts with the American flag meshes the conflicting emotions of ideological anger and consumerist desires that sweep through the passively gazing men. Interestingly, it is not Tamir’s crime but his male body that draws Sharaf's interest and the Islamists’ anger. Tamir is one of the leading agents of globalization and local corrupting forces. He is a regional manager of a five-star hotel whose kitchen sends him food daily, and he funds his consumption of global luxury brands by employing sex workers who are beautiful stars of television commercials. The exploitation of the female body to sell products is likewise the selling of female Egyptian honor; here, Ibrahim expresses anxieties over globalization and its local agents meshed with concerns over heterosexual normativity.

In the milieu of prison, male bonding becomes important to alleviate loneliness and fear. Sharaf develops an affection for another inmate around his age, ʾAbdu al-Fattah (ʾAbdu), from Upper Egypt. They spend their daytime breaks outside their cells together, holding hands—a common gesture of homosocial friendship without conscious sexual connotations. Yet the novel makes it clear that Sharaf has homoerotic feelings for ʾAbdu; he surreptitiously looks at ʾAbdu's naked chest and handsome face, thinks about him at night, and even arranges to sleep next to ʾAbdu one night on the pretext that it is his birthday. The attraction is more than physical, as Sharaf values ʾAbdu’s kindness and endeavors to learn all he can about ʾAbdu's life before prison. The account of ʾAbdu's background furthers Ibrahim’s narrative of globalization. He is from Upper Egypt, a region that Ibrahim references throughout Sharaf as having been particularly victimized by radical fanaticism and the corrupt alliance between the state and global drug companies, but ʾAbdu does not recognize the hefty price his region has paid; instead, he listens with fascination to Sharaf’s talk of foreign brands and the plots of American films.

When Sharaf learns that ʾAbdu is about to be transferred to another prison, he is overwhelmed emotionally and hugs him and kisses him on his mouth. ʾAbdu's transfer ends the men’s relationship. Although they never consummated their relationship, Sharaf feels guilty and in need of repentance because of their kiss as well as because of his own nightly masturbation, which is euphemistically called “nightly activities.” Ambiguity in the reference to his guilty feelings suggests that Sharaf, who throughout the text has used female images to stimulate his sexual excitement, may have fantasized about sexual contact with ’Abdu.

Sharaf and ’Abdu’s relationship is about male-male bonding, providing comfort, and unfulfilled desire. Although attempts at sexual contact are never realized, Sharaf and ’Abdu’s relationship is the only one in the text that is not coercive but based on mutual and true friendship. By ending it abruptly, Ibrahim avoids having to justify their same-sex relationship. Aside from that un consummated relationship, throughout the text homosexuality appears as a horrific symptom of decay; it is rape by foreigners and corrupt locals. This depiction resonates with the Egyptian public’s perception, and thus it amplifies and dramatizes the political-socioeconomic decline of Egyptian society due to the corrupt, repressive regime and enforced integration into the global economy. Globalization is a destructive force.

Male Prostitution

The novel portrays all types of same-sex relationships in a negative light and associates homosexual desire with rape, male prostitution, and accepting buggery for protection and food. The plight of Haggag, a handsome young man with straight black hair, began when he was in eighth grade, living with his impoverished parents and four siblings in two rooms in a slum on the outskirts of Cairo. A hustler deceived the young boy and took him to his house in another slum, where he repeatedly raped the boy. Threatening to ruin the boy’s face with acid, the hustler added Haggag to his gang of street children who engaged in petty crimes. Haggag becomes a frequent offender, and when behind bars, he provides assistance and sexual services to drug dealers who cover his expenses. While celebrating the release of a drug dealer, Haggag performs an erotic belly dance wearing lipstick and a scarf wrapped around his waist in the style of female dancers, and he lifts his clothes to reveal his hairless thighs, intensifying the sexual excitement among his audience. Haggag’s homosexuality exemplifies the stereotype of men diverted from “normative” sex due to the trauma of rape during childhood: the raped child becomes a prostitute for older men who support him and satisfy his effeminate desires. On another level, homosexuality is the ultimate symptom and result of the dysfunction of state and society.

Inmates call another male prison prostitute ‘Aziza, a female-only name. ‘Aziza has a feminine laugh, moves his fingers around his mouth like lower-class women, walks in a sultry manner like a fallen woman, and wears many gold rings. Since cigarettes are the currency inside the prison, ‘Aziza charges a box (a dozen packs) for a quick, casual encounter during the daytime and several boxes for a whole night.

Sharaf has already offered his rectum to hide drugs for inmates before he attracts the attention of sex shoppers. Once Sharaf’s youthful body has gained some fat due to lack of exercise, one of the prison guards communicates offers from two potential sex clients and Sharaf, who was committed to prison for defending his sexual honor, ends up making his rectum available for sex and and the concealment of drugs. He discovers that there is no place for sharaf (honor) in an oppressive, corrupt state, and he learns to manipulate his subjugation, obtaining protection and food in return for accepting the submissive and effeminate position in sexual acts. Just as he was consumed by his desire for global designer label brands beyond his means, he is consumed by his despair and need to secure the basic needs of food and protection. His lack of intellectual sophistication prevents him from understanding his subjugation inside and outside prison, and he has no chance to reflect on his experience. Yet Sharaf, as well as his fellow inmates and the majority of the Egyptian population, pays a high price. Globalization, corruption, and oppression emasculate him and lead to the loss of the honor of the entire country.

Sharaf deals explicitly with homosexuality as a symptom of the national decline in Egypt. Although he is one of the most prominent and progressive Arab/Egyptian writers, Ibrahim sustains heteronormative conservative biases toward male homosexuality. Like many other contemporary Arab/Egyptians writers, he expresses anxiety over globalization and political and economic corruption by condemning male homosexuality. According to this view, globalization castrates the Egyptian nation, the repressive, corrupt Egyptian regime emasculates Egyptian men, and both create castrated homosexuals. The metaphors of rape and honor that animate the novel express the author’s notion of homosexuality as a national degradation. There is no discussion of homosexuality itself; Ibrahim takes it for granted that homosexuality is a symptom of the decline of the nation. That decline began in the year Sharaf was born, 1974, when Egyptian president Anwar Sadat (r. 1970–1981) announced his open-market policies, infitah. After 1974 Egypt was increasingly integrated into the global economy from a subordinated position, which allowed President Hosni Mubarak (r. 1981–2011) to rapidly privatize Egypt’s economy during the 1990s under the guidance of the International Monetary Fund. Thus, Sharaf’s trajectory and fate in prison correspond to that of the country torn by economic failure, political repression, and the rise of violent political Islamism.

Because Egyptian critics share Ibrahim’s views, Sharaf was not challenged for its depiction of homosexuality, but Ibrahim was accused of plagiarizing Fathi Fadl’s novel al-Zinzana (1993; The cell). Ibrahim does not deny that he benefited from Fadl’s work, and he mentions al-Zinzana, along with many other works, in the acknowledgments section of Sharaf. Although many defended Ibrahim against the plagiarism accusation, readers of Sharaf can find several passages taken directly from al-Zinzana, including paragraphs about the detention in the police station, the trip from the station to prison, the layout of the prison cell, and the daily routine of inmates.

Ibrahim himself was imprisoned under President Gamal Abdel Nasser (r. 1956–1970), an experience that shaped his worldview, according to his own statement. Nasser’s regime imprisoned Ibrahim along with many other leftists and communists between 1959 and 1964. The same regime confiscated and banned Ibrahim’s first novel, Tilka alraʾiha (The smell of it), upon its publication in 1966. (It appeared in incomplete versions several times until its final version was published in 1986.) Before Sharaf, Ibrahim published all his work in Lebanon or with Dar al-Mustaqbal al-ʿi, a private, progressive Egyptian publishing house; avoiding state publishers underlined the distance between Ibrahim and the Egyptian regime and grounded Ibrahim’s reputation as a dissenter. Thus, the publication of Sharaf by the state-owned publishing house Dar al-Hilal raised questions about whether there had been a radical change in Ibrahim’s relationship with the regime. Ibrahim ended this speculation and confirmed his independence in 2003 when he publicly refused the Arab Novel Award, a prize given by the Ministry of Culture under Mubarak.

SEE ALSO Imarat Yaʿkubian (2002; Alaa al-Aswany); Jannā-Iblīs (1992; Nawal El Saadawi)

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Ariss, Tarek el-. “Majnun Strikes Back: Crossings of Homosexuality and Madness in

Amrad Relationships and the Acceptance of Homoerotic Practices

Until the end of the nineteenth century, erotic relationships between grown men and adolescent boys (amrad in Persian) were considered normative in Iran as in many other Middle Eastern societies. Men would court boys, write love poems to them, and act as their patrons and lovers. Such relationships did not preclude grown men's heterosexual relations and marriage, and being attracted to boys did not exclude sexual attraction to women. This, however, changed during the decades of the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. Homoerotic relations came to be considered as perverse, unnatural, and immoral, and male (and female) sexuality was heteronormalized. The figure of the amrad gradually disappeared from the public discourse and was forgotten by Iranians themselves.

In her book Women with Mustaches and Men without Beards: Gender and Sexual Anxieties of Iranian Modernity (2005), Afsaneh Najmabadi follows the process in which male-male erotic relationships were marginalized and delegitimized in Iranian society and the ways this process influenced relationships between the genders. Najmabadi opens her discussion with demonstrating how, during the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries, notions of beauty were similar for women and for male youths, to the point that in paintings of lovers from that period it is sometimes difficult to discern the gender of the beloved. This changed as the nineteenth century progressed, when female attributes such as breasts became more pronounced in such paintings. Beautiful women and beautiful boys could equally evoke male desire, and adolescent boys who had only the first traces of a mustache were perceived as representing ideal beauty. This early mustache was a marker of beauty for both genders, and women of that period would draw thin mustaches above their lips (Najmabadi 2005). The importance of the mustache lay in the fact that it marked the beginning of the passage from adolescence to manhood. A boy would become a man with the growth of full facial hair. The first appearance of a mustache, then, marked the final stage in which a boy was still a legitimate object of male desire, but was about to lose that status, becoming a desiring man himself.

Late nineteenth-century portrait photographs showing men and their boy-lovers positioned in a way that suggests an intimate relationship are one proof of the legitimacy of the practice. They attest to the fact that men deemed it appropriate to have their portraits taken alongside “their” boys as part of their self-representation. Despite the Qur’anic edict prohibiting sodomy (levat/liwat), and despite the fact that sexual relations between two grown men were considered a sin and a crime, various sexual acts were not as strictly prohibited when occurring between a grown man and an adolescent boy. Furthermore, some Islamic jurists perceived sexual acts that did not include anal penetration as less severe than sodomy (Afary 2009; Floor 2008). Socially, the role the man played in the sexual act was crucial. Having an adolescent boy as a lover did not jeopardize the grown man’s masculinity as long as he was the “active” (penetrating) partner. However, once a man took the passive (penetrated) role, he lost his masculinity and with it, his honor (Floor 2008).
The amrad and his lover do not fit into binary definitions of gender or sexuality. The former is neither a man nor a woman, and being courted and penetrated by an older man does not make him a homosexual. The latter can desire young boys, but this does not make him a homosexual. Najmabadi and Janet Afary demonstrate that the homo/hetero binary (and, indeed, the man/woman binary) was not entirely relevant to Qajar society. They point to the manner in which male-male desire in Iran disrupted the scheme of homo/heterosexuality. (Afary 2009, 86, 107; Najmabadi 2005, 237). In addition to the amrad, men, who after growing up wished to remain an object of desire for other men and showed that by shaving their faces (and were thus named amradnuma—he who looks like an amrad), were considered unmanly and perverted, and were socially rejected (Najmabadi 2005). However, the desire to be anally penetrated was considered a medical condition called ʿubna (with the person afflicted with this condition termed maʿbun) that could be medically treated and not a personality trait or identity marker. Another nonbinary type is the mokhannas/mukhannath, an adult effeminate male who might adopt some feminine visual attributes and who often worked as an entertainer (Afary 2009).

Afary adds to Najmabadi’s description of boy-loving the aspect of power relations, showing how such relationships were usually unequal and sometimes nonconsensual and even pedophilic. The adult man–amrad relationship was based on several levels of power inequality: age, socioeconomic status, and sexual positioning. The older man was usually wealthier. Sometimes he was even the owner of the boy, as long as slavery existed in Iran. He was also the penetrating partner in sex. The boy’s own wishes and desires were not taken into account, and it is even suggested that he was not supposed to enjoy the sexual act. Furthermore, if on the one hand tales and poems about the beloved’s cruelty or indifference were common, the rape of a boy was sometimes considered a proper subject for jokes or boasting (Afary 2009).

Adoption of European Heteronormativity

Starting with the late nineteenth century, definitions of desire and love went through a process of heteronormalization. This was expressed by the rejection of homoerotic practices by Iranian modernizing intellectuals (Najmabadi 2005). Najmabadi argues that the exposure of educated Iranians to Europeans’ abhorrence of homosexuality and to their criticism of Iranian society’s homoerotic practices was the main cause for the abandonment of amrad loving. Similar explanations are offered by Dror Ze’evi (2006) and Joseph Massad (2007) regarding the Ottoman Empire and Egypt.

The influence that Western perceptions of Iranian sexuality had over Iranian reformers can be partly explained by the political conditions of the country during this period. The early decades of the twentieth century were a period in which Western involvement and influence in Iranian internal affairs were at a high point. Russia and Great Britain were competing for influence in the country, and military losses in the nineteenth century brought about increased European economic activity and presence in Iran. Militarily and economically, Iran was at a disadvantage vis-à-vis foreign powers. Attempting to ameliorate this situation, Iranian modernizing reformers suggested a range of political, military, educational, judicial, and cultural changes, inspired by Western models. Following Western assertions regarding Iranian sexuality, homoerotic practices (as well as women’s veiling and seclusion) came to represent Iran’s backwardness and lack of modernity (Najmabadi 2005).

Another explanation given by Najmabadi for the adoption of European heteronormativity by Iranians is that Iranian men who traveled to Europe were deeply affected by the experience of being surrounded by men and women in a heterosocial public sphere as well as by being courted by European women. In this manner, despite the fact that Iranians viewed both European beardless men and women as objects of desire, the attention they received from European women refashioned and reeducated them in the heteronormative direction (Najmabadi 2005).

Iranian intellectuals who adopted a homophobic stance used it also to protest the seclusion of women in Iranian society and their veiling. They claimed that the homoerotic practices of men in Iran resulted from the inaccessibility of women to men and from the fact that, because of the gender-segregated nature of Iranian society, men lived in an exclusively male society starting with adolescence. According to these intellectuals, if Iranian society were heterosocial like European society, this kind of phenomenon would not have evolved (Najmabadi 2005). This meant that the modernist attempt to reconfigure Iranian society as a heterosocial society, where unrelated men and women could interact freely in the public sphere, was thus connected to the process of heteronormalizing male sexuality.

The Link between Heteronormalization and Nationalism

The process of heteronormalization of love and desire took place not only via homophobic writing. The simultaneous exaltation of heterosexual love in patriotic discourse as well as in discussions of marriage and of women’s status was equally important in this context. The early twentieth century was the period in which an Iranian nationalist movement emerged and took shape, mostly surrounding the events of the Constitutional Revolution of 1905 to 1911. Looking into the nationalist discourse of late nineteenth-century Iranians, Najmabadi offers the intriguing notion that imagining the homeland as a woman (a mother or a beloved) and configuring love of the homeland as a heterosexual love in themselves helped in solidifying the heteronormalization of love and desire in Iran. It also provided men with an alternative homosocial activity in the public sphere to replace previous activities now seen as unmodern and immoral.

Another link between the rise of the Iranian nationalist movement and the rejection of boy-loving was suggested by Sivan Balslev (2016). Balslev points to the nature of the nationalist project as border-marking, marking the geographical boundaries of the homeland, and marking the human boundaries of the nation. In a period when clear boundaries became central to the Iranian imagination, possibly due to the destabilizing effects of accelerated and radical changes that characterize a society going through a process of modernization, stable gender boundaries became increasingly important. As part of the discourse of reform and progress, early discussions on women's education, unveiling, and their status within the family both challenged and entrenched accepted notions of gender. Figures such as the amrad or mokhannas/mukhannath, who blurred gender boundaries, were less tolerable in such a period and became “abject” figures.

The Promotion of Companionate Marriage and Procreation Najmabadi considers the promotion of companionate/romantic marriage part of the process of heteronormalization of Iranian society. Introducing desire and love into a relationship that was traditionally perceived mostly as a procreative contract, or a way to cement ties between families, assisted in redirecting the homoerotic inclinations of men toward a heterosexual relationship (Najmabadi 2005). Romantic marriages were promoted in newspaper articles and serialized stories where Iran's political situation frustrated a happy union between man and woman. Thus, readers’ desire to see the lovers marry became a patriotic desire for political change. Patriotism and companionate marriage became interlinked in such stories.

This link also had much to do with demographic concerns prevalent in interwar Iran. Balslev shows how the debate regarding marriage reform in Iran tied together reform of male sexuality with anxieties about demography. The years following the Constitutional Revolution, followed by Iran's occupation during World War I (1914–1918), were years of political chaos, military weakness, and physical hardship for the population as a result of famine, droughts, and plagues. Demographic concerns regarding Iran's supposedly small and sickly population called for a heterosexual, monogamous, balanced male sexuality that was to produce numerous healthy and moral offspring. Heteronormalization was only one among several other changes in sexual norms promoted in Iran during these decades that aimed to solve the (real or imagined) demographic crisis of the country. The patriotic Iranian man was required to let go of boyloving as well as child-brides, prostitutes, polygyny, and promiscuity, and to avoid late bachelorhood. Legitimate objects of desire for a grown man narrowed down to the single, adult, Iranian woman.

These demands of Iranian men were promoted in the name of national interest, which required a procreation-oriented male sexuality. Homosexual sex was counter-reproductive and therefore unpatriotic. Not only did it not result in the production of children who would strengthen the nation, it also damaged companionate marriage by impinging upon the sexual and emotional ties between man and wife (Balslev 2016).

Iranian Women's Homosexual and Homosocial Bonds Companionate marriage, as Najmabadi shows, had a similar impact on women’s homosexual and homosocial bonds. Information about women's homoerotic practices in Iran is scant, but some practices may attest to deep emotional and sexual ties between women. In Qajar Iran, women could profess “sisterhood vows,” which marked a union between two married women (single women were not allowed to take a sisterhood vow) and were a framework in which homosexual acts would sometimes occur. Such vows would take place in a shrine, usually on specific festive dates of the year; the ceremony itself resembled marriage in some aspects (Afary 2009). According to Willem Floor (2008), sisterhood vows were still in existence in the 1930s. However, Najmabadi claims that such vows were replaced during the twentieth century by masquerading practices, such as cohabitation or marrying the same man. Companionate marriage urged women to abandon former homosocial/sexual bonds with other women. They were supposed to detach themselves from the feminine world of their mothers and the harem and invest all their emotional energies in the new conjugal pact, marginalizing attachments to female relatives, friends, and servants.

The Persistence of Homoerotic Practices in Twentieth-Century Iran Despite the fact that the discourse regarding homosexuality became increasingly negative and that boyloving lost its legitimacy, homoerotic practices did not disappear from Iranian reality. The press still discussed such practices even in the 1930s, and sex among men continued as part of the sex industry, under the guise of relationships such as apprenticeship or employment (Afary 2009). The delegitimation of certain homoerotic practices can be seen in the penal code of 1925, which prohibited sodomy, both with males and females. There was no direct reference to homosexuality in the code, though, and the Persian term for homosexuality (ham jens bazi or ham jens gara) appeared only in the mid-twentieth century (Floor 2008).

SEE ALSO Masculinity in Iranian Cinema; Mufākharat al-Jawārī wa-al-Ghilmān (al-Jāḥiz); Ottoman and Persian Miniature Paintings; Sex Reassignment Surgery in Iran; Transgender Identity in Iranian Cinema; Transgendered Subjectivities in Contemporary Iran

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Ze'evi, Dror. *Producing Desire: Changing Sexual Discourse in the Ottoman Middle East, 1500–
Sins Against Nature in Colonial Latin America

LEE M. PENYAK
Professor Emeritus, University of Scranton, PA
Director of Study Abroad, Diether H. Haenicke Institute for Global Education, Western Michigan University, Kalamazoo

ZEB TORTORICI
Associate Professor, Department of Spanish and Portuguese Languages and Literatures
New York University

The colonial prosecution of crimes grouped together under the term sodomy in Latin America from the fifteenth to the nineteenth centuries.

Spanish and Portuguese magistrates and inquisitors in colonial Latin America—from the late sixteenth century to the early nineteenth—grouped bestiality, same-sex relations, nonprocreative opposite-sex relations (primarily oral and anal sex), and masturbation under the term sodomy and referred to them as inherently nefarious, abominable, and against nature. Punishments given to transgressors suggest the general acceptance of Saint Thomas Aquinas’s (c. 1224–1274) views: bestiality was the gravest of the sins against nature because the “use of the right species is not observed,” followed by same-sex relationships because the “use of the right sex is not observed,” followed by “not observing the right manner of copulation” and, finally, “pollution without any copulation” (quoted in Gilbert 1981, 62). Inquisition and criminal cases provide insight into early modern Iberian and colonial Latin American perceptions of human desire. Unlike the more recent views of human sexuality that tend to classify people as heterosexual, homosexual, or bisexual because of supposed innate sexual orientations, criminal and religious authorities in colonial Latin America thought that persons who had sexual relations with members of their own sex, for example, had sexual drives like their own but had surrendered to carnal impulses that both the Catholic Church and the secular justice system deemed “against nature” (contra natura).

The term sodomy derives from sodomiticus, the Latin word used to describe the biblical city of Sodom destroyed by fire and brimstone by Yahweh because of the supposed depraved sexual activities of its inhabitants. The act of sodomy was said to cause plagues, famines, and disasters (Nesvig 2001), and there are multiple examples throughout colonial Latin American history of communities trying to “purify” themselves after especially egregious (and highly public) cases of sodomy came to light and transgressors were punished. Much of the official rhetoric of the church and state referred to sodomites in colonial Latin America as "abominable" and "dirty." The act itself was described as "the ugly crime of sodomy" and as "a vice completely contrary to nature." The derogatory word puto existed in common vernacular and was defined in colonial dictionaries, with pejorative connotations, as "a man who commits a nefarious act" (quoted in Penyak 1993), yet there is some evidence that the term itself may have been used by some men to describe themselves and their own desires (Tortorici 2007a). And, while in theory magistrates and inquisitors were equally concerned with both male and female sodomy, in practice relatively few cases of female sodomy ever came to light; some of them are discussed below (Black 2016; Vainfas and Tortorici 2016). It was not until the nineteenth century that the term homosexual was coined as a medicalized term to identify (and denigrate) those who exhibited same-sex desires, and for this reason the term itself appears in none of the colonial Latin American historical records.

The Spanish Inquisition set up tribunals of the Holy Office of the Inquisition in Lima (1570), Mexico City (1571), and Cartagena (1610) largely to combat the crime of heresy, and while sodomy throughout the Spanish American colonies did not technically fall under the jurisdiction of the Holy Office, there is no shortage of Inquisition cases investigating men (and rarely women) for sodomy. Yet in nearly all these cases some other act of heresy was the principal crime, such as a priest who solicited sexual favors from penitents during confession or an individual who publicly asserted that sodomy was not a sin. In stark contrast to colonial Spanish America, the Portuguese in colonial Brazil never established an independent tribunal of the Inquisition. Instead, in the late sixteenth century, the Portuguese Crown sent two inquisitorial visitations to Brazil (1591–1593 in Bahia and 1593–1595 in Pernambuco), which uncovered several cases of male and female sodomy. Those records have been the key source for historians of colonial Brazil who have researched and written on the topic of female sodomy (Bellini 1989). Crucial records on the "sins against nature" exist for much of colonial Latin America, however sparse they may be, but the focus here is on colonial New Spain because of the unique wealth of documentary evidence and historical scholarship that have been produced on the topic.

Contrasting Treatment of Clerics and Laypersons

The organization and scope of the Holy Office of the Mexican Inquisition made it the ideal mechanism for supervising clerical morality, investigating priests accused of abusing the confessional, and safeguarding the reputation of the church by discreetly punishing clerics accused and convicted of sodomy (González Marmolejo 2002), a punishment that sharply contrasted with the harsh punishments received by laypersons convicted of sodomy, as discussed later in more detail. Papal decrees required inquisitors to punish any priest who provoked or tempted persons to participate in sacrilegious and heretical acts before, during, or after confession. Most solicitation cases concerned priests and female penitents; however, a smaller number examined priests who solicited sexual favors from men or from both men and women. Despite its condemnation of the act of sodomy, the Holy Office proved reluctant to prosecute priests, which sometimes contributed to serial abuse (as in the present). The case of Father José María García (denounced in the cities of Zacatecas, Puebla, and Guanajuato between 1782 and 1795) serves as a case in point, demonstrating the high degree of inquisitorial negligence. The first denunciation against him in 1785 for fondling a male parishioner resulted in the rather benign punishment of undertaking “spiritual exercises” (i.e., he had to pray more) and making a general confession. Eight years later, however, the Holy Office decided to more thoroughly investigate García’s self-denunciation for “repeated solicitations of men,” in which he provided information on the thirty-two men (and at least two women) whom he solicited in the confessional in the interim. He said he had always been discreet, had sex with each person only once, and purposely selected individuals from the countryside of limited economic resources and little stature in society. His only punishment was being restricted to administering the sacrament of confession to clerics inside his own convent (Penyak 2008).

The 1799 case of Father José Gregorio Zebrón in the town of Calimaya typifies the sympathetic sentences reserved for priests. Four separate denunciations for solicitation against Zebrón (between 1784 and 1800) led to a formal inquisitorial review, in which he confessed that he had indeed had sex with forty additional men over the course of the last decade and a half of the eighteenth century. Inquisitors called his actions “sodomitic” (somético), forbade him from ever confessing men or women and from celebrating Mass for thirty days, and required him to say certain prayers on his knees on Fridays and Saturdays. He was placed under house arrest in a convent for two years (Penyak 2008).

In contrast, laypersons convicted of sodomy faced far harsher punishments: many were publicly shamed and whipped, sent to prison, forced to labor on public works projects, banished forever, or conscripted into the military for periods ranging from six to ten years. And, in especially harsh sentences, dozens of men were sentenced to death for sodomy, usually garroted and burned at the stake. An Inquisition trial in Mexico City that commenced in 1765 and concluded in 1768, illustrates differences in the interrogations and punishments involving nonclerics and similarities in the powerlessness of victims at the hands of sexual predators. In 1765 Mexican inquisitors charged Manuel Gordillo, a successful fifty-eight-year-old Spanish merchant, with saying that men were permitted to touch one another even to the point of orgasm without incurring sin. Because this statement contradicted Catholic Church doctrine, the Inquisition, rather than secular courts, handled the case. Nine witnesses testified that Gordillo used his economic status to persuade men to have sexual relations with him and that he used force when monetary inducements failed to elicit his desired goal. Because Gordillo refused to admit guilt he was subjected to torture, his arms loosely tied to an apparatus that tightened with each turn of its wheel. Four turns failed to elicit a confession. Inquisitors sentenced him to receive 200 lashes and then ordered his imprisonment in Havana for six years (Penyak 1993). Importantly, Gordillo was not punished by the Inquisition for having committed acts of sodomy but rather for the heretical statements that he uttered—specifically, that neither “impure touches among men nor the orgasm that followed were sinful”—in order to convince other men to have sex with him (Archivo General de la Nación, Inquisición, vol. 1078, exp. 4, f. 132). The victims of García, Zebrón, and Gordillo were relatively powerless compared to their violators. Indeed, older, wealthier men in positions of authority were more likely to seek sexual favors from younger, less powerful males.

Male couples who had consensual sex could expect to receive similar punishment from magistrates regardless of the specific act they committed. Colonial magistrates considered all sodomites equally sinful and reprehensible and did not differentiate between or use distinct vocabulary to describe, for example, penetrator and penetrated. Each person received similar sentences (Spurling 1998; Hurteau 1993).

Anal Sex

Male-female couples who engaged in anal sex could also, in theory, be charged with sodomy, yet there are exceedingly few archival cases on this topic. In 1826 (only five years after Mexico’s independence from Spain in 1821) Policarpo Flores’s defense lawyer argued that his client was inebriated when he forced his wife to commit the offense—here, a criminal act—and therefore had lost his reasoning faculty, which he characterized as “man’s only brake, which guides him and prevents [people from committing] certain acts.” The influence of alcohol, the lawyer continued, left Flores “without the will or the force to resist them.” Flores’s wife also blamed alcohol: “Drink is the mother of all vices and the cause of all offenses that are committed” (quoted in Penyak 1993, 255). Husband and wife were sentenced to two years’ labor on a public works project and one year as a servant in a hospital, respectively. Church and state officials assumed that anyone might commit lascivious sexual acts under certain circumstances (and even more frequently under the influence of alcohol); free will enabled everyone to make voluntary choices and rational decisions, to control his or her emotions and passions, and not to surrender to impulses and animalistic pleasures.

Masturbation

Inquisitors in Mexico and elsewhere throughout colonial Spanish America also examined cases of masturbation. Confessional manuals followed the typical question-and-answer format of that genre and encouraged priests to inquire, “Have you felt your own flesh, having [as] the object [of your desire] some woman...? How many times has this happened to you?” (quoted in Alva 1999, 108). José Eugenio Nepomuceno Beltrán, for example, spent several months in prison in central Mexico in 1816 for his masturbatory habit, described as “the enormous sin upon which falls the curse of the Holy Spirit” (quoted in Penyak 2008, 354). Archival references to female masturbation, though rare, are occasionally documented, as in the 1621 Inquisition case of a young mestiza woman, Agustina Ruiz, who... admitted to having engaged in repeated sexual acts with the Virgin Mary and the saints. For her heretical visions and beliefs, the Inquisition sentenced her to three years in a convent—a punishment that was meant to rectify her, and that was lenient in part because she expressed great remorse (Tortorici 2007b). It is worth recognizing that Ruiz’s crime was not the act of masturbation per se, but rather the heretical visions of Jesus, the Virgin, and the saints that accompanied her masturbatory visions.

Bestiality

Contemporaries generally considered bestiality the most evil of the “sins against nature” because it was “discordant with rational nature and indecent” and contravened the order of nature even more so than same-sex acts or masturbation (Ferrer 1778, 2:314). Rural areas throughout colonial Latin America accrued their fair share of bestiality cases (Bazant 2016; Tortorici, 2018), although there are relatively few historical studies on the topic despite the plethora of cases. Those accused tended to be young, single males who worked on haciendas and who abused the burros, mares, dogs, mules, and goats under their care when they thought they were unobserved. When caught and interrogated, men and adolescents blamed sexual privation for having caused them to abuse animals. Eighteen-year-old Vicente Bonifacio Isidro de la Peña said he “fornicated with a burro” in 1801 because he was “possessed by the heat of concupiscence and had no opportunity to relieve it.” In 1808 Lorenzo Aguirre said that he had resorted to penetrating a burro because he had been unable to find a woman (Penyak 1993, 283). Those found guilty received sentences similar to laypersons who had had sex with men: corporeal punishments, banishment, public shaming, and, far less frequently, castration or the death penalty (Tortorici, 2018). Importantly, the animals implicated in cases of bestiality were regularly put to death, usually by blows to the head or by fire “so that in this way the memory of the act will be deadened” (quoted in Penyak 1993, 280). This form of animal eradication was both symbolic (to purify the community) and practical (to prevent the meat or milk of a defiled animal from being consumed).

Illicit Female Sexuality

Regarding the topic of female-female sodomy, several publications from the late twentieth century forward have displaced the paucity of archival evidence on female-female sex in colonial Latin America (Bellini 1989; Vainfas and Tortorici 2016; Black 2016; Holler 1999; Velasco 2011). Women who sought the sexual company of other women or who engaged in self-gratification were not necessarily said to have been committing sodomy. The language in documents dealing with illicit female sexuality is devoid of the same careful detail and the virtual hysteria present in cases dealing with male criminalized sexuality, suggesting that officials did not consider sex among women to be as much of a threat to society as sex among men. The 1796 case of Gregoria Piedra in Mexico City even reveals that some members of society thought that others might be sexually inclined toward a member of the same sex and not just victims of depraved temptation. Equally important, the trial references Piedra's friendship with female members of her community, suggesting that not everyone viewed her as an outcast. Inquisitors were less understanding; they sentenced her to eight years of confinement in a religious home for women—her use of men's attire in public and sacrilegious treatment of the Eucharistic host contributing to the lengthy sentence, as both acts were deemed worthy of punishment, respectively, by secular and inquisitorial courts (Penyak 1993; Camba Ludlow 2003).

Same-Sex Subcultures

Scholars of sodomy and “homosexuality” in colonial Latin America have long tried to document the existence of same-sex subcultures (Garza Carvajal 2003; Mott 2003; Tortorici, 2018). Asunción Lavrin and Serge Gruzinski, for example, have written separately about the 123 men from Puebla and Mexico who were prosecuted between 1657 and 1658, fourteen of whom were publicly burned at the stake in Mexico City. An additional boy received 200 lashes as opposed to death because of his young age. Lavrin (2005) notes that these men provided mutual support for one another but often lived as social pariahs. Gruzinski (2003) suggests the existence of a subculture with its own secret geography and networks of information and informants, as well as its own language and codes, but he acknowledges that these men were essentially thrown together through their marginalization and the repression of their activities. Zeb Tortorici’s (2010, 2018) examination of sodomy cases in mostly rural areas of Mexico convinced him of the existence of subcultures consisting of “social networks of men who sought out and knew where to have sex with other men” (Tortorici 2007a, 50).

Societal Views on Same-Sex Intimacy

Scholars’ conclusions about societal perceptions of and reactions to same-sex intimacy are influenced both by the primary documents they examine and by the politics of the present. While this entry has focused largely on the authors’ own expertise on colonial Mexico, there are a growing number of studies on the topic for other parts of Latin America and the early modern Iberian Atlantic world (Horswell 2005; Molina 2016; Few 2007). The historian who mines inquisitorial and criminal documents might conclude that such individuals almost always risked societal condemnation and severe punishment if caught. Yet, lest one think that this is solely a story of repression, the archival record makes clear that social control throughout colonial Latin America was sporadic and irregular. The death sentence for sodomy and bestiality was applied inconsistently, and punishment depended on the particulars of each case, the motivations of the court, and the social positions of those charged, testifying, or accusing. Many social actors evidently chose to ignore instances and allegations of sodomy or merely gossiped about them to friends and neighbors rather than Researchers who rely on documentation from rural areas outside the immediate reach of powerful church and state officials often make a strong case for a more relaxed and even sympathetic attitude toward people who did not subscribe to societal norms. Both sets of researchers, however, admit to finding examples of leniency and intolerance that seemingly contradict their own conclusions. The lesson to be learned is that, like today, in many societies, some people believed or had as take in forcing all members of society to conform to a single religious and cultural sexual morality, whereas others, usually without pretentions to power and influence, adopted the view that individuals who were thought or known to share same-sex attraction did not negatively affect the lives of others and could be tolerated and sometimes accepted as they were.

JUANA AGUILAR: HERMAPHRODITISM AND COLONIAL COURTS

In 1792, in what is now El Salvador, the Real Audiencia (High Criminal Court) of Guatemala began criminal proceedings against Juana Aguilar for having reportedly “violated” a woman. Nearly a decade later, in 1801, she was charged with a similar crime: “double concubinage” with both men and women, though this time in Guatemala City (Martínez Durán 1941). Aguilar—a historical figure who is often read retrospectively as “trans”—has aroused more curiosity and generated more scholarship than perhaps any other “queer” figure in colonial Latin American or early modern Iberian Atlantic history. The murky details of her case—documented through medical writing published in colonial newspapers and in a handful of archival documents—continue to provoke scholars, and more recently, performance artists, who have sought to imagine the circumstances of her life and its disruption of colonial Latin American society.

Aguilar dressed and identified as a woman but rumors circulated, alleging her to be either a man or a hermaphrodite. In order to have committed sodomy—yet another crime that the criminal court charged her with—and be held accountable for her crime, if indeed there was one, Aguilar needed to be legally recognized as either a man or a woman. Unsure of how to proceed, the secular courts in both trials turned to medical experts—surgeons and midwives—to determine her sex and make sense of this legal, medical, and bodily conundrum. In multiple physical examinations, doctors probed and studied Aguilar’s body, especially her clitoris, all to determine how the criminal court might understand, categorize, and adjudicate her behavior. In 1803 Doctor Narciso Esparragosa concluded, perhaps paradoxically, that Aguilar was neither man, nor woman, nor hermaphrodite: “Not only is the exterior configuration of the clitoris very similar to the virile member, but also its internal structure, in the way that according to the uniform consent of the most famous anatomists, it only lacks the urethra or the duct through which urine leaves [the body], for which one cannot Without a clearly visible vaginal cavity, or a seminal tube, the doctor recommended that Aguilar be exonerated of the crime of sodomy, which would have entailed her being either fully male or female, biologically speaking. In 1803 Esparragosa published his findings in the Gazeta de Guatemala, a late colonial Guatemalan newspaper, subjecting Aguilar to further inspection by her peers, as well as by contemporary historians, who have primarily encountered her through the doctor's reports published in this newspaper.

The story of Aguilar joins a long history of so-called hermaphroditism—embedded within the larger framework of the “sins against nature” of sodomy and bestiality and other unnatural acts and desires—within the Iberian Atlantic world, including such figures as Eleno/Elena de Céspedes in early modern Spain and Mariano Aguilera in colonial Mexico, on whom a growing number of scholarly publications have focused. The collective sexual ambiguity of those whom, today, we might term intersex greatly troubled medical and legal authorities that sought to naturalize heterosexual relations through binary categories of sexual difference. Early modern Christian views of sex and marriage relied on a clear physiological definition of man and woman, which was necessarily connected to their respective reproductive function. The logic held true for sodomy, which, as a nonprocreative act of sex, signified a violation of the natural order created and maintained by God. Hermaphroditism, too, challenged this definition of sexual order, and with it, the legal and social codes by which colonial society was governed. However, as Martha Few and María Elena Martínez both show, the threat of hermaphroditism also provided opportunities to redefine the rules of classification, extending the reach of authorities into the lives (and beds) of queer colonial subjects.

Aguilar—and her entry into the colonial archive—indicates the importance of sexuality and its control in late colonial Guatemala and the broader Iberian world, and well into the present. Bodies deemed unnatural were exploited to enhance science and medicine. However, the energetic but ultimately frustrated efforts made to meticulously classify Aguilar, down to the size of her clitoris, ultimately expose how heterosexual relations were socially and politically produced and made to seem natural. The decade-long debate over a suspected hermaphrodite reveals, through the uncertainty of professional medicine, how untenable these regulations were in defining what it meant to be a man or a woman.

Aguilar was, ultimately, as per the recommendations by Doctor Esparragosa, exonerated of any crime. The documents of the early nineteenth-century criminal trial have only recently come to light, and it is still unclear to what extent Esparragosa’s medical findings held sway in the court’s decision to set Aguilar free. Future research will certainly further illuminate how the reliance or rejection of medical expertise shaped competing ideas about sexual difference, criminal proclivities, and human nature in the criminal case (and journalistic dissemination) of the body and desires of Aguilar. The (once presumed) lack of archival documentation that animates these questions continues to inspire alternative historical methodologies and queer performances, as evidenced by the scholarship of Martínez (2014). Aguilar—through the performative practices in radical queer art, history, and politics—resonates still for those contending with the enduring forms of discrimination and homophobia first shaped by the colonial desire to fix criteria for sexual and racial difference.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Martínez Durán, Carlos. Las ciencias médicas en Guatemala: Origen y evolución.
Sodomy cases support research that emphasizes the pivotal role of the institution of marriage in colonial Latin America (Lavrin 2005). Courts promoted and protected this institution in the belief that moral individuals in stable families buttressed the order and stability of the realm. Men and women who offended that institution by participating in premarital sex or committing adultery received mild punishments if they acknowledged their wrongdoing and promised to respect the institution of marriage in the future (and many, of course, simply went undiscovered and unpunished). Men and women who succumbed to unnatural acts that could not lead to procreation received severe punishments because their sins were affronts to God and society, wasted precious seed, and mocked society’s most revered institutions of marriage and family.

Postcolonial Developments

Colonial views about gender and sexuality remained firmly entrenched after the early nineteenth-century wars of independence and shaped criminal prosecutions of same-sex couples in Latin America well into the nineteenth century. Sodomy was decriminalized in many countries, including Argentina, Mexico, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras, Paraguay, Peru, and Brazil, in the nineteenth century, often with new law codes and constitutions that were written and enacted after independence. Yet, in other countries, sodomy remained criminalized well into the twentieth century, and sometimes even into the present, most notably in several Caribbean nations, including Antigua and Barbuda, Barbados, and...
Jamaica. Sodomy in Trinidad and Tobago was decriminalized as recently as April of 2018. Most countries, however—whether or not sodomy was technically decriminalized—continued to arrest men for same-sex intimacy, although they did so through vague laws related to “indecency,” public morals, and customs (Monsiváis 2003). Over the course of the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, citizens began to view the “homosexual” as a person (albeit disordered) with distinct preferences or orientations toward the same sex and not as someone whose vice perverted the natural order of men. Some scholars note the development over time of the active-passive dichotomy, which generally resulted in increasing scorn and hatred toward “passive” men (those who were penetrated) and a degree of tolerance toward discreet “active” participants (those who penetrated others) in male-male sexual activity (Lancaster 1992; Prieur 1996). Subcultures developed in most areas despite continued persecution and prosecution, sometimes resulting in scandalous roundups of groups of men, such as the forty-one men arrested at a drag queen ball in Mexico City in 1901 who were tried, convicted, and sentenced to hard labor on plantations (Monsiváis 2003). Only in the late twentieth and early twenty-first centuries have some countries, such as Argentina, Uruguay, Brazil, Cuba, and Colombia, acknowledged LGBT rights, some allowing marriage and adoption, and recognizing the rights of transgender people to legally change their names and gender without medical or judicial mediation. Several other countries—most notably Paraguay, Guatemala, Honduras, El Salvador, and Nicaragua—remain hostile to extending equal rights to people with same-sex attraction. Whereas the theology and ideology of the Catholic Church shaped colonial views of sodomites, some studies have noted that intolerance of “homosexuals” today seems strongest in areas with significant evangelical populations, and evangelicalism’s rapid growth throughout Latin America may not bode well for the precarious future of LGBT rights and welfare in many countries (Pew Research Center 2014).

SEE ALSO El Baile de los 41; Confessional Manuals in Colonial Latin America; Conquest and Sodomy in Latin America; Inquisition, Criminal Courts, and Sexuality in Colonial Latin America

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Brasiliense, 1989.

González Marmolejo, Jorge René. Sexo y confesión: La iglesia y la penitencia en los siglos XVIII y XIX en la Nueva España [Sex and confession: The church and penance in New Spain during the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries]. Mexico City: Plaza y Valdés Editores, 2002.

1–26.

Molina, Fernanda. Cuando amar era pecado: Sexualidad, poder e identidad entre los sodomitas coloniales (Virreinato del Perú, siglos XVI–XVII) [When to love was a sin: Sexuality, power, and identity among colonial sodomites (Viceroyalty of Peru, sixteenth to seventeenth centuries)]. Lima, Peru: IFEA Instituto Francés de Estudios Andino; La Paz, Bolivia: Plural Editores, 2016.

Situational Homosexuality

PAUL R. DESLANDES
Associate Professor, Department of History
University of Vermont, Burlington

A term used to describe same-sex sexual activity that occurs under specific circumstances rather than as part of a homosexual lifestyle.

The term situational homosexuality has, as the historian Regina Kunzel (2008) has observed, very specific origins. It was developed by sexologists and other social scientists during the middle decades of the twentieth century to serve various cultural purposes. Also characterized (in different contexts) as transient, circumstantial, pseudo, or emergency homosexuality and frequently cast as a form of sexual contact distinct from that engaged in by “true” homosexuals, the concept of “situational homosexuality” has been used to describe same-sex relations between men and women in contexts such as single-sex schools and colleges, the military, prisons, and religious orders. Scholars such as Kunzel and Jeffrey Escoffier (2003) agree that the term was coined in this period to differentiate context-driven sexual activities in these communities from those engaged in by homosexuals—individuals with increasingly fixed sexual and social identities that were predicated, at least in part, on a congenitally acquired predilection for a particular sexual object choice.

Still, David M. Halperin (2002) has provided a reminder that many acts that were labeled as “situational” in the mid-twentieth century were bound up with systems of hierarchy in which mutuality was masked by the exercise of power or the assertion of authority. Relations of this sort, he is careful to note, occurred in a variety of settings across time and space. In short, distinctions between “normative” same-sex behaviors and “pathologized” same-sex desire have a history that predates both the rise of sexual taxonomies and the growth of sexology in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. The term situational, thus, might be used to describe a range of same-sex activities across various time periods and cultures. Historically, it can be applied to maledominated environments in Renaissance Florence where relations between older men and adolescent boys were common, even after they began to be policed (in 1432) by a specially created enforcement agency known as the Office of the Night (Rocke 1996). Similarly, it can be used to describe relations, in more contemporary contexts, between men who identify as “mostly straight,” “men who have sex with men,” “sexually fluid,” or men on the “down low” (Savin-Williams 2017).

Pre-nineteenth-Century Examples
Even though the term situational homosexuality is a relatively recent invention, it clearly still serves some utility in describing certain erotic behaviors that emerged in various historical contexts where same-sex behaviors were common. In the ancient Greek state of Sparta—a militaristic and masculinist culture that privileged and eroticized the nude, athletic body—the segregation of the sexes was common, with boys being removed from their homes at an early age to undergo physical and military training. Within such a context, relations between older soldiers and younger men just embarking on their military careers were common and considered to be of value to the recruit, who not only provided a sexual outlet to his older mentor, but also acquired from his partner invaluable knowledge about the ways of the world (Scanlon 2005). Similarly, in the dynastic courts of the Han dynasty (206 BCE–220 CE) in China, same-sex relations were common in the royal households of emperors where government officials, artists, musicians, astrologers, and military men congregated (Carton 2006).

Opportunities for intimacy between men and between women presented themselves in a variety of contexts in the medieval and early modern world. In Catholic Europe, sexual acts between monks in monasteries and nuns in convents were reasonably common, although the extent to which such acts can be documented is limited by the availability of relevant primary sources. One example, recounted in the work of the historian Judith C. Brown, among others, is that of the Italian nun Benedetta Carlini (1591–1661). A mystic and religious leader at a convent in the city of Pescia, she and her story became known when church authorities investigated her relationship with another nun, Bartolomea Crivelli. A large archival dossier documents an intimate sexual relationship, in which Carlini assumed the identity of a male angel named Splendidiello. While Brown has labeled her a lesbian nun, this category would not, of course, have been available to Carlini in the seventeenth century. Questions of identity aside, the case serves as a reminder that sexual activity in same-sex institutions was not a feature of the modern period alone (Brown 1986).

One final example serves to further illustrate this point. The sixteenth and seventeenth centuries were characterized both by European exploration of North and South America, Africa, and Asia and increased international trade. The establishment of extensive imperial networks relied on a large labor force of sailors who manned the ships that traveled, in the Spanish case, from the city of Seville to the Caribbean, as well as to Central and South America. In a study on the topic, Pablo E. Pérez-Mallaína rehearses an explanatory theory that very much resembles the idea of “situational homosexuality,” noting “that the special conditions of isolation and the predominantly masculine component of the crews converted the workplace on long transoceanic voyages into a situation especially favorable to the development of homosexuality” (1998, 170). While Pérez-Mallaína notes that there were a small number of women frequently onboard these ships and that those who committed sodomy could be subjected to punishment, these environments were nonetheless conducive to same-sex relations, especially between more experienced sailors and young apprentices. Similar conditions prevailed among male vagrant populations in England and pirate communities in the Caribbean around the same time (Burg 1995).

Segregated Communities and Same-Sex Behaviors—The Nineteenth Century

Relationships and activities among same-sex groups that might be labeled as situational abounded in a variety of settings in the late eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. In Canada, fur traders of French descent, known as voyageurs, likely engaged in sexual relations with each other and with their aboriginal guides, even though they had access to native women as sexual and romantic partners (Podruchny 2006). The push westward in North America by explorers, travelers, and settlers of European descent in the first half of the nineteenth century produced multiple circumstances to observe and engage in same-sex sex in predominantly male settings. William Drummond Stewart (1795–1871), a Scottish aristocrat, traveled with fur traders through the Rocky Mountains in the 1830s. In part, William Benemann notes in a 2012 biography, Stewart did so to pursue the company of other men and knew that, in this homosocial world, relationships between men (such as the one that he pursued with a biracial man named Antoine Clement) were both possible and permissible. Similarly, in documenting his journey along the Oregon Trail in a book that was published in 1849 and simply titled The Oregon Trail, the historian Francis Parkman commented on the social relationships among the native peoples he encountered along the way, recounting tenderly the same-sex intimacy of two Sioux men, identified as Rabbit and Hail-Storm (Katz 1992).

In studying the Pacific Northwest region of the United States and Canada in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, the historian Peter Boag has noted the degree to which the burgeoning economy of that region in these years relied on transient or migratory labor. Within the logging, fishing, and mining communities he examines, sex between younger men (referred to as “punks”) and older men (referred to as “wolves” or “jockers”) was relatively common and reflective, once again, of the opportunities that could emerge in frontier contexts. Within such settings, particularly in such cities as Seattle, Washington, where casual workers, fishermen, and loggers congregated during their leisure hours in bars and saloons, teenage boys were known to resort to prostitution to sustain themselves economically while satisfying the desires of their older clients (Boag 2003). Similar conditions prevailed in gold rush San Francisco in the 1840s and 1850s, where the predominantly male population interacted at work and in leisure, including in all-male dances. While the degree of sexual contact remains impossible to know fully, the conclusion that same-sex relations indeed occurred in these settings seems reasonable. Cowboys involved in the cattle trade in the American West and mountaineers in the Canadian Rockies also formed strong homosocial bonds, some of which were clearly sexual in nature, in the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries (Beemyn 2006; Deslandes 2009).
Relationships of this sort also predominated in many imperial/colonial contexts where men lived in single-sex communities, as noted in work by both Ronald Hyam (1990) and Robert Aldrich (2003). In nineteenth-century India, for instance, colonial officials worried openly that if British soldiers did not have access to wives or prostitutes, the homosocial world of the barracks would naturally lead them to pursue homosexual liaisons. By labeling relations of this sort “special Oriental vices” (Bhaskaran 2002, 17), officials not only commented on the situational nature of some homosexual activity but also sought to mark same-sex sex as a “foreign” problem. Black miners engaged in the lucrative extraction of gold and diamonds in southern Africa during this period often migrated away from their wives and families to other regions to pursue employment. In doing so, they entered an intensely homosocial world where intimate sexual relations often flourished. According to one government report published in 1907, this practice was identified as “a well-recognized custom.” The report went on to note that it was common for recruits “to select from the youths and younger men what are termed amankotshane or izinkotshane.” These younger miners received food and presents in return for performing the tasks of a servant and sharing their master’s bed where, the author noted, they were “utilised for satisfying the passions,” usually through intercrural or “thigh” sex (Murray and Roscoe 1998, 178).

Passions between women were also common in nineteenth-century contexts. The literary critic Sharon Marcus (2007) has noted that intense and passionate relationships could easily develop in female-dominated private spheres or in female institutions. Rather than being pathologized, she notes, such relationships were often seen as a prelude or rehearsal for heterosexual courtship and marriage. In the girls’ schools and women’s colleges that grew in the years after 1850 in Great Britain and the United States, intense, frequently homoerotic, and sometimes sexually intimate relationships developed between students. Especially common were the “crushes” or “smashes” that younger girls or women developed for older students or their teachers (Vicinus 1989)—a type of relationship that generated considerable cultural fascination well into the twentieth century, as reflected in the German film (based on an earlier play) Mädchenin Uniform (1931; Girls in uniform), which tells the story of a schoolgirl who falls in love with her female teacher. Relationships of this sort were common enough to prompt an investigation in the 1880s by one committee at Newcomb College in New Orleans, Louisiana, which noted not only the love and sense of attachment that could develop between students but also their tendency to cuddle and sleep together (Beemyn 2006). Some women who were committed to social justice and to improving the conditions of life in urban slums in such cities as London, New York, and Chicago in this period became involved in the settlement house movement. This movement involved the creation of residential communities (usually sex-segregated) where wealthier women moved to work among the poor and provide them with a variety of social services. Such organizations as Chicago’s Hull-House and London’s Canning Town Women’s Settlement also provided spaces in which same-sex desires occasionally flourished, temporarily for some or more permanently for others (Koven 2004).
The activities described in this section did not escape the notice of late nineteenth-century social scientists, even if they did not use the term situational homosexuality. The British sexologist Havelock Ellis (1859–1939), for example, in publishing his work on “sexual inversion” (a late nineteenth-century term for “homosexuality”) in his multivolume Studies in the Psychology of Sex, did not shy away from discussing contexts that might be identified as “situational,” referencing contemporary and historical examples from, among other places, ancient Greece. Ellis noted, for instance, that “homosexuality is specially fostered by those employments which keep women in constant association, not only by day, but often at night also, without the company of men” (1910, 212). Singled out for attention in his work were convents and female servant communities in large hotels. In discussing boys and men, Ellis was careful to note both the prevalence of sex between boys in English public schools (private, boarding schools) and to assert that these acts were frequently committed not by the “truly homosexual,” but by those with an “immature sexual instinct” (78)—ideas that were also present in the contemporaneous work of the Russian venereologist and sexologist V. M. Tarnovskii (1837–1906), who formulated theories about what he identified as acquired pederasty (Healey 2001). Similarly, the American sociologist Josiah Flynt (1869–1907) observed this phenomenon while following and studying tramps or hoboes on trains around the United States, a project documented in his book Tramping with Tramps (1899).

Situational Homosexuality—The Twentieth Century

Some of the traditions and experiences described in previous sections of this entry continued to prevail in the twentieth century and beyond. Given the prominence of global war during the first half of the twentieth century, it should come as no surprise that same-sex behaviors remained common in military contexts. In a study titled Sittengeschichte des Weltkrieges (1930; The Sexual History of the World War [1941]), the German sexologist Magnus Hirschfeld (1868–1935) documented the sexual practices of men in the trenches during World War I (1914–1918). Aside from noting the predominance of erotic literature and masturbation, Hirschfeld also had a lot to say about sex between men, noting, “It has been reported that on and off pseudo-homosexual intercourse, or homoerotic love between men who heretofore had been of normal sexuality, also played a role as a substitute form of sex satisfaction” (1941, 87). With men at the front during World War I, women took on a variety of important roles in home industries and in providing auxiliary services (though some Russian women engaged in combat). The female communities created for nurses and ambulance drivers, for instance, were one place where some women pursued intimate relationships with other women (sometimes as an expression of identity, and sometimes as a mode of sexual experimentation), as evidenced in such literary sources as Rose Allatini’s Despised and Rejected (published under the pseudonym A. T. Fitzroy in 1918) and Radclyffe Hall’s infamous novel The Well of Loneliness (1928). Allatini’s work, a pacifist novel that was ultimately banned, discusses various forms of situational same-sex relations between women, including the "crushes" discussed in the work of Sharon Marcus (2007) and Martha Vicinus (1989) (Cohler 2007).

In the British army during World War II (1939–1945), sex between soldiers and sailors was reasonably common. For most, acts of this sort had nothing to do with the expression of a particular identity but functioned, instead, as a form of sexual release. As one former officer in the British navy noted, “Sailors were a fairly randy lot and masturbation was not at all uncommon. You could go down in the middle watch which was twelve midnight to four and hear a whisper come from a hammock, someone saying ‘Give us a wank,’ which was just completely accepted by the lower deck ratings” (quoted in Vickers 2013, 56). The lack of female companionship in many contexts and the fear of venereal disease were frequently cited as reasons for what historians such as John Howard (1999) and Matt Houlbrook (2005) have labeled “homosex.” In the British military, relations of this sort were structured around either differences in rank, age, and experience or sexual identity, with heterosexually identified men pursuing an active role in sex with queer-identified comrades. Similar dynamics prevailed in Nazi concentration camps, where attractive young prisoners (referred to as pipels) might receive special favors and status in exchange for acting as servants and sexual partners to older, higher-status prisoners or guards—a phenomenon chronicled in memoirs and fictional sources (Shallcross 2011).

Concerns about this reality of military life led some to express anxiety about the corrupting influences of same-sex environments where access to members of the opposite sex was limited. One American general stationed in France during World War II, for example, worried that the sex drive of his men would get the better of them. He openly expressed concern that the lack of female company would lead some men to pursue sex with fellow soldiers as an alternative. Like other medical professionals during the war, the German American endocrinologist and sexologist Harry Benjamin (1885–1986) ruminated on the sexuality of military men. In one piece he wrote, “Morals versus Morale in Wartime” (1943). Benjamin noted that men sometimes resorted to sex with other men out of desperation and that, on occasion, this led some to pursue homosexuality on a more permanent basis. Historical evidence collected by Allan Bérubé in his 1990 study of US soldiers during World War II shows that, in fact, it was not uncommon for men who identified as heterosexual to seek out sex with other men in the army, especially if their partners assumed a “passive” role.

In some ways, it was the experiences of war that led those interested in understanding psychosexual development to consider more fully the various “routes” to homosexuality. Discussions about acquired or congenital causes were common among those who were considering what to do about homosexuality in the military in the United States. Following Freudian principles, psychiatrists differentiated between normal heterosexuals, deviant homosexuals whose development had been arrested, and regressive heterosexuals who, under the pressures of military life, “reverted” to the homosexual stage of human development. Such an analysis also figured into considerations of sex in American prisons in the twentieth century. While various prison officials had been discussing sex between prisoners and the distinctive sexual culture that had developed in penitentiaries since the late nineteenth century, prison sex became a matter of public concern as reports of what went on behind bars began to enter public discourse through newspaper reporting in the 1930s and 1940s (Kunzel 2008).

In the 1940s and 1950s there was a growth in the popularity of detailed studies of prison populations that examined same-sex sex and the distinctive sexual cultures that emerged in men's and women's institutions. Many of these, conducted by sociologists, psychologists, and psychiatrists, sought to understand the incidence of homosexual acts in prison and what the sociologist Donald Clemmer called, in his 1940 book The Prison Community, “prisonization”—a process of socialization that led many to accept the unique sexual cultures and hierarchies that prevailed in jails and penitentiaries. These studies led many to understand same-sex sex as a natural expression of a human impulse, borne out of unique circumstances and not necessarily connected to some sort of core sexual identity. Public fascination with these instances of situational behaviors was fueled by a variety of popular cultural forms. One 1954 article in the tabloid magazine True Confessions chronicled the experiences of women in prison, noting the effects of these unique environments on sexual behaviors (Kunzel 2008).

An emphasis on the situational quality of same-sex sex in certain contexts and environments has also featured in work examining a variety of other historical and social contexts in the second half of the twentieth century. Beginning in the 1950s, scholars interested in studying same-sex relations between women have noted the existence of age-variant relations (sometimes called “mummy-baby” relationships) between girls and women in Kenya and in the southern African countries of Lesotho and Swaziland (Spurlin 2006). These emerged out of several homosocial contexts, including girls' boarding schools and communities from which men had migrated to take advantage of labor opportunities elsewhere. In South Africa in the 1990s and early in the following decade, relationships between girls in boarding schools (known sometimes as amachicken relationships) were relatively common (a part of normative gender and sexual socialization) and not necessarily indicators of future sexual identities. The forms of intimacy in these relationships included cuddling and innocent kisses but also genital eroticism (Gunkel 2009).

The Fate of “Situational Homosexuality”

The term situational homosexuality has engendered a fair bit of criticism over the years. Jonathan Ned Katz, for instance, in a study that he titled Gay American History (first published in 1976 and revised in 1992) offered the following observation on the concept: “The traditional concept of ‘situational homosexuality’ or ‘pseudohomo-sexuality,’ implying the existence of some nonsituational ‘true’ homosexuality, is misleading. All homosexuality (and heterosexuality) is situational—situated within a specific time, society, and class—and takes on a particular character in that context” (1992, 446). In the twenty-first century, terms of this sort, which smack of a social scientific certainty that may belie human experience, have been abandoned in favor of ideas that emphasize the language either of a sexual continuum or, perhaps more popularly, a lack of sexual and gender fixity. Even as the term situational homosexuality has fallen into disuse, the acts it was used to describe have continued to be examined by historians and other scholars interested in exploring the dynamics of same-sex sex and desire among men who do not necessarily identify as gay. One study of men who pursued sex with men in a park in Delhi, India, noted the varied ways in which they interpreted their acts and tried to situate them in the context of traditional kin and friendship networks (Seabrook 1999). Some have even sought to resurrect the term situational homosexuality or identify it with new names reflective of early twenty-first-century preoccupations with sexual fluidity (Savin-Williams 2017).

In exploring the phenomenon of “gay-for-pay” pornography actors (straight-identified men who engage in homosexual sex on film for pay), Jeffrey Escoffier (2003) has posited that the term situational might still have analytical utility. For many of these men, the motive is economic. The production process, Escoffier notes, involves tactics (including erotic stimulants that ensure that straight-identified men can get aroused) for effectively creating a situation where believable performances are possible. Scholarly work, much of it completed by sociologists, from the second decade of the twenty-first century has examined men who have sex with men while retaining primarily heterosexual identities in both urban and rural contexts in the United States (Ward 2015). While some of these studies have examined military settings and fraternities, or what is sometimes labeled, within African American communities, as men on the “down low,” others have sought their subjects on websites such as Craigslist, where men searched for a kind of “straight” same-sex sex (identified by some as a form of heteroflexibility) (Ward 2015; Boykin 2005). (In March 2018 Craigslist shuttered its personals section after the US Congress passed the Allow States and Victims to Fight Online Sex Trafficking Act [FOSTA].) The reasons for these same-sex behaviors vary enormously, with some subjects describing the need as practical (women being inaccessible or unavailable), and others discussing the transgression of a taboo as exciting. Still others see sex with other men as a relief from the rigors of heterosexual manhood or as a celebration or affirmation of their masculinity. Studies of this sort provide a reminder that the conditions and practices that the originators of the term situational homosexuality sought to understand continue to exist as both genuine experiences and cultural preoccupations, as reflected in such contemporary artistic works as Orange Is the New Black, the American television comedy-drama (2013–) set in a women’s prison. Exploring them through both contemporary and historical lenses remains, in fact, an important and viable area of serious inquiry.

SEE ALSO The Closet; Foucault, Influence of; Mädchen in Uniform (1931; Leontine Sagan); Marriage, Woman-Woman, in Africa; Military Law and Policy in the United States; Military/Navy in the United Kingdom; MSM (Men Who Have Sex with Men) in Asia

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Sexual violence was an inherent aspect of the institution of slavery in colonial Latin America, which lasted until the early 1820s in many of the newly formed postindependence nation-states. Brazil was the largest importer of African slaves in the Americas, comprising 40 percent of all slaves brought to colonial Latin America. It was also the last country in the region to abolish slavery, in 1888. This entry focuses on the context of slavery in Brazil, demonstrating how intersecting forms of sexual violence were aimed primarily at controlling and degrading both male and female slaves. It then focuses more closely on same-sex relations among male slaves, as well as between male slaves and their masters or free men in Brazil from the early 1500s until the abolition of slavery in 1888.

Cases from the Portuguese Inquisition (1536–1821)—which had jurisdiction over colonial Brazil and other overseas Portuguese territories—offer the most important entry point into the daily sexual practices of slave owners, free men, and slaves. Although inquisitorial cases regarding sexual violence deal mostly with female slaves who sought protection from their masters, men and children were also victims of sexual coercion. Of all sexual acts, the Holy Office considered sodomy and bestiality the most vile and punishable. Both of these acts were referred to as the pecado nefando (nefarious sin), and they were considered by religious and secular authorities to be “against nature” because they did not lead to procreation. Yet, less than 10 percent of sodomy cases went to trial: of 4,419 registered denunciations between 1587 and 1794 in Brazil, 394 went to trial and 30 men were burned at the stake for the crime of sodomy (Green 1999). The small number of death penalties for the act of sodomy is partly due to the moral laxity of the Portuguese inquisitors, who viewed sexual violence by white men against slaves as an inherent part of colonization. The massive and continual influx of African slaves for almost 400 years also helped perpetuate the image of the colony as sexually immoral, inspiring the saying by Portuguese colonists, “Below the Equator there is no sin!” (Mott 2003, 169).

Historical Background of Slavery in Brazil

In the early 1400s Portuguese expeditions on the sub-Saharan African coast were focused on the acquisition of gold, with slaves and other products, such as ivory, sugar, and spices only secondary concerns. Their focus on gold and other precious metals stemmed from the growing relative scarcity of precious metals in Europe’s mercantilist economic system. The purchasing of slaves began in 1444, with only a small number of African slaves going to Europe to serve as domestic servants. Portuguese explorers also engaged in Africa’s internal slave trade by supplying slaves from the western African coast to central Africa, such as the Kingdom of Kongo, in exchange for gold needed to stimulate trade with Asia and Europe. By the middle of the fifteenth century the Portuguese Empire had established sugar plantations on islands off the Atlantic coast of Africa—Madeira, Cabo Verde, the Azores, and São Tomé—increasing the demand for slave labor for the production of sugar. This profitable experience gradually changed the primary focus of the Portuguese slave trade from acquiring gold to producing agricultural goods for European markets.

The establishment of the Portuguese colony of Brazil in 1500 marked a major shift in the Portuguese slave trade, which future colonizers, such as the English and French, sought to emulate in their agricultural economic pursuits: “What distinguished this American slave society from most previous societies was in fact the domination of slaves as agricultural workers, their vital importance in the production of goods for the international market, and their importance within the local societies” (Klein and Luna 2014, 13). At the beginning of the colonization of Brazil, the Portuguese exported mainly dyewood, but they eventually focused on sugar because of the colony’s climate and fertile land.

When they first colonized Brazil, the Portuguese sought to enslave the largely Tupi-speaking indigenous peoples for farming and for harvesting brazilwood, but the onslaught of diseases contracted from the colonizers, along with the harsh working conditions, led to high mortality rates among indigenous communities. In turn, bandeirantes (slave raiders) and acculturated Tupi-speaking indigenous people went in search of people to enslave in villages in the vast forests and savannahs of the colony. Portuguese missionaries, notably the Jesuits, who came to the Americas to convert these communities fought against the enslavement of indigenous people. In particular, Father Antônio Vieira (1608–1697) traveled throughout Brazil and condemned the bandeirante slave trade in letters to the king of Portugal, João IV (1604–1656). In 1757, after the expulsion of the Jesuit order from Brazil, the governor of Maranhão ordered the abolition of indigenous slavery.

Making use of their extensive experience of the slave trade in the interior of Africa since the 1400s, Portuguese colonizers sought large-scale importation of African slaves for the production of sugar in the northeastern region of Brazil, in the states of Bahia and Pernambuco. Although sugar plantations had been established in the Spanish Caribbean in the first decades of the sixteenth century, Brazil emerged as the largest producer of sugar in the seventeenth century, accounting for 95 percent of Brazilian exports. The Portuguese Empire also dominated the Atlantic slave trade in the sixteenth century, enabling it to acquire slaves more cheaply and more easily than its European counterparts.
Consequently, Brazil became the most important importer of slaves in the New World, with an estimated 5 million coming on slave ships primarily from West Africa (Ghana, Nigeria, Benin, and Togo) and the former Portuguese colonies of Angola and Mozambique. By way of comparison, it is estimated that a total of 12.5 million arrived in the New World as a whole between the sixteenth to the nineteenth centuries.

The diversifying exports of the colony, however, required the labor of slaves in a wide range of fields, such as cattle ranching, the production of foodstuff, and the fishing industry in both rural and urban spaces throughout the vast territories of Brazil. By the end of the seventeenth century, slaves also worked in gold and diamond mines in the southeastern state of Minas Gerais until the mining industry's decline in the second half of the eighteenth century. According to Mieko Nishida (2003), up to one-fourth of slaves between 1811 and 1888 (when slavery was officially abolished in Brazil) were employed as artisans in the northeastern city of Salvador—Brazil’s first capital—and provided a profitable return to their masters. By the nineteenth century, the rise of coffee and tobacco production further increased the importation of slaves, this time in the southern states of São Paulo and Rio de Janeiro. In other words, slaves played a fundamental role in a wide range of economic industries, and slave ownership was common among all social classes. This led to the continual arrival of slaves from Africa to Brazil for almost 400 years, distinguishing the Brazilian slave trade as the largest and most enduring of all the European colonies in the Americas.

In both urban and rural settings, the living and working conditions of African slaves were brutal (Conrad 1984). Slave merchants sought to maximize their profits by shackling people and cramming as many as possible into the ships, under very harsh conditions. Underfed and trapped in unhygienic conditions, an estimated 20 percent of slaves died before landing on the Brazilian coast. Many more perished within the first weeks after their arrival. For those who survived, an estimated 75 percent of slaves died within the first years in the colony due to extremely harsh working conditions. The average life span of an African-born slave was about twenty-three years, which was four years more than indigenous slaves (Skidmore 1999).

Once the slaves were in Brazil, Portuguese masters engaged in wide-scale violent practices to keep them under their control. Such violence as flagellations was often perpetrated in public squares to instill terror. African slaves often revolted against their masters, and those seized and convicted were typically punished by death. Many slaves also escaped and established quilombos, settlements founded by fugitive slaves who established self-sustaining communities. The most famous and longest-standing quilombo was Palmares, which comprised more than 30,000 escaped slaves, near the northeastern city of Recife. It was established around 1600 and lasted for almost a century before Portuguese soldiers managed to dismantle it. In addition, slave revolts were common from the sixteenth into the nineteenth century. The largest urban insurrection, the Malê revolt, occurred in Salvador, Bahia, in 1835; 600 Africans led by Muslim African leaders ran in the streets shouting “Death to the whites” and fighting against 1,500 police officers. Although the revolt was put down, its impact contributed to a shift in popular and official opinion in support of ending the slave trade (Graden 1996).

Sex and Sodomy in Colonial Brazil

It perhaps comes as no surprise that the sexual exploitation of men, women, and children was one of the most important mechanisms of social and bodily control employed by many slaveholders (Aidoo 2018). Children born of enslaved mothers inherited their mothers’ status as slaves, making sexual violence a way of ensuring the reproduction of slaves. Cases from the Portuguese Inquisition demonstrate that male slaves were also coerced into sexual acts by their owners or by free men (McKnight and Garofalo 2009). Some of these owners engaged slaves in homosexual acts in exchange for money, food, or drinks, while others used intimidation; some cases reveal love affairs between masters and slaves living in homoerotic concubinage. If necessary, however, owners could resort to physical coercion or rape, a sexual privilege they held as colonizers of Brazil. Forced sodomy by male slaveowners was not limited to male slaves. Documents from the Holy Office of the Inquisition reveal that female slaves, too, accused their masters of the crime; moreover, several of women accused of sodomy were engaged in some form of sex work, or had been coerced by their husbands to commit sodomy. In defending themselves, these women often argued that they had been taken by surprise or were forced by their lover or client (Soyer 2008).

Sexual acts considered borderline heretical, such as sodomy, bigamy, bestiality, and the solicitation of sexual favors in the confessional, came under the jurisdiction of the Portuguese Inquisition, which sought to regulate both religious and cultural behaviors in the colony. A major target of inquisitors was Muslim and Jewish people in Portugal and its colonies who had converted to Catholicism, most often under coercion, but who secretly continued to practice their original faith. With regard to sexuality, Brazil was considered a sinful place in the imaginations of Portuguese colonizers and inquisitors, who lamented the sexual disorder of the colony. During the eighteenth century, the administrator Pedro Miguel de Almeida “was relentless in pointing out the moral deficiency of his domain, linking it to the tense and rebellious environment that was indeed prevalent in Minas Gerais” (Almeida [1720] 1994).

Nonsanctioned sexual behaviors stemmed largely from the strictures set up by the Catholic Church with regard to marriage: white men could not marry black or mulatto women. However, the majority of colonizers arriving from Portugal were male and therefore had no choice but to seek women of African, indigenous, or mixed races as mates. Also, the church’s overall laxity on sexual matters until the second half of the eighteenth century enabled men and women to engage in sexual behavior forbidden by the Inquisition more openly than in Portugal (Vainfas 2014). With regard to same-sex relations between men, historian and LGBT activist Luiz Mott (1946–), founder of the Grupo Gay da Bahia, argues that this moral laxity enabled small homosexual subcultures to emerge in urban centers during the 300 years of Brazilian colonization (Mott 2003).

The Inquisition deemed sodomy a crime in the sixteenth century. Sodomites were called fanchonos (faggots) and somitigos (sodomites). By 1613, Mott explains, only sodomia perfeita—understood as anal penetration with ejaculation—could be prosecuted by the Portuguese Inquisition (Mott 2003); all other sexual acts between men fell under the jurisdiction of the secular justice, though in reality this division was less clear. It was also important for inquisitors to identify who were the “active” and “passive” partners in the sexual act in order to better determine the severity of the crime of the accused. Inquisitors were more likely to punish passive partners than active ones because male penetration was considered more “natural” (Alves Dias 2006, 55).

It is important to note that African slaves also sought other male slaves for emotional and sexual satisfaction, especially in areas where the ratio of men to women was low (Sweet 2003). For newly arrived slaves, Western gender constructions did not allow for the more flexible gender identities that existed in some parts of Central Africa. For example, in Angola and Congo, cross-dressing men who performed the passive role in acts of sodomy sometimes made up a third-gender category termed jimbandaa, which did not carry immoral connotations. In fact, cross-dressing males in Angola were considered an important and powerful caste. In the Portuguese colonies, however, consensual same-sex relationships between slaves were punishable by death. In 1591 a young slave living in Bahia, Francisco Manicongo, was denounced to the Holy Office for dressing as a woman and being known as a sodomite among the slave community (Sweet 2003).

Although same-sex sexual acts were prevalent throughout the colony of Brazil, only approximately thirty sodomites were executed throughout the nearly 300-year period of the Portuguese Inquisition. In contrast, historian Serge Gruzinski found fourteen cases of sodomites burned at the stake in colonial Mexico in 1658 alone, and Zeb Tortorici has shown that some three dozen men were executed between 1530 and 1786 in Mexico (Vainfas and Tortorici 2016). This leniency in Brazil over the crime of sodomy stemmed largely from the implicit agreement between colonial officials and the church regarding colonization: despite their strong disgust for the act sodomy, colonizers and the Holy Office believed that the successful enslavement of African men and women entailed sexual abuse (Vainfas 2014).

Some accused sodomites from Portugal were exiled to Brazil as part of their punishment. For example, Father António Soares was exiled in 1643 after his confession of countless of homosexual acts in Lisbon. During his lengthy stay in the Brazilian colony, he continued to engage in homosexual acts, but he was able to avoid execution, or any form of punishment, because of the wealth and reputation of his powerful family (Higgs 2003). In the majority of cases, accused sodomites from the upper classes were protected by their social status and were rarely punished for crimes against their slaves.

The Holy Office was also known for covering up sexual violence by even the most notorious clergy members. David Higgs’s 2003 study of inquisitorial cases of Carmelite friars accused of the pecado nefando explains that sex with young slave boys served as a sexual outlet for some friars and monks, and that, despite considerable evidence against ordained priests, fellow Carmelites protected accused sodomites from punishment. For example, two summaries of evidence gathered by Carmelites about the friar Thomé da Madre de Deus Coutinho reveal his repeated sexual abuse of slave boys in his cell at the monastery. The accusations came from other friars living in the convent as well as from some of the victims. For example, a slave and barber of the convent heard from two other young slaves that Coutinho had violently raped his son. After the father’s testimony, all three boys were sent to the country estate “in order to heal some great evil which is public among the monks and slaves of the Convent” (Higgs 2003, 162). Although the prosecutors believed there was clearly a case against the friar, they claimed that they were forced to dismiss it because the social position of some of the witnesses, as creoles, slaves, and minors, meant that their testimonies were not trustworthy.

Sexually abused slaves had little recourse other than fleeing or reporting their abuser to the Holy Office. Trials and confessions documented by the Holy Office, however, reveal a bias against the victims. Their testimonies were written down by scribes but constrained by the inquisitorial genre and its vocabulary, thus mitigating the demands for protection of the slave from his master. For a sodomy conviction, two witnesses as well as the confession by the defendant himself (i.e., slave owner), were needed. Paradoxically, the victim (i.e., slave) had to confess to having committed the crime of sodomy even though the sexual act occurred against his will. Often, slave owners and free men offered detailed and voluntary confessions of sodomy because it was a way to satisfy the Holy Office and avoid harsh punishment. In 1593 a twenty-one-year-old man confessed to an inquisitor that he had had sexual relations with two of his father’s male slaves, stressing that they had been receptive to his advances. Higgs (2003) suggests that the man may have come forward as a way to forestall his sexual partners from accusing him of sodomy. Confessions by Portuguese slave owners could easily cast sexually violent acts against their slaves in consensual language to conceal their crimes.

Inquisition cases also shed light on how some male slaves successfully secured protection from their owners by denouncing them to the Holy Office. Julie Elizabeth Redekopp’s analysis of the 1743 trial of Luiz da Costa, a Brazilian slave from Pernambuco, demonstrates how he appropriated hegemonic discourse regarding sodomy to receive a lenient punishment (Redekopp 2013). Redekopp suggests that da Costa’s understanding of the act of sodomy in the eyes of the inquisitors enabled him to formulate a confession that stressed his passive role in the act of sodomy as well as his social position as a minor and marginalized individual. By underlining his passivity and marginalization, he was able to navigate the inquisitorial system in ways that positioned his aggressor as the perpetrator of the crime and prevented him from further abusing him. Da Costa received the light punishment of an injunction never to commit sodomy again.

Despite the inherent biases embedded in inquisitorial sources, they remain invaluable for the study of sexual violence and sodomy. Following the end of the Portuguese Inquisition in 1821, there was a relative absence of explicit cases of sexual violence against the enslaved. In fact, some of the main sources for students interested in the intersection of same-sex relations and sexual violence after the Inquisition are documentary evidence, such as runaway slave advertisements, reports by doctors, bills of sale, the journal writings of European travelers in nineteenth-century Brazil, and Brazilian literature such as Adolfo Ferreira Caminha’s novel*Bom-Crioulo* (1895), which deals openly with homosexuality and the legacy of slavery in Brazil. Almost forgotten during the first part of the twentieth century, Bom-Crioulo has been translated into Spanish, French, English, and German since the 1980s, and scholars of gender and sexuality have offered many interpretations of the novel (Mendes 2003; Howes 2001; Foster 1988).

The legacy of slavery in modern Brazil is evident in the social and economic disparities between its white and Afro-Brazilian population. Despite the myth of racial democracy promoted by such thinkers as sociologist Gilberto Freyre (1900–1987), people of Afro-Brazilian descent earn 58 percent as much as whites and represent less than a quarter of the government officials elected in the federal and state races in 2014 (Economist 2016). Afro-Brazilians are also more likely to suffer police brutality than white citizens (Mitchell and Wood 1999, 1001). With regard to LGBT rights, Brazil legalized same-sex marriage in 2013, and legal protections of the LGBT community have gradually increased since the end of the military dictatorship in 1985. That said, violence against the LGBT community in Brazil is among the highest in the world, with more than 445 deaths related to homophobia in 2017 (Cowie 2018). In addition, very few studies have looked at the intersection of race and hate crimes against the LGBT community. One study suggests that approximately 52 percent of murdered LGBTQ persons in 2012 were of Afro-Brazilian descent (Secretaria de Direitos Humanos 2012). Crimes against Afro-descendant Brazilians of the LGBT community include, but are not limited to, daily incidents of intimidation, rape, sexual harassment, and murder; these forms of violence occur as a result of police abuse and minimal efforts by the Brazilian government to combat these, as well as a lack of legal resources.
BIBLIOGRAPHY

Sodomy Laws in the United States

MELINDA D. KANE
Associate Professor, Department of Sociology
East Carolina University, Greenville, NC

The history of US laws against sodomy and the legal battle to decriminalize it.

Throughout the history of the United States, sodomy laws have been used to police and punish nonnormative sexualities. Sodomy laws refers to a category of laws that criminalized consensual sexual acts between adults under statutes of various names, including “unnatural offenses,” “crimes against nature,” and “buggery.” In the United States, sodomy laws were state laws and, prior to 1961, every state had a sodomy law (Eskridge 1999). While the overwhelming majority of US laws criminalized sexual acts regardless of the sex of the participants, the laws were often interpreted, and enforced, as bans against same-sex sexuality and were used to target LGBTQ people. Over a period of several decades, decriminalization occurred state by state until 2003, when the remaining sodomy statutes were invalidated through the US Supreme Court decision Lawrence v. Texas. This entry briefly describes the history of sodomy laws in the United States, their relevance for LGBTQ people, and the process through which sodomy was decriminalized.

History of Sodomy Laws

The criminalization of consensual sexual activity between adults in the United States can be traced back to the country's history as a British colony. British common law instituted prohibitions against “buggery” in the sixteenth century during the reign of Henry VIII and, through colonization, spread those prohibitions in criminal codes across the globe, including the original British North American colonies. Prior to the inclusion of buggery in the common law, sodomy was criminalized in England through canon law (i.e., religious law) (Sanders 2009; Eskridge 1999). After independence from Britain, the first US states criminalized sodomy, and subsequent territories and states included prohibitions against sodomy as they developed their laws. Sodomy laws had significant penalties attached. The original buggery law in Britain had the penalty of death, as did the first colonial laws. After independence (between 1786 and 1826), the death penalty was removed from US laws, though sodomy remained a felony in most states until the 1950s (Andersen 2006; D'Emilio 1983). Even as late as 2003, when sodomy was decriminalized nationwide, eight states still classified sodomy as a felony, with penalties of up to fifteen years in jail (Eskridge 1999, 2008).
The statutory language of sodomy laws was often purposefully vague; the sex acts were considered so reprehensible that they “should not be named.” However, general interpretation of the laws was that they criminalized anal sex, covering activity between male partners, as well as between male and female partners. Buggery under British common law and the original sodomy laws within the United States also covered sexual activity with animals (bestiality) (Eskridge 2008). In contrast, sexual activity between women was not originally criminalized (Andersen 2006; Eskridge 1999).

In the late 1800s, states became increasingly concerned with nonnormative gender and sexual expression. As the urban population increased, female prostitution became more visible, and identifiable queer spaces were established. A portion of women also began to enter the public sphere, earning college degrees, joining the workforce, and delaying or avoiding marriage. Some of these women developed close relationships with other women (Eskridge 2008). These challenges to existing gender and sexuality norms were perceived, by many, as evidence of moral and societal decline. In response to these perceived threats, states began to explicitly define the sex acts prohibited and to broaden their laws to include a wider range of sexual activity, including oral sex. These specifications and expansions, through legislative action or judicial interpretation, meant that sexual activity between women began to fall within the law, at least in some states (D’Emilio 1983; Eskridge 1999, 2008).

Implications and Uses of Sodomy Laws

Sodomy laws criminalized acts, not identities, and the language of the laws covered participants regardless of the sex of their partners, but the laws were used to persecute lesbians and gays. Arrests under sodomy laws were relatively uncommon, particularly for consensual acts that occurred in private. Most enforcement targeted prostitution, acts involving a lack of consent, or activity in public spaces (Andersen 2006; Eskridge 2008; Hassel 2001; Sanders 2009). But arrests did occur, and usage of the law varied depending on police and political interests (Klarman 2013). For example, William N. Eskridge Jr. (2008) documented a dramatic uptick in sodomy arrests after the wave of sodomy law expansion in the late 1800s, as states attempted to control and suppress nonnormative gender and sexual expression. Local priorities could also increase enforcement, such as attempts to “clean up” areas of the city or be “tough” on crime (Klarman 2013). When arrests did occur, those engaging in same-sex sexual activity were disproportionately targeted.

Sodomy laws, while criminalizing the engagement in sex acts, were also interpreted and used much more broadly so that any suspicion of same-sex sexual activity, or even implied solicitation of such activity, was used to justify arrest (Sanders 2009). Mary Bernstein, in her historical analysis of the US gay and lesbian movement, argues that “most arrests of homosexuals came from solicitation, disorderly conduct, and loitering laws which were based on the assumption that homosexuals (unlike heterosexuals), by definition, were people who engaged in illicit activity” (2002, 540). Police would target areas where lesbians and gay men congregated, such as bars and public spaces, and arrest them for the “intent” to commit sodomy (Bernstein 2002). For example, the New York City police targeted male “degenerates” in the 1920s, using the disorderly conduct laws to arrest men engaging in activity such as fondling in parks and public toilets.

Targeting of LGBTQ people and places continued into the 1950s and 1960s, when gay bars were denied liquor licenses for serving “known” criminals, criminalizing gay space and creating the rationale for police raids of bars serving liquor illegally where patrons were arrested. Arrests publicized in the newspaper led to other harms, such as job loss and violence, even if the arrests did not result in prison time (D’Emilio 1983; Klarman 2013). Some of the earliest protests of the modern US gay and lesbian movement were in reaction to police harassment during the 1960s, including the 1966 Compton Cafeteria riots in San Francisco, the 1967 Black Cat Tavern protests in Los Angeles, and the Stonewall riots of 1969, when patrons of a gay bar in New York City fought back against a police raid, leading to a multi-night protest and spawning new activism and organizations within the gay and lesbian community (Armstrong and Crage 2006; D’Emilio 1983).

Even when sodomy laws were not used to arrest people, they still had consequences through the symbolic messages they conveyed (Cowell and Milon 2012). The laws were often interpreted as if being gay or lesbian was sufficient evidence to determine that one was engaging in criminal acts. “Thus, unproved status as a violator of the sodomy laws becomes a basis” for denying other rights to lesbians and gays and blocking programming around lesbian and gay issues (Hassel 2001, 822). Using the argument that sodomy laws defined all homosexuals as criminals, US judges denied parents custody of their children, university officials denied recognition of student groups, lawyers were prohibited from joining the bar, and legislators voted against the inclusion of sexual orientation in civil rights bills (Cain 2000; Eskridge 2008; Hassel 2001).

Miriam Smith (2008) argues that one of the key reasons why the United States made progress on lesbian and gay rights so much later than Canada—a very similar country in numerous ways—was Canada’s decriminalization of sodomy in 1969. Canada’s initial policy change made the whole conversation around gay and lesbian rights different—reducing legal barriers to other policy gains—while the United States continued to use the sodomy laws to discriminate against its gay and lesbian citizens. Therefore, the decriminalization of sodomy was an important, long-term goal of the modern lesbian and gay movement because of its both concrete and symbolic implications (Andersen 2006; Cain 2000; Eskridge 2008).

Decriminalization
Sodomy was not decriminalized nationwide in the United States until 2003, but thirty-six states removed their prohibitions prior to national decriminalization, starting with Illinois in 1961 (Andersen 2006; Kane 2003). Decriminalization occurred through either legislative repeal of the law, where legislators voted to remove consensual sexual activity from their criminal code, or through judicial invalidation of the law, where a state supreme court ruled that the statute violated the state constitution. Of the thirty-six states that decriminalized sodomy prior to 2003, twenty-six did so through legislative repeal, while the remaining ten decriminalized sodomy through judicial decisions.

Model Penal Code Era Sodomy reform within the United States can be broken down into several phases (Andersen 2006; Kane 2007). The first phase ran from 1961 to 1983, when twenty-five states decriminalized sodomy. Most of the reforms during this phase occurred legislatively through larger, general revisions of state criminal codes. The American Law Institute (ALI), an independent group of judges, lawyers, and law professors, drafted a “Model Penal Code” in the mid-1950s as a guide for individual states updating their penal codes to help them remove old and unnecessary criminal laws, including consensual sodomy laws (Eskridge 2008). Of the states that used the Model Penal Code to help draft new codes, almost half followed the ALI’s recommendation and removed their statutes when the new codes were adopted (Eskridge 1999; Kane 2003). Though the adoption of new codes did not guarantee that a state would decriminalize sodomy, it did provide an important opportunity for decriminalization.

States that adopted new codes without repealing their sodomy law either kept the law as it was or made other changes, such as reducing penalties. Several states, including Kentucky and Texas, chose to make their sodomy laws same-sex specific. By changing the law to prohibit specific, consensual acts between same-sex partners while decriminalizing the same activities between different-sex partners, these states made the previously implied targeting of nonnormative sexuality explicit.

During this initial period of decriminalization, legal experts and legislators were the primary instigators of reform. There is some evidence that the early US lesbian and gay movement purposefully stayed quiet on the issue since repeal was happening through penal code revision. Movement activists were afraid that if they advocated for change, it would turn a relatively noncontroversial modernization of the criminal code into a lesbian and gay rights issue, undermining the likelihood of change. In addition, by leaving decriminalization to legal elites, the movement could focus on other goals (Bernstein 2003). However, once decriminalization became seen as a lesbian and gay rights issue, repeal through these code revisions slowed, and activists became the primary advocates for reform.

Bowers v. Hardwick (1986) After Wisconsin’s repeal in 1983, almost ten years passed before another state decriminalized sodomy. The second phase of sodomy reform covers the period from 1984 to 2002, years in which no state-level sodomy reforms occurred. There are two primary explanations for this lack of change. First, the arrival of AIDS in the 1980s increased discrimination against gays and lesbians and reoriented public attention toward sexual activity within the community, particularly anal sex. This made it more difficult for decriminalization advocates to bundle reform as part of general penal code revisions or to frame sodomy laws as state overreach into people's private lives. At the same time, AIDS provided decriminalization opponents new arguments against reform, including concerns about public health, and a focus on specific sexual acts (Andersen 2006; Kane 2003).

THE SODOMY CASE AGAINST NICHOLAS SENSION

Nicholas Sension, a married farmer who lived in Windsor, Connecticut, appeared in court on charges of sodomy in 1677. The surviving documentation from his trial—the most detailed known to exist for any sodomy case from the colonial period in North America—suggests that popular attitudes toward sodomy did not always match official declarations. Sension had been making overtures toward men for over three decades. Although his behavior prompted three informal investigations, only when Sension sued one of his servants for defamation (after the young man complained to other townsfolk about his employer's sexual aggression toward him) did the court hearing that case decide to prosecute Sension for sodomy. Despite strident denunciations of sodomy by New England ministers and in the region’s legal codes, colonists mostly preferred to avoid taking formal action against men such as Sension, even if notorious for their sexual interest in other men and especially if otherwise valued as neighbors. Prosecutions for this crime were unusual but not necessarily because sodomy occurred only rarely. Some townsfolk may have been reluctant to admit that such behavior was taking place in their communities, but others were apparently less upset by the occurrence of sodomy than official statements might lead one to expect. Even those who condemned Sension's behavior had difficulty finding enough allies to make a legal prosecution feasible.

Sension's case also casts doubt on the success of ministers and legislators in popularizing their understanding of illicit sexual desire. People living in the past did not think about or evaluate sex using the categories that modern Westerners take for granted. The notion of sexual orientation, which assumes that most people are drawn sexually and romantically to either men or women, is a relatively recent invention. Indeed, the introduction of the words homosexuality and heterosexuality at the end of the nineteenth century marked a major shift in thinking about sex. Puritans in New England saw sex as an expression of moral, not sexual, orientation. Ministers taught that sexual sins, like any other form of sin, resulted from corrupt tendencies that everyone inherited from Adam and Eve: all sins were interconnected, and no one was drawn in particular to one form of offense, so that anyone could be tempted to commit any sin. Sension's neighbors clearly identified in him an ongoing attraction toward men, but they had to come up with their own vocabulary to describe that. They referred to Sension's behavior as a “trade,” meaning a calling or way of life (albeit an unwelcome one that Sension prayed God would release him from). Neither Sension nor his neighbors identified in his behavior a distinct sexual orientation, but they did recognize a consistent and specific impulse.

New England courts rarely convicted on charges of sodomy or other sexual acts that carried the death penalty unless there was clear proof that intercourse had occurred. Neither intent nor intimacy short of penetration could justify conviction: the courts focused on acts, not symptoms of desire or identity. Yet Sension's neighbors repeatedly described his attraction to men and his attempts to have sex with them; such evidence was revealing of popular attitudes but of little use to those who wanted a conviction. Only one witness claimed to have seen sexual intercourse take place, and there was no corroborating witness (as required in capital cases). The court therefore found Sension guilty only of attempted sodomy. He was whipped and shamed in public, lost his right to vote, and gave bond for his future good behavior, but he escaped with his life. The records surviving from Sension's trial provide a reminder that the court system was much more rigorous and restrained than present-day stereotypes of Puritan society as intolerant, repressive, and trigger-happy might lead one to expect. They also suggest that New England settlers were quite independent-minded and pragmatic in dealing with illicit behavior, whatever their ministers may have preached from the pulpit.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Richard Godbeer

Director, Humanities Research Center and Professor of History

Virginia Commonwealth University, Richmond

As reform through penal code revisions ended, lesbian and gay rights organizations, through the Ad-Hoc Task Force to Challenge Sodomy Laws (later the Litigators' Roundtable), began to proactively work together, looking for court cases that they could use to make effective challenges to the constitutionality of sodomy laws (Andersen 2006; Eskridge 2008). The focus on a federal case to take to the Supreme Court, with the hope of invalidating all remaining sodomy statutes in one fell swoop, also contributed to the lack of state-level reform during this period.

The task force needed a case that showed actual harm, where someone engaged in a criminalized act, in private, and was arrested. Without direct harm, judges would likely dismiss the claim due to a lack of standing, preventing the constitutional challenge from going forward (Andersen 2006). This kind of case was difficult to find since few people were arrested under sodomy statutes for activity that occurred in private. Most harm was indirect, through the use of sodomy laws to deny other rights to lesbians and gay men. A case from Georgia—Bowers v. Hardwick—appeared to fit the bill. In 1982 a police officer entered Michael Hardwick’s home to serve a warrant for failing to appear in court on a charge of public drunkenness. (Hardwick had already taken care of the fine; the warrant was in error.) When the officer looked into Hardwick’s bedroom, he saw him engaging in oral sex with another man and arrested them under the Georgia sodomy statute (Andersen 2006). Hardwick sued the state of Georgia, arguing that the law violated his right to privacy (see Eskridge 2008 for a detailed description of the case).

Relying upon the right to privacy established in Griswold v. Connecticut (1965) and Roe v. Wade (1973) as the constitutional justification for their challenges (Eskridge 1999), advocates argued that consensual sexual activity in the home was also protected. Advocates thought the ruling would be close, based on their knowledge of the nine justices sitting on the court at the time, but advocates were optimistic about their chances after oral arguments. However, in 1986, in a five to four decision, the Supreme Court ruled in Bowers v. Hardwick that the Georgia sodomy law did not violate the constitutional right to privacy, and therefore states could criminalize specific sexual acts between consenting adults (Andersen 2006; Eskridge 2008). While the Georgia statute criminalized both same-sex and different-sex sexual activity, the majority opinion’s argument was largely based on the supposed long history of the illegality of sodomy and the assumption that most people in Georgia believed homosexual sodomy to be immoral (Eskridge 2008). The ruling contributed to the failure of other pending judicial challenges as well, including cases in Missouri, Louisiana, and Texas, halting the momentum that had been gained in sodomy law reform (Andersen 2006; Cain 2000).

After Bowers After suffering the dramatic setback of the Bowers v. Hardwick decision, US lesbian and gay rights organizations began concerted grassroots efforts to target individual states (Boutcher 2010). In addition to advocating for legislative repeal, activists continued their judicial strategy, turning from the federal courts to state courts, arguing that sodomy laws violated state constitutions. These alternative strategies took time to yield fruit, especially in the case of judicial strategies, since cases take multiple years to weave through the lower courts before reaching the state supreme court. Phase three, from 1992 to 2002, marks the period in which the new state-level strategies implemented after Hardwick became effective and sodomy decriminalization resumed.

Advocates needed to develop strategies to circumvent the Bowers ruling (Andersen 2006; Cain 2000), and state-focused approaches provided a couple of ways to do that. In the United States, states can provide additional rights beyond those guaranteed through the federal constitution; they just cannot provide fewer rights. Any rulings made on state constitutional grounds, in most cases, would not be reviewed by the federal courts, and the decisions would stand irrespective of Bowers. Therefore, advocates could still use privacy claims, pointing to state constitutions as the source of those privacy rights (Andersen 2006). In addition, several states had same-sex specific laws. By criminalizing sexual activity between same-sex partners that was legal for different-sex couples, same-sex specific laws were also open to equal protection challenges to which other, more inclusive, sodomy laws were not, because of their more explicitly discriminatory nature (Cain 2000). The gay and lesbian movement took advantage of this legal argument and used equal protection claims in most, if not all, of the constitutional challenges to same-sex specific laws. In fact, research has shown that same-sex specific laws were more likely to be decriminalized in this period than broader, more inclusive laws (Kane 2003).

Under this new post-Bowers strategy, Kentucky became the first state to decriminalize sodomy in 1992 when the Kentucky Supreme Court ruled that the law violated its state constitution under both privacy and equal protection grounds. After that decriminalization, reform picked back up again—with ten additional states decriminalizing sodomy between 1993 and 2002 (Kane 2007). Unlike the Model Penal Code era, which was dominated by legislative repeal, eight of the eleven reforms after Bowers were achieved through the courts, including in Georgia, whose state supreme court ruled in 1998 that the law upheld by the US Supreme Court was invalid under its own state constitution (Andersen 2006; Eskridge 2008).

Lawrence v. Texas (2003) As the movement pursued its state-by-state strategy, it also debated when to return to a federal-level challenge. The state-by-state strategy was successful, but it was expensive and time intensive, and it left the Bowers v. Hardwick decision uncontested. Bowers, as a federal precedent, harmed the movement’s ability to litigate other forms of discrimination through the courts. Federal judges used Bowers in their decisions as a rationale for deciding against other gay and lesbian rights claims, such as cases involving employment discrimination. Therefore, Lambda Legal and the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) Lesbian and Gay Rights Project, two national legal organizations active in the battle against sodomy laws from the beginning, decided to identify, and pursue, cases where they could include both state and federal challenges (Andersen 2006).

Advocates needed a case where, like Bowers, the person was arrested for engaging in a criminalized act in private (Andersen 2006; Klarman 2013). They also wanted a case from a state whose law was limited to same-sex sexual activity so they could make the equal protection argument, in addition to privacy. This time, a case from Houston, Texas, matched their criteria. In 1998, based on a fraudulent report of an armed man, police entered the home of John Lawrence and, claiming to see Lawrence and Tyrone Garner engaging in sexual activity in the bedroom, arrested both men. After discussions with lawyers from Lambda Legal, Lawrence and Garner agreed to plead guilty to the misdemeanor so they could be the plaintiffs in a constitutional challenge to the law (see Eskridge 2008 for a description of the case).

In 2003 Lawrence v. Texas reached the US Supreme Court where, in a six to three decision, the court ruled that the Texas sodomy law was unconstitutional. Five of the justices, led by Justice Anthony Kennedy, ruled that the law violated the federal right to privacy, thereby invalidating all remaining state sodomy laws—those limited to same-sex sexual activity as well as broader, more inclusive laws (Andersen 2006; Eskridge 2008; Klarman 2013). The majority decision overturned the Bowers v. Hardwick decision, finding it to be made in error—an unusual act, especially for a relatively recent decision (made just seventeen years before). In contrast, Sandra Day O’Connor, a justice who had ruled in favor of Georgia’s law in Bowers, also ruled against the Texas law in Lawrence, but on equal protection grounds, rather than privacy (Klarman 2013). Regardless, consensual sexual activity between adults was officially decriminalized throughout the United States, and Bowers could no longer be used as precedent in subsequent lesbian and gay rights court cases.

Conclusion

Lawrence v. Texas was an important success for the LGBTQ movement in the United States, finally decriminalizing consensual sexual activity between adults more than forty years after the first state law was repealed in 1961. The path to nationwide decriminalization was arduous and the result of substantial dedication, effort, and time from activists in the LGBTQ movement.

Embedded in US laws since the nation’s inception, states expanded and revised their sodomy laws as a way to police and repress the growing visibility of nonnormative sexuality and gender expression. While sodomy laws focused on sex acts, not identities, the laws were used to target people who engaged in, or who were assumed to engage in, same-sex sexual activity through direct sanctions like arrests, as well as indirectly through the stigmatization of LGBTQ people.

Once same-sex sexual activity was decriminalized, a key justification for denying other rights to LGBTQ people was removed. Justice Antonin Scalia’s minority opinion opposing the Lawrence decision specifically argued that the invalidation of sodomy laws would open the door to legalizing marriage for same-sex couples, which Massachusetts did, via its state supreme court, less than a year after the Lawrence decision (Eskridge 2008; Klarman 2013). Twelve years later, Justice Kennedy, who wrote the majority opinion in Lawrence, wrote the majority opinion in Obergefell v. Hodges (2015), which granted marriage equality nationwide. It is difficult to imagine marriage equality or other recent LGBTQ policy gains, such as the repeal of “don’t ask, don’t tell,” which enabled LGBTQ people to serve openly in the US military, without the removal of criminal sanctions for same-sex sexual activity.

Of course, the decriminalization of sodomy does not necessarily improve conditions for gay and lesbian citizens if the underlying attitudes behind these laws continue to exist. For example, many of the states whose laws were invalidated by the Lawrence decision still have their laws “on the books.” Legislative action is required to remove the laws from the state criminal codes, and most states have not done so. In fact, several state legislatures have actually voted to retain their sodomy laws (Murphy 2011). These laws cannot legally be used to arrest people, so the unwillingness to remove them suggests the laws are being maintained purely to continue to send symbolic messages condemning nonnormative sexuality. There is also evidence that remaining laws can still be used to harm LGBTQ people. For example, police in Louisiana continued to use the invalidated sodomy law to arrest people “soliciting” consensual gay sex and using the arrests to encourage people to plea bargain to reduced charges, demonstrating the residual power of these laws in the United States, even today (Mustian 2013).

SEE ALSO Antisodomy and Buggery Trials; Canadian Criminal Code Reform (1969); Compton's Cafeteria Riot (1966); Cruising and Cruising Grounds; Inquisition, Criminal Courts, and Sexuality in Colonial Latin America; Lambda Legal Defense and Education Fund; Offences Against the Person Act (1861); Section 377 and Section 377A; Section 377 in South Asia; Stonewall Riots, International Effects of

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz (1648–1695)

ALICIA GASPAR DE ALBA
Professor, Department of Chicana/o Studies
University of California, Los Angeles

Iconic nun, poet, and scholar, known as the Mexican “Tenth Muse,” who manifested same-sex desires in her writings.

The Proto-feminist Tenth Muse

Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz (1648–1695) is one of the Spanish-speaking world’s most iconic figures, the seventeenth-century nun/poet/scholar who is known the world over as “the first feminist of the Americas,” and the Mexican décima musa, or “Tenth Muse,” the same name Plato gave to the lesbian poet Sappho millennia earlier. It is well-known that Sor Juana’s intelligence was the rival of any man’s (scholar, priest, or ruler) in both New Spain and the Iberian Peninsula.

What is not so known, or rather, not popularly acknowledged or accepted, is that Sor Juana was not only a proto-feminist, or rather, a woman who advocated for women’s rights 300 years before the women’s movement, but also a woman who loved and desired other women—in short, Sor Juana was a seventeenth-century Spanish-Mexican lesbian nun. As the many love poems she wrote to (or about) other women attest, Sor Juana felt a passionate, erotic, and intellectual connection to two vicereines (wives of viceroys, who were the representatives of the king and queen in the colonial world): La Marquesa de Mancera, whom Sor Juana served as lady-in-waiting when she lived at court (1664–1668), and La Condesa de Paredes, whose husband, the Marquise de la Laguna and Conde de Paredes, ruled as viceroy of Mexico from 1680 to 1688. It is Sor Juana’s veiled love for these two women that earned her the allegorical title “Tenth Muse.”

In those eight years of the Conde de Paredes’s reign, arguably the most productive years of Sor Juana’s cloistered life, she enjoyed the full protection of the palace and produced some of her most intrepid work, in which her passion for La Condesa, as well as her battles with the patriarchal church, take center stage. These include her famous poem “Hombres necios” (Stubborn men), in which she accuses men of the very “sins” they ascribe to women; her intellectual autobiography, La respuesta a Sor Filotea (1691; Response to Sister Filotea), in the form of a response to a letter from a pseudonymous bishop of Puebla, who, writing as a woman, accused Sor Juana of endangering her soul with secular study and suggested she should study only the Bible; and her most baroque poem, “Primero sueño” (First dream), which illustrates her perpetual struggle between reason (or male enlightenment) and passion, both for learning and for other women.

Portait of Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz (1750) by Miguel Cabrera. Sor Juana is an iconic figure of the Spanish-speaking world as a proto-feminist who advocated for women's rights hundreds of years before the women's movement as well as a poet who expressed desires for other women.

In her twenty-six-year tenure in the habit of a Hieronymite nun, Sor Juana created a large archive of her proto-feminist struggles and intellectual accomplishment that she left behind in four thick volumes of collected works. The first collection, published in 1689 and edited by none other than her beloved María Luisa, La Condesa de Paredes, when she and her husband returned to Spain a year earlier, taking Juana’s writings with them, is titled Inundación castalida de la única poetisa, musa décima, Soror Juana Inés de la Cruz, or, Castalian Inundation of the Only Poet and Tenth Muse, Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz. It would be difficult to believe that a learned woman such as La Condesa would not have known that she was deploying a double entendre (or secret code?) with that epithet: Sor Juana the sublime writer of décimas, poems of ten-line stanzas, and Juana, the New World’s equivalent to the Greek lesbian poet Sappho, whom Plato baptized the “tenth muse.” That first book can be seen as the cerebral offspring of the love, admiration, and erotic desire she shared with La Condesa de Paredes.

The Worst of All Women

Three years after penning La respuesta, in one of the documents Sor Juana wrote to renew her vows as a nun, she calls herself “yo, la peor de todas,” which translates accurately into “I, the worst of all women” (not just “I, the worst of all,” as it has typically been translated). In the document, she confesses to having “lived in religion not only without religion, but worse than a pagan” (de la Cruz 1700, 130; translation by Alicia Gaspar de Alba). The renewal of vows as a sister in the Holy Family of Church and Crown was a rite of passage that all the cloistered nuns in the Convent of the Hieronymite Order had to undergo during their twenty-fifth anniversary, or silver jubilee.

In 1694, fourteen months before her death and five years after the publication in Spain of her first book of compiled works (followed by a second edition, as well as a second volume), Sor Juana stabbed her sharp quill into the inside of her wrist and signed her name to the convent’s Book of Professions in her own blood, giving herself the epithet, “yo, la peor de todas”—“I, the worst of all,” that is, the worst nun, the worst woman in the world. Using the “worst” as a way of describing her behavior as a nun and a criolla (a “Creole” or a Spaniard born in New Spain, the racial caste with the most privilege in colonial Latin America), Sor Juana admits in La respuesta that she elected to join the convent because she felt “a total antipathy toward marriage,” and thought the cloister would be “the least unsuitable and most honorable” place in which to “insure [her] salvation” (de la Cruz 1997, 17), as well as a place where she would have a cell of her own to study and write.

A master of rhetoric and double entendre, Sor Juana’s self-inflected “worst of all women/all nuns” epithet situates her within both the private world of the cloister and the public world of authorship—both spheres intersected by the religious rules that circumscribed her female body, rules that she defied to the bitter end. It is this defiance that she deems as “living without religion,” without rules, without limits, and in her mind as a “pagan.” Thus, she can only be the worst of all nuns and all women. Sor Juana was not only confessing her “sins”—pride rather than humility, rebellion rather than obedience, passion rather than chastity, and pagan rather than Christian beliefs—but also, and more significantly, she inscribed her female body’s difference in her own blood.

It was because Sor Juana recognized that she had, perhaps, gone too far in pushing the boundaries of her sex and her vocation that she signed her name in blood to renew her religious vows in 1694. As part of her entrapment by the bishop of Puebla and the archbishop of Mexico, with her own father confessor, Padre Antonio Nuñez de Miranda, in his role as censor of the Holy Office serving as pawn of the bishops, Sor Juana was required to offer a public confession before the Holy Inquisition. It was not enough that, in both La respuesta and the penitential documents she wrote in 1694, she “confessed” every egregious sin she had committed against the rule since she entered religious life. There had to be a public humiliation, as well as a total dispossession of everything that had given meaning to her life: all her writing instruments were impounded, she was forbidden from corresponding with the world, and her massive library of books and instruments (both musical and scientific) was taken and sold by the archbishop, the proceeds going to the poor, by way of the archiepiscopal coffers. In an act that can be read as either capitulation or self-orchestrated sacrifice, or as her last act of rebellion against the oppressive mandates of the Holy Office of the Mexican Inquisition, Sor Juana threw herself into the care of her terminally ill sisters in the convent. Abandoning all caution against infection, she soon contracted typhus during an epidemic that for months had been ravaging the convents and religious houses of Mexico. On 5 April 1695, a year after she had renewed her vows in blood, Sor Juana succumbed to the disease.

Scholarly Interpretations of Sor Juana's Sexuality

Male and female scholars from all over the world, but most notably the Mexican Nobel laureate Octavio Paz (1914–1998), have gone to great lengths to deny Sor Juana’s “Sapphic tendencies” (Paz 1988, 217) or masculine qualities (i.e., her lesbianism), arguing that “it is futile to try to learn what her true sexual feelings were. She herself did not know” (Paz 1988, 111). Calling her lesbianism everything from a hormonal imbalance to penis envy to “an excess of libido” (Paz 1988, 217) expressing itself as a platonic relationship with La Condesa, to a complex web of repressed emotions made even more complicated by what Paz sees as Sor Juana’s own shame over her illegitimacy, Paz’s massive tome Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz, o, Las trampas de la fé (1982; Sor Juana, or, The Traps of Faith [1988]) constructs Sor Juana as a highly intelligent, socially astute, erotically naive cloistered nun who became a celebrity in her own lifetime, but who was also relentlessly persecuted and finally ensnared in the political intrigues and gender-normative constraints of the colonial church and state.

For Paz, Sor Juana’s tragic flaw was that “she wanted to become like a man [and her inability to do so, then] turns her against men, [hence, she] defends women, and anticipates modern feminism” (Paz 1988, 112). Because “Sor Juana lived among erotic shadows,” he argues, “her poems reveal ... that she was a true melancholic ... [filled with] an internal emptiness” and Freudian “grief [over] the loss of a desired object” (Paz 1988, 216, 217). Thus, while Paz recognizes the depth of passion (albeit “chaste”) that exists in Sor Juana’s love poetry to the two vicereines, particularly La Condesa, his heteronormative mind can only associate desire for a woman as a masculine prerogative; in his view, only men can desire women. If a woman desires another woman, according to Paz (and others), she wants to be like a man. The occluded lesbian in this equation is the veiled subjectivity that Alicia Gaspar de Alba undresses in the historical novel Sor Juana’s Second Dream (1999).

It was not, as Paz believes, because she hated men that Sor Juana defended women, but rather because, as a woman, a poet, and a scholar, living at a time when it was deemed anomalous for a nun to have a public reputation as a scholar and a poet, Sor Juana was defending herself from the virulent misogyny of a colonial hierarchy that included every form of domination, but particularly those based on race, class, and gender. Throughout her life, right up until renewing her vows in blood in 1694, Sor Juana employed her quill, her wit, and her knowledge to challenge male double standards and advocate for a woman's right to learn, study, and publish. Although she endured constant harassment from the Catholic Church for her defiance, nothing stopped her from producing (and publishing) a body of work that both freed and condemned her in seventeenth-century New Spain, a legacy that, in the twentieth century, the Mexican nation, as well as scholars of the Iberian Golden Age, proudly claim as their own. Sor Juana’s image on the Mexican 200-peso note, quill in hand against a backdrop of books, suggests what it is about Sor Juana that we should remember and pay homage to: her intellect, her dedication to learning, and her writing. Divorced from her own body, or, as she says in the very last poem that was found among her papers after her death, “diverse from [herself],” she exists in our imaginations and representations as anything we want her to be.

Cinematic and Literary Portrayals

Sor Juana's is such a compelling story that it is difficult to understand why there have been so few visual, celluloid, and literary representations of her work in Mexico, Spain, or other Latin American countries. In English, aside from a few stories and poems that have Sor Juana at the center of the work, there are two novels about the Mexican Tenth Muse: Gaspar de Alba’s novel, Sor Juana’s Second Dream (1999), a lesbian interpretation of Sor Juana based on the author’s own queer reading of her erotic poetry and personal papers; and Canadian writer Paul Anderson’s massive (and somewhat appropriative) Hunger’s Brides (2004), in which Sor Juana’s lesbianism is voyeurized but never averred. In Spanish, prior to Paz’s 1982 tome, and even to Rosario Castellanos’s writings on Sor Juana, Televisa produced a black-and-white, one-season telenovela titled Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz in 1962.

The Netflix Series Juana Inés There would not be another televised Sor Juana until more than fifty years later, with Netflix’s Juana Inés (2016). Created by Patricia Arriaga-Jordán, the seven-episode miniseries shows the life of the woman inside the habit (hence the title Juana Inés, rather than the better-known Sor Juana). Told in flashbacks from the point of view of a delirious older Sor Juana on her deathbed, the story begins with her teenage years as a lady-in-waiting at the viceregal palace, during which she consistently proves her brilliance and rebelliousness, even as she does her best to avoid the attentions of the vicereine, La Marquesa de Mancera, portrayed in the series as a deranged pedophile who insists on touching and being touched by Juana Inés in inappropriate ways.

The Juana Inés of this part of the series, played by Arantza Ruiz, is young, sassy, and heterosexual; she falls in love with a gentleman of the court, who asks her to marry him until he discovers her illegitimacy and then must take back his ring and proposal. According to the strict racial and moral codes of colonial New Spain, her illegitimacy cancels out her status as a criolla, which ruins her chances of ever finding a good (read, criollo, or upper-class) husband. Rejected by her suitor, Juana Inés decides to leave the palace and become a nun, where at least she can devote herself to her books and letters.
The court’s father confessor, Padre Antonio Nuñez de Miranda, places her in the ascetic order of Discalced Carmelites, where she endures three months of torture and humiliation before being rescued by La Marquesa and returned to the palace to heal. The following year, Juana Inés, having taken the religious name of Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz, chooses to profess in a milder order, and enters the cloister of the Convent of Santa Paula of the Order of Saint Jerome.

The series’ older, wiser, and more tormented Sor Juana, played adroitly by Mexican actress Arcelia Ramírez, shifts between the delirium of her sickbed that racks her mind with painful memories and her body with the ecstasies she shared with La Condesa. Sought after by noblemen and clergy alike who long to participate in the literary salons she hosts in the convent’s receiving room, Sor Juana enjoys privileges that none of her other sisters in the convent gets to experience. Housing the court’s favorite clearly benefits the convent in material ways, but her rising popularity and entourage of guests greatly displease her mother superior and father confessor, and raise the suspicions of the new archbishop of Mexico, Francisco de Aguiar y Seijas, a zealous misogynist whose sole mission is to rid New Spain of the debaucheries of women. Finding a kindred spirit in the new vicereine, María Luisa Manrique de Lara, La Condesa de Paredes, and feeling more secure in her influence and sensuality, Sor Juana begins to experience physical desire for La Condesa, and the feeling is mutual. Because of the power invested in her as vicereine, the story intimates, La Condesa is allowed to visit Sor Juana privately in the nun’s cell (without supervision from the convent’s mother superior), where their erotic encounters are openly portrayed on the screen. Indeed, the Netflix website describes the plot as “Juana Inés de la Cruz, a powerful feminist nun involved in a forbidden love affair with a woman, faces oppression in 17th-century Mexico.” This is a far cry from the representation of their clandestine love affair in the only feature film on Sor Juana, Yo, la peor de todas (1990).

María Luisa Bemberg’s film Yo, la peor de todas María Luisa Bemberg’s film Yo, la peor de todas (I, the Worst of All) was shot entirely inside a dark convent to intensify the claustrophobic environment in which Sor Juana lived, aptly capturing the push and pull between light and darkness, or rather, reason and passion, that her critics and biographers say was the driving force of Sor Juana’s life. The film also depicts Sor Juana’s battles with the leadership of the convent and the male clergy who futilely tried to control her genius. Interestingly, although Yo, la peor de todas opens with a quotation from Paz’s book on Sor Juana, the film itself contradicts Paz’s homophobic reading, and instead depicts a brilliant, energetic, and at times arrogant Sor Juana (played by Assumpta Serna), who is clearly aroused by and in love with La Condesa de Paredes (Dominique Sanda). The intimacies shared by Sor Juana and La Condesa in the film are limited to coy glances, double entendres, and even power struggles between the two women, but their common ground is a love of books and La Condesa’s desire to take Sor Juana’s writings with her when she returns to Spain so that she can have them published. At no point does Bemberg’s film represent what Sor Juana and La Condesa felt for each other as simply a “Platonic love-friendship” (Paz 1988, 217). The one expressly erotic scene in the film shows Sor Juana unlacing the pregnant vicereine’s corset in Sor Juana’s booklined cell; this is as much “lesbian passion seething behind convent walls” (Sherman 1994, 59) as the film offers.

As La Condesa tells Juana in Yo, la peor de todas, the two of them live similar lives, though Sor Juana wears a monastic veil and La Condesa a viceregal crown. In both the convent and the palace, La Condesa asserts, each one is tied to the normative behaviors and choices of her station in life. Each one is cloistered in her own gender and class, and at twenty years of age, became either a bride of Christ or a count’s wife. For each of them, their world is small and socially constructed to erase their free will. La Condesa’s publication of Sor Juana’s work, then, like Sor Juana’s own life and death, are acts of resistance to Catholic patriarchal conscriptions of their womanhood.

With the celebrity granted her by her published volumes, Sor Juana knew her words, her ideas, her wisdom would live on, even when her body lay in the ground. In an unfinished poem where she declares herself a product of someone else’s interpretation, she writes, “I am not the one you think. / Your Old World quills have given me / another life, breathed another spirit into me, / and diverse from myself, I exist between your plumes, / not as I am, but as you have wanted to imagine me” (de la Cruz 1997, 73–74; translation by Alicia Gaspar de Alba).

Legacy of a Woman’s Genius In the essays “The Politics of Location of La Décima Musa” and “The Sor Juana Chronicles” that appear in her 2014 book [Un]Framing the “Bad Woman,” Gaspar de Alba argues that, despite how Sor Juana may have been embraced in the nineteenth-century nation-building campaigns of Mexico, during her seventeenth-century lifetime, she was constantly persecuted, punished, berated, ridiculed, and ultimately suppressed by the church powers for being a “bad” nun and a “bad” woman, that is, for refusing to adhere to the dictates of the day regarding the female gender, especially in religion. Remonstrated by her mother superior, her father confessor, her sisters in religion, the bishop of Puebla, and the archbishop of Mexico, and with her writing and visitation privileges curtailed, her quills confiscated, her books expurgated against the Index of Banned Books, Sor Juana eventually succumbed to her bleak fate as a silent “daughter of the Church,” as she was described in her childhood register.

Rebel with a cause that she was, however, Sor Juana managed to leave behind a legacy of a woman’s genius in the face of insurmountable opposition, a story that has prevailed across cultures and centuries through her writings, and through the twenty-first-century embodiments of Sor Juana by scholars, poets, novelists, playwrights, directors, and composers—many of them queer. Her life retold in biographies, novels, poems, and plays, Sor Juana’s twenty-first-century incarnation reenters the imaginary sphere in a Netflix miniseries, a children’s book (Clinton 2018), several stage plays, an opera, and an upcoming feature film (the last two based on Sor Juana’s Second Dream).
SEE ALSO Confessional Manuals in Colonial Latin America; Erauso, Catalina de (1592–1650); Inquisition, Criminal Courts, and Sexuality in Colonial Latin America de la Cruz, Sor Juana Inés. Inundación castálida de la única poetisa, musa décima, Soror Juana Inés de la Cruz, Religiosa profesa en el Monasterio de San Gerónimo de la Imperial Ciudad de México: Que en varios metros, idiomas y estilos fertiliza varios assumptos; con elegantes, sutiles, claros, ingeniosos, útiles versos para enseñanza, recreo y admiración. Madrid: Juan García Infanzón, 1689.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

de la Cruz, Sor Juana Inés. “Petición que en forma causídica presenta al Tribunal Divino la Madre Juana Inés de la Cruz, por impetrar perdón de sus culpas.” In Fama y obras póstumas del Fénix de México, décima musa y poetisa americana, Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz. Madrid: Ruiz de Murga, 1700.

FILMOGRAPHY

Bemberg, Maria Luisa, dir. Yo, la peor de todas. GEA Cinematográfica, 1990. English title: I, the Worst of All.
Despite progressive provisions in the 1996 South African Constitution that grant equal rights to citizens and prohibit discrimination on the basis of race, gender, sex, pregnancy, marital status, ethnic or social origin, color, sexual orientation, age, disability, religion, conscience, belief, culture, language, and birth, individuals who claim same-sex sexual identities in South Africa continue to face daily and varying forms of discrimination designed to render them invisible and unwanted. The toxic mix of culture and religion, inherited through imperial colonialism, produces violent forms of resistance against practices deemed to be “unAfrican,” “unChristian,” and “unnatural.” However, this does not mean that the context is simply riddled with corrupt forms of homophobia and discrimination against same-sex–desiring individuals. The intersection of patriarchy, communalism, colonialism, and the legacy of apartheid produces a much more complex picture, where a single narrative of discrimination is an inaccurate depiction of how same-sex sexuality is experienced in the context. This entry argues that the South African experience of same-sex desire is dependent on individual experience, informed by intersecting identity markers, as opposed to a global, all-encompassing narrative of victimhood. The context presents, at best, what can be characterized as curtailed freedoms; that is, freedoms that are regulated, defined, and constrained through cultural and religious frames. This is best understood through an exploration of the role of religion and culture in shaping the experiences and understandings of sexualities in Africa during the colonialism and apartheid eras, and the strategic articulations (Grossberg 1996) that were enabled when a new constitution, premised on equality, was adopted at the collapse of apartheid.

This entry begins by unpacking the historical understandings of same-sex desire in South Africa prior to colonialism. It then proceeds to discuss documented experiences of same-sex desire during the colonialism and apartheid periods, with the aim of exploring the ways sexuality was brought under the control of the state. The third section discusses the strategic articulation of the equality clause extending beyond race to include sexuality at the collapse of apartheid, and some of the reasons for the continued discrimination against individuals who engage in same-sex relations in postapartheid South Africa. The fourth section showcases some of the enabling forces in South Africa that have made struggles around sexual orientation and gender diversity more visible and accepted in the public space. The final section explores future possibilities pertaining to gender diversity and sexual orientation in South Africa. Through these five parts, this entry presents a complex image that suggests a mix of experiences when it comes to same-sex issues and argues for the need to move beyond identity labels to address homophobic discrimination in South Africa.

Same-Sex Desire as African: Precolonial Exploration

Any exploration of same-sex desire in South Africa cannot occur outside an understanding of a context deeply riddled with a history of racial oppression and inequality. Equally, it also cannot occur outside an understanding of the force of imperial power that attempted to redefine and perhaps erase the African experience through processes of psychological colonization, with the aim of buttressing ideas about white superiority over the uncivilized native. Therefore, in order to understand current practices and understandings of same-sex desire, it is important to understand certain historical processes that enabled current understandings and practices.

From a historical point of view, as evidenced by Marc Epprecht's pioneering analysis of same-sex practices in Africa from the precolonial to the contemporary period, it can be argued that while same-sex desire in Africa was not openly welcomed, there was a degree of tolerance, enabled by existent local cultural practices designed to protect both the individuals who pursued same-sex desire and their families. Homosexual practices in Africa thus predate colonialism. However, these practices were strategically erased by imperial politics of racial superiority, which presented African societies as primitive and thus in need of European civilization. Brenna Munro, writing about the history of same-sex sexuality struggles in South Africa, notes that > homosexuality in Africa is bound up with a contradictory modernity that has been produced both within and against imperialism.... Europe's "civilizing mission" constituted itself through attempts to eradicate indigenous social formations that were deemed deviant, from polygamy to "female husbands," all while unruly new sexual cultures were being forged in the cities, industries, and institutions of a changing Africa.

(2012, XIII)

In focusing on these competing and contradictory discourses, this entry demonstrates that it is European and missionary homophobia that was imported into Africa, not homosexuality (Ndijo 2013).

Same-sex sexual engagements in Africa are not a European imposition, as some African leaders have argued. Evidence of precolonial same-sex practices includes paintings by early Bushmen that depict men engaged in what appears to be same-sex sexual acts (see Epprecht 2004). Equally, there is anecdotal research suggesting that African society in southern Africa found strategic accommodations with same-sex sexuality prior to colonialism through existing social norms. For example, if a young man was suspected of being interested in other men, his family would make arrangements with a woman to marry him in order to maintain the family’s respectability in the community. In this arrangement, they would be married in public only, while in private the wife would be having sex with the man’s brother. Therefore, same-sex desire would not be on display in public, but in private, family members would know of the arrangement and make accommodations. Similarly, in acknowledgment of an opposite-sex ancestral spirit among some women, particularly sangomas (traditional healers), such women were able to pursue same-sex desire. For example, Nkunzi Nkabinde and Ruth Morgan (2006) show that there were (and still are) traditional and institutionalized ways in which sangomas could obtain ancestral wives (unyankwabe), with the full public knowledge and appreciation of local subjects. Simply, these women sangomas were seen to be possessed by dominant male spirits and therefore were allowed to have wives (see also Reid 2003). These arrangements were similar to those for certain Native American identities, such as Two-Spirit.

This brief discussion posits simply that same-sex practices in traditional, precolonial societies were neither celebrated nor frowned upon. Certain culturally sanctioned accommodation processes were established in line with local norms. While of course these examples do not represent a global, all-encompassing analysis of experiences across all cultural groups in South Africa, they nevertheless give an indication of the various accommodations that existed. (For a more elaborate discussion of these accommodations, see Msibi 2011, 2018.)

Colonialism and Apartheid

First, it is important to provide a brief history of the foreign occupation of South Africa through colonialism. The colonization of South Africa began with the arrival in 1652 of Jan van Riebeeck (1619-1677). The Dutch were primarily concerned with obtaining spices and other produce not available in Europe from the Indonesian archipelago. They thus established a fueling station in what is now known as Cape Town in South Africa to supply sailors with fresh produce during their dangerous missions from Europe to the East. The Cape Colony of the Dutch East India Company was established under the command of van Riebeeck. To amass land and resources, and also to provide free labor for the Cape Colony, van Riebeeck and his team adopted a strategy of slavery and forced labor. This early colonization by the Dutch continued until 1795, when the British Empire became the country's new colonial masters. For centuries that followed, wars and conflicts between the descendants of the Dutch, German, and French Huguenot settlers (known as the Boers or Afrikaners) and the British persisted, with each side claiming control over expanding territories at different times. The discovery of diamonds and gold only heightened the existing tensions, with local people being used as cheap labor at the receiving end of violence and subjugation.

The hostilities between the Afrikaner and the British settlers reached a boiling point in the Anglo-Boer war in 1899, when each warring side presided over two self-governing states within South Africa: the Cape and Natal for the British, and the Transvaal and Orange Free State for the Dutch. By the end of the war, the Dutch (Afrikaners) had been defeated, and a new Union of South Africa came into effect in 1910. This union was active until 1961, when South Africa became a republic. The National Party had already assumed power in 1948, and it heightened the exclusionary and discriminatory laws that treated Africans as second-class citizens in their own land. Through apartheid, a strategic and deliberate system of institutionalized disenfranchisement of black people through “separate development,” racial purity and white supremacy ideals were advanced. It was also at this stage that the state became powerfully involved in the regulation of sex and people's bodies. Apartheid came to an end officially only in 1994, when a new democratic government was elected.

At the very heart of colonialism was an imperial strategy of rendering local subjects as uncivilized while simultaneously extracting raw materials for significant economic gains, both for those who were settling in the region and of course for the colonizing state. It was not surprising, then, that the missionary exercise and strategy were driven by the desire to position local practices as abhorrent while presenting Christianity as civilized. Xolela Mangcu (2010) has written prolifically on this topic, noting that this arrival led to tensions between the native amakholwa (believers and civilized) and amaqaba (heathens and continuing with local customary practices). Africans were required to relinquish their “uncivilized” practices and to move to the more modern, civilized space of Christianity. Christians were formally educated and taught Western ways of being, and African practices were seen as backward and unsophisticated.

In terms of sex, Mark Hunter notes that “sex became formative of, as well as viewed through, this new register. According to missionaries, to be civilized required rejecting ‘lewd’ practices of ‘sex’ and embracing Christian virtues of self-restraint and sexual prudery” (2010, 57). Same-sex sexual practices therefore could never be accommodated, as they represented what was most reviled and rejected by society. It was under colonial rule, with ideological backing from Christianity, that penal codes were introduced in the laws of African nations (even beyond South Africa) making “sodomy” illegal. As early as 1735, the Dutch executed a young Khoi man, Klaas Bank, for having sex with another man. Immediately after their arrival in the Cape, the Dutch introduced very strict laws against same-sex sexual acts between men, informed strongly by their Christian faith. Similar attitudes toward same-sex relations prevailed in British thinking, as well as negative attitudes toward “racial mixing.” For example, after the formation of the Union, the Immorality Act, which prohibited sexual engagements between Africans and Europeans, was introduced in 1927. This was followed by the Prohibition of Mixed Marriage Act in 1949, immediately after the nationalist government came into power. In 1950 the Immorality Act was expanded to criminalize sex between any different racial groups. This was followed in 1957 by another amendment directed at same-sex--desiring white men (see Weeks 1981), prohibiting “immoral and unnatural sexual acts.” In the wake of a national scandal after a raid on a party with 300 men in attendance, the government once more amended the Immorality Act in 1969, adding sections on “crimes against nature” that prohibited men from having any sexual contact with each other or engaging in any acts that may lead to sexual gratification at a party, which was defined as “any occasion where more than two persons are present” (see Munro 2012, xxiii). Mark Gevisser (1995) notes that these laws were designed to erase same-sex desire from public view.

The colonial desire to amass riches in South Africa through the establishment of mines, mostly located in the northern parts of the country, led to new configurations of same-sex practices among African people. Epprecht's (2001, 2004) account of same-sex sexual practices in the mines presents a compelling picture of the various ways same-sex desire came to be accommodated by African men. While some have argued that these same-sex sexual practices were largely coping and economic survival strategies for men forced to leave their wives in the villages to work in the mines, the documented accounts of mine marriages (inkotshane) between older men and younger men shatter any idea of a “pure” Africa with no same-sex relations. The issue of men engaged in same-sex sexual practices was so concerning for the authorities that a commission of inquiry was launched in 1907 to look into the matter (Epprecht 2001). The “unnatural practices” initially had been blamed on the Chinese who had been brought in to work at the mines. The findings from the initial investigations by the mine authorities (prior to the establishment of the commission) concluded that the majority of the Chinese men were “moral” and put the blame on a small group who were subsequently deported. However, a missionary, the Reverend Baker, was not convinced, arguing that these practices had been present before the arrival of the Chinese. The commission that was then established concluded that the inkotshane practice was well known among the men in the mines and appeared to be confined to men coming from Portuguese territory (modern-day Mozambique) (see Epprecht 2001). While this conclusion should be viewed within the broader context of colonial treatment of African sexuality and homosexuality as disparate and abnormal, evidence that these African men were having thigh sex (nonpenetrative sex that involves the insertion of the penis between the thighs of the “receiving” partner) with each other is adequate to dispel the myth that African men did not engage in same-sex sexual practices. There are other examples of same-sex male intimacy, such as the marriages in Mkhumbane, an informal settlement in Durban (see Hunter 2010; Louw 2001) in the South African province of KwaZulu-Natal.
Following on the colonial governments that sought to erase same-sex desire and render it outside the space of white liberal English civility, the apartheid government worked to contain not only same-sex desire but all forms of desire deemed to be in opposition to white purity. With the Sexual Offences Act of 1957 (a continuation and strengthening of the Immorality Act of 1927), consensual sexual relations among individuals from different racial groups were completely prohibited. Same-sex relations between white men were also prohibited; interestingly, the ban was not extended to women. Gevisser (1995) notes that many of the legislative prohibitions emanating from the apartheid government were never quite enforced by the apartheid state, and that as early as the 1950s, a thriving gay subculture existed in various spaces of white South Africa. During World War II, sailors and soldiers encamped in various parts of the country and in need of entertainment were courted in “cruising” spaces frequented by men seeking to have sexual relations with other men, including restaurants, bathing spots, and certain bars. Sex between young white Afrikaner working-class men and older, middle-class white men was a frequent occurrence in spaces such as café-bios, or “ordinary cinemas where you could eat, smoke, and have it off while watching a movie” (quoted in Gevisser 1995, 26). White women also had thriving lesbian subcultures where they met in homes to engage sexually. Gay neighborhoods such as Atlantic Seaboard, Sea Point, and Bantry Bay also had flourishing gay and lesbian cultures. These “queer” spaces included “coloured” spaces, such as District Six, where same-sex–identifying men participated in drag shows and even had their own sporting teams, such as the District Six netball team.

Given that it was public same-sex acts that were outlawed, white South African same-sex–desiring citizens continued to enjoy relative freedom by engaging in same-sex relations in private spaces. However, these freedoms came to a halt when the police raided a party of 300 men in Forest Town in 1966. The newspaper headlines screamed of national disgrace, causing a sex panic and triggering the apartheid government to propose new draconian legislative amendments to the Immorality Act. These amendments would essentially outlaw same-sex desire, even in private, and proposed to include women for the first time. Gevisser (1995) argues that fear of the repercussions from the antihomosexuality legislation led to the formation of the first real “movement” against same-sex discrimination with the launch of the Homosexual Land Reform Fund, euphemistically known as the “Law Reform.” The Law Reform grouping was successful in curbing some of the outlandish amendments to the Immorality Act proposed by Minister of Justice P. C. Pelser, but three amendments were finalized: first, the age of consent was extended from sixteen to nineteen for male same-sex acts; second, dildos were banned; and third, the “men at a party” clause was added.

Following these amendments and the relative success of the Law Reform team, several organizations were launched in the 1970s and 1980s as gay culture became more entrenched. Gevisser argues that the movement of South African white men to the United States and Europe enabled the transnational exchange of gay cultures into the South African scene. Clubs and bars thrived, and gay men's support networks (built on parties, not politics) emerged. Organizations such as Gay Aid Identification Development and Enrichment (GAIDE) offered support for same-sex–desiring white people in South Africa. The first national organization to advance gay politics, the Gay Association of South Africa (GASA), was also launched. GASA's stated raison d'être was to advance gay liberation by being apolitical. Thus, they failed to engage in any material way with the oppression and subjugation of black people at the height of apartheid brutality, which resulted in their suspension from international gay and lesbian organizations. As Gevisser's (1995) historical account shows, the disdain shown by middle-class white men toward black gay activists during GASA's existence was one of the main reasons for its failure (in addition to the general mismanagement of the organization). GASA's failure to deal with the issue of race—and its decision to limit the number of black members that could be admitted to the organization—resulted in the formation of the Saturday Group in 1984 by black activist Simon Nkoli (1957–1998). Unsurprisingly, when Nkoli was arrested in the same year for leading a rent boycott demonstration in his township of Sebokeng, GASA sought to distance itself from him. Judging from Nkoli's writings at the time, as captured by Gevisser (1995), the gay liberation movement in South Africa only served to peddle white gay middle-class interests without ever challenging the machinery of the apartheid state. As such, it can be fairly argued that the gay liberation movements, particularly in the 1970s and 1980s, protected white interests only, thus colluding with the apartheid and colonial agenda. It was only in the era of HIV and AIDS—and mainly because white gay men were also affected—that strategies driven by social justice were adopted.

The Postapartheid Paradox: Constrained Freedoms

When South Africa dismantled its system of apartheid in 1994 under intense pressure from international and domestic actors, activists moved to strategically articulate the equality clause in the South African constitution to include not just race but also gender and sexual orientation. Some of these activists, including Nkoli, who was imprisoned during the apartheid period, assisted in formulating a progressive, inclusive constitution. Unfortunately, these strategic articulations enabled traditional, conservative Africanists to claim equal rights in rejecting same-sex desire, resulting in a complicated narrative emanating from the South African government.

BEV DITSIE (1971–)

Beverley Palesa Ditsie, known as Bev Ditsie, is a gay and lesbian rights activist, writer, and filmmaker. Raised by her grandmother, who worked as a domestic servant, and her actor-singer mother, Eaglet Ditsie, Bev grew up under the yoke of apartheid as a self-described “Soweto tomboy.” Coming to terms with the radical potential of her dissident sexual identity at a young age, Ditsie was still a teenager when, in April 1988, she became a founding member of the multiracial and explicitly anti-racist Gay and Lesbian Organisation of the Witwatersrand (GLOW). Befriended and mentored by the well-known gay rights and antiapartheid activist Simon Tseko Nkoli (1957–1998), Ditsie became an organizer and activist who articulated the injustices and marginalization faced specifically by black lesbians in South Africa. Along with GLOW being a site for Ditsie’s early activism, Ditsie described her finding community in GLOW as coming home. In 1990 she was part of a cadre of GLOW activists who organized the first gay and lesbian pride march on the African continent, in Johannesburg, South Africa.

After identifying openly as a lesbian on a television news report covering the march, she was forced to contend with an onslaught of threats on her life and autonomy. Despite the threats of violence she faced, Ditsie’s appearances on South African television are remembered as watershed moments that inspired many lesbians in the country to embrace their sexual identity in the public sphere.

During the South African transition to democracy in early 1990s, Ditsie’s work centered on sustaining a politics of visibility for black gay and lesbian people’s full inclusion in the new South Africa. Ditsie used print media to share her thoughts on justice for gays and lesbians and the racial politics within the LGBT community, sharing her perspectives in the column “Bev’s Beat,” which was published in the glossy gay and lesbian magazine Outright in the mid-1990s. As a representative of GLOW, Ditsie traveled extensively to mobilize support for gay and lesbian rights in South Africa and beyond. Successfully working to strengthen ties within an increasingly global LGBT network, Ditsie was honored in 1994 by the San Francisco proclamation of 5 July as Simon Nkoli and Bev Ditsie Day. On 13 September 1995, at the Fourth World Conference on Women in Beijing, Ditsie became the first openly lesbian-identified person to address the United Nations. In an uncompromising and brave speech asserting that lesbian rights are women’s rights, Ditsie challenged the silencing of lesbians and sexual minorities within the emerging transnational feminist movement. Along with gay and lesbian rights organizing, Ditsie also led safe sex and sexual empowerment workshops for lesbians and other women living with AIDS.

Frustrated by what she saw as the lack of support for lesbian issues within the organization, Ditsie left GLOW in 1996. Thereafter, she focused primarily on film as a vehicle for activism and social change. She, along with codirector Nicky Newman, released the documentary film Simon and I in 2002. Chronicling her development as an activist and her complex friendship with Nkoli, the film is a memory project documenting the formation of GLOW and the tireless contributions made by Nkoli, who died of HIV-related illness in 1998. Ditsie also worked as a director in the South African television industry, developing variety, educational, and reality programming. In 2017 Ditsie released a full-length documentary titled The Commission: From Silence

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Z’étoile Imma

Assistant Professor, English and Africana Studies

Tulane University, New Orleans, LA

Essentially, the top-down approach in introducing a bill of rights for the new nation without fully engaging at the grassroots level (although Munro [2012] argues that there was active consultation at grassroots level) has meant that circulating homophobic discourses remain in force, even among government officials. For instance, former South African president Jacob Zuma (1942–) recorded his displeasure with same-sex marriage by saying that when he was younger he would have beaten a gay man. In 2010 a former minister for arts and culture, Lulu Xingwana (1955–), walked out of an exhibition by world-renowned artist Zanele Muholi (1972–), declaring that the depiction of same-sex desire among women was against the values of nation-building. In 2016 there was great surprise when South Africa, one of the first countries to legalize same-sex marriage and offer constitutional protections on the basis of sexual orientation, voted against the United Nations’ resolution Protection against Violence and Discrimination Based on Sexual Orientation and Gender Identity. In 2017 a deputy minister, Mduduzi Manana (1984–), was forced to resign from government after assaulting a woman who had allegedly called him gay in a nightclub. Hande Eslen-Ziya and colleagues (2015) suggest that this is a “paradox” emerging from the interests of the South African political elites who sought to present South Africa as progressive once apartheid had collapsed, and utilized the constitution as evidence.
Despite the constitutional provisions, harrowing newspaper headlines indicate that South African black lesbian women, predominantly based in townships, have been raped and murdered in alarming numbers. One of the participants in a study conducted by Amanda Lock Swarr stated, “I thought he was going to kill me; he was like an animal. And he kept saying, ‘I know you are a lesbian. You are not a man, you think you are, but I am going to show you, you are a woman. I am going to make you pregnant. I am going to kill you’” (2012, 961). These crimes have been theorized as an outcome of the bruised masculinity of African men, which was wounded during apartheid and continues to be wounded postapartheid due to poverty and a lack of employment opportunities (see Swarr 2012). It is not only women who experience this violence; men who claim same-sex sexual identities are also targeted. Gay men have been identified as being at risk of violence and attack, particularly in rural communities.

It would be easy to assume that South African homophobia is primarily black and rural, but this is too simplistic a reading. The complexity of the South African space, together with its history, makes it challenging to offer a universal account of the same-sex experience. For example, the modalities of homophobia vary if one is a white working-class transgender woman or a black middle-class cisgender (i.e., one whose gender identity corresponds to the identified sex at birth) man. Homophobia is influenced powerfully by class and gender, and context, too, often defines the experience. A study of black male teachers who engage in same-sex relations and are based in rural and township contexts (Msibi 2018) found that the teachers’ experiences of homophobia were limited, mainly because they had the economic means to define and control the agenda at home, in their churches, and in their professional work spaces. It was clear, however, that without the money and professional standing, these teachers would be subjected to homophobia on a daily basis. Urban spaces such as Cape Town have been shown to offer greater visibility for same-sex–desiring individuals, but again here, both race and class define those experiences (see Tucker 2009). While many studies in South Africa focus on black subjects when studying same-sex issues, work by Renée DePalma and Dennis Francis (2014) at primary and secondary schools has shown that homophobia also affects white, liberal middle-class spaces, often taking more covert forms as opposed to the overt violence seen in other spaces (see also Bhana 2015). Novels by South Africans have also long brought this issue to light (see Munro 2012 for an exploration of these novels). What becomes clear from the literature on same-sex desire and the South African experience is the particularity of each individual experience and context. In some South African township spaces, for instance, being black and openly gay is not received with the same vitriolic, violent response found in some other spaces. Simply put, South African experience of same-sex desire is largely shaped by race, gender, sex, class, and context; at the intersection of these markers rests the complex relationship of the individual with the community. Thus, experiences will vary from one individual to the next.

Queer Visibility and Opportunity
While the harrowing stories of rape and murder present an image of queer identity under siege, the reality is that experiences of same-sex desire in South Africa are characterized paradoxically by both freedom and constraint. In recent years, an emerging queer visibility has taken shape, particularly in the more urban spaces, including rural areas. Historically, asserting a gay or lesbian identity has been frowned upon, but gradual shifts in public sentiment have meant greater opportunities and recognition for individuals who claim same-sex sexual identities, and therefore an increasing number of individuals are doing so. At the heart of this progress are three forces: constitutionalism as expressed via the legal system, the media, and globalization.

INXEBA (2017; JOHN TRENGOVE)

Premiering in 2017 and the winner of multiple international awards, this South African film, the title of which translates into English as “the wound,” centers on the secret amaXhosa custom of ulwaluko: initiation with ritual circumcision. During three weeks of isolation and privation in Eastern Cape mountain locales, teenagers (abakhwetha, or “learners”) are instructed in manhood. After cutting, the traditional surgeon shouts “You are a man!” with the initiate replying “Ndiyindoda!” (“I am a man!”).

The movie was inspired by the director John Trengove’s reading of A Man Who Is Not a Man, a 2009 novel by the South African public health researcher Thando Mgqolozana that describes the traumatic experiences of an initiate whose circumcision was botched. Pain and the attendant social stigma of being a “failed man” lead the initiate to reflect on deeper meanings of masculinity. Mgqolozana became a co-scriptwriter for the movie, which was filmed in the Xhosa language.

The film follows Xolani, a lonely, closeted gay factory worker taking youngsters to initiation school. Xolani looks forward to rekindling his romantic liaison with Vija during the initiation period, but their reunion is complicated when Kwanda, an initiate whom Xolani is assigned to mentor, discovers their relationship. Kwanda, himself gay, feels Xolani is a hypocrite for remaining closeted, resulting in escalating tension among the three.

In March 2018 Inxeba won six prizes at the annual South African Film and Television Awards ceremony, including best film, director, screenplay, actor, and supporting actor. Yet what international and national critics recognized as edgy, aesthetically powerful, taboo-breaking gay love, powerful local forces saw as heretical transgressions; they threatened enforced closures of any movie theater that dared to show it. These threats resulted in Inxeba being taken off-circuit in the Eastern Cape.
focus, all reflecting acknowledged fissure lines in South African society and constitutional law. First, who is authorized to comment on secret traditional male initiation ceremonies? In a society influenced by identity politics, commentators asked if even young, “born free” (i.e., postapartheid), first-language Xhosa-speaking women may speak on the matter, much less Trengove, a white South African. Second, why does the film deal with the taboo of homosexuality? Finally, do individual rights to creative freedom triumph over collective rights to preserve the sanctity of traditional customs?

Leading the protest was the African National Congress–aligned Congress of Traditional Leaders of South Africa (CONTRALESA), whose appeal to the national Film and Publication Board (FPB) saw Inxeba’s viewing license raised to that of a pornographic film, despite the film inclusion of neither full sex scenes nor an exposé of ulwaluko secrets. The FPB denied the film’s director and supporting civil society groups the opportunity to represent their side, considering CONTRALESA’s and a supporting civil society group's views as having primacy by representing customary authority. The FPB has been accused in the past of allowing a conservative ideology to influence its actions; in 2017 ousted FPB CEO Themba Wakashe accused the board of pushing him out for being gay. As noted by Charl Blignaut, who covered the story for the City Press, a Johannesburg newspaper, “According to several sources, the FBP is known to house ... a culture of conservative Christianity that does not hold homosexuality in a favourable light” (2017, 5). On 27 June 2018 the North Gauteng High Court restored the FPB’s original viewing license on the grounds of procedural unfairness, while not making any findings on the substantive issues raised by the case.

Initiation schools are now of great public concern. Many schools are bogus. Initiates suffer often irreparable disfigurement and death from botched circumcisions. Some suggest that circumcision should be performed at state hospitals as part of the ritual. Yet, there is a wider crisis of masculinity, reflected in rising levels of gender-based violence, including assault, murder, and rape, and violent homophobia, including “corrective rape” of women “accused” of being lesbian. What exactly are tribal elders currently secretly teaching the abakhwetha, tradition’s new Xhosa men?

BIBLIOGRAPHY

The provisions and protections explicitly articulated in the South African constitution have enabled a greater number of individuals to lay claim to their rights in their day-to-day expressions of identity. While the equality clause offers protections only on paper, and the experiences of individuals who claim same-sex sexual identities have been generally negative, these individuals have been able to appeal to these provisions when under attack or in need of additional protections. For instance, the constitutional provisions of the right to sexual orientation have enabled other legal advances for same-sex–identifying individuals, the repeal of the criminal offense of sodomy (1994); the extension of benefits to permanent residents in same-sex relationships (1999); the extension of adoption rights to individuals who claim same-sex sexual identities (2002); the grant of civil service pension benefits to individuals in same-sex partnerships (2002); and the legalization of same-sex marriage in 2005 (see Klaaren 2005). While access to legal services in South Africa is still raced and classed, meaning that many poor black individuals who engage in same-sex relations are unable to access these services, the general provisions of the constitution mean that the dignity of those who claim same-sex sexual identities is fully protected. Thus, many people are able to publicly claim same-sex sexual identities because increasingly they are not viewed as inherently abhorrent and dirty. This is not to say that these negative beliefs no longer exist; clearly, they still do. But the constitutional provisions have allowed people to question religious and cultural scripts, thus leading to greater freedom and, when desired, visibility.

South African media and novels such as K. Sello Duiker's pioneering The Quiet Violence of Dreams (2001) have played an activist role in normalizing same-sex desire in the public mind. Local soapies (television soap operas) such as Generations (1993–), Isidingo (1998–), Rhythm City (2007–), and Uzalo (2015–) have featured black gay characters who skillfully and positively portray same-sex desire, challenging homophobia. Generations has been particularly groundbreaking in this regard; unlike some soapies that have presented gay characters as excessively and stereotypically feminine, Generations portrayed masculine men involved in same-sex–desiring relationships when the general public still found such ideas palatable. In 2009, when two of the show's characters, Senzo and Jason, shared their first kiss on national television, there were public expressions of outrage and disgust.
One viewer remarked, “If you are gay, it's fine, but don't publicize it because it's disgusting. It's worse than animal behavior. I hate gays. I get goosebumps every time I think of them. My days of watching Generations are numbered” (City Press 2009). There was a similar reaction from some Xhosa men to the sex scenes in Inxeba (2017; The wound), the award-winning film about same-sex desire in an initiation school. The thinking here is simple: same-sex desire is acceptable as long as it stays in the private space of darkness. Visibility requires recognition and acknowledgment of reality; it is this reality that homophobia often seeks to hide. In addition to gay characters, Generations also portrayed transgender characters, including Wandi, whose introduction once again forced the South African public into an uneasy conversation, though unlike Jason and Senzo, Wandi did not inspire virulent homophobia in viewers.

The positive portrayal of same-sex identity in the media has resulted in many “gay” celebrities emerging and being celebrated by many South Africans. Somizi, a celebrity and judge in the local version of the singing competition Idols, has captured the imaginations of many in South Africa, with people from varied backgrounds celebrating his craft and responding warmly to him. Local reality dating shows such as Date My Family and Uyangithandana (Do you love me?) have also featured same-sex–desiring individuals, though these programs tend to rely on an identifiable “gay” or “lesbian” subject, which often serves to concretize existing stereotypes, thus doing little to undermine homophobia in fundamental ways.

Finally, globalization has played an incredibly important role in terms of the transnational borrowing of terms and concepts regarding same-sex desire. Social media has ensured that a greater number of South Africans are able to interact with people in other parts of the world. While being gay or lesbian takes on a particular local South African flavor, the availability of the repertoire of terminologies and concepts has made it possible for many South Africans to name themselves. African societies have always had same-sex practices, but these practices were seen not as identities but rather as acts, or in other contexts, as characteristic of a third gender (see Msibi 2011). The powerful combination of the constitutional provisions, the media, and globalization have enabled greater freedoms and visibility for many same-sex–identifying individuals, thus challenging the perception that South African same-sex experience is exclusively homophobic.

While these positive forces have gone some way toward helping individuals who engage in same-sex relations to enjoy freedoms in South Africa, it goes without saying that HIV/AIDS has presented serious constraints and devastating consequences for South Africans across racial lines. From the first appearance of the HIV virus in South Africa in the 1980s, activists such as Zackie Achmat (1962–) have sought sustainable ways of managing the spread of the virus and fighting off stigma while also offering health care to those infected. Although the transmission rates remain high for men who have sex with other men, with some studies suggesting an HIV-infected population of between 23 and 48 percent, depending on location, successful organizing by the Treatment Action Campaign (TAC) has ensured that antiretroviral treatment is readily available for working-class people, including those in same-sex relationships. The homophobic nature of the society forces many men who have sex with men to hide their HIV status for fear of rejection. Often, if they do attempt to access health-care support, they are pathologized and judged for their sexual identities. Clearly, the postapartheid freedoms are seriously constrained, and this continues to limit the lives of same-sex–desiring people in material ways.

Looking Ahead: Future Possibilities

South Africa has come far since the introduction of the equality clause in the South African constitution in 1996. Significant gains have been and continue to be made for individuals who claim nonnormative sexual identities. These gains survive in the tension-filled space amid pushback from conservative forces that draw on religious and cultural notions of sexual purity. It is clear that the fragility of heteronormativity cannot be sustained via these institutions. Younger South Africans are beginning to chart their own directions, insisting on recognition and acknowledgment. A video of two high school boys sharing a romantic kiss on Valentine’s Day while their peers cheered is a strong indication of these shifts in the public space. Conversations about same-sex desire are happening in schools, in social and communal spaces, and via social media and other public platforms, suggesting that in the long term, the failures in public engagement when the constitution was drafted will likely become inconsequential. The homophobic conflicts and violence witnessed today are happening in a society in transition, and the homophobia experienced by many individuals who engage in same-sex relations is a reflection of the strenuous tensions that exist in the paradox of freedom and constraint facilitated by the equality clause.

What will ultimately define the future of South Africa in terms of sexuality is the degree to which local queer identities develop their own expression, without assimilating and mimicking Western cultures (notwithstanding, of course, globalization). “Coming out of the closet” and publicly claiming gay identities should not be the defining feature of the South African experience. Instead, a pluralistic and malleable understanding that centers identification on fluidity and flux needs to inform South African thinking. The complex history of colonialism, together with traditional African responses to same-sex desire, mandate an approach to sexuality that is deeply appreciative of the complexity of human sexuality, including the complexity of love. Proclaiming an identifiable, recognizable gay and lesbian identity results in continued tensions, many of which are unnecessary; moving away from sexual categories might lead to the creation of a much more inclusive society.

SEE ALSO Activism in Africa South of the Sahara; Cape Town; Cinema, African (Anglophone); Colonialism in Africa South of the Sahara; HIV/AIDS in Africa; Internet in Africa; Nkoli, Simon (1957–1998); Rape, Corrective, in Africa; Refugees and Asylum in Africa; Sports, Women in, Africa

FILMOGRAPHY

The Southern Comfort Conference is an annual convention for transgender and gender-nonconforming (GNC) people and their families. The conference bills itself as “a safe place for LGBT people with a familial atmosphere” and offers seminars, presentations, and workshops by leaders in trans issues, including health professionals, educators, researchers, activists, and public figures (SCC 2018a). In short, the conference seeks to create a sense of community for trans and GNC people nationwide and to provide a space in which members of the community can connect, socialize, and share common experiences. It is the largest convention designed specifically for trans people in the United States.

PHOTO COURTESY OF THE GREATER FORT LAUDERDALE CIB
Banquet Dinner of the 2016 Southern Comfort Conference in Fort Lauderdale, Florida. The Southern Comfort Conference is an annual convention for transgender and gender-nonconforming people and their families.

History and Organization

From its founding in 1991 until 2014, the Southern Comfort Conference was held every year in Atlanta, Georgia, in September. After the 2014 conference, the board of organizers announced that the event would be moved to Fort Lauderdale, Florida, citing dwindling attendance numbers and “adding an element of vacation to the conference” as factors for the change (SCC 2018a). The 2017 conference, which was to be held at the Riverside Hotel in Fort Lauderdale, was canceled due to the threat of Hurricane Irma, a category five storm that did significant damage to south Florida and parts of the Caribbean. The 2018 conference was scheduled to be held at the same venue in Fort Lauderdale.

Since its inception the Southern Comfort Conference has welcomed over 400 different speakers and presenters. Presentations at the event, whether in the form of public addresses, seminars, or workshops, vary widely in topic and are delivered by people from a range of career fields and disciplines. Medical doctors and other health-care providers who specialize in trans health are especially frequent guests. For example, cosmetic surgeons who specialize in gender-confirmation procedures, including “top” (torso and abdomen), “bottom” (genital and reproductive), and facial surgeries, often lead information sessions about the process of medical transition. Gender-confirmation surgeries are generally so expensive that most trans people are denied access, and most procedures are not covered by insurance plans.

Psychologists and other mental health professionals are also regular guests, offering sessions on trans-related mental health issues, including workshops designed to help trans people manage the coming-out process and to effectively support their loved ones during their transition. At the 2018 conference, a speech and language therapist was scheduled to offer voice-modification coaching for both trans-feminine and trans-masculine individuals, including “ways to modify and maintain your true gender’s pitch, modify vocal resonance, intonation, breath support, tone, and the melody of your gender’s speech,” in addition to training on how to adopt nonverbal cues that are consistent with one’s gender identity (SCC 2018b).

As trans and GNC people have gained more mainstream visibility, the number of celebrities, prominent trans activists, and other public figures in attendance has also increased. For example, in 2016 the conference welcomed Schuyler Bailar, a Harvard University student who is the first openly trans NCAA Division 1 swimmer and the first known NCAA Division 1 trans man to compete in any sport. The conference also hosted Sean Dorsey, an award-winning modern dance choreographer from San Francisco who offered an all-levels dance workshop to conference attendees. Gloria Stein, a trans activist, was in attendance to screen the film Uncle Gloria: One Helluva Ride (2016), based on her life and work. Other 2016 guests included British boxing manager and promoter Kellie Maloney, who is credited with helping famed fighter Lennox Lewis become the undisputed heavyweight champion of the world, and Sarah McBride, the national press secretary of the Human Rights Campaign.

In 2007 the Southern Comfort Conference held its first transgender career expo, which helps trans job seekers find work settings and career paths in which they feel safe being themselves. At the time of the first expo, no federal protections existed for trans employees in the United States, some of whom report significant harassment, discrimination, or abuse in the workplace. In addition to its schedule of presentations and professional networking opportunities, the conference also offers a range of informal and social activities for attendees. For example, the event hosts a marketplace where vendors sell products specially designed for trans consumers. Since the conference’s move to south Florida, it has organized excursions to local sites, including the Everglades and Fort Lauderdale’s famous Las Olas Boulevard shopping district.

Advice and Guidelines for Attendees

Southern Comfort organizers make clear efforts toward inclusivity at the conference. The official website strikes an informal tone in offering potential attendees information on what to expect from the weekend’s events. For example, “first-timers” are encouraged to visit the welcome table near registration, which is designed to get the “First-Time-Outer” comfortable enough to not only leave their [hotel] room, but participate and enjoy the many events available during the conference (SCC 2018c). All guests are encouraged to “leave those self-conscious feelings at the curb—we are your brothers and sisters and have all been where you are. The difficult part was getting here and actually deciding to come out of your room, don’t miss your opportunity to experience it all” (SCC 2018c).

The conference website also offers information pertaining to the personal safety of its attendees, because transgender people are significantly more likely than cisgender people to be victims of hate-based harassment, assault, and violence. To provide support to guests who are anxious about attending, the conference offers a “Big Brother/Big Sister” program in which guests unsure of their ability to safely and successfully navigate the weekend’s events can partner with more experienced attendees. Because the conference has historically been held in hotel settings, attendees are advised about contact with nonattendees in a way that lightheartedly raises the issue of potential conflict:

_The mainstream public does not pay much attention if we present ourselves and behave like ladies and gentlemen.... Even if we are “read” [identified as a transgender person] we want to be seen as normal people expressing themselves in a non-threatening way. Remember that during the day there are families with children in the mainstream so we are invading their space to some extent. Travel in small groups, 1–4 ladies together is not unusual (unless they are all tall with the wrong lipstick, lol!)._

(SCC 2018c)
Furthermore, conference organizers issue strict guidelines about how to comport themselves at the event and suggest a dress code:

DO NOT dress like a hooker for the seminars or banquets—you have the freedom to express yourself later in the evening. This is NOT a sex convention, nor is it a fashion show so there is no “wrong” outfit within the guidelines of decency and appropriateness for any event. Casual or professional during the day, the Friday night events are a bit more flashy while Saturday night is more of a formal event. Gowns and tuxes if you like to really go formal. (SCC 2018c)

The website goes so far as to broach the subject of behavior in bathrooms, again suggesting a potential for conflict if these guidelines are violated: “Play the part of the gender you are presenting! Ladies—when in the stall—always sit, feet facing the door, and leave the seat down when you leave.... If you can minimize drawing negative attention to yourself you will have fewer problems” (SCC 2018c). The rights of transgender and GNC people to use the bathroom of their choice has become a hot-button issue in recent years, as several conservative politicians in regions across the United States, especially in the South, have proposed legislation designed to ban people from using gendered bathrooms that are inconsistent with their biological sex, irrespective of how the person identifies. Ironically, organizers caution attendees about getting “political—we all have views and this conference is more educational and social than it is for political activism” (SCC 2018c). Some argue that liberally offering advice about dress and comportment is a form of respectability politics that may reflect the conservative values of conference leadership. In recent years, longtime attendees have encouraged younger interested parties to reach out for more leadership roles. Historically, the conference has been predominated by transfeminine older adults, many of whom began their transition later in life. But as the transgender community has changed over time, organizers have suggested that leadership roles should be distributed more evenly across generational divides. The continued preeminence of the Southern Comfort Conference reveals the significant growth of support networks for trans people in the United States and serves as a symbol of the diversity—familial, social, political—within the trans community.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

SCC (Southern Comfort Conference). “About.” Accessed 1 April 2018a. https://sccfla.org/about-1/

SCC (Southern Comfort Conference). Facebook, 13 April 2018b. https://www.facebook.com/southerncomfortconference/

Spectra Project

SUBHI NAHAS Founder
Spectra Project

US-based charity supporting LGBTQ refugees in Turkey.

Spectra Project is a US-based charity that formed in 2016 to provide housing, food, and education to LGBTQ refugees who have fled to Turkey from Syria, Libya, Iraq, Egypt, and other countries in the Middle East and North Africa. Driven by war and instability in their own countries, many LGBTQ refugees flee to Turkey as a safer country of transit, but they may not find refuge in a third country. These LGBTQ refugees are an especially vulnerable subset of the refugee population because discrimination against LGBTQ individuals in refugee camps prevents them from receiving the support offered to others. Spectra Project aims to provide a safe house (located in or near Istanbul) where these refugees can be free of persecution and receive both immediate emergency support and ongoing support in the form of language and vocational education so that they have a greater chance of becoming self-sufficient wherever they may end up living. Although operating in Turkey, Spectra Project is based in San Francisco, California. Subhi Nahas, a gay refugee from Syria who was granted refugee status in the United States in July 2015 after spending two and a half years in Turkey, started Spectra Project to provide support to LGBTQ refugees he left behind, many of whom may never be able to leave Turkey. The name Spectra Project reflects both the range and spectrum of countries from which those who need help come and the wide array of needs LGBTQ refugees have.

Background

Increased activism has resulted in significant gains for LGBTQ Americans in the early twenty-first century, but people living outside North America, particularly in the Middle East and Africa, have not shared these gains. While the United States and other nations have moved toward more tolerant policies, many countries globally have implemented harsher penalties, and hate crimes are on the rise. As of 2017, seventy-nine nations criminalize same-sex relations in their penal code. Seven of these apply the death penalty for consensual same-sex conduct. In many African and Arabic-speaking nations, gay men, lesbians, and gender-nonconforming individuals face brutal violence, honor killings, or so-called lesbian corrective rapes if their homosexuality or gender variance is revealed. After the late 2010 and 2011 uprisings popularly known as the Arab Spring destabilized many of the affected countries, there was an increase in radicalism and terrorism in countries such as Syria, Libya, Egypt, and Iraq (Carroll and Mendos 2017). Ironically, in the midst of what was supposed to be greater liberty, many minorities and vulnerable groups were targeted.

In Syria specifically, Islamic radicals and armed terrorist groups such as ISIS (the Islamic State), al-Nusra Front, and a few Syrian militias targeted LGBTQ community members. In addition, the Syrian government's laws against homosexuals left no safe place for members of the LGBTQ community. As a result, the number of LGBTQ asylum seekers and refugees from that region both drastically increased.

As of June 2016, there were over 21 million refugees living in North Africa and the Middle East, with over 34,000 people forcibly displaced every day. The number of Syrian refugees is especially high, doubling between 2015 and 2017, reaching 4.9 million. As of 2017, there were over 2.7 million registered Syrian refugees living in Turkey (UNHCR 2018). Their arrival in Turkey does not guarantee their safety, however, as many still face threats and assault (Weise and Banks 2016). In 2016, for example, a gay Syrian refugee named Muhammed Wisam Sankari was found tortured and beheaded in Istanbul. Fellow refugees noted that this was not an isolated incident and that the Turkish police did not investigate his death (Weise and Banks 2016). As noted in a 2009 news release by the Organization for Refuge, Asylum and Migration (ORAM), LGBT refugees in Turkey often must go without medical care, social support, or employment, choosing to remain in their dwellings rather than risk violence. According to that ORAM release, “Turkey was named one of the worst countries in the world for refugees in the 2009 World Refugee Survey…. Discrimination and hate crimes against LGBT individuals are commonplace in Turkey, where ten transgender and gay individuals have been murdered since the beginning of 2009.”

While a number of very large organizations help refugees, these organizations are limited by lack of funding and the increasing number of individuals in need. Two-thirds of the Syrian programs are unfunded, leaving many refugees to seek protection, shelter, and survival on their own. All Syrians displaced by the ongoing civil war depend on humanitarian aid for food, clothing, and shelter; LGBTQ refugees—a subset of the larger group—face additional hardship in that they experience discrimination in refugee camps given the largely homophobic and increasing religious atmosphere in Syria in particular and the Middle East in general. They may have already been cast out by their parents, threatened by classmates, or terrorized by government officials or militia. These LGBTQ individuals have few options.
Subhi Nahas, Founder of the Spectra Project. Nahas, a gay refugee from Syria who fled to Turkey and eventually settled in the United States, founded the Spectra Project in 2016 to aid other gay refugees in Turkey.

Mission

Spectra Project focuses on LGBTQ refugees eighteen years of age and older, providing temporary emergency shelter to up to four individuals at a time and other services to approximately 100 individuals each month. As of June 2017, there were over 250 identified LGBTQ individuals living in Turkey, and these individuals needed not only basic support and refuge but also health education, language courses, and legal aid. One aspect of the Spectra Project’s support involves plans for a safe house to be managed by fellow LGBTQ refugees, who understand firsthand the threats, fear, and isolation associated with living as a minority in such difficult circumstances. The safe house is designed to serve as an education and resource center where more than fifty refugees per week can learn other languages such as English and Turkish, as well as skills such as sewing, which will help them find temporary or permanent work in Turkey, encouraging self-sufficiency.

Challenges

Some of the challenges faced by Spectra Project have included fund-raising in the United States, where knowledge of the LGBTQ refugee situation in the Middle East and North Africa is fairly limited; determining reliable, safe, and legal methods for transferring funds to Turkey; and ensuring that employees and benefactors are protected at all times while engaged in Spectra Project–related activities in Turkey. Spectra's work has also been unsettled by the efforts of US president Donald Trump to implement severe travel restrictions targeting the predominantly Muslim countries of Iran, Libya, Syria, Yemen, Somalia, and Chad, as well as North Korea and some groups from Venezuela (Liptak 2017). As Kate Moran noted on the Spectra Project website on 8 June 2017, “The travel ban is yet another blow to LGBTQ refugees’ tenuous hold on a viable future for an already-marginalized minority.”

Raising Awareness

Nahas has used his position as a prominent gay activist to bring international attention to the plight of Middle East refugees, using his own experience as a gay man in Syria to vividly illustrate the dire conditions. In 2015 he testified before the United Nations Security Council to advocate that the Security Council establish an agenda for protecting LGBTQ rights. He spoke of how both militants and government soldiers targeted gay men in Syria, which included public executions of men suspected to be gay by ISIS, as well as a government-sponsored media campaign that portrayed all dissidents as homosexual (Wolpow 2015). In June 2016, speaking before the US Senate's Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, he told the personal story of his life as a gay man in an area of Syria controlled by forces aligned with ISIS, as well as his subsequent escape to Lebanon and then Turkey. In his testimony, he boldly proclaimed the need to combat the ideology of ISIS by confronting bigotry and xenophobia in all its forms and promoting human rights for LGBTQ persons (C-SPAN 2016).

SEE ALSO The Gay International and Mideast LGBTQI Organizations; Human Rights and Queer Arab Refugees; ISIS Gay Trials

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Moran, Kate. “Trump’s Travel Ban: Another Blow for LGBTQ Refugees in MENA.” Spectra

Social scientists consider the realm of sports to be a key site for the study of both male and female masculinity. Sports reveal a given society’s valorization of a particular style of masculinity, thus mirroring an idealized form of masculinity in that place while simultaneously serving as a way for young people to learn, construct, rehearse, refine, and perform that masculinity competently (Archetti 1999). This emphasis on idealized masculinity has consistently created tensions for two sets of athletes in particular who experience stigma as a result of their incursion into prototypically and hegemonically masculine territory: women and LGBT individuals, the latter of which experience a gradation of severity within this group. Misogyny and homophobia, oftentimes mutually reinforced, permeate most sports and sporting cultures worldwide. In the case of Latin America, local variants of machismo—a particular regional style of masculinity emphasizing positive attributes of provision and mentorship but also many negative attributes such as rigidity in gender roles—are central to considerations of both misogyny and homophobia. Yet, because sports are a site for performing masculinity, there is also great potential for people to perform counterhegemonic masculinity through sports and to thereby increase acceptance of more diversity in the sporting world.
Gender and sexuality are not isolated as identities within sports. These identities intersect with other performances of identity, including class, race, ethnicity, ability, and nationality. Hosting major events is a way for countries to position themselves geopolitically through intersectional performances of nationhood. Latin American states that have used male athletes’ bodies for the purpose of particular political aspirations on the global stage include, for example, Uruguay during the World Cup in 1930, Guatemala during the Central American and Caribbean Games in 1950, and Mexico during the 1968 Summer Olympics and the World Cup in 1970 and 1986.

Certain sports may even have distinctive associations with axes of identity and particular performances of masculinity (e.g., wealthy white equestrians and snow-boarders; working-class nonwhite Latin American men playing football; hypermasculine and aggressive men playing wheelchair rugby). Such stereotypes often play out in global contests such as the World Cup where the national team’s style of play has implications for how the country is perceived (e.g., sportsmanlike, corrupt and prone to feigning injury, etc.). There are also intersections with politics and political identity. For example, after Fidel Castro took power in Cuba in 1959, his regime sought to create a “new man” and incorporated recreational and professional sports programs into that idealized vision of state-sponsored masculinity that the government expected boys to learn to perform (Pettavino and Pye 2002). This extended beyond highly visible sports such as football and baseball to other areas of Cuban excellence such as volleyball and boxing, sports for which Cuba began exporting successful coaches to wealthier European clubs. As for the fans, the ability to discuss sports is nearly universal as a means of performing one’s competency at masculinity, but scholars have pointed out how this is especially true in Cuba, where “arguing baseball” with other men is essential to establishing one's status in the hierarchy of masculinity that has been so carefully crafted by the political and economic interventions of the state (Carter 2002).

In the case of Cuba, having successful professional sports teams that performed well in international tournaments was especially important during the Cold War because it showed that communism could produce excellent specimens of manliness. Indeed, battles over communism and capitalism have played a profound role in shaping sports and masculinity in Latin America. And in the early twentieth century, Catholic Church officials and state government representatives supported football activities as a way to battle for political influence among rising classes of workers (Urbina Gaitán 2002). All these formations of identity are encapsulated in sociologist Pierre Bourdieu’s canonical theory of sports, which argues that sports are a means of indoctrinating youth with values of nationalism. For Bourdieu (1978), however, sporting cultures also indoctrinate youth with sexism, violence, and the central values of capitalism through the creation of cults of spectatorship based on imagined participation in a militantly competitive community, although other scholars have pointed to similar uses and effects within noncapitalist authoritarian regimes (cf. Lenartowicz and Jankowski 2014).

Homophobia and Sports

The issue of homophobia dominates scholarly discussions of gender and sexuality in sports, particularly in Latin America. The origins of homophobia in sports are deeply rooted, but scholars frequently trace the modern incarnation of this phenomenon to the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, when fears over industrialization and transitions to urban life led medical and political leaders to fret that men were losing their natural ruggedness. They postulated that boys and men needed a renewed emphasis on sports in order to remasculinize them (Kimmel 2017). Precisely because sports are often associated with hegemonic masculinity, gay men are seen as poor candidates for excellence in this area and may often internalize this homophobia and thereby come to see themselves in this manner. This creates particular anxieties around football for boys in Latin America (Tobin 2000). Indeed, a lack of interest in sports or sports fandom may make a boy’s sexuality suspect. Conversely, a girl’s interest—rather than lack thereof—can be highly suspect for the same reasons, further increasing associations of athleticism, female masculinity, and lesbianism. One consequence of this homophobia, however, is that gay male athletes frequently attempt to mitigate stigma by adopting hegemonic masculinity, including exhibiting dominance, making hierarchical displays, policing rigid gender norms, and even reproducing homophobia (Anderson 2005).

Homophobia does not arise only within the realm of the athletes themselves but also manifests among fans and spectators. During the second decade of the twenty-first century, homophobic verbal abuse at football matches became a highly controversial and widely covered issue in conversations about sports in Latin America. Since 2015, the Fédération Internationale de Football Association (FIFA), the international body governing football (soccer), has issued fines to seven countries for homophobic crowd chants. Of the seven countries (Chile, Peru, Mexico, Paraguay, El Salvador, Honduras, and Croatia), six are Latin American. This has not stemmed the abuse. Other possible penalties in the future could include larger fines, ordering teams to play in empty stadiums (as happened to Croatia when fans chanted fascist slogans), taking away points, or forcing forfeits, but these seem unlikely.

FIFA had until the mid-2010s showed tolerance for the most common chant: “Putoooo!” Many fans disagree on the exact translation, objecting to its rendering as puto—that is, “faggot” or “queer”—and instead arguing that it is not a homophobic slur at all. However, given that it literally is the male form of the word whore, it certainly is an epithet with connotations for gender and sexuality. It is also commonly deployed in a variety of nonsporting contexts, but the communalized ritual chanting of the term at sports events shows how spectators form in-group solidarity around a term that creates hierarchies of masculinity. Outside Latin America, other organizations such as the Chicago Fire and San Jose Earthquakes (both Major League Soccer clubs) were able to effectively quell this chant by ejecting fans who use it. Within Latin America, though, it is a much beloved practice, and few leaders or teams have shown interest in halting the practice.

Homophobia in Decline

Despite the visibility of homophobia in sports and the invisibility of LGBT players in Latin America, it is also important to note that the scholarly consensus is that homophobia is markedly decreasing over time (Anderson, Magrath, and Bullingham 2016). In a large US-based study of fan perceptions of gay male athletes, male fans showed no change in feeling toward an athlete after he comes out, and female fans formed significantly more positive impressions of the out athlete (Campbell et al. 2011). Latin America may be following suit, as there has been a proliferating number of amateur leagues and clubs for gay players, especially in major cities. For example, São Paulo has the Unicorns team, and Mexico City now has the Halcones (Falcons) league consisting of five teams: El Clan, Fashion Team, The Fuckers, Fuerza G, and Tu Mamá. Although the International Gay and Lesbian Football Association includes multiple Latin American member associations (in Brazil and Argentina, as well as many in Mexico) that are active, opportunities and leagues for queer women are less prominent. Still, this shift toward more visibility and inclusion for queer athletes correlates with broader advances in gay rights in Latin America in areas such as marriage, adoption, and antidiscrimination, even though homophobia and homophobic violence have also accompanied the increased visibility and advocacy.

Because sports are sites where athletes perform gender and sexuality, sports cultures also allow a range of behaviors that can challenge heteronormativity. For example, many gay men in working-class and poor areas in Lima, Peru, play vóley callejero, or street volleyball. These men engage in ritual insults and competitiveness but use these social practices differently than one sees in hegemonically masculine contexts. In contrast to the latter, their verbal exchanges highlight playfulness, use feminizing grammar, and show linguistic prowess with a gay argot. Spectators from across the communities respond well to these gay volleyball games and turn up at the matches more for the linguistic competition than the volleyball itself. In this way, the gay men use sports to cultivate and perform specifically gay masculinities, queering the sport (Perez 2011). In another example, Mexican lucha libre (wrestling) features exóticos who adopt a flamboyantly effeminate style when they fight. Within these scripted narratives, the exóticos (who often do not identify as LGBT or queer) succeed in periodically emasculating their macho opponents when the exóticos vanquish them (often with displays of penetration and dominance), creating queer challenges to conventional masculinity and heterosexuality that delight audiences precisely through the contestation of Mexican heterosexual masculinity (Levi 1998). Nevertheless, LGBT fans may also experience ambivalence or outright negative feelings about these putatively queer contestations of hegemonic masculinity and machismo because of the ways that homophobic slurs, chants, and displays occur onstage and off in the realm of lucha libre performance.

Although athletes have been slower to come out as openly LGBT in Latin America than their counterparts in the United States, Canada, and much of Europe, this is beginning to change and was especially visible at the 2016 Summer Olympics in Brazil, where athletes from the host nation came out publicly. There are also more out women than men in sports both generally and in Latin America, which reveals the simultaneous effects of homophobia in rendering gay male athletes invisible and rendering gay female athletes hypervisible owing to their respective conforming to and deviation from gender norms.

Female Athletes

Female athletes have historically faced strong bias from the medical establishment, which commonly told women in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries that it was not in women’s nature to compete. This sentiment was common in Latin America and still persists. Brazilian law, for example, banned girls and women from football and certain other sports (even as purely recreational pastimes) from 1941 until 1979 because the government deemed it incompatible with their “feminine nature.” Western women’s widespread desire to participate in sports such as tennis, golf, and bicycling in the early twentieth century led to debate between those allied with health and wellness movements and their opponents who feared that playing sports could give women a muscular, mannish appearance and possibly even cause them to take on other male characteristics. This bias is present today in the policing of intersexed athletes, as officials look for telltale signs of “excessive” masculinity. Such policing, however, was present in the Olympic Games going back to Mexico City and Grenoble, France, in 1968 and has variously been known by the International Olympic Committee as “sex verification,” “women’s medical examination,” “sex check,” “femininity testing,” and “gender verification,” among other terms (Pieper 2016).

Concerns about female masculinity were undergirded by homophobia and the fear that tomboyism and its associated athleticism would result in gender inversion or lesbianism (Griffin 1998; Lenskyj 1986). In Latin America, many countries followed on the successes of Title IX in the United States, a 1972 federal law stating that “no person in the United States shall, on the basis of sex, be excluded from participation in, be denied the benefits of, or be subjected to discrimination under any education program or activity receiving Federal financial assistance.” Both international sports organizations for women and girls and domestic grassroots recreational organizations contributed to a growing number of opportunities for female athletes. In 2016 Colombia joined Chile, Argentina, and Brazil as the fourth Latin American country to have a professional women’s football league. Revenues and funding are scarce for women, however, and the leagues sometimes go so long between matches that they risk being “deactivated” and declared defunct by FIFA. Despite these concerns, recreational leagues in Latin America run by community groups and nongovernmental organizations are increasingly promoting football and other sports programs for girls, especially in low-income areas. For example, through the Guerreiras Project in Brazil, football is used as a tool to promote gender justice, create opportunities for girls to participate in sports, and bring athletes, artists, academics, and activists together for workshops, exhibitions, research, and other activities. Another central issue facing female athletes is sexualization. Even in Latin American countries where women do play, they may be expected to wear revealing uniforms or titillating costumes to attract crowds. Despite these setbacks, women’s football is on the rise and increasingly visible. In the 2015 Women’s World Cup, 27 million viewers in the United States watched their team play in the final—the largest turnout for any football match (male or female) in that country. Women’s sports advocates in Latin America are hopeful that with increased audiences and visibility as well as more girls playing globally there will be a knock-on effect in the Latin American region that results in more opportunities, more sponsorships, and more funding for female athletes.

The 2016 Summer Olympics in Brazil

LGBT visibility in athletics is increasing steadily owing in large part to the Olympic Games, which features a wide array of sports and athletes from around the world. In 2008 only 12 of the nearly 11,000 participating athletes openly identified as lesbian, gay, or bisexual. By the next Summer Olympics in 2012, that number had reached 23. In Brazil in 2016 there were 64.

The 53 female and 11 male openly gay athletes competing in Rio de Janeiro hailed primarily from Europe, Australia, the United States, and Canada. However, seven were from Latin America (six Brazilians and one Argentine). The Brazilians included five women: Larissa França (beach volleyball), Mayssa Pessoa (handball), Rafaela Silva (judo), Isadora Cerullo (rugby), and Julia Vasconcelos (tae kwon do). Brazil’s Ian Matos (diving) was the only Latin American out gay man. Valentina Kogan represented Argentina (handball).

No publicly “out” transgender or intersexed athletes competed. Great controversy exists within various sporting bodies about how to handle the inclusion of intersexed athletes and transgender athletes. This is complicated by the great variety of physical conditions that can fall under the category of intersex. In 2009 the media pushed this issue into great prominence in its coverage of Caster Semenya, a runner from South Africa who was subjected to controversial “sex testing” by the International Association of Athletics Federations. The results are not officially known, but some of them leaked to media sources, further angering many advocates for intersexed and LGBT people. At the time of the Brazilian Olympics, neither Semenya nor Dutee Chand of India (another athlete subjected to controversial sex testing) confirmed their intersexed status, although Semenya is married to a woman and is included in the total number of out lesbians. Nike also featured a transgender male runner from the United States in one of its advertisements, although that athlete, Chris Mosier, did not compete. Three transgender women participated in the Olympic torch relay and a transgender Brazilian model, Lea T, led Brazil’s team of athletes into the stadium for the opening ceremony.

Although the number of men was low, the 11 men represented a significant shift from the single out gay male athlete in 2008. There were a number of other high-profile LGBT moments in the Brazilian games, including the first same-sex marriage proposal (made on the field to Brazil’s Cerullo after a rugby game). Brazil’s first gold medal (judo) came from Silva, a black woman from the City of God favela, who told the news media that she owed her success to her longtime girlfriend (O’Boyle 2016).

LGBT representation during the Olympics in Brazil, which was the first South American country to host, stood in marked contrast to the previous games in 2014 in Sochi, Russia. Although seven openly gay women participated in Russia (with no Latin Americans among them), the Russian government remained staunchly homophobic and stood behind its much-publicized antigay legislation passed the year prior that banned as propaganda all activities it construed as promoting “nontraditional sexual relationships” in front of minors. Using this law, Russia even went so far as to ban the Olympics from offering a “Pride House,” a temporary venue that had become customary for hosting and supporting LGBT athletes, volunteers, and visitors (analogous to the houses used in support of various participating countries). By contrast, Brazil's Pride House Rio Pavilion offered an opening day cocktail reception; featured drag shows and musical guests; displayed banners with dozens of lesbian, gay, and bisexual athletes; offered yoga classes; featured roundtables and discussions about sexuality and health access, homophobia, and issues related to sports; and offered artistic activities for children to showcase their feelings about diversity. Brazil had also hosted a Pride House in São Paulo in 2014 during the FIFA World Cup. Despite the positive nature of the events at Pride Houses, some scholars have sharply criticized the deployment of such venues as homonationalistic, or using the veneer of gay rights to whitewash violent histories of settler colonialism, hide the fact that sports events occur on stolen land, and cover up the economic and material damage wrought by major sporting events on poor and marginalized (often displaced) communities in host countries (Sykes 2017).

Not all the media coverage of LGBT issues at the Olympics was positive, however. In what became perhaps the most widely covered LGBT story, the Daily Beast sent Nico Hines, a heterosexual, married male writer to the Olympic Village to lure gay men out into the open using Grindr, a hookup app for gay and bisexual men. Hines then outed numerous male athletes by disclosing identifying information about them, including several closeted men from countries that Hines described as “notoriously homophobic” or possessing restrictive laws about homosexuality. Gay athletes and activists worldwide protested the story. Amid widespread complaints about Hines's journalistic ethics, the Daily Beast retracted the story, published an apology, and called its reporter home. For its part, Grindr later released its own anonymous data about users in the Olympic Village, noting that 38,000 people from 109 nations sent 14 million messages on the app just from inside the village (a restricted area not open to the general public). The Grindr numbers showed that there was a great deal more same-sex sexual activity among men associated with the Olympics beyond the relatively few out athletes and suggest that there is a need for more scholarship on the question of sexuality and sports related to coaches, journalists, delegates, and others involved with such events. Importantly, representatives of Brazil, the United States, and the United Kingdom were the most active on Grindr, but users from countries with antigay laws were disproportionately represented, including Russia and Qatar, the hosts of the FIFA World Cup in 2018 and 2022, respectively.
Given the prevalence of football in Latin America, it is unsurprising how much of the activity and visibility of LGBT athletics is concentrated in that one sport. Further academic study may reveal, however, whether the trends, patterns, and questions outlined above related to football could also function in other sports. It is also important to consider to what extent team sports create or rely on different hierarchies of gender conformity compared to more individualized sports (e.g., track and field, martial arts). Further attention should also be given to questions of race and racialization in sports and to investigating how race intersects with questions of class, access, opportunities, and the accrual of social capital for LGBT athletes in Latin America. The lack of research on LGBT sports cultures may reflect biases on the part of researchers and/or societal exclusion of LGBT people from this realm, but it should not be assumed that the lack of information reflects a lack of importance. Finally, it is noteworthy how much three countries—Brazil, Argentina, and Mexico—dominate in the media coverage and academic literature. To some extent this reflects the economic clout, size, and fundamental material realities of these countries. Much more could be learned, however, from further refocusing scholarly attentions to the anglophone, francophone, Dutch, and indigenous cultures of Latin America and the Caribbean. Sports rise and fall in popularity regionally, and the spread of particular sports can reveal much about the histories of trade, colonialism, and domination. Therefore, there is both an academic and political urgency to furthering the study of sexuality and sports in this region so that a greater understanding of sexuality's relationship to these other vital aspects of Latin American culture and history can be realized.

SEE ALSO Athletics, Trans and Intersex; Athletics, Trans and Intersex, in Asia; Human Rights and Activism in Latin America; Sports, Women in, Africa

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Sports play an important role in the cultural identities and nationalist sentiments of African people. When women play sports, they simultaneously challenge and affirm normative ideas about gender and sexuality. Likewise, women’s sporting experiences—whether as athletes, spectators, or administrators—reflect conflicting meanings around women’s place in the national imagination, the economy, the political sphere, and the home. African sportswomen face structural barriers such as inadequate field time, ineffective coaches, lack of adequate childcare and compensation, insufficient access to sanitary napkins, and policing around their sexuality. All these constraints hinder their ability to play, whether for leisure or professionally. These structural barriers reproduce the idea that women are uninterested in, or bad at, sports. At the same time, however, women in sports challenge the normative idea of sports as belonging to men. Social and economic inequalities in sports are a product of how, despite women's increased participation, the terrain remains coded as a site for men.

Although African women play all kinds of sports, some are coded more appropriately feminine than others. For example, track and field is a sport in which women have historically participated without much contest. Kenyans Joyciline Jepkosgei (1993–) and Mary Keitany (1982–) hold world records, as of early 2018, for fastest half marathon (mixed-gender races) and marathon (women-only races), respectively. Mozambican 800-meter track and field athlete Maria Mutola (1972–) attended six consecutive Olympics over the course of her career and consistently placed in international competitions. When women depart from such acceptably feminine sports to participate in or watch (in public) boxing, football, basketball, or hockey, they face heightened opprobrium for transgressing prescriptions for normative gender. Often this censure is in the form of sexual harassment, reifying the heteropatriarchal claim that men have on women's leisure time and embodied practices. The complex terrain on which African women engage in and with sports reflects a long-standing struggle around the meanings of gender and sexuality, both on and off the playing field.

Normative Gender and Sexuality as a Postcolonial
Heritage

The modern gender system reifies binary gender, which is the firmly held belief that there are only two genders: men and women. Attached to these binary genders are particular roles, stereotypes, and beliefs about what constitutes a “real” man or woman. The binary gender system asserts heterosexuality as normative human sexuality. Hence, a “real” man is sexually attracted to a “real” woman. This framing of gender and sexuality interprets and assigns social characteristics and expectations such as physical strength, sexual pursuit, leadership, and working outside the home as male traits. By contrast, women are expected to be homebound, demure recipients of men’s sexual aggression and interest.

There has been much contestation around the primacy of gender as an embodied category of difference in pre- and postcolonial African societies. In some contexts, age, social status, and kinship took precedence over gender as a biologically determined binary construct. As such, women could be husbands or kings while remaining women (Amadiume 1987; Oyěwùmí 1997). The challenge posed to the gender binary from such indigenous analyses demands a reassessment of what constitutes a man or woman. Despite the idea that African genders might challenge the Western/colonial binary system, heterosexuality largely remains the only publicly acceptable sexual orientation for African men and women. As such, the postcolonial heritage of binary gender and heterosexual patriarchy upholds a dichotomous system of gender and sexuality.

The Role of Sports in Reinforcing Normative Gender and Sexuality

In sports, the binary is held in place through a variety of means, including segregating athletes according to gender, harassing female sports fans and spectators, and employing diminutive and sometimes demeaning names for sportswomen and teams. One might point to the Black Queens of Ghana (football), Malawi’s Queens (netball), or Uganda’s She Cranes (netball), just to name three examples. Such naming simultaneously enthrones women and positions them as subordinate to men, the implied kings or ungendered Cranes. By positioning women’s teams as Queens or Ladies, sporting organizations, media, and spectators enforce a gendered expectation of sportswomen. Queens are subordinated to their kings, and ladies to their lords. This gendered naming also imposes Victorian class and heterosexual expectations on African sportswomen.

In addition to the class, gender, and sexual implications of how women’s sports teams are named, some sports are also designated as men's sports or women's sports. In Africa, netball is the most popular women's sport—a result of its colonial designation as an appropriate sport for women. When women play and watch this sport, their actions are not seen as disrupting the gender order (Mansfield 2014; Pelak 2009). The construction of Netball as a “women’s game” reifies the sport as less important, less aggressive, and less masculine than other sports. Sometimes gendered rules deviate from the sport itself to concerns about athletes’ uniforms. For example, the president of FIFA (Fédération Internationale de Football Association), Sepp Blatter, was reported to have said in 2004 that if women want a greater audience at their football (soccer) matches, they should wear tighter shorts (Christenson and Kelso 2004). Such gendered rules are justified by the belief that women are physically weak and that their sexuality belongs to men. These rules and regulations extend beyond the playing field to affect female spectators and fans. Women who attend live matches alone can expect to be sexually (physically and verbally) harassed by male spectators, who construct the stadium as an all-male private playground (Shehu 2010). When sporting organizations and the general social structure constrain how African women experience sports, they reproduce narrow prescriptions for gender and sexuality.

The Role of Sports in Challenging Normative Gender and Sexuality

Although women’s sports are largely acceptable when they reinforce normative ideas about gender and sexuality, sports also provide a venue for challenging these prescriptions. When women play sports that are perceived as masculine (e.g., football or rugby), they are seen to transgress normative gender. As a result of this perceived transgression, women may experience various sanctions against their involvement in the sport. Sportswomen who do not embody femininity are accused of being lesbians or men in women’s clothes. For example, the Nigerian and Ghanaian women’s football leadership have repeatedly claimed that “lesbianism” is a big problem in the sport. Equatoguinean footballers Genoveva Añonma, Salimata Simpore, and Bilguisa Simpore have been accused by opposing teams of being men posing as women because of their athletic builds and style of play. Such accusations are a reminder that, regardless of their athletic training and focus on sports, sportswomen are expected to be recognizably feminine and thus sexually available to men.

Sportswomen challenge this expectation of sexual availability in a variety of ways. Sometimes these ways reify the gender binary and compulsory heterosexuality. For example, in response to accusations from coaches and other match officials, the Ghanaian and Nigerian women’s football teams have vehemently denied that they are anything but heterosexual. Such denials reject sweeping generalizations and stereotypes about sportswomen’s sexuality. However, these athletes also generally fall short of challenging the negative stereotypes attached to queer sexuality in an African context. Consequently, simple denials of lesbianism might reject the stereotype that sportswomen transgress heterosexual femininity, while leaving intact the idea that there is something morally and socially reprehensible about masculine women and same-sex desire. Of course, coming out as a lesbian athlete is not easy in a context where so-called corrective rape and even murder remain implicitly acceptable and there is no legal protection for queers (Ogunniyi...
2014). For example, in 2009 the South African footballer Eudy Simelane was gang-raped and murdered, and her corpse was disposed of in a public space (Kelly 2009). Consequently, it is not surprising that women footballers would vehemently deny allegations that they are lesbians. Despite the dangerous landscape that lesbian athletes navigate, South Africa had its first and only openly lesbian football team, the Chosen Few, which was in operation from 2006 until 2013. According to players, the club folded because it was too dangerous to remain active (Collison 2017).

CASTER SEMENYA (1991–)

The South African middle-distance runner Caster Semenya came into the public eye in 2009 when she won gold at the world track and field championships in the 800-meter race, but controversy quickly gained her unwelcome fame when questions arose about her gender. The International Association of Athletics Federations (IAAF) subjected Semenya to gender-verification testing, compelled by complaints from her rivals and suspicion that her performance had improved too easily. While the results of these tests were not initially released, rumors widely suggested that Semenya was not “fully female.” Athletes, forced into oppositional conceptions of male/female, have long been subjected to controversial gender testing, including visual inspections of genitals, invasive surgical examinations of reproductive organs, and chromosomal and hormonal testing. But despite binaries in sport, scientists widely agree that no tests can successfully classify “sex,” and intersexuality may occur in more than 1 percent of the population.

Semenya’s gender testing elicited angry responses, evoking critiques of racism and reminders of taxonomies of colonialism and apartheid based on pseudoscientific tests to determine race and rights. As gendered questions were raised about Semenya—a strong and successful black athlete whose success threatened her European rivals—South Africans rallied together against the invasion of her body and privacy. Semenya was celebrated by crowds of supporters and referred to with nationalist pride as “our first lady of sport.” The vehemence of the defense of Semenya even compelled Makhenkesi Stofile, then serving as South Africa’s minister of sport and recreation, to famously declare that excluding Semenya from competition could create a “third world war” (Roelf 2009).

Many politicians undermined intersexuality; for instance, the African National Congress Youth League issued a statement suggesting that “hermaphroditism” (long considered derogatory) does not exist (Levy 2009). But some of Semenya’s supporters extolled her specifically as an intersex athlete. South Africa has been at the forefront of LGBTQI activism for decades, and intersex activists drew on the attention to Semenya’s plight to further highlight medical education and the challenges of the legal imposition of gender binaries. Semenya’s gender again came under scrutiny when she underwent a hyperfeminizing makeover in the South African magazine You; many deemed it uncharacteristic of Semenya's usual gender expressions, but Semenya herself called questions about her gender a "joke" (Beyers 2009).

Semenya has continued to excel as an athlete and ignore controversies to focus on her performance. She was chosen to carry the flag representing South Africa at the opening ceremonies of the 2012 Summer Olympics and won silver at that event in the 800-meter race. In 2017 Mariya Savinova of Russia—one of Semenya's biggest rivals and critics who grumbled after Semenya's first big win in 2009, “Just look at her!”—was convicted of doping and stripped of her Olympic gold medal, which was then awarded to Semenya (Kessel 2010; Guardian 2017). Sporting regulatory bodies such as the IAAF are still striving to establish consistent testing patterns and “proof” of sex. In 2018 the IAAF introduced new regulations of “normal” testosterone levels that only apply to women athletes running in track distances from 400-meter to one mile, a move widely critiqued as targeting women of color from the Global South and especially Semenya. Semenya has continued to win—claiming victory in twenty-five consecutive public competitions at the 800-meter distance as of 2017—and is legally contesting the regulations of the IAAF (O’Riordan 2017).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

O’Riordan, Ian. “Why Won’t Caster Semenya Break World Records?” Irish Times
One athlete who has created space for African female athletes to be gender variant and queer is Caster Semenya (1991–). The South African track-and-field star was, like the Equatoguinean footballers, accused of being a man and tested for so-called dominant male hormones. Following an invasive health examination, Semenya continued to compete in women’s competitions, going on to win gold in the 800-meter track race at the London (2012) and Rio (2016) Summer Olympics. Semenya’s visibility as an internationally acclaimed, medal-winning, trans-masculine athlete who married her longtime girlfriend and fellow track athlete Violet Raseboya in a lavish ceremony in 2016, followed by a “white” wedding in 2017 (Dayile 2017), shifts the landscape of women’s sports in Africa. Semenya, like the white South African Olympians Sunette Viljoen (1983–) and Karen Hultzer (1965–), rejects the insistence that African sportswomen must be heterosexual and conform to a binary feminine gender. The visibility of masculine sportswomen and lesbian athletes serves as a rejection of the societal imposition of binary gender and limited prescriptions for women’s place in African societies more generally.

SEE ALSO Athletes, Trans and Intersex; Athletes, Trans and Intersex, in Asia; Sports and Sexuality in Latin America

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Stone Butch Blues (1993; Leslie Feinberg)

RACHEL CORBMAN
PhD candidate, Women's, Gender, and Sexuality Studies
Stony Brook University, Stony Brook, NY

Novel about an American lesbian's transition to a trans man.

In 1993 Leslie Feinberg (1949–2014) published hir (Feinberg preferred zie/hir pronouns) debut novel Stone Butch Blues with Firebrand Books, an independent lesbian feminist publishing house in Ithaca, New York. Prior to Stone Butch Blues, the bulk of Feinberg's writing had appeared in Communist periodicals such as Workers World and Liberation and Marxism magazine. In 1992, the year before the novel's publication, Feinberg also published a pamphlet titled Transgender Liberation, and excerpts from hir forthcoming novel appeared in The Persistent Desire, an anthology of writing on butch-femme relationships. Typed on a borrowed laptop at night after work, Stone Butch Blues extends the earlier pamphlet's focus on the history of trans and gender-nonconforming people before the emergence of a transgender movement in the 1990s.

Specifically, Stone Butch Blues tells the story of Jess Goldberg, a protagonist who is clearly modeled after Feinberg. Following the currents of Jess's life from the 1950s through the 1990s, the novel offers a window into the formation of LGBTQ communities and social movements in the United States during the late twentieth century. After its publication, Stone Butch Blues was quickly cemented as a classic of LGBTQ literature. Partially because Stone Butch Blues coincided with a growing popular and academic interest in gender and sexuality, the novel also established Feinberg as, to quote the historian Susan Stryker, “one of the chief architects of the new transgender sensibility” (2017, 154). Since 1993, the novel has been translated into seven languages, while the original English version has been reissued twice. The third and final edition of Stone Butch Blues was released after Feinberg's death in 2014. This edition is available as a free PDF on Feinberg's website as a way to, in the author’s words, “give this novel back to the workers and oppressed of the world” (2014, 352).

Butch-Femme Bar Culture

Stone Butch Blues is narrated as a retroactive account of Jess's life, beginning with their childhood. Much like Feinberg, Jess was born in 1949 to a working-class Jewish family and grew up in Buffalo, New York. Throughout their childhood in the 1950s, an era noted for its vigilant policing of gender and sexual norms, Jess’s appearance was an ongoing source of anxiety for their family, classmates, doctors, teachers, and strangers alike, with the question of whether they were a “boy or girl” echoing as a “constant refrain” (Feinberg 1993, 13). After enduring years of abuse as a gender-nonconforming child, Jess discovered that they were attracted to women during a Saturday matinee at a local theater. “I melted as Sophia Loren moved her body against her leading man,” Jess recalled (24). Although Jess was initially frightened by their “new secret,” their budding interest in women soon prompted them to visit Tifka’s, a bar in Niagara Falls, New York, where they were introduced to working-class butch-femme bar culture.

Published the same year as Stone Butch Blues, Elizabeth Lapovsky Kennedy and Madeline D. Davis’s Boots of Leather, Slippers of Gold (1993) traces the history of butch and femme bar culture in Buffalo from the 1930s to the 1960s, ending their study at around the time that a young Jess worked up the courage to step inside Tifka’s for the first time. As the introduction to Boots of Leather explains, butch and femme identities were central to the development of working-class lesbian culture in the mid-twentieth century. Within this cultural context, identifying as a butch (that is, a masculine person) or a femme (that is, feminine) mattered more than a shared lesbian identity. Kennedy and Davis’s interviewees, in fact, “rarely used the word ‘lesbian,’” identifying instead as butch or femme (1993, 6).

As a companion to Kennedy and Davis’s ethnography, Stone Butch Blues offers a moving literary account of butch-femme bar culture as it existed in the 1960s, emphasizing the resilience of LGBTQ people in the face of structural violence. On Jess’s first trip to Tifka’s, they met Butch Al, who takes Jess “under her wing,” teaching them “all the things she thought were most important for a baby butch” to know (Feinberg 1993, 29). Literally and metaphorically grooming Jess, Butch Al took Jess to purchase new clothes and also sat Jess down for a “butch ‘father to son’ talk” (30). However, most of Butch Al’s guidance was centered on Jess’s survival. Although Jess was already aware of the “tremendous power” the world wielded over them, the police emerged as a new and central threat to their safety after their introduction to the bars (22). During routine raids of Tifka’s, the police specifically targeted butches, drag queens, and known sex workers for arrest. As a teenager, Jess was apprehended for the first time along with Butch Al. Thrown in the “bulls’ tank” for butches, Butch Al was beaten and presumably raped, while Jess was warned that as soon as they grew a little bit taller, the same would happen to them. “I learned to fear the cops as a mortal enemy,” Jess remembered (22). With her unflinching account of Tifka’s, Feinberg positions butch and femme bar culture as central to LGBTQ history—and especially the development of what became known as gay liberation in the late 1960s.

New Social Movements

The story of Jess’s teenage years in the mid-1960s intersects with broader histories of US social movements against the Vietnam War and for racial, gender, and sexual liberation, while also suggesting some problems with how these histories are most often told. After their initial introduction to butch-femme bar culture in Niagara Falls, Jess spent the 1960s frequenting bars in the Tenderloin strip in downtown Buffalo and working a series of factory jobs. In the 1950s butches who did not capitulate to gender norms were generally unable to secure jobs (Kennedy and Davis 1993). By the mid-1960s, however, Stone Butch Blues describes factories populated by a sufficient number of butches to form their own “baseball or bowling team” (Feinberg 1993, 77), a historical shift facilitated by the passage of employment discrimination protections in the Civil Rights Act of 1964, as well as the intensification of the Vietnam War. “All the young guys were getting drafted left and right,” Jess explained (81). In the factories, Jess developed a leftist-oriented politics through their work with the union. Yet Jess nevertheless felt alienated from the student-led movements of the 1960s.

Jess's girlfriend, Theresa, however, worked as a secretary at the State University of New York at Buffalo, a campus that was rocked by student activism, culminating in a police occupation of the campus in March 1970 (Heineman 1993). Through Theresa, Jess learned about the antiwar, Black Power, and women’s liberation movements, as well as the Daughters of Bilitis, the first lesbian organization founded in the United States. Gay liberation and lesbian feminist groups also sprouted up on campus following the 1969 Stonewall riots, an uprising against a routine police raid of the Stonewall Inn in Greenwich Village, New York, that helped catalyze a broader national movement. In attending campus-based lesbian feminist meetings, however, Theresa was alarmed to discover that many newly politicized lesbians were critical of butch and femme relationships, despite the predominance of butches and femmes in the bar culture that ostensibly prompted the movement. Through Jess’s and Theresa’s experiences, Stone Butch Blues suggests the importance of class in historicizing the social movements of the 1960s and 1970s.

Toward a Transgender Movement

In 1973 Jess decided to transition in order to, in their words, “pass” as a man (Feinberg 1993, 231), a decision that Feinberg also made in the early 1970s (Feinberg 1992). In subsequent popular and scholarly accounts of the novel, critics have debated if Jess is best read as a “lesbian” or “trans” character (see Prosser 1995; Halberstam 1998). Especially in the 1990s, Feinberg’s novel in fact became a flashpoint in what the queer theorist Judith (later Jack) Halberstam (1998) termed the “butch/FTM border wars.” As Halberstam argues, considerable overlap exists between trans masculine and butch lesbian identities, which has resulted in a series of struggles over the definitional boundaries and political stakes of these identity categories. In the novel itself, Feinberg emphasizes three main reasons for Jess’s decision to transition. First, Jess feared for their safety, following an escalation of police harassment “after the birth of gay pride” (Feinberg 1993, 135). Second, Jess had economic motivations. In the 1970s, factory work was scarce in Buffalo on the heels of a global recession in 1973 and a more gradual decline of manufacturing jobs in the... region since the 1950s. “It seemed as though everyone we knew was laid off,” Jess explained (141). By presenting as a man, Jess hoped they would have greater access to employment opportunities.

At the same time, however, Jess also viewed testosterone injections and breast reduction surgery as a means of obtaining the body they had “expected before puberty confounded [them]” (Feinberg 1993, 171), an understanding of gender-affirming hormone treatment and surgeries that aligns Jess with more contemporary trans activists. Yet, even as Jess is legible to readers as a trans character, Stone Butch Blues underlines the great personal cost of transitioning in the years before the emergence of a transgender movement in the 1990s. In the 1970s Jess and their friends understood their transition not as an affirmation of Jess’s trans identity but rather as a pragmatic decision to present as a “clean-cut young man” (174). In navigating the world, Jess thus had to remain vigilant in the face of “constant terror of discovery” (173). Simultaneously, their transition, which resulted in Jess presenting as a purportedly heterosexual man, also isolated them from the queer culture that nurtured them, a fate most poignantly illustrated through Jess’s painful breakup with Theresa following their decision to take hormones.

After living as a man for a decade, Jess decided to quit taking hormones in the early 1980s. “My face no longer revealed the contrasts of my gender,” Jess explained. “I could see my passing self, but even I could no longer see the more complicated me beneath the surface” (Feinberg 1993, 222). As well as ceasing hormones, Jess also built a community of trans and gender-nonconforming people in the closing pages of the novel. Signaling an emerging understanding of transgender as a distinct identity category, one of Jess’s friends commented that she wished “we weren’t always lumped into gay” (267). Intersecting trans and queer activism, Stone Butch Blues ends on an optimistic note with Jess testifying at an AIDS rally in Greenwich Village. Vowing to “imagine a world worth living in, a world worth fighting for” (301), Feinberg’s novel ultimately advances a vision for a radical social movement that is attentive to gender, sexual, racial, and class politics.

Critical Reception

Stone Butch Blues won a Lambda Literary Award and an American Library Association Stonewall Book Award in 1994. Reaching a large international audience, Jess’s story has resonated with a wide range of readers and has been taken up as a crucial text by trans and queer studies scholars. On 15 November 2014 Feinberg died of complications from chronic Lyme disease. Echoing the themes and larger vision of the novel, hir last words called for “the revolution” and implored that zie be remembered “as a revolutionary communist” (Advocate 2014).

SEE ALSO Daughters of Bilitis; Femmes and Butches; Lavender Menace
BIBLIOGRAPHY

Stonewall Riots, International Effects of

CRAIG GRIFFITHS
Lecturer in Modern History
Manchester Metropolitan University, United Kingdom

The global impact of the 1969 riots at the Stonewall Inn, which marked a symbolic turning point in gay rights activism.

The Stonewall riots, which began in the early hours of Saturday, 28 June 1969, are often credited as the spark that set gay liberation alight, not just in the United States, but around the Western world. As Marc Stein aptly notes, Stonewall is frequently understood “as the first act of lesbian and gay resistance ever” (2000, 289). Such is Stonewall’s iconic status that gay pride events and Christopher Street Day parades around the world usually take place over the last weekend in June to commemorate the riots. Activists and historians often frame important domestic catalysts for gay and lesbian activism as “our Stonewall,” whether in France, Poland, or Australia, and the leading LGBT rights charity in the United Kingdom, founded in 1989, is called Stonewall. The riots remain the preeminent reference point not only in contemporary activism but also in LGBT history, with the “mythical queer historical marker” (Ramírez 2012, 194) of Stonewall looming large in how we conceptualize and periodize the gay and lesbian past.
This entry traces the international ramifications of the Stonewall riots and the international dimensions of their celebration and commemoration, and demonstrates that it is the memory of the Stonewall riots, rather than the riots themselves, that has played such a powerful role in gay and lesbian activism—and history making—around the Western world. Stonewall was internationally significant. However, gay and lesbian movements across the Western world have their own histories, their own contexts, which often proved more significant than events in New York.

Gay Power!

While we may never know who threw the first bottle or brick, who was the first to resist arrest, we do know that the police did not receive the response they were expecting in the early hours of Saturday, 28 June 1969, when they raided the Stonewall Inn, a bar located in the Greenwich Village neighborhood of New York City. Accustomed to meek and fearful acquiescence to regular police raids, they were met instead with a rising tide of anger, shrieks of “Gay power!” and trash cans set alight; the police were forced to call for backup from the Tactical Patrol Force, a riot-control unit that had been set up to deal with militant demonstrations against the war in Vietnam. Skirmishes continued for hours that night and were repeated the following night and into the next week. Deputy Inspector Seymour Pine, who had been forced to take shelter inside the Inn from the baying crowd outside, recalled in 1990, “For those of us in public morals, things were completely changed ... suddenly they were not submissive anymore” (quoted in Duberman 1994, 208).

News spread quickly of the events at the Stonewall Inn and in its immediate vicinity on Christopher Street and Sheridan Square, attracting local queer luminaries to the scene; the poet Allen Ginsberg (1926–1997) visited on the second night and described patrons of the Stonewall as “beautiful—they've lost that wounded look that fags all had 10 years ago” (quoted in Duberman 1994, 208). The riots were widely covered in the local press; headlines included “Homo Nest Raided, Queen Bees Are Stinging Mad” (New York Sunday News), “Gay Power Comes to Sheridan Square” (Village Voice), and “Police Again Rout 'Village' Youths” (New York Times). The international media did not—yet—report on the riots.

Gay Liberation

For a few days it seemed that little had changed in homosexual politics in the United States. The very next week, on 4 July 1969, the homophile movement’s fifth Annual Reminder took place: around seventy-five men and women dressed in a formal and gender-normative fashion walked silently in front of Philadelphia’s Independence Hall in their annual picket meant to remind the public that homosexual Americans were being denied the rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness promised to all citizens in the Declaration of Independence. It would prove to be the last annual reminder as Frank Kameny (1925–2011) and other leaders in the homophile movement were confronted by the rise of a more militant tendency in activism in the form of the Gay Liberation Front (GLF), which had its genesis in heated discussions that same evening. Rather than commemorating the Stonewall riots with a candlelight vigil—the proposal put forward by the New York chapter of the Mattachine Society, an early homosexual rights organization—the GLF supported loud direct action, tackling oppression (and self-oppression) head-on by publicly confronting the police, city officials, and antigay psychiatrists.

Describing itself as “a revolutionary homosexual group of women and men formed with the realization that complete sexual liberation for all peoples cannot come about unless existing social institutions are abolished” (Gay Liberation Front 1970, 2), the GLF demonstrated solidarity with other oppressed peoples through their choice of name: the “Liberation Front” designation was inspired by liberation struggles in Algeria and Vietnam (Duberman 1994, 217). This refusal to focus on specifically “gay” issues led some members to split from the GLF and set up the Gay Activists Alliance (GAA) as early as December 1969. The GAA adopted from the GLF the mantle of direct action, but in its single-issue politics was arguably more reminiscent of the Mattachine Society. Any similarity between the GAA and Mattachine did not extend to questions of vocabulary; the Mattachine Society and other homosexual rights groups founded in the 1940s, 1950s, and early 1960s often used the term homophile to avoid drawing attention to the sexual in homosexual. While the North American Conference of Homophile Organizations chose “Gay is good” as its official slogan in August 1968, it was only after the Stonewall riots that groups and activists more readily used the term gay in their public activism.

However, neither the Stonewall riots nor gay liberation was all the work of self-identified gay men only. While the GAA was a largely gay male organization, the GLF was more mixed in its gender makeup (at least until 1970, when several activists left to form the all-lesbian group Radicalesbians). Martin Duberman points out that “street queens” such as his interviewee Sylvia Rivera (1951–2002) were an important constituency for the Stonewall Inn, alongside what he describes as “ordinary gay male patrons” (Duberman 1994, 197). The Stonewall riots are therefore also a celebrated moment in transgender history, although the term transgender was not used by gender–nonconforming individuals such as Rivera who took part in the riots. Writing a few years later, Rivera claimed that “a transvestite half sister” threw the first stone at the riots, arguing that “transvestites are the most liberated homosexuals in the world. We have had the guts to stand up and fight on the front lines for many years before the gay movement was born” (1972, 10). This did not prevent a lesbian member of the GAA from trying to prevent Rivera from addressing the crowd at the 1973 gay pride rally, accusing Rivera of “parodying womanhood” (Duberman 1994, 236).

Christopher Street Liberation Day

Stonewall's iconic international status was not an inevitable result of an immediate impact of the riots on gay and lesbian activism in the United States; rather, it was the outcome of tenacious activism that built on the opportunity presented and a determined campaign to commemorate the riots, which found expression in “Gay Liberation's First Birthday Celebration” twelve months later. This campaign was led by Craig Rodwell (1940–1993), the owner of the Oscar Wilde Memorial Bookshop, which had opened in New York City a few years earlier. Meeting at Rodwell's apartment, the grandiosely named Christopher Street Liberation Day Umbrella Committee (CSLDUC) began in February 1970 to plan a rally to mark the first anniversary of the riots. The first Christopher Street Liberation Day was held on Sunday, 28 June 1970, part of a wider Gay Pride Week; approximately 2,000 people assembled in Sheridan Square, adjacent to the Stonewall Inn, before marching up Sixth Avenue and enjoying a “Gay-In” in Sheep Meadow, Central Park. Smaller events took place in San Francisco, Chicago, and Los Angeles.

According to the organizers, “These riots of last year in New York City's Greenwich Village area marked the first time in history that homosexuals rose up in massive and violent resistance against the forces of oppression and many centuries of cumulative abuse by society and its institutions” (CSLDUC 1970a). But there was, in fact, queer resistance before Stonewall; even if we narrowly define resistance as street protest, the riot at Compton's Cafeteria in San Francisco in August 1966 preceded Stonewall by almost three years. Nevertheless, the annual Christopher Street Liberation Day successfully embedded this mythological narrative of Stonewall. We continue to talk and write about the riots not because Stonewall single-handedly inaugurated a new era in the history of homosexual emancipation; activists were able to build on the opportunity presented by the riots because of the level of organization and consciousness that had already been reached by 1969, which in part is the historical legacy of the postwar homophile movement. Therefore, rather than “a literal account of its origins,” the “Stonewall story” is better viewed as an achievement of gay liberation (Armstrong and Crage 2006, 725). Indeed, marchers at that first Liberation Day rally in 1970 were told, “We are all participants in the most important Gay event in history”; that is, not Stonewall but its first annual celebration (CSLDUC 1970b).

Germany

One historical consequence of the Stonewall story is that the United States eclipsed Germany as the national context most associated with homosexual emancipation. After all, it was in Imperial Germany that the first homosexual emancipation movement in the world was founded, in 1897: Magnus Hirschfeld's Wissenschaftlich-humanitäres Komitee (Scientific-Humanitarian Committee). With the relaxation of censorship following World War I and the German revolution, Die Freundschaft (Friendship) became the first homosexual paper anywhere to be sold openly on newsstands (Beachy 2014, 164). Although their language was somewhat anachronistic, early gay community historians John Lauritsen and David Thorstad had a point when they wrote in their 1974 book on the German homosexual movement, "In reality, the Stonewall riots represent not the beginning of gay liberation but the beginning of a new wave of gay liberation. 1969 marks a rebirth, an anniversary—indeed, one might say the 100th anniversary of gay liberation" (5).

News of the Stonewall riots seems to have reached Germany after a delay of twelve months. Revealingly, it was coverage of the first Christopher Street Liberation Day in New York City in June 1970 that saw Stonewall mentioned for the first time in the German press. Wolfgang Selitsch covered the event for him, West Germany's largest gay magazine, which along with du & ich (You and I) and other gay magazines had been sold openly on newsstands only since September 1969, when the liberalization of Paragraph 175 came into effect; previously, West Germany had enforced the 1935 Nazi version of the law, which criminalized male homosexuality. It was therefore homosexual law reform and not Stonewall that was the most significant event in 1969 for West Germany's same-sex-desiring population.

A correspondent for the conservative daily Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung who was also in New York City for Christopher Street Liberation Day identified the genesis of a “new homophile consciousness” (Lietzmann 1970; translation by author). The most obvious manifestation of this new consciousness in West Germany was Rosa von Praunheim's iconoclastic film Nicht der Homosexuelle ist pervers, sondern die Situation, in der er lebt (1971; It is not the homosexual who is perverse but the society in which he lives). First screened in 1971, and broadcast on national television in January 1973, the film was a key factor in the expansion of the gay movement. In his program notes for the film Praunheim (1942–) praised the “historical act” of Stonewall and expressed hope that it would serve as an example, because the “inhibition and cowardice amongst German gays still stinks to high heaven” (Internationale Forum des Jungen Films 1971; translation by author).

Praunheim later described West Germany as “a second America,” blithely stating that “everything that happens there comes over here someday” (Blatt 1979, 15; translation by author). However, gay liberation was never a one-way street. Consider activist salience crossing the Atlantic in the other direction, such as the symbol of the pink triangle worn by homosexual prisoners in the Nazi concentration camps, rediscovered by West German activists in the 1970s and soon adopted also in the United States and Canada. North American gay liberation has dominated the historiography of gay activism, but events in the United States did not provide a wholly amenable framework for gay activism elsewhere; not least, the models provided by the civil rights movement and black power were absent in West Germany.

It is true that Stonewall and its commemoration by gay and lesbian activists in the United States offered inspiration to international observers and, perhaps, gave rise to a certain jealousy. In his coverage of the 1970 Christopher Street Liberation Day events, Wolfgang Selitsch commented that West German homosexuals were at an earlier stage in their activism, and he called on homophile students to set up grassroots groups at their universities. The model he cited in this regard was not the United States, however, but the Netherlands. Indeed, for West German homosexual activists, Dutch, French, and British influences were to prove especially significant.

Elsewhere in Western Europe

Arguably, the most successful homophile organization internationally was the Dutch Cultuur en Ontspanningscentrum (COC; Center for Culture and Leisure), which was founded in 1946. The moderate nature of the COC’s leadership and their dealings with police and government officials did not endear them to a younger generation of gays and lesbians radicalized by the student movement, who staged the first gay and lesbian public demonstration in The Hague in early 1969, several months before Stonewall (Hekma 2014, 126). When activists decided to stage a national demonstration, rather than a merely local event, the impact of Stonewall became more evident: the date chosen by Dutch lesbians was the last weekend in June 1977, and the model was the annual Christopher Street Liberation Day. Similarly, there was a public gay and lesbian demonstration in Münster, West Germany, as early as May 1972, but there was no annual fixture until June 1979, when the Christopher Street Liberation Day model was deployed in Bremen and in West Berlin.

The first gay and lesbian rally in France to commemorate the Stonewall riots was held on 25 June 1977. It was met with opposition by some activists who preferred to focus on French gay and lesbian contributions to annual May Day rallies organized by socialist and communist groups. Similarly, some organizers in West Germany sought to commemorate not Stonewall in late June but the capitulation of the Nazi regime on 8 May, thereby honoring the homosexual victims of fascism. Still, it is a date emanating from New York that quickly became the favored occasion for annual rallies across Europe.

At least one French figure was radicalized by Stonewall: Guillaume Charpentier (a pseudonym), who was an exchange student in New York at the time of the riots in 1969. He returned in 1971 to France, where he cofounded the Front Homosexual d’Action Révolutionnaire (FHAR; Homosexual Revolutionary Action Front). He later described his time in New York as formative: “I americanized my experience of liberation” (Sibalis 2009, 244). Nevertheless, there were domestic incitements, too. Julian Jackson describes how the “Stonewall’ of French homosexuality” took place live on radio on 10 March 1971 when gay and lesbian activists disrupted a popular discussion program that had as its topic “homosexuality, this painful problem” (2009, 183). The informal group of activists soon founded the FHAR, which engaged itself in sharply opposing the homophile organization Arcadie, whose leader, André Baudry, was one of the panelists interrupted on the radio show. These French disputes bear the hallmarks of similar debates that took place in the United States immediately following Stonewall, as the newly founded Gay Liberation Front outflanked the longstanding homophile group the Mattachine Society.

Historians locating different national “Stonewalls” have not always looked to moments of protest. According to Peter Edelberg, Stonewall took on a different meaning in the Danish context because LGBT Danes “did not experience the same oppression and police harassment as in New York” (2014, 69). Instead of Stonewall, it was the introduction in 1961 of a law criminalizing same-sex prostitution with a minor under the age of twenty-one, and the repeal of this law in 1965, that were pivotal. The debate about this discriminatory measure gave Danish homosexuals “a final push out of the closet” (Edelberg 2014, 67).

Eastern Europe

Łukasz Szulc has argued that rather than 1969, 1985 was a “watershed year” in the history of Polish LGBT activism (2011, 161). Under the so-called Operation Hyacinth, police raided bars, clubs, bathhouses, and other meeting places, detaining and collecting details of an unknown number of men suspected of being gay. This series of raids was not followed by gay and lesbian public protests, given the difficulty of mounting any kind of protest in Communist Poland. But the raids did provoke Polish same-sex–desiring individuals to unite against oppression and to start building a sense of community, which found expression in Poland’s first magazines aimed at a LGBT audience (Szulc 2011). Eastern Europe’s first gay liberation group, the East Berlin–based Homosexuelle Interessengemeinschaft Berlin (HIB; Homosexual Interest Group Berlin), was formed in 1973 when, with the aid of Peter Tatchell, an Australian member of the London Gay Liberation Front, activists distributed German translations of a gay liberation flyer at the Tenth World Festival Games of Youth and Students, much to the ire of the East German police and, indeed, Tatchell’s heterosexual fellow British delegates (McLellan 2012).

The English-Speaking World

The London GLF was the first GLF organization set up outside the United States, in autumn 1970. London GLF member and trailblazing historian of homosexuality Jeffrey Weeks recalls reading about the 1970 Christopher Street Liberation Day in New York: “I remember feeling that that could never happen in London.” Yet, due to “a turbulence of ideas in the United States and a penetration of the new movement abroad,” the GLF and other groups found themselves in late June 1972 organizing the United Kingdom’s first gay pride march, which was the first time the annual commemoration of the Stonewall riots had been celebrated outside the United States (Weeks 1999, 189).

Much like its American counterpart, the British GLF was not on the scene for long. Stephen Engel has argued controversially that gay liberation was “an American transplant which never firmly took hold” and that “the British had no Stonewall legend with which to incite anger, excitement, and energy” (2001, 83). He underscores the significance of the 1967 Sexual Offences Act, which partially decriminalized male homosexuality in England and Wales; this legal reform prevented the formation of “revolutionary outrage.” Instead, Engel points to the battle in the late 1980s over Section 28, a measure that prevented local authorities and schools from promoting the “acceptability of homosexuality as a pretended family relationship.” This oppression, and the protest to which it gave rise, “could be conceived of as Britain's version of the Stonewall riots” (Engel 2001, 93).

Australia’s first organization that explicitly defined itself as gay liberationist was set up in Sydney in 1972, but this group had its origins in the Campaign against Moral Persecution (CAMP), founded in 1970, and the Homosexual Law Reform Society, established in 1969. In 1978 Australian activists responded to calls from San Francisco for an international day of protest over Anita Bryant’s antigay crusade “Save Our Children,” which supported the introduction of Proposition 6 in California. Had the law passed, it would have banned gays and lesbians from working in public schools in California. On the night of 24 June 1978 activists in Sydney staged the first Australian gay pride, or Mardi Gras, as it was better known. The police withdrew the permit they had previously issued, ordered the crowd to disperse, and arrested more than fifty marchers. Remembering what has been dubbed “our Stonewall” by the Australian Lesbian and Gay Archives, the parade became an annual fixture commemorating the police oppression in Sydney in June 1978, on a date chosen to commemorate police oppression at the Stonewall Inn in June 1969. However, Australia also provides a rare example of how the symbolic power of Stonewall has its limits. In 1980 activists shifted the date of Mardi Gras to March to take advantage of the Southern Hemisphere summer. Over time, this defined the Sydney Mardi Gras as a major gay and lesbian event in its own right, which has helped construct Sydney as “a gay and lesbian city of international standing” (Waitt and Markwell 2006, 62).
The First Australian Gay Pride Parade, 1978. This event, also known as Mardi Gras, has been dubbed “our Stonewall” by the Australian Lesbian and Gay Archives. The parade became an annual event, initially held in June to commemorate the anniversary of the Stonewall riots, before switching to March in 1980, to take advantage of the Southern Hemisphere summer.

South America and Beyond

A gay liberation group was formed in Argentina as early as 1971—the Frente de Liberación Homosexual (FLH; Homosexual Liberation Front), which survived until the military takeover in 1976 (Green 1994). It seems that this Argentine example proved more influential than Stonewall for activists in São Paulo, because Brazil’s first gay liberation group in 1978 renamed itself after the FLH’s magazine Somos (We are) (Green 1994). Like some of their counterparts in France, Brazilian gay and lesbian activists chose a date associated with socialism, not with Stonewall, as the occasion of their first public protest, with about fifty men and women taking part in a homosexual contingent at São Paulo’s May Day rally in 1980. São Paulo’s first gay pride parade took place in mid-June 1997; according to its organizers, it is now the largest in the world. While the São Paulo parade emulates earlier gay pride and Christopher Street Liberation events around the world, it does not take place on the last weekend in June, thereby decentering the commemoration of the Stonewall riots.
While this entry has focused on Western nations, a case could be made for the truly global impact of Stonewall were we to link recent gay pride rallies in cities such as Moscow; Kampala, Uganda; Delhi; and Shanghai to the riots in New York’s Greenwich Village in late June 1969, but this would not make for good history. Rather than assuming the global salience of a particular incident in a specific place and time, we should interrogate the prevailing conditions for LGBT and queer consciousness in each locality. While the transnational commemoration of the Stonewall riots was remarkable, historians should be cautious in adopting Stonewall as a lens through which to analyze the LGBT struggle around the world, because this assumes the existence of (1) a more or less openly accessible gay scene, (2) the possibility of meeting police oppression with street protest, and (3) a media prepared to report on this protest. Moreover, it directs our attention toward the 1970s, the decade of gay liberation, which can lead to new insights but also to a trivializing of all that came before and all that has happened since. In particular, organizing around HIV/AIDS prevention in the 1980s, 1990s, and the next decade has been more foundational for many LGBT groups in the Global South (Roberts 1995). It does not play down the contribution of those who stood up to police oppression at the Stonewall Inn in late June 1969— and those who commemorated their actions—to recognize that the “Stonewall story” has its limits.

SEE ALSO ACT UP; Australia and New Zealand; Bathhouse Raids, Toronto (1981); Bookstores; Compton's Cafeteria Riot (1966); Gay Liberation Front; Mattachine Society; Parada do Orgulho LGBT de São Paulo, Brazil; Pink Triangle; Pride Demonstrations in Europe; Pride Parades and Marches; The Ugly Law (1961–1965; Denmark); “We Demand” Protest (1971); The Wolfenden Report

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Roberts, Matthew. “Emergence of Gay Identity and Gay Social Movements in Developing Countries: The AIDS Crisis as Catalyst.” Alternatives: Global, Local, Political 20, no. 2 (1995):
243–264.

The Amsterdam-based Strange Fruit collective, whose name simultaneously references queer positionalities and African diasporic networks, almost perfectly represents the subaltern of contemporary European discourses around race, religion, and migration in their assumed impact on gender and sexuality. Active from 1989 to 2002, the group was founded by a small group of queer youths of Muslim and Afro-Caribbean background, mostly welfare recipients and/or sex workers, who came together to challenge their marginalization within both their ethnic communities and the Dutch gay scene. Committed to a nonhierarchical self-help approach, the activists focused on empowering other queer youths of color, using the expertise present within the community itself. Much earlier than others in continental Europe (and partially informed by queer-of-color activism in the United Kingdom), Strange Fruit questioned the widespread assumption of a deficiency of nonwhite/non-Western queerness and identified racism and Islamophobia as intrinsically linked to dominant models of gay liberation.

This was particularly obvious in the Netherlands, which in the late twentieth century had become a key site of the Othering of racialized Europeans via a discourse that presents Islamophobia as the logical response to Islam's homophobia. Cracks in the idealized narrative of Dutch liberal tolerance, manifest in the success of the extreme right, are largely seen as caused by the nation's Muslim communities, which make up just 6 percent of the population (Wekker 2016; Hackett 2016). Several studies devoted to the issue of Islam and homosexuality produced results that seemed to confirm the adversarial relationship between the two. One of the earliest was a 1996 survey of Amsterdam high schools identifying rampant homophobia among migrant youths (Strange Fruit 1997). In its search for responses, the city turned to the only local organization that combined the seemingly incompatible identities of Muslim and queer: Strange Fruit became the main contact point for press and politicians amid growing concerns around allochtoon (nonwhite) youths and the supposed threat they posed to the nation’s commitment to gender equality and sexual tolerance (Arts and Nabha 2001). The group’s assessment of the larger Dutch context, however, differed drastically from the prevailing focus:
It is often assumed that all minorities have psycho-social problems, ... criminal behavior, runaways, drugs, prostitution ... [and] supposed taboos in the diverse communities, often based on the assumption of backwardness/underdevelopment. It is hardly ever discussed what problems these minority youths encounter within the Dutch society/the Dutch education system, in gay and lesbian organizations, subcultures, in contacts, friendships, relationships with Dutch peers/adults, hardly ever is there room for survival strategies, statements by the youths themselves or for the insights of black/migrant experts.

(STRANGE FRUIT 1997, 23; TRANSLATED BY FATIMA EL-TAYEB)

The tension caused by the group’s refusal to internalize the narrative of deficiency and be treated as native informers, while simultaneously using its growing influence to open spaces for other queers of color, remained a central challenge and led to several transformations. Founded without resources, Strange Fruit had initially constituted itself as a workgroup within the Amsterdam Cultuur en Ontspanningscentrum (COC; Center for Culture and Leisure, Europe’s oldest LGBT organization). When changes in the COC’s structure brought more formal control, most of the group left and, to be able to operate independently and receive direct funding, reconstituted itself as a foundation. A minority of members remained and reorganized as Secret Garden, focusing exclusively on the concerns of queer Muslims, primarily through monthly gatherings at the COC. (In 2008 Secret Garden became a foundation aimed at supporting LGBT refugees.)

The transformation into Vereeniging Strange Fruit in 1997 caused conflicts with the group’s nonhierarchical structure that were never fully resolved. The collective functioned through largely independent subgroups: from a refugee support group to weekly "Safer Sex and Culture" evenings focused on AIDS education through art; a weekly local radio program covering everything from Amsterdam news to queer activism in Zimbabwe; a monthly party; the weekly Women of Color Café, frequently cooperating with feminist organizations and spawning new groups such as Asian Lesbians Outside Asia; and the Strange Fruit Machine, responsible for the group’s visual art production, from flyers to posters and slide shows. This variety of activities was driven by Strange Fruit’s internal diversity, combining artists and activists, feminists and AIDS educators, refugees and members of the second generation, and believers and atheists. Trans members were a small but vocal presence from the beginning, and while most of its founders were men, the group soon included an equal number of women and became increasingly ethnically diverse, with activists of North African, Caribbean, Middle Eastern, Afro-Dutch, Asian, and Asian Dutch background (as well as some white queers). While productive and contributing to the group’s unique position, this diversity also frequently led to tensions, which were primarily resolved through a radically democratic structure, granting far-reaching autonomy to subgroups while retaining overall coherence through biweekly, open roundtable meetings at which all decisions were made.

This approach became increasingly difficult as interactions with authorities and the social services sector grew, forcing the activists into a position they had always resisted: that of representatives, spokespeople, mediators, and service providers for migrant and minority queers. It speaks to the success of Strange Fruit’s intersectional, peer-focused strategy that it gradually became the main hub of queer-of-color activism in the Netherlands, if not continental Europe, and a major access point for those looking for help and information. This, however, put increasing stress on the organization, which remained strictly volunteer-based and whose core membership never exceeded twenty people. The group eventually dissolved in 2002.

For more than a decade, Strange Fruit practiced a locally grounded activism with a global perspective, connected to a transnational feminist/queer-of-color network spanning several continents. The collective was the first to explicitly represent queer-of-color perspectives, emphasizing shared experiences and goals rather than offering “ethnic” support. Rejecting culturalist categorizations, the activists resisted divisive discourses that not only pit “gay” against “migrant” communities but also divide the latter. Instead, they persistently sought contact with community organizations and elders while maintaining explicitly queer positions. They applied an understanding of cross-communal solidarity that allowed for alliances without denying differences. They practiced a form of resistance rooted in women-of-color feminism’s intersectional analytical framework (first introduced to the Netherlands by feminist groups closely working with Strange Fruit, such as the Sister Outsider and ZAMI collectives, both founded in Amsterdam in the 1980s). This resulted in, for example, the incorporation of Afro-Caribbean practices such as toris—storytelling events that offered an alternative to and creolization of individualized Western coming-out narratives and instead emphasized collectivity and the complex dynamic between queers of color and their communities, which can be and often are both safe havens and sites of oppression.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

El-Tayeb, Fatima. European Others: Queering Ethnicity in Postnational Europe. Minneapolis:

Sufi Treatment of Same-Sex Relations in Poetry and Prose

ALI-ASGHAR SEYED-GOHRAB
Associate Professor
University of Leiden, Netherlands

Homoerotic expressions in the literature of Islamic mysticism.

Sufism produced one of the richest literary and artistic traditions in the world in which same-sex relations are treated as serving a range of purposes. Sufi homoeroticism cannot be fully understood without considering the courtly traditions and literature in which such relationships were the rule rather than the exception. Homoeroticism is an essential component of Persian poetry and in the cultures under the Persian literary spell, such as Ottoman Turkey and India. In the courtly tradition, the beloved is chiefly a handsome young man. These young men were recruited from Central Asia, India, and China. After training for several years, they would become an appealing cupbearer, a musician, a fearless soldier, and even the boon companion of a king, and in courtly literature they are called the beloved. The beloved is described as a Turk, an Indian, a soldier, a general, a pleasing male cupbearer, a musician, and so on. In hundreds of poems, the poetic persona is depicted as longing to steal a kiss from the beloved, whose beauty has stolen his patience:

O boy, if you wish to please my heart,
After serving me wine, you must give me kisses

(FARROKHI 1992, 45; TRANSLATION BY ALI-AS GHAR SEYED-GOHRAB)

The beloved as a brave soldier steals souls on the battlefields and hearts at convivial gatherings. The texts in which such homoerotic relations are depicted range from panegyrics, love lyrics (ghazals), and romances, to ethicodidactic prose and poetry. The lack of an indicator of grammatical gender in the third-person pronouns ʿu and ān in Persian allowed for some confusion about the gender of the beloved, but descriptions of the budding beard and mustache give the game away (de Bruijn 1989).

Sufis took over a rich repertoire of tropes, metaphors, and stories from this courtly literature and applied them to their relationships with the divine. One should distinguish here between homoeroticism, homosexual relations, and homosexual identity (Schmidtke...
While homoeroticism was ubiquitous in the Islamic world, and homosexual relations were—to judge from the literature—not uncommon, homosexuality in the form it is understood in modern times did not exist. Attraction between people of the same sex was viewed as natural. For instance, Kay Kāvus has a whole chapter titled “Enjoying Sexual Relations” in his Qābus-nāma (eleventh century; Mirror of princes), which he wrote for his son, delineating why a prince should share his bed with both sexes.

Active and Passive Partners and Punishment

Many texts distinguish an active and a passive partner. The former, the penetrator, is commonly a person of a higher status and power, whereas the passive partner is usually a slave or boy. In such social hierarchies, there was rarely a question of punishing the penetrator. A famous example is the story of the judge from the city of Hamadan and the farrier boy, recounted by Saʿdi (c. 1210–1292) in his Golestān (Rose garden). The judge is caught with a boy in his arms, drunk with wine in the middle of the night. When the king, who is the judge's friend, wants to punish him by throwing him from a building as an example for others, he begs the king to throw someone else so that the judge too may profit from this example. The story shows an awareness that the theory of religious law was hard to apply in practice. Saʿdi’s moral is that homoeroticism exists, human beings are sinful, and one should not blame others (Lewis 2009; Southgate 1984).

The Qurʾan does not specify punishment for sexual relations between two men but expresses abhorrence, exemplified in the story of Lut (see 7:80–81; cf. 26:160–166, 27:54–55, 29:28–29). Jurists and exegetes understood the story to mean that anal intercourse was a major sin, supporting their arguments through a plethora of prophetic traditions (hadith), whose authenticity was sometimes questionable. There is no agreement between the Islamic legal traditions as to the penalty: the severest punishment cited is death by stoning for both partners, but other jurists are satisfied with flagellation (Pellat 1986). Despite the abhorrence for same-sex relations in the Qurʾan, Islamic societies possessed a homoerotic sensitivity.

Shāhed-bāzi and Other Sufi Same-Sex Associations

Several Sufi practices, doctrines, and symbol systems are based on homoeroticism or homosexual relationships. Inspired by the tradition “God is beautiful and loves beauty,” the practice of “gazing at a beloved person,” usually a beardless youth, emerged. This is called shāhedbāzi or nazar-bāzi (literally meaning “witness playing” or “the gaze game”) in Persian and nazar ila al-murd in Arabic (ʿAyn al-Qozāt Hamadān 1991; Ritter 2003; Pourjavady 2005; Wafer 1997). The purpose of such practice is to become absorbed in the divine beauty by contemplating a human beauty. The youth is called the shāhed or “witness” of the presence of God’s beauty. As Leonard Lewisohn observes, “The reflection of divinity within humanity ... was based on the Sufi mystico-erotic doctrine that taught, similar to Aristophanes’ speech in Symposium, that love always pursues wholeness and is essentially the desire of lover and beloved to merge into one” (2010, 44). This erotic theology is related to the notion of al-majaz qantarat al-haqiqqa (metaphor is a bridge to reality), which Sufis use to refer to the importance of human love as a bridge to the divine love.

The shāhed-bāzi was subject to vehement criticism from Islamic theologians accusing Sufis of belief in holul, or “God residing in beautiful youth” (Ritter 2003; Shamisā 2002). Sufis rejected such accusations, emphasizing the contemplative aspect of the relationship and the sublimation of erotic affection. Sufis also justified such relationships by saying that God makes man fall in love with a beautiful face in order to learn the ways of love, preparing him for divine love. The didactic function of earthly love is often used as a rationalization for same-sex relations. Such validations generally stem from the Sufi philosophy of pantheism, developed by the Andalusian mystic Ibn al-ʿArabi (1165–1240). Relations between a mystic and a boy were not always sexual, because some treatments include chastity. The oft-cited tradition “He who loves and remains chaste, and then dies, dies a martyr” was applied to those mystics who chastely contemplated a shāhed (Lewis 2009, 710). In addition, Sufis related shāhed-bāzi to the prophet Muhammad’s ascension (miʿraj), his nocturnal journey through the heavens to encounter God. Sufis repeatedly cite the traditions: “I saw my Lord on the night of ascent in the form of a young man” and “Beware! The beardless youth has a complexion like that of God” (Ridgeon 2012, 9; Schimmel 1975, 290–291; Ritter 2003, 459–460).

Another purpose of same-sex associations among Sufis was, as Hellmut Ritter delineates, “a community-building bond of sociological and pedagogical significance” to be found in Islamic organizations such as futuwwa, or the akhi, which were guild communities bringing people together. Such relationships are known through the “vehement polemic directed against [them] by the law-revering orthodoxy” (2003, 377), such as Ibn al-Jawzi (1126–1200) who, in his Talbis iblis (The Devil’s Deception) [2014]), severely criticized several mystics, including Ahmad Ghazāli (c. 1061–1123 or 1126). Although Sufism could be regarded as a path in which each individual attains personal development, it is also equally a way of life centered around a spiritual leader (pir) who guides his disciples (morids) through the spiritual path in Sufi hospices. The emotional bond between the mentors and disciples was strong, and relations between the disciples themselves sometimes tended toward homoeroticism. Women were excluded from most Sufi lodges. It is not clear how physically homoerotic love was expressed. Several reports indicate that boys were physically exploited at such lodges (Lewis 2000; Bashir 2011).

Kings and Princes and Their Lovers

Anecdotes of the love between a king and a youth are frequently used in mystical literature to depict the subtleties of love and the relationship between man and his creator. In such stories, the beloved, usually a slave boy, rises in rank as soon as a love relationship commences. The kingly lover is ruled by the beloved’s wishes, willing to sacrifice everything for a glimpse of the beloved. A good example is Sultan Mahmud and his favorite slave boy Ayāz, a paragon of beauty in Sufi literature. In his influential theory of love, the Sawāneh, Ahmad Ghazāli shows how love removes the earthly status of bondage, making the prince an obedient slave and the slave a powerful man. Anecdotes of Sultan Mahmud and Ayāz are repeatedly used to delineate the power of love, the subjection of the prince to the beloved’s whims, their inseparability, and their proverbial mutual devotion (Ritter 2003; Kugle 2002). A relationship with such a boy depended on his not yet being virile. As soon as his beard began to grow, his beauty would be destroyed and his social role would change. If an adult man were subject to penetration, it would be a disgrace to himself and his family. These partners were called mukhannath, meaning effeminate male (Najmabadi 2005).

Another related theme is of a man of the lowest social status, usually the furnace stoker of a bathhouse, falling in love with a prince. The lover craves a glance from the princely beloved. Ghazāli tells one such anecdote to emphasize the necessity of the gaze of the beloved and man’s lack of control over love:

> There was a furnace stoker who had fallen in love with a king. The vizier told the king. The king wanted to punish the furnace stoker, but the vizier reminded him of his justice, saying: “You are famous for your justice; it is not befitting for you to punish someone on account of something which is beyond one’s control.” It so happened that the king’s regular route passed by the bathhouse of that poor man. Every day, he would sit at the edge of the road, waiting for the king to pass by. When the king reached that place, the amorous flirtation of the beseeching lover would connect with the amorous gesture of loveliness. This continued for some time, until one day, when the king arrived, the stoker was not there when the king was donning the flirtatious stance of the beloved, but that stance requires the supplicant gaze of the lover. Because he was absent, the king remained naked, for he found no response, and the king’s mien changed. His vizier, who was a shrewd man, grasped intuitively what had happened and came to him courteously, saying: “We said that there was no sense in punishing him, for he does no harm; now we realize that his importuning was necessary.”

(1942, 25–27; TRANSLATION BY ALI-ASGHAR SEYED-GOHRA)

This topos (literary theme) is so popular that it has grown into a distinct genre, the Shāh-o Gedā, or “king and beggar.” An aspect of this genre is that the lover desires to be wounded or killed by the beloved. Often the imagery of polo is used (Seyed-Gohrab 2007). The lover desires that the polo-playing prince should play with his head, removing and tossing it around on his polo stick, as an image of his total submission to the beloved. Related to such stories are anecdotes in which a Sufi falls in love with the beautiful son of a vizier, or an army general falls in love with a prince. Farid al-Din ‘Attâr tells many anecdotes about Sufis who fall in love with a youth (‘Attār 1989).

Musical Audition

Another Sufi ritual in which the same-sex relationship appears is the Samā’, or musical audition, during which mystics listened to the recitation of certain formulas from the Qur’an, or erotic poems, often accompanied by musical instruments and dance. References to homoerotic contacts are made in Sufi manuals on Samā’. In their ecstatic rapture, Sufis would tear open their shirts, embracing young boys or other dancing mystics. An example is Khwāja ʿAbdollāh Ansāri (1006–1088), who once frequented musical auditions but stopped after one incident:

One day during the samā’, I was in rapture, and tore open my shirt. After the samā’ I went to the Jāmaʿ Mosque. While I was still drunken from the samā’, a person came to me and said: “Who was the youth who was moving around you during the dance?” I said: “Why?” He said: “A young boy with a long stalk narcissus was dancing with you. Every time he brought the narcissus near your nose, you became ecstatic, losing all your patience.” I begged him: “Do not tell this to anyone.” Afterward, I never saw him anymore.

(QUOTED IN JĀMI 1991, 3 4 6; TRANSLATION BY AL I-ASGHAR SEYED-GOHRAR)

Another example is Owhad al-Din Kermāni (d. c. 1238), who would tear open the shirts of prepubescent boys, rubbing his chest against them (Lewis 2000; Ridgeon 2012). Similar stories could be given of Sufis such as Fakhr al-Din ʿErāqi (1213–1289) (Zargar 2011).

While verses of the Qur’an were chanted at such gatherings, it was common to recite erotic couplets such as the following: I will hide

I will hide myself in my poem
So that I can kiss your lips when you read it.
For modern Western audiences, it is hard to imagine that this erotic couplet was sung in tenth-century Persia at a gathering in which male Islamic mystics were listening to music. The couplet demonstrates quite well how different sorts of love, earthly and heavenly, are intermingled. Yet the primary use of this poem was to come into rapturous ecstasy in order to come close to God.

Ghazals

The largest body of homoerotic poetry in Islamic literatures is without doubt in the ghazal form, which was used for a variety of purposes for more than one millennium. Many of these ghazals praise a boy, often a Zoroastrian or Christian. Probably it was the poet Sanāʾi (d. 1131) who introduced such poems. Other influential mystic poets such as ʿAttār (c. 1142–c. 1220), Rumi (1207–1273), and Hafez (c. 1326–c. 1390), to name a few, elaborated on the themes and metaphors. In such poems, the poet is the Muslim lover who is smitten by the love of a Christian boy. He accepts all denigration and humiliation, even renouncing Islam and drinking wine dregs in response to the beloved’s whims. Aside from sexualizing Christianity in such representations, the poet finds a playful way of criticizing orthodox Islam, distancing himself from orthodox Islamic creeds that he regards as impediments on the spiritual path. The references to other religions create a space to view one’s own religion from a new perspective, rejecting the orthodox Islamic appreciation of outward piety. Outward piety is a dangerous pitfall on the mystical path, as it invites people’s respect and can lead to hypocrisy. True piety is between the mystic and the Creator and can be achieved in an outwardly sinful life. It is in the taverns, among the pagans, drunkards, and vagabonds who ridicule Islamic norms and values, that the mystic experiences true love for the one Beloved. The mystic takes refuge from the mosque in the tavern, as here he hears wisdom from a Christian or Zoroastrian guide, whereas in the mosque, the preacher preaches one thing and practices the opposite in private.

These Sufi poems are examples of homoerotic courtship, yet they also idealize and spiritualize love by praising other religions. One example is from the first two couplets of one of Sanāʾi’s many ghazals:

```
You have again robbed me of my Muslim faith; bravo, heathen boy!
You have chained me and have thrown me into a dungeon; bravo, heathen boy!
Again and again you bring me back to the reckless ones, who gamble everything;
You bring me to those masters of love; bravo, heathen boy!
```
Sanāʾi composed a series of poems with the rhyme refrain “boy” (pesar) in which he expresses the erotic relationship and radical renunciation:

\[
\begin{align*}
I, & \text{ your slave, wear a ring in my ear, my boy!} \\
\text{Do not sell me, hold me with you, my boy!} \\
\text{Do not pain yourself in torturing,} \\
\text{Exert yourself to be faithful, my boy!} \\
\text{My dear, take a cup of wine from the cupbearer,} \\
\text{Kiss me with your honey lips, my boy!} \\
\text{Fetch your harp and play like a vagabond,} \\
\text{To bring my soul to its senses, my boy!} \\
\text{Your absence told me stories yesterday,} \\
\text{I repeated them to you in my dream last night, my boy.} \end{align*}
\]

(SANĀʾI 1983, 894; TRANSLATION BY ALI-ASGHAR SEYED-GOHrab, BASED ON J. T. P. DE BRUIJN’S RENDITION)

In such poems, the lover and the beloved remain anonymous. Such poems in praise of a boy belong to the genre of qalandariyyāt (vagabond) expression (de Bruijn 1992), characterized by a set of imagery for radical detachment, related to the debauchery of beggars, gamblers, and drunkards, who stay in pubs, taverns, and brothels at the fringes of Islamic towns, usually called kharābāt (ruined places; from which the word cabaret derives). The masochistic lover describes all the hard things the pagan beloved has done to him so that he might lose his own identity and assume the beloved’s identity. Sufis believe that separate identities are a barrier to union: the lover must annihilate his own identity to attain union. The following example by ʿAttār illustrates the flavor and merits of such ghazals:

\[
\begin{align*}
\text{A Christian boy like a heavenly idol} \\
\text{came unwittingly but drunk from the monastery,} \\
\text{With a Christian belt, a face like a heart-ravisher, a bell, and wine in his hand.} \\
\text{He loudly praised the wine and the disgrace of the Muslims.} \\
\text{When I looked at him carefully, at his eyes, lips, and curls,} \end{align*}
\]
that moon came to sit on the throne of my heart like a sultan.
I grabbed his belt and fell at his feet;
I said, “My life, what should I do?” He replied, “You know this yourself.
O old man who wears the woolen mantle! If you want to have me, you must burn your mantle, you must pray in another direction;
You must then come to our monastery, and choose another prayer niche.
You must read a few lines of our book of love.
We have set these three conditions in the heart of our monastery, so that you leave yourself, let go of your soul and of your heart.
Drink wine in our monastery so that you are enraptured by drunkenness, for in ecstasy you will find what you are looking for.
When it is clear to you who you really are, then shout ‘I am the truth’ in the world of humanity.”
‘Attār! Transcend your own path so you can see;
free yourself because you are hidden from yourself.

(1940, 659–660; TRANSLATION BY ALI-ASGHAR SEYED-GOHrab)

This poem depicts how a Muslim falls in love with a Christian boy, employing a wide range of non-Islamic religious symbols, such as the monastery, bell, idol, and the belt or cord that the non-Muslim population had to wear to distinguish themselves from Muslims. While the love relationship remains central, these symbols and the Christian boy’s provocative statements prepare the ground for the mystic to reject all conventional Muslim piety. It is common in such poems that the male Christian beloved asks the amorous mystic to turn against Islam, to drink wine, to burn the Qur’an, and to follow the path of homoerotic love, leaving behind conventional Islamic piety. The only way to become one with the beloved is to risk one’s good name and reputation, choosing the beloved unconditionally. The mystic uses an outwardly sinful life as a shield from the dangers of hypocritical piety. Such poems are used symbolically to show how the Sufi who yields himself entirely to the immaterial beloved is ready to sacrifice all, including his religion, to attain spiritual love. These erotic motifs remain popular today. Even Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini (1902–1989) used these motifs in his poetry to convey his hatred for Islamic orthodoxy and ironically to emphasize his own superior piety (Seyed-Gohrab 2011).

While these motifs are metaphors used to emphasize one’s inner piety, the antinomian mystics actually lived in Islamic societies from the Balkans to Bengal from the twelfth century onward under various names, such as abdāl, qalandar, or malang. They were famous for appearing naked or semi-naked in public, shaving all facial hair, using piercings in their ears, noses, and genitals, and practicing homosexual relations. The shaving of bodily hair made these qalandars “feminine.” Abu Bakr ibn Abi al-Wafāʾ of Aleppo (1503– 1583) addressed his male audience in Arabic using the grammatical feminine. Shah Hosayn of Lahore “spoke in the voice of a woman’ in his Punjabi poetry, but openly lived with his Brahmin lover Madho in a homoerotic relationship in defiance of prevalent heteronormative custom” (Karamustafa 2015, 121 [quote within quote by Scott Kugle: see Kugle 2007, 201]). Some reports of these wandering mystics call them sodomites. There were also qalandars who refused to participate in the sexual reproduction of society but who “did not exclude unproductive forms of sexual activity” (Karamustafa 1994, 20).

To conclude, homoeroticism is intrinsic to Islamic mysticism, serving various purposes. While admiring a beautiful young male face is to commune with the divine, a profane love relationship is regarded as an exercise to prepare oneself for the divine love. Metaphors, imagery, and anecdotes from daily life are reflected in poetry exhibiting the subtleties of the psychology of love and a homoerotic love relationship. The radical renunciation of the world for the beloved is conveyed in the ghazal genre in which the lover falls in love with a Christian boy and is expected to offer everything to attain union. The qalandar mystics showed the extreme of such an antinomian approach to the norms and values of Islamic society, flouting them by their appearance and by indulging in homosexual love.

From the twentieth century onward, modernizing Muslim intellectuals have treated Sufism as a superstitious backward movement that hindered the progress of Islamic countries (Ridgeon 2006). Basing themselves on modern Western political philosophy, these intellectuals have criticized various Sufi rites and doctrines, including homoerotic relationships. While Sufi literature is still a living tradition in Islamic societies, homosexual practices are repressed in these societies, and homosexual relations are often regarded as a Western cultural invasion that should be resisted.

SEE ALSO Homoerotic Poetry of Abū Nuwās; Homosexual Acts in Shariʿa; Literary Discourses in the Ottoman Middle East (1500–1900); Ottoman and Persian Miniature Paintings

BIBLIOGRAPHY

[http://www.iranicaonline.org/articles/be doved](http://www.iranicaonline.org/articles/be doved)

Najmabadi, Afsaneh. Women with Mustaches and Men without Beards: Gender and Sexual

Traditionally, Nepal has been a country with deeply ingrained social norms regarding marriage and gender roles. However, the abolition of the monarchy in 2008, along with the rise of democratization, led to a rapidly changing social climate. Traditional cultural expectations and family values came under pressure from the processes of globalization and modernization. This caused shifting norms in gender roles, opening up social spaces for sexual and gender minorities to campaign for their rights (Boyce and Coyle 2013). As travel and access to education increased, sexual and gender minorities in Nepal gained exposure to Euro-American conceptions of sexuality, leading to widespread usage of previously unheard-of LGBTQ terminology. Not only are these categories useful in understanding the self in regard to human sexuality, but Paul Boyce and Daniel Coyle (2013) argue that they are essential for campaigning for rights and visibility of gender minority populations.

It is important to acknowledge, however, that the usage of these prescribed labels is a double-edged sword, because legislating for particular groups such as “gay,” “lesbian,” “intersex,” or “transsexual” creates rigid categories that may not represent actual lived experiences of sexuality in Nepal and across South Asia (Coyle and Boyce 2015). In fact, the hegemony of Euro-American conceptions of sexuality and their invasion into the Global South have created conflict between preconceived Euro-American categories and South Asian expressions of sexuality. Research has shown that many Nepali men and women who engage in same-sex activities may not identify explicitly as sexual and gender minorities. Furthermore, it is not uncommon for those who do identify as part of the LGBTQ community to be heterosexually married, a kinship arrangement that allows individuals to satisfy the social obligation to create a family while participating in same-sex relationships and intimacies (Coyle and Boyce 2015).
Discrimination

Queer subjectivity in Nepal and across South Asia is complex and multifaceted. Although the introduction of Euro-American categories such as “lesbian,” “gay,” and “transsexual” is relatively recent and radical, gender nonconformity has been an aspect of cultural ceremonies throughout Nepali history. In these settings, cross-dressing and gender nonconformity are not only sanctioned but an essential aspect of rituals. One example of this phenomenon can be found in the Tharu ethnicity of southern Nepal. In this subgroup, there is a revered ceremony revolving around a dance called the dhumbra, in which a man dresses as a woman and performs emotional dances, songs, and stories, often bringing his audience to tears. The man is referred to as a natuwa, a highly respectful term signifying a creator of happiness. However, individuals who display similar forms of alternative gender expression outside of the role of a natuwa are ostracized and referred to as chakka, a derogatory term (Frisbie 2014). This contradiction represents the conditional acceptance of gender nonconformity that is sanctioned in specific settings but never as a day-to-day existence. Much of this discrimination is rooted in the perceived rejection of patriarchal and social values rather than explicit homophobia. Boyce and Coyle (2013) explain that individuals experience discrimination based on social visibility, given that metis (effeminate or cross-dressing males) are more likely to be targeted than their masculine counterparts, tas (masculine gay men), because metis contradict the social expectations... regarding gender norms.

Discrimination against sexual and gender minorities takes many forms, including harassment, social isolation, difficulty finding employment, and disproportionate detention by police. A central issue for these minorities revolves around citizenship certificates, which are essential documents identifying individuals as members of Nepali society. Without these, individuals are unable to access driver’s licenses and passports, government services, health services, bank accounts, the right to vote, employment opportunities, and land inheritance (Blue Diamond Society and Heartland Alliance 2013). This issue primarily affects those who identify as third gender, a recognized community of Nepal and other parts of South Asia that consists of individuals who fall outside of the gender spectrum, including transgender individuals and those who identify as neither female nor male. A recurring issue for these individuals has been their difficulty in obtaining citizenship certificates that note their self-identified gender rather than the gender they were assigned at birth. Problems occur when these individuals attempt to use a citizenship certificate that lists their birth gender and are denied services or accused of fraud because their gender expression does not match the gender listed on the certificate (Bochenek and Knight 2012). This has prevented third-gender individuals from fully participating in Nepali society and from accessing countless opportunities.

The Case

The issue of citizenship cards along with the aforementioned discrimination led to the 2007 court case Sunil Babu Pant and Others v. Nepal Government. Sunil Babu Pant (founder of the Blue Diamond Society, an LGBTQ rights organization), along with a number of organizations representing sexual and gender minorities such as MITINI Nepal, Cruise AIDS Nepal, and Parichaya Nepal, challenged the government of Nepal and other legislative offices by filing a writ petition under the Interim Constitution of Nepal. Their objective was for sexual and gender minorities to be given the full range of constitutional human rights through the legal recognition of a third-gender category and the creation of a law forbidding discrimination on the basis of gender identity and sexual orientation (“Decision of the Supreme Court on the Rights of Lesbian” 2008).

The petition used Nepali domestic law, comparative law, and international law to demonstrate the legitimacy of its claims. The use of domestic law centered on sections of the Interim Constitution of Nepal, such as Articles 12, 13, 32, and 107. These passages guarantee the right to freedom for all individuals, establish equal protection under the law, provide the right to file a petition before the Supreme Court, and require the Supreme Court to review legislation and enforce constitutional rights. The use of comparative law and international law included the constitutions of Ecuador and South Africa, as well as relevant court cases from other countries that resulted in forms of protection for LGBTQ communities. One example used was the court case McCoskar v. the State (2005), in which the High Court of Fiji established that legal provisions prohibiting homosexual conduct were discriminatory and unconstitutional, overruling Fiji’s sodomy law (Immigration and Refugee Board of Canada 2007).

The government of Nepal responded to the petition with the assertion that it lacked validity, stating that its arguments were based on assumptions of discrimination rather than actual data. It called for a dismissal of the writ petition and argued that any individual who had been mistreated had the ability to use the courts to enforce his or her rights. Conclusively, because the existing legal framework guaranteed all Nepali citizens freedom from discrimination, the government felt that the creation of a separate law for the LGBTQ community was unnecessary (“Decision of the Supreme Court on the Rights of Lesbian” 2008). In response, the petitioners asserted that numerous international courts had created laws catering to the needs of sexual and gender minorities, and they reiterated specific evidence of discrimination.

Court Deliberation

After hearing arguments presented by the petitioners and the defendants, the Supreme Court of Nepal narrowed its deliberation down to four key questions (“Decision of the Supreme Court on the Rights of Lesbian” 2008). These were:

1. Whether the petition regarding the rights of a minority community (on the basis of sexual orientation and gender identity) fell under the category of public interest litigation.
2. Whether members of the LGBTQ community and those identifying as “third gender” possessed these characteristics naturally or whether they were a result of mental perversion.
3. Whether the state of Nepal had truly discriminated against members of the LGBTQ community.
4. Whether the order for legal provisions sought by the petitioners should be issued.

The court concluded that the petition was in fact in the public interest, because it concerned a matter of social justice, citing the constitutional duty of the state to provide equal rights and access to opportunities for all. In regard to whether sexual and gender minorities occur naturally or unnaturally, the court mentioned relevant evidence from the laws of other countries, including the United States, South Africa, and Australia, as well as the European Court of Human Rights. After considering these contexts, as well as widely cited medical research (such as the Kinsey reports), the Supreme Court of Nepal concluded that sexual orientation was a natural aspect of human development rather than a mental perversion or psychological disorder (“Decision of the Supreme Court on the Rights of Lesbian” 2008). As for whether or not LGBTQ individuals had been discriminated against, the court referred to evidence from multiple sources detailing mistreatment of sexual and gender minorities, particularly those of the third gender. It also cited the existence of Nepal’s law on “unnatural coition,” which criminalized same-sex relations and marriage, and urged its removal, noting that it was an appropriate time to begin destigmatizing and decriminalizing same-sex marriage.

Finally, the Supreme Court of Nepal came to its last question: whether or not the orders sought by petitioners should be issued. This was perhaps the most influential segment of the case, because it could lead to court-ordered mandates regarding the legal protection of the LGBTQ community. The court reiterated Nepal’s commitment to equality, concluding that sexual and gender minorities were full citizens under Nepali law and were therefore entitled to all rights provided by the Nepali constitution (“Decision of the Supreme Court on the Rights of Lesbian” 2008). The court then issued a series of instructions to the government of Nepal, the first being an order for the creation of a committee to study the endorsement of same-sex marriage, with the eventual goal of full legalization. The court also ordered the government to recognize the rights of sexual and gender minorities through the creation of new laws prohibiting discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation and gender identity, as well as through the annulment of discriminatory laws. These legal provisions were to be reflected in Nepal’s new constitution, which was in the process of being written.

Legal Outcomes

The 2007 court case Sunil Babu Pant and Others v. Nepal Government significantly improved the legal standing of the LGBTQ community of Nepal. With the ratification of Nepal’s new constitution on 20 September 2015, legal security for the community was made official. Article 12 of the constitution guaranteed every individual the right to a citizenship certificate that coincided with their actual gender identity. As a result of this decree, new citizenship cards were created with a separate column for “third gender.” Recognition of the third gender gives these individuals greater opportunities, from the ability to vote and access public services to increased engagement in social, political, and economic processes. Not only is a third-gender category now included on citizenship certificates, but it also appeared on the national census for the first time ever in 2011. This census is used for the creation of budget allocations by the government for programs benefiting these individuals (Boyce and Coyle 2013). Additionally, Nepal’s Ministry of Education planned to include third-gender issues in the national health and reproductive curriculum, a development with the potential to raise awareness regarding sexual and gender minorities (Boyce and Coyle 2013). Not only have third-gender individuals benefited, but the new constitution guaranteed all sexual and gender minorities the right to employment opportunities (Article 42) and listed the community among minority groups of Nepal that deserved empowerment and protection (Article 18). The constitution also reiterated Nepal’s commitment to equality and condemned all forms of discrimination, authorizing protection for sexual and gender minorities in a legal format for the first time.

The constitution failed, however, to address the issue of same-sex marriage. Although this issue was still being discussed within the government of Nepal as of 2017, the country is expected to take steps toward legalization in the future because the Supreme Court of Nepal's order was binding. As legalization looms, a common quandary is the question of whether marriage involving third-gender individuals will be classified as same-sex or heterosexual marriage. In one case, a union between a transgender woman who identifies as third gender and a man was categorized as same-sex (Agence France-Presse 2017). (This marriage was registered locally but remains legally unofficial.) If this serves as an indicator for future cases, it implies that unions involving third-gender individuals will be classified as same-sex marriages regardless of the original birth certificates and gender identities. Yet, because no official same-sex unions had been performed as of 2017, the resolution of this issue remains uncertain.

Related Casework

The Supreme Court of Nepal's progressive ruling not only had a notable influence on the new constitution, but it laid the groundwork for progressive outcomes in derivative cases. One such case was the 2012 Supreme Court case Rajani Shahi v. National Women Commission et al., in which Shahi petitioned for the right to live with her female partner rather than her husband. Shahi filed for divorce from her husband after beginning a relationship with a woman, Prem Kumari Nepali. However, Shahi's husband threatened her and, at the recommendation of the National Women Commission, sent her to Maiti Nepal, an institution whose goal was “eradicating social evils” (Scribd.com 2013, 3). Maiti Nepal held Shahi in custody for forty-five days with the explanation that they were attempting to change her sexual orientation. In response, Prem Kumari filed a writ petition in Shahi’s name, asking for her release and for the two to be allowed to live together freely. This case highlighted the conflict between Nepal’s traditional structure of heterosexual marriage and the right to freedom. The court declared that despite the importance of marriage in Nepali society, it was not worth the cost of personal liberty. It argued that all individuals deserve equal rights, regardless of sexual orientation, and concluded that it was not legal to prevent two consenting adults from cohabitating (Scribd.com 2013).

An Altered Climate but Challenges Remain

Sunil Babu Pant and Others v. Nepal Government altered the situation for sexual and gender minorities in Nepal. Steps were taken with regard to both legal recognition of LGBTQ rights and acceptance of the third-gender identity. Despite these advancements, attitudes toward the LGBTQ community remain complex, and many of these individuals are far more marginalized than legal progress would suggest. For instance, although the government of Nepal created a third-gender category on citizenship certificates, reports show that many individuals have been unable to actually obtain these documents. The causes behind this serious shortcoming range from bureaucratic obstacles to noncompliant government officials (Coyle and Boyce 2015). This demonstrates that altering legislation does not, in itself, guarantee the elimination of discrimination based on sexual orientation or gender identity.

In fact, some scholars claim that the creation of an official third-gender category in Nepal and other parts of South Asia, although legally progressive, has led to negative social outcomes. As Adnan Hossain explains, the designation of individuals as third gender can be misunderstood as “a form of gender failure on the part of those who fail to be either sufficiently masculine or feminine” (2017, 1428). In addition, the promotion of the third-gender community as a marginalized group has inadvertently led to misunderstandings, causing many to view third-gender individuals as being sexually or otherwise disabled (Hossain 2017). It is clear that, despite positive legal reform, sexual and gender minorities face the difficult task of transforming social perceptions and altering cultural norms that have existed for centuries. Social pressure and discrimination still shape the lives of sexual and gender minorities in Nepal. However, shifting social attitudes are slowly leading to greater acceptance of this marginalized population, as Nepal creates its own narrative of sexual and gender subjectivities.

SEE ALSO Family Law in Asia; Section 377 in South Asia tatiana de la tierra (1961–2012) was a Colombian writer, archivist, librarian, activist, and pivotal figure in the formation of transnational networks of Latina lesbians across the Americas. Primarily known for her role in the creation and circulation of the Latina lesbian magazines esto no tiene nombre (1991–1994; this has no name) and conmoción: revista y red revolucionaria de lesbianas latinas (1995–1996; commotion: magazine and revolutionary network of Latina lesbians), de la tierra was also a prolific writer who published essays, short stories, poetry, and critical scholarship. Writing in Spanish, English, and Spanglish, her creative production engaged directly and explicitly with themes of sexuality, the body, migrant memory, and lesbian desire and includes the books Para las duras: Una fenomenología lesbiana / For the Hard Ones: A Lesbian Phenomenology (2002); Porcupine Love and Other Tales from My Papaya (2005); Píntame una mujer peligrosa (2005; Paint me a dangerous woman), and a Spanish-language children’s book, Xía y las mil sirenas (2009; Xía and the thousand sirens).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Biographical Overview

Born in Villavicencio, Colombia, on 14 May 1961, de la tierra immigrated in 1969 at the age of eight to the United States, where her family settled in Homestead, Florida. In one of her several artist bios, this one published on her website, she states, “I grew up in typical Spanish-speaking immigrant fashion—poor and future-less” (de la tierra 2004). Her writing frequently commented on both the devastating beauty and quotidian violence of her homeland, as well as the vicissitudes of migration, exile, displacement, biculturalism, and geographic longings. After high school, she attended Miami Dade Community College and later, in 1984, graduated from the University of Florida; shortly afterward, she completed certification to become a massage therapist. In her piece “Wings,” published in Michelle Tea’s collection Without a Net: The Female Experience of Growing Up Working Class, de la tierra describes her early induction into the US school system, writing, “I would master the English language. I would infiltrate the gringo culture without letting on that I was a traitor. I would battle in their tongue and make them stumble. I would cut out their souls and leave them on the shore to be pecked on by vultures” (2003, 96). In 1999 she completed a bilingual master's in creative writing at the University of Texas at El Paso, and a year later she earned another master's degree, this one in library science, at the State University of New York at Buffalo, where she worked as a librarian before moving to Long Beach, California. As a librarian, she was a fierce advocate for Latina/o and Latin American queers, publishing book reviews and bibliographical accounts of Latina lesbian literary history, including the essay “Latina Lesbian Literary Herstory: From Sor Juana to Days of Awe,” published in The Power of Language / El poder de la palabra: Selected Papers from the Second REFORMA National Conference (2001). In these professional library venues, she would repeatedly decry the whiteness of LGBT literature and the lack of queer representation of Latinas in mainstream literary circles.

Colombian Writer and Activist tatiana de la tierra. de la tierra was a pivotal figure in the formation of transnational networks of Latina lesbians across the Americas as well as the creation of the Latina lesbian magazines esto no tiene nombre and conmoción.

A lifelong writer and adventurer who described herself as “a barefoot traveling lesbian in search of an exotic secret society,” de la tierra was immersed in the emerging transnational Latina and lesbian of color movements of the 1980s and 1990s (de la tierra 2004). She was a frequent participant in the Encuentros de Lesbianas Feministas de América Latina y el Caribe, gatherings of Latina lesbians from across the United States, Latin America, and the Caribbean that first took place in Cuernavaca, Mexico, in 1987, and were later hosted in Argentina, Costa Rica, Puerto Rico, and Brazil. Organized to create transnational networks of exchange, these Encuentros served as a means to share locally produced newsletters, books, pamphlets, and other forms of creative production among Latinas across the hemisphere.

Editorial Contributions

Inspired by these international identity-based formations and the recent publication of This Bridge Called My Back: Writings by Radical Women of Color (1981), de la tierra joined the newsletter committee of the nascent Miami-based Latina lesbian group Las Salamandras de Ambiente (The Queer Salamanders), and along with Vanessa Cruz, Patricia Pereira-Pujol, and Margarita Castilla, she worked to produce esto no tiene nombre, a bilingual newsletter that featured poetry, interviews, comics, drawings, photography, and reviews. After publishing a review of a lesbian pornographic film, de la tierra and her collaborators were asked to leave Las Salamandras for printing what were deemed “groserías” (vulgarities) that some more conservative members felt did not reflect the values of the group, and the magazine broke away from Las Salamandras after the first issue.

Born out of this early moment of censorship, much of the writing and images published in esto no tiene nombre explicitly documented in images Latina lesbian sexuality and desire, including the editorial decision to publish an orgasm in every issue, whether as a poem, image, or prose. The magazine went on to develop an international circulation throughout North and South America and Europe while also serving as a venue to promote local events organized by the many identity-based gay and lesbian groups that emerged during this period in Latin America and the United States. In 1995 esto no tiene nombre was followed by the glossier and more professionally published magazine conmoción, an effort that received limited funding from a variety of LGBT and feminist sources before filing for bankruptcy in 1996.

In photography, drawings, poetry, editorials, letters, and prose, these magazines boldly tackled topics of AIDS, sadomasochism, sex work, drug addiction, sexual roles, race and racism, online hookups, and local political debates in diverse Latina lesbian communities. In the process, they provided a publishing venue for emerging writers and artists including Laura Aguilar, Alicia Gaspar de Alba, Erika Lopez, Carmen de Monteflores, Cherrie Moraga, Achy Objeas, Rosamaría Roffiel, Sheila Ortiz Taylor, Carmelita Tropicana, Luz María Umpierre, and many others. In her 2002 essay “Activist Latina Lesbian Publishing: esto no tiene nombre and conmoción,” published in the journal Aztlán, de la tierra provides a vibrant, hilarious, and vital account of this moment in Latina lesbian history and discusses the messy personal and political dynamics involved in the formation and dissolution of these groundbreaking publications. In connection with conmoción, de la tierra and Lesley Salas created La Telaraña (The Spiderweb), a web platform to connect Latina lesbian writers and artists; years later; she was an active member of the online community *La Bloga, a bilingual blog focusing on Latina/o writers.

Unapologetically sexual, fat, and decidedly femme, de la tierra often wrote odes to lesbian sex, her own “big fat pussy,” and what she describes as lesbian smut and drama (2005b, 5). In describing her initiation into lesbianism, she writes, “I discovered an incredible knack for good sex and sick relationships” (1998, 128). With titles such as “Neurotic Love Letters,” “True Cunt Stories,” and “When Cunt Is Angry,” her prose evinces humor and heartbreak, perverse passions, and lesbian love stories alongside her own theorizations on life, sex, and language (de la tierra 2004). In the essay “About the Tongue,” included in Para las duras, she writes, why not admit that the tongue is the lesbian mascot?

with the tongue you can say: “I’m going to eat you piece by piece.”

with the tongue you can make: a platter between the legs, a direct connection between the body and soul, thunder and lightning at the base of the throat, a private dish, multiple orgasms, silence from the eye of the hurricane, a lesbian symphonic orchestra.

(2002B, 37)

Experimentation with Literary Forms

While much of her work could be described as creative nonfiction, throughout her career she experimented with literary forms, including monologue, the epistolary, lyric poetry, erotica, and drama. The musicality and orality of her writing was felt most powerfully in her numerous international public performances throughout the United States, Latin America, the Caribbean, and Spain, some of which exist in digital form. A survivor of childhood sexual abuse, her writing luxuriated in the vulnerability and sensorial delights of the flesh, and she frequently published naked photographs of herself as a way to reclaim the pleasures of her own body. An avid collector of Latin American music, particularly music by women, her extensive music library was donated to the UCLA Ethnomusicology Library as the tatiana de la tierra Collection of Sound Recordings, while her letters and papers are collected in the UCLA Chicano Studies Research Center.
Throughout her life, de la tierra struggled with health issues; in 1990 she was diagnosed with lupus, and in 2012 she was diagnosed with terminal cancer. Throughout her life, she pursued a range of alternative health options and cultivated an active spiritual practice—topics that she integrated into her writing and her identity. These were activated most fully as she prepared herself and her community for her eventual passing with rituals and the gathering of the queer tribe that formed around her Long Beach home. Shortly before her death, she renamed herself Suerte Sirena (Lucky Mermaid). She died on 31 July 2012.

In 2018 the journal Sinister Wisdom and A Midsummer Night's Press republished Para las duras: Una fenomenología lesbiana / For the Hard Ones: A Lesbian Phenomenology as part of their Sapphic Classic editions. This new edition includes an introduction by scholars Olga García Echeverría and Maylei Blackwell, a foreword by creative writer Myriam Gurba, an essay on the influence of de la tierra's editorial work by Sara Gregory, and a tribute to de la tierra's life and work by her mother.

SEE ALSO Human Rights and Activism in Latin America; Lesbian Feminist Encuentros of Latin America and the Caribbean

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Thai K-Pop

DREDGE BYUNG’CHU KANG
Faculty, Department of Anthropology
University of California, San Diego

The impact of this popular music genre on queer Thai identity.

New technologies and media have been employed to heighten the power of the Thai monarchy and state. Thailand was one of the first countries outside the West to employ film and photography in the service of imagined citizenship and nationalism. Thai print magazines in the early twentieth century were instrumental in developing middle-class consciousness around national identity, social status, and normative gender and sexuality (Barmé 2002). The state continues to monitor and manage the production of “national” representations. Culturally inappropriate imagery is censored or banned, while the state sponsors historical films, particularly about the monarchy. The Thai state uses media in support of “Thainess,” in an ongoing effort to create a national culture designed by elites to improve the image of the nation to itself and outsiders. Political figures, for example, would be accused of not being patriotic if they were associated with anything but Thai music.

However, media is a contested, expanding, and increasingly unregulated global resource. Since the 1980s, Hong Kong cinema and Japanese animation and music have become popular in Thailand. Following the financial crisis of 1997, Korean popular music (K-pop) and Korean television series (K-drama) have become trendy among the urban middle class in Thailand. Importantly, the transnational genre known as K-pop is but a subgenre of Korean popular music (since the incorporation of rap) that is branded as distinctly Korean and promoted overseas. Similarly, K-drama generally refers to nighttime soap operas of relatively short duration that are easily packaged in seasons and sold as DVDs, as opposed to ongoing daytime soaps of indefinite duration.

Styles and Market Value of Popular Music in Thailand

Regarding music, there is a distinction between “populist” and “popular,” in that the former is associated with spaces of protest and marginalized dissent (Tausig 2013). Thai popular music is more broadly associated with rurality, the urban working class, and the urban middle class. Common Thai genres include mor lam (Lao-Thai folk music with roots in Buddhist moral fables that now include a wide variety of themes and styles, including electronic dance music) and luk thung (“songs about life,” often referred to as Thai “country” music, centered on difficulties in life, poverty, and longing). Foreign pop music, especially from the United States, is also widely disseminated. While all these genres are modern, luk thung and mor lam are often described as “traditional” Thai music. These styles of music, often considered low class, are quite popular among middle-class urbanites with roots in provincial areas and those nostalgic for traditional Thai culture. Thus, mor lam and luk thung are widely broadcast on television and radio and are common in live performances.

Thai pop music, based on Western pop music, became a genre in the 1970s and 1980s following the extensive presence of American soldiers during the American War in Southeast Asia (known as the Vietnam War in the United States). Thereafter, Thai pop music became mainstream among the urban middle classes. As Ubonrat Siriyuvasak and Hyunjoon Shin (2007) note, Western music has a relatively low market share (10–15%) in Thailand, and the trend is toward K-pop. In 2011 the Thailand Creative and Design Center estimated the market value for music to be 20 billion Thai baht, or about $654 million. However, the extent of Thai K-pop’s fan base and revenues in comparison to Thai pop, rock, luk thung, or mor lam is unclear, as objective data on sales and rankings are not available. There are no independent figures about the market provided by the industry itself. Two highly competitive companies, GMM (generally credited with creating the genre of Thai pop music) and RS, control the market. Each publishes its own charts, restricted to its own artists. Additionally, since so much music consumption in Thailand occurs via pirated sources, these figures are likely unreliable. Late in the first decade of the twenty-first century, street vendors selling “Top 100 K-pop” CDs typically charged around 50 baht (about $1.75), while copyrighted digital downloads generally cost 29 baht (about $1.00) per song. The Thailand iTunes store, Intensive-Watch, and MusicWeekly.asia provide proxies but have their own limitations. Thus, there is no reliable way to measure the sales impact of K-pop in Thailand.

Cultural Salience of K-Pop in Thailand

Alternatively, one can examine the cultural salience of Kpop. K-pop, which is already a hybridized pop genre, has become incorporated into Thai pop. RS has several subbrands of music, including Kamikaze (also called Zheza) and RSiam (luk thung). Kamikaze targets young people nine to seventeen years old and is known for copying Kpop. The Thai pop group 7 Days, for example, is a facsimile of the popular South Korean group Girls' Generation. In 2009 Thai pop singer Sadoet had a hit with “Sao Kaoli” (Korean girl), about a Thai girl who idolizes Korean music, dramas, food, and sleeps with a cutout of a Korean singer. A common theme portrays rural girls who want to go to the big city or sometimes to Korea.

K-pop is commonly played in commercial spaces, such as shopping malls. Siriyuvasak and Shin (2007) report that in Thailand K-pop is primarily followed by young, middle-class girls. However, young gays (especially young feminine gay men known in Thailand as tut or “sissies,” a sometimes derogatory term that is used for self-identification like “queer”) and lesbians (toms) are also avid fans. In Thai slang, K-pop is also known as “gay-pop.” Cross-gender performances of K-pop cover dance (the copying of choreographed movements from music videos) are popular among young girls, gays, and lesbians (Kang 2014). K-pop cover dance is a popular social activity and is often performed on television shows like Thailand’s Got Talent and on documentaries on Thai public television. There is a vibrant cover dance contest circuit in Thailand, and Thai sissies are among the most successful competitors in the international K-Pop Cover Dance Festival (see coverdance.org). In 2011 the first year of competition, a group of Thai boys placed third doing a girl group routine. Many Thai commentators claimed that the boys did not win because Koreans are homophobic and could not accept the cross-gender performance. The following two years, Thai boy groups who covered boy bands won the competition. Thais placed second in 2014 and won again in 2015. These Thai K-pop cover dance groups become minor celebrities in Thailand. The dancers are interviewed on national television and develop fan followings as if they were actual Korean idols (Kang 2018).

For young consumers, K-pop and other aspects of the K-wave, such as the popularity of Korean cosmetics and electronics, signify cosmopolitan pan-Asian modernity and aspirations of participation in an ascending Asia, where Korea represents the most desirable model (Hoang 2015). “Asia,” in the minds of Thais, is often reduced to certain national ethnicities that have achieved global economic power and civilizational status (Kang 2017). This view is reinforced by the prevalence of desirable consumer media and goods from such nations as Korea and Japan. In Thailand, K-pop has come to represent “Asian” music, vastly dominating the occasional songs from Japan, Indonesia, and other nations on radio and television. If one watches Asian music video shows on Thai television, one is likely to see mostly K-pop, with a song from another country occasionally added to the mix. Ben Tausig (2013) notes that K-pop music has both influenced and stands in contrast to popular Thai music genres. “International” nightclubs play Western music (primarily American), while Thai nightclubs play Thai, Korean, and Western music. During the beginning of the twenty-first century, the majority of music heard in Thai gay bars was K-pop. Kpop’s dominance of the Thai soundscape peaked around 2010 in gay venues and 2012 in Bangkok more broadly. Since then, K-pop has become ubiquitous.

The most popular Thai musician of all time is Bird Thongchai, whose recording career has spanned more than thirty years. The video for Thongchai’s 2010 smash hit “Too Much, So Much, Very Much” visually mimicked K-pop. Following K-pop genre conventions of combining a simple signature move within a longer choreographic group sequence, Bird’s V-shaped fingers traversing the eyes was the local equivalent of popular Korean singer Psy’s horse dance. Thongchai’s music video even incorporated practice sessions for choreography to the song and a pseudo K-pop cover dance contest.

Thai Indigenization and Refashioning of K-Pop

The Thai indigenization of K-pop has also circulated to other parts of Asia. For example, the video for Thai pop group 3.2.1’s 2013 song “Rak Tong Poet (Naen Ok)” (“Splash Out”), featuring Baitoey, includes a chest pump signature move and group choreography that features numerous gay and trans performers. The signature move references a campy, salacious play on words in which love literally bursts out of the chest. One of the most popular songs for gay men at the time, it was played often at gay venues and during Songkran (Thai New Year) festivities. Because Bangkok is a major travel destination for Asian gay men, the song traveled back home with them. Thus, “Rak Tong Poet (Naen Ok)” became a broader gay dance song in the region, particularly in Taiwan. In 2014 gay Taiwanese men regularly cover danced to it in G*Star Club, one of Taipei’s most popular gay clubs, similar to the cover dancing by Thai men to K-pop in gay clubs.

The popularity of “soft” K-pop masculinity has molded Thai aesthetics of masculinity among queers and straight Thai men (Kang 2019). Thai men often state that Korean women are more beautiful than Thai women. Some of them also believe that donning K-style outfits will attract women (Cornwel-Smith 2013). But Kmimicry is most pronounced among queer youth. Young toms and gay-sao (girly gays) model K-pop flower-boy masculinity (Sinnott 2012) so precisely that their sartorial style is often indistinguishable (Kang 2018). That is, butch lesbian and sissy style has converged on the same formulation of masculinity. Moreover, K-pop and K-drama masculinity have opened the space for Thai toms to perform and enact new gender and sexual identities, such as tom-gay (a butch lesbian in a relationship with another butch lesbian), a gender/sexuality category previously considered unimaginable (Sinnott 2004). Similarly, Kmasculinity in dialogue with boys love (BL), or homoeroticaesthetics, has allowed for new ways of being among Thai gays. Thus, K-pop is not only popular, but has shaped the lived experience of gender and sexuality in Thailand, especially among queer youth.

Thais have also been transforming K-pop. Thai performers, such as Nichkhun Buck Horvejkul of the South Korean group 2PM and BamBam (Kunpimook Bhuwakul) of Got7, have become popular K-pop stars and Thai brand ambassadors. Moreover, local producers have adopted K-pop aesthetics and conventions to such a degree that they are often presumed to be Thai. This indigenization and refashioning of K-pop and popular cultural genres, such as BL, has circulated in overlapping networks with the K-wave and Cool Japan and has produced its own fandoms in China, Vietnam, the Philippines, Malaysia, Indonesia, and other countries in the region. For example, the Wonder Gay, who cover the South Korean group Wonder Girls, are a Thai K-pop cover group that achieved national and international fame, inspiring Wonder Gay coverers across the globe (Kang 2018). Thus, Thailand acts as a critical node for K-pop, through its consumption, production, and recirculation.

SEE ALSO Boys Love (Yaoi) Manga; The Lesbian Music Movement; New Media in Asia; Popular Music and Queer Identities

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Central to queer theater and performance is its connections with gay theater and performance; often the terms gay and queer function as synonyms in this context. Likewise, in the Global North, queer theater and performance has emerged as a marketing term that covers both queer and gay theater performance. The differences and connections between queer and gay reflect their respective politics and histories in complex ways. In simple terms, however, gay theater has tended to represent dominant norms of gayness—the homonormative (Duggan 2003)—and queer theater tends to undermine and question those norms, especially around gender, sexuality, identity, parenthood, and marriage, for example. In the Anglo-American context, gay work, which encompasses representations of lesbian, bisexual, and trans people, has occupied main stages in dominant theaters, reflecting normative representational modes of performance, whereas queer work tends to happen in other spaces—nightclubs, galleries, festivals, streets, and protests, for example—and is more often experimental in form. Both queer and gay theater continue to use performance as protest. There is by no means a clear consensus around how they are defined and where they overlay each other.

Because gender and sexuality are socially constituted and controlled, it is important to note in a global context that queer theater functions differently depending on its location geographically and historically. Given the cultural, geographic, and historical specificity of queerness, the location of the performance in time and space is important to the title “queer theater.” As Alyson Campbell and Stephen Farrier (2015) argue, queer performance is located such that what may appear to be radically queer at one time and place, may not in another.

Recognizing that queer and gay theater work is context dependent and emerges in relation to geographical location is significant. Broadly speaking, for countries with a gay liberation narrative similar to the Anglo-American, the appearance of queer and gay theater may be charted alongside an acquisition of rights. It is important, however, not to expect that all queer and gay theater can be read in this way. For instance in relation to Singapore, Audrey Yue and Jun Zubillaga-Pow (2012) have demonstrated that LGBTQ identities are present... less because of a liberation process matching an Anglo-American narrative but rather through “illiberal pragmatics,” though discourses of liberation persist in such contexts. There are many different ways that gay and queer materialize geographically (Altman 2001); likewise, the development of queer and gay theater is fluid and complex in each location. By dint of its subject matter, however, wherever queer and gay theater and performance develops, it does so in relation to the social politics of local conditions and histories, as well as to the global context. Both gay and queer theater have strong relations to social politics and are deeply connected with identity; in these politics, there is a constant questioning of what constitutes “gay” and “queer.” Queer and gay theater have strong connections with the women’s movement (French 2017; Case 2009), disability politics (McRuer 2006), race politics (Johnson and Rivera-Servera 2016), and the impact of AIDS (Juntunen 2016; Schulman 1998; Román 1998). As such, queer and gay theater developed in and around these and other social political movements and politics and is connected to theater and performance’s histories and lineages. Consequently, there are many ways in which queer and gay theater can be described: chronologically; thematically, in terms of form and traditions; or in relation to social politics and protest, such as appeals to tolerance or arguments for liberation (Fisher 2008).

Dominant Narratives

Given the complexity of definition, this entry articulates a connection from gay theater through the middle of the twentieth century, toward queer theater at the latter end of the twentieth century and into the twenty-first, with the understanding that this is a contested lineage and that it is more complex. But, even before gay as a term was commonplace, works of same-sex love and desire were present on the stage. Alan Sinfield (1999) has linked homosexuality on stage to the start of the twentieth century, which he sees as the period when the modern idea of homosexuality developed, noting the influence of the Irish playwright Oscar Wilde (1854–1900) and the English writer Radclyffe Hall (1880–1943) on the popularization of understanding homosexuality. Although not covered herein, others trace the relations of theater and performance to gayness beyond this period (Freccero 2006; Garber 1992).

Some collections of plays claim representations as gay and/or queer before the terms were understood as they are today; volume 1 of Gay Plays (Wilcox 1984), for instance, includes the English playwright Mordaunt Shairp’s The Green Bay Tree (1933), which played successfully in London and New York, as an early exemplar of this. Earlier than this, however, there were other plays. For instance, while Sholem Asch’s 1907 Yiddish play The God of Vengeance (English-language production in 1923 in New York) represents a lesbian relationship, its author was ambivalent about showing it in the United States (see Warren Hoffman 2009 and Paula Vogel’s play Indecent [2017], which is about the production’s history). In the same decade Mae West, writing under the name Jane Mast, produced *The Drag in 1927, a play that was panned by critics and closed after two weeks because of its unguarded rendering of homosexuality. In 1926 The Captive opened in the United States; it was an English translation of La prisonnière (The [female] prisoner) by the French playwright Édouard Bourdet. Previously performed in Paris, the play included a depiction of lesbianism, which eventually caused it to be shut down based on obscenity laws after 160 Broadway performances. Other notable plays present in the period include the German Hungarian writer and artist Christa Winsloe's play Gestern und heute (1930; Yesterday and today), which had its first English-speaking production in London in 1932 and depicts a lesbian relationship forming in a girls’ school. The play appeared as a film in 1931 under the title Mädchen in Uniform (Girls in uniform; screenplay by Winsloe; directed by Leontine Sagan) with a different ending than the stage version; the play ends with one of the girls committing suicide, whereas the film ends by showing that the character wants to kill herself. Similarly, the American writer Lillian Hellman's (1905–1984) The Children’s Hour (1934) is also set in a girls’ school. The play depicts how two women’s lives are pulled apart because of an accusation of lesbianism. As the play progresses, it is revealed that one of the characters indeed has lesbian desires and at the end shoots herself.

The depiction of homosexuality on stage from the 1930s through the early 1960s most often depicted homosexuality as a problem—as degeneracy, sickness, or criminality. Neil Bartlett has called these “problem plays” (2002, 306) in which homosexual women and men are the problem. The common social discourses at the time in the United Kingdom and the United States mainly concurred with the characterization of homosexuality as problem, disorder, and disease. Yet, even though some forms of homosexuality were legislated against, its appearance on stage was consistent, if not direct. After the 1930s it appears on stage mostly through implication, via subtext, and as open secret. Thus, in some early works, which now can be read as gay plays, the subject is often dealt with indirectly. (The word homosexual does not appear in Shairp’s play, for instance.)

Perhaps because of the historical proximity of newly developing ideas of sexology and sexual identity alongside the ebb and flow of social and legislative attitudes toward homosexuality, some portrayals in the 1930s appear more open than later depictions in that they do not seem exploitative and are genuinely interested by the “problem”—though still extant were other works that do not directly engage with homosexuality by writers such as the English playwrights Noël Coward (1899–1973) and Terence Rattigan (1911–1977), for example, which may now be understood as containing gay themes. As such, indirect reference to homosexuality on stage proceeded into the 1950s. Writers across this period often did not directly reference homosexuality in strong terms but dealt with it by critiquing normative gender. The work of the American playwright Tennessee Williams (1911–1983) sits here along with that of his compatriot Eugene O’Neill (1888–1953) and works such as Rattigan’s The Deep Blue Sea (1952). Although the general trends of these plays are to hint at homosexuality, sometimes homosexuality appears as a problem and secret, as in Robert Anderson’s Tea and Sympathy (1953) or in Williams’s Suddenly Last Summer (1958). The writers of these emblematic plays, staged in an increasingly conservative social context, used ambiguity to get around social, political, and legislative mores; in the British context, theater was subject to censorship until 1968 (though with some loopholes). Both formal and informal censorship has been a feature of the context in which gay and queer work has been produced and continues to exist across the world in relation to queer performance. In other parts of Europe, however, writers and works that are now considered queer and/or gay were present; particularly emblematic are the French writer Jean Genet’s (1910–1986) works The Maids (1947) and The Balcony (1957), which remain notably influential and are still performed. Work by an earlier Spanish playwright and poet, Federico García Lorca (1898–1936), is now read through a gay lens, although Lorca’s work for the theater deals less with gayness directly than with frustrated love in a conservative context; his poems, however, are more candidly about gay love.

In the 1960s, however, gays and lesbians became more visible, certainly in Anglo-American contexts, though, of course, not exclusively so. For instance, outside this context the Brazilian playwright Nelson Rodrigues’s O beijo no asfalto (1960; staged in English as The Asphalt Kiss) is unambiguously about homophobia and newspaper sensationalism rather than the representation of a gay person on stage. Instead of the guilt-ridden images of the 1950s, homosexuals emerged in new ways. In the West End of London and on Broadway, the English playwright Joe Orton (1933–1967) made explicit reference to homosexuality (with more success in London than New York) even when there was state censorship of theater in the United Kingdom. Focusing on a lesbian relationship, The Killing of Sister George, by Frank Marcus, appeared in the United Kingdom in 1965 and in New York a year later. In 1968 it was adapted into a popular film (screenplay by Lukas Heller; directed by Robert Aldrich) in which a lesbian sex scene appears. Although groundbreaking because it presents a lesbian relationship, the play also shows lesbians as maladapted, infantile, petty, and spiteful. The play’s presentation of gayness relies on the dysfunctional homosexual as a key trope.

Even where gayness is pondered openly by characters, it is relayed as dysfunctional. For instance, The Boys in the Band (1968), by the American playwright Mart Crowley, has been described as contributing to negative stereotypes about gay men (as noted by the writer and novelist Merle Miller in 1971). It can be considered that even as far back as Hellman, gays and lesbians seemed to appear on stage only if they were unhappy or died before the final curtain. However, The Boys in the Band introduces the “gay speak” of the time; consequently, the depictions appear more rounded and recognizably gay. Indeed, for some of the characters being gay is not the primary issue they deal with in the play. The play set off a long debate about whether it was a positive or negative representation; by the early twenty-first century, critics were making the point that negative readings of the play do not account for its progressive attitude to “effeminate-male courage” (Schiavi 2002, 307). Thus, there is a balance to be struck when studying such works because the representation of queers at this stage had a “cost”; to appear they, generally, could not be seen to be happy.
(though, with some exceptions, in Orton, for instance), but showing them to a wide audience meant that those who were queer spectators saw that they were not alone.

The Gays Appear

The late 1960s was a key time for gays in the West as it marked the beginning of the rolling back of legal prohibitions against male homosexuality. Further opportunities for gay and queer work opened because of the growth of liberal social attitudes in the Anglo-American context, the lifting of theater censorship in England in 1968, and the development of off-Broadway venues in New York and fringe venues in the United Kingdom. In both locations, there was a growth in performance and theater companies. Through the 1960s, there is not only a diversification of the kinds of work but also a broadening of the way that the work was made, particularly in relation to politics. Of course, the changes in legislation meant that not only did gay plays diversify and queer works, as now understood, started to emerge, but also gay and lesbian audiences became more visible in the theatrical landscape. Supported by gay audiences in New York’s Caffe Cino, for instance, the playwright Doric Wilson was nurtured and produced several of his early works in 1961 (this was followed by other writers).
In the 1970s there developed works that explore gayness in diverse ways other than as open secret or miserable existence, in part because the development of gay liberation began to complicate the social resonances of representations. There were gay play collections (William M. Hoffman 1979); the first gay companies in New York (TOSOS formed in part by Wilson in 1974 and The Glines, a gay arts center founded in 1976); works that began unearthing gay histories (Martin Sherman's Bent [1979]); and works that focused on stories less concerned with the psychological misery of the homosexual individual and that began to examine the social pressure to conform (Torch Song Trilogy, the first part of which was staged in New York at La MaMa in 1978). In the United Kingdom in 1974, Gay Sweatshop theater company formed, initially as a collective until 1978, and then as a company limited by guarantee; the organization of the company reflected the politics of the time because it was not driven by commercialism, although some of the plays and people with whom it worked did enjoy commercial and critical success. The company received state funding and toured extensively in the United Kingdom with productions that had explicitly gay content. At its heart, the company was founded to articulate and resist the politics of inequality. Likewise in the United Kingdom, the gay theater company Brixton Faeries was founded in 1974 at the South London Gay Community Centre. By 1979 Buddies in Bad Times had formed in Toronto, Canada; this company grew in influence throughout the 1980s and still produces work. Likewise, lesbian companies sprung up in the United Kingdom; Hormone Imbalance and Siren Theatre Company (the latter also being a punk band) were both formed in 1979, while Hard Corps was established in 1983, with many more created around this time. From the early 1980s onward, many of these UK companies played at the Drill Hall in London, a venue that developed queer work well into the first decade of the twenty-first century.

AIDS and Its Impacts

The works that appear in the 1960s and 1970s were the early point in formal experimentation in and around identity and performance, and it is at this point that queer theater began to grow from gay theater. Charles London (2002) sees queer theater developing from the work of Charles Ludlam's Theater of the Ridiculous in 1965. The experimentation with form that might be a clear index of queer theater began to be more visible in the 1980s. In the early 1980s, as the AIDS crisis began to hit the gay male population in the United States and United Kingdom, works emerged that dealt directly with the crisis, most notably Larry Kramer's The Normal Heart, produced at the Public Theater in New York in 1985. The play's set was simple, and present on it—and in the theater—were up-to-date figures of deaths from AIDS-related illness, figures kept updated by crossing out the old number, leaving it visible, and replacing it with the latest one. AIDS had a profound impact on queer theater, not only in terms of the number of plays written in response to it but also in terms of how the political arms of the queer community responded to the crisis with direct action. The defining play that deals with AIDS must be Tony Kushner’s two-part epic Angels in America: A Gay Fantasia on National Themes (1991 and 1992). Formally the work is complex, theatrical, and folds AIDS and HIV into ideas of American nationhood, history, and identity. Structurally, it is queer in that it does not function as realist narrative, as had much of the work from the 1920s through the 1950s. The work is so rich that it sustains much scholarship and often is revived. It has been performed around the world, including productions at the National Theatre in London in 1992, 1993, and 2017, a production in Rio de Janeiro in 1995, and another in the Philippines in 1995. However, right from the beginning of plays about AIDS, aesthetic and experimentation were present, notably in Robert Chesley’s extreme and dreamlike work Night Sweat (1984). Other notable plays that dealt with HIV and AIDS at this point include The AIDS Show in 1984 and 1985 at the Theatre Rhinoceros in San Francisco, William M. Hoffman’s As Is (1985), Harvey Fierstein’s Safe Sex and Neil Bartlett’s A Vision of Love Revealed in Sleep (both 1987), Paula Vogel’s The Baltimore Waltz (1990), Kramer’s The Destiny of Me (1992), Terrence McNally’s Love! Valour! Compassion! and Kevin Elyot's My Night with Reg (both 1994), and Jonathan Larson's musical Rent (first workshopped in 1993; produced in 1996). There were many more productions that responded to the AIDS crisis directly or indirectly through metaphor and embodied protest in performance (Román 1998).

Certainly, much of the early theater on AIDS chimed well with the radical position of queer, itself reflecting some of the energy of the Gay Liberation Front (GLF) of the early 1970s, in that it was angry and in opposition to assimilation. As had been the bent of the GLF, queer work aimed at a wholesale rethink of the society that produces phobic responses to gender and sexual nonnormativity. However, some critics, such as Jacob Juntunen (2016), have argued that much mainstream theater about AIDS contributed to change because it played down its radicalism. Others, such as David Román (1998), have looked to queer performance work as the embodiment of queer politics, both in terms of content and form. Importantly, productions that hit the stage formally were often deeply related to community performance happening in nonbourgeois theater settings.

Prompted by the politics of the community, as queer work flourished it questioned its own internal prejudices, positions of privilege, and omissions. In 1990 Pomo Afro Homos was formed in San Francisco by Djola Bernard Branner, Brian Freeman, and Eric Gupton. The company aimed specifically to unabashedly present black gay men on stage. A key work, Fierce Love (1991), consists of thirteen sections of stories from black gay life. The structure of the work, adhering to the “pomo” (postmodern), resists any singular reading of the bodies on stage, demonstrating that queer performance work resists the regimented definitions of identity. Other performances addressed gay intersectional politics, which also has a long root, as can be seen in the late 1950s and 1960s with LeRoi Jones’ s (Amiri Baraka) The Toilet in 1964 and Shelagh Delaney’s A Taste of Honey in 1958 (Román 1998; Muñoz 1999; Johnson and Rivera-Servera 2016).
By the mid-1990s, queer work diversified further. Of note at this historical point is some of the experimental work of Reza Abdoh in the United States. Alongside this in the United Kingdom was Mark Ravenhill’s 1996 breakthrough play Shopping and Fucking, which along with other plays and writers, notably Sarah Kane’s Blasted (1995), formed what critics called “in-yer-face theater.” Shopping and Fucking and other works by Ravenhill (particularly Some Explicit Polaroids [1999] and Mother Clap’s Molly House [2001]) deal with how queers treat each other, both in terms of a community and as objects circulated in a market. The work, which is in part a playing out of the cost of the Ronald Reagan/Margaret Thatcher commitment to neoliberalism, is in turn violent, darkly humored, and stark in its portrayal of queerness. What these works (and others that fell within the in-yer-face theater classification) do is relate the state and social politics to gender, sexuality, and identity. In the United Kingdom across the 1990s, there was a strong showing of gay/queer plays. Other writers and producers of note in this era are Neil Bartlett, Jonathan Harvey, Tim Miller, Bryony Lavery, and Phyllis Nagy.

© ROBBIE JACK/CORBIS VIA GETTY IMAGES

Scene from a National Theatre Production of Angels in America. Tony Kushner’s two-part epic play about AIDS interweaves the topic with ideas of American nationhood, history, and identity.

In other places, gay work and companies also surfaced. OutCast Theatre, Australia’s longest-running theater collective, was established in 1997, though, of course, it was not the first. The Gay Theatre Company formed in 1979 and In the Pink Theatre Company formed in 1990, both in Sydney. According to Bruce Parr (1998), in the Australian context it was in the 1990s that gay characters started to appear on stages, though lesbian characters had little visibility there; lesbians were more present in the subcultural performance scene. By the mid-1990s, according to Parr, works with gay themes (some of which were related to AIDS and HIV) were pervasive. And it is important to note that individual gay actors were influential in the production of work; of particular note is Jack Charles, who was instrumental in the development of Australia’s first aboriginal theater in 1972, although the company was not set up specifically in relation to gayness. Other academic work describes queer and gay theater related to HIV in other contexts, such as Severino J. Albuquerque’s 2004 book Tentative Transgressions: Homosexuality, AIDS, and the Theater in Brazil, which focuses on homosexuality on Brazilian stages; it proceeds from the standpoint that to understand queer Brazilian theater after 1970, an investigation of its historical lineage across the twentieth century is necessary.

From the mid-1990s into the new century, where treatment for managing HIV in the Global North was available (though not universally so), works became less engaged with AIDS as a death sentence and turned to examining other social systems that supported violence against queers. The Laramie Project (2000), for instance, is a play about the real-life homophobic killing of Matthew Shepard, a student at the University of Wyoming who died from his injuries after being beaten and tortured by two men in 1998. The play consists of a series of short scenes built from hundreds of interviews with community members about the murder. Although the production is about the narrative of homophobia, it also highlights the lack of legislation around hate crime.

As the AIDS crisis in the Global North began to come under control, other works emerged that engaged with HIV and AIDS from specific perspectives. Positive/Negative: Women of Color and HIV/AIDS, a collection of plays published in 2002 and edited by Imani Harrington and Chyrell D. Bellamy, exemplifies the kind of work that was taking place out of earshot of main stages. This kind of work is grassroots and functions in specific ways for specific communities. On some main stages this energy was present, too; although not directly depicting queers in relation to HIV and AIDS, debbie tucker green’s 2005 play Stoning Mary depicts an HIV-positive heterosexual couple arguing because they can afford only one prescription between them, and the Australian writer Lachlan Philpott’s 2009 play Bison catches a nuance of the time in that it deals with how the gay male community seems to have forgotten the AIDS crisis in the pursuit of pleasure.

Other Forms and Narratives

When laying out one dominant account of the lineage of gay and queer theater, it is clear that as the time line progresses, the connection with grassroots performance becomes key. From the late 1980s through the second decade of the twenty-first century, queer performance found one stable form in the figure of the single performer working on stages in nightclubs, studios, universities, and places where queer communities gather. Thus, much of the work that can claim the name “queer” might be underrecorded because the production history is not present in dominant theater archives. Holly Hughes and David Román note in their 1998 book O Solo Homo that solo performance has been present as a queer form for a long time and connects to other forms of popular performance, such as drag. T. L. Cowan’s work (2012, 2015) on feminist and queer cabaret across the United States, Canada, and Mexico traces this kind of performance. Cabaret and nightclub settings have an international history commingled with the key issues explored above, notably including such performers as Paddy Chew in Singapore, one of the first people to publicly come out as living with HIV in that region; Chew worked for the Boom Boom Room, a drag cabaret venue, and in 1998 performed an autobiographical solo show titled Completely With/Out Character. This significant show was reimagined by the performance and moving image artist Loo Zihan as With/Out in 2015 and 2017. And, of course, cabaret dealing with nonnormative sexuality in content and audience was historically present throughout Europe, particularly in Berlin in the 1930s, where drag abounded (see Whisnant 2016).

Popular performance forms, such as cabaret, variety, musicals, and some comedy, can appeal to queer audiences even when the performance is not directly related to queer or gay concerns. For instance, all over the United Kingdom pantomimes play at theaters around the Christmas holidays, with the pantomime form—a family show with cross-gender casting and audience participation—presenting opportunities for queerness. Pantomime is risqué, full of comic set-pieces and double entendre, and ripe for queer performers to occupy. There are “alternative” pantomimes, many of which are populated almost entirely by queer and drag performers, featured at small-scale queer venues as part of their holiday offering. (In London, the Royal Vauxhall Tavern, an important site of queer performance year-round, has a notable pantomime.) In regular UK pantomimes (those not made directly for queer audiences), the key character of the Dame is almost always a man in drag played by a performer who is not normally a drag queen. Although pantomime might not be classed as a specifically queer or gay form, well-known drag and queer performers take to main stages to perform in them, such as in the West End of London at the London Palladium’s lavish productions.

This figure of the drag performer is vital to any narrative of queer theater. Drag performance is not often taken seriously but appears in important queer work. Drag might be missing in this history because it is lowbrow, popular, and working-class. Performance in general and drag in particular, both male and female, is intimately connected to LGBTQI subjectivity and history. Likewise, work in cabaret, burlesque, (some) performance art, (some) UK pantomimes, and nightclubs forms a strong vein of work that does not appear on main stages and as such goes unrecognized.

Given that drag is underresearched, there is still a lot of effort needed to unpack the relations between drag and nightclub work with regular queer histories of performance on main stages. Certainly, contemporary drag kinging has a lineage connected to the famous male impersonators of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, such as Annie Hindle, Vesta
Tilley, Hetty King, and Ella Shields. Male impersonators onstage and off have a rich and underinvestigated history; likewise, drag queens' work is underexplored. Drag for the most part takes place in smaller venues, cabarets, and nightclubs; consequently, it is often unrecorded unless it breaks through into the mainstream. Yet, drag work is important to queer theater, has made an impact on some of its key works, and is a form of performance that is watched by many people who might not enter a bourgeois theater. Historically speaking, drag communities comprise a key place where trans identities formed in a relatively safe space, and for some trans people these spaces continue to serve as a base from which to gain rights (see Esther Newton’s 1979 groundbreaking study of drag queens and their relation to trans identity; Eve Shapiro’s 2007 exploration of the Santa Barbara kinging troupe Disposable Boy Toys; Marlon M. Bailey’s 2013 exploration of ballroom culture in Detroit; and more recently and independently, the South Asian nonbinary trans performance duo DarkMatter). Likewise, drag has been fundamental to queer protest (see Lucas 1994) and is particularly energetic in the activities around legislation and health; international groups, such as the Sisters of Perpetual Indulgence, are key here.

However, not all the work that is done in drag appears only in nightclubs and on the streets. Important works appear in conventional theater buildings, too. Of note are the companies Bloolips and Split Britches, both of which have long histories. Split Britches, formed in 1980, exemplifies how lesbian performance deeply connects with feminism; the company, with others, founded the WOW café, a feminist performance space in New York. Its work as a company is highly influential in its relation to a politics of representation—it places the lesbian at the center of its work—and the work shakes up the conventional forms of normative “straight” theater. Bloolips (1977–2002) was a company of men in drag who purposefully set out with their productions to resist the far and religious right. In 1991 Split Britches and Bloolips produced a show at La MaMa in New York titled Belle Reprieve, which was a take on Tennessee Williams’s iconic play A Streetcar Named Desire (1947). In the production, the queer undertones of the original play are brought to the fore, and although the play is used as a point of departure, it critically says out loud things at which Williams only hinted.

Other narratives flourish around queer theater and performance in part because its relation to community is so vital, so there are many omissions in this overview entry. Given that queer performance at the grassroots level is deeply connected with the communities that perform it, the historical, temporal, and geographical specificity of the work is important to its politics and meanings. Although this entry focuses mainly on English-speaking work (and omits great swathes of work in other parts of the globe), it is important to note that there is a great deal of variety in the locations in which these performances take place. Accordingly, Canada has a specific relation to queer performance that is not wholly shared with Australia, for instance. Indeed, even within a small country such as the United Kingdom, there is a wide variety of specific, important local narratives around queer performance. Paying attention to specificity is important because, as the situation stands, Anglo-American forms of gayness can appear as the hegemony. Because it looks for a reflection of these dominant narratives, the study of gay theater can have a tendency to overlook other forms of nonnormative sexuality that do not reflect this hegemony. Thus, in the impulse for inclusivity in a global context of theater, there must be close attention paid not only to the impositions of dominant norms of Western gayness, but also to dominant norms of theatrical tradition that are as diverse. Often work on gay and queer theater conforms to a “West and the rest” structure where the West comes first in considerations of theater and performance. Therefore, gay and queer theater as terms are always already inculcated with the concerns of the Global North and also represent a fluid area of study that is connected with both individuated senses of self and senses of nationhood and the national and local theatrical traditions. Hence, careful navigation of definitions is required, although there is still much work to be done on finding a way to articulate the complex diversity of forms that may be claimed as queer performance. The writer Eng-Beng Lim (2005, 2014) offers a structure of “glocalqueering” to read a performance in Singapore—a structure that does not pit the so-called West/Global North against histories and identities of the Global South/East. Likewise, Albuquerque (2004) has pointed out that, to understand Brazilian queer work, one must have a grasp of its antecedents, such as modernist representations in Brazil. Such work of definition is important not only to bring queer theater and performance to a place where it can be shared, but also to express that performance is fundamental to the exploration of community and identity; it is a vital place to discover what is possible and to make sense of what has passed.

SEE ALSO Bars and Cabarets in Europe; Cabaret Theater in Latin America and the Caribbean; HIV/AIDS in the United States; Homoeroticism in the Plays of Ibn Daniyal; Mädchen in Uniform (1931; Leontine Sagan); Tuqus al-Isharat wa-al-Tahawwulat (1994; Sa‘dallah Wannous)

BIBLIOGRAPHY

The term third gender accounts for how cultures from around the world have created spaces for gender variation in social institutions and traditions that allow for the expression of gender that differs from the anatomical sex of an individual at birth but that does not necessarily signify a transgender identity. To classify a person as a third gender is not to posit that there are three genders rather than two, but to break with gender bipolarity that has dominated Western thought and science until recently.

The indigenous meaning of third gender varies from culture to culture and must be understood in the context of the particular gender system in which it appears. Most cultures with third gender have their own autochthonous word or phrase to describe the person’s subjectivity, though many such words were lost, altered, or replaced through settler colonialism’s imposition of linguistic binaries and through colonial resemantization of indigenous concepts related to third gender. The spread of colonial religious traditions often eschewed gender variance and its concomitant relationship to indigenous modes of knowledge, ritual practices, and cultural norms. Thus, any study of third gender must take into consideration the colonial history that has shaped the disparate societies—and their gender cultures—where third gender has existed.

Scholars who employ the term third gender today attempt to provide a neutral word (versus the common colonial terms that are clearly biased and pejorative, such as berdache), though use of the culturally specific term is preferable when available in the original language. The term is not without controversy, both from the perspective of indigenous peoples who identify as third gender and their community members who may hold differing views on their place in the culture, and from those who see transgender allies as appropriating the history of the third gender into their own activist work for human rights without appreciating the differences between the subject positions that various gender-variant people hold in the complex gender cultures from around the globe and across time. Most recently, various states and countries have begun to legally recognize third gender, ushering in a new appreciation for this identity category and greater popular knowledge of its complex history.
History of the Term

The terms third gender and third sex first appeared in the mid-to-late nineteenth century, as sexual dimorphism was becoming increasingly naturalized and propagated through social Darwinism and the nascent field of sexology, with its emphasis on heteronormative reproduction and innate differences between "male" and "female." This tendency toward essentialist understandings of gender and sexuality solidified in both the scientific and popular imagination, despite ample examples of nonbinary genders and their contributions to both Western and non-Western ancient and early modern cultures (see, for example, Ringrose [1994] for the role of eunuchs in Byzantium).

As this theoretical consolidation around a biologically based understanding of binary gender systems evolved, European scholars sought to explain the cases of people in clinical and archival literature who did not conform to the normative reproductive paradigm of sexuality and who transgressed traditional gender roles, leading to the early theorization of homosexuality. As Gert Hekma (1994) explains, some early German sexologists began using terms such as "Uranians," understood as “a female psyche in a male body” (Karl Heinrich Ulrichs [1825–1895]), or “intermediate sexual types” (Magnus Hirschfeld [1868–1935]) to account for homosexuals as a third sex: that is, feminine men and masculine women who “inverted” the naturalized sexual dimorphism that shaped the scientific fields of the day.

One the earliest social reformers and advocates for Uranians was the British author Edward Carpenter (1844–1929). His 1908 manuscript The Intermediate Sex circulated ideas that promoted remarkably modern notions of human rights for men and women who were, he argued, instinctively behaving as third sexes like those in premodern societies. His notion of the intermediate sex brought into the discussion the emotional life of Uranians: Carpenter understood third-sex men as having female emotions and third-sex women as having male emotions. Although these various theorizations of the third sex had contemporary critics, this conflation of gender identity and sexual object choice has remained in the discourse on nonnormative gender and sexuality for decades and in the popular imagination to this day. These early observations and theorizations of variance from the binary gender paradigm have also shaped the way social scientists began to reconsider and discuss archival and contemporary examples of non-Western people's gender and sexuality.

The social sciences, as they became established and expanded in the early twentieth century, also adopted sexual dimorphism as the paradigm in social theory on topics related to sex and gender. Anthropology, the academic discipline most implicated in the history of outsiders’ representation of people characterized as third gender, employed sexual dimorphism as “an axiom of cultural classification” (Herdt 1994, 33) for the study of contemporary cultures and often projected it back to the past in studies of human history. Early ethnographies tended to apply the Western concepts discussed above to the objects of their study around the world, including to those whose gender performance or sexual practices deviated from the Eurocentric norms informing the field and the popular imaginary. Those researchers relying on early descriptions of other cultures produced in the context of European exploration and colonization layered these biases on top of the medieval and early modern prejudices informing the representation of cultural “contact zones” (Pratt 1992), further obscuring aboriginal gender and sexual cultures that existed before contact (Horswell 2005) and influencing modern discourses on gender and sexuality (Bleys 1995).

By the late twentieth century, this textualization of the body began to be understood as part of colonial, postcolonial, and neocolonial writings as gender and sexuality increasingly became theorized as discursive constructs. This move at the center of disciplinary transformations in the ways gender and sexuality were interpreted was inspired by the feminist and civil rights movements of the 1960s, poststructuralist theory, and more recently postmodern and postcolonial critiques, all of which led to a revision of assumptions about binary gender systems, in addition to a better understanding of sexuality.

Anthropologist Evelyn Blackwood’s pioneering work The Many Faces of Homosexuality (1986) shifted the focus from treating homosexual acts as deviant individual behavior to emphasizing institutional and cultural patterns of that comportment. Contributors to her volume avoided imposing Western prejudices that informed sexology and psychoanalysis on the non-Western cultures they studied. Thomas Laqueur (1990) contributed to the questioning of a traditional understanding of a dimorphic sex model by demonstrating that from the ancient Greeks to the eighteenth century, the West actually had a single-sex model and that the female body was culturally constructed as incomplete and inferior relative to a male point of reference, further opening scholars to the notion that both sex and gender are contingent constructs. Scholars began to reexamine passages in historical texts, material culture, and ethnographies to recognize a more diverse population of sexes and genders throughout the world without projecting on them social prejudices of earlier generations. From this scholarship emerged the contemporary meaning of the term third gender as it has been applied to many cultures throughout the world.

Third Gender in North America

From the earliest chronicles of the exploration and colonization of North America, Europeans recorded seeing men who dressed like and adopted the roles of women in the native societies they encountered, as well as occasionally documenting women who took on traditionally male roles. The fact that Western colonial chroniclers, nineteenth-century ethnographers, and, later, anthropologists did not have linguistic or cultural categories that corresponded to this third-gender subjectivity has resulted in misnomers, such as the term berdache, which was originally a Persian and Arabic word for the younger male partner in a same-sex erotic relationship (Roscoe 1994). In the various sources mentioned previously, the third-gender subjects were also referred to as hermaphrodite, sodomite, effeminate, and, more recently, homosexual and transsexual. Each of these terms misrepresents the native North American third gender in its own way, some expressing bodily confusions, others inscribing the native subject in Christian or psychosexual discourses while ignoring the social and sacred roles these subjects performed in their communities. Walter Williams (1986) wrote the first booklength study that combined archival research with field investigations to reconstruct a more integral understanding of berdaches’ roles in native societies, though he sometimes romanticized them in utopian terms.

Anthropologist Will Roscoe (1991) followed Williams’s pan-American survey with a detailed ethnohistory of the Zuni berdache. Roscoe then researched the commonalities between the berdache in different North American native societies, based on the growing literature on the subject. He estimated that male berdache have been documented in nearly 150 North American societies, while female berdache (females who take on the lifeways of males) appear in half as many groups (Roscoe 1994). Roscoe's work provided a methodology for the analysis of gender diversity in a society, taking into consideration the sociocultural processes that construct gender positions, addressing the cultural meanings of their social relationships, considering power relationships among genders, and discerning how historical discourses have affected the subject positions studied.

Roscoe’s approach to determining third-gender status in a given culture has four principal components and can be applied to any culture while adjusting for cultural specificity. The first dimension to analyze is the role of third gender in their society, specifically, any possible “productive specialization” that they may typically undertake that sets them apart from other genders (Roscoe 1994, 334). There are abundant examples of these specialized roles in the cultures of the world in which third gender appears, such as providing childcare and education, tending to the dead, and safeguarding the culture's traditions. “Supernatural sanction” of the third-gender subject, often relating to their culture's mythology, ritual practices, and spiritual traditions, can also be an important marker of the subjectivity. These beliefs often determine if third-gender subjects are “accepted and integrated members of their communities” and can help understand their relationship to their culture, often in opposition to or in tension with both colonialism’s imposition of outside values and their own culture’s transculturation toward those prejudices introduced over time (Roscoe 1994, 335). “Gender variation” in relationship to the culture’s predominant gender norms can often signal the difference that the third gender represents in the society. Cross-dressing or dressing completely differently from other genders is often an example of how this variation manifests (Roscoe 1994). Finally, third-gender sexuality varies from individual to individual. It represents the range of human sexualities and may include shortterm as well as long-term relationships (Roscoe 1994).
By the end of the twentieth century, native North Americans, particularly those identifying as LGBTQ, had begun to research third gender as part of their heritage. Many were attracted to the spiritual and sacred dimensions of third-gender roles in many First Nation societies, while others assumed the roles of third genders in their communities and began to discuss and document their histories more openly. Such Native American writers as Paula Gunn Allen also began to recognize the value of the feminine in native cultures, while such feminist philosophers as María Lugones contributed to our understanding of the gendered nature of the coloniality of power at play in the writing of the history of gender and sexuality. The work of Native creative writers identifying as LGBTQ has been published and anthologized. Living the Spirit: A Gay American Indian Anthology (1988), for example, collects a variety of genres representing voices of native LGBTQ people. No longer would the third-gender experience be represented only by outsiders.

Some native words for third gender translate as “twospirit people,” and this became an attractive way for many to identify with the ancestral spiritual values represented by third-gender subjects. Two-spirit has been adopted by many First Nation groups from across North America as the preferred term in English to refer to third gender (Jacobs, Thomas, and Lang 1997). Sue-Ellen Jacobs, Wesley Thomas, and Sabine Lang’s edited collection,
“Two-Spirit People: Native American Gender Identity, Sexuality, and Spirituality (1997), a unique collaborative effort between anthropologists and contemporary two-spirit-identified people, provided nuanced accounts of the third gender from diverse native traditions and opened the way for many more studies and anthologies produced by two-spirit authors.

Deborah Miranda’s recovery (2010) of the aqi or joya’s third-gender role and status in native and contemporary California is an exemplary study of what she considers the “gendercide” of the Chumash third gender. Miranda takes into account the process of acculturation common in most indigenous contexts where settler colonialism’s effects are felt, but her study concludes on the hopeful note that the joya is reemerging as two-spirit people reclaim their heritage.

Sovereign Erotics: A Collection of Two-Spirit Literature (Driskill, Justice, Tatonetti, and Miranda 2011) is the first collection since Living the Spirit to anthologize exclusively two-spirit literature. The collection was coordinated by editors who identify as two-spirit people from various First Nation heritages. Another important collection published the same year, Queer Indigenous Studies: Critical Interventions in Theory, Politics, and Literature (Driskill, Finley, Gilley, and Morgensen 2011), offers theoretical interventions on queer, indigenous-centered approaches to the LGBTQ2 (the 2 stands for “two-spirit”) movements and history emerging in the twenty-first century.

Third Gender in Mesoamerica

Pete Sigal’s groundbreaking work on the Maya and Nahua pre-Hispanic history of gender and sexuality has opened new avenues of research on more contemporary third gender in this region. Sigal argued that the pre-Hispanic Maya did not have an ongoing berdache subjectivity but that ritualized homosexuality and transsexualization existed as symbolic political and religious structures that maintained hierarchical power relations (Sigal 2000). In his studies of Nahua sexualities, Sigal continued his close readings of pre-Hispanic and colonial sources to reveal how homosexualities were performed in relation to changing understandings of native concepts of power, pleasure, rituals of fertility, and the balance between sexual moderation and excess (Sigal 2011). His findings in both traditions of ancient Mesoamerica report mixed-gender gods, cross-dressing priests, and same-sex sexuality.

One area of this region where third gender has emerged in contemporary times is Oaxaca, Mexico. Alfredo Mirandé (2017) provides a comprehensive understanding of the contemporary third-gender muxes in the Oaxaca community of Juchitán in southern Mexico. His combination of historical and ethnographic research, along with documented interviews with several muxes, reveals the complexity of this third gender and their relationship with what is generally considered to be a patriarchal society. Muxe, a Zapotec
The word said to be derived from mujer, the Spanish word for woman, is a role assigned to young males who begin to identify with female lifeways and whose family most often accepts them into this traditional role as caregiver for the family and as gifted artists and artisans. Their dress varies from typically female to more male-oriented clothes. The town of Juchitán celebrates with a muxe ball and beauty contest each November that community members of all walks of life attend. Shaul Schwarz’s short documentary film Muxes (2017) provides several first-person testimonials from muxes and their family members that reveal the complexities of assuming the muxe identity in Juchitán.

Third Gender in the Andes of South America

Several scholars have noted South American colonial sources that report the existence of berdache figures with characteristics similar to their North American counterparts. Richard Trexler’s Sex and Conquest (1995) is the most extensive analysis of the phenomenon throughout the hemisphere. Trexler theorized the berdache in terms of masculine power relationships within indigenous societies, understanding them as filling dependent, effeminized positions in the context of conquest expansions.

Michael Horswell (2005), concentrating on the South American Andean region once controlled by the Incas, explored how the colonial “tropes of sexuality” both obscured our understanding of South American gender variances and provided strategies for recuperating a more native understanding of third gender through interpreting sources from an indigenous paradigm of their own gender culture. Understanding third-gender ritual subjectivity as a symbolic position in culture-producing rituals made sense in the context of the Andean gender culture in which the feminine enjoyed autonomy, power, and respect. The feminine and the masculine were to be negotiated and mediated through signs of androgyny reminiscent of an originary, androgynous creator.

The evocation of gender liminality is consistent with a step in the native Andean philosophical process known as yanantin, the uniting of opposite forces. While the corporal manifestation of this in-between position varied in the distinct textual fragments of colonial discourse, the Andean third-gender subjectivity, sometimes referred to as the quariwarmi (man-woman) in Quechua, was often performed as a biologically sexed male, socially recognizable either through castration, cross-dressing, or both. They reportedly were sexually passive in ritual and perhaps profane occasions and fit into the Andean kinship system as ipas, one of the native names found in the sources, and often spoke “like women,” either in falsetto voice or by conforming with gendered linguistic rules. Their ritual roles were related to agriculture and to the channeling of ancestors’ voices in ceremonial contexts. In one example, they seem to embody a mythic founding mother of the Inca dynasty, and they enjoyed supernatural sanction through myths and supernatural protection from a stellar cult figure, the Chuquichinchay. Sigal’s edited collection, Infamous Desire (2003), provides a robust discussion of both Trexler’s and Horswell’s theses, as well as his own on the Maya.

In their contemporary iterations, the ritualists and dancers who invoke the third gender are respected and integrated members of the community. They perform the role on ceremonial occasions, though transnational influences related to reactions to the LGBTQ movement have begun to introduce negative attitudes toward the performers. This historical third-gender role in the Andes has recently been recovered and employed by transgender rights activists in Peru and beyond to reclaim a space for gender-nonconforming people (Horswell 2016).

Ana Mariella Bacigalupo (2007) offered a transhistorical analysis of the “co-gendered” machi weye from the Mapuche in Chile, whose gender performance fluctuated between the masculine and the feminine in roles that involved both warfare and healing. Evidence from colonial times to the present suggests the machi weye's gender variance was respected by their communities and consistently performed in ritual contexts, though it was challenged by both early Spanish colonialists and more recent mainstream national discourses on normative gender and sexuality.

Other Examples from around the World

Among the most widely known of the third genders are the South Asian hijra, who are typically males, eunuchs, or intersex people who adopt feminine lifeways, leave their original families, and live in organized communities under the mentorship of a guru (Nanda 1994). Sanctioned by various gender-changing Hindu heroes and deities (Arjun, Siva, Bahuchara Mata, Vishnu, Krishna) and with a presence in sacred and profane texts dating to the epic narrative the Mahabharata, many hijras live ascetic-like lives and perform rituals at weddings and births (Nanda 1994). Some go through emasculation as part of their devotion to the mother goddess, which in turn affords them power as agents of fertility. This earns them respect, if not fear, from Hindus, who hire them to perform rituals at the two most important moments in a traditional family's life: marriage and birth (Nanda 1994).

Hijras tend to be receptive partners in sexual relationships with men, some of whom they consider "husbands," and many supplement their income through sex work. By 2014, Nepal, India, Bangladesh, and Pakistan had passed laws acknowledging the hijra as a third gender with rights to self-determination and government-issued identification cards and other documents, as well as recognition for affirmative action and welfare benefits (Khaleeli 2014).

As Michael Peletz (2006, 2009) has shown, Southeast Asia has a long tradition of gender pluralism that is documented in early modern sources and in more recent anthropological literature. Peletz expansive research on the diverse and complex gender cultures of the region examines the roles of “highly esteemed (and mostly male-bodied) transgendered ritual specialists” (2006, 310), who were integrated into their societies but who began to lose legitimacy and sanctity as successive waves of religious, political, and social transformations swept the region. One example of the many third-gender subjects of the region is the bissu, whom Peletz describes as, *a class of ritual specialists among the Bugis of South Sulawesi, who, like many other Indonesians, have long identified with a highly syncretic variant of Islam heavily influenced both by pre-Islamic Hindu-Buddhist beliefs and practices and by the Austronesian ritual cults that predated Indic influences in the region. The male-bodied bissu assumed female attire and other accoutrements of femininity, safeguarded royal regalia and the sacred “white blood” of ruling families, engaged in sexual relations and marriage with same-sex (though different-gendered, i.e., male) partners, and were apparently accorded the status of nobility.

(Peletz 2006, 312)

By the late seventeenth and into the eighteenth centuries, the cultural and religious context in which the bissu operated began to change, with Islamic laws discrediting their “divine” status as heretical. By the twentieth century, Dutch colonialism and later modernist projects eroded the bissus’ royal patronage, and they were increasingly seen as “feudal” and anathema to the emerging Indonesian nationalist identity (Peletz 2006, 316).

In Polynesia, early ethnographers and, more recently, anthropologists have documented various culturally specific names, including the māhū in Tahiti and Hawaii, the fa’afāfine in Samoa, and the fakaleiiti in Tonga (Besnier 1994). The fa’afāfine are generally well-integrated into family and social structures in Samoa. They are usually assigned male at birth but are often socialized into a more gender-liminal role when the family has more boys than girls. The word fa’afāfine means “in the manner of woman,” and most fa’afāfine have sexual relationships with men, though sometimes with women. They have several active social organizations, including the Samoa Fa’afafine Association Incorporated and the Society of Fa’afafine in American Samoa. Johanna Schmidt (2001) has shown how the fa’afāfine gender category is undergoing change as a result of globalization and the influence of Western discourses on transgender identity and homosexuality.

The māhū are native to the cultures of Hawaii and Tahiti and are understood to embody both the male and female spirit, an attribute that makes them esteemed as healers, teachers, and caregivers. Hawaiian mythology includes the legend of Laka, the mixed-gender god/goddess of hula. māhū; are known for passing traditions such as the hula along to the next generation. The 2014 documentary Kumu Hina follows the lives of two māhū; both of whom describe themselves as “in the middle” of the gender binary, taking advantage of both male and female “energies.” Though at times the filmmakers use the term transgender to refer to them, the characteristics of the māhū; seem to point toward a third-gender status.

In eighteenth-century Japan, adolescent males known as wakashu occupied a gender-liminal status, as documented in Edo-era woodblock prints that show them in cross-dressed attire and with a unique hairstyle. Scenes from private spaces such as brothels and bedchambers show wakashu pleasuring both men and women. Other prints depict them dancing in kabuki performances, selling items at markets, and playing musical instruments. Their cross-dressing and sexual pursuits generally ended once they officially entered adulthood, suggesting a temporary third-gender status.

© SAM PANTHAKY/AFP/GETTY IMAGES
Indian Hijras Perform a Community Dance during a World Peace Magna Ritual, 2012. One of the most widely known of the third genders in the world are the South Asian hijra, who are typically males, eunuchs, or intersex people who adopt feminine lifeways, leave their original families, and live in organized communities together under the mentorship of a guru. Some go through emasculation as part of their devotion to the mother goddess, which in turn affords them power as agents of fertility. This earns them respect, if not fear, from Hindus, who hire them to perform rituals.

Though commonly denied by contemporary African leaders, who often proclaim transgender identity and homosexuality to be foreign imports, gender and sexual diversity are common across the continent and there are examples of third gender throughout African history (Murray and Roscoe 1998). As in other parts of the world, the written sources representing this history are marked by both Islamic and Christian colonialist discourses and later emergent discourses of Eurocentric sexology (Bleys 1995). Many contemporary attitudes derive from this history, despite the widespread evidence of gender nonconformity (Collins 2017).

An example from the Swahili-speaking east coast of Africa that has many characteristics of a third gender are the mashoga, cross-dressing males with gendered markers (grammatical, sartorial, and professional, among others) that identify them as distinct from both males and females (Amory 1998). The Gabra nomadic people of East Africa have a temporary third-gender category, the d’abella, that accounts for “men who become women” late in life and take on roles as “ritual experts with feminine identities.” D’abella are regarded as highly prestigious members of Gabra society (Wood 1999, 5). The supernatural and mythological sanctions common to third gender appear in many African cultures. “In Mali, the Dogon tribe generally maintain that the perfect human being is androgynous; the tribe worships Nommo, ancestral spirits who are described as androgynous, intersex, and mystical creatures” and who are considered teachers (Collins 2017).

Controversies and Debates

Third gender can be a controversial term. Evan B. Towle and Lynn M. Morgan discuss the abuse of the term in its transference from anthropological literature to “popular American writing by and about transgendered people” (2002, 469). The title of their article, “Romancing the Transgender Native,” speaks to one of the principal pitfalls of the use of the term, given the difficulty of recovering a full accounting of third-gender experience from the past. Towle and Morgan advise that studies of third gender “should center on the meanings, ideologies, disputes, and practices that situate gender dynamics in specific historical and cultural contexts” (471), and they insightfully remind us of the potential “reductionism and exclusionism” (484–485) of the term that can erase the very difference some anthropologists wish to highlight. Others are concerned that the international transgender rights movement might erase traditional and distinct third-gender categories, such as Pakistan’s khwaja sera, that have existed for millennia. The tension between the more communal identification of the khwaja sera, organized much like India’s hijras, and the individual transgender woman or man is beginning to show (Azhar 2017).

Recent State Sanction of Third Gender
Nation-states from various parts of the world have recognized third gender during the first two decades of the twenty-first century, bringing official legal recognition to nonbinary gender categories. The result of human rights work and legal petitions brought by gender nonconforming individuals, this trend has spread from Australia to Southeast Asia to Europe and most recently to the United States, where several states, including Oregon and California, have adopted measures to allow people to identify as “nonbinary” (Mason 2017). The practical results of these changes to law include issuance of official documents, such as birth certificates, driver's licenses, passports, and identification cards, that conform to an individual's gender identity, without the requirement of a physician's report or recommendation. Some critics believe the state should eliminate all gender markers on official documents, given that this power to determine and register gender should not pertain to governments. Still, these legal advancements represent an affirmation to millions of human beings who do not identify with the historically dominant, normative binary gender system and who face daily harassment for simply living their lives with integrity, and in some cases, in harmony with age-old traditions as a third way, neither male nor female.

SEE ALSO Anthropology in Africa South of the Sahara; Bakla; Biological Essentialism; Gender, Flexible Systems, in Africa; Hijras; Historical Sexes; Imperialism and Colonialism; Kathoey; Muxes; Pacific Island and Pacific Island Diaspora Identities; Psychopathia Sexualis (1886; Richard von Krafft-Ebing); Rituals and Same-Sex and Trans Experience; Transvestites/Transsexuals; Two-Spirit

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Jacobs, Sue-Ellen, Wesley Thomas, and Sabine Lang. Two-Spirit People: Native American

Williams, Walter L. The Spirit and the Flesh: Sexual Diversity in American Indian Culture.

FILMOGRAPHY

Thomas/Thomasine Hall Court Case (1629)

KATHLEEN BROWN
David Boies Professor of History and Faculty Affiliate, Alice Paul Center for Research on Gender, Sexuality, and Women
University of Pennsylvania

The case against an English indentured servant accused of violating gender norms in the Colony of Virginia in the early seventeenth century.

The individual known as both Thomasine and Thomas Hall (b. circa 1603), a recently arrived English indentured servant, appeared in the colony of Virginia’s General Court in March 1629 for having exasperated neighbors and local officials by shifting the most visible expression of gender identity—gender-specific clothing. Two questions needed resolution by the General Court: Had Hall, as reported by a fellow servant, “layen with a mayd of Mr. Richard Bennetts” (McIlwaine 1979, 195), an illicit sexual act that to the justices and Hall’s neighbors signified presumptive male identity? Or was Hall, following recent public sightings wearing women’s clothes, actually a woman? This latter designation would contradict Hall’s contractual identity as a male servant.

Background on Warroskoyack and the Colony

The General Court’s judges included a medical doctor, but they did not conduct a physical examination of Hall’s body to answer these questions. Instead, they extracted lengthy testimony from the women and men of Hall’s community who purported to have examined Hall. All hailed from Warroskoyack, Virginia, a sparsely populated English settlement located on the south side of the James River. Established on the site of a former Native American village of that name, Warroskoyack was in 1629 a Puritan enclave anchored by substantial land grants to its two most prominent residents, Richard Bennett and Nathaniel Bass. Bennett’s uncle, Edward Bennett, a Puritan merchant from London who had served the Virginia Company as an auditor, received a land grant from the company for settling two hundred people. His plantation, Bennett’s Welcome, contributed to the displacement of the Warroskoyack tribe but subsequently suffered terrible losses during the Powhatan tribe’s attack on English settlements in March 1622. Bennett the younger arrived in the colony in 1628 and within a year was serving as an elected representative in the House of Burgesses. Bass, the other prominent settler in the community, owed his survival of the attack to the fact that he was back in England to secure his land patent, losing his house but not his life. Bass also served as a representative in the House of Burgesses.
At the time of Hall’s General Court appearance, Virginia was beginning its fifth year as a colony under the direct rule of the English Crown. The Virginia Company had folded in 1624 as news of the 1622 Powhatan attack on company settlements soured investors and forced the Crown takeover. During the intervening years, the colony's English population had recovered, and the tobacco economy had grown. Servants such as Hall were much sought after to provide the field labor needed for this commodity. Yet despite this uptick in the colony's fortunes, the material lives of even prosperous planters were spartan. Colonists’ household furnishings were limited compared to modern Western standards, with their wardrobes so basic that upon completing an indenture a servant would receive a new set of “freedom clothes” to begin his or her new life.

Bennett and Bass, the two most powerful men in Warroskoyack, were the faces of law, order, and morality for the community, and Hall managed to run afoul of both of them. Like most of the new colony’s counties, Warroskoyack lacked a local court or an Anglican parish. The absence of the latter was not simply a manifestation of the colony’s weak institutional life but was likely exacerbated by the Bennett family's Puritan faith and the cohort of Puritan settlers who had been attracted to the plantation. Once Hall emerged as someone whose very existence troubled the county’s presumptive gender binary, responsibility for dealing with the matter sat with Hall’s masters, neighbors, and the plantation commander, Bass.

Questions Arise about Hall's Identity

Hall attracted the attention of Warroskoyack neighbors by wearing clothes that contradicted what people believed they knew about Hall’s identity. When asked by several male neighbors to explain why a seemingly male Hall had been seen in women’s clothing, Hall replied, “I goe in weomen’s aparell to get a bit for my Catt” (McIlwaine 1979, 194), a likely reference to begging for scraps. Hall’s first recorded master, John Tyos, believed Hall was a woman and saw no discordance between wearing female clothing and Hall’s identity. Hall, in contrast, self-defined as both male and female to the plantation commander, Captain Bass, answering “hee was both man and woeman” (194). At least one other person, a Mr. Stacey, echoed this assessment, telling John Atkins, Hall’s second master, that Hall was both a man and a woman.

Uncertainty about Hall’s identity provoked local men and women to conduct a series of examinations of Hall’s person. Their responses revealed the stakes of the gender binary for people who lacked formally designated authority but enjoyed community standing based on marriage, household membership, and property ownership. Community regulations relied on categorizing people as male or female, even though there were examples in folk knowledge and historical memory of individuals who did not fit within a gender binary. Artists, writers, and classical scholars of Hall’s time fixated on “hermaphrodites,” individuals possessed of both male and female sex characteristics, seemingly fascinated by what they considered to be nature’s trompe l’oeil, or visual trick. Even in the colony of Virginia, where the pressure to put all hands to cultivating tobacco meant sending women to work in the fields, women remained associated with and sometimes assigned to domestic tasks that men ordinarily avoided. Able-bodied men were automatically assigned to field labor, although young men sometimes found themselves relegated to domestic work because of a shortage of female labor. Assignments of men and women to specific tasks associated with gender in England was one part of the performance of the gender binary. Wearing gender-specific clothing, having sex with members of the opposite sex, and being subject to punishment for out-of-wedlock sexual activity and pregnancy were all part of heteronormative gender and sexuality.

Enforcing the gender binary and regulating the sexual and gendered behavior of community members was itself a source of authority for Warroskoyack’s “ordinary” (and normative) residents. Although they did not wield the formal political, legal, and medical authority of the plantation commander or the doctor who presided over the General Court, Warroskoyack locals did have influence over the daily lives of the people who lived in their community. This influence coalesced in same-sex collectives, including at least two groups of men and a very determined group of married women. Connected through marriage, employment, and gossip, these same-sex groups passed information about Hall and sparked new questions and investigations.

Court Testimony

The General Court record of the testimony of Hall’s Warroskoyack neighbors, although itself sparse, detailed community efforts to determine Hall’s sex through both interrogation and physical examination of genitalia. The first group to lay hands on Hall for the purposes of fact finding had been piqued by conflicting reports of Hall’s sex. Three married women investigated Hall’s body while gathered at the house of Nicholas Eyres, a relative of one of Hall’s masters, Robert Eyres. Whatever it was they saw led the married women to conclude that Hall was a man. But Hall’s other master, John Tyos, swore, for unknown reasons, that Hall was female. This disagreement about Hall’s sex was enough to send a party to plantation commander Bass requesting his intervention. Bass did not search Hall’s physical body but asked directly “whether he was man or woeman” (McIlwaine 1979, 194). Hall affirmed both identities and offered graphic details about “not having the use of the man’s parte” (195). This was sufficient for Bass to conclude that Hall should be wearing women’s clothing. He ordered Hall into women’s dress, but when Hall complied, it undermined the convictions of the married women. Perhaps it also undermined Hall’s relationship—or value—as a servant, for Eyres and Tyos transferred responsibility to John Atkins.

When the married women next had an opportunity to search Hall’s body it was at Atkins’s house. “Doub[ing] of what they had formerly affirmed” (195), they searched Hall’s body and again concluded that “he” was a man, but they ventured beyond this conclusion to ask whether there were other anatomical clues. Hall informed Atkins of a bodily feature the searchers had not found initially, describing it as “a peece of an hole” (195). Atkins delegated the married women to search Hall’s person once more, and again they concluded that Hall was a man. Exasperated, Atkins contravened Captain Bass’s command and ordered Hall to dress like a man.

Wearing breeches and assuming the appearance of a man, Hall encountered yet another set of curious Warroskoyack neighbors. As Francis England testified, when he and Roger Rodes met Hall along the road, Rodes declared, “Hall thou has beene reported to be a woman and now thou are p[ro]ved to bee a man, I will see what thou carriest.” With help from England, Rodes threw Hall down and “felt the said Hall and pulled out his members,” finding him to be “a perfect man” (194).

Interleaved with their testimony about their investigations of Hall’s body, Hall’s neighbors and masters considered the rumor about Hall’s alleged sexual transgression with Bennett’s maid, “Great Besse.” England mentioned hearing the rumor, and Atkins reported that Hall had confronted Alice Long, one of the married women examiners, for spreading it. Long denied that she was the source of the gossip, however, and blamed a servant man belonging to a master named Tyos, most likely Hall’s former master John Tyos, for the story.

Hall’s experience with being examined revealed how little expectation there was of privacy of person when community welfare—defined as conformity with heteronormative marriages to produce children and devise property to heirs—was threatened. Hall’s claim to be both man and woman brought the community of Warroskoyack to attention. Various members of the community asserted the right to investigate Hall’s body for clues that would align Hall with the choices available to English settlers: male or female. In only one instance— when Atkins declined to search a female-clad and sleeping Hall—did the court record reflect hesitation about the violation of Hall’s privacy.

Hall’s Autobiographical Account

Following the reports of these contradictory findings, the judges asked Hall to provide a life history to make sense of seemingly irreconcilable facts: that dressed as a woman, Hall was found by female examiners to be a perfect man; that dressed as a man and vulnerable to a crude examination by two men, Hall was again found to be a man. Yet Hall’s self-reported incapacity as a man and questions about the apparent existence of a vagina-like orifice undermined the evidence of manhood for Bass, the plantation commander. Curiously, Bass did not view Hall’s body but accepted the reports of the men and women of the community.
This was how Hall’s case ended up in Jamestown at the General Court.

Hall answered the judges’ implicit question “Who are you really and how did you come to be this person?” with an autobiographical account of shifting gender identities, occupations, clothes, and abodes. Born around 1603 as Thomasine, Hall lived with their mother until the age of twelve. At that point, Hall moved to London where an aunt continued to raise them as a girl. With puberty and a brother’s impressment into the navy for the attack on Cádiz, Spain, in 1625, Hall “cut off[f] his heire and changed his apparel into the fashion of man” (McIlwaine 1979, 195), joining English troops in the disastrous assault on the Isle of Rhé in 1627. Lucky to have survived this debacle, Hall resumed life as Thomasine upon returning to Plymouth, England. There Hall earned a living making lace and sewing. Another life decision—travel across the Atlantic to the Colony of Virginia—coincided with yet another shift in Hall’s visible expression of gender identity. Hall traveled as Thomas, apparently under condition of indenture to provide several years of bound labor in exchange for the passage. Transported and sold as a male servant who would likely have worked in the tobacco fields, Hall entered the employ of Robert Eyres and John Tyos and moved into the household of the latter. Disputes about Hall’s identity and its expression subsequently stirred the community to search Hall’s body and eventually moved the case to the General Court.

The Court’s Punishment

After hearing Hall’s story, the judges decided to inflict a punishment out of sync with Hall’s own chosen presentation of self. It must have been demeaning and embarrassing, much as the entire ordeal of being subjected to forced physical examinations and forced changes of clothes had been. Hall was to wear clothing that no one wore in combination, male breeches topped with a woman’s apron and headdress. Anyone seeing the apron and head covering would have perceived Hall as female. Anyone seeing the breeches would have assumed Hall was male. To see both kinds of clothing together would have baffled the viewer and made Hall constantly vulnerable to being harassed, bullied, and ostracized. Worse still, Hall lost any self-determination of identity—the constant thread of self in their life story.

To protect “male” and “female” as distinct categories in their community, Warroskoyack locals and the General Court judges compelled Hall to relinquish membership in either category. Although Hall had self-defined as both a man and woman, never had they transgressed the categories by blending the dress of both together. Hall’s own self-description conforms to what seventeenth-century people would have described as a hermaphrodite, although no one involved in Hall’s case used that word. Categorizing Hall today, one might choose the term intersex, but that should be done advisedly. If, as the term intersex suggests, the truth about Hall’s identity resides in anatomy, the only evidence that exists on which to make a judgment is Hall’s fragmented testimony and the determined efforts of the men and women of Warroskoyack to protect the gender binary that supported their division of labor, their process of marriage and household formation, and their community coffers from the burden of raising illegitimate children. Whatever Hall’s anatomical "truth," Hall's identity truth remains a mystery. Hall appears at times to be a transgender person who felt like both a man and a woman but chose to perform these identities sequentially and situationally, appearing at any given moment as someone who conformed to the conventions of manhood and womanhood. Hall's desires, to the degree they can be fathomed from the distance of nearly four centuries, might be more nearly described as queer in their disturbance of binary expectations for gender appearance, social belonging, and sexuality.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

A Thousand and One Nights

SARAH BULL
Wellcome Research Fellow in Medical Humanities, Department of History and Philosophy of Science
University of Cambridge, United Kingdom

The impact of the French and English versions of this collection of tales on Western views of Eastern sexuality, particularly the 1885–1886 edition by Richard Francis Burton.

Alf layla wa layla (A Thousand and One Nights or Arabian Nights in English) is a collection of stories with roots in ancient and medieval Arabic, Persian, Turkish, and Indian literature and folklore, linked by a frame story about Scheherazade, a royal bride whose clever storytelling persuades her husband to postpone, and ultimately cancel, his plan to execute her. Different, overlapping configurations of Alf layla wa layla were compiled by authors, scholars, and translators from Asia, North Africa, and western Europe over hundreds of years, starting around the eighth century (Ouyang and Horta 2014).

From their introduction to the West in the early eighteenth century, versions of Alf layla wa layla situated it at the heart of Western knowledge about “Oriental” cultures, including their sexual practices. Western scholars framed the Arabian Nights’ portrayal of sexuality as proof of Middle Eastern peoples’ difference from white Europeans, as a challenge to Western attitudes about sex and as a basis for one of the first modern theories about the nature of homosexuality.

Early Translations

The first European adaptation of Alf layla wa layla, Antoine Galland’s Les mille et une nuits, contes arabes traduits en français, appeared in French between 1704 and 1717. In preparing his twelve-volume version, Galland freely changed the tales, embellishing, appending, and deleting material as he saw fit. He also incorporated some stories, such as “Aladdin’s Lamp” and “Ali Baba and the Forty Thieves,” that do not appear in Arabic versions of the collection (Horta 2017). Galland’s work became immensely popular across Europe, inspiring many translations, including the first English-language version, The Arabian Nights’ Entertainment (1706).

In the wake of Napoleon Bonaparte’s 1798–1801 military campaign against Egypt and Syria, and amid growing European fascination with the “Orient,” Western scholars began to call for more accurate translations of Alf layla wa layla, prepared directly from Arabic texts. Drawing on versions compiled in Egypt in response to European demand for “complete” manuscripts, the resulting adaptations framed the collection as a stable anthropological artifact and often included informational notes on Arab customs (Marzolph 1998). The first of these versions, including Edward Lane’s well-known The Thousand and One Nights (1838–1841), censored sexual content amid concerns about its palatability for Western audiences. Unexpurgated versions of Alf layla wa layla became available in English and French only during the late nineteenth century. The first, prepared by John Payne, was published in 1882–1884 under the title The Book of the Thousand Nights and One Night. Richard Francis Burton’s “plain and literal” translation, The Book of the Thousand Nights and a Night, appeared a few years later, in 1885–1886. Joseph-Charles Mardrus’s unexpurgated French version, Les mille et une nuits, was published between 1899 and 1904.

Like Galland’s version, these adaptations were creative: although branded “full” translations, their authors reconfigured, added, and cut material from Arabic texts for European audiences (Ouyang and Horta 2014). Unexpurgated adaptations emphasized, and sometimes expanded, the tales’ sexual content, in addition to reproducing it. Although critics maintained that this material was unsuitable for public consumption, the adaptations’ authors and supporters argued that its utility justified its publication. Unexpurgated translations, they claimed, unveiled the secrets of a less civilized culture and could provide beneficial insights to those overseeing imperial rule in Muslim countries. Some also suggested that unexpurgated versions of Alf layla wa layla offered a useful vantage point from which to critique Western culture and correct problematic Western assumptions about sexuality.

Richard Francis Burton's Nights

Although it was not the first of its kind, Burton’s unexpurgated version became the most notorious. It used Alf layla wa layla as a platform for critiquing British attitudes about sexuality and for communicating Burton’s own theories about the nature of homosexuality. Burton (1821–1890) was already an experienced translator of Arabic, Hindu, Sanskrit, and Yoruba works for Western audiences when he published The Book of the Thousand Nights and a Night and famed in England for his varied career as an army officer, a British consul, and an explorer of the Muslim holy cities, Mecca and Medina. Like Payne’s before it, his ten-volume version advertised itself as a no-holds-barred translation of tales from the original Arabic. It was, therefore, similar to Payne’s version, much of which Burton plagiarized (Horta 2017).

What set Burton’s adaptation apart from previous ones is that it was deliberately provocative. The work’s foreword emphasized the explicit nature of some of the stories, declaring them a reflection of the “indecency which ... occurs throughout general conversation” in the “East” (1: xiv). Burton’s language choices, which often emphasized the tales’ foreign origins, also struck many readers as unnecessarily coarse (Colligan 2002; Horta 2017). Moreover, as experts would later point out, Burton did more than simply render suggestive portions of the Arabic text into “plain” English: he embellished the tales to make them even more exotic and shocking to Western readers (Knipp 1974). For example, the man who cuckolds the king in the “Story of King Shahryar and his Brother,” described simply as a black slave in Arabic sources, becomes “a black cook of loathsome aspect and foul with kitchen grease and grime” in Burton’s version (1:4).

The Nights’ scholarly apparatus further emphasized and expanded the tales’ eroticism. Its many footnotes provided readers with observations about a variety of supposedly “Arab” sexual practices, including bestiality, sodomy, eunuchism, clitoridectomy, miscegenation, and pederasty, a term commonly used in the nineteenth century for sex between men. Burton’s notes also guided readers to places in the text where they could read more about these practices. One, for example, advises that “all but anthropological students … ‘skip’ over anecdotes in which [the character Abu Nowas’s (Abū Nuwās)] name and abominations occur” (5:64), ensuring that those interested in pederasty could find descriptions of the practice by looking for Nowas’s name in the text. The Nights’ “Terminal Essay” offered readers still more observations on sexuality, including a section devoted to pederasty.

Sotadic Theory of Homosexuality

The most provocative aspect of Burton’s Nights was arguably the section in the “Terminal Essay” on pederasty, which outlines a theory of homosexuality. Appearing at a time when sexuality was just beginning to be studied in a “scientific” manner, the essay was, notably, the first inquiry into the nature of homosexuality published in Britain for a public audience (Kennedy 2000). Burton argued for the existence of a “geographical and climatic, not racial” zone in which homosexuality is prevalent and celebrated among its inhabitants (10:207). He called this region the Sotadic Zone, after the classical Greek poet Sotades, whose verse deals with same-sex desire.

According to Burton’s description, the Sotadic Zone is a long geographical belt running through many of the warmer portions of the globe. Beginning at the Mediterranean, it encompasses the south of France, the Iberian Peninsula, Italy, Greece, and the coastal regions of North Africa, as well as Asia Minor, Afghanistan, the Punjab, and Kashmir. The zone then broadens, enveloping China, Japan, and Turkistan and finally the South Sea Islands and the Americas. Burton speculated that the climate in these places must produce “a blending of the masculine and feminine temperaments,” making their inhabitants susceptible to same-sex liaisons (10:208).

Burton referred to tales in the Nights to support parts of his theory: the “Terminal Essay” cites the “Tale of Kamar al-Zaman,” for example, as an illustration of “the funny form” of pederasty, and the “Tale of Abu Nowas” as one that displays “the grimmest and most earnest phase of the perversion” (10:252–253). However, the essay's claims are largely supported with anecdotes from other literary, historical, and social-scientific sources, as well as stories from Burton’s own experiences abroad. The latter include the essay’s opening reference to a secret government report on a boy brothel in Karachi, in present-day Pakistan, allegedly written by Burton in 1845 and based on his own infiltration of the region’s “porneia,” disguised as a traveling merchant (10:205–206). Broadly hinting at sex between Western and native men in newly acquired British territory, this reference did not simply act as evidence of foreign affinities for pederasty: it also provocatively implicated white European men, and imperial power, in that activity (Arondekar 2009). One explanation for the fact that this portion of the “Terminal Essay” focuses so much on sources other than Alf layla wa layla is that it was not originally written for publication in the Nights. Instead, as Dane Kennedy (2000) has argued, content in the tales presented Burton with a convenient pretext for publishing work on pederasty that he had written years earlier.

Aims and Influence

In pointing to climate as a cause of pederasty, Burton sought to naturalize same-sex desire and convince readers that men who have sex with other men “deserve, not prosecution, but the pitiful care of the physician and the study of the psychologist” (10:209). A number of early sexologists shared this aim and drew on Burton's essay in their own work on homosexuality. John Addington Symonds's study of same-sex desire, A Problem in Modern Ethics (1896), cites Burton as an authority on Oriental pederasty, as do Edward Carpenter's The Intermediate Sex (1908) and Intermediate Types among Primitive Folk (1914), which defend homosexuality through cross-cultural comparison. Havelock Ellis’s Studies in the Psychology of Sex: Sexual Inversion (1897), a textbook on homosexuality cowritten by Symonds, and Sigmund Freud's Three Essays on the Theory of Sexuality (1905) also draw on Burton's “Terminal Essay” to argue that, in certain regions, people have a special proclivity toward same-sex desire.

SAME-SEX RELATIONS IN ARABIC VERSIONS OF THE NIGHTS

Stories involving same-sex relations between men are very common in classical Arabic literature, and almost all larger anecdote collections, such as Ibn Qutayba’s ‘Uyun al-akhbar (Choice narratives) and al-Abi’s Nathr al-durr (Scattering of pearls), contain a good number of these, whereas stories about female same-sex relations are clearly rarer, though occasionally attested. Homoerotic literature to some extent mirrors contemporary reality in Arab culture as well as in Turkish and Persian cultures, and it also reflects a society where slaves were readily available to wealthier social classes. Homosexuality also played a role in the high life of and around the courts, together with wine and later also drugs. Although forbidden by Islamic law, homosexuality was often silently approved, especially between an adult male and a slave boy.

Same-sex stories belonged to commonly accepted mainstream literature and are mostly of a comic nature, involving risible situations arising from encounters between ardent elderly lovers and their unmoved young beloveds or from authoritative religious characters trying to hide their vices. Male same-sex relations are also prominent in love poetry.

The Alf layla wa layla (known as Arabian Nights in English) is no exception. The collection developed in mutual relation to anecdotal literature, with individual stories being borrowed in both directions, especially often from adab literature (the classical Islamic literature of medieval Asia) to the Alf layla wa layla. Sexuality in general is strongly present in the collection, beginning with the frame story, and individual stories present a large variety of sexual habits.

While the older layers of stories, which go back to Indian prototypes and often include a resourceful wife playing tricks on her husband, like many of the stories in the cycle The Craft and Malice of Woman, or the Tale of the King, His Son, His Concubine and the Seven Viziers, contain exclusively heterosexual stories, the homosexual ones are primarily of Arabic origin and relate to the overall acceptability of homosexuality in classical Arabic and Persian cultures, especially in literature. The majority of stories with same-sex content in the Alf layla wa layla derive from learned adab literature. The same-sex stories and references to male homosexuality in the Alf layla wa layla describe asymmetric love affairs between adult males and adolescents, which is also typical of classical Arabic literature in general, as well as classical Greek literature. Often their protagonist is the poet Abū Nuwās (d. 813; transliterated as “Abu Nowas” in Richard Burton’s famous 1885–1886 English translation), who was well-known for his homoerotic love poems and the anecdotes about his homosexual (as well as heterosexual) love affairs. “Hikayat Abi Nuwas” (“Abu Nowas with the Three Boys”) presents the poet in the company of three handsome boys drinking wine and is loosely patterned on a tenth-century anecdote in Ibn Abi ‘Awn’s (d. 934) al-Ajwiba al-muskita (Witty answers). “Wazir al-Yaman wa-akhuhu” (“The Wazir of Yemen and His Young Brother”) introduces a teacher who falls in love with his young pupil and has him climb over the wall to join him in a nocturnal lovers’ meeting. When the elder brother of the boy, the vizier, surprises the two sleeping together, he is first enraged but is later easily soothed by a poem. This story is already attested in Ibn Hijja al-Hamawi’s (d. 1434) Thamarat al-awraq (Fruits of the leaves) and other adab collections. In both tales there is an initial negative reaction to same-sex encounters, but this displeasure is easily surpassed, and the lovers escape without harm. “Munazarat al-rajul” (“The Man’s Dispute with the Learned Woman”) discusses the relative merits of men and women in love relations, following an old model already extant in ninth-century literature (al-Jahiz, Mufakharat al-jawari wa-al-ghilman [Boasting match over maids and youths]). After al-Jahiz (d. 868), the theme was often discussed in both Arabic and Persian literature.

These stories, where the point of view is that of the adult lover, take asymmetric relations between males as a natural part of life in higher society, but other tales, such as “ʿAlaʾ al-Din Abu al-Shamat,” contain sinister characters, often magi, who try to seduce beautiful boys. These may also introduce fathers who try to prevent seduction by going to the extremity of keeping their sons in complete isolation from the outside world from birth, until something happens and sets the story going. The viewpoint of the victim of unwelcome sexual attention can be seen in “Qamar al-Zaman” (“Tale of Kamar al-Zaman”), where Princess Budur, disguised as a male and having become a king, threatens to force Qamar al-Zaman to have sex with her; the latter thinks that the king wants him to be the passive partner in a same-sex relation. In the same story, Princess Budur, as a man, also celebrates a wedding night with Hayat al-Nufus, and the text implies that their nightly encounter may have been sexual. A similar confusion caused by cross-dressing takes place in “Muhammad al-Dimashqi wa Saʿd al-Baghdadi” (“Muhammad of Damascus and Saʿd of Baghdad”), where the malicious, homosexual Saʿd falls in love with a woman disguised as a man. Usually, though, cross-dressing in the Nights is merely a necessity under duress, with no erotic connotations. It seems that the stories that take asymmetric male homosexuality as an acceptable feature of courtly life derive from literary sources, whereas those that see such relations from the boy's viewpoint and as something to be avoided tend to derive from more popular levels of narration.

Female same-sex relations are much rarer both in the Nights and in classical Arabic literature in general, and they are depicted in a much less favorable light. In at least two stories we encounter a wicked old witch who seeks out beautiful girls. In “al-Malik ʿUmar ibn al-Nuʿman wa waladayhi” (“The Tale of Omar bin al-Nu’man and His Sons”) she is Dhat al-Dawahi (Mistress of Misfortunes) and in “Qissat Hasan al-Basri” (“Hassan of Bassorah”) she is the ugly old Shawahi Umm al-Dawahi (Lusty, Mother of Misfortunes); the names themselves are revealing.

Of the stories mentioned above, only “Qamar al-Zaman” is found in the (partial) fourteenth-century Syrian edition of the Alf layla wa layla by Muhsin Mahdi, published in Arabic in 1984. This is mainly because same-sex stories tend to derive from adab literature, and the Galland manuscript, on which Mahdi’s edition is based, represents an earlier form of the text that was later patched with additional stories taken from adab literature. All the stories except for “Muhammad al-Dimashqi wa Saʿd al-Baghdadi,” which is found only in the Reinhardt manuscript, found their way into the more extensive editions of Bulaq (1835) and Calcutta II (1839–1842), going back to the eighteenth-century Egyptian prototype.
The stories that were included in the Arabic editions found their way also into English, French, and German translations of the Alf layla wa layla toward the end of the nineteenth century. Thus, John Payne (1882–1914), Burton (1885–1888), J. C. Mardrus (1899–1904), and Enno Littmann (1921–1928) translate them all, and they also form part of Malcolm C. Lyons's 2008 translation. In earlier editions, the blatantly homosexual stories were either left out or translated in a way that minimizes their erotic content.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Jaakko Hämeen-Anttila

Professor of Arabic and Islamic Studies

University of Edinburgh, United Kingdom

Ironically, Burton may not have found his theory as persuasive. Several parts of the “Terminal Essay,” such as the section where he claims that pederasty was uncommon among the Hindus of the Indian subcontinent, an area within the Sotadic Zone, contradict his presentation of pederasty as a climatic and geographic phenomenon, as did some of his personal experiences (Kennedy 2000). Burton’s annotations to a copy of the essay, and the interest he later expressed in writing a general history of pederasty with European examples, further indicate that his views on same-sex desire were far from fixed.

Nevertheless, even if he was not persuaded by his own theory, presenting pederasty as a phenomenon associated with the “Orient” suited Burton’s aims. Orientalist writing had long associated Arab culture with sexual exoticism and desire between men (Boone 2014; Massad 2007). Discussing it in this tradition, which distanced Western readers from pederasty, could make them more receptive to Burton's argument that same-sex desire could be studied scientifically (Bleys 1995). There were also economic advantages to situating a shocking essay within a collection of tales already familiar (in censored forms) to British readers, as the Nights' publishing history suggests.

Pornography or Social Critique?

The publishing history of Burton's Nights reveals more about his aims for the work. Burton clearly knew that it would initiate public controversy after it was published, and to some extent incited it. His version was published through the Kama Shastra Society, an underground press that he founded with F. F. Arbuthnot and Richard Monckton-Milnes for the purpose of publishing erotic and semierotic translations. Prior publications issued through the society, such as The Kama Sutra of Vatsyayana (1883) and The Perfumed Garden of the Cheikh Nefzaoui (1886), were published anonymously and circulated only among subscribers to avoid public outcry and prosecution for distributing obscenity. Burton's Nights carried his name and was meant for a public audience. Between 24,000 and 30,000 advertising circulars were posted for the edition, boasting of its copious notes on Arab customs, beliefs, and practices and hinting at its explicit nature (Colligan 2002).

Partly because of this publishing strategy, Burton's Nights ignited debate about its suitability for public consumption. Critics considered its crude language and descriptions of sexuality "morally filthy" and "absolutely unfit for Christian populations" (quoted in Kennedy 2000, 325, 326). One even labeled it "pornography" (326). Burton defended his work against these charges, arguing that few members of the public would actually read his expensive, limited-edition book. However, the controversy arguably worked to his advantage. In addition to ensuring rapid sales for the Nights, as well as a market for Burton's subsequent collection of tales, Supplemental Nights to the Book of the Thousand Nights and a Night (1886–1888), it initiated a public debate about where and how sexuality should be discussed in which the Nights itself could intervene. Burton's foreword defends it on the grounds of cultural and historical relativism: what was considered indecent in England, it argues, was not considered offensive in Egypt; and although Western readers might consider parts of the Nights coarse, passages from the works of some of Britain's most celebrated writers were just as suggestive. For Burton, the latter exposed the "perfect hypocrisy" of Western society (1:xv). By showing that definitions of decency were socially constructed, the former suggested that Western attitudes about sex could change.

SEE ALSO Homoerotic Poetry of Abū Nunwâs; Orientalism in Gay Pornography about the Middle East; Pasolini's Cinematic Adaptation of A Thousand and One Nights; Religion and Same-Sex Behaviors: Islam

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Since Tibet’s “incorporation” into the People’s Republic of China (PRC) in the 1950s, the hegemony of the Han-dominated Chinese state has been a defining characteristic of Tibetan modernity. Beyond widespread socioeconomic disadvantage and political marginalization, Tibetans have also endured and continue to endure many restrictions on their cultural and religious practices under the Chinese state. This is often done in the name of “modernization” and “development,” and increasingly in the name of “social stability” and “state security.” Less explored to date, however, is the question of how the Chinese state has mobilized particular norms and configurations of gender and sexuality to undermine traditional sociocultural norms across Tibet and extend its own power base. As such, it is important to examine the ways in which the long shadow of the PRC has affected and detracted from traditional forms of gender and sexuality in Tibet, and sometimes even enabled their revival and the formation of new forms of queer identity. Such an examination has the potential not only to illuminate the spatial and temporal politics of gender and sexuality in Tibet, but also to raise broader questions about ethnic relations in contemporary Tibet.

Historical Overview

This entry begins by considering the various landscapes of gender and sexuality in Tibet from a historical perspective in order to better understand how they have changed since the Chinese occupation. With regard to “premodern” Tibet, a wide variety of sexual arrangements have been documented. Charlene E. Makley (1997) notes that the practice of polyandry (the taking of multiple husbands), as well as the relative premarital sexual freedom experienced by many Tibetan women in some classes and regions, signals the presence of a less restrictive system of sexuality than that of Tibet’s historical neighbors, China and India. Tsering Shakya has also asserted that sexual relationships between monks were widespread in Tibetan monasteries (see Otton 1996). While some studies have focused on what have been characterized as “exotic practices,” closer examination has shown that these arrangements tended to result from “an ethic of fraternal solidarity and patrilocality” rather than from the exercise of sexual agency per se (Stein 1972, 98). Families arranged polyandrous marriages for their children, and it is unclear to what extent women or men were able to engage in polyandry without the approval of families.

A number of Tibetologists have also described indigenous and hybrid Indo-Tibetan Buddhist understandings of a “third sex.” Developed and defined by Buddhist thinkers based on Indian medicine (Gyatso 2003), the third sex, as described by Janet Gyatso, refers to “those whose sexuality changes every half month (in some versions from male to female and back again),” as well as intersex individuals and eunuchs (2003, 97). Based on her analysis of Tibetan literature, terminology, and medical systems, Gyatso argues that Buddhist conceptions of gender were not so much based on a particular conception of gender identity but rather on sex characteristics, and she also notes some degree of overlap between ideas of gender and sexuality in the idea of the third sex. Third sex is further expounded on in Buddhist literature, mostly for the purpose of excluding this category of people from taking monastic vows, receiving teachings, and giving donations. Yet, as in many cultures, these rules were not always strictly followed, and interpretations often varied across region, class, and era. It remains unclear to what extent third sex was ever a fully inhabitable identity for Tibetans. (For a thorough discussion of third sex in Tibetan literature, especially medical treatises, see Gyatso 2003, 2015; Gyatso and Havnevik 2005.)

It is important to note that “third gender” and Buddhist gender systems more generally do not map neatly onto current uses of the terms gender and sexuality. Indeed, to what extent “queer” even provides a helpful way of describing these practices is unclear. This raises broader questions as to how histories of sexuality and gender across different geographical areas can be translated in ways that would be understandable to readers in the contemporary era. In Tibet, because of the foundation of Vajrayana Buddhist epistemology and ontology, the inclusion of the “third sex” in standard medical discussions, and the normative status of polygamy, gender and sexuality are clearly conceived of and engaged with differently. This incommensurability of labels and concepts also compels one to consider how these practices relate to present-day practices of queerness and how far “queer” can go as a conceptual tool in understanding varied cultural expressions across different places and times (Domínguez Ruvalcaba 2016).

Following the Chinese Communist Party’s rise to power and the establishment of the PRC in 1949, a “scientific” model of monogamous heterosexuality was promoted that emphasized the reproductive needs of the socialist state. As Harriet Evans (1997) argues, women’s sexuality was particularly targeted during the Mao Zedong era, with official and popular press, women’s magazines, sex education publications, self-help guides, and medical advice pamphlets all variously propagating stringent ideological controls over sexual and social conduct. New regulations and policies reflecting these norms and values were gradually rolled out across Tibet, resulting in widespread disruption to the various traditions and hierarchies of sexuality and gender that had long formed the bedrock of Tibetan societies. For instance, the regulation of sexual desire through the implementation of a strict heteronormative marital order, reinforced by household registration policies, formed a core part of the Chinese state's modernizing project across Tibet. Moreover, the state disbanded monasteries and nunneries, weakening local power structures by compelling Tibetans into conformity with the state’s norms of sexual morality and family values. Celibacy, the most fundamental vow for a Buddhist monk or nun, came under attack, with reports of nuns and monks forced to marry and violate their vows to prove their symbolic alignment with state values (Gyatso and Havnevik 2005). Furthermore, polygamous marital arrangements were banned by the state in the interests of promoting “respectable” domesticity.

In the late 1970s, following the death of Mao, the Chinese Communist Party embarked on a series of radical economic reforms designed to generate growth and investment. Moving from a planned economy to embracing many tenets of capitalism, these reforms quickly brought about widespread social changes. Media commercialization, a relative loosening up on control over cultural content, and greater exposure to the global cultural market all opened up new spaces for thinking about, challenging, and practicing social norms and values.

Since these landmark reforms were introduced, understandings of sexuality and gender have undergone immense transformation across the PRC. In 1997 the Chinese criminal code was revised to remove “hooliganism,” under which sexual relations between people of the same sex had been banned, while in 2001 homosexuality was removed from the Chinese Classification of Mental Disorders. Yet, while numerous surveys suggest that the general public has become tolerant of homosexuality and that queer culture has flourished, the state continues to informally maintain an ambiguous position often characterized as “the three nos”: no approval, no disapproval, and no promotion. This stands in contrast to the sizable strides that Taiwan made in relation to LGBTQ+ rights in the later years of the second decade of the twenty-first century. In May 2017, a top Taiwanese court ruled that discrimination against same-sex marriage is unconstitutional, while in January 2018 the country announced plans to add a third-gender option to passports.

Importance of Online Spaces

Online spaces represent a lively and cacophonous platform for exploring and discussing questions of sex, sexuality, and gender. Searching a combination of terms such as gay, lesbian, bisexual, trans, and Tibet reveal a number essays and comments, as well as details of LGBT-themed events in Tibet. Although queer desire and relationships are still sometimes considered a taboo topic, conversations about them on Weibo, WeChat, and other social media are not uncommon among Tibetan netizens, often embracing a mix of Tibetan, Chinese, and English terms.

An important part of online discussions about queer issues among Tibetans are stories by and about Tibetans outside of Tibet. For instance, one of the most popularly circulated articles on queer Tibet is a 2007 interview published by Phayul, a popular exile Tibetan web portal that has published a number of stories about LGBTQ+ issues in Tibetan communities. The interview tells the story of a young Tibetan man who grew up in India and identifies as gay (Jigdel 2007a). Translated into Chinese as “Homosexuality in Tibet: We Are No Different” (Jigdel 2007b), it was widely circulated among Tibetans in Chinese cyberspace. More recently, feature articles on Tenzin Mariko (Gurung 2017), an India-based Tibetan trans woman who made her first public appearance as a performer at the 2015 Miss Tibet pageant in Dharamsala, were also shared and discussed among Tibetans across Tibet, with many expressing support. However, contemporary Tibetan ideals and norms concerning gender and sexuality are far from homogenous across Tibet and the Tibetan diaspora. As Emily T. Yeh has noted, despite a shared cultural identity across written language, religion, and history, Tibetan identity formation is “varied and deeply inflected by national location and transnational trajectories” (2007, 648). Across Tibet, China, India, Nepal, Switzerland, and elsewhere, Tibetans navigate a wide range of social, cultural, and political frameworks about gender and sexuality, while also responding to pressures and expectations to perform an authentic “Tibetanness” (Harris 1999). Along with age, class, and social status, these geopolitical frictions variously play out between Tibetans in Tibet and those in exile. Yet, while online spaces can provide a space for negotiating such questions, internet censorship across the PRC can also affect the possibilities for discussion between Tibetans outside of Tibet. For example, while the Dalai Lama voiced his support for same-sex marriage in 2014, it is unclear what impact this had within Tibet, as almost all public discussion of the Dalai Lama, viewed as a “separatist” by the Chinese state, is strictly censored.

Online sites have become an important meeting space for queer Tibetans. While a number of gay bars and a cruising scene in Lhasa once meant a vibrant though small and low-key queer scene, tighter security across the city has made physical gatherings increasingly difficult. This has pushed many toward the use of dating apps, of which there are many in contemporary China (Cook and Young 2013).

Literature and Popular Media

Beyond online spaces, Tibetan literature has also been an important place for public discussions about sex and sexuality. In 2011 the Tibetan writer Pema Tsering (pen name: Tian Yong) published Zhuoma de hunli (Drolma’s wedding), a novel that explores love, loss, and faith in contemporary Tibet. The plot centers on the protagonist, also named Pema Tsering, who has moved to Tibet to end his own life after an accident on his wedding day in which his wife-to-be was killed. There, his encounters with love and relationships, including that of two queer Tibetan women who plan to marry, rekindle his sense of purpose in life. Nonetheless, Lama Jabb has argued that references to same-sex relations remain fairly rare in modern Tibetan literature. Although a few examples can be found, Jabb notes that these tend to center on lesbian sex and are generally more indicative of “the persistence of a heterosexual, masculine conception of carnal passion” that characterizes the male gaze in contemporary literature rather than support for LGBTQ+ rights (2015, 197).

In popular media, references to queer relations in Tibet are similarly rare. One exception is the well-known Tibetan singer and songwriter Han Hong, who is often referenced in China’s official state media and rarely without some speculation as to her sexuality. Celebrated for her high-pitched and versatile singing style and songs about Tibet, Han is the daughter of a Tibetan mother and a Han father. She is one of the most famous singers in the People’s Liberation Army, where she entertained troops for close to thirty years before retiring in 2015. Typically performing smartly dressed in a colorful tuxedo, Han has never publicly disclosed her sexuality. Since the middle of the first decade of the twenty-first century, state media have repeatedly referred to her being a lesbian as an “open secret” (Chinese: gongkai de mimi), while tabloid magazines often post images of her with a person they claim to be her girlfriend of the moment.
Differences and Relationship between Han Chinese and Tibetans

In many ways, the discussions happening around queer issues in Tibet mirror many of those also taking place among Han Chinese. In other ways, however, these discussions are more specific to the Tibetan context. For instance, conversations about queerness in Tibet are often met with the response that LGBTQ+ individuals do not represent “our values” and are “against our religion.” As in many societies living under occupation, for some, LGBTQ+ identities are seen as part and parcel of broader trends of modernity imposed on Tibet from the outside rather than as something occurring organically in Tibetan culture and society. Others are interested in learning about the histories of gender and sexuality in Tibet. Essays examining what Buddhism says about sexuality and gender constitute a core part of Tibetan discussions on queer Tibet. Moreover, some essays demonstrate a keen sense of interest in the revival of polyandry as a means of promoting and preserving Tibetan tradition, tending to reflect wider anxieties about the survival of Tibetan culture, language, identity, and national unity under the pressures of assimilation (see Brox and Bellér-Hann 2014; Topgyal 2013; Kolas and Thowsen 2005).

At the same time, however, numerous heavy crackdowns on queer communities have taken place across the PRC under the president Xi Jinping, who came to power in 2012. A push for “family values” and traditional gender roles form a core part of the state’s revival of certain Confucian values. As part of this, queer content on television, in film, and online has been met with heavy censorship. Moreover, restrictions on queer activism as part of the broader crackdown on civil society are also proving to be major challenges for queer visibility and rights advocacy work across the PRC. Combined with the already heightened state surveillance in Tibet since the 2008 unrest, LGBTQ+ groups there are even more vulnerable.

In the context of broader interethnic relations and widespread prejudice against Tibetans, there are many other questions to ask about how Han-Tibetan relationships play out in queer spaces. Many have written about how ethnicity has long been a highly gendered construct in contemporary China (Schein 1997; Jinba 2014). Although many see ethnic minorities characterized in popular and official media as highly eroticized and feminized, Ben Hillman and Lee-Anne Henfry (2006) have argued that Tibetans are instead routinely masculinized. Similarly, Makley argues that Tibetan men are represented as rugged, valiant, and wild, possessing a “virile, brutish sexuality” (2002, 629). While some of these stereotypes are certainly propagated by gay Han men in online forums, to what extent this hypermasculinization of Tibetan men manifests itself in terms of gender expression, sexual roles, and fetishization in Han-Tibetan dating scenes and relationships requires more research.

Queer Tibet is, and indeed always has been, deeply transnational. Today, Tibetans negotiate between various notions of sexuality and gender coming from “the West,” the Tibetan diaspora, and Han Chinese LGBTQ communities, as well as from their own rich indigenous histories and traditions. However, under the shadow of a state that continues to oscillate between tolerating and cracking down on LGBTQ communities, the politics of queer Tibet are set to remain intricately entangled in debates and discussions about the past, present, and future of Tibet and its people.

SEE ALSO Third Genders

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Tom of Finland (1920–1991)

KATI MUSTOLA Researcher
University of Helsinki, Finland

Finnish artist whose work portrayed strong, masculine gay men.

Tom of Finland, born Touko Laaksonen in Kaarina, Finland, is one of the best-known gay erotic artists in the Western world. He drew strong, masculine gay men at a time when gays were considered to be effeminate and weak. He created the prototypical "leather stud." The manly men in his drawings have become archetypes for generations of gay men, influencing a variety of artists, including Robert Mapplethorpe (1946–1989), Bruce Weber (1946–), Rainer Werner Fassbinder (1945–1982), and Freddie Mercury (1946–1991).

Inspiration for His Art

Laaksonen was a self-taught artist who never received any formal training in the visual arts; he did receive training in music (piano) and advertising, the latter of which influenced his art. He started drawing at a young age, eventually becoming a world-class illustrator of the male body. That being said, the scope of his mastery was narrow, being limited to the male physique. From childhood on, Laaksonen was attracted to masculine men, leather, and uniforms. In the documentary Daddy and the Muscle Academy (1991), he describes how he received his first leather boots at age five and wanted to wear them to bed. He admired the muscular farmhands working in the fields around his home and the uniformed bus drivers he saw during his daily commute to his secondary school in Turku. He drew his secret fantasies of these men, but he had to destroy his early erotic and fetishist drawings for fear of discovery.
Laaksonen was drafted into military service in the spring of 1940, following the Soviet Union's invasion of Finland the previous November. Finland reached out to Germany for help against the invaders, which resulted in more than 200,000 German soldiers being stationed in Finland between 1940 and 1945. Laaksonen admired the Germans' formfitting uniforms and engaged in sex with German soldiers in the gay cruising parks of Helsinki. He never supported Nazi ideology, but his later inclusion of SS and Wehrmacht uniforms and swastikas in a few of his erotic pictures drew accusations that he was a Nazi or sympathized with Nazism. After these accusations, he developed his own uniform, the uniform of Tom's men. The resemblance with the German, tight-fitting black uniforms remained, however, and continued to generate controversy around Laaksonen and his illustrations. Another source of inspiration for Tom's men was the rising American youth culture, especially the leather jacket and denim jeans worn by silver-screen biker rebels such as Marlon Brando in the movie The Wild One (1953) and James Dean in Rebel without a Cause (1955).
Tom's Men

The postwar gay subculture of Helsinki came as a shock to Laaksonen, as the uniformed men in leather boots vanished, replaced by effeminate queers. Lacking manly men to admire and have sex with, Laaksonen renewed his earlier hobby of drawing his sexual fantasies. During the war, he could not draw erotic pictures, given the lack of privacy. At first, drawing served as a private sexual release, but when he showed his drawings to other gay men, he received positive responses, as well as sex.

Encouraged by an acquaintance, Laaksonen sent some drawings to Physique Pictorial, an American bodybuilding magazine, in 1956. These “beefcake magazines,” which typically featured photographs and drawings depicting manly, muscular men, were gay magazines in disguise. Physique Pictorial published Laaksonen’s pictures of laughing lumberjacks. He had signed them as “Tom”; the editor and owner of the magazine, Bob Mizer (1922–1992), added “of Finland,” and the pseudonym was born. In addition to publishing in the United States, Tom also published his work in gay magazines in Denmark and Sweden.

The men in Tom’s drawings are typically working-class. Another characteristic feature of Tom’s works is gaze; the men depicted in his drawings focus their gaze on the viewer, or meet the gaze of another man. Tom’s men also smile and laugh. Sex is fun; Tom’s men display no inhibitions or shame about their sexuality. Big or huge penises are a characteristic trademark of Tom’s work.

Tom had strict limits on what he was willing to draw. Occasionally he would receive commissions asking him to draw pictures of sex with children, which he refused. He also refused to draw on themes of mutilation and genuine sadism. His sadomasochistic pictures may look wild, but Tom was always careful to depict sadomasochistic sex as consensual play and to see that the “victim” was also portrayed as enjoying the situation. In his comics, Tom delighted in showing role reversals, in which the man who started from a position of strength—a policeman, for example—might end up the underdog, suffering humiliation and shame, although he would eventually enjoy this new role. Tom’s humor was black but always benevolent.

Tom drew in times when homosexual acts between adults were illegal in many parts of the world, which was the case in Finland until 1971. Pornography was also illegal both in Europe and in the United States, although laws on pornography started to relax in the 1960s and 1970s. Pirated versions of Tom’s pictures appeared in many countries, which Tom was unable to combat since his drawings were considered pornography and were therefore illegal themselves.

Impact of Tom's Work
The first exhibition of Tom’s art took place in the back room of a sex shop in Hamburg in 1976. Exhibitions followed in 1978 in small galleries in San Francisco, Los Angeles, and Amsterdam. In 1978 Tom went to the United States for the first time to be present at the openings of his exhibitions. There he became friends with a devoted fan, Durk Dehner, who took over sales and management of Tom’s work. Together, they set up the Tom of Finland Company to print and sell Tom’s art and to safeguard his rights. In 1984 the Tom of Finland Foundation was set up to protect, preserve, and promote erotic art.

The Tom of Finland Foundation has cataloged nearly 4,000 works by Tom (finished and preparatory), and there is an unknown number of works that have been lost or destroyed. Tom’s art is exceptional in the sense that it has been consumed mostly by ordinary gay men, rather than the artworld elite. His works were first published as magazine illustrations, comic strips, and posters, and only later appeared in art books and galleries. Tom’s work had a defining impact on the way gay men throughout the world were perceived and, more importantly, how they perceived themselves. Tom’s pictures of laughing, gay men having fun portrayed the homosexual liberation movement long before the new wave of gay liberation started in the 1960s (building on previous movements that extended back to the 1890s).

Tom’s work has also penetrated to the dominant straight culture and influenced fashion, design, and art. His pictures are nowadays seen on everyday objects, such as postage stamps, bedsheets, and towels. Tom’s art occupies a conflicting field in the space between art and pornography, which has made it difficult to get it displayed in art galleries and museums. Tom himself thought of his art thus: “I know my little ‘dirty drawings’ are never going to hang in the main salons of the Louvre, but it would be nice if—I would like to say ‘when,’ but I better say ‘if’—our world learns to accept all the different ways of loving. Then maybe I could have a place in one of the smaller side rooms” (quoted in Hooven, Dehner, and Sharp 2011, 204).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

FILMOGRAPHY

The development and usage of the Chinese word tongzhi, an umbrella term for people with nonnormative genders and sexualities in Hong Kong, Taiwan, and China.

Often translated as “comrade” by English writers, the Chinese dictionary and encyclopedia Cihai defines tongzhi as “people sharing a common will.” Its first appearance in the Chinese lexicon is believed to date back more than 2,700 years, in the ancient Chinese text Guoyu of the Spring and Autumn historical period (771–476 BCE): “when people share the same moral character, they share the same heart; when they share the same heart, they share the same will.”

The term first took on political and militaristic overtones amid the revolutionary efforts led by Sun Yatsen (1866–1925; usually referred to as the father of the modern Chinese nation) against the imperialist regime of the late Qing dynasty (1636–1912), when members of the revolutionary force would address each other as tongzhi. Sun's Triple Demism philosophy called on his followers, or comrades, to fight against imperialism: “As the revolution is not yet completed, all my followers must endeavor to carry it out” (quoted in Fang and Heng 1983, 496). Shortly after the Communist Party of China stepped onto the political stage and founded the People's Republic of China (PRC) in 1949, the use of tongzhi extended beyond the narrow circles of political parties and reached the masses, alongside the introduction of nationwide socialist programs that aimed to collectivize agricultural land, nationalize industries, redistribute wealth, and bridge class divides.

While still indicative of revolutionary passion, the term shed some of its official and formal associations and found its way into everyday, casual conversations of the general populace.
This shift in usage reflected the state’s project to equalize and homogenize social relations throughout the nation, as one’s parents, relatives, neighbors, and coworkers turned into one big collective: everyone was now a tongzhi. However, the popularization of the term came to a halt upon the outbreak of the Cultural Revolution in 1966 (Fang 2007). Spearheaded by the state and executed by the Red Guards, public criticism and violent persecution seemed relentless and omnipresent. Naturally, people refrained from calling each other tongzhi for fear of associating themselves with someone who might soon be branded as a “capitalist roader” or an enemy of the state, reflecting a larger trend of the breakdown of kinship ties and the antagonization of social relations. Use of the term, therefore, sharply declined. Its popular usage continued to wane during the reform era, when China witnessed the rise of new conceptions of individualism and the resurfacing of class differences as a result of the marketization of the economy, the privatization of enterprises, and the consumerization of society (Fang 2007).

The Relationship between Tongzhi and Homosexuality

Given this brief genealogy of the term, what is the relationship between tongzhi and homosexuality? The term homosexuality was translated first from Western sexology through the Japanese translation doseiai into Chinese tongxing'ai (tongxing lian'ai, or tongxing lian) in the Republican period (1919–1949). It is a gender-neutral term, referring to both male and female homosexuality (Sang 2003; Chiang 2010). Since then, the terms tongxing lian or tongxing'ai have been widely used to refer to homosexuality in China, Hong Kong, and Taiwan.

It is believed that it was in 1989, when the first Hong Kong Lesbian and Gay Film Festival used “Hong Kong Tongzhi Film Festival” as its Chinese title, that the word tongzhi suddenly became a synonym for gays and lesbians and, shortly after, an umbrella term for all people with nonnormative genders and sexualities, such as LGBTQ (lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender, and queer). The queer appropriation of the term became popular in both the LGBTQ and straight communities first in Hong Kong and then in Taiwan. The Taipei Golden Horse International Film Festival in 1992 featured a section on lesbian and gay films titled “New Queer Cinema,” which was translated as xin tongzhi dianying, equating tongzhi with “gays and lesbians,” or “queer” (Lim 2008). The term became popular within LGBTQ communities in China in the late 1990s.

The Emergence of Tongzhi Identities and Communities

It should be noted that tongxinglian subcultures have always been present and even seemed to flourish in the post–World War II period (e.g., in Hong Kong, see Kong 2014; in Taiwan, see Huang 2011 and Chiang and Wang 2017; in China, see Chiang 2012). However, the blooming of visible and explicitly queer cultural production, commercial venues, and political activism, together with a more distinctive “gay,” “lesbian,” or “tongzhi” identity, among other self-identified labels, emerged in Hong Kong and Taiwan in the late 1980s and in China in the late 1990s. Tongzhi identities and communities slowly emerged, along with vigorous social, legal, economic, and cultural developments. The most prominent developments are legal reforms, such as the decriminalization of homosexuality (1991) in Hong Kong, the lifting of martial law (1987) and the abolishment of police offence law (1991) in Taiwan, and the deletion of hooliganism from criminal law (1997) and the removal of homosexuality from the list of mental illnesses (2001) in China. Other salient developments include the rise of gender and sexuality studies as academic disciplines, the emergence of a substantial infrastructure of tongzhi consumer markets, the burgeoning of visible online and offline communities, and the development of tongzhi activism (for Hong Kong and China, see Kong 2011, Kong 2017, and Jeffrey and Yu 2015; for Taiwan, see Wang 1999).

Hong Kong tongzhi identities and communities that emerged around the 1980s were heavily influenced by Western queer cultures, partly due to Hong Kong’s British colonial context. And the most discernable form of same-sex expression in contemporary Taiwan since the early 1980s has been local literary production (Lim 2008; Chi 2017). Mainland Chinese tongzhi identities and communities emerged almost ten years later, were heavily concentrated in urban centers, such as Shenzhen, Shanghai, and Beijing, and were shaped not so much by Western but by Hong Kong and Taiwanese tongzhi identities, communities, and cultures. Influences included terminology (e.g., the use of tongzhi), the decor and design of entertainment venues, and the style of cultural production (e.g., film festivals). For example, many gay businesses, such as gay bars and saunas, in Shenzhen in the early twenty-first century were set up or run by Hong Kong gay men.

Diverse Terminology

Since the 1990s, being homosexual has ceased to be perceived as a crime, deviancy, or mental illness; instead, homosexuality has become acceptable as a distinct sexual identity. Apart from tongzhi, many specific terms have been created, such as membə (member) for gay men, and lesi (lesbian), TB (tomboy), or TBG (tomboy girl) for lesbians in Hong Kong; gay (gay men) and lala (lesbian) in China; gaizu (gai as gay and zu as tribe) and guaitai (freak) or ku'er (cool child) (both translations of the term queer) in Taiwan. The term tongzhi has replaced tongxinglian or tongxing'ai, which has strong clinical connotations, as the dominant discourse for nonnormative genders and sexualities.

Although tongzhi serves as an umbrella term for LGBTQ, it should be noted that gay, lesbian, bisexual, transgender, and other queer communities have their own specific terms and may not use (or may even resist) tongzhi as self-identification. Therefore, the term is sometimes used strategically by queer collectivities, activists, or academics as an umbrella term, especially when facing the general public. For example, the Taiwan Pride Walk is called Tongzhi Youxing, but in English “Taiwan LGBT Pride.” In this sense, tongzhi is a conceptualization of the term queer itself and a tactic of “strategic essentialism.” Nevertheless, tongzhi’s popularity may be due to its erasure of sexual connotation and its affirmation of a "positive" rather than a "negative" identity. As argued by Wah-Shan Chou, the term contains “positive cultural references, gender neutrality, desexualization of the stigma of homosexuality, politics beyond the homo-hetero binarism, and indigenous cultural identity for integrating the sexual into the social” (2001, 28). Echoing the shifts in the politics of identity in the West since the 1970s, tongzhi gestures to a variegated identity for cultural production, academic focus, consumption, policy advocacy, and social activism in Chinese societies.

Use of the Term by Activists and within Social Movements

Tongzhi movements in the three Chinese locales—Hong Kong, Taiwan, and China—have their own distinctive paths of development due to their different social, cultural, political, and economic contexts. Briefly put, the state plays a key role that at once enables and constrains the development of tongzhi culture and sexual citizenship in these Chinese societies. Religious (Christian/Catholic) nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) shape social and moral developments in Hong Kong and Taiwan (less so in China because of its state Marxism), which has a profound impact on gender and sexual politics in the two locales. Next comes the family, widely seen as the most powerful institution in Chinese societies that circumscribes tongzhi lives. The circulation of goods and services consciously developed for and marketed at tongzhi, known as the pink economy, also serves as an important platform for identity building and solidarity but at the same time demarcates tongzhi along the lines of class, age, gender, ethnicity, and other social and cultural belongings. Tongzhi movements have been working along the parameters of these “sites of governance” (for Hong Kong, see Kong 2011 and Kong, Lau, and Li 2015; for China, see Engebretsen and Schroeder 2015; for Taiwan, see Gofyy 2015 and Lee 2017).

Hong Kong In Hong Kong, tongzhi groups have emerged since the early 1990s, and a few observations can be made about their use of the term. First, tongzhi is not so often used in their names, as is the case with Xianggang Shifenyi Hui (Hong Kong Ten Percent Club), the first tongzhi group in Hong Kong, founded in 1986 and formally registered in 1992; Xing Quan Hui (Civil Rights for Sexual Diversities), founded in 1999; and Xianggang Caihong (Hong Kong Rainbow), founded in 1998. Second, tongzhi appears more in Chinese but not in the English titles, such as Tongzhi Jiankang Cujin Hui (Satsanga, 1993) or Zimei Tongzhi (Queer Sisters, 1995). Third, tong (or tung in Cantonese), which signifies “sameness,” has been widely used: Qi Tong Fuwu She (Horizons, 1991), Lui Tung Yuen (Cantonese, 1996), Xianggang Nu Tong Meng Hui (Women’s Coalition of HKSAR, 2003), Nutong Xueshe (2005), Da Tong (Gay Harmony, 2009), and Da’ai Tongmeng (Big Love Alliance, 2012).

The early tongzhi movement of the 1990s strongly emphasized identity building. Activists tried hard to dissociate homosexuality from pathology, to play down the “sexual” aspect of tongzhi identity, to stress the similarities between heterosexuals and homosexuals, and to emphasize the harmonious nature of Chinese society in stark contrast with the confrontational politics in the West (Kong 2011). The tongzhi movement in the twenty-first century has been more vocal and proactive in fighting for various tongzhi sexual citizenship rights, ranging from conduct-based claims to identity-based and relationship-based claims (Richardson 2000), hallmarked by IDAHO (International Day against Homophobia, 2005–) and Pride Walk (2008–). Activists have sought the right to disclose their sexual identity without being penalized, the right not to have to hide their sexual identity, the right to same-sex marriages or domestic relationships, and the right to access social and legal benefits. From identity building in the 1990s to sexual citizenship since the first decade of the twenty-first century, the term tongzhi has been used mostly in academic writings and social activism as an umbrella term to fight for the rights and benefits of the LGBTQ community in Hong Kong (Kong, Lau, and Li 2015).

Taiwan In 1990 Taiwan's first tongzhi group, Wo Men Zhi Jian (Between Us), a lesbian organization, was formed and thus started the institutionalization of the tongzhi movement in Taiwan. In 1993 Gay Chat became the first officially registered and recognized gay student organization on a Taiwanese university campus (Han 1995). The subsequent formation of student-based tongzhi organizations gave the gay and lesbian movement in Taiwan a distinctively youthful character (Erni and Spires 2001). From 1990 to 1997, there was an explosion of tongzhi-themed publications, including novels, documentaries, gender discourses, biographies, scripts, and HIV/AIDS stories, which led the Taiwanese public to begin to understand the real-life situations of tongzhi (Gofyy 2015). In the meantime, the vibrant growth of new media, the internet, and interuniversity networks created opportunities for BBS (bulletin board system) chat sites or online tongzhi discussion forums targeted to and supported by gays and lesbians, which initiated an unrestricted, diffusive, powerful, and consciousness-provoking cyber mobilization. Furthermore, social activist groups, such as the Taiwan Tongzhi Zixun Rexian Xiehui (Taiwan Tongzhi Hotline Association, 1998), the Taiwan Xingbie Renquan Xiehui (Gender Sexuality Rights Association Taiwan, 1999), and the 2001 Gay and Lesbian Campaign Taskforce, argued that tongzhi rights needed to be considered an inalienable part of Taiwan’s emerging human rights regime (Wong 2003).

The first glossy lifestyle magazine, G&L (1996–2001), catering to young Chinese gay and lesbian readers called itself the Chinese tongzhi magazine. The magazine’s title had multiple meanings, such as Glory & Liberty, Gentlemen & Ladies, and Gay & Lesbian (Lim 2008). It signified consumerist and cultural citizenship and projected a notion of “tongzhi cosmopolitanism” in Taiwan (Erni and Spires 2001, 30). In 2003 Taiwan successfully organized not just the first Taiwan LGBT Pride parade (Taiwan Tongzhi Youxing), but also the first pride parade in Chinese society. By 2017, this annual parade had become the biggest LGBT pride event in Asia. And more importantly, Taiwan’s top judges in 2017 ruled in favor of same-sex marriage, leading it to become the first place in Asia to legalize same-sex unions.

In sum, the term tongzhi has become, since its arrival in Taiwan from Hong Kong in the early 1990s, the linguistic icon most commonly used to refer to nonnormative genders and sexualities, appearing frequently in academic studies, popular culture, and the names and events of activist organizations (Martin 2000).

China In China, while a handful of scattered tongzhi websites operated in the 1990s, it was not until the next decade that tongzhi nonprofit organizations begin to flourish, with the establishment of community centers (Beijing Tongzhi Zhongxin [Beijing LGBT Center], 2008; Kuaxingbie Zhongxin [Trans Center], 2016), online media outlets (Tongzhi Yi Fanren [Queer Comrades], 2007), family support and counseling groups (Tongxinglian Qinyou Hui [Parents and Friends of Lesbians and Gays, or PFLAG], 2008), cultural festivities (Beijing Kuer Yingzhan [Beijing Queer Film Festival], 2001), and business networks (Tongzhi Shangwu [WorkForLGBT], 2013). Not all organizations explicitly include tongzhi in their official names. PFLAG even uses the traditional and clinical term tongxinglian, possibly because it makes more immediate sense to parents of tongzhi, who are its target audience.

What is common among these NGOs, though, is that oppositional politics and in-your-face tactics always take a back seat, a phenomenon that has to be understood within the broader sociopolitical circumstances. Organizing or unionizing anybody in China is illegal without the government’s approval. This makes the fight for tongzhi rights in any collective sense difficult. To avoid sanctions and crackdowns and ensure longer-term sustainability, NGOs must register with the state, so activists tend to adopt a nonconfrontational and nonradical approach, steering clear of tactics perceived as undermining state authority, such as street demonstrations (Chua and Hildebrandt 2014). Most often, such groups have to camouflage themselves as public-health organizations and thus emphasize risk factors and HIV infection at the expense of identity building, sexual rights, and activism (Kong 2011; Engebretsen and Schroeder 2015). This has stripped tongzhi activism in China of any militant potential it might have had and has rechanneled it through cultural and corporate arenas, where tongzhi are repackaged as morally upright consumer-citizens deserving tolerance and respect.

Another major development is the emergence of PFLAG, whose membership is largely made up of parents of gay and lesbian children instead of gays and lesbians themselves. Appealing to Confucian notions of parental love and care, PFLAG advocates for social acceptance and public tolerance, again avoiding emphasis on sexual and human rights.

The third main development is the rise of the tongzhi market, or pink economy, whose discourse and operating mechanisms have had the effect of coupling tongzhi visibility with tongzhi consumption. A report in 2015 sampled 18,647 tongzhi and claimed that they earned an average of 10,298 renminbi (approximately $1,610) per month, five times the national average (F. Zhu 2015). As observed by Geng Le, founder of the gay dating app Blued, in a 2015 interview: “what I want to do is to show everyone the enormous economic power of the tongzhi community, so that people will no longer look down on us, and the government will know where our value lies” (X. Zhu 2015; translation by Travis S. K. Kong, Sky H. L. Lau, and Amory H. W. Hui).

The Rise of Transgender-Focused Activism In the twenty-first century, there has been a gradual rise of a transgender-focused activism within the tongzhi movement across all three locales—Hong Kong, Taiwan, and mainland China. In Hong Kong, there are a few organized groups for transgender people and their supporters, such as Hong Kong Transgender Equality and Acceptance Movement (TEAM, 2002) and the Transgender Resource Center (2008). There are no visible and established transgender entertainment, beauty, or sex industries in Hong Kong, as there are in Thailand. Transgender individuals have been more invisible than gays and lesbians, and they mainly appear as part of negative news stories or as the objects of ridicule in movies. The situation has begun to change, notably with the inclusion of transphobia in the 2012 International Day against Homophobia and Transphobia, thus raising awareness about transgender people within the tongzhi community. Another notable development was the victory of the plaintiff known as “W” in the court case W v. Registrar of Marriages in 2013, in which the Court of Final Appeal overturned the registrar’s decision and held that W, a transgender woman, could marry her boyfriend (Cheung 2012).

In Taiwan, transgender subjectivities and discourses were neglected in the early stages of the local tongzhi movement. In response to the 1999 debate on quasi-transgenderism arising from butch lesbians and feminine gay men within the tongzhi community, the Gender Sexuality Rights Association Taiwan and the Center for the Study of Sexualities started a series of actions, including translations and academic seminars, to develop (extra)medical understanding and public awareness about transgenderism. They thus paved the way for the subsequent establishment of the first transgender activist group in Taiwan, Taiwan TG Dieyuan, in 2000. This group aimed to recognize the intensifying solidarity among transgender people via information provision and hotline consultation services, highlighting the transgender meanings of social and political events, and striving for the rights of transgender individuals (Ho 2003, 2017).

In 2003 the Taipei government subsidized the efforts of local tongzhi NGOs to publish a manual for understanding tongzhi in which the narratives of transgender people were documented by linking them with the global discourse of gender diversity and the gender spectrum. The term transgender was mentioned collectively with lesbian, gay, and bisexual under the category of tongzhi (Chen 2016). In addition, Xingbie Buming Xingdong Lianmeng (Alliance of Trans Action) was set up in 2009 to focus on public education, rights advocacy, antidiscrimination, and counseling and caring services. It was renamed Taiwan Xingbei Buming Guanhuai Xiehui (Beyond Gender) in 2013 to extend its services to intersex persons and thus make the transgender community more inclusive.

China has a long and rich transgender tradition, ranging from myths, folklore, and the performing arts to imperial court culture (Chiang 2012). Contemporary transgender activism has taken the form of cultural representations, such as documentaries on the lives of transgender people, as well as direct action against transphobia and discriminatory practices. NGOs and community centers have dealt with the hardships faced by transgender individuals on a daily basis and have leveraged the widely used microblogging platform weibo to roll out awareness campaigns. The Beijing Gender Health Education Institute, for example, launched an advocacy campaign for unisex toilets in 2016, supported by over thirty establishments across Beijing. In July 2017, a court in Guiyang ruled that Ciming Health Exam Center had violated the rights of a twenty-nine-year-old trans man in firing him. Nevertheless, uncertainty continues to hover over the impact and prospects of cultural production, online campaigning, and offline organizing for transgender individuals in China, given the state’s tightening censorship of media content and stringent regulation of charities and social organizations in recent years (Bernotaitė 2017).

“Good” and “Bad” Tongzhi

Tongzhi have successfully transformed from mental patients and social outcasts to responsible and respectable citizens since the 1990s. Economic participation and possibly marital and familial connections among tongzhi as consumers have been key means for social inclusion (Richardson 2005). However, it is precisely because of this reconstruction that the tongzhi community is said to endorse a “demobilized gay constituency and a privatized, depoliticized gay culture anchored in domesticity and consumption” (Duggan 2002, 179). If heteronormativity functions to create a hierarchy of “good” and “bad” citizens by privileging heterosexuals and stigmatizing homosexuals, new homonormativity also differentiates “good,” “normal,” and “healthy” tongzhi, who support dominant heteronormative values, from “bad,” “radical,” and “dangerous” tongzhi, who fail to achieve these ideals (e.g., working class, rural migrant), who engage in outlawed sexualities (e.g., prostitution, public sex, chemsex), or who subvert sexual norms and values (e.g., polyamory, open relationships). These individuals remain (or become further) closeted, stigmatized, and disenfranchised.

A few examples can illustrate this dilemma. In Hong Kong, an activist organization known as Rainbow Action threw leaflets in a shopping mall in 2001 to protest against Red Cross blood-donation guidelines that banned male homosexuals from giving blood. In 2002 activists wearing sadomasochistic outfits tied themselves to the front gate of a police station to support a BDSM couple under prosecution. In 2003 activists staged a kiss-in at a Catholic church to denounce the bishop for his opposition to same-sex marriage. All these actions were largely disapproved of by both the general public and the tongzhi community, as they were perceived to “bring shame to the tongzhi community” (Kong, Lau, and Li 2015, 197).

In Taiwan, the proposed theme of the Eleventh Taiwan LGBT Pride parade in 2013 was “Make LGBT Visible 2.0—The Voice of Sexual Sufferer.” The “sexual sufferer” included HIV carriers, BDSM practitioners, sex workers, and chemsex/chem-fun (i.e., an intoxicated eroticism that combines gay sex and drugs such as ecstasy, ketamine, or crystal meth) tongzhi. The inclusion of these marginalized groups drew severe criticism within the tongzhi community, and the term sexual sufferer was deemed too harsh, negative, or stigmatizing for “normal/good” tongzhi. It seemed to threaten the respectability of Taiwan’s tongzhi community, especially when Taiwan was debating amendments to the civil code that sought to incorporate same-sex marriage and other citizenship rights. In China, PFLAG operates a chat group on Blued and shares HIV-related information and other updates, but the administrator prohibits members from discussing political and sexual topics, openly soliciting hookups, or exchanging erotic texts and images. Such top-down “netiquette” ensures that there is literally no room for political campaigning or flirtatious exchanges.

These incidents point to important larger questions concerning the future of tongzhi: How can a tongzhi be radical but at the same time a good citizen? To what extent is the tongzhi movement fighting for inclusion into the mainstream but at the same time offering a subversive challenge to the heterosexualization of intimate life? What real transformations are possible for sexual and gender norms within tongzhi movements and the wider society? These questions echo the international debate between assimilation politics and the gay shame discourse (Dangerous Bedfellows 1996; Warner 1999; Halperin and Traub 2009). Assimilation politics often create “good,” “normal,” and “healthy” sexual citizens, who are “expected to be gender conventional, link sex to love and a marriage-like relationship, defend family values, personify economic individualism, and display national pride” (Seidman 2002, 133). This conception of “good” sexual citizens contrasts sharply with “bad,” “perverted,” and “dangerous” queers, or the “queer unwanted,” who do not ask for inclusion in the mainstream nor perform as “good” citizens by following conventional gender and sexual practices. Instead, they “shamelessly” challenge existing heteronormative and even homonormative practices and views by creating alternative and transient “counterpublics.”

A Transnational Study of Tongzhi

This short entry has traced the history of the origin of the term tongzhi and its queer appropriation first in Hong Kong and then in Taiwan and China in the 1990s. It has also examined how the term has been mobilized within activist groups and social movements, and has pointed out its usage, as well as limitations, mainly through the “good/bad” homosexual debate in the three Chinese societies. Such a transnational history of the term is often neglected in the international and global study of sexuality. The dominant model for understanding contemporary non-Western and nonnormative identities has always been drawn from the theorization of Western queer identities, cultures, and communities (Martin et al. 2008). Globalization is usually viewed as a binary process of the interflows between the global and the local (Altman 1997); what is often missing is an examination of the queer flows of circulation among and within Asian societies that constitute, inform, and shape queer identities, practices, and desires (Kong 2011; see Chiang and Heinrich 2014; Martin 2015; and Chiang and Wong 2016 for their discussions of queer Sinophone cultures). Tongzhi therefore serves as an excellent vantage point to contemplate these transnational and interregional queer flows and rethink the meaning of non-Western and nonnormative genders and sexualities.

SEE ALSO Kathoey; Marriage, Same-Sex, in Taiwan; Tongzhi Literature, Taiwan; Transgender Organizations in Mainland China, Hong Kong, and Taiwan; W v. Registrar of Marriages (2013)

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Chen, Wei-Zhen. Taiwan kuaxingbie qianshi: Yiliao, fengsuzhi yu yayi zao feng [Pre-transgender history in Taiwan: Medical treatment, hostess clubs, and inter-Asia encounters]. Taipei: Transgender Punk Activist, 2016.

Ho, Josephine Chuen-juei. “Wo De Kua Xingbie Jiechu Shi: Jian Lun Taiwan TG Dieyuan” [My

Kong, Travis S. K. Nan nan zheng chuan: Xianggang nan chang nan tongzhi koushushi [Oral history of older gay men in Hong Kong]. Hong Kong: Stepforward Multimedia, 2014.

Zhu, Xiaojia. “Fenhong jingji hen renao, dan ta ye jinjin shi ge kaishi eryi” [Buzz around pink economy continues, but it has yet to reach its full bloom]. Infzm, 2 July 2015. http://www.infzm.com/content/110385
Tongzhi Literature, Taiwan

TA-WEI CHI
Associate Professor, Taiwanese Literature
National Chengchi University, Taiwan

A genre of Chinese-language literature featuring homosexuality that flourished in Taiwan starting in the 1960s.

Whereas LGBTQ histories in some countries are often documented through oral history, twentieth-century LGBTQ history in Taiwan can be traced particularly through tongzhi literature—a genre consisting of literary works featuring homosexuality, some of which have been translated into English. Throughout the twentieth century in Taiwan there was a tendency to sociopolitical dissidence, such as criticism of authoritarianism and advocacy for women's rights, to materialize discreetly in literature before it progressed to overt activism. Tongzhi literature was thus a main platform for LGBTQ representation, especially during the period of martial law (1949–1987), when homosexuality was taboo and any activism was forbidden.

The Impact via Hong Kong

The term tongzhi literature emerged in the early 1990s, when Anglo-American “new queer cinema” was introduced to Taiwan via Hong Kong. The activists and writers in Hong Kong interpreted new queer cinema as “tongzhi cinema,” suggesting that the term tongzhi (the same will) is evocative of the politics of Anglo-American gay rights movements during the AIDS crisis, as well as more politically energizing than the prevalent term tongxinglian (homosexual). Effectively convinced by these Hong Kong advocates, Taiwanese society quickly adopted tongzhi in lieu of tongxinglian.

Eager to present its post-martial law image to the post-Cold War world, Taiwan was not yet ready to offer a Taiwanese version of tongzhi cinema, but it became evident that a literary version of the Taiwanese tongzhi legacy—namely, locally created tongzhi literature—might bring the nation into line with the First World countries that registered renewed interest in LGBTQ rights and representations. Tongzhi literature was expected to reclaim an elided history of local literature about homosexuality, which had been stigmatized since at least the early decades of the Cold War. The flourishing of Taiwanese tongzhi cinema, including such works as Ang Lee’s Xi yan (1993; The Wedding Banquet), did not occur until after Taiwanese tongzhi literature had become popular.
Scholars of tongzhi literature focus not only on the literature produced after the appearance of the term tongzhi literature but also retrospectively on the often-forgotten works predating this conceptualization. The retrospective efforts were mobilized by the lexical replacement of tongxinglian with tongzhi, with tongxinglian connoting homosexuality as something shameful to be forgotten, but tongzhi confirming homosexuality as a pride to be remembered. When labeled “tongxinglian literature,” LGBTQ literature during the era of martial law was commonly ignored, but once renamed “tongzhi literature,” it became an asset that was gladly salvaged in post–martial law Taiwan.

An Imagined Community of Readers

Textual representations of LGBTQ people appeared throughout the twentieth century. During Japanese colonial rule before World War II, Japanese-language newspapers in Taiwan often mentioned suicides of homosexual women. However, the 1950s was the crucial period when modern tongzhi literature started to take shape. According to Chi (2017), an imagined community of readers of tongzhi literature emerged during that decade as Cold War–period newspapers increasingly published news and literature relating to homosexuality. In the early 1950s, in the wake of the Korean War (1950–1953), these newspapers were urgently pedagogical in at least two aspects: they imposed modern Chinese language on Taiwanese readers, further marginalizing the Japanese-language readers educated in the Japanese colonial period; and, strongly influenced by the US press, they bombarded readers with homophobic McCarthyism (a vociferous campaign against alleged communists in the US government and other institutions, conducted by US senator Joseph McCarthy), which viewed gay people in the United States as potential allies of communists and thus advocated for their suppression.

Chi’s history of tongzhi literature looks similar to the histories presented by Tze-lan Deborah Sang and Wai Siam Hee, which examine Chinese-language cultural representations of homosexuality in the twentieth century. Owing to her emphasis on China in the first half of the twentieth century, Sang does not discuss the newly interpreted term tongzhi and the critical role played by Hong Kong writers in the reevaluation of homosexuality by the end of the twentieth century. Focusing on narratives of men (but not women) in China, Hee observes that modern tongzhi literature did not emerge in China until the end of the twentieth century and then was ignored in literary and academic circles. Unlike Chi, Sang and Hee do not focus on the 1950s because China was not exposed to American values during the period, whereas Taiwan was open to, and influenced by, the anti-Communist and homophobic ideologies of the 1950s United States.

The 1950s

In the 1950s newspapers in Taiwan diligently introduced homosexual-related materials from the United States such as reports on the persecution of gay men in Washington, DC, and literary works exposing homosexuals’ secret lives. Among such literary works was Hazel Lin’s novel Moon Vow (1958), in which a female psychotherapist converts the members of a lurid lesbian sex club into husband-loving wives. resembling typical lesbian pulp fiction, Moon Vow was serialized over several months in a major newspaper in Taiwan in 1958, as soon as it was published in the United States. Thus, despite the apparent absence of any local writer of tongzhi literature in the 1950s, a readership emerged that would be taught what homosexuality is in newspapers filled with American discussions of nonconforming sexuality. These newspapers also fed readers sensational reports on Taiwanese homosexuals that seemed to support the reports from the United States.

The 1960s

Probably in response to the rampant homophobia of the 1950s, writers discussing homosexuality since the 1960s have tended to show more sympathy than disdain for sexual nonconformity. Hsien-yung Pai (1937–), author of the 1983 novel Nietzu (Crystal Boys [1989]), the most famous work on homosexuality from Taiwan, appealed to his readers to sympathize with homosexuals. In the 1960s Pai began to publish short stories about forbidden desires—for example, between a senior physician and his dying patient, between an aging painter and his young male nude model, and among men cruising in the Taipei New Park, the best-known cruising spot during the period of martial law.

Pai was not the only contributor to tongzhi literature in the 1960s. Kuei Chiang (1908–1980) and Liang-hui Kuo (1926–2013) were established writers a generation before Pai. Chiang’s colossal Chongyang (1961; Double suns), set in the pre–World War II era, presents the sexual exploits of its antihero protagonist, a member of the Communist Party in China. In line with anti-Communist propaganda, the whimsically depraved protagonist sexually corrupts both women and men. Discounted by some scholars as a negative and thus dismissible representation of gay men, the novel’s playful scenario of the protagonist’s sodomy is a product of the McCarthyist mentality that allied homosexuality with Communism. Chongyang’s contribution to tongzhi literature is less as a realistic depiction of male homosexuality than as an example of 1960s homophobic propaganda inspired by Cold War paranoia. Kuo published Qingcao qingqing (1963; Green is the grass), whose protagonist, Ming-ming, an effeminate male student in his early teens, is infatuated with his classmate Lei, a more masculine boy. The two boys play a prank in the school washroom and touch each other’s genitals, but end up parting company when Lei shows interest in dating girls. Because of Ming-ming’s immaturity, this novel is not so much about desire as it is an interrogation of heteronormativity, embodied by the militaristic environment of the school.

The 1970s
The 1970s was a turning point for women characters in tongzhi literature as Taiwan's economic boom prompted women to leave their rural hometowns to work in sweatshop factories. With relatively more economic independence than before, working-class women began consuming romance pulp fiction that depicted female characters in a variety of relationships, including with other women. In essence, women's increased presence in the labor force enabled them to view other women as subjects of desire. Before the 1970s, such representations had been scarce at best. Moon Vow, which depicts a heterotopia of lesbians, was a 1950s US import that showed no sympathy for women-loving women. One of the few texts in the 1960s that depict women's same-sex love is Pai's short story “Gulian hua” (1970; Love's lone flower), in which a retiring madam cohabitates with the bar girls who work for her.

The theme of financial pressure markedly differentiates 1970s tongzhi literature about women from the works about men. Women-loving women must earn money not only to maintain their independence from men but also to build homes with the women they love. In these scenarios, sexual gratification is not a priority. In contrast, the male protagonists from this decade are not concerned with similar financial pressures because, generally, they seek not to settle down with the men they love but to enjoy transient sexual encounters. In 1976 Hsiao-fo Xuan (1951–) published Yuan zhi wai (Outside the circle), which centers on a butch teenage lesbian. Cut off financially from her family, she vows to succeed in a profitable career and in winning the heart of the woman she loves. Having attained financial prestige, she dates a couple of impoverished cabaret singers without finding the right woman for herself. The aforementioned Kuo, whose 1960s novel Qingcao qingqing concerns a teenage boy’s desire, published Liangzhong yiwai de (Beyond the two genders), whose title reflects the notion that lesbians are a third gender. In this novel, set in the underground lesbian community in Taipei, a “tomboy” (an English word widely adopted in Taiwan, similar to “butch” in US lesbian culture) in her thirties pursues, with money and sex, a passive-aggressive married “woman” (similar to “femme”) in her forties. This novel’s “tomboy-woman” pair debunks the common impression that lesbian characters in tongzhi literature are generally young girls attracted to other girl students, possibly the result of the popularity of the works of Tien-hsin Chu (1958–), known for exalting platonic love between high school girls.
Fran Martin (2010) has observed in Chu’s works a conflict between energetic teenage girls and bored, aging women who were once teenage girls. These older women, now stuck in heterosexual marriages, once studied in elite schools and enjoyed infatuations with other girls. It is important to note, however, that Xuan's and Kuo's works, although less popular than Chu's, may be seen as more insightful about the lives of 1970s Taiwanese lesbians, many of whom gained more sexual freedom with their increased participation in the workforce. In Xuan's and Kuo’s works, the older female characters confront financial pressures not felt by the youthful girl students admired in Chu's works.

The 1970s tongzhi literature about women envisions a Taiwan that accommodates women-loving women, whereas works on men tend to focus more on the repressive environment of Taiwan. The contrast between the stories of women and men is illustrated, on the one hand, by the theme of financial burden evident in the texts about women (where money secures a home so the couple can settle down), and on the other hand by the lure of the United States, imagined as a promised land for gay men, in the texts about men. In some works, Taiwanese men are lucky enough to experience American life. In 1972, renowned poet Mu Yang (1940–) published “1972,” an essay on what he saw in the Bay Area and Seattle. Enlightened by activism in general in Berkeley, California, Yang, hitherto unfamiliar with homosexuality, found that (white) gay scholars also deserved his understanding and sympathy. In 1977 Pai published in an elite journal sample chapters of Nietzu, in which a Taiwanese man who has killed his gay lover is smuggled to New York City. In pre-AIDS-crisis Manhattan, the fugitive enjoys an endless feast of eye-opening sexual adventures with men of different races that is therapeutic for his mind and body. In many other 1970s works, however, Taiwanese men find the American life out of reach. Wittingly or unwittingly, they turn to local proxies of US culture, such as a legendary coffee bar that flaunts a supposedly American lifestyle and attracts youthful clients who might be nonheteronormative; a movie theater adjacent to Taipei’s New Park, where gay men cruise after watching the handsome white actors in Hollywood movies; and a psychiatrist’s clinic that purports to determine whether gay men are normal according to supposedly American standards.

Despite the differences between women and men in 1970s tongzhi literature, they are similarly rendered minorities in a heteronormative society. This is not pronounced in the works of the 1960s, in which characters, often thrown into unspecified social settings, keep their secrets to themselves without unsettling anybody else, let alone the larger society. In contrast, in 1970s tongzhi literature women-loving women and men-desiring men begin to feel obligated to justify themselves to the larger society, whose knowledge of homosexuality is minimal. In Yuan zi wai, the butch protagonist loses financial support from her family precisely because she decides to come out to her father. Liangzhong yiwai de provides insight into the lesbian protagonist’s nagging anxiety over how society regards lesbians; she is exhausted not only by having to persuade heterosexual busybodies that lesbian relationships are viable but also by having to reassure her femme lover that they need not worry about onlookers’ comments.

The 1980s

Tongzhi literature from the 1980s is relatively better-known to domestic and international readers, who generally subscribe to two assumptions: first, that Pai’s Nietzu is the earliest work on homosexuality in Taiwan; and second, that the lifting of martial law in 1987 marked the break point before which tongzhi literature was suppressed (the Dark Ages) and after which tongzhi literature started to bloom (the Renaissance). Both assumptions are inaccurate. A longtime best-selling work with monumental status in modern Taiwanese literature, Nietzu was preceded by many earlier works of tongzhi literature, such as Pai’s own short stories in the 1960s, Chongyang in the 1960s, Qingcao qingqing in the 1960s, and Yuan zi wai and Liangzhong yiwai de in the 1970s. The flowering of tongzhi literature by the end of the twentieth century, in terms of quality and quantity, owes less to the end of martial law in the late 1980s than to the often-underestimated impact of AIDS, which was detailed in Taiwan via US media in the early 1980s. Indeed, some writers were so stunned by the AIDS crisis that they dared to discuss it in tongzhi literature in the intensely homophobic environment of the early to mid-1980s.
It is fair to esteem Pai’s Nietzu, though not as the earliest work of tongzhi literature but more precisely as a pioneering work dramatizing the conflict between homosexuals and their parents. It is seldom understood that this opposition is relatively new in this literature. Before Nietzu, or before the 1980s, tongzhi literature paid little attention to this intergenerational conflict; earlier works scarcely mentioned homosexual characters’ parents or families, who were often absent or too distant to intervene in the sexual dissenters’ lives. According to Chi (2017), whereas tongzhi literature was not concerned with heteronormative society until the 1970s, it was not interested in parents’ acceptance of their homosexual children until the 1980s, when the nuclear family—newly established as a normative social unit in Taiwan—became a new hegemony. The conflict between homosexuals (cast as rebellious children) and their heartbroken parents, found in Nietzu and later works, was due in part to the emerging ideology that revered the nuclear family and held that parents are supposed to monitor their children closely. A more pronounced lament for the transformation of the Taiwanese familial structure can be found in Nan-dung Chao (1987) by Ying-chen Chen (1937–2016), one of Taiwan’s best-known Marxist writers. Portrayed as a handsome man addicted to drugs, having sex with both women and men, the titular character embodies the vices of post–Cold War capitalism deplored by the author. The elders of Chao’s family believe in preserving the more traditional, larger household in which solidarity across classes is admired, but Chao, made indulgent by selfish individualism, can barely maintain a bourgeois nuclear family.

The 1990s

The 1990s are commonly considered the golden age of tongzhi literature, characterized by such award-winning, acclaimed novels as Tien-wen Chu’s (1956–) Huangren shouji (1994; Notes of a Desolate Man [2000]), Miaojin Qiu’s (1969–1995) Eryu shouji (1994; Notes of a Crocodile [2017]) and Monmate yishu (1996; Last Words from Montmartre [2014]), and Chen Xue’s (1970–) short story “Xunzao tianshi yishi de chibang” (1995; “Searching for the Lost Wings of the Angel” [2003]). Chu’s novel is a confessional recollection of a gay man in his forties mourning his gay friend who was energized by queer activism and killed by AIDS, and expecting his union with his boyfriend to be as sacrosanct as a heterosexual marriage. Qiu, who killed herself in Montmartre, Paris, at the age of twenty-six, is a butch lesbian icon. Her Notes of a Crocodile alternates between story lines about a butch college student heartbroken over failed affairs with girls and about a cartoonish crocodile who plays ventriloquist for the protagonist. The posthumously published Last Words from Montmartre presents a butch lesbian student who bids farewell to her lovers and dreams of being a dedicated artist. Also popular among lesbian readers in Taiwan and beyond are Chen Xue’s portrayals of femme or bisexual women who thrive on unblessed, allegedly immoral, love affairs with other women, in contrast to Qiu’s butch characters, who are incessantly lured by death. The success of 1990s tongzhi literature paved the way for the emergence of LGBTQ activism in Taiwan, which has inspired more and more citizens to interrogate the status quo of heteronormativity.

SOURCE: SHIBAO (TAPEI)

Cover of Eryu Shouji (1994) by Miaojin Qiu. The story line of Eryu shouji (published in English as Notes of a Crocodile) alternates between a butch lesbian heartbroken over her failed affairs and a cartoonish crocodile who virtually serves as the protagonist’s mouthpiece.

The Twenty-First Century

Tongzhi literature was more popular during the twentieth century than in the new millennium. The private, discreet acts of reading and writing tongzhi literature were more central to the twentieth century, when coming out was a rare act of courage in a society inhospitable to nonnormative sexual expression. The genre lost its monopoly over the cultural expressions of the LGBTQ community as more Taiwanese citizens engaged in public representations of LGBTQ identity and became openly critical of the status quo, and as more public forms such as theatrical productions, documentary showings, and poetry readings on LGBTQ themes became fashionable.

SEE ALSO Literary Discourses in the Ottoman Middle East (1500–1900); Literature, African (Anglophone); Literature, African (Francophone); Literature, Caribbean (Anglophone and Creole); Literature, Caribbean (Francophone); Tongzhi

Hee, Wai Siam. Cong yanshi dao xingshi: tongzhi shuxie yu jindangdai Zhongguo de nanxing jiangou [From amorous histories to sexual histories: tongzhi writings and the construction of masculinities in late Qing and modern China]. Taoyuan, Taiwan: National Central University, 2015.

Trans Issues in Africa

LIESL THERON
Cofounder
Gender DynamiX, South Africa

The state of trans people in several different African countries as well as the work of activists to advance trans rights.

As is the case in the rest of the world, there is no singular “trans” definition or experience in African countries. Sexual orientation is composed of various identities, and trans, gender-nonconforming, and other queer identities are part of a spectrum of identification. Before colonization, African cultures tended to acknowledge that spectrum, often in terms that suggested “man/woman.” Such people might be regarded an amusing quirk explained by the inscrutable ways that spirits sometimes embodied themselves in living people or how they take on respected ritual roles. Examples of such effeminate males include the gorjigeen among the Wolof of Senegal, the ‘yan daudu among the Hausa of northern Nigeria,) and the ashtime among the Maale of southern Ethiopia. Rudi C. Bleys (1995), Stephen O. Murray and Will Roscoe (1998), and John K. Thornton (1998) discuss dozens of other historical accounts from across the continent that attest to a great diversity of gender expression, sometimes but not always manifest in sexual relationships.

European colonialism brought two important influences: a scientific paradigm that demanded clear categorization and new forms of Christianity that judged sexual and gender diversity in moralistic, often highly stigmatizing terms. Modernization under these conditions introduced widespread intolerance of many aspects of traditional society, including African culture’s varied gender expressions. A fluid definition of gender identity is thus now at odds with most contemporary African societies that are, by and large, perceived as socially conservative or, at best, ignorant. The conflation of gender identity and sexual orientation within contemporary African societies is very rigid and is enforced by the state, religion, and the media, resulting in social institutions based on a dualistic binary concept of gender, with no in-between (Theron and Kgositau 2015). For this reason, gender-nonconforming and trans people who do not fit into this binary concept of gender have been singled out as targets of systematic and institutionalized homophobia and transphobia throughout the continent.

Cases of Persecution

One of the most widely publicized cases of the persecution of trans individuals and how gender identity is conflated with sexual orientation is that of Tiwonge Chimbalanga, a transgender woman in Malawi. In 2009 she participated in a traditional engagement ceremony known as a chinkhoswe with a man named Steven Monjeza, and a reporter for the Nation (Blantyre, Malawi) who witnessed the event, held at her workplace, announced it as the first gay marriage in Malawi. The engagement was a crime in the eyes of the law, given that homosexuality is illegal in Malawi. Two days after the published report, the couple was arrested on charges of gross indecency. Chimbalanga was confused by the charges, as she related to reporter Mark Gevisser for a 2014 Guardian (London) article: “I am a woman…. They told me I was gay when they arrested me…. They told me that I was paid to do my chinkhoswe by the LGBTs from overseas. But the first time I heard the word ‘gay’ was when I saw it next to my photograph in the newspaper.” In May 2010 Chimbalanga and Monjeza were both sentenced to fourteen years in prison with hard labor as a penalty designed to deter others from engaging in homosexual activity. The International Gay and Lesbian Human Rights Commission (IGLHRC), the Open Society Initiative of Southern Africa, Amnesty International, and many other African and international organizations advocated on the couple’s behalf and wrote letters to the Malawian government to drop the charges. Malawian president Bingu wa Mutharika pardoned the couple after a meeting with Ban Ki-moon, the United Nations secretary-general. As a result of the publicity surrounding the case, Chimbalanga become one of the first known refugees to be granted asylum in South Africa on the basis of discrimination because of sexuality or gender identity.

There are other notable cases of trans individuals forced to flee their countries because of persecution. Alexandra Rubera from Burundi, who self-defined as a transgender woman, was repeatedly harassed and humiliated because of pervasive homophobic hatred that culminated with her arrest under the penal code and sodomy laws in that country. The charges against her were typically based on claims that she was a “public nuisance,” a “fraud,” or “imposter identity.” Rubera fled to South Africa in 2006 and filed for refugee status there, seeking protection against Burundi’s homophobic laws.

Other African trans individuals have not been so fortunate. On 2 June 2008 South Africa trans individual Daisy Dube was shot and killed outside a Johannesburg nightclub after being accosted by men who called her and her friends izitabane, a derogatory term widely used in South Africa to refer to an LGBTQI person. The first openly identified transgender woman in Tanzania, named Auntie Victoria, likewise met a sad end in 2009. Auntie Victoria had undergone gender-affirming surgery in Europe and returned to Tanzania to earn a living as a tavern owner. There, she experienced constant persecution until finally she committed suicide by ingesting poison, ironically on the International Day against Homophobia and Transphobia. Following her death in a local hospital, an unknown person released pictures of her naked body online. When her family refused to identify her body at the hospital morgue, the hospital exposed her body for public viewing under the guise of identifying her. With the support of the IGLHRC and Gender DynamiX, activists in Tanzania eventually succeeded in convincing the hospital to stop the public viewing. The final dishonor to Auntie Victoria was that, because of religious customs, her family insisted on burying her in her “original form,” removing her breasts and surgically affirmed genitalia. The IGLHRC appealed to the United Republic of Tanzania to include this incident as part of its fourth periodic report (July 2009) to the United Nations Human Rights Committee.

SIGNS OF PROGRESS FOR TRANS INDIVIDUALS IN AFRICA

1980:
South African–born trans model Lauren Foster appears in Vogue Mexico, post-sexual reassignment surgery and is subsequently outed as a man. Despite bad publicity, Foster embraces her role as a transgender model, later becoming the first transgender woman to regularly appear on the American reality TV franchise Real Housewives (The Real Housewives of Miami, 2011–2013).

2003:
Senegalese-born model Barbara Diop achieves notoriety when it is revealed after she represented the country of Zimbabwe at the opening ceremony of the Cricket World Cup hosted by South Africa that she is a trans woman. Although Diop initially denies it, she later corroborates the news. Three years later she moves to North America and finds success as a transgender model and designer.

August 2010:
South Africa’s Labour Court rules in favor of Christine Ehlers’s reinstatement after she takes her employer, Bohler Uddeholm, to court for dismissing her based on her transition.

24 November 2012:
The first trans and intersex pride event on the continent of Africa takes place in Gaborone, Botswana, initiated by the Rainbow Identity Association, which hosts various trans and intersex activists from other African countries.

December 2012:
A trans man makes history when he participates in the third Mr. SA (South Africa) Leather contest and comes out as trans on stage during his speech. At the time of the contest, SA Leather’s constitution stipulated that only cisgender and gay or bisexual men are allowed to participate. Subsequently, SA Leather’s board decides to add this to the next annual meeting’s agenda as a discussion point, and members vote to amend the constitution to include all sexual orientations, as well as all genders and gender identities.

October 2013:
Angolan transgender musician Titica is named a goodwill ambassador for the Joint United Nations Programme on HIV/AIDS (UNAIDS). Titica is a pioneer in the local music genre called kuduro and has performed for the Angolan president José Eduardo dos Santos. Her appointment as UNAIDS goodwill ambassador comes at a time when many acknowledge Angola being at a tipping point from a rigid anti-LGBTI state to one where there is social recognition and acceptance of the presence of transgender persons, although the state’s penal code still outlaws homosexuality.

June 2014:
A photography exhibition by the Somali photographer Abdi Osman features a trans woman from Somalia called Sumaya. Somalia has long remained one of the countries in Africa with no known trans voice. This exhibit thus dramatically reveals the existence of trans persons in Somalia.

2015:
Cloe Gair, a trans woman from Despatch, Eastern Cape, a remote and often overlooked geographical area of South Africa, runs her own visibility campaign for trans sensitization by hiring an advertisement agency to post her photo with a positive message on the back window of a municipal bus. The quoted message —“Hi, I am Cloe Caylen Gair,” with this quote from Nelson Mandela: “Do not judge me by my successes, judge me by how many times I fell down and got back up again”—is accompanied by her Facebook and YouTube addresses. The ad runs for a year, until November 2016.

10 March 2017:
South African trans woman Nare Mphela wins her case against the Limpopo Department of Education, which is ordered by the court to pay her 60,000 rand in damages for violating the Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act. Mphela had endured physical and verbal abuse in school at the direction of the school’s principal because of her gender identity.

September 2017:
The Western Cape High Court in South Africa rules that individuals in heterosexual marriages have the right to change their gender without dissolving their unions.

December 2017:
A court ruling orders the government of Botswana to recognize a transgender woman's identity for the first time after trans woman Tshepo Ricki Kgositau successfully sues the government for its refusal to legally recognize her gender as female.

Early Organizations

In 1996, years before any known trans activism or the existence of any movement, Barbara—who chose to never use her surname in public to protect her and her family's privacy—and some of her friends set up an association for transgender and lesbian gays in Abidjan, Côte d'Ivoire. The association was called the Côte d’Ivoire Transvestites Association, and Barbara served as president. She participated in the production of the 1998 documentary film Woubi chéri, directed by Laurent Bocahut and Philip Brooks. In Côte d’Ivoire, the term woubi refers to a man who is the effeminate partner in a relationship, while the term yossi refers to the more masculine partner or husband. In later years, Barbara founded Woubi International (Barbara 2014).

In 1992, a few years before Barbara and her friends started their group in Côte d'Ivoire, the South African social group Phoenix Society faded away into nonexistence after being around for thirteen years. The Phoenix Society was possibly the continent’s first well-documented (GALA 2017) social group catering to trans women and cross-dressers (Morgan, Marais, and Wellbeloved 2009). Also among the Phoenix Society’s members was one trans man. The exact reason for the dissolving of the Phoenix Society is unclear. There was speculation that threats (to investigate the Phoenix Society) were made to the founder by the former apartheid government’s Special Branch of the police forces.

Apartheid-Era Policies and Their Reversal

Also during apartheid rule, the South African Defence Force (SADF) engaged in efforts to police gender and censor citizens. Studies point to the SADF being the apartheid government’s agent to ensure that sexuality and gender were being policed. The notorious Aversion Project aimed to condition gay and lesbian military conscripts and uniformed (and unconsented) soldiers to heteronormativity through chemical castration, the administration of cross-gender hormones, and shock therapy, in an ongoing, and ultimately failed, effort to change their behavior. Evidence surfaced years after the end of apartheid that the SADF conducted forced sex-change operations on gay and lesbian military conscripts (Swarr 2012).

In 1992, around the same time that the Phoenix Society faded out of existence, the National Party government in South Africa changed the law so that transsexual people from that date forward would no longer be able to apply to the Department of Home Affairs to change their gender on the national birth register. A window was provided, however: if a person could provide proof that they were in their transition process prior to 1992, then they could still apply (Swarr 2012; Klein 2008; Morgan, Marais, and Wellbeloved 2009). Intersex and trans people in South Africa lived in limbo for the next twelve years. In 2002 Sally Gross, Simone Heradien, and Estian Smit made oral presentations to the South African parliament to advocate for an amendment to the Births and Deaths Registration Act of 1992, allowing trans and intersex people to have their legal documentation reflect their gender identity, even if they have not had genital surgery (Klein 2008). This amendment, known as the Alteration of Sex Description and Sex Status Act of 2003, was enacted in 2004. The implementation of this amendment was still in dispute as of 2017, and advocates have continued to work toward satisfying its full implementation.
While trans and gender-diverse people in South Africa were repressed into silence and censorship during the 1990s, progress was made in other regions in Africa. Besides Barbara in Côte d’Ivoire, another individual grappled with his gender and identity for years and, as a result, the first (known) book on the continent to address gender from a personal point of view was published in 1997: From Juliet to Julius by Julius Kaggwa, a Ugandan intersex person. Although Kaggwa is not trans per se, this book is worth mentioning given when it was published and the anguish of isolation revealed by Kaggwa.

The African Trans Movement in the Twenty-First Century

A movement cannot exist without the individuals that form part of that movement (and create organizations along the way)—the persons who walked the path before the movement is acknowledged as such. Most of the historical record has remained silent about trans people, viewing them as being either nonexistent or underrepresented in many of the existing narratives. With the exception of scandalized portraits (e.g., Chimbalanga), trans women are, according to the media in many African countries, “female imposters” committing fraud (e.g., Rubera) or reduced to spectacle and to be ridiculed (e.g., Auntie Victoria). Since the emergence of a trans movement, combined efforts in advocacy and sensitization have led to an increase of individuals coming out publicly, both in their private lives and on public platforms.

The emergence of a trans movement on the African continent started as early as the middle of the first decade of the twenty-first century. In July 2005, for example, Gender DynamiX was established in South Africa by ciswoman Liesl Theron and her trans partner, Lex Kirsten. Theron became the face of the organization during its formative years so that Kirsten’s job would not be jeopardized by her association with it. Gender DynamiX was the first registered organization in Africa advocating specifically for trans people, focusing on social outreach, health issues, and rights for trans people in South Africa and elsewhere on the continent.

In subsequent years, advocacy, movement building, and trans organizations developed quickly around the continent. On an organizational level, great strides were made in a number of countries, while individuals continued to effect change without organizational support in other nations. As recently as 2010, nearly no trans organization talked about or advocated for the depathologization of transgender identity or the removal of “gender identity disorders” from the World Health Organization’s International Classification of Diseases. A mere five years later the trans movement’s advocacy strategies had become refined, and on a regular basis trans organizations and leaders were hosting meetings on thematic topics and engaging in joint efforts in such areas as advocacy for gender recognition, health access, and the formation of regional networks.
PHOTO COURTESY OF CLOE GAIR.

Poster of South African Trans Woman Cloe Gair on the Back of a Bus in Eastern Cape, South Africa. Gair embarked on a trans visibility campaign in her native Eastern Cape between 2015 and 2016. Like many other African trans individuals, Gair struggled to find employment for years before she established a successful perfume business in 2015.

South Africa is known for its constitution and several liberal laws in favor of LGBTQI rights. Yet the experience of LGBTQI individuals on the ground is still marred by discrimination and hostility. There are fewer than five hospitals in South Africa that include gender-affirming procedures as part of their health care. The best-known gender clinic is at the Grootte Schuur Hospital in Cape Town, which has a waiting list for surgery longer than twenty years. Health care and the implementation of Act 49 of 2003, the aforementioned Alteration of Sex Description and Sex Status Act, are some of the most pertinent advocacy areas for trans organizations in South Africa.

Trans organizations struggle to receive legal recognition by means of registration in most African countries, with the exception of the positive outcomes in Botswana (2010) and Kenya (2014). A good example of the strides being made in regard to legal gender self-determination is the case of Transgender Education and Advocacy (TEA), a transgender rights organization in Kenya that engaged in a lengthy legal battle to register the organization and individual members. The group had been denied permission by Kenya's Nongovernmental Organizations Co-ordination Board on the grounds that three transgender women listed in the application—Audrey Mbugua, Maureen Muia, and Annet Jennifer—did not have names that “reflected their gender” (Okoth 2014). In a historic court battle initiated in 2011, TEA received a landmark victory in Kenya's high court in 2014 when Justice George Odunga ruled that the NGO Co-ordination Board had acted in a manner that was “unfair, unreasonable, unjustified and in breach of rules of natural justice”
The NGO Co-ordination Board was ordered to register TEA with immediate effect from this date. In many countries, trans organizations remain unregistered, with organizational statuses varying from underground and/or illegal to relying on the protection of host organizations. In February 2017, after years of advocacy, the high court in Kenya ordered the state to alter the names on identity documents for five trans persons.

KEY DATES IN TRANS ACTIVISM IN UGANDA

2002:
Victor Juliet Mukasa, a Ugandan human rights defender and activist who identifies as a transgender lesbian, starts speaking publicly in the local media about the oppression of LGBTI persons in Uganda.

2004:
Mukasa helps found the LGBTI rights group Sexual Minorities Uganda.

2005:
After Mukasa conducts an interview on the radio regarding LGBTI issues, the station is heavily fined and Mukasa's house is raided by the police for documents and information. Mukasa sues the Ugandan government for violation of privacy and flees to South Africa. Three years later, a Ugandan court rules in Mukasa's favor, but the government's stance against homosexuality remains unchanged, and in February 2014 the Anti-Homosexuality Act is signed into law, criminalizing any sexual acts and relations between people of the same sex. (This law is ruled invalid on procedural grounds later that year.) In 2013 Mukasa was granted asylum in the United States out of fear of persecution in Uganda.

January 2008:
Transgender, Intersex, and Transsexuals Uganda is established by Nikilas Mawanda, a trans man and Ugandan activist, with a focus on advocating for the rights of transgender, intersex, and transsexual persons in Uganda.

September 2008:
Julius Kaggwa starts the first informal support group in Uganda for intersex persons, which is hosted by a coalition of Christian children's rights organizations. In July 2009 the group is formalized under the name Support Initiative for People with Atypical Sex Development.

April 2011:
Transgender Equality Uganda is founded by Beyonce Amooti Karungi to create a safe space for trans women in Uganda.

3 October 2014:
Mawanda is granted LGBTI asylum status in the United States months after fleeing his Ugandan home as a result of state-sanctioned violence from the Anti-Homosexuality Act signed into law earlier in the year.

April 2016:
The documentary The Pearl of Africa is released, featuring a trans woman, Cleo Kambugu, and her partner, Nelson Kasaija. The couple had been forced to flee Uganda in 2014, shortly after Uganda enacted the Anti-Homosexuality Act, when Kambugu was outed as trans by the Ugandan tabloid Red Pepper.

The early years of southern and eastern African trans organizing were trans masculine–led. Around 2010, tension had emerged between trans women and trans men, as there were no or limited leadership opportunities for trans women. A crucial moment came at a meeting in Uganda in May 2010 during a highly emotional debate between trans feminists and the trans men. This meeting was the catalyst for an organizing movement led by trans feminist activists. They formed the Social, Health and Empowerment Feminist Collective of Transgender and Intersex Women of Africa (S.H.E), which developed various projects in the eastern and southern African region such as leadership institutes and research and media workshops. In 2014 trans feminists launched the African Trans Feminist Charter (van der Merwe 2016). More visible discussions about trans women sex workers and the intersection of trans people and HIV have since emerged.

In its current form, what is known today as the African trans movement is documented in various formats within organizational documents and reports. The archives of Gay and Lesbian Memory in Action (GALA) in Johannesburg includes a large collection of LGBTQ organizational information. Furthermore, South African–specific archival material dating from the 1980s can be found online at the Digital Transgender Archive (2017).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Byrne, Jack. License to Be Yourself: Laws and Advocacy for Legal Gender Recognition of Trans

van Zyl, Mikki, Jeanelle de Gruchy, Sheila Lapinsky, et al. The Aversion Project: Human Rights
Transfeminism

CLAUDIA SOFÍA GARRIGA-LÓPEZ
Assistant Professor of Queer and Trans Latinx Studies
California State University, Chico

The intersections of feminism and trans activism.

Transfeminism is a form of intersectional feminism founded on the understanding that sexism and transphobia are interlocking and mutually reinforcing systems of oppression. It functions as an application of feminist analyses and methods toward the advancement of trans liberation and empowerment. In the first decade of the twenty-first century, transfeminism took shape as a transnational social movement through a network that combined political activism, scholarship, artistic expression, and radical sex subcultures. This network was established and strengthened through several feminist scholarly and activist conferences, on the internet and other forms of digital media communications, and within the circuits of migration and travel to and from Europe and the Americas.

Origins

The term transfeminism, or transfeminismo in Spanish, was first articulated in Spain in the late 1980s during a series of feminist working group meetings, or jornadas feministas, which called for the inclusion of trans women into feminist politics (Fernández Garrido and Araneta 2017). Since those early years, transfeminismo has become part of a broader subculture that encompasses resistance to capitalism and austerity measures; anti-racist, postcolonial, and pro-migrant critiques of state policies; antiinstitutional and leaderless social movements; and a posporno (i.e., post-pornographic or “post-porn”) performance art scene that appropriates and subverts the medium of pornography.

In the United States, the term was coined by Diana Courvant and Emi Koyama in 1992 “in the context of their intersectional work on trans, intersex, disability, and survivorship of sexual violence” (Stryker and Bettcher 2016, 11). Koyama published her “Transfeminist Manifesto” online in 2001, and this work was instrumental to the expansion of transfeminism in and outside the United States. The manifesto described transfeminism as “a movement by and for trans women who view their liberation to be intrinsically linked to the liberation of all women and beyond” (Koyama 2003, 245). Transfeminism in the United States is often associated with “thirdwave” feminism because both these political standpoints share a commitment to not prioritize any one subject position or form of oppression over others (Currah 2016). Third-wave feminism is also known for being “sex positive” because it opposes “slut shaming,” supports nontraditional sexual practices, and espouses “affirming attitudes toward stigmatized body types” (Stryker and Bettcher 2016, 12).

Transfeminist activism often develops in close relation to advocacy for sex-worker decriminalization and empowerment on account of the widespread labor discrimination faced by trans women that pigeonholes them into sex work. For example, in Ecuador, transfeminism emerged in 2002 through a grassroots organization called Patrulla Legal (Legal Patrol), which brought together a coalition of trans sex workers, law students, feminists, and LGBT activists in order to document and combat police abuse against trans sex workers in the capital city of Quito. Since its inception, several trans men have also been a part of Patrulla Legal, and their integration into this work significantly increased trans men’s visibility within the LGBT community in Ecuador and prompted activists to include trans men in their analysis of the intersections of sexism and transphobia (Garriga-López 2016).

Organizing Efforts

One of the first organizing efforts of transfeminist activists in Spain was a call to eliminate “transgender” or “gender dysphoria” as a diagnostic category within the field of psychiatry. This campaign to “depathologize” trans identities, which started in 2006, was the impetus for the formation of a network of activists and organizations throughout Spain, with close ties to allied groups in France and Italy (Fernández Garrido and Araneta 2017). The rejection of psychiatry as an institution where trans people are pathologized and controlled led to the articulation of a broader anti-institutional position that rejects party politics and rights discourse as a source for empowerment. As a result, transfeminist activists often strategize within a micropolitical framework, one that prioritizes grassroots activism and cultural and aesthetic practices, as well as interpersonal or community mediations of conflicts, over and above government interventions or legal reforms. Furthermore, the demand for bodily and gender self-determination for trans people, as it relates to the freedom to access hormone replacement therapy and surgical interventions without oversight from psychiatric institutions, prompted an analogous call for the abolition of surgical interventions that are often imposed on infants and children with ambiguous sex characteristics. In 2009 the Red por la Despatologización de las Identidades Trans del Estado Español (Spanish Network for Depathologization of Trans Identities) established five central organizing objectives that would later, in 2012, be developed into a global campaign named “Red Internacional por las Despatologización de las Identidades Trans” (“Stop Trans Pathologization”) (Araneta and Fernández Garrido 2016). This same network also developed the first series of Trans October events, which “grew from being held in only three cities in 2007 (Paris, Barcelona, and Madrid) to taking place in more than fifty cities on several continents by 2012, with more than eighty organized groups participating”
Transfeminism congealed as a transnational social movement beginning in 2009 with the Conferencia Feminista (Feminist Conference) held in Grenada, Spain. During this conference the attendees collectively drafted the “Manifiesto para la Insurrección Transfeminista” (Manifesto for the transfeminist insurrection), which was read aloud at the end of the conference and published simultaneously on multiple online platforms throughout Europe and the Americas on 1 January 2010 as a call to action (Araneta and Fernández Garrido 2016). This manifesto represented the formalization of principles that came into being as an integral part of a Spanish political subculture of post-pornography and anti-capitalism. Lucía Egaña and Miriam Solá describe how, following this pivotal conference,

\[
\text{little by little, transfeminism has woven a network between groups both within and beyond Catalonia, working through such questions as pornography and sex work; trans depathologization; squatting; migrant resistance; economic precarity; the critique of state feminism; the institutionalization of the LGBT movement; open-source software, copyleft, creative-commons licensing, antisurveillance and data obfuscation strategies; self-training and peer-to-peer education that allows more access to technology for more kinds of people who have been excluded from it; and performance and the body.}
\]

(2016, 75)

Transfeminism as Epistemology

In this respect, transfeminism encompasses much more than the inclusion of trans people in feminist politics or their depathologization in the field of psychiatry. It is an epistemology—a theory of knowledge and power—that guides a diverse array of transfeminist activist political practices. Sayak Valencia (2014), a Mexican transfeminist scholar and activist, identifies four central lines of influence within transfeminism as a global network: US women of color feminisms; post-pornographic and anti-capitalist subcultures from Spain; the global movement to end the pathologization of trans and intersex people; and a sustained commitment to the empowerment of migrants and people living in conditions of poverty or social marginalization. This last connection is less obvious but highly significant because migration is a recurring feature in the lived experiences of sex workers. As Laura Agustín’s (2005) research demonstrates, feminist debates regarding the criminalization versus legalization of sex work are often limited by their lack of attention to migration policy as a source of systemic disenfranchisement for sex workers. These different points of inflection within transfeminism each speak to the material conditions of trans people's lives and their means of daily survival, as migrants and sex workers, as ethnic and racial minorities in their home and host countries, and as people whose marginalization within capitalist economies leads them to form micropolitical networks of mutual support, empowerment, and self-directed action, or autogestión in Spanish. The developmental arc, from transfeminism as a politics focused primarily on trans inclusion within feminism to a transfeminism that organizes around a much wider range of political issues, is what Aren Aizura refers to as a move to turn the prefix “trans” in an “antiidentitarian direction” (2012, 135). Another way to conceptualize this expansion of transfeminist praxis beyond trans identity is to attend to the “tremendous worldwide effect of ‘intersectional’ feminisms promulgated by US feminists of color in the 1980s” (Stryker and Bettcher 2016, 8).

US women of color feminists from the 1980s onward set important ideological and methodological precedents for transfeminism. Their writings problematized the category “woman” as the central subject of feminism by focusing on the different experiences of women across the categories of race, sexuality, and class. Black feminists in particular emphasized their history of shared oppression with Black men, as well as the relative privilege of White women over Black men, in order to deconstruct essentialist stereotypes that represent women as always being the victims of men. Kimberlé Crenshaw, a worldrenowned legal scholar and Black feminist theorist from the United States, elaborated the concept of intersectionality in 1989 as an analytic method that demands a careful attention to the interplay between different systems of oppression. Transfeminism represents an expansion and deepening of intersectional feminism through a critique of the gender essentialism and unacknowledged transphobia within mainstream feminist discourses on sex.

Just as Crenshaw's foundational writings on intersectionality invite her readers to imagine how policy makers could design antidiscrimination legislation in more effective and comprehensive ways if Black women were the starting point of their analysis (Crenshaw 1989), Vic Muñoz, a diasporic Puerto Rican transfeminist scholar and activist, poses the following question: “What happens to feminist pedagogy [and activist interventions] when feminist trans-people of color name the world?” (2012, 23). In other words, how does attention to, and commitment toward, the empowerment and liberation of profoundly marginalized people transform one's fundamental understanding of society and social justice practices? Transfeminism espouses a coalitional politics that operates under the assumption that “changes that would be good for trans women will ultimately be beneficial for everyone” (Halberstam 2018).

Historical Coalitions and Connections

Contentious debates about trans exclusion from feminist social movements often lead to a misconception that feminists of the past resoundingly rejected and excluded trans people from participation in feminist struggles and that it is only recently that feminists have started to embrace trans leadership and participation in the movement. However, a number of scholars offer more nuanced, historically grounded analyses to better understand these conflicts within feminisms. Finn Enke’s “Collective Memory and the Transfeminist 1970s” (2018) provides an alternative account of several of the most prominent controversies of the 1970s regarding trans exclusion within second-wave feminism and argues that these instances reveal how several trans women were fully integrated into prominent feminist organizations during that period. The debate regarding the inclusion or exclusion of trans people within feminist praxis has been a subject of recurring conflict between different groups of feminists who do not comprise the totality of second-wave or third-wave feminist politics. As the Brazilian transfeminist scholar and activist Hailey Kaas notes, “Even if we are able to label some part of feminism as being trans excluding, it does not therefore follow that the rest of feminism is free from reproducing cissexism” (2016, 146). Rather than reduce one's understanding of this conflict into an “overly simplistic dichotomy often drawn between an exclusionary transphobic feminism and an inclusive trans-affirming feminism,” Susan Stryker and Talia M. Bettcher suggest that one should instead focus on “the range and complexity of trans/feminist relationships” (2016, 7).

To that end, there is a growing body of scholarship that documents trans and feminist collectives in other historical periods and geographic locations that came about independently of the transnational networks mentioned above (Stryker and Bettcher 2016). In 2016 TSQ: Transgender Studies Quarterly published a special issue titled “Trans/Feminisms” that documented transfeminist politics across seventeen countries, including Brazil, Ecuador, England, France, Germany, Japan, Mexico, Spain, and the United States. As an epistemology, transfeminism serves as a magnifying lens that identifies instances of, and possibilities for, solidarity and coalitional practices across a wide spectrum of political subjects. For example, the Chilean trans artist Hija de Perra (Daughter of a Bitch) served as the master of ceremony for the annual Chilean women’s festival called Femfest for seven years, beginning in 2007. Even though neither she nor the conference organizers explicitly identified as transfeminist during that time, this collaboration was based on an understanding of the shared political commitments between cisgender and trans feminists in Chile. As such, transfeminism gives name to a set of feminist principles and practices that precedes its formal articulation as a mode of politics (Garriga-López 2016).

connection between women of color feminism and transfeminism through the writing of Pauli Murray (1910–1985), an African American activist, journalist, and lawyer. Murray, who published under the pseudonym of Peter Panic, coined the term Jane Crow in 1944 to describe how “White supremacy and male supremacy operated in tandem” (Fisher 2016, 101). This concept was central to Crenshaw’s formulation of the theories and methods of intersectionality and her observations about the ways in which racist and sexist systems of oppression operate in conjunction with one another. Transfeminism necessarily attends to questions of race and ethnicity because “antitransgender discrimination and violence are often accompanied by racial and ethnic discriminations, and conversely, situations interpreted as instances of racial and ethnic injustice often also involve a policing of gender and sexual boundaries” (Juang 2006, 706). Enke argues that “while most scholars fast forward this insight to the Black feminism articulated by the Combahee River Collective” Fisher’s research provides important insights into the origins of intersectionality by “stay[ing] with Murray in the 1930s and 1940s long enough to comprehend Murray’s biracial and transing experience” (2018, 13). Echoing Fisher, Enke further describes how “Murray wrote plenty about persistently longing to be known as male and had from the late 1930s through the 1940s implored endocrinologists for testosterone treatment, only to be repeatedly recommended ‘female’ hormones instead” (2018, 13). Although ultimately unable to access hormone treatments to physically transition, Murray is nevertheless recognizable as trans in the modern sense and was a foundational figure for contemporary intersectional and transfeminist praxis. Micha Cárdenas’s use of the term trans of color feminism in her scholarship (2016) likewise draws attention to these genealogical connections.

These varied examples make evident that transfeminism does not conform to a single ideology or practice; instead, its political dynamism lies in its function as a contingent and context-specific epistemology. It is both a transnational and micropolitical mode of politics, intimately tied to the specific material needs of trans people and also capacious enough to include broader struggles for social justice. Consistent with the Latin origin of the word trans, which means “to cross” (A. Enke 2012, 5), transfeminism can be thought of as a feminism in motion, a movement that is continuously “transforming margins into centers” (López 1994, 130).

See also Combahee River Collective; Feminism, African; Grupo Gay da Bahia; Human Rights and Activism in Latin America; Pornoterrorismo and Post-Porn; Sex Tourism in Latin America and the Caribbean; Travesti and Trans Activism in Latin America and the Caribbean

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Transgender Identity in Iranian Cinema

KAVEH BASSIRI
PhD candidate
University of Arkansas, Fayetteville

Examines the portrayals of female-to-male (FTM) and male-to-female (MTF) cross-dressing and transsexuality in Iranian cinema.

Iran's long history of cross-dressing entertainments has involved male-to-female (MTF) performers and the gender substitutions in Shi’a passion plays (ta’zieh). Gender ambiguity also plays a unique role in miniature paintings and Persian poetry, where poets take advantage of Persian’s gender-neutral pronouns in their love poems. In the late 1950s and 1960s, Iranian cinema became a site of transgender discourse. Transgender identity, as discussed here, ranges from gender masquerading to transsexuality, which is separate from, though related to, homosexuality.

Cross-Dressing in Iranian Cinema

Most of the cross-dressing in Iranian cinema, especially for MTF roles, is in the genre of comedy and involves stereotypical scenarios making the transgender characters objects of ridicule and laughter. The reason for cross-dressing is always external and a means to an end. Often, a male character decides to pass as a woman to trick someone, while a female character is coerced into taking the role of a man in order to get a job. Their exaggerated performances seem credible to other characters who are not “in the know” but appear farcical to viewers aware of the masquerading. The differences between sexes is a frequent topic of conversation, where heteronormativity and the gender binary are promoted. Audiences are expected to identify with the heterosexual side of the transgender character. In the end, the transgender identities are exposed, and the characters return to their earlier roles for a happy ending.

Cross-dressing in Iranian films can be discussed from two different perspectives. On the one hand, it can be seen as subversive and liberating, "putting in question the very notion of the ‘original’ and of stable identity" (Garber 1992, 16). The films foreground the gender anxieties brought about by modern social transformations in Iran. Transgender characters problematize the strict gender rules and customs of Iranian society. They mimic and destabilize archetypical constructions of masculinity and femininity, while providing a space for homoeroticism. They create ambiguity, plurality, and gender indeterminacy. In Iranian cinema after the Islamic Revolution of 1979, transgender characters allow directors to transgress the strict censorship of male and female intimacy, such as touching and the requirements of the veil. (Such restrictions did not exist before the revolution.)

On the other hand, the films can be seen to “ridicule and hence domesticate a transvestism that might otherwise prove threatening” (Phillips 2006, 81). Revealing the characters’ transgender identities and returning them to their “original” gender encourages heteronormativity and gender conformity. In the films, heterosexual subjectivity and the male gaze remain the sources of power and authority. The comedies reinforce negative stereotypes of transgender people as deceitful and manipulative. The transgender identity is portrayed as inauthentic, as something that can be laughed at and should be discarded.

MTF Characters

Madmazel Khaleh (1957; Mademoiselle Aunty), directed by Amin Amini (1930–2004), is a key early cross-dressing film in Iranian cinema. It was based on a Persian theater adaptation of the English playwright Brandon Thomas’s popular Charley’s Aunt (1892). The actor Ali Tabesh (1925–1997) had already performed the role of the aunt in the play. The success of the film made Tabesh a popular female impersonator, and he continued to play the role in a number of films through the 1960s. Another important MTF film from before the revolution is Shahbaji Khanom (1958; Mrs. Shahbaji), directed by Sadegh Bahrami (1909–1988). The film’s title character was played by the actor Mohammad Ali Zarandi (1925–1988), who was already well known for impersonating a nagging, uncouth older woman on Friday morning radio shows. The two characters—Shahbaji Khanom and Madmazel Khaleh, with their plebeian and foreignized names, respectively—are two stock characters that continue to be exploited in Iranian cinema: an old, unrefined, rural woman and a younger, Westernized, urban woman. (After the revolution, the modern woman was also marked by wearing a hat or a loose scarf while showing some hair.) These characters lay bare the contentions between modernity and tradition in Iran.

During the strict and sober early years following the revolution, MTF characters faded from the screen. They returned with the liberalization and reforms brought about by Mohammad Khatami’s presidency (1997–2005). Adam barfi (1995; Snowman), directed by Davood Mir-Bagheri (1959–), was the first movie after the revolution to have an acknowledged cross-dressing character. The film was shown at the 1995 Fajr International Film Festival in Tehran before the female impersonation of Akbar Abdi (1958–) prompted its ban. In the film, the masquerading Abbas as Dorna, without a hijab, is able to transgress the rules of censorship. Dorna even kisses a man to get him to fetch some food. Dorna’s passing as a woman to obtain a visa for the United States is a source of shame and humiliation. In a scene imagined by the character, Dorna’s beloved female friend describes a cross-dresser as “abnormal” and a “murderer.” In the end, cross-dressing Abbas decides to be a man again and return to Iran with his beloved. The conclusion reiterates the message that abandoning one’s home, like losing one’s masculinity, results in an inauthentic and deprived identity. Adam barfi was finally released publicly in 1998 and subsequently set a box-office record. Abdi has gone on to play a number of female and MTF roles. He even won a best supporting actor award at the 2012 Fajr International Film Festival for his role in Khabam miad (2012; I feel sleepy), where, like Zarandi, he plays a female character throughout the film.

The success of Adam barfi resulted in renewed interest in MTF characters, who began to appear often in minor plot twists as a comedic gimmick. The characters temporarily adopt transgender identities for trickery and crime or for a good cause, such as exposing a criminal. With the exception of Mozahem (2002; Intruder), the popular genre of transgender thriller does not exist in Iranian cinema. MTF films are usually comedies or melodramas.

Female-to-Male Characters

The roles of female-to-male (FTM) characters are different than those of the MTF characters in Iranian cinema. While MTF cross-dressers are routinely associated with comedic entertainment, criminality, and trickery, FTM cross-dressers are typically coerced into adapting to another gender, often as an act of necessity to gain employment. The FTM films champion women’s rights and problematize the constructs of masculinity. Moreover, given that men have more rights and authority, posing as a man is socially understandable. It also reaffirms the established patriarchy. In a few instances, as in Dokhtari be nam-e Tondar (2000; A girl named Tondar) or Qahremane qahremanan (1965; The champion of champions), the female protagonists, even before cross-dressing, behave like a man or want to be one. The representation of FTM characters has also evolved in post-revolution movies, adding new complexity and insight.

Released a few months after the popular Madmazel Khaleh, the movie Zalem bala (1958; The naughty girl), directed by Siamak Yasami (1925–1994), is an early key example of a FTM film in Iranian cinema. In Zalem bala, a celebrated singer known as Delkash (1925–2004), with her low voice, becomes the first female actress to don the clothing of the popular tough-guy archetype (jahel), speaking and behaving in a macho style. She sings a vernacular song while wearing a mustache, a velvet hat, a black suit, and a white shirt. The popularity of Delkash’s performance made women’s jahel impersonation the most popular transgender role in prerevolution cinema. Yasami continued to use FTM jahels in a number of films in the 1960s, including Qahremane qahremanan and Shamsi pahlevoon (1966; Shamsi, the champion).

In Iranian commercial cinema, a jahel is a recognizable example of the performative acts and gestures that define masculinity. With his prescribed dress code, speech, and behavior, he is typically a rowdy street-smart manifestation of the traditional chivalrous hero. Judith Butler argues that gender is “a set of repeated acts within a highly rigid regulatory frame that congeal over time to produce the appearance of substance” (1990, 43–44). What these acts “express are fabrications manufactured and sustained through corporal signs and other discursive means” (173). Iranian movies take advantage of the fabricated jahel as a discernible construction of dominant masculinity to easily convert dandies to “real” men and females to males. All a woman has to do is to put on the right clothes and start behaving like a jahel to become a man and gain employment, authority, and access to power. Furthermore, the exaggerated mimicry satirizes the masculine identity. The films ridicule the false appearance of masculinity in jahels, in contrast to the true inner nature of a chivalrous, heroic man. By subverting the heroic performance of jahels, these FTM characters also critique hegemonic masculinity.

In these comedies, the FTM characters foreground the force of modernity by becoming active agents and pursuing their partners. Their love takes precedence over a traditionally arranged marriage decided by a father. Moreover, the female heroines transgress not only gender but also class. As in many Iranian commercial films of the time, the love of a rich, modern, and spoiled member of the upper class for a traditional, genuine, honest, and lower-class character brings integrity and generosity to the rich while solving the financial troubles of the poor. But these films do not probe the social problems and class struggles, or the real concerns, of a transgender individual. Ultimately, the FTM character is publicly revealed and returns to the more passive female gender—reestablishing the primacy of the heteronormative identity. The upper class is redeemed, and the idealized poor are content. The films end happily with what Afsaneh Najmabadi has called the “marriage imperative” in Iranian society (2014, 7).

After fading from cinema in the late 1970s, FTM characters surfaced again, like the MTF cross-dressers, during Khatami’s presidency, in films such as the awardwinning Dokhtaran-e khorshid (2000; Daughters of the sun), directed by Maryam Shahriar (1966–), and Baran (2001), directed by Majid Majidi (1959–). These films, however, are dramas, dealing with gender and social oppression. FTM films before the revolution were part of the popular cinema patronized mainly by lower-class audiences, whereas these post-revolution films often catered to art-house and middle-class viewers.

In post-revolution cinema, crude jahels are no longer permissible role models. Female characters typically do not mimic tough-guy heroes. The common FTM character in these films is derived from the known figure in Persian culture of the amrad, the young man without facial hair who is beautiful, androgynous, quiet, and sensitive. Masculinity is not satirized by exaggeration but feminized. This passing character also recalls the idolized self-sacrificing innocent martyr of the Iran-Iraq War (1980–1988). Unlike in the prerevolution films, the sympathetic transgender characters become objects of love and desire. The plight of women and the poor are highlighted in these critical dramas, but there are no happy endings even if characters return to their female gender. There is no transgression of class or relief from patriarchy or poverty. Usually, the father’s wish to have a son or his inability to be the family’s breadwinner compels the daughter to become a man. Similar to much of classical Persian poetry, love triggers a character’s internal awakening but is not consummated. For example, in Baran, the love of FTM Rahmat sets the young man Lateef on his spiritual journey.

Transsexuals in Iranian Cinema

The cross-dressing movies discussed so far are not about transsexuals’ internal desires to have their body match their gender identity. They do not speak to prejudices transgender subjects experience nor to the challenges of transitioning. The actors masquerading in Iranian cinema do not identify as transgender. By the middle of the first decade of the twenty-first century, however, a number of documentaries on Iranian transsexuals were produced by local and Iranian diaspora directors. They were shown at film festivals and on television in different parts of the world. Najmabadi (2014) identifies 2003 to 2008 as the years when the discussion of transsexuality in Iran was most prominent in Iran and the Western media.

The first Iranian transsexual documentary was Juste une femme (2002; Just a woman) by Mitra Farahani (1975–), who lives in Paris. The film, which won the Teddy Award at the Berlin International Film Festival, follows the post-op MTF Morvarid’s overcoming of fear to venture outside with a veil. By 2005 documentary reports about transsexuals in Iran were being made for television broadcast. For example, Amir Amirani (1967–), living in England, made Trans-sexuality in Iran (2005) for BBC World’s Newsnight program. Hamid Naficy calls it “highly engaging and informative both in terms of what it reveals about the religious and legal status of transsexuality and about what it is like to be a transsexual in a sexually restrictive society” (2011–2012, 4:435). Faramarz Amini produced a three-part special, Farzand-i bimar-i tabiʿat (2005; Nature’s sick child), for Omid-e-Iran, a Los Angeles–based satellite television channel. Najmabadi’s transgender interviewees mention that Amini’s documentary had an important part in “their self-cognition” (2014, 35). Maria (2006), directed by Abbas Burhan (1984–), shown at the Fajr International Film Festival in 2006, was the “first documentary screened in Iran” (Najmabadi 2014, 206). It is about the struggle of a father and former truck driver who has gone through the MTF operation. The Iranian director Mohammad Ahmadi (1962–) did six years of research to make Shokhi-e tabiat (2007; Nature’s humor). Elhum Shakerifar writes that Ahmadi used his film for the purpose of “lobbying members of parliament” in Iran for “laws to be put in place to protect the social rights of transgenders” (2014, 332). Iranian transgender films have continued to win international awards. For example, Be Like Others (2008), directed by Tanaz Eshaghian (1974–), won three awards at the Berlin International Film Festival. In 2016 a short documentary made by Vahid Zare Soheili was even broadcast on Iranian national television.

These documentaries usually consist of interviews with transsexuals about their dreams and difficulties, their struggles with their families, their experiences of prejudice and abuse, and the process of transition. The films also include interviews with friends and family, as well as therapists, doctors, and clerics. As in the films of Eshaghian and Amirani, they may include interviews with the Islamic scholar Hujjat al-Islam Karimi-nia, who advocates for transsexual rights to sex reassignment surgery (SRS). Karimi-nia notes that the Qur’an does not forbid SRS. He argues that transsexuals are individuals who feel their soul is trapped in the wrong body, a condition that can be healed. As he reasons, there is nothing wrong with doctors correcting their abnormal condition, as many human changes to nature are not sinful. Some films also cover the story of Maryam Khatoon Molkara (1950–2012), a transgender activist who had contacted Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini (1902–1989) for guidance and an SRS approval. Khomeini’s letter of support in the mid-1980s become a fatwa—an edict—for legalizing SRS for transsexuals.

While raising awareness about the plight of transgender individuals, the documentaries have been the subject of criticism. Many films continue to exotify Iran and Iranian transsexuals for an assumed Western audience. None has been made by the members of the Iranian transsexual community. They also do not provide a deeper investigation of the history of transsexuality in Iran. For example, they do not address the close historical ties between transsexuality, intersex, and SRS. Instead, they may simplistically conflate transsexuality with homosexuality. Najmabadi writes, “International media coverage of transsexuality in Iran increasingly has emphasized that sex reassignment surgery (SRS) was being performed coercively on Iranian homosexuals by a fundamentalist Islamic government” (2014, 2). Shakerifar writes that Be Like Others sees transsexuality “as a cure for homosexuality” and that “techniques such as directed questions, selective translation, lack of contextualization and the use of stereotypical images all serve the purpose of manipulation of the film’s message” (2011, 333). Be Like Others begins with the titles: “In the Islamic Republic of Iran, sex change operations are legal,” followed with, “Homosexuality is punishable by death.” Shakerifar argues that “the idea that transsexuality in Iran is paradoxical is also a media construct, a product of Western representations of Iran” (2011, 333). In this context, the representation and discussion of transsexuality can be seen in light of the “discourse of the Gay International that ... produces homosexuals, as well as gays and lesbians, where they do not exist” (Massad 2002, 363). (Joseph A. Massad coined the term Gay International to refer to “organizations dominated by white Western males ... [that] sprang up to defend the rights of ‘gays and lesbians’ all over the world” [2002, 361].)

From late in the first decade of the twenty-first century forward, Iranian transsexuals have also been the subject of feature films and have started acting in movies. Aynehaye rooberoo (2011; Facing mirrors) by Negar Azarbayjani (1973–) is the first feature film released in Iran that openly discusses the struggles of an Iranian transsexual. Shayesteh Irani (1979–), who had earlier played a FTM cross-dresser in Offside (2006), plays Edi, a young pre-op FTM character. Edi runs away from home to escape their father’s plans for an arranged marriage. Anna Vanzan writes that the movie even “triggered a discussion about transgenderism held at the Mofid University in the ultraconservative town of Qom” (2014, 53). After their operation, Saman Arastoo (1967–), once a respected actress in Iran under their birth name Farzaneh Arastoo, has been able to work in television and cinema, this time as a trans man. In Anahita (2010), Arastoo plays both a female and a male character.
Arastoo’s transition experience is the subject of a documentary directed by Milad Bahar (1983–), Hamatoon manno meshnasin (2009; You all know me). Arastoo has also written and directed a play about their experience with the same title.

In summary, transgender characters began appearing as temporary cross-dressers in Iranian cinema in the late 1950s. While providing a slippage in heterosexual boundaries, as well as ambiguity and homoeroticism, these films ultimately reinforced heteronormativity.
MTF and FTM characters perform different roles in Iranian cinema. Iranian FTM films champion women’s rights and expose both the strictures of tradition and the repression experienced under patriarchy and class barriers. More recently, beginning in the first years of the twenty-first century, Iranian documentaries have overtly addressed transgender and transsexual identities, dealing with real life struggles of the community. These films opened up opportunities for transgender performers and feature films to address transgender subjectivity. Meanwhile, the cinema continues to demarcate a gender binary while homosexuality remains unacceptable.

SEE ALSO Masculinity in Iranian Cinema; Sex Reassignment Surgery in Iran; Shifting Sexual Norms in Nineteenth-Century Iran; Transgendered Subjectivities in Contemporary Iran

BIBLIOGRAPHY

The status of transgender Muslims can be partially understood on the basis of the canonical sources of Islamic law: the Qur’an (the central text of Islamic belief) and the hadith (narratives on the practices of the prophet Muhammad as the basis for religious practice). This partiality, however, follows from the vast geographical and cultural variations in the practice of Islam across centuries and continents. This entry is divided along the historical contrast between premodern figures and controversies of gender plurality and their remnants and reformulations in the contemporary period.

Premodern Views

The Qur’an’s view of gender dimorphism is a familiar one insofar as men and women are addressed in their gendered specificity. The status of men and women is not the same, however, as reflected in the various kinship-based laws and aspirations ascribed to each in the holy text. A closer reading of the Qur’anic text reveals that the situation is not simply of men being superior to women, but that women and men are in close proximity to each other in the created universe. The fourth chapter (titled “The Women”) opens with this verse: “O mankind! reverence your Guardian-Lord, who created you from a single person, created, of like nature, His mate.” As the verse indicates, men and women, created from the same person (nafs in the original could also mean “soul” or “spirit”), may even be so similar to each other that the Qur’anic law lays down clear lines of demarcation between them in terms of dress, comportment, and social roles (Bouhdiba 1985).

The hadith literature mentions at several instances the mukhannathin (effeminate men; singular mukhannath) and the mutarajjilat (mannish women; singular mutarajjila) who are seen as a class of people whose status needs to be fixed among the new community of believers of Islam (see Rowson 1991). As Everett K. Rowson shows in a 1991 article, while they pose a threat to the morals of the new community, they seem to be embedded in the social life of early Islamic society in Arabia. And although several of these references pertain to types of transvestism alone, the transgression of these named groups results from their inhabiting a gender presentation contrary to their genital gender. Therefore, contrary to modern prejudices, there seems to be little condemnation of these gender transgressors for upending their “natural” gender at birth. While “mannish women” are rarely mentioned, the hadith literature refers to the “effeminates” several times. It is also notable that homosexuality is not ascribed to these personages. Their social roles are specified as artists, singers, musicians, and, in particular, go-betweens, especially because of their access to women’s segregated quarters.

With the spread of Islamic culture and civilization over the last millennium, these rules and their underlying views on gender dimorphism traveled to places as far apart as Spain and Indonesia. One recurring figure of gender transgression, significantly, is the eunuch, which was a male captured in war, but sometimes raised as a slave, too, and castrated for the purpose of guarding women’s quarters and providing important skills in statecraft in various Muslim polities. While Islamic law forbids castration in lands under its realm, the eunuch, who was often taken from foreign lands and was born outside the faith, is a constant presence in Islamic history. They are named variously in the Islamic lands as khadim or khasi (in Arabic), agha (Turkish), khwaja sara (Persian), hijra (in modern India, Bangladesh, and Pakistan), and sida-sida (Malay). Some eunuchs rose to become important military commanders, showing that castration was not simply seen as demasculinization in terms of social roles. Scott Siraj al-Haqq Kugle (2014, 17) notes that the legal status of such people was outside the gender binary and seen as an “in-between position.” (This could be one genealogical source of the modern notion of the “third gender” in Islamic societies in Pakistan and Bangladesh.) Before the formation of Saudi Arabia under its present Wahhabi regime, the prophet Muhammad’s tomb in Medina was guarded by a posse of eunuch guards (Hathaway 2015). This attests to the ritual and symbolic value of the eunuch in Islamic history and societies.

Modern Lives

The spread of Islam to societies east of the Arabian Peninsula involved the spelling out of social and sexual identities in the idiom of Islamic norms and practices. But this idiom does not simply translate into local terms, practices, and worldviews. The idiom of transgenderism exists in Islamic societies, for example, of the Indian subcontinent and Southeast Asia, but it needs to be understood in light of both the premodern worldviews (derived from the Islamic canon) and the local practices that are influenced not just by Islam but by the West, too, primarily through colonial contact in the nineteenth century.

Indonesia has the largest Muslim population in the world. It also has a colonial past and before that centuries of contact with the Arab world through trade and religious conversion. Consequently, anthropologists have presented a definitive picture of transgender practices and lives in this country existing at the intersection of various histories, influences, and idioms from the religious and secular contexts. The warias (male-to-female transgenders; literally “womanman”) and tombois (female-to-male transgenders) are two main categories that characterize Indonesian transgenderism. The anthropologist Tom Boellstorff (2005) has chronicled the overlap between homosexuality and transgenderism within these categories and how it is difficult to separate the two strands of identity and self-identification. For example, while warias may be seen as homosexually inclined men, some also choose to undergo sex reassignment surgery (Safitri 2013). Another identity name, bissu, is socially recognized and corresponds with the premodern figure of the mukhannath. The bissu performs ritualistic functions and is an androgynous (born male or female) figure tolerated by the Islamic orthodoxy (Boellstorff 2005) and considered to be part of the social universe (Peletz 2009).

As transgender Muslims, the people classed under these local names are socially more visible than the Western-inspired categories of “gay” and “lesbian” in Indonesia. However, this visibility cannot be taken to mean open social acceptance or equality with the normative genders. Transgender Muslims have struggled to assimilate their inner life with the codes of Islamic practice and piety. For example, Dian Maya Safitri (2013) has documented a piety movement initiated by some warias in contemporary Indonesia involving religious preaching, veiling, and dress codes in consonance with Islamic practice, which are seen by the practitioners as fulfilling their lives as transgenders and as Muslims.

In Malaysia the male-to-female transgender identity of the warias exists as mak nyah (used by trans women to identify themselves). In a 2002 study on the mak nyah, Yik Koon Teh points to the existence of four classes of gendered persons in Malaysia: men, women, hermaphrodites (khunsa), and mukhannas (effeminate males). Sex reassignment surgery is allowed only for the khunsa and forbidden especially to the mukhannas. The designations and prejudices against the transgender category are reminiscent of a strict interpretation of certain views within Islamic law. The neglect of male-to-female transgender positions in scholarly literature is conspicuous. The mak nyahs are increasingly subject to violent crime (including murder), and this can be related to their belonging to the Malay majority whose relation to Islam is strictly defined by the state. Teh (2002) suggests that other non-Malay transgenders may have assimilated into society through successful sex reassignment surgery.
Most of the scholars of Southeast Asian transgender lives cited above argue that the category “third gender” cannot be applied to these societies. This is in marked contrast with the circulation of this term in Pakistan, Bangladesh, and India. The hijra (whose ancestor is the eunuch of the Islamic courts in the region) is often translated as the third gender, especially in the language of the state. In mid-2017 Pakistan officially recognized the third gender by issuing passports with that designation. Yet a sole focus on the third gender has meant the invisibilization and judicial and social harassment of transgender people who do not see themselves in the more traditional role of the hijra.

The case of Shumail Raj, a Pakistani trans man who underwent surgery to transition to a masculine identity, reveals the fault line not only between traditional transgender figures and modern trans lives but also between trans sexualities and homosexualities. Around 2006, Raj married his female cousin Shahzina Tariq, but the marriage was annulled by the courts based on the legal injunction against same-sex marriage in the country. Raj’s transgender identity was set aside in the name of preserving the state-sanctioned—and by implication Islamic—definition of marriage (Dawn 2007). The couple were also fined and imprisoned as part of their conviction. However, the law used to convict them was the British colonial law of the Indian penal code (Section 377), which outlaws “unnatural offenses,” although Islamic law was cited in a general way. This shows that in so-called Islamic contexts the categories and institutions of colonial (i.e., Western) provenance support a more “traditional” regime of laws and sexual mores. It therefore becomes difficult for activism and scholarship to work with a simplistic category of “Islam” as the ruling ideology of societies in which Islam is the majority religion. It is possible that the dissolution of transgender unions, like that of Raj and Tariq, is fueled by the fear that transgender identities put in question legal categories that are more starkly defined under modern colonial law, even more than in customary usage as derived from Islamic practice. The role of the modern state in determining the realm of transgender existence and survival cannot be ignored in predominantly Islamic countries.

The conjuncture of Islamic practice and transgender identity can be witnessed most strongly in contemporary Iran, where the Islamic state’s policy recognizes transgender lives through legal and medical categories. This situation is comparable with the state’s intervention in transgender lives in other Muslim-majority countries such as Malaysia and Indonesia, but its salience is partly a result of geopolitical interests in reporting on the region. Around 2003, the world media reported widely on the state sponsorship of sex reassignment surgery in Iran, which is often directed at homosexual men and women as a legal “option” to “convert” to their “real” gender, along with transgender people who benefit from such a policy. In her 2014 ethnography of transgender practices in Iran, Afsaneh Najmabadi notes that in 1964, well before the Islamic Revolution of 1979, Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini (1902–1989) had expressed his legal opinion that sex change was permissible in Islam in an Arabic treatise written by him. The official support for transgender identification (and medical intervention), according to Najmabadi, exists “at the intersection of medicine, the law, fiqh [Islamic jurisprudence], psychology/psychiatry, and several institutions of the Islamic Republic of Iran” (2014, 30). She has carefully tabulated the official hierarchy that oversees the “certification” process to determine a person’s official transgender identification, which then not only allows for hormonal treatment and sex reassignment surgery but also provides basic health insurance, financial assistance, and exemption from military service (20).

The example from Iran shows the difficulty of keeping issues of sexual identity separate from questions of transgender selfhood. Najmabadi highlights other domains of transgender existence that cannot be subsumed under governmental recognition and control, especially in the performative traditions of theater and music. While sexuality activists, focusing mostly on state policy, might see official Iranian policy as curtailing the freedom of gay and lesbian lives, the situation is complicated by the official recognition of a realm of bodily experience that may touch on homosexuality but may articulate itself through the trans category. It also becomes difficult to cast “official” Islamic doctrine as a blanket prohibition against sexual and gender variations in the name of a God-given, “natural” order of gender and sexuality. Transgender lives are lived in Islamic societies under the gaze of the state, against traditional taboos and drawing on partial social tolerance and on the legal institution, which offers both recognition and installs strict definitions for the trans experience.

SEE ALSO Eunuchs; Hijras; Homosexual Acts in Shariʿa; Malaysia; Mukhannath; Section 377 and Section 377A; Section 377 in South Asia; Sex Reassignment Surgery in Asia; Sex Reassignment Surgery in Iran; Third Genders; Waria

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Hamzić, Vanja. Sexual and Gender Diversity in the Muslim World: History, Law, and Krämer, Denis Matringe, et al. 2015.

http://referenceworks.brillonline.com/entries/encyclopedia-of-islam-3/eunuchs-
COM_27821

Kugle, Scott Siraj al-Haqq. Homosexuality in Islam: Critical Reflection on Gay, Lesbian, and Najmabadi, Afsaneh. Professing Selves: Transsexuality and Same-Sex Desire in Contemporary

Peletz, Michael G. Gender Pluralism: Southeast Asia since Early Modern Times. New York:

Senin-Kamis Yogyakarta: Negotiating the Islamic Religious Embodiment.” In Islam in Transgender Organizations in Mainland China, Hong Kong, and Taiwan

YANG YU
PhD candidate
Temple University, Philadelphia, PA

The most significant transgender organizations to emerge in these areas since the 1990s.

In the period since the 1990s, the LGBTQ movement in mainland China, Hong Kong, and Taiwan has developed and become increasingly visible. The internet and other new information and communication technologies have played significant roles and created new opportunities for self-identification in the LGBTQ community, extending the public spaces available to them and promoting the online visibility of the LGBTQ community in society (Cao and Lu 2014; Sun 2010). This entry introduces the transgender recognition laws and some of the most significant transgender organizations that have emerged in mainland China, Hong Kong, and Taiwan since the 1990s.

Mainland China

As of 2018, mainland China had not passed any antidiscrimination laws regarding gender recognition or gender expression, which leaves gender-nonconforming persons vulnerable to prejudice and abuse in schools, workplaces, and hospitals, as well as within their own families. Compared to other Chinese LGBTQ communities, the mainland Chinese transgender community has less visibility. Mainland China's Ministry of Health has strict rules for people who want sex-reassignment surgeries, requiring them to meet the following criteria:

- obtain the informed consent of family members;
- obtain police certification that they have not perpetrated any crimes;
- be over twenty years old;
- be unmarried;
- be under a doctor’s care for transsexualism and have demonstrated a consistent desire to change their sex for more than five years;
- have undergone psychotherapy for more than one year, with the result that such therapy was ineffective; and
- obtain a psychologist’s verification that they will be heterosexual after the surgeries.
Furthermore, the mainland Chinese government allows transsexuals to make gender changes on their hukou (residency) and identity cards in their birthplaces only after sex-reassignment surgery, and they cannot change their gender on their degree certificates and diplomas, which exposes them to possible discrimination in their further education and employment (Karen 2014).

Given the difficulties experienced by transgender persons in mainland China, the importance of support from online sources cannot be understated. Established in August 1998, xiasl.net is the first comprehensive website on transsexuality and cross-dressing in China. It includes information on sex-reassignment surgery and transsexuality both inside and outside China, as well as netizens' autobiographies, stories, poems, novels, photos, and cross-dressing cosplay. When xiasl.net was founded it was the personal website of Ms. Shu Qian. It was in simplified Chinese language, making it different from all other Chinese websites on transsexuality and cross-dressing—such as Taiwan's Wenny Mei Li Xin Shi Jie (Wenny's Beautiful New World), Juliana Mi Mi Hua Yuan (Juliana's Secret Garden), and Hong Kong's Kaimin Rou Qing Wang Ye (Kaimin Gentle Website)—which were in traditional Chinese language. The arrival of xiasl.net attracted attention immediately and visits to the website increased dramatically; netizens interested in transsexuality and cross-dressing were ecstatic because they finally had a place to express their feelings and gender confusion. After years of development, xiasl.net has gradually become a comprehensive website on transsexuality and cross-dressing.

The development of xiasl.net was a long and difficult process. At first, transsexuals and cross-dressers could connect with each other only rarely due to limited internet access. Among netizens, connections were mostly by email, on electronic bulletin boards, and on free online guestbooks. After xiasl.net was established, a large number of netizens sent emails and messages sharing their stories and hitherto repressed feelings, turning xiasl.net into a welcoming virtual space for cross-dressers and transsexuals. With the growth of the internet, xiasl.net expanded from a personal website to a comprehensive website for these communities. Users consulted the site for psychological counseling recommendations and information about surgery and postoperative care, in addition to using it to connect with and encourage each other.

With the development of the online community Baidu Tieba, most xiasl.net users moved over to Yao Niang Ba. Developed by the Chinese search engine company Baidu, Baidu Tieba allows users to search for or create a bar (forum) by typing a keyword; Yao Niang Ba is a forum about yao niang (male-to-female transsexuals who transition by taking medicines or injecting hormones). In 2014 Baidu Tieba’s anti-pornography campaign affected Yao Niang Ba, and afterward the visibility of yao niang decreased dramatically on the internet.

In contrast to xiasl.net, Kua Xing Bie Sheng Huo (Trans Life) functions more like an alternative media organization, publishing articles about transgendered persons' daily problems and needs. Founded in May 2015 almost exclusively by transgender people, Kua Xing Bie Sheng Huo positions itself as a “toolbox” rather than a “treasure chest” because it works to spread knowledge and share experiences to help others on social media platforms such as WeChat and Sina Weibo. Its articles offer tips for transgendered people on college entrance exams, college or major selection, life planning, coming out, dressing, and sex-reassignment surgery, among other topics. Kua Xing Bie Sheng Huo is also developing its own website and supporting facilities to offer most of the information and services that transgender persons require.

One year after the establishment of Kua Xing Bie Sheng Huo, a trans lesbian, a genderqueer, and a gender-nonconforming person, founded Kua Er Zhong Xin (Trans Center; known as Kua Xing Bie Zhong Xin before 2018) in Guangzhou, though its work covers most provinces and cities in mainland China. Kua Er Zhong Xin has a broad and inclusive definition of trans that includes not only trans women and trans men, but also individuals who identify as gender-nonbinary, gender-nonconforming, and genderqueer, among others. The group promotes equal rights for the trans community as well as equal access to social resources and freedom from gender discrimination and violence. Kua Er Zhong Xin’s work consists of three parts: service, activity, and advocacy. The service group provides care, resources, and intervention to the trans community, their relatives, and friends. One of its main focuses is domestic violence. It has established a domestic violence hotline for the trans community that advises callers on how to stay safe and connects them with a trans community network, a nationwide LGBT organizations’ network, lawyers, social work organizations, shelters, and anti–domestic violence organizations, as needed. As of 2017, Kua Er Zhong Xin had dealt with twenty-three cases of domestic violence in the trans community; of these, eleven involved underage trans individuals targeted by domestic violence, eight involved trans persons who were suicidal, three gave support to trans persons who were threatened with murder by their parents, and one involved the attempted murder of a trans child by their parent. The activity group aims to connect and eliminate the gap between the trans community and the cisgender community to advance a future without discrimination. The advocacy group aims to increase the visibility of Kua Er Zhong Xin, the trans community, and transgender issues in order to accelerate improvements in culture, the legal system, and the living and working conditions of the trans community. As of 2017, Kua Er Zhong Xin had held events to disseminate transgender information in Guangzhou, Ningbo, Chengdu, Wuhan, Dongguan, and Changsha. Its main advocacy methods include media promotion, offline activities, story documentation and dissemination, consulting on reports, investigative reporting, research, and conference participation.

Among all the Chinese transgender organizations, Kua Xing Bie Wei Ji Yuan Zhu Yu Zi Xun (Transgender Crisis Assistance and Consulting), founded in 2017, is the only group that offers transgender people in crisis temporary accommodation in a shelter (located in Nanjing). In addition, the group also provides transgender-friendly medical resources, a counseling service, and offline activities for transgender individuals.
Hong Kong

As in mainland China, in Hong Kong transgender people have to be diagnosed by a psychiatrist before they undergo sex-reassignment surgeries. Genders and names on identity cards can be changed, but birth certificates cannot be changed. The Hong Kong Sex Discrimination Ordinance protects equal rights in employment, education, public space, and services, but there have been no cases to test whether such antidiscrimination regulations apply to transsexuals. Notably, although in both mainland China and Hong Kong transgender people can enter into heterosexual marriage after surgery and change their gender on (some) certificates, these rights are rooted in discourses that pathologize transgenderism and privilege heteronormativity.

Pui Kei Eleanor Cheung, who has conducted fieldwork with Hong Kong gender-variant communities, concluded that transgender subjectivity in Hong Kong changed from shame to self-acceptance to pride (2012). In 2002 Jessica Park, a trans woman, and her colleagues (both Westerners and Chinese) established Transgender Equality and Acceptance Movement (TEAM), the first organization serving the transgender community and fighting for transgender rights in Hong Kong (Cheung 2012). In September 2004, the suicides of two trans women, Louise Chan and Sasha Moon, shocked the Hong Kong transgender community and spurred efforts to build solidarity; TEAM was prompted to engage in political activism, making its first press announcement as a group and participating in the government’s Sexual Minorities Forum (Cheung 2012).

According to Cheung (2012), the gradual increase in awareness of transgendered persons in Hong Kong and their inclusion in LGBTQ communities and in curricula of gender/sexuality courses is partly due to TEAM’s political activism. Hong Kong transgendered individuals (most of whom had participated in TEAM) have shared their personal experiences in university classes, community workshops/seminars, and media interviews (Cheung 2012). One of these individuals and a key figure in promoting the transgender movement in Hong Kong, is Joanne Leung, a male-to-female transgender and LGBTQ activist, who in 2008 founded Hong Kong Transgender Resource Center (TGR), which advocates for and provides resources to the transgender community both off- and online. Leung has appeared at Hong Kong and Taipei LGBT Pride several times since 2007. She also has devoted herself to promoting queerology, which is seen as an effective tool for queer theologians to deconstruct heteronormative Christianity culture and help LGBTQ Christians to come to terms with their identity. According to Ka Chan (2015), convener of the Hong Kong Queer Affirming Fellowship, queer theologians use queer experiences to construct the meanings of theology or use queer theory to deconstruct theology. Leung also assisted in the establishment of Hong Kong’s Indonesian lesbian group, most of whose members were domestic workers. In March 2014 Leung became the first transgender person from Hong Kong to speak before the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW) and won the HER Fund Award, which honors women activists who promote human rights and gender equality.

TGR’s mission ranges from education to advocacy in its aim to provide information and resources to the transgender community and the general public to support trans rights and equality. Through hundreds of seminars conducted in colleges in Hong Kong and mainland China, as well as through a media campaign of interviews, articles, and a radio program, TGR works to educate trans persons and the general public and to promote a positive view of transgender identity. In addition to its promotional activities, TGR sponsors a monthly gathering, conducts advocacy on health and legal issues (including HIV/AIDS prevention and promotion of equality in the workplace), and provides a counseling service, a support group/parents group, a hotline service, and online outreach. TGR also publishes the Chinese-language series Shi fei nan nv (Gossip boys and girls), which consists of three books: Shi fei nan nv: ben tu kua xing bie yue du shou Ce (Gossip boys and girls: Domestic transgender reading manual–Hong Kong version), a handbook about Hong Kong’s transgender community; Shi fei nan nv: kua xing bie jia zhang shou ce (Gossip boys and girls: A handbook for parents of trans people), which answers common questions from parents of trans kids and deals with how to build trusting parent-child relationships; and Shi fei nan nv: kua xing bie tong meng shou ce (Gossip boys and girls: A handbook for trans allies), which deals with how society can accept transgendered persons and treat them equally. An English version that consolidates the Chinese booklets, Gossip Boys & Girls: The Book of Transgender in Hong Kong (2017), is available from the TGR.

Taiwan

LGBTQ rights in Taiwan are better than in other areas in Asia. Taiwan passed the Gender Equity Education Act in 2004 and the Act of Gender Equality in Employment in 2002, which ban discrimination based on gender or sexual orientation in education and the workplace, respectively. An amendment to the Gender Equity Education Act in 2011 calls for more instruction in schools on the topics of gender equality and respect for gender diversity. In 2013 the Taiwan Ministry of the Interior recognized for the first time the registration of a transgender marriage. Yet, Taiwan’s transgender people still have a long fight against discrimination ahead of them. For example, persons who want to undergo sex-reassignment surgeries have to be evaluated by two psychiatrists and secure the support of their parents or partners, which may make it impossible for them change their genders; even after undergoing evaluations, they are required to have a “real-life experience,” a stage in which transgender persons live full time in their preferred gender roles (Wang 2016), which is a prerequisite for sex-reassignment surgeries.

Founded on 8 November 2008, Organization Intersex International Chinese (OiI-Chinese) is an information platform for Chinese-speaking intersex persons to communicate with international intersex communities. It is the first website in the Chinese-speaking world that provides information on intersex issues. Hiker Chiu, a human rights activist, established the organization as a tribute to the fourth annual Intersex Awareness Day. By increasing the visibility of intersex, Oii-Chinese has steadily improved public knowledge of intersexuality and assisted intersex persons in achieving self-acceptance as well as social acceptance.

Like Oii-Chinese, Intersex, Transgender and Transsexual People Care Association promotes the visibility and rights of intersex; it is the first Taiwanese organization to cater to transsexuals, transgender, and intersex. The association grew out of Beyond Gender, a cooperative group of transsexuals founded in 2009; with the expanding participation of intersex people and an increased desire to bring about greater change in society, the group formally registered with the government and began work as an association. The association believes that the existence of diverse gendered communities makes the world more beautiful. Its work includes hosting gender education lectures, leading antidiscrimination efforts, and promoting rights such as those associated with gender change in law.

Gay and lesbian organizations in Taiwan also realized the urgent needs of the transgender community. In 2010 Taiwan Tongzhi Hotline Association, the first gay and lesbian organization in Taiwan, established its Transgender Group to receive calls from transgender persons, with the goal of improving engagement with transgender issues and enhancing mutual understanding within the gay, lesbian, bisexual, and transgender communities. The group has hosted talks and activities on transgender issues and sought to mitigate family conflicts by inviting family members of transgender persons to share their anxieties and worries.

Two years later, Wei-Jhen Chen, a graduate student at the Department of Philosophy of National Chengchi University, established Taipei’s Transgender Punk Activist, which focuses on promoting transgender issues and related policies. Transgender Punk Activist’s work projects include promoting public discussions on gender changes on certificates and telling the stories of transgender persons. Chen has presented conference papers on transsexuality and cross-dressing and worked as an online transgender forum moderator.

In conclusion, although transgender communities have not gained full recognition in mainland China, Hong Kong, and Taiwan, organizations striving for transgender rights have gradually emerged in these areas since the late 1990s. These organizations have played significant roles in the personal and public lives of members of the transgender community and have worked extensively online and offline, sharing information and resources, leading public advocacy efforts, and providing community services. It is because of their work that Chinese transgender communities have been able to enter the public domain, triggering more profound social, cultural, and legal changes in terms of transgender rights.

SEE ALSO Conversion Therapy in China; Marriage, Same-Sex, in Taiwan; New Media in Asia

According to extant historiographies of gender and sexuality in modern Iran, around a century ago the country’s gender order—that is, the dominant definitions of masculinity and femininity and the normative patterns of gender relations between, and among, women and men at the level of a whole society (Connell 1987)—began undergoing significant transformations (Najmabadi 2005; Afary 2009). In Women with Mustaches and Men without Beards (2005), the Iran historian Afsaneh Najmabadi rewrites Iranian modernity as a process inevitably interlinked with issues of gender and sexuality. She argues that during the late Qajar dynasty (1797–1925) era, primarily as a result of Iranians’ increasing contact with the West, notions of gender and sexuality in Iran started to shift noticeably, from a previous legitimacy of a mixture of homo- and heteroerotic relations toward a fairly heteronormative matrix. While the extent to which nonnormative genders and sexualities were tolerated among premodern Iranians remains debatable, it is known that, similar to many other premodern Muslim societies, Iranians were also well familiar with more than one manifestation of sexuality and gender ambiguity, including the figures of khontha/mokhannath (intersex), amrad (young male adolescent object of desire for adult men) (Najmabadi 2005; Afary 2009; Alipour 2017), and zanan-e hakkeh (women who desire other women), as well as acts and practices such as sigheh-ye khahar-khandegi (sisterhood vows) and musaheqeh (same-sex acts between women) (Babayan 2008; Afary 2009). As Najmabadi puts it regarding the above historical shift, “In the nineteenth century, homoeroticism and same-sex practices came to mark Iran as backward; heteronormalization of eros and sex became a condition of ‘achieving modernity,’ a project that called for heterosocialization of public space and a reconfiguration of family life” (2005, 3). This collective, shame-driven self-consciousness regarding certain sexual acts and desires resulted in the gradual abjection and erasure of cultural figures such as amrad and in the stigmatization of homosexuality in Iran.

The Transsexual Category

As if to fill a gap in that narrative, Najmabadi’s 2014 book Professing Selves: Transsexuality and Same-Sex Desire in Contemporary Iran rendered a historiographical account of the formation of the category of transsexuality and how it has become intertwined with the already stigmatized category of “homosexuality” over the past century in Iran. From current “psycho-medical and jurisprudential discourses within which practices and procedures of changing sex have operated in Iran since the 1990s” (38), Najmabadi goes back in time to map the trajectory of the formation of the category of “transsexual” and its “intersecting discursive sites, including medicine, religious doctrine, psychology, criminology, the family, trans activism, and practices of everyday life” (3). In 1930s and 1940s Iran, intersex emerged as an instance of intriguing marvels and spectacles of nature, while sex-change and intersex transformations in turn appeared as examples of national pride-inducing scientific marvel and progress. Over the next three decades, however, the above trends converged with a concurrent discourse of national concern with “the exceptional and the marvelous” as a matter related to “the health of the nation, the progress of its educational system, and the reform of family norms,” to help bring about a seminal shift in the conceptualization of transsexuality, due to which it was disaffiliated from the intersex and associated with sexual deviancy. Or, as Najmabadi puts it, “[transsexuality] shifted from the physical body onto the psychosexual” (39).

Professing Selves helps to complicate transsexuality in modern Iran at a time when in mainstream Western media Iranian transsexuals are recurrently linked with the Iranian state’s ban on homosexuality. Emphasizing the interplay of transsexuality with the categories of intersex, criminality, pathology, and homosexuality over the past century, Najmabadi shows how, despite current public and official notions of transsexuality and homosexuality, they have never been received neutrally or positively in modern Iranian history. Indeed, well in advance of the Islamic Revolution of 1979, by the 1970s, transsexuality was linked with criminality and homosexuality. Yet, there were also ruptures within certain social spheres. For instance, while “in the 1970s, ‘woman-presenting males’ (mard-i zan-numa) had carved themselves a space of relative acceptance in particular [especially entertainment] sites and professions,” after the revolution, such “males not only carried the stigma of homosexuality, but they also transgressed the newly imposed regulations of gendered dressing in public” (Najmabadi 2014, 6). Yet, this hazardous sphere under the Islamic Republic state still echoed traces of familiar notions toward gender and transgender during the Qajar dynasty and the Pahlavi eras (1925–1941; 1941–1979), particularly as manifested in the zanpush (cross-dressing male performer), bachcheh-raqqas (transvestite male adolescent dancer), and even fokoli (Westernized dandy) figures.

Dancing Boys and Westernized Dandies

Whereas in Islam, gendered tashabboh (cross-dressing or transvestism) is strongly censured or deemed haram (that which is considered sinful, and thus forbidden, by Islamic law)—depending on the jurisprudential school—transvestism, at least for presentational or strategic purposes (rather than for eroticism or self-fulfillment), abounds in Iranian history and culture (Milani 2011). Within certain temporal ghettos, but also as means to achieving otherwise culturally problematic ends, men and women have often cross-dressed. The well-known figures of zanpush men and bachchehraqqas are prominent cases in point, particularly during the Qajar dynasty and the early Pahlavi eras when, as a result of cultural restrictions regarding women’s public display, young men would often perform as female characters in religious and nonreligious plays or within motrebi (minstrel) troupes—a performance form involving music, dancing, and acting (Meftahi 2016). After Reza Shah’s ban on veiling in 1936, such impersonating dancing boys were often replaced by women (Meftahi 2016). The figure of the male performer and dancer was revived, especially in films, in the 1940s and 1950s, but as a laughingstock (Najmabadi 2014), a phenomenon not incomparable to the contemporaneous, widespread derision of the fokoli social type within Iranian literature, pop culture, and film (Naficy 2011). Standing for, among other things, excessive bodily performativity and effeminacy, fokolis were perceived as “figures of modernity who threatened the Islamic, patriarchal, secular, and heteronormative orders” (Naficy 2011, 277). In his best-known work of nonfiction, Gharbzadegi (1962; Occidentosis: A Plague from the West [1984]), the renowned Iranian writer and social critic Jalal Al-i Ahmad (1923–1969) describes his gharbzadeh figure (translated as “Westoxificated” and “Weststruck”) in this way: “The Occidentotic is effete [qerti]. He is effeminate [zan-sefat; efféminé]. He attends to his grooming a great deal. He spends much time sprucing himself up. Sometimes he even plucks his eyelashes” (1984, 96).

Given the previously established association of the dancing boy with passive homosexuality and with Westernized dandies (Najmabadi 2005), the derisive revival of the cross-dressing male performer figure had in part to do with the aforementioned heteronormative shift in the Iranian gender order, serving as an explicit example of the disciplinary function of gendered humor (Abedinifard 2016). Yet, it also reflected a historical moment in the formation of the category of transsexuality in Iran, as the country's anxieties about the unfamiliar issues of intersex and sex change were unfolding (Najmabadi 2014). An abject figure, the male dancer is to this day often associated with unmanliness, particularly gayness, in Iranian culture (Papan-Matin 2009).

In post–1979 revolution Iran, cross-dressing is officially banned, sometimes even on the screen, as seen in cases such as Davood Mir-Bagheri’s film Adam barfi (1995; Snowman), featuring a male character (Abbas, played by Akbar Abdi) who disguises himself as a woman to receive a visa to the United States, and Ja’far Panahi’s Afsayd (2006; Offside), which depicts teenage females who impersonate men to watch a match in an officially male-only space—that is, a soccer stadium. Adam barfi was censored and banned for three years before it was publicly viewed in Iran; Afsayd has never been screened publicly there. However, the Islamic Republic proved to be a paradoxical moment for trans people, who were later allowed to pursue a sex change—and even supported in that pursuit.
Maryam Khatoon (née Fereydoon) Molkara in 2010. Molkara, an Iranian woman-presenting male, secured Ayatollah Khomeini's permission to undergo a sex change in 1987. The resulting religious decree affirmed the use of sex reassignment surgery for transgendered persons in Iran even while homosexuality continued to be outlawed.

Khomeini's Fatwa and Cultural Attitudes

When mainstream Western media outlets address the topic of transsexuality in contemporary Iran, they typically position its acceptance in terms of its alleged contradiction of the Islamic Republic's strong ban on homosexuality. Far from being inconsistent, however, current Iranian official policies regarding transsexuality—which resulted from a combination of events, particularly a trans woman's valor and a powerful religious leader's leniency on the subject—are, while generative of social spaces for transgendered subjectivities, ultimately supportive of a heteronormative gender order. Several years after the 1979 Iranian Revolution, a woman-presenting male, Maryam Khatoon (née Fereydoon) Molkara (1950–2012), met with the revolutionary leader Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini (1902–1989) to obtain a religious solution to her transsexual situation. The meeting resulted in Khomeini's renowned fatwa (a legal decree issued by an Islamic religious leader) regarding sex change: “In the Name of God. Sex change is not religiously problematic [i.e., it is permissible] if authorized by reliable physicians. God willing, you will be safe and hopefully the people you mentioned will be mindful of your particular situation” (translation by Mostafa Abedinifard). Khomeini had previously issued a similar edict in his master treatise Tahrir al-wasilah (1965); yet the fact that he was the supreme leader of the Islamic Republic at the time Molkara approached him in 1987 was enough reason for his second proclamation to gain universal value later, even though it had been customized to Molkara’s situation.

Khomeini’s fatwa has certainly facilitated the road to sex reassignment surgery and opened previously nonexistent spaces for many trans people. Yet, significant changes, especially in grassroots attitudes toward trans persons within Iranian society and culture have yet to occur. Current nonlenient official policies and social taboos regarding nonheteronormative performances and subjectivities in general, as well as substantial legal and jurisprudential gaps regarding transsexuality in particular (see Saeidzadeh 2016), especially need attention. Indeed, the fatwa, as fulfilled by the medical discourse, can serve as a permit for directing abnormal bodies into a heteronormative matrix, but at worst can also be “[misused to push] sexual minorities who do not belong to the transgender group, such as homosexual or bisexual people, to undergo SRS [sex reassignment surgery]” (Alipour 2017, 101).

Autobiographical, documentary, and fictional narratives of Iranian trans persons—whether cross-dressers or pre- or post-operation transsexuals—abound with painful experiences of social ostracization and various forms of trans- and homophobic violence, whether in closed circles of peers, family, and the workplace or by strangers and the police. As evidenced in several accounts of transgender and transsexual people in Iran, such as in Tanaz Eshaghian’s documentary Transsexual in Iran (2008; also known as Be Like Others), pre- and post-operation trans people often become subject to various social control strategies, ranging from such soft options as ridicule and verbal abuse to hard options such as social exclusion, physical abuse, and violence. The transgender person’s concomitant subjection to violence and ridiculing laughter is masterfully captured in Mahsa Mohebali’s short story “Nesf sefid, nesf banafsh” (Half white, half violet; published in Asheqiyat dar pavaragi [2004; Lovemaking in the footnotes), in which the first-person narrator, while allowing the pains and misery of her transgender guest/partner to be narrated, cannot help but ironically reveal to the reader that she herself finds her/his situation to be ludicrous. As Transsexual in Iran shows, some trans people—especially those who are diagnosed as “really homosexual” through a “filtering” process (Najmabadi 2014, 15)—are forced to undergo surgery; still others who willingly accept the surgery might not necessarily lead a successful life afterward, sometimes ending in poverty, isolation, or forms of prostitution.

Hegemonic Masculinity

Despite the public regulating forces against transgendered subjectivities in contemporary Iranian culture, strong evidence exists in narratives of Iranian trans people that foregrounds the determining role of a hegemonic configuration of Iranian masculinity in policing transgenderism. Being enacted by many men and boys as brothers, fathers, husbands, friends, lovers, and relatives, this primarily honor-based masculinity tends to rigorously oppose trans people’s struggle for agency through threats, or implementation, of violence. Heeding this juncture seems crucial to filling the current gap in Iranian transgender studies of how trans people’s issues interplay with those of other gender and sexual minorities, particularly women (Connell 2015). As the culturally ascendant form of being a man in a society, hegemonic masculinity is defined by its distancing from and othering of women, as well as from other sexually or racially marginalized and subordinated masculinities (Connell 1987; Connell 2005b). Seen through the lens of hegemonic masculinity, real men avoid the abjection of feminized masculinities as much as they shun the incongruity and freakishness of masculine femininities.

As a case in point, transgenderism is linked to the forceful demands of hegemonic masculinity in Abdolreza Kahani’s film Asb heyvan-e najibi ast (2011; Absolutely tame is a horse), which features Ramin, a genderqueer character who has apparent homosexual tendencies, as revealed through his dialogues with, and emotional attachment to, another male character, Mas’ud. Because of strong cultural pressure regarding accepted norms of masculinity, Ramin’s male body has turned into a site for culturally contradictory enactments of gender. Thus, while his visibly unmanly voice and behaviors often draw other characters’ curious or teasing attention, he frequently struggles to maintain a façade of hypermasculinity by growing a mustache and engaging in risky, masculine behaviors such as smoking cigarettes and driving too fast. At one point, Mas’ud objects to Ramin’s driving, shouting, “Would you drive properly if I said ‘Ok, you’re a man!’” Later, a sympathetic female acquaintance shares with Ramin the story of a relative who had “similar demeanors” and who eventually left Iran for Denmark, thus leaving Ramin preoccupied with a similar solution to his problem.

Women’s empathy with trans people in the face of threats of hegemonic masculinity is also featured in Negar Azarbayjani’s Aynehaye rooberoo (2011; Facing mirrors), which can be read as a coming-of-age narrative of Ra’na, a traditional and religious, cisgender, married woman, whose friendship with a trans woman, Eddie (née Adineh)—who has escaped his father’s and brother’s threats—leads to a transformation in Ra’na’s attitude toward trans people, as well as toward her own heterosexual marriage. Having spent weeks with a gender-ambiguous person while her husband was in prison, Ra’na feels distressed about the consequences for her own relationship when the husband is released. The film ends on a hopeful note regarding gender politics, as Eddie’s brother eventually helps her escape from a forced marriage, a reminder of R. W. Connell’s argument that, ultimately, “men and boys are in significant ways gatekeepers for gender equality” (2005a, 1802).

Research, Activism, and the Future

Any significant, positive change in mainstream cultural attitudes toward transgenderism within Iranian society and culture requires persistent, meaningful conversations among Iranians regarding sexual minorities, including transsexuals. Given the hegemony of the official religious and medical discourses on transsexuality in Iran, engendering effective dialogues beyond those discourses, particularly carving out a space to debate homosexuality openly, seems challenging, if not impossible, especially because of official repression and censorship. Yet, efficient struggles are ongoing at least on three fronts.

Currently, state-approved organizations such as GID ([Iranian Society for Supporting Individuals with] Gender Identity Disorder) and Mahtaa (an acronym for Markaz-e Hemayat az Tarajensiyyati-ha-ye Irani [Support Center for Transgender Iranians]) are opening up unprecedented forums for Iranian transgendered people while also urging further visibility of transsexuals in Iran. While such organizations can hardly discuss the full range of LGBTQ issues openly, they cannot help but induce such topics among their members and audiences. Since the beginning of the twenty-first century, queer movements and communities have strived, even if silently (Ganji 2015), toward equality for the LGBTQ population inside Iran, although sometimes difficulties have pushed them outside the country to work more freely (Parsi 2015). Nevertheless, for the LGBTQ population within Iran, the internet and online social media have often also provided promising spaces and sources for constructive debates, consciousness-raising, collective identity construction, support seeking, and connection making with the outside world. Noteworthy organizations and virtual spaces operating outside Iran include the Iranian Queer Organization, the Iranian Lesbian and Transgender Network, and the Iranian Railroad for Queer Refugees.

In the face of persistent stigmatization of gender ambiguity in modern Iranian culture, alternative literary and cinematic representations of transsexuals are also emerging within Iran, which can incite substantial rethinking of transgenderism and transsexuality, thus also serving to complicate the official religious and medical discourses. This trend is visible in cinema. For instance, in contrast with the superficial and facetious treatment of medicalized transsexuality in Tahmineh Milani’s Atash bas (2006; Cease Fire), where a transsexual character is inserted as comic filler and disallowed any meaningful voice, Alireza Raisian’s Dorane asheghi (2015; Time to love) embeds a similar transgendered character who is treated respectfully and granted due voice. Full-length coverage of transgendered characters in films such as the aforementioned Transsexual in Iran and Aynehaye rooberoo is also increasingly emerging. Also in the works as of early 2018 were another feature film, Fatemeh Saqafi’s Biography, and a documentary codirected by the renowned Iranian actress Behnoosh Bakhtiari. Finally, serious literary interventions in cultural attitudes toward transgenderism are gradually appearing. A pioneer was Farkhondeh Aqaee’s novel Nimeh-ye gomshodeh (2000; Lost gender), whose attention to transgenderism was addressed by several short story writers afterward. A relevant novella, A (2018), was also set to be published by the acclaimed postmodernist poet and fiction writer Leila Sadeghi. The connecting thread in all these texts is a serious concern with, and thus critical intervention in, grassroots cultural attitudes toward gender and sexuality in general, and transsexuality in particular. Some also effectively link women and sexual Finally, during the second decade of the twenty-first century, academic research on the Iranian LGBTQ population, often by Iranian scholars in the diaspora, has flourished. Alongside Najmabadi’s single historiography of transgenderism in Iran, an increasing number of scholarly articles are being published in peer-reviewed journals. Heeding the importance of the effect that religious and juridical discourses have on the lives of sexual minorities, some scholars pose vital legal, jurisprudential, and exegetical questions and offer alternative interpretations and possibilities for redress (see, e.g., Alipour 2017; Saeidzadeh 2016; Naraghi 2018). As implied by such research, just as Khomeini’s fatwa remains unconventional within Islamic jurisprudence, it would be unhelpful to hold Islam accountable for the current hegemonic attitude toward sexual minorities in Iran. Thus, revisionist readings of Islam and the Qur’an with regard to the rights of women and LGBTQ individuals, as initiated by some Iranian Muslim scholars associated with “religious intellectualism,” can be especially rewarding. The Iranian Shi’ite philosopher and religious studies scholar Arash Naraghi (2018), for instance, explores both scientific and religious sources, including the Qur’an (particularly the Qur’anic story of Lot) and the Shi’ite fiqh (tradition of Islamic jurisprudence) to argue that homosexuality is not unnatural or incompatible with Shi’a Islam.

As invisible as they have often been within Iran, Iranian queer movements might eventually bring unique insights to Iranian feminist and women’s rights activism. Given the oft-trodden path toward Iranian democracy, what one queer activist imagined as the perspective of the Jonbesh-e sabz (Green Movement) might as well provide an effective prospect for gender and sexuality activism in Iran: “a ‘united chain’ of the oppressed, bringing together women, LGBTQs, workers and students against social oppression” (Ganji 2015, 112). (A nonviolent civil rights movement, the Iranian Green Movement refers to a series of organized mass protests by many Iranians after the contested 2009 presidential election in Iran, which began with the motto “Where is my vote?” and gradually expanded into further quests for democratic rights. The word green contained ritual and religious connotations only.) While this might look like too ideal an aim to begin with, a starting place for feminist scholars and women’s rights activists is a serious attempt to welcome queer studies and activism. As far as feminist historiography is concerned, Najmabadi argues that it genuinely needs to heed sexual orientation. To articulate this necessity, she draws attention to “historical amnesia” about the figure of amrad in modern Iranian culture, which began with a shift in Iranians’ “aesthetic sensibilities” toward women’s beauty. While “Qajar women sported a thin mustache, or more accurately a soft down, as a sign of beauty” (Najmabadi 2005, 233), by the end of the Qajar era this sign of women’s beauty had turned into a “troubling sign of undesirability” (233) and one of “masculine ugliness” (235). Prior to that in the Qajar period, however, “the single most important visual marker of manhood ... was not a mustache but a full beard” (233). The woman’s soft down, more than anything else, was a reminder of an amrad’s khatt (the first trace of a mustache on an amrad’s face), which modern Iranians have long forgotten. The erasure of homoeroticism, Najmabadi maintains, “became a contingent birthmark of the Iranian women’s movement for parity at the end of the nineteenth century” (235). Ever since, feminist critiques of Iranian modernity have been actively, though inadvertently, involved in the production of heterosexuality and the disavowal of homoerotism. Given that today, more than feminism itself, particular kinds of it such as lesbian feminism, as well as homoeroticism and same-sex sexuality, are under attack inside Iran, the essential task of feminist historiography of Iranian modernity, Najmabadi concludes, is to “re-member” the above eroded figures of the past and “to reenvisage affinities with male homosexuality and same-sex affectivity” (243). This is the case not least because, as she warns, “it would be tragic if the opening of a publicly acceptable cultural and political space for feminism in Iran is officiated by a national consensus against queer subjectivities” (243).

Developing alliances between Iranian feminism and queer studies can also be justified because, as noted earlier, women’s and queer subjectivities’ marginalization within current Iranian society and culture appears to be strongly linked to the undeniable cultural and political power of a heterosexual, hegemonic masculinity. Therefore, getting involved in studies that aim to critique and challenge the subordinating control and common harms of this prevailing masculinity—for both women and queer subjects—would be an equally essential task for Iranian gender studies, which could subsequently also provide promising grounds for shared activism (Abedinifard 2015).

SEE ALSO Masculinity in Iranian Cinema; Sex Reassignment Surgery in Iran; Shifting Sexual Norms in Nineteenth-Century Iran; Transgender Identity in Iranian Cinema

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Babayan, Kathryn. “‘In Spirit We Ate Each Other’s Sorrow’: Female Companionship in Seventeenth-Century Safavi Iran.” In Islamicate Sexualities: Translations across Temporal Geographies of Desire, edited by Kathryn Babayan and Afsaneh Najmabadi, 239–274. Cambridge, MA: Center for Middle Eastern Studies of Harvard University, 2008.

Najmabadi, Afsaneh. Women with Mustaches and Men without Beards: Gender and Sexual Transvestites/Transsexuals

RAINER HERRN
Lecturer and Researcher, Institute for the History of Medicine and Ethics in Medicine, Berlin University Hospital Charité, Germany
Associate, Magnus Hirschfeld Society, Germany

MICHAEL THOMAS TAYLOR
Independent scholar
Berlin, Germany

The Euro-American development of labels for those who choose to dress in the clothing of the opposite gender and those who feel they are in the wrong body for their gender.

Late nineteenth-century Germany witnessed both the birth of the organized self-articulation of sexual minorities (who were inspired by activists such as Karl Heinrich Ulrichs [1825–1895] and Magnus Hirschfeld [1868–1935]) and the growing influence of the field of psychiatric sexual pathology, which set the terms of public discourse about sexual difference. In a dialogue between sexual researchers and the subjects they researched, sexual categories were developed for those who did not conform to heteronormative gender roles and whose behavior was considered pathological. In 1870 the German psychiatrist Carl Westphal (1833–1890) developed the category of “contrary sexual feeling,” which encompassed same-sex desire, cross-dressing, and the wish to be considered a member of the opposite sex. The Austro-German psychiatrist Richard von Krafft-Ebing (1840–1902), author of the book Psychopathia sexualis (1886; Sexual psychopathy), labeled this desire metamorphosis sexualis paranoica, or a delusional desire to transform one’s gender. Although the list of individuals who have temporarily or permanently lived in the role of the other gender is long, it was only in 1910 that Hirschfeld coined the word transvestites to describe these people in order to distinguish them from homosexuals. Given prevailing stigmas, male transvestites did not want to be categorized as homosexual, and homosexual men did not want to be considered transvestites.

International Influence of German Theorists

International networks of German émigré cross-dressers helped to internationalize these categories and identities. For example, in 1913, the German-trained physician Bernard S. Talmey (1862–1926) helped introduce American sexology to the concept of transvestitism after having met fellow German immigrant and cross-dresser Otto Spengler in New York, and in 1914 the British sexologist Havelock Ellis (1859–1939) coined the term Sexoästhetische Inversion or Deonism to describe British cross-dressers. Recognition of this identity was, however, particularly advanced in Germany. In 1909 Hirschfeld negotiated with Berlin’s chief of police (Polizeipräsident) to institute the use of medical certificates for transvestites, a practice that protected individuals from arrest under public nuisance laws and that was later adopted across Germany. After 1920, individuals were able to legally change their given names. Transvestite bars, organizations, and periodicals flourished up until the beginning of the Nazi seizure of power in 1933.

Those labeled “transvestites” included not only women and men who were interested in wearing the clothing of the other sex but also those who felt themselves to entirely belong to that sex, a desire that Harry Benjamin (1885–1986), a German-American endocrinologist and sexologist and Hirschfeld disciple, classified using the now controversial (i.e., entirely medicalized) term transsexual. Until that point, Hirschfeld had categorized these individuals as “extreme” or “total transvestites.” (Hirschfeld had used the term psychological transsexualism [seelischer Transsexualismus] earlier in 1923, but with a broader meaning.) In using these categories, Hirschfeld described individuals whose desire to take on the social role of the other gender was not necessarily intertwined with discomfort about their bodies or a wish for physical transformation. But developments in the natural and social sciences along with the growth of various social reform movements around 1900 led to a rehabilitation, new definition, and glorification of the natural body, physical beauty, and asexual nudity. Collectively known as Lebensreform (life reform), these movements praised the virtues of harmonizing “healthy” nature with body and soul. Viewing the body as an expression of the soul, reformers believed that it needed to be modeled and disciplined to conform to the ideals of masculinity and femininity. These arguments likely motivated those who wanted to belong to the other gender to start seeking physical transformation. The necessary surgical techniques were simultaneously being developed, because the trend of aesthetic normalization of bodily beauty had encouraged the development of cosmetic surgery, which promised to correct physical deficits. However, this contextualization can provide only general background; it cannot convey the psychological suffering that motivated individuals to seek and undergo irreversible transformation of their bodies through invasive surgical interventions such as castration, amputation, and transplantation.
Transvestite Rudolf Richter in Male and Female Attire. Born in Bohemia in present-day Germany in 1892, Rudolf Richter, known as Dorchen, considered themselves a transvestite and was recognized by others under this historical term. Motivated by the Steinach Film depicting experimental sex change operations on animals (1922), Dorchen sought out Magnus Hirschfeld’s Institut für Sexualwissenschaft and requested a surgical transformation of their genitals. Dorchen was then castrated in 1923, followed by an amputation of the penis in 1929, and the formation of a vagina at the beginning of 1931 in Berlin.

Development of Gender Transformation Surgeries

In a 1914 publication, Ellis was the first to divide individuals into those who wanted to wear the clothing of the other sex and those who felt they belonged to another sex. In 1916 German sexologist Max Marcuse (1877–1963) described for the first time individuals who hoped for complete physical transformation. But surgical realization was prevented by doctors’ ethical concerns. The first surgical bodily transformations did not necessarily involve the surgical creation of the genitals of the other sex. These individuals sought to remove the physical signs of the gender they rejected. For women this meant mastectomy, ovariectomy, and hysterectomy—operations that were performed by the Berlin-based surgeon Richard Mühsam (1872–1938) as early as 1912. Men sought castration, which some individuals performed on themselves. Those seeking hormonal conformity with the desired sex started seeking implantation of gonadal tissue, a technique inspired by the Austrian physiologist Eugen Steinach’s (1861–1944) experiments with the transplantation of gonads from castrated laboratory animals starting in 1910. Press reports and a popular film depicting Steinach’s technique (1922) had prompted some “transvestites” to demand these procedures. Testicle tissue was transplanted into those seeking masculinization, and those seeking feminization were prescribed ovarian extracts. By 1920 German surgeons were conducting transplantations of ovaries and testicles. After World War I (1914–1918), castrations that were medically indicated by the threat of suicide were undertaken as “emergency surgery” at the Institut für Sexualwissenschaft (Institute for Sexual Science) in Berlin. In 1920 the first surgical creation of a vagina for the purposes of sexual transition from male to female was carried out; rather than amputating the penis, surgeons sewed it under the intestines. Techniques to create a vagina had been developed around the turn of the century to treat cancer and were employed by the surgeon Erwin Gohrbandt (1890–1965) in 1930 and by Kurt Warnekros (1882–1949) in Dresden. There is further evidence that the first penectomies were carried out in the late 1920s. Surgical techniques to build breasts deployed vacuum pumps and injections of paraffin, while beards were removed with epilation and X-rays.

Between 1910 and 1930, in other words, various surgical techniques that had been developed for other purposes were put to use in gender transformation surgeries, and there was no inevitability to the choice of techniques; many individuals sought only castration. The key criteria for access to surgery was the individual’s urgently articulated desires and needs—the suffering of the person—along with the medical expertise and understanding of the doctors. These incrementally executed gender transformations were the first tentative searches for a practical medical solution to an entirely new but pressing problem, whose consequences were impossible to measure.

United States: Medicalization, Political Movements, Gender Identity

With little attention to this earlier German history, a new but once again medically focused interest in the phenomenon arose in the United States in the 1940s and 1950s. In a lecture delivered at the symposium of the Association for the Advancement of Psychotherapy on 18 December 1953, Benjamin claimed to have developed the concept of transsexuality, even though David O. Cauldwell (1897–1959) had already used the term in its present-day meaning in 1949. Benjamin published the first monograph on the subject of transsexuality in 1964 and a more widely, popularly received book, The Transsexual Phenomenon, in 1966. Continuing practices that characterized the work of Hirschfeld, whom Benjamin knew and had visited in Germany before the plundering of Hirschfeld's Institut für Sexualwissenschaft in May 1933, Benjamin based his account on his interviews with individuals who belonged to a small but tight-knit social network across the United States and abroad. Indeed, in the 1920s, Benjamin’s practice as an endocrinologist in New York put him into contact with the aforementioned Spengler, who successfully persuaded Benjamin to administer hormone treatments. Like many individuals who contacted Hirschfeld, Benjamin’s patients often sought him out, advocated for themselves, and exerted significant influence over the shape of his theories. The famous American sexologist Alfred Kinsey (1894–1956) later turned to Benjamin as an expert and point of entry for meeting these individuals and gathering materials for his archive, and Kinsey's work in turn expanded Benjamin's engagement with the community.
Before this popular medicalization in the 1960s, representations of “transsexualism” in the United States (to use Benjamin’s term) were dominated by sensationalistic journalism. Yet even this publicity had a profound effect on gender-nonconforming individuals. Many of the persons who sought out Benjamin’s help had been inspired by the story of the former soldier and Danish American Christine Jorgensen (1926–1989), who in 1952 became the second transgender individual, after Lili Elbe (1882–1931), to experience intense media coverage. Jorgensen’s autobiography was published in 1967 and was turned into a film in 1970. Like the publications and media attention about Elbe, Jorgensen’s biography contributed to identity formation within the trans movement. The first political movements for gender-nonconforming individuals were, however, quickly eclipsed by movements for women’s rights and gay rights that were often openly hostile to transgender identities. As in Germany before the war, the role and visibility of gender-nonconforming individuals within political and social movements in the United States was often erased or subsumed into narratives of other identity categories— notably, for example, in the role that Marsha P. Johnson (1945–1992) and Sylvia Rivera (1951–2002) played in the Stonewall riots of 1969. Nevertheless, both private and openly political groups continued to organize: Virginia Prince (1912–2009) began publishing the magazine Transvestia in 1960; the International Imperial Court System was founded in 1965 in San Francisco (eventually growing into a network of local nonprofits that raise money for charitable causes through gala state dinners, which gave cross-dressing and transgender communities important visibility and a forum for social and political activism); and clubs or retreats for cross-dressers offered places of refuge, community, and self-expression. Reed Erickson (1917–1992), a wealthy heir and businessman who transitioned to male in the 1960s, quietly but significantly supported activism, research, and treatment of “transsexualism” through the Erickson Educational Foundation, which was founded in 1964.

Among the recipients of this support was Benjamin, who used it to organize a series of symposia on gender identity beginning in 1969 that proved influential in changes to diagnostic categories and treatment paradigms beginning in the 1980s. Benjamin’s work reflected a wider wave of medicalization in the 1960s that also saw the founding of gender identity clinics in the United States— first, in 1965, at Johns Hopkins University and then at many other universities and hospitals, as many as forty within ten years. Academic and medical interest in gender identity increased rapidly, producing theories about gender identity formation that were themselves controversial; the academics and scientists also displayed open animus toward gender-nonconforming identities, and this was particularly true of John Money (1921–2006), a psychologist and sexologist associated with the Hopkins clinic. This visibility sparked a popular and professional backlash in the 1970s that led, most famously, to the closing of the Johns Hopkins clinic in 1979. While the third edition of the psychiatric Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders (1980) was the first to appear without “homosexuality” as a diagnosis, it also marked the introduction of “transsexualism” as distinct from “transvestic fetishism (cross-dressing for purposes of sexual excitement)" (Rudacille 2005, 195). Later editions of the DSM evince a shift in perspective away from a desire to change sex toward cross-gender identification, distress at perceived gender, and impairment in functioning.

Standards of Care

The year 1979 also marked the founding of the Harry Benjamin International Gender Dysphoria Association, which published the so-called Benjamin Standards of Care. Revised twice before Benjamin’s death in 1986, and four times thereafter, these standards established a process of treatment for transitioning from one gender to the other. Originally intended as a “consensus opinion on transsexual treatment by medical and psychological experts,” the seventh edition of the guidelines were issued in 2011 with a new name, Standards of Care for the Health of Transsexual, Transgender, and Gender Nonconforming People and under the auspices of the similarly renamed World Professional Association for Transgender Health. Motivated by desire to relieve psychological distress or suffering, the standards outlined what they considered to be a progression of treatment requiring psychosocial support and a period of living in the new gender as necessary first steps for accessing physical interventions such as hormone therapy or surgical procedures; they also placed medical professionals in the position of gatekeepers authorizing each step of the process. Both these aspects of the standards have provoked criticism. The evolution of the standards in the United States nevertheless also reflects the wave of activism beginning in the 1990s that effected a decisive shift away from the medical category of “transsexual” toward concepts of transgender identity, as well as away from medical models of relieving distress toward broader models that actively affirm a range of individual gender identities.

SEE ALSO Chevalier d’Éon or Mademoiselle Beaumont (1728–1810); Cross-Dressing in the West; Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders (DSM); Elbe, Lili (1882–1931); Erauso, Catalina de (1592–1650); Institut für Sexualwissenschaft; Psychopathia Sexualis (1886; Richard von Krafft-Ebing); Trans Issues in Africa; Transgender Identity in Iranian Cinema; Transgendered Subjectivities in Contemporary Iran; Travesti and Trans Activism in Latin America and the Caribbean

BIBLIOGRAPHY

The Middle East has been associated historically with male homosexuality by scores of Western travelers, historians, writers, and artists for well over 400 years (Boone 2015). Discourses across Middle Eastern and Western cultures have evolved since Elizabethan commerce opened the Mediterranean world, particularly the Ottoman and Levantine area, to trade during the sixteenth century. It was then that the West castigated the Middle East as a hotbed of sexual and sinful perversities that could contaminate the virtuous Europeans (Boone 2015). And as fundamentalist cultures have been established in many areas in the Middle East, the same claim is made about the West—what was once the puritanical West is now a hotbed of sexual perversions and immorality that might contaminate Middle Eastern cultures. Thus, there is a need to ward off that same threat that is now coming from the West rather than vice versa (Boone 2015). Western interest in homosexual men in the Middle East has changed over time and taken the shape of an industry that controls access to the “Gay Orient.” The tourism industry sells the Western traveler an image of the homosexual Middle Eastern man that reflects Anglo-European fantasies of sexual taboo. This image is both a rhetorical strategy and a common by-product of Orientalist writing (Boone 2015).

The Tourism Industry's Manufactured Image of the Middle East

Gay tourism has become a significant contributor to the income of the tourism industry since the late twentieth century. The image of the homosexual Arab that is manufactured and sold to the Western gay traveler today is reliant on the postcolonial legacy, which, in itself, is primarily a reaction to, and analysis of, the global colonial legacy. This image is consistent with the image presented during the nineteenth century in Gustave Flaubert’s writings, which is addressed and analyzed in Edward Said’s Orientalism (1978). It consistently establishes the Middle East as a setting of “sexual promise [and] untiring sensuality” and the Arab man as a dominating and hypersexualized figure (Macfie 2009, 109). Striking examples of this eroticization continue to appear in modern travel literature, on the shelves of travel agencies, in electronic brochures, and on Middle Eastern gay travel websites. These depictions of the Arab man as a masculine yet sexualized figure sell the idea of an exotic land, and it becomes apparent that most representations rely on an idealized exoticism wherein the tourist and the indigenous population are constructed as oppositional.

Gay trips to the Arab world, promoted using such names as the “Bear Arabia Summer Trip” and “Nyle in Style,” promise the traveler visits to historical and cultural sites as well as contact with Arab men, and ensure the tourist will have a safe experience with a group of friendly, likeminded gay individuals. Homosexuality and sexual desire are employed as an incentive for the Western tourist to embark on an experience that he once thought was out of reach: the gay Arab world. Since around 2010, there has been a growing demand for conspicuous gay consumption in the Middle East, with Beirut as the focus (McCormick 2011, 72). Entrepreneurs capitalizing on this demand have created an organized gay tourism as an option for Western travelers to gain access to the gay scenes in certain Arab countries. These travelers, in turn, often write about their unique experiences.

Gay travel writing on the Middle East is mostly produced by Western white men who have constructed an image and concept of the Arab world for Westerners who read about it in brochures and gay travelogues (Pratt 1992). There is some progress in the production of gay travel writing on Arab sexuality by Arab authors. Such writings distract readers from trends in international LGBT publishing that provide a platform to Western narrators giving accounts of their sexual encounters in the “lands of Islam” (Mack 2014, 326; also see Bowles 1963; Schmitt and Sofer 1992; Luongo 2007). Mary Pratt, in her book Imperial Eyes: Travel Writing and Transculturation, speaks of “the contact zone” as a result of such tourism, which creates social spaces where “disparate cultures meet, clash and grapple with each other, often in highly asymmetrical relations of domination and subordination” (1992, 4). The physical spaces where individuals separated by geography encounter one another involve relations of radical inequality, oppression, and conflict between the Western traveler and the Arab native. One of the common factors among travel writings on the Arab world is the Western tourist’s construction of himself in his writing as a vulnerable individual without a sense of authority in the Arab country. These “anti-conquest writings” share a strategy of portraying Western tourists as men seeking to secure their innocence while, at the same time, asserting European hegemony (Pratt 1992). This innocent traveler, however, plays a significant role in the production of knowledge and the perpetuation of stereotypes of the oversexualized, savage, male Arab queer.

Gay Tourism as a Reflection of Colonialist and Orientalist Desires

The booming gay tourism industry in the Arab world is often framed as mere reinforcement of colonialist and Orientalist desires, where "the polymorphous perversion" (Freud 1953–1974, 7:234) of the Arab queer within Orientalist discourse also provides the Western traveler with the opportunity to "free himself" from the rules and restrictions of his civilized society by gaining access to the primitive Orient (Anderson 2016). Therefore, the Western traveler projects his sexual desires and "polymorphous perversity" into the Arab queer and must, then, leave "civilization" (as this step is part of the fantasy of the savage sex) and go to a faraway place seeking to fulfill his sexual desires and fantasies, positioning himself as the vulnerable individual and the Arab man as the oversexualized savage queer. The position of certain countries, such as Lebanon, as the most liberal of the Arabic-speaking countries enables them to take part in selling this image to the Western traveler in exchange for profit generated from gay tourism.

Gay tourism in the Arab world is angled at times toward "social, political and economic inequalities with very deep roots in ... colonialism" (Murray 2007, 50). The 2009 Lebanese tour package called "Bear Arabia," for instance, intentionally misemploys Arabia not as a reference to Arabian Gulf countries, since Lebanon is in the Levant, but to evoke an image of the Arab world that the Western person might have seen in Hollywood films (see Shaheen 2009)—a mystical and dangerous place that further reinforces the image of a larger exotic Middle East. The tourists' lack of sustained depth in their encounters with Arab men and their "fantasies of sexual fluidity of preidentity, precapitalist, premodern times conjoin nicely with the tourist agenda" (Puar 2007, 113).

It is important to point out that, with a few exceptions, most gay travel writings on the Arab world are produced by men. However, despite gay tourism in the Middle East being targeted and defined by male homosexual relations, there seems to be a significant number of Western lesbian tourists visiting Arab countries. However, these data are insufficiently theorized.

Representations of Gay Travel in Arab Cities

Many Arab cities have been investing in efforts to attract consumers of diverse sexual orientations and marketing themselves as among the most "tolerant" cities in the world (Jordan 2012, 10). Such initiatives include providing gay tourism, establishing gay bars and pubs, and displaying the rainbow flag around the city, as well as providing legal rights and protections for LGBT individuals and same-sex marriage and civil unions. However, this "progress" must be questioned, for the tolerance discourse toward a certain people validates the categorization of and discrimination against another (see Butler 2008; Puar 2007; Ritchie 2010). This tolerance is established around sexuality and sexual dissidents, which enables homosexuality to be both a way to show a nation's modernity and progress and a means to distinguish the Arab nations that have managed to embody Western values from those who have not. Calls for and claims of homosexual liberation have been relocated from the sidelines of the counterculture to the center of many countries' national discourses and have become a principal constituent in the fashioning of these nations as progressive and human-rights oriented. The homonormativity employed here “anesthetizes queer communities into passively accepting alternative forms of inequality in return for domestic privacy and the freedom to consume” (Manalansan 2005, 142). Islamophobic rhetoric is employed to attain credibility and normalize “gay and lesbian human rights, which produce ... gay-friendly and not-gay-friendly nations” (Puar 2007, xiv). This does not indicate progress in gender and sexuality politics but a regression in racial politics (Haritaworn, Tauqir, and Erdem 2008).

In successfully marketing a conservative Arab country as a gay-friendly tourist destination, racist and Islamophobic rhetoric are employed to establish credibility. Gayfriendly cities are thus placed in contrast with other Muslim Middle Eastern cities and countries where homosexuality is illegal and whose people are hostile toward nontraditional sexualities (Fassihi 2007). As a result, the few travel agents working in the Middle Eastern gay tourism industry can control the market (e.g., in 2007 the US-based International Gay and Lesbian Travel Association named Bertho Makso, a Lebanese travel-services promoter, its sole representative in the Arab Middle East) and only a handful of Arab cities serve as safe gay travel destinations in the Arab world (Fassihi 2007; McCormick 2011).

Gay-Friendly Lebanon In 2007 the United Nations World Tourism Organization reported that tourism in the Middle East, a region highly susceptible to political turbulence, was growing at an average yearly rate of 10.6 percent (UNWTO 2007). Lebanon, and specifically its capital, Beirut, are often portrayed by popular Western newspapers and magazines as a top tourist destination and as the most gay-friendly Arab city. Lebanese homosexual male bodies are construed as oversexualized sites of polymorphous perversity, as discussed previously, but also as yardsticks of civilization and modernity. In Lebanon, queerness is conflated with modernity, in which Lebanon and its neighboring country Israel compete, a competition that includes attracting the most Western gay tourists (McCormick 2011; Anderson 2016). For instance, Lebanese travel agencies organize tourist packages that market masculine Lebanese men and promise beautiful sites, nightlife outings, and bathhouse visits (McCormick 2011). Publicity is accomplished via the internet, with many nationalities targeted: French, American, British, Scottish, Australian, Spanish, Italian, Cypriot, Venezuelan, Jordanian, Saudi, Qatari, Norwegian, Swedish, and Canadian. This usage of gay Lebanese bodies to promote Lebanon as an Orientalist gay paradise is almost always countered by Israeli gay tourism promotions, in which the discourse combines pinkwashing (positioning Israel as a progressive democratic state that is tolerant of LGBT rights, adopting Western liberal queer discourses, and shaming Arab states for their oppressive behaviors toward their LGBT communities), far-right Israeli politics, and gay freedom in Israel. Such promotions describe Israel as a more gay-friendly country than its neighbor and remind Western tourists that Israel remains the only country in the Middle East that protects gay rights (Anderson 2016).
Gay tourism in Lebanon is romanticized in gay travelogues and portrayed as countering the political, religious, and social barriers that keep nations at war, with gay connections between tourists and gay natives capable of overcoming boundaries and stereotypes (Luongo 2007). Beirut’s Annual Arab Tourism and Transportation Fair promotes this image of gay tourism as a bridge between nations and a way to overcome war and prejudice. And while gay tourism is not promoted in a provocative manner, it is nonetheless emphasized for its profit potential (Fassihi 2007). Many argue that this acceptance of gay tourism and the lucrative gay scene in Lebanon by the government and mainstream society is strongly linked to the money that Western gay tourists bring into the country (McCormick 2011). And many LGBT and human rights activists in Beirut note that the reason the government is not suppressing the gay spaces that have arisen due to gay tourism is because of the large amounts of money at stake on the national level, which ultimately forms the driving force of the economy (McCormick 2011).

Jordan, Egypt, and the United Arab Emirates Other select Arab cities and countries, such as Jordan, Dubai, and Cairo, are also portrayed as modern gay paradises for the Western traveler. Jordan is depicted as an Americanized version of an Arab country; with its Islamic style and architecture and international brands, stores, and restaurants, Jordan is promoted as the perfect merging of otherwise opposing worlds (Luongo 2007). To the Western outsider, Jordan’s Queen Rania represents the values of Jordan, which are shared with the United States (Macleod 2007). She is often seen on Western television, unveiled and dressed in stylish Western clothing, speaking about women’s rights in the Arab world. Although many Westerners mistake the Jordanian queen as the country’s leader, gay travelogues make it clear that once the traveler enters the country, her image is replaced with that of her husband, King Abdullah II (Luongo 2007). And while Amman, Jordan’s capital, is promoted as progressive and tolerant of alternative sexualities, the frequent crackdowns on gay spaces call this image into question (CRS 2009). However, the country’s international character and its position as a base for America’s involvement in the Middle East and especially Iraq indicate that most interactions between locals and gay foreigners take place through this military channel (Luongo 2007).

Gay travel in Cairo and Dubai is framed as “terrifying and thrilling,” depending on location, that is, where the tourist is staying (whether in a big city like Cairo or in the countryside) and the neighborhoods and places the tourist frequents in the capital cities themselves (Senzee 2015). In the case of Egypt, the government launched more frequent crackdowns on public gay gatherings after Mohamed Morsi’s rise to power in 2012, and gay people in Egypt are reportedly facing harassment and arrest (Gerstler-Holton 2012). Both Egypt and the United Arab Emirates are infamous for the considerable effort their police invest in seeking out same-sex events and arresting participants for indecent behavior (Carreiro 2018). The thrilling aspect of the gay tourism experience, however, concerns gaining access to the secret network of the large local gay communities in both countries. In Cairo, for instance, gay social networks and hookup apps, which have thousands of Egyptian members and users, facilitate connections between gay individuals (Gerstler-Holton 2012). Dubai, which has been dubbed “the landscape of desire” (Bell and Valentine 1995), is a city advertised for its limited access; even European and American citizens are only granted a one-month tourist visa. Gay tourism websites promote this exclusive city’s underground gay scene as a “gyrating sea of bulging biceps and tank tops” (Richardson and Ewart 2016).

The Views of Locals, Governments, and LGBT Groups These cities, seen as the most gay-friendly spaces in the Arab world, have managed to support an intricate system akin to turning a blind eye to homosexual tourism and activities. This does not create an ideal life for homosexual Arabs in these countries, as acceptance of gay tourism among governments and locals is not so much acceptance of gay identities or behaviors as acceptance of gay travelers’ money. However, gay tourism does provide an outlet and a space to address homosexuality and debate it in relation to these countries’ laws. Aside from the money made from gay tourists, these governments’ acceptance of gay tourism and their utilization of gay presence as confirmation of their countries’ progressiveness are essential factors in defining them as modern, liberal civil societies (McCormick 2011).

The gravity of emergent tourist narratives and the way they shape larger conceptions of certain Arab countries have produced international support and interest in gay tourism to the Middle East, as well as objection and condescension within LGBT communities in these countries (Healy 2009). In Lebanon, for instance, LGBT organizations, such as Helem, have often spoken out against travel writing and articles that categorize Beirut as a mere tourist stop for travelers wealthy enough to frequent commercialized locations. LGBT organizations have also argued against strengthening the city’s tourist industry by positioning its narrative within globalized conceptions of sexual identity and orientation through the use of such terms as liberated, out, and gay (McCormick 2011).

Gay Tourism and Issues of Social Justice

Gay Arab individuals have been politicized, romanticized, stigmatized, and widely assumed by many to conflict with one another. Homosexual Arabs embody contradictions: being Arab and queer; being a lesbian and wearing a hijab; living between worlds and not belonging anywhere. Yet scholars and LGBT activists and organizations in Arab countries have presented important arguments concerning gay tourism in the Middle East that must be addressed and taken into consideration, as they will ultimately play a major role in shaping the future of the region’s gay communities.

Many in the Middle East, for instance, consider gay tourism as “selling out” their countries and communities for money (McCormick 2011). The intersecting influences of national and transnational forms of capitalism have created a “global queering” (Jackson 2009, 387) that has forever altered the perception of Arab homosexuality. Gay Arab tourism has also commodified notions of Arab male beauty and gender norms. Displays of sexuality have become linked closely to the market, and consumption has reached new heights (McCormick 2011). As such, the pressure to tolerate and accept gay tourism, and ultimately homosexuality, in the Middle East is tied to economic profit and has the potential to incite discourse or dampen ideological appeals against homosexuality. It is also unclear whether the money from the gay tourism market can bring LGBT rights to these regions, for such a development could be regarded as a provocation and as another attempt by Western countries and Western nongovernmental organizations to force the initiation of discussions on gay rights (Massad 2002).

Gay tourism can do little to advance sexual rights in the Middle East, for the economy privileges gay individuals in transit and not gay locals. On many occasions, Arab LGBT rights organizations have questioned the relation of gay tourism to inequality and social justice (Makarem 2011). The discourse surrounding Beirut, Amman, Dubai, and similar cities as being gay-friendly is only relevant and true to the tourist, those who hold another nationality or more particularly those who hold a Western nationality, and wealthy individuals who use money as an incentive to be left alone (McCormick 2011). This image of select Arab cities and countries as gay utopias also marginalizes and silences the many gay Arab men who are not permitted a liberal environment and tolerance of homosexual activities in their own countries.

One must also question the assumption that the gay tourism industry and international business associations in the Middle East can assist the local gay communities and individuals, for the industry’s interests revolve around business connections as opposed to local communities (Makarem 2011). This assumption stems from the concept of visibility, in this case brought on by the tourism industry, as positive and necessary. Dominant Western LGBT discourses describe countries that do not provide their mainstream LGBT communities with public visibility as repressive, “nonmodern,” and in need of Western intervention (Long 2005). Visibility is also assumed to be a goal for gay tourism in the Middle East, along with the need for Arab LGBT communities to address their countries’ lack of gay rights and claim validation in the region. The ways in which money made from gay tourism has become a method to demand rights versus obscuring concerns of inequality must thus be counterbalanced. This can be achieved by addressing tourism beyond a mere definition of avariciousness (McCormick 2011).

SEE ALSO Coming-Out/Coming-In Discourses in the Middle East; Gay European Tourism Association; The Gay International and Mideast LGBTQI Organizations; Orientalism in Gay Pornography about the Middle East; Pinkwashing; Resorts; Sex Tourism in Asia; Sex Tourism in Latin America and the Caribbean; Sex Tourism in the Middle East; Sex Work in Asia; Sex Work/Sex Tourism/Sex Trafficking in Africa

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Healy, Patrick. “Beirut, the Provincetown of the Middle East.” New York Times, 2 August

Indigenous peoples across the Americas have long understood gender to be multiple and mutable. West African and South Asian cultures brought to Latin America and the Caribbean during the slave trade and colonial period also included gender identities outside the binary logic of the colonial/modern gender system. Despite the hegemony of sexual and gender dimorphism that is central to—and mutually constitutive of—heternormativity, coloniality, and modernity in Latin America and the Caribbean today, traces of precolonial gender complexity persist, often alongside more “modern” articulations of gender identity. The greatest continuity with precolonial, colonial, and slave-era Latin American and Caribbean gender complexity appears in indigenous communities with third- and fourth-gender positions, such as the Zapotec and the Maya, and through Afro-Caribbean religions that often overlap with LGBTQI communities, as for example in Haiti where Vodou houngan and mambo (priests and priestesses) welcome the travesti and trans persons who are often part of their communities. Like their West African predecessors, many Afro-Caribbean lwas (spirits) and beings are gender diverse: the rainbow god Dambala is both female and male, and both male and female devotees of Ezili (or Erzuli) are feminine. Afro-Caribbean religions such as Condomblé, Vodou, Santeria, and Obeah feature shifting, porous, and fluid genders and gender identifications in their religious ceremonies, as well as throughout the lives of religious persons.

The historical realities of trans existence and experiences in Latin America and the Caribbean, especially in the colonial period, are complicated by the more modern-day focus on trans as carnivalesque transvestism. Latin American and Caribbean gender complexity has been most visible and perhaps best documented since the onset of the nineteenth century in Carnival, predominantly through transvestite mas (masquerades or “characters” performed in the Carnival celebrations every year), such as the Baby Doll, Dame Lorraine, Pisse-en-lit, Mother Sally, Roba la Gallina, and Jamette. These figures represent the “symbolic form [that] dominates the symbolism of the festival,” as the scholar Richard G. Parker writes (2009, 162). As Rosamond S. King (2014) notes, however, because the socially sanctioned space it provides for transvestism is spatiotemporally delineated, Carnival—especially from the nineteenth century to the present—simultaneously reinforces the binary gender system its performance nonetheless unsettles. As it has become ever more commercial and touristic in the twenty-first century, Carnival (throughout Latin America and the Caribbean) has also increasingly served as a space for public manifestations of both local and internationalized travesti, trans, and LGBTQI activism.

Definitions and Terms

These overlaps render the grouping of persons, and the terms used to identify those groupings, deeply fraught. Initialisms such as LGBTQI often lump together gender-complex people and practices with lesbian, gay, bisexual, and queer persons. This is not always an easy or a good fit. As Yolanda Martínez-San Miguel and Sara Tobias point out, the “understandings of ‘homo, hetero, and bi’ that underpin LGB identities ‘are all predicated on congruent conceptions of what it means to be a woman or a man,’” whereas “trans activists challenge the necessity for trans people to define themselves against hetero/homo norms” (2016a, 238). Yet grouping people under various versions of LGBTQI also has benefits, both facilitating coalitional activism in the difficult political and social climates that trans and LGBTQI individuals face and serving to include and acknowledge the many overlaps and intersections between gender complexity and sexual diversity. The term trans (which includes self-defined transsexual, transgender, and other nonbinary gendered identities) provides a more delineated umbrella category for gender-complex persons. Although its origin in Euro-American terminology and activism also relates it to the colonial and neocolonial traditions that impose Euro-American conceptions of gender and “progress,” activists use it for the international intelligibility and the openness to broad-based activism it offers as an umbrella term.
A wealth of regional and local terms abound, many of which appropriate and reconfigure colonial languages for local uses. Throughout the Spanish- and Portuguese-speaking areas of the Caribbean and Latin America, travesti refers both to superficial practices of cross-dressing—impermanent gender change undertaken for work performance and personal fulfillment—and to persons who identify as travesti, understanding travestura (transvestism) as a regular or integral part of their lives accomplished through everything from clothing and makeup to hormones and silicone injections. In parts of South America, as the anthropologist Marcia Ochoa has shown, transformista “refer[s] to people assigned male sex at birth and who present themselves in their everyday lives as women. The word has associations with the sex work performed by many transformistas” (2008, 150). Other common Spanish-language terms include draga, someone who performs on stage in drag or travesti; loca, a fabulously effeminate gay man, transgender woman, transformista, travesti, or draga; and marimacha, a lesbian or male woman. Less specific terms such as de ambiente and entendido demonstrate the mobile, variable, and inclusive—perhaps because not always clearly defined—nature of the communities and terminologies.

In the francophone areas of the Caribbean, masisi is a Haitian Kreyòl term for feminine-presenting male-born homosexuals, whereas madivine refers to lesbians across gender presentation. (Haitian Creole, referred to locally as Kreyòl, is one of Haiti’s two official languages.) In Guadeloupe and Martinique, macomère refers to a man who dresses as a woman and can also mean “sissy” or “faggot”; fè zanmi designates a lesbian but also has gender implications; mal-fanm indicates male-woman, often an insult for strong-willed women who do not “know their place.” While all these terms can be, and frequently are, used pejoratively, they are not insults that have been reclaimed by activists but instead have positive and self-designating origins.

In the anglophone areas of the Caribbean, transgender and transsexual are widely used, but Creole terms, such as the Jamaican man royal, referring to a biological woman who exhibits masculinity, are also common. Some anglophone Caribbean organizations use the term allsexuals to, as noted on the website of the Jamaica Forum for Lesbians, All-Sexuals, and Gays (J-FLAG), “reflect a continuum in sexual identity, which captures the consensual bisexual and transgender experiences of sexual minorities more so than any sexual activities or behaviours.”

This entry’s titular grouping—travesti and trans—calls attention to the hypervisibility of feminine and female men and trans women and the relative invisibility of masculine and male women and trans men in political, academic, and artistic discourses. King argues that the “dearth of representations of ‘female to male’ Caribbean trans experiences ... points to the insidiousness of androcentrism and patriarchy; even in a supposedly radical realm that troubles gender, the focus remains on biological men. This absence also points to the threat that biological women who exhibit trans identities pose to the stability of patriarchy” (2014, 23). Omise’ke Natasha Tinsley (2011), one of the few academics who focuses on female masculinities in Latin America and the Caribbean, argues that female masculinities appear more in transgressive women’s activism than in “trans” activism. Gender-complex women in Latin America and the Caribbean are as likely to be the mothers the Jamaican anthropologist Edith Clarke refers to in her landmark My Mother Who Fathered Me (1957) as they are to be male-presenting trans organizers or performers.

Nonetheless, there are Latin American and Caribbean organizations, such as Jamaica’s TransWave and Mexico’s Centro de Apoyo a las Identidades Trans (Center for the Support of Trans Identities), that actively include male women and persons who identify as trans men, and a few trans men organizations, such as the Generación de Hombres Trans de El Salvador (Generation of Trans Men of El Salvador), are emerging. Other organizations, such as the Federación Argentina de Lesbianas, Gays, Bisexuales y Trans (FALGBT; Argentine Federation of Lesbians, Gays, Bisexuals, and Trans) and the Asociación de Travestis, Transsexuales y Transgéneros de Argentina (ATTTA; Association of Transvestites, Transsexuals, and Transgenders of Argentina), replace the gender-identifying o/a Spanish noun and adjective endings with the more recently popular x—as in “lxs compañerxs” or “ciudadanxs” (ungendered forms of las/los compañeras/compañeros [the companions], and ciudadanos/ciudadanas [citizens])—to refuse both the gender binary and the predominance of trans womanhood created by the common use of all feminine language in much travesti and trans activism.
Activist Agendas and Practices

In the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, outside of Carnival and Afro-Caribbean religious practices, travesti and trans activism is documented primarily through a combination of fictional depictions, judicial records, and newspaper articles that tend to focus on crimes and scandals such as the 1901 Baile de los 41, which centered on forty-one men arrested in Mexico City at a “scandalous” party involving, among other things, several of the men dressed elegantly as women. In the mid-twentieth century, travesti and trans activism was largely restricted to, but rarely distinguished from, gay and lesbian activism. Visible, vocal, and self-identified travesti and trans organizations and individuals began to emerge in the 1990s and grew significantly in the first decades of the twenty-first century, focusing on a cluster of key concerns that emerged out of the intersection of revolutionary independence movements, human rights work, and the sexual revolution. As outlined in the following sections, contemporary activist organizations focus on legal and legislative rights activism, antiviolence activism, sex-work activism, and health-care activism. More diffuse but no less important are the social groupings that emerge out of and practice social activism.

Legal and Legislative Rights Activism Legal and legislative rights activism targets national laws and their implementation. While homosexuality remains criminalized in much of the Caribbean and parts of Latin America, resulting in activism focused on decriminalization, gender identity and presentation largely go unmentioned in criminal codes, with the important exception of laws outlawing cross-dressing for “improper purposes,” as for example in Guyana. The relative historical legal and legislative silence on gender identity and expression has resulted in twenty-first-century travesti and trans activism focusing on legislative efforts to pass gender identity bills allowing changes of name, gender, and sex on identity cards and other official documents that are used to access legal work, health care, and social security. Gender identity laws thus affect not only sense of self but also economic opportunity and physical safety and security.

Argentina and Cuba stand at the vanguard of travesti and trans legal and legislative rights. Thanks largely to the activism of the FALGBT and the ATTTA, in 2009 Argentina proposed one of the first gender identity laws in Latin America and in 2012 passed into law one of the most comprehensive gender identity laws in the world. Cuba’s government-sponsored Centro Nacional de Educación Sexual (CENESEX; National Center for Sex Education), founded in 1977 and now under the leadership of Mariela Castro Espín (1962–; daughter of Raúl Castro, the nation’s president), has ensured full political and legal rights for transgender individuals and, in 2008, instituted the most comprehensive state-funded trans medical support in the world.

Brazil’s large and visible travesti and trans organizations, including Rede Trans Brasil (Trans Brazil Network) and the Associação Brasileira de Gays, Lésbicas, Bissexuais, Travestis e Transexuals (Brazilian Association of Gays, Lesbians, Bisexuals, Transvestites, and Transsexuals), and important regional groups such as the Associação das Travestis e Transexuais do Estado do RJ (Association of Transvestites and Transsexuals of the State of Rio de Janeiro) have secured national and international recognition, hosting in 2009 the world’s largest LGBT pride celebration and, with the support of the presidency from 2000 to 2013, undertaking numerous political and social initiatives to ensure travesti and trans rights. However, without legislative support and with the conservative Brazilian Democratic Movement’s Michel Temer in the presidency as of 2017, Brazil’s Gender Identity Bill, proposed in 2013, languished in parliament.

Activist groups in many other South American countries have secured the passage of gender identity decrees and laws: the Asociación Trans del Uruguay (Trans Association of Uruguay) in 2009, Aquelarre Trans (Trans Coven) and Colombia Diversa (Diverse Colombia) in 2015, and Bolivia’s Red Trebol (Clover Network) in 2016. In the same year, Peru’s Red Trans (Trans Network) helped introduce a gender identity bill in the Peruvian Congress, and in Paraguay, Panambi organized an effort that led to the Ministry of Health passing a resolution allowing trans people to use their “social name” in health-care situations. In Chile, the Movimiento de Integración y Liberación Homosexual (Movement for Homosexual Integration and Liberation) and the Movimiento por la Diversidad Sexual (Movement for Sexual Diversity) are working toward allowing for legal gender identity change in the nation’s civil code.

Central America and the Caribbean are often earmarked by international human rights organizations and media as disastrously transphobic and void of local organizing. Yet, while legal and legislative protections continue to be elusive and transphobic violence remains a significant problem, travesti and trans activism has been steadily increasing since 2001. Some countries have strong traditions of legal and legislative activism despite the lack of rights and judicial protections. In 2017 Transvida, the first trans group recognized as a nongovernmental organization in Costa Rica, worked to secure the introduction of Expediente 19.841, a measure that would allow name and gender changes on identity cards. TransWave, founded in 2015 in Jamaica, is working in partnership with J-FLAG and other LGB groups to protect gender identity from discrimination in penal codes. In the Dominican Republic, Trans Siempre Amigas (Trans Always Friends) runs a publicity and education program to inform travesti and trans Dominicans about their legal rights and to organize the denunciation of human and civil rights violations. Since March 2016, Guatemala’s Organización Trans Reinas de la Noche (Trans Queens of the Night Organization) has been instrumental in ensuring that trans persons can select their gender identity on the National Registry of Persons and on the Personal Identity Document.

In Barbados, Antigua, Guyana, Trinidad and Tobago, and Suriname, where the criminalization of travesti and trans practices persists and few if any legal and legislative rights or judicial protections have been extended to travesti and trans individuals, activism often remains nascent, frequently taking the form of individual court cases claiming the right for gender and name changes on identity cards or prosecuting those responsible for transphobic crimes. In Belize, Guyana, Saint Lucia, and Dominica, such individual activism led to the formation of national organizations in the second decade of the twenty-first century.

Looking beyond national borders, the well-developed regional coalition Red Latinoamericanay del Caribe de Personas Trans (REDLACTRANS; Latin American and Caribbean Network of Trans Persons) supports both new and established national organizations by facilitating cooperation among them, hosting regional conferences, producing regional studies, coproducing trans art projects and films such as the 2010 documentary Translatina, and working with regional groups such as the Organization of American States and the Caribbean Court of Justice. Indeed, even without the support of REDLACTRANS, activists often, when national activism falters, turn to regional bodies such as the Caribbean Court of Justice, as in a case in Guyana in which a 2017 appeals court both maintained a 2010 ruling upholding a section of the nation's law that made public cross-dressing “for any improper purpose” illegal and refused to define “improper purpose,” effectively giving local law enforcement and courts the discretion to arbitrarily open criminal proceedings.

Legal and rights-based activism can be life changing, not only extending legal protections but also changing public opinion. As Martínez-San Miguel and Tobias point out, however, granting legal status and rights “enables governments to rebrand themselves as the protectors of marginalized people” and to cover over “the violent realities of life confronted by trans people” (2016b, 12). All too often, trans people who use antidiscrimination laws to report violence give their names and addresses or places of work to the police only to be arrested on charges that they engaged in sex work or be assaulted by off-duty police shortly thereafter.

Antiviolence Activism Latin American and Caribbean travesti and trans activism takes place in a context of significant and deadly violence. Transrespect versus Transphobia Worldwide reported in 2017 that of the 2,343 worldwide killings of trans and gender-diverse people between 2008 and 2015, more than half (1,834) occurred in Latin America and the Caribbean. Nearly half of those (938) occurred in Brazil, with Mexico, Colombia, and Venezuela also reporting high numbers of murders, followed by Honduras and Argentina. The absolute numbers become starker as percentages in some places, such as Honduras with a rate of 10.77 reported trans and gender-diverse murders per million inhabitants (compared to Mexico with a rate of 2.37 and the United States where the rate is 0.50). Of course, these are only the reported numbers; the actual numbers certainly exceed these, given the combination of lack of opportunities to report, failure of authorities to recognize reports, fear of retaliation for reporting, experience of retaliation for reporting, and of course all the material and symbolic violence that prevents survivors from even considering reporting.

Trans Activists Participate in a March against Homophobia in El Salvador, 2016. A translation of the sign held by a trans woman at the front of a march against homophobia is “We Are Not Dangerous. We Are in Danger.” Latin American and Caribbean travesti and trans activism takes place in a context of significant and deadly violence, with more than half of the world’s reported killings of trans individuals occurring in that region in 2016.

The comparative tracking of violence against trans people, particularly by organizations active in Latin America and the Caribbean but seated, run, and funded primarily in Europe and North America, is too easily wrapped up in a narrative about the dangerous Global South and the wonderful Global North, which in turn feeds, as Vanessa Agard-Jones writes, “a narrative whereby metropolitan queers are mobilized to ‘save’ local (Antillean) queers from local (Antillean) people” (2011, 188). This is not to deny the importance of publicity and advocacy by international human rights organizations such as the United Nations and regional organizations such as the Organization of American States, not to mention national governments, presses, and publics; such publicity and advocacy certainly aids Latin American and Caribbean-based travesti and trans activists working to document, respond to, and prevent transphobic violence. Yet the increasingly vocal response of travesti and trans activism to transphobic violence manifest in public protests, in social and traditional media, and in mounting public and legal pressure for the investigation, arrest, and prosecution of those responsible is in large part the product of local activists and organizations who are able to identify and address specific causes of antitrans-violence—including the lack of protection for sex workers, inadequate training of and support for police, and extremist evangelical rhetoric—and to provide protective spaces and support for travesti and trans people that are integral to antiviolence activism.

Sex-Work, Health-Care, and HIV/AIDS Activism Plagued by legal and social barriers to other fields and occupations, travesti and trans persons are particularly likely to turn to sex work, where they are especially at risk of violence and sexually transmitted diseases. As social communities form around travesti and trans sex work, its accessibility and appeal as a career can increase. In conjunction, much travesti and trans activism works to ensure legal protections for sex workers and to offer travesti and trans sex workers pathways to other careers. Linked to REDLACTRANS, the Red de Mujeres Trabajadores Sexuales de Latinoamérica y el Caribe (Network of Latin American and Caribbean Sex Workers) often serves as the coordinating body for more local organizations such as the Comunidad de Trans-Travestis Trabajadoras Sexuales Dominicanas (Community of Dominican Trans-Transvestite Sex Workers) or the Chilean Sindicato Nacional Independiente de Trabajadoras Sexuales Transgéneras, Travestis y Otros (National Independent Trade Union of Transgender, Transvestite, and Other Sex Workers). Given the high risk of sexually transmitted diseases and the institutional difficulties of accessing medical care for travesti and trans sex workers, HIV/AIDS prevention and care activism have traditionally been points of emphasis for trans activism and points of collaboration with local, national, and international health initiatives. The disease-specific focus of HIV/AIDS activism has, however, also limited its capacity to address the many other health and wellness needs of travesti and trans individuals and communities.

Access to medical care is a particularly salient issue, both in terms of questions of safety, respect, and adequate care in health-care situations, in terms of mental health care and the diagnosing of gender identity disorders, and in terms of access to hormones and surgical procedures, the most visible and delineated of travesti and trans health-care concerns. While many travesti or trans persons never seek hormonal or surgical interventions, the ability to access them should they so desire represents tremendous opportunity and freedom.

A full range of surgical options are available only in Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Cuba, and Mexico; more limited surgical procedures, such as breast augmentation, liposuction, chest reconstruction, hair removal, and mastectomy are available to travesti and trans persons in Ecuador, Peru, and Puerto Rico. While hormones and hormone therapy are available directly from pharmacies or on the black market throughout most of Latin America and the Caribbean, only in Cuba and Argentina can medical supervision be accessed without a psychiatric diagnosis, and only in Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Cuba, Ecuador, El Salvador, Mexico, Nicaragua, and Puerto Rico is medically supervised hormone therapy even an option. The disparity between the availability of hormones and the availability of medical supervision puts travesti and trans persons at high risk of health complications resulting from un- or undersupervised use of hormones, another reason that access to safety and respect in any medical care situation is tantamount.

EL TEJE

El Teje: Primer Periódico Travesti Latinoamericano, the self-proclaimed first Latin American travesti (transvestite) newspaper, launched its debut issue in 2007 in Buenos Aires, Argentina, under the editorship of the trans activist Marlene Wayar. The idea for a newspaper written by and about travestis originated in a workshop on chronicle writing delivered by the contemporary Argentine writer María Moreno at the Centro Cultural Rector Ricardo Rojas, a center associated with the University of Buenos Aires that is renowned for innovative cultural and educational initiatives. Moreno, working within the Communications Division of the center, along with the feminist lawyer Paula Viturro from the Technologies of Gender Division, enlisted Wayar in an effort to craft a creative space that, while providing Argentine travestis a way out of prostitution, would constitute a means for members of the travesti community to express themselves and self-reflectively document their history. As Josefina Fernández summarizes in Cuerpos desobedientes (2004)—the first study of Argentine travestis—the vast majority of travestis residing in Buenos Aires live off prostitution, with only a tiny minority enjoying other forms of employment. The large majority also come from very poor households in the interior of the country and have had only a couple of years of formal education.

Teje itself is a word used to describe the act of sharing information among travestis without anyone else noticing—for instance, alerting others to the presence of police, someone with a record of abusive or violent behavior, or an opportunity to score drugs. Wayar herself traces the origin of the word to carrilche, an argot originating largely within prisons and associated with the world of prostitution. El Teje was freely distributed throughout the city of Buenos Aires, and it was hard to miss. Professionally printed on bright, glossy paper at the Centro Cultural Rector Ricardo Rojas, located in one of the busiest areas in the city, this unusual publication resembled in its design a magazine rather than a newspaper. In 2011 the city's legislature declared El Teje to be of cultural interest, and, that same year, the Dirección General de la Mujer de la Ciudad de Buenos Aires awarded the publication the prestigious prize Lola Mora, which recognizes media that disrupts gender stereotypes in order to promote equality and inclusivity.

El Teje appeared twice a year until 2009, when the fifth issue was released. The sixth issue would appear about a year later, and a seventh, and final, issue was published in July 2012. Although it is uncertain why publication of El Teje ceased in 2012, the magazine is still featured as one of the main publications of Centro Cultural Ricardo Rojas on the center's website, where the first six issues are easily accessible online. Among the list of regular contributors are the names of several Argentine trans activists: Wayar, the cofounder of the Trans Network for Latin America and the Caribbean “Silvia Rivera”; Diana Sacayán, an activist in the Movimiento Antidiscriminatorio de Liberación (Antidiscrimination Liberation Movement); and Lohana Berkins, the founder of the Asociación de Lucha por la Identidad Travesti y Transsexual (Association for the Fight for Transvestite and Transexual Identity) and one of the most vocal proponents of the 2012 Gender Identity Law, which was repeatedly discussed in El Teje. Sacayán’s successful campaign for legal recognition of trans patients’ name of choice in public hospitals by the government of the province of Buenos Aires also featured prominently in the publication. Alongside these political pieces, El Teje contained graphic erotic humor, art, and entertainment, lists of desired male partners, medical and legal advice, queer theory, interviews with celebrities, and personal stories shared by readers. Throughout its publication history, El Teje played an active role in debates and campaigns surrounding the Gender Identity Law and became a powerful platform for denouncing police brutality and other forms of violence suffered by the travesti population. It remains particularly important historically and culturally as the first magazine dedicated to travesti politics and issues that was entirely produced by travestis with no previous experience in the press. Most of its contributors have remained iconic figures in the fight for LGBTQI rights in Argentina and the rest of Latin America.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Mariela Méndez

Associate Professor, Latin American, Latino, and Iberian Studies, and Women, Gender, and Sexuality Studies

University of Richmond, Richmond, VA

Large clinics devoted to travesti and trans persons are rare: Mexico has one, the Clínica Especializada Condesa (Condesa Specialized Clinic) in Mexico City, which offers specialized services for trans persons; and in 2005 Cuba’s CENESEX created the Estrategia Nacional de Atención Integral a Personas Transexuales (National Strategy for Comprehensive Care of Transsexual Persons), which, since 2008, has guided the national health-care system’s delivery of hormone therapy, sex reassignment surgery, and other medical services to travesti and trans persons. Travesti and trans persons in other parts of Latin America and the Caribbean often find the most competent and understanding care in HIV/AIDS clinics, which are increasingly accessible even if they do not always offer full medical services.

International organizations such as the World Professional Association for Transgender Health advocate at the level of the World Health Organization, but on the ground in Latin America and the Caribbean they have few affiliates. Thus, information about good general medical care, as well as specific services, for travesti and trans persons tends to come through personal recommendations and social connections.

Social Activism The political activities generally understood as activism, and even the concept of speaking out, are not always available or effective for travesti and trans persons. Silent forms of social activism play an important role, as well as what Ochoa calls “bodily and imaginative responses to marginalization” (2008, 147), including delineating gathering places, holding pageants and shows, and creating artistic expressions.

The acquisition and defense of public and semipublic spaces is central to travesti and trans individuals and communities and is often carried out by individual entrepreneurs, performers, and community members who might consider themselves more survivors than political activists. As exemplified in the 2014 Puerto Rican documentary _Mala Mala_, performance spaces, street corners, and beauty salons not only provide social spaces that allow for a sense of belonging and safety and the exchange of vital information, they also provide job opportunities, housing, and distribution sites for healthcare information and materials.

Travesti and trans participation in Carnival, as well as in other performances, shows, and pageants, sometimes gaining public approbation through links to Carnival, can be understood in the context of such social activism and provides essential spaces for gathering, celebrating, and connecting. As one participant in Brazil’s first transgender beauty pageant, in 2012, told the _Huffington Post_, “This contest is key for the visibility of us. We transgender women suffer a lot from prejudice and discrimination, whether we are pretty or not, rich or poor” (“Brazil Hosts” 2012). Not only does the visibility and acclaim that contestants gain in their own community provide a sense of pride and belonging, beauty pageants often garner positive national and international media coverage and draw attention to the lives and the activist agendas of travesti and trans individuals. The links between political activism and work in shows are multiple: many who are unable or unready to face the vocalization and publicity often linked to political activism are able to share space and knowledge across social and political affiliations at performances, shows, and pageants; many, such as the Honduran activist and Miss Rainbow Honduras Ruby Ferreira, openly participate in both pageants and political activism, explicitly bringing the platforms together.
Bars, clubs, bookstores, beauty salons, and street corners serve a similar purpose. As gathering sites for friends, dates, or work, they serve as essential spaces for sharing information—from gossip (which feminist and queer scholars have long documented as a critical and subversive organizing tool and channel for sharing lifesaving information such as which potential client may be an undercover police officer or an abuser, or which clinics or pharmacies can offer safe health care) to bulletin boards announcing events and job information—and providing a sense of belonging that travesti and trans individuals might not always find in their families and communities of origin.

Since their appearance in the 1990s, online travesti and trans social spaces have proven as significant as they are fleeting. The relative ease of creating online groups, pages, and sites and the minimal investment required to operate them mean that many are short lived, but the proliferation of new social media groups and online spaces demonstrates their continued importance. Social media groups have become the most common. That they are often difficult to find and/or restrict access is indicative of the safety they provide and the threats under which their members continue to live. These pages and sites serve as spaces for social and sexual connections and for the diffusion of event information, as electronic bulletin boards, and as forums for debate and the safe exchange of information.

Rather than substituting for face-to-face organizing, online social spaces complement and grow in parallel to it. In Brazil, for example, there are over eighty LGBTQI Facebook groups and over 300 nonelectronic groups; Panama’s four on-the-ground organizations are matched with ten Facebook groups; Haiti has four Facebook groups and two face-to-face organizations. Countries with one or no public face-to-face organizations, such as Suriname, Saint Lucia, Antigua and Barbuda, and Paraguay, also have no recognizable Facebook groups. The relatively larger numbers of nonelectronic groups in most South American nations are matched by relatively larger numbers of Facebook groups, generally over twenty and often over forty; the relatively smaller numbers of nonelectronic groups throughout Central America and the Caribbean are similarly matched with generally fewer than ten and often only one or two Facebook groups. Online activism offers a new tool that Latin American and Caribbean travesti and trans persons and groups use as they also continue activism in other public and private spaces.

Artistic work also belongs to social activism. Whether or not an activist impulse propels it, the production of literature, film, visual art, and performing art that represents and showcases travesti and trans characters and artists functions as social activism. Already in the late nineteenth century, novels such as José Martí’s (1853–1895) Amistad funesta (1885; Fatal friendship), which portrays masculine women and effeminate men as deeply flawed, documented and provided virtual spaces for gender complexity. In the 1960s authors such as the Cuban Severo Sarduy (1937–1993) were celebrated for their avant-garde depictions of drag queens and gender transformations in artistic circuits, making a name for Latin America and the Caribbean as an incubator for gender complexity.
In the late twentieth and early twenty-first centuries, many more Latin American and Caribbean novels, films, paintings, and plays have represented travesti and trans persons in ways that have rendered their presence and work more visible. Works such as the short stories and novels of the Trinidadian author Shani Mootoo (1957–) recognize both the long history of gender complexity and the ongoing struggle for trans legal, medical, and social acceptance in the Caribbean. Novels such as Sirena Selena vestida de pena (2000; Sirena Selena [2000]), by the Puerto Rican writer Mayra Santos-Febres (1966–), and films such as Una mujer fantástica (2017; A fantastic woman), by the Chilean filmmaker Sebastián Lelio (1974–), also work to bridge what has been a gap between upper-class academic and intellectual integration and popular exclusion of travesti and trans individuals and communities in Latin America and the Caribbean.

Documenting, Studying, and Historicizing Travesti and Trans Activism

Historical documentation and academic investigation lag behind travesti and trans political and social activism. Academic studies of HIV/AIDS and sex work pay significant attention to travesti and trans sex workers, albeit almost exclusively to those who present and live as women (Infante, Sosa-Rubi, and Cuadra 2009; Kulick 1998; Ochoa 2008; Prieur 1998; Tucker et al. 2014). While these provide a key space of documentary and investigative inclusion, they also run the risk of reinforcing the association of travesti and trans individuals and communities with sex work and illness, especially insofar as they focus on travesti and trans individuals as bearers of HIV/AIDS, rather than as persons working to prevent, treat, and cure disease.

In the introduction to his 2003 edited collection The Culture of Gender and Sexuality in the Caribbean, Linden Lewis observes that “transgendered identity formation is also essentially off limits for researchers, or, to be generous, constitutes an area of neglect” (5), and Hilbourne Watson comments, in the same volume, that “research on bisexuality and transgendering is absent from most Caribbean scholarship, and even though such issues and practices are present in Caribbean life … they are not located at the center of theoretical consciousness and explication” (55). Important exceptions and newer developments include the work of King, Ochoa, Lawrence La Fountain-Stokes (2008), Tinsley and Matt Richardson (2014), and Christian Flaugh (2013), although the slow pace of change can be seen in the conspicuous absence of the mention of any variation of trans in Lorena García and Lourdes Torres’s 2009 article “New Directions in Latina Sexualities Studies.”

Historical and academic investigations require data. As activists continue to produce those data in increasingly visible ways, and as archival research questions and methods make previously hidden data increasingly available, the study of travesti and trans activism in Latin America and the Caribbean will also grow. New work on precolonial conceptions of gender and sexuality in Latin America and the Caribbean can help to bring out the decoloniality of travesti and trans activism and to further challenge the places of Euro-American involvement in Latin American and Caribbean travesti and trans communities and organizations. Greater attention to travesti and trans men can both further reveal the intersections of sexism and the hegemony of binary gender and enable more exploration of the ways that travesti and trans activism challenges the colonial/modern gender system. New work on the spaces and places of social activism can open new understandings of how travesti and trans individuals and communities negotiate such forces as the market economy, zoning laws, the publishing industry, and social media. And as the rights-based work of much travesti and trans activism garners more legal and legislative equality and protection, and as antiviolence, sex work, medical, and AIDS activism saves more lives, attention can turn to the ways that travesti and trans persons and groups challenge enlightenment notions of liberal subjectivity and citizenship.

SEE ALSO Argentina’s Gender Identity Law; Asia Pacific Transgender Network; El Baile de los 41; Grupo Gay da Bahia; Jamaica Forum for Lesbians, All-Sexuals and Gays (J-FLAG); Trans Issues in Africa; Transfeminism; Transgender Muslims; Transgender Organizations in Mainland China, Hong Kong, and Taiwan; Transgendered Subjectivities in Contemporary Iran

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Corrales, Javier, and Mario Pecheny, eds. The Politics of Sexuality in Latin America: A Reader on Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, and Transgender Rights. Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh

FILMOGRAPHY

In the Christian West—the cultural tradition examined in this entry—nonnormative sexual behavior has been associated since the Middle Ages with disloyalty to, or crimes against, the body politic. In popular understanding and political and religious rhetoric, as well as more covertly in legal matters, the idea that sexual “deviance” is related to, or indeed a form of, political treason has long been robust. In the twelfth-century French romance Eneas Queen Amata denounces Aeneas as “a traitor and a sodomite” (Yunck 1974, 226). Eight hundred years later, novelist Marcel Proust equated homosexual propositions with “treasonable proposals from the enemy” (Proust 1927, 132). How did this association arise, and what have been some of its consequences?

Treason and Sodomy in Law

Since at least the Crusades and possibly earlier, European peoples had described various sexual aberrations as “sodomy” or “buggery”—categories that might include bestiality or anal intercourse between a man and a woman as well as same-sex relations—and characterized them as foreign customs introduced through either conquest or trade. Many Christian countries claimed these behaviors originated in the Islamic world, but they also blamed them on each other so that the English were likely to say that sodomy came from Italy, while the French identified it with the English (Frantzen 1998; Pepys 1983; Rosenstock 2003). Regardless of its source, if sodomy was by definition foreign, then any native subject who practiced it was indulging in an alien vice, betraying the customs and norms of his own culture.

Furthermore, in Europe, heresy, sodomy, and other mortal sins on the one hand, and treason or sedition on the other, were closely related offenses against the monarch, who was God’s earthly representative (Bray 1982). In judicial writings or legal cases, this relationship is not treated as causal or one of exact equivalence, but rather as a matter of proximity. Thus the medieval legal treatise Miroir des justices (Mirror of justices), a fourteenth-century Anglo-Norman document, classifies sodomy as a crime of lèsemajesté (injury to the sovereign) along with treason. Later legal documents, such as Edward Coke’s
The Third Part of the Institutes of the Laws of England: Concerning High Treason (1640) and the various legal codes instituted in North America by British colonists, tend to follow this classificatory system: sodomy and treason are not the same crime, but they are of similar seriousness, treated in adjacent segments of the penal code, and subject to the same punishment, often death by hanging or burning.

As absolute monarchs increasingly saw their powers limited and secularized, treason was reconceived of as an offense against the national collectivity rather than against an individual embodying both church and state. Laws governing treason were restricted so that fewer offenses were considered treasonable and fewer people were executed for treason (Mcfarlane 1997). By the nineteenth century, legal convictions for treason, on any grounds, had become comparatively rare, partly because as democratic forms of government replaced monarchies throughout western Europe, the legal definitions of treason narrowed even further, and the evidentiary requirements for proving it grew quite stringent. Yet the rhetorical concept of “treason” and its association with sexual deviance have continued to resonate in the modern era.

Homosexuality as a Foreign Threat

In the late nineteenth century, the sodomite—now often renamed the invert or Urning—emerged as a distinctive, medically pathologized type. At a time when women were not full participants in public life, female inversion was of concern largely because of its potential implications for family stability or, in the case of cross-dressing women, for the maintenance of visible gender distinctions. But the male invert’s sexual conduct threatened both family life and the political, public realm. His sexual behavior no longer constituted a betrayal of the monarch, but it indicated a diseased physiology and psychology that rendered him untrustworthy. François Carlier, chief of the morals police in Paris in the 1880s, said that “The pederastic passion ... extinguishes, in those whom it possesses, the noblest sentiments, those of patriotism and of the family; it makes of them creatures useless to society” (Carlier [1887] 1981, 92–93; translation by Erin G. Carlston). In addition, because so much of the scientific work on homosexuality was being published by German scholars, and because Germany was the birthplace of the homosexual emancipation movement, non-Germans were beginning to identify homosexuality as a particularly German, and thus foreign, vice.

Several notable scandals in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries both reflected and reinforced the idea that there was a connection between treason, Germany or German-ness, and sexual deviance. The Dreyfus affair in France marks the first time in modern European history that the crime of treason was linked to homosexuality, albeit indirectly and only within a small circle of military personnel and politicians. In 1894 a Jewish officer in the French army, Captain Alfred Dreyfus (1859–1935), was accused and convicted by a court-martial of treason, originally on the shaky basis of a single piece of paper that French intelligence found discarded in the wastepaper basket of a German military attaché which suggested that an artillery expert was selling military secrets to the Germans. Knowing their case against Dreyfus was weak, army officials padded the file of evidence against him with huge amounts of extraneous material, including some of the other contents of the wastepaper basket—sexually graphic notes exchanged between the German attaché and his Italian counterpart, with whom he was having an affair.

Private, consensual same-sex relations between adults were not technically against the law in France. No explicit connection was drawn between the two men's sexual relationship and Dreyfus's alleged acts of espionage and treason, nor was Dreyfus himself ever accused of homosexuality. It is unclear, therefore, just how these additional documents were meant to incriminate him. Possibly they were simply intended to trigger an already-existing association between sexual deviance and political treachery in the minds of the legal and political authorities who had access to this file. Or perhaps, as one general later claimed, the obviously uncensored nature of the correspondence between the attachés was meant to persuade the readers of Dreyfus's file that all its contents were similarly uncensored and unfalsified (Carlston 2013). In any case, while the otherwise unexplained proximity of male homosexuality and treasonous acts within Dreyfus's file certainly suggests that a connection between the two was already in place, the limited readership of the file and the fact that the attachés' affair did not become general knowledge mean that the case probably did not significantly reinforce that idea in the public imagination.

In contrast, male inversion erupted into public consciousness in Europe with the trials of Oscar Wilde in 1895, and achieved even greater visibility during the Eulenburg scandal in Germany that began in late 1906. Wilde’s case had nothing to do with treason, but it brought to attention a series of associations with sodomy that had not previously been so widely recognized: henceforth, male homosexuality would be strongly connected with both upper-class effeminacy and cross-class sexual relationships. Effeminacy posed an implicit threat to the strength of a nation that depended on virile, masculine men to defend it, while cross-class fraternization challenged established social hierarchies; both of these themes would resurface in later scandals that explicitly linked sexual deviance and treason.

Espionage in the Twentieth Century

In the early years of the twentieth century, the German journalist Maximilian Harden (1861–1927) undertook, for political reasons, to ruin Philipp, Prince of Eulenburg (1847–1921). Beginning in 1906, he ran articles charging that Eulenburg and his friends formed a pacifist, homosexual cabal around Kaiser Wilhelm (1859–1941), committing treason by giving him advice that undermined German interests. The libel cases and countercases that ensued dragged on for years, destroyed the lives and friendships of many of those close to the kaiser, and also confirmed for non-Germans the idea that homosexuality was a peculiarly German vice.
Another early twentieth-century scandal that rattled the German-speaking world is especially significant because of the frequency with which it was cited later: the case of Colonel Alfred Redl (1864–1913), a counterintelligence specialist for the Austro-Hungarian Empire. By the time he was caught in 1913, Redl had already been working for more than ten years as a double agent for czarist Russia. He was apparently blackmailed into turning traitor after the Russians discovered his homosexuality, although he seems also to have enjoyed generous payments (some of which he spent on lavishly supporting his lovers) for the information he shared. Apprehended and confronted by his colleagues, Colonel Redl shot himself. The information he leaked to Russia may ultimately have had devastating consequences for Austria-Hungary in World War I (Asprey 1959; MacMillan 2013).

© UNIVERSAL HISTORY ARCHIVE/GETTY IMAGES

Irish Nationalist Roger Casement. Casement was sentenced to death in 1916 for his support of Irish nationalists rebelling against British rule, sparking an outcry from supporters because of his strong humanitarian record. British intelligence agents were able to silence this support by leaking excerpts from Casement’s diary, which detailed his sexual encounters with other men.

Even more publicized at the time than Colonel Redl’s treachery was that of Roger Casement (1864–1916), a humanitarian and Irish nationalist who had been knighted in 1911 for uncovering human rights abuses on rubber plantations in South America. In 1916 he was arrested because of his involvement with the planned Easter Rising and his efforts to get Germany—with which Britain was by then at war—to supply arms to Irish nationalists and support their rebellion against British rule. Quickly convicted of treason and sentenced to death, he might still have had his sentence reduced when supporters around the world protested that his long and distinguished record of humanitarian work militated against putting him to death. British intelligence agents, however, had obtained what were purported to be Casement’s private diaries, which recorded in explicit detail his sexual encounters with other men. (There has been a long debate about whether these so-called Black Diaries were forged by the British; most scholars now believe them to be authentic.) By circulating excerpts from the diaries to journalists, politicians, leaders of humanitarian organizations, and even Casement’s own defense lawyers, the British government was able to discredit Casement, portray him as a moral degenerate, and silence his supporters. In August 1916, Casement was hanged for treason. As in Dreyfus’s case, documents about homosexuality were used in a treason case not to prove or explain the treasonous acts but simply to prejudice opinion against the accused (Conrad 2010; Daly 2005).

World War I bred nationalist fervor and anxiety about betrayal as well as intense anti-German sentiment in the countries of the Triple Entente (Russia, France, and Great Britain). In England, the view that Germany was using homosexuality as a weapon of war surfaced in media reports that warned, “Men are willing to die for their homes, but if the conception of home life is replaced by the Kultur of urnings, the spirit of the Anglo-Saxon world wilts and perishes…. Espionage is punished by death at the Tower of London, but there is a form of invasion which is as deadly as espionage: the systematic seduction of young British soldiers by the German urnings and their agents” (White 1918, 451). Building on this fear, conservative member of parliament Noel Pemberton Billing (1881–1948) deliberately created a scandal to draw attention to what he, too, believed was a campaign of infiltration and conspiracy by the Germans: he published an article in his paper the Imperialist implying that actress Maud Allan (1873–1956) was a lesbian, and that she was one of 47,000 Britons guilty of sexual perversion whose names the Germans allegedly kept in a “Black Book” for purposes of blackmail. As Billing hoped she would, Allan sued for libel, and the British public was riveted by the resulting trial, which very unusually singled out female homosexuality—something many people did not even know existed—as a threat to national security. The article in the Imperialist claimed that “in lesbian ecstasy the most sacred secrets of the state were betrayed.” During the trial, Prime Minister Herbert Asquith’s wife, Margot, was named as one of Allan’s alleged lovers (Bland 1998, 184).

The legend of the Germans’ Black Book never entirely died and was revived during and after World War II. First, Nazis were supposed to be in possession of the book and to be using it to obtain classified information; then, in a new twist on the tale inspired by anticommunist fervor, the book was supposed to have fallen into the Soviets’ hands after they occupied Germany at the end of the war. This story was promoted in the United States by a German-born writer who had immigrated to the United States, R. G. Waldeck (1898–1982). In 1952 Waldeck responded to the investigations into homosexuals in government employment that were then underway with an article titled “Homosexual International” that was eventually read, in its entirety, into the Congressional Record by Republican congresswoman Katharine St. George (1894–1983). When introducing the article, St. George emphasized that the Countess van Waldeck’s German origins gave her particular experience with homosexual scandals, and reminded her congressional colleagues about the Eulenburg affair. Waldeck argued in her article that homosexuals form an international conspiracy with a more-than-coincidental relationship to communism: “Homosexuals,” she wrote, “make natural secret agents and natural traitors” (Waldeck 1952, 140).

Waldeck's prime example of this alleged phenomenon was Redl. It was by now commonplace for US politicians, intelligence agencies, and journalists to assert that homosexuals were security risks both because they were morally weak and because they were subject to blackmail and could be pressured into espionage. A Senate subcommittee, known as the Hoey Committee, formed to investigate the “problem” of homosexuals in government and asserted in 1950 that “perverts are frequently victimized by blackmailers who threaten to expose their sexual deviations…. The lack of emotional stability which is found in most sex perverts and the weakness of their moral fiber, makes them susceptible to the blandishments of the foreign espionage agent” (US Congress 1950, 5). The journalist Max Lerner (1902–1992) wrote that during his research for an exposé he was doing on the Hoey Committee’s investigation, every government figure he interviewed reiterated this point. Yet the only case anyone could point to of a homosexual who had actually been blackmailed into committing treason was that of the Austrian Captain Redl, almost forty years earlier; this was repeatedly offered as definitive proof of an American epidemic (Lerner 1950).

The US government’s hunt for homosexual traitors was also spurred by a scandal unfolding in the United Kingdom in the early 1950s, the so-called Case of the Missing Diplomats. Guy Burgess (1911–1963) and Donald Maclean (1913–1983) were both career civil servants working for the British Foreign Office when they suddenly went missing in 1951. As word began to circulate in intelligence agencies and the yellow press that both men were homosexuals, speculation grew that they had run off to pursue a sexual relationship and/or that they had been communist spies who had now defected. Only the latter surmise was correct; the Soviet Union confirmed their defection in 1955. Although Burgess and Maclean were never formally charged with treason, since they had already permanently fled the West before they could be apprehended, there is little doubt that they had committed treasonous acts over many years of spying for the Soviet Union, and the news of their defection solidly cemented the view that “perverts” were traitors by nature.

It is somewhat ironic that, although (William) John Vassall (1924–1996), a low-ranking British Admiralty official, was not unmasked as a Russian spy until 1962, he was actually blackmailed into committing espionage in 1954, just at the time the British and US governments and intelligence services were most stridently insisting, as grounds for denying homosexuals government jobs, that blackmail was stock-in-trade for the Soviets. In fact, while working in Moscow, Vassall was lured to a party by KGB agents who got him drunk and then photographed him in compromising positions with other men. Soviet intelligence then threatened to circulate the indecent photos unless he agreed to start passing them classified information, which he did for the next seven years until he was caught. It seems, therefore, that Soviet intelligence may indeed have felt that blackmailing Western homosexuals to obtain intelligence was a valuable weapon in the Cold War; nonetheless, Vassall remains the only known instance of this happening. (Despite rumors to the contrary, Burgess and Maclean were never blackmailed; they went to work for the Communist cause out of ideological conviction.)

Vassall's arrest for spying obviously confirmed entrenched beliefs about the unreliability of homosexuals and the inadvisability of allowing them to participate in national institutions. Yet the wider social framework within which that narrative had been sustained was already shifting. Already in 1957, the Wolfenden Report—issued by a commission set up after a number of prominent and well-respected British men had been arrested for homosexual offenses—had recommended the decriminalization of consensual same-sex relations between adults, indicating a changing climate of opinion. Then in 1963, just a year after Vassall's arrest, the Profumo affair created an even noisier scandal than Vassall had—but this one involved heterosexuals. The revelation that the Conservative secretary of state for war, John Profumo (1915–2006), was having an affair with a call girl who was simultaneously seeing a Soviet naval attaché impressed upon the British public the idea that heterosexual misconduct could pose at least as much of a security risk as same-sex relations did.

In 1967 the recommendation of the Wolfenden Report was implemented, and the laws under which Wilde, Alan Turing, and thousands of other British men had been prosecuted were abolished. Germany and the United States took longer than Great Britain to overturn their sodomy laws, decriminalizing male homosexuality in 1994 and (at the federal level) 2003, respectively. Even before these legal changes, gay liberation movements around the world had already encouraged many gay people to live openly and greatly reduced the stigma of homosexuality in many places. Once same-sex conduct was no longer illegal, or widely considered unspeakably shameful, it became harder to argue that blackmailability was a sufficient reason for excluding homosexuals from sensitive positions. Thus, one notable feature of gay life in industrialized nations since the last quarter of the twentieth century has been increasing inclusion in national institutions including diplomatic service, military service, and electoral politics.
The Twenty-First Century

And yet the ideological correlation between homosexuality and treason has still not died. In 2013 Chelsea Manning (1987–), who was then known as PFC Bradley Manning, was convicted by a court-martial of violations of the Espionage Act for leaking classified information in 2010 while she was working as an army intelligence analyst. Manning had lived as a gay man for several years—discreetly while on duty, since the policy of nondisclosure popularly known as “don't ask, don't tell” was still in force, but openly elsewhere. The day after she was sentenced, she issued a statement explaining that her gender identity was female, changing her name to Chelsea, and expressing her wish to begin transitioning medically. Manning’s own lawyers and Manning herself alluded to her untreated gender dysphoria as the cause of the acute depression and conflict she experienced before deciding to send hundreds of thousands of classified documents to WikiLeaks, implying that psychic distress might have impaired her judgment.

A few liberal commentators seized on these claims to suggest that Manning had been seeking attention or “acting out” in posting to WikiLeaks, rather than being a conscientious whistle-blower as she and her supporters affirmed. This analysis was rejected by some LGBTQ people, especially conservatives and those in the military, who resented the implication that sexual minorities or gender-variant people are too psychologically unstable to be trusted with state secrets, which was, unsurprisingly, the conclusion drawn by pundits on the right and far right. For them, Manning’s sexual orientation or gender identity— which they typically collapsed together into “effeminacy” or “perversion”— confirmed the wisdom of excluding gay people from military service and raised questions about why Manning had been allowed to stay enlisted long enough to commit espionage, given her frequent pro-gay postings on social media. In a 2011 article, antigay activist Cliff Kincaid asked “whether [Manning] was part of a secret homosexual network in the military” and quoted a passage from the 1950 Hoey Committee report on the vulnerability of “sex perverts” to blackmail (Kincaid 2011). In online discussion forums and blogs, alt-right posters demanded the death penalty for Manning as a “sodomite traitor,” demonstrating the extraordinary consistency of this strain of homophobic rhetoric over the centuries.

SEE ALSO Blackmail; Lavender Scare; Military Law and Policy in the United States; Military/Navy in the United Kingdom; Nationalism and Sexuality in Europe; Scandals in Europe; Wilde Trials. International Significance of; The Wolfenden Report

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Daly, Mary E., ed. Roger Casement in Irish and World History. Dublin: Royal Irish Academy, 2005.

Tuqus al-Isharat wa-al-Tahawwulat (1994; Saʿdallah Wannous)

ROBERT MYERS
Professor, Department of English
American University of Beirut, New York, NY

A modern Syrian play set in nineteenth-century Damascus that includes the first overt and serious dramatization of homosexuality in Arab theater.

Saʿdallah Wannous (1941–1997), Syria's most prominent playwright and one of its most important contemporary intellectuals, is credited with reinventing the forms and themes of contemporary Arab theater by dramatizing the ills of traditional societies and authoritarian political systems. Tuqus al-isharat wa-al-tahawwulat (Rituals of signs and transformations), his most celebrated and multifaceted play, addresses themes such as clerical corruption, male homosexuality, male and female prostitution, suicide, and honor killing. Published in 1994, the printed edition of the play was freely available in Syria. However, when the play was first produced in Damascus in 2005 by a German-Syrian theater company, directed by Friederike Felbeck, the scenes about homosexuality were removed by censors.

Tuqus was first performed in Beirut in 1996 in a groundbreaking staging by the celebrated Lebanese actress and director Nidal al-Ashqar, who employed an idiosyncratic dramaturgical structure in which she placed the play's plotlines of psychological, spiritual, and sexual transformations side by side. In 2011 the play was performed at the American University in Cairo as a response to the sociopolitical turmoil in post–Hosni Mubarak Egypt after the so-called Arab Spring. In 2013 the Anglo-Kuwaiti playwright and director Sulayman Al Bassam directed the first French-language performance of the play at the Comédie-Française in Paris. Later that same year, Tuqus received its first English-language production by the American University of Beirut, directed by Sahar Assaf, which was followed by staged readings in New York and Chicago in 2014.

Wannous's Life and Works

Wannous was born to an Alawite (a branch of Shiʿa Islam) family of peasants in a small village in northeastern Syria. At an early age, and contrary to his modest upbringing, he began to pursue an interest in literature, theater, culture, philosophy, and politics. He moved to Cairo at age nineteen to study journalism and graduated in 1963. After returning to Syria, he began writing short philosophical plays that were heavily influenced by existentialism and designed more for the page than the stage. These plays treated the tensions between the individual and society, especially the authoritarian state, a theme that continued to be a central concern of his work.

In the late 1960s he studied theater at the Sorbonne in Paris under the mentorship of Jean-Marie Serreau, a follower of Bertolt Brecht who directed plays by Luigi Pirandello, Jean Genet, Eugène Ionesco, and the Algerian playwright Kateb Yacine. After the disastrous Arab defeat by Israel in the June 1967 war, Wannous returned to Syria to join other intellectuals and artists who reacted strongly to the postwar government’s censorship and manipulation of facts concerning the role of Arab governments in the defeat. His groundbreaking play Haflat samar min ajl al-khamis min huzyran (1968; An evening party for the fifth of June), strongly influenced by Peter Weiss’s Marat/Sade, was a manifesto for his new “theater of politicization,” which he believed would be a powerful tool to expose corrupt Arab regimes, engage the audience, and promote political change. “Theater of politicization” consisted of interactive plays that combined Brechtian techniques and elements of Arab folk culture such as the figure of the hakawati (storyteller), live music, and traditional songs. Mughamarat ras al-Mamluk Jabir (1970; The adventure of the head of Mamluk Jabir), a play about personal ambition and treason, is arguably the most powerful of his political dramas from the 1960s and 1970s. Other significant plays from this period include the Brechtian fables Al-Fil ya malik al-zaman (1969; The King’s elephant) and Al-Malik huwa al-malik (1977; The King is the king).

The peace process with Israel that led to the Camp David Accords, signed in 1978, which was supported by Egyptian president Anwar Sadat, marked a turning point in the Arab world and in Wannous’s life and career. Like many Arab intellectuals, he viewed the peace process with Israel as another political capitulation by an Arab leader and a betrayal of the Palestinians. In part because of what he perceived as Sadat’s treachery in visiting Jerusalem, Wannous sank into a depression and attempted suicide. Although he continued to work in the theater, founding and directing the High Dramatic Institute in Damascus, he stopped writing plays for more than ten years.

The second phase of Wannous’s career began soon after he received a diagnosis of terminal cancer in the early 1990s. His response to the disease was to write “frenziedly for the theatre” (quoted and translated in al-Anezi 2006, 219), and he adopted a new approach to playwriting in which he shifted from his earlier overtly political and programmatic Brechtian style to one more focused on personal psychology and individual suffering. In a 1992 interview, he admitted that before his diagnosis he had thought “that individual strife or personal idiosyncrasies were inessential, shallow bourgeois matters that should be set aside” (quoted and translated in Wannous 2019). He also stated that although he continued to see the role of the intellectual as primarily critical, he believed the new approach he had adopted was “more beneficial than my miserable attempts to struggle and immerse myself in political affairs on a daily basis, or to disseminate readymade ideas, definitive theories and flamboyant slogans” (quoted and translated in Wannous 2019).
"Tuqus al-isharat wa-al-tahawwulat," more than any of the half-dozen works Wannous wrote between 1992 and 1997, represents a clear shift in his theatrical language from the political to the personal. In the play Wannous introduces themes he had previously ignored, such as mysticism, female sexual freedom, sexual abuse, and male homosexual love. The play celebrates individual liberation and transformation—whether in the form of mystic fervor, sexual pleasure, or publicly assuming one's gay identity—while at the same time serving as a cautionary tale about the terrible price one pays for acting on one's deepest desires in traditional and corrupt authoritarian societies.

Plot and Themes

The prominence of the theme of self-actualization and transformation in Tuqus is best characterized by Wannous’s note for the play’s Beirut production. In it he writes that while writing Tuqus “a spring of feelings suddenly welled up inside me” that “overwhelmed me,” adding that “the characters’ choices and transformations were not merely actions I created ... according to a specific scheme; they and I were connected in an electrical field” (quoted and translated in al-Anezi 2006, 250–251). Wannous’s identification with the “frightful and [intoxicating] ... nakedness” (251) of his characters in Tuqus marks a rupture with his previous ubiquitous authorial voice and his preoccupation with human experience defined principally in terms of political power and economic forces.

Although Tuqus was inspired by a historical incident in nineteenth-century Damascus and is set in that period, the play is generally seen as an allegory dramatizing the dilemmas of Syria and the Arab world in the 1990s. The play’s structural division into two parts, “Conspiracies” and “Outcomes,” evokes both Greek and Shakespearean tragedies, in which the actions of the characters in the first part determine their fate in the second. Tuqus begins with the police chief, ʿIzzat, surprising ʿAbdallah, the naqib (head of the city’s nobility) and a descendant of the prophet Muhammad, frolicking in his private garden with his mistress, the prostitute Warda, who is wearing his clerical attire and riding on his back. ʿIzzat proceeds to arrest the couple and parade them through the streets of Damascus to expose ʿAbdallah’s immoral behavior. ʿAbbas and ʿAfsa, bodyguards of the Mufti, the highest local religious authority and a rival of ʿAbdallah, inform the Mufti of his enemy’s public humiliation. Although he secretly enjoys the news, the Mufti pretends to the bodyguards to be dismayed by their mocking account of the shaming of a fellow religious official. He concocts a scheme to replace Warda, who occupies the same prison cell as ʿAbdallah, with his wife, Muʾmina, and arrest the police chief for his arrest of ʿAbdallah for making love with his own wife. Muʾmina, herself the daughter of an influential cleric and a sophisticated, well-read woman, agrees to the Mufti’s theatrical scheme in exchange for his agreeing to grant her a divorce from ʿAbdallah. The women are exchanged for one another in the prison cell, Warda is ushered out in Muʾmina’s clothing, and the police chief is soon arrested. As happens repeatedly in the play, the change of characters’ costumes and appearance augurs radical changes in their lives as latent desires are made manifest.

Mu’mina’s choice and transformation are transgressive and extreme. She changes her name to Almasa (meaning “diamond”), becomes a celebrated, high-end prostitute, and enjoys the power and sensuality her sexual freedom confers on her. After her liberation, which arouses the city’s males—including the professedly pious Mufti who, having issued a fatwa (a ruling based on Islamic law issued by a clerical authority) calling for her death, falls in love with her—she lends her name to perfumes, jewelry, and teas. Her ex-husband, ‘Abdallah, converts to Sufism and fancies himself a Sufi saint, while officials and business leaders fight to regain control of the city from the frenzy of immorality unleashed by Almasa’s transformation. Her father chastises her for her lascivious conduct, but she defiantly rebuffs him, reminding him that he molested young women in their house, including Warda. He renounces Almasa/Mu’mina, and her younger brother, Safwan, attempting to prove his manhood by restoring the family’s honor, stabs her, but as she dies she tells him his act is futile: “I am a tale, Safwan, and a tale can’t be killed” (Myers and Saab 2014, 392).

Although ‘Afsa, one of the Mufti’s two bodyguards, appears at first glance to be a secondary character, he is arguably Wannous’s most “astonishing creation” (al-Anezi 2006, 257). His actions and transformation echo and surpass those of Mu’mina. Although he has a reputation as one of the strongest men in Damascus, he enters into a sexual relationship with his fellow bodyguard, ‘Abbas, and upon being rejected, commits suicide. The story of the relationship of ‘Afsa and ‘Abbas is the first overt and serious dramatization of homosexuality in Arab theater. While the play’s rendering of these two characters draws on many aspects of social reality in Syria and other parts of the contemporary Arab world, such as the pervasive erotic relationships between men who may officially be heterosexual, it directly challenges traditional social practices in which overt acknowledgment or acceptance of nontraditional sexual practices or gender roles is generally met with swift social censure.

In ‘Afsa, Wannous creates an entirely new kind of character, a hypermasculine yet “passive” homosexual who is transformed by his desire to become completely submissive to and openly proclaim his affection for his lover, ‘Abbas. ‘Afsa’s desire to publicly embrace what he desires erotically and who he sees himself to be stands in stark defiance of a homoerotic culture frequently marked by stealth, in which homosexuals are either “dominant” bisexuals or seen as “passive,” feminized, lewd, and perverse. In scene 3 of part 1, in which ‘Afsa and ‘Abbas are interrupted by Simsim, an effeminate male prostitute, Wannous—whose political theater promoted vigorous interaction with the audience—forces the spectators to look at eroticized male bodies and listen to charged, titillating language about sex between men. Simsim tries to seduce the manly ‘Abbas by saying he is not interested in “lion’s milk”—that is, a proffered glass of araq—but rather desires ‘Abbas’s “milk,” Arabic slang for “semen.” Simsim, who is apparently a former sexual partner of ‘Afsa, also suggests to ‘Abbas that there is no difference between Simsim and ‘Afsa, who, infuriated at being outed, violently attacks Simsim, forcing ‘Abbas to intervene. ‘Abbas warns Simsim to keep silent about what he has revealed, and after he has left, ‘Abbas tells ‘Afsa that they will now have a new relationship, which will remain secret, in which ‘Afsa will be like one of his women whom he will protect. “We will,” says ‘Abbas, “have our appearance and our reality” (Myers and Saab 2014, 292).

‘Afsa, who is relieved that ‘Abbas does not reproach him and pleased that he is willing to accept ‘Afsa’s affection, initially agrees to ‘Abbas’s condition that they remain secret lovers, but as ‘Afsa’s love for ‘Abbas deepens, he refuses to live a life of appearances and enacts his own transformation. He reveals what he asserts is his true self by stripping his body of the signs of masculinity in Arab cultures—he moustache and body hair. Scene 3 of part 2 is perhaps the play’s most poignant and cruel. ‘Afsa assumes a feminized posture as he walks intently toward ‘Abbas, offering him his shaved moustache, a sign of his sexual transformation, and his depilated body, which he believes will please his lover. ‘Abbas harshly rejects him: “You disgust me. You’re nothing but a lecherous leech who’s attached himself to me” (Myers and Saab 2014, 337). He had, he says, desired ‘Afsa’s masculine appearance and asserts that there is “no such thing as love between men…. What was between us was lust that fades when satisfied. It gives me pleasure to mount someone so strong, to see his body break between my thighs. But what pleasure can I get now from mounting a shameless swish?” (Myers and Saab 2014, 339). ‘Abbas, who enjoys same-gender sex as a means to assert his power and physically dominate another male, is, however, promptly challenged. In place of a goodbye, ‘Afsa demands that the two men engage in a final arm wrestling contest, which ends in a draw, an outcome that infuriates ‘Abbas. In part 2, scene 7, the play’s shortest, the tragic results of quests for authentic self-expression in Tuqus and in traditional societies are crystallized in ‘Afsa’s final monologue as he prepares to kill himself: “What a wicked world this is in which only forgers and liars thrive” (Myers and Saab, 2014, 358).

‘Afsa is a tragic hero who is prepared to be publicly humiliated and endure abuse to become his true self. Unlike Almasa, however, he does not wield the power of seduction. His struggle is seemingly in vain, and his story ends in self-annihilation, but it is dramatized in crude, raw language whose effect on the audience is far more profound than the poetic language used by Almasa, which suggests that she is “partly a symbolic figure, a goddess of ... sexuality” (al-Anezi 2006, 258).

Criticism

Prior to its first English translation in 2013, studies of Tuqus were conducted by Syrian scholars who interviewed Wannous and later traveled to England to pursue doctoral degrees. Although their English-language dissertations offer valuable documentation of and insights about the playwright’s career and works, they have remained unpublished in book form. One of the first analyses of the play that focuses on Wannous's dramatization of male homosexuality is Ali al-Souleman's 2005 Oxford University dissertation. He notes that Arab reviewers largely avoided discussing the scenes featuring 'Afsa and 'Abbas and asserts that Tuqus was written during a period of transition in Arab societies that was marked by instability, the decline of traditional institutions such as tribe and family, and the emergence of the modern state. This transition provided the social and historical context for Wannous's vivid portrayals of individuals trapped between traditional and emerging orders as they struggled to actualize their impulses, desires, and choices.

Ali Ali 'Ajil Naji al-Anezi's 2006 dissertation offers a detailed and eloquent reading of 'Afsa and 'Abbas's scenes, in which he emphasizes the centrality of 'Afsa's story to the play and fiercely challenges accepted notions of homosexuality prevalent in Arab societies. He criticizes a moral code that tolerates undisclosed homosexuality and causes same-gender relationships to be fleeting, clandestine, abusive, and defined by power. In Tuqus, the dominant and abusive figure is obviously 'Abbas, who takes pleasure in controlling 'Afsa's submissive masculine body. Al-Anezi sees 'Afsa's transformation—his willingness to give up the signs of his masculine identity—as a challenge to social hypocrisy and an assertion of the nature of his love and his body. He describes the scene in which 'Afsa offers his moustache to 'Abbas as "one of the most touching Wannous ever wrote" and one in which the prejudices of the audience are openly confronted (258).

An opposing and polemical analysis of Wannous's dramatization of homosexuality is offered by Joseph A. Massad in his 2007 book Desiring Arabs. Although Massad points to the fluidity of gender and sexuality in the Arab world, particularly as portrayed by medieval writers, as a powerful rebuke to hegemonic Western sexual norms, he rejects as essentialist and colonialized the notion that sexual mores and practices construct identity. He does admit that the putative Arab tolerance of homosexuality is exaggerated, but he chastises Arab artists and intellectuals for being either moralistic in their treatment of same-gender sex or replicating Westernized notions of gay identity and rights. In his critique of Tuqus, Massad incisively points to the Shakespearean echoes in the play's plot and structure, such as the reversals of roles, the disguising of characters, and "the centrality of desire and public sexual conduct" (353). His insight into Wannous's dramaturgy is, however, complicated by his indictment of the playwright for using "ready-made and uninterrogated Western formulae"—that is, feminism, gay liberation, and sexual identity—to critique the Arab world (375).

In a 2013 article on the representation of homosexuality in modern Arab literature, Khalid Hadeed counters Massad's assumption that Arab homosexuality is part of culturally specific sexual codes and endorses the "right to enjoy wide-scale social visibility and legitimacy" and "the freedom to choose a person of the same sex as a life partner" (272). He also critiques, however, what he identifies as Wannous's faulty "representational logic," which, he asserts, correlates homosexual identity with male dominance (274). For Hadeed, 'Afsa's transformation “via the language of interiority and essence he deploys to express himself” paradoxically establishes “masculinity as the natural outcome of male sexual development” (274).

A distinct approach to the tragedy of ‘Afsa is offered in two studies of Tuqus published in Theatre Research International in 2013. The first is by Margaret Litvin, who discusses the significance of the Cairo performance of Tuqus in late 2011 after the fall of Mubarak. Litvin attributes the play’s relevance in times of political instability and anxiety to its “spectacular pessimism” (120). She sees ‘Afsa’s suicide after “performatively disclosing his homosexual love for his colleague” (121) as the result of the pervasive political and gender domination in patriarchal societies.

In the second study, Robert Myers and Nada Saab enlarge on Massad’s insights about the Shakespearean elements of Tuqus, further map the evolution of Wannous’s drama, and explore a neglected but prominent component of the play, Sufism, including its role in political dissent and its mystic theology of revelation and sacrifice. The authors see ‘Afsa’s failed attempt to reconcile his inner and outer selves as a metonymic, “profane” transformation that mirrors various Sufi rituals.

Despite the contrasting approaches used in the English-language studies of Wannous, critics and scholars view the radical and tragic metamorphoses the characters undergo in Tuqus in their struggle to defy a corrupt and oppressive order as prefiguring the collapse of Wannous’s own nation and as a testament to his profound belief in theater as both a manifestation of civil society and a mechanism for its transformation (Saab 2014).

SEE ALSO Halat Shaghaf (1998; Nihad Sirees); Homoeroticism in the Plays of Ibn Dаниyal; Theater, Queer

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Written and directed by Ferzan Özpetek, the film Hamam (1997; Bath; titled in English as Steam: The Turkish Bath), about male homoerotic encounters in Turkish baths, accounts for the current renaissance of these largely abandoned spaces as part of an emerging gay subculture in Istanbul and other Middle Eastern cities, including Beirut, Damascus, Cairo, and Tehran. The film’s visual and sensual fascination with the labyrinthine topography, intricate design, and steamy interior of such nearly ruined Ottoman buildings partakes in a long history of (homo) erotic projection and fantasy of Western travelers and artists from descriptions of Turkish baths by the English writer Lady Mary Wortley Montagu (1689–1762) and the French novelist Gustave Flaubert (1821–1880), to the Orientalist paintings of the French artists Jean-Auguste-Dominique Ingres (1780–1867) and Jean-Léon Gérôme (1824–1904), to the gay porn films of the French director Jean-Daniel Cadinot (1944–2008) that were set in Maghrebi bathhouses.

Same-sex eroticism ascribed to Turkish baths is not just a Western fantasy, because many Middle Eastern miniature paintings and written documents such as the seventeenth-century Dellakname-i Dilkuşa (Pleasuring tellak) attest to at least occasional male same-sex acts between the tellak (the attendant who provides scrubs and massages) and paying customers. Dating back to the Roman Empire, bathhouses spread across Europe, North Africa, and the Middle East, but they were especially popular in the Ottoman Empire, where they became gender-segregated, semipublic places serving both religious and therapeutic and hygienic purposes. Bathhouses were located near mosques, and for a devout Muslim they have been a transitional space, linking the profane quotidian sexual activity and the religious worship through the act of physical and mental cleansing. The hamam is a place not for reading the Qur’an but rather for relaxing the body—and possibly releasing sexual tension—and preparing for the ensuing prayer. For a young Muslim male, the first visit to a bathhouse has served as rite of passage marking his entry into an all-male community. Meanwhile, for women in Muslim-Arabic countries, bathhouses have been one of the few social spaces where they can be among themselves, beyond paternal and spousal governance.
The Cemberlitas Turkish Bath in Istanbul, Turkey, Built in 1584. While gender-segregated Turkish baths served religious as well as therapeutic and hygienic purposes in the Ottoman Empire, they saw a revival in the twentieth century as queer spaces.

Whereas modern-day Turkey's founding father Mustafa Kemal Atatürk (1881–1938) declared bathhouses to be old-fashioned and traditionalist quasi-religious institutions attesting to decadent Ottoman cultural habits and thus standing against the republican ideals of secularism and modernization, other post-Ottoman countries such as Hungary maintained a secularized bathhouse culture of their own throughout the twentieth century. In tourism in the late twentieth century, interest in searching for erotic exoticism led tourists—many gay tourists among them—to again turn to the old Ottoman bathhouses, triggering a boom for the Turkish bath industry. Many shabby and almost defunct locales have since been restored to their former splendor, which in turn has resulted in a reinvigorated public interest in the Ottoman cultural past. Although the gay tourist habit of cruising based on an identification with queer sexual desire hardly recalls the former transitional moment of Muslim cleansing practices, this revival has also brought back homoerotic customs inherent in the hamam experience. With a secularized understanding of bathhouse attendance, both tourists and locals are part of new LGBT generations who embrace their queerness and reinvent the mythicized space of the Turkish bath with recoded potentials for cross-cultural queer encounters.

SEE ALSO Cruising and Cruising Grounds; Gay European Tourism Association; Resorts; Travel/Travelogues on the Middle East
BIBLIOGRAPHY

Two-Spirit

SCOTT DE GROOT
Postdoctoral Fellow
University of Winnipeg, Canada

A term used by North American Indigenous peoples to refer to nonnormative sexual or gender identities.

In the summer of 1990 Indigenous LGBTQ people from across North America traveled to a wilderness site near Winnipeg, Manitoba, Canada. Along the banks of the Brokenhead River, they gathered to attend the Third Annual Intertribal Native American/First Nations Gay and Lesbian Conference. At this historic event, participants discussed, debated, and ultimately embraced two-spirit as a new identity that linked contemporary LGBTQ experiences with Indigenous traditions, histories, and worldviews (Anguksuar 1997; McLeod 2003). In the months and years that followed, two-spirit rapidly spread and circulated as a novel mode of pan-Indigenous identification. By the close of the twentieth century, two-spirit organizations had been established across Canada and the United States.

Attempts to impose a narrow meaning on the term two-spirit are bound to fail. For some, the term literally denotes a spirit imbued by the Creator with male and female elements. Others play down the term’s metaphysical aspects and regard two-spirit as an identity that is uniquely modern, postmodern, and/or postcolonial. Some Indigenous people have articulated two-spirit primarily with respect to sexual orientation. Others suggest that it is not actually about sexuality but nonbinary gender roles with deep roots in Indigenous cultures. Although two-spirit is sometimes experienced as an exclusive identity, many Indigenous people employ the term in ways that coexist and overlap with additional LGBTQ+ identities (Driskill 2004; Wilson 1996). The Cherokee scholar Qwo-Li Driskill suggests that, like queer, two-spirit is “intentionally complex” and “meant to be inclusive, ambiguous, and fluid” (Driskill 2010, 72). Driskill asserts that two-spirit is an umbrella term intended to strategically foster transnational, pan-Indigenous interconnections.

While a straightforward definition is evasive, two-spirit must be understood in relation to three main elements. The first is self-determination. Selected by Indigenous people themselves, two-spirit asserts self-determination in terms of language and discourse (Lyons 2000). Simply put, two-spirit proclaims the right of Indigenous people to define themselves and describe their worlds. The second element is decolonization. Two-spirit not only casts off colonial labels such as berdache but also recalls the gender and sexual diversity of traditional Indigenous cultures and reclaims this diversity in a decolonizing fashion. Healing is the third element. Two-spirit is part of a broad process of healing that involves rediscovering and celebrating Indigenous traditions and worldviews that were criminalized and suppressed by Euro-American authorities for many centuries (McLeod 2003; Hunt 2016; Wilson 2008).

Precolonization

There are hundreds of Indigenous nations in North America, and they have distinct cultures, histories, and languages. However, the worldviews of these nations tend to have much in common. As two-spirit scholar Alex Wilson notes, Indigenous worldviews are not structured by the binary oppositions of Western thought; they typically value balance with nature and harmony among community members (Wilson 1996). The notion that sexuality could form the basis of a social identity separate from—or antithetical to—the general life of the community makes little sense within Indigenous worldviews.

© H. S. PHOTOS/ALAMY

We’wba, a Zuni Two-Spirit, c. 1871. We’wha was a famous lhamana, or male-bodied individual who adopted the stylizations and labor roles of women.
There are hundreds of Indigenous languages in North America, and most possess terms that describe individuals who combine both male and female characteristics and roles (Hunt 2016). To provide a few examples, in the Cree language there are multiple terms for men and women who dress, behave, or live as members of the opposite sex, including napêw iskwêwisêhot, Iskwêw ka napêwayat, Înahpikasot, ayahkwêw, napêhkân, and iskwêhkân (Pruden and Edmo 2016). Navajo culture traditionally recognizes four different genders: asdzaan (feminine women), hastiin (masculine men), nádleehi (feminine men), and dilbaa (masculine women) (Raymond 2016). The Lakota Sioux traditionally referred to male-bodied persons who performed female social roles as winkte. Often living in same-sex relationships, winkte were regarded as endowed with spiritual gifts, and they fulfilled important functions in religious ceremonies (Roscoe 1998; Raymond 2016). In traditional Zuni culture, male-bodied individuals called lhamana adopted the stylizations and labor roles of women and often acted as social mediators. The most famous lhamana was We’wha, the subject of extensive anthropological and historical study by the LGBTQ community–based scholar Will Roscoe (Roscoe 1991).

These diverse terms and social roles defy most attempts at generalization, as there are profound differences with respect to their spiritual significance, labor implications, cultural meanings, and erotic dimensions. It is necessary to avoid romanticizing Indigenous cultures as uniformly accepting of all forms of gender and sexual diversity because there were often strict regulations and taboos (Towle and Morgan 2002). Suffice it to say that the gendered and sexual lives of precolonial Indigenous North Americans did not mirror Western constructions of femininity, masculinity, homosexuality, and heterosexuality. For example, the life of Osh-Tisch (1854–1929), a Crow badé (a male-bodied individual who performed male and female social roles), refuses Western binaries. A renowned warrior in late-nineteenth-century battles against the US military, Osh-Tisch was also known for wearing women’s clothing and crafting jewelery (Roscoe 1998). More generally, Indigenous peoples recognized as blurring the lines between male and female often had important responsibilities as knowledge-keepers, healers, child-rearers, spiritual leaders, interpreters, social mediators, and artists (Hunt 2016).

Waves of Colonialism

From the late fifteenth century, successive waves of European explorers, missionaries, soldiers, and settlers often reacted with disgust and aggression when they encountered Indigenous modalities of gender and sexuality. Perhaps most infamously, Spanish conquistadors ordered the torture and public execution of Indigenous men they variously regarded as sodomites, hermaphrodites, or transvestites (Roscoe 1991; Trexler 1995). Deploying images of hellfire and eternal suffering, Catholic and Protestant missionaries worked to convert Indigenous peoples to Christianity and impose Christian modes of gender embodiment and sexual conduct (Williams 1986; Roscoe 1998). Nevertheless, colonial efforts to reorganize the intimate lives of Indigenous peoples were relatively scattered and inconsistent prior to the nineteenth century, especially in central and western North America.

With the consolidation of settler colonial states in the nineteenth century, Indigenous peoples were increasingly subjected to a microphysics of colonial power. As Canada and the United States extended their territorial claims, legal jurisdiction, and police powers, Indigenous sovereignty was supplanted in such areas as marriage, family life, and child-rearing. For example, in the late nineteenth century Canada and the United States enacted laws that restricted and criminalized Indigenous forms of marriage and enforced Euro-American ideals of monogamous Christian matrimony and nuclear family domesticity (Barker 2006; Gilley 2006; Carter 2008). Both settler colonial states also sought to extinguish the transmission and reproduction of Indigenous cultures by removing children from their families and resocializing them in residential and boarding schools. Although rife with sexual abuse, these schools strove to inculcate Euro-American values regarding gender and sexual normality. Indigenous students were molded in accordance with Euro-American standards of masculinity and femininity, and youth who displayed queer desire or nonbinary forms of gender expression were correctively punished (Roscoe 1998; Gilley 2006). Mark Rifkin has influentially argued that imposing Euro-American forms of domesticity, intimacy, gender, and sexuality upon Indigenous peoples was central to the overall projection of settler colonial power across North America (Rifkin 2011).

By the early to mid-twentieth century, Indigenous modalities of gender and sexual diversity had generally gone underground or completely disappeared (Driskill 2008). For example, as mentioned previously, a wellknown badé named Osh-Tisch achieved great renown in Crow culture as both a warrior and a maker of jewelery and clothing. For much of Osh-Tisch’s life, he and other Crow badés were respected members of their communities. However, in the late nineteenth century US Indian agents demanded that Osh-Tisch and other badés cut their hair, dress in male clothing, and conform to Euro-American gender norms or face imprisonment (Roscoe 1998; Gilley 2006). There was strong and partially successful opposition on the part of Crow leaders, who argued that such measures contravened the social status and personal nature of Osh-Tisch and those like him. Nevertheless, Osh-Tisch was the last known badé when he died in 1929, as the role had virtually disappeared from Crow culture in the face of government regulation and Christian condemnation.

Indigenous LGBTQ Organizing

In the final decades of the twentieth century there were expansive efforts to recover and reclaim Indigenous traditions of gender and sexual diversity, and the formation of Indigenous LGBTQ organizations. The red power and gay liberation movements were important catalysts. Red power crystallized in the late 1960s to demand sovereignty and self-determination for Indigenous peoples. The movement staged militant protests against North American colonialism, occupied land deemed stolen, asserted pride in Indigeneity, and embraced pan-Indigenous forms of collective action (Shreve 2010; Rutherford 2011). Also emerging at the close of the 1960s, gay liberation politicized the importance of sexuality in relation to struggles against capitalism, imperialism, and other systems of oppression. Challenging homophobia and heteronormativity, gay liberation affirmed the value of homosexuality and encouraged gay people to come out of the closet en masse (Hobson 2016; Downs 2016).

Indigenous LGBTQ activists were greatly influenced by gay liberation and red power. However, there were also points of tension. Indigenous LGBTQ activists were often discouraged by gay liberation's white normativity and tendency to critique Western imperialism abroad while ignoring settler colonialism at home (Gilley 2006; Morgensen 2011). In red power circles, Indigenous LGBTQ people were frequently alienated by homophobia and macho gender dynamics (Burns 1988; Gilley 2006). Consequently, LGBTQ Indigenous activists increasingly elected to create independent organizations that would more effectively address their unique sociopolitical concerns and priorities.

The first of these groups, Gay American Indians of San Francisco, was founded in 1975. Organizations subsequently established included American Indian Gays and Lesbians (Minneapolis), Gays and Lesbians of the First Nations (Toronto), WeWah and BarCheeAmpe (New York City), and Nichiwakan (Winnipeg) (Roscoe 1998; Morgensen 2011). For all their differences, these groups had similar goals. Oriented toward a broad range of socioeconomic issues, they helped Indigenous LGBTQ people access housing, employment, and education. They organized dances and other social gatherings at which Indigenous LGBTQ people were free to be themselves, build community, and discuss the meaning of Indigeneity from queer perspectives. Especially as the HIV/AIDS crisis unfolded, these groups addressed issues of health care and culturally appropriate prevention and community education strategies (Burns 1988; Roscoe 1998; Gilley 2006).

Also important were their efforts to reclaim lost knowledge of sexual and gender diversity in precolonial Indigenous cultures. For example, Gay American Indians of San Francisco devoted considerable time and energy to producing Living the Spirit, the first anthology of LGBTQ historical and creative writing produced by Indigenous people themselves. This anthology contained critical reflections, historical and anthropological scholarship, and poetry (Burns 1988; Morgensen 2011).

Two-Spirit's Emergence and Spread

By the late 1980s Indigenous LGBTQ organizations existed in a number of Canadian and US cities. Discerning a need for greater communication and coordination among these groups, American Indian Gays and Lesbians of Minneapolis decided to create an annual, transnational forum. In 1988 the organization held the first Intertribal Native American/First Nations Gay and Lesbian Conference in Minneapolis; in 1989 a second conference was held in Wilderness Way, Wisconsin. These events brought together Indigenous LGBTQ people from across Canada and the United States to socialize in drug- and alcohol-free environments, share their experiences, and learn from one another. Workshops addressed such topics as substance abuse, mixed-race relationships, HIV/AIDS, and Indigenous history (Roscoe 1998; McLeod 2003). A growing dissatisfaction with Euro-American terms for Indigenous gender and sexual diversity was palpable. The European term berdache was especially critiqued, given its history of denoting various forms of “passive” male homosexuality, male prostitution, and intergenerational sex (Jacobs, Thomas, and Lang 1997).

A third Intertribal Native American/First Nations Gay and Lesbian Conference was sponsored by Nichiwakan of Winnipeg and held in 1990 at a wilderness site along the Brokenhead River near Winnipeg, Manitoba, Canada. While the conference addressed many of the same themes of previous gatherings, there was a new emphasis on finding a new term for Indigenous gender and sexual diversity (Anguksuar 1997; Thomas and Jacobs 1999). In this regard, a Winnipeg-based Cree and Metis activist named Myra Laramee shared a recent dream: while sleeping inside a tepee that had been erected on the Manitoba legislative grounds, Laramee dreamt of seven ancestral spirits. Shifting between male and female forms, two of these spirits declared that Laramee was niizh manidoowag—an Ojibwe term that translates into English as two-spirited or two-spirit (Albert McLeod interview by Scott de Groot, 18 December 2017; Laramee 2017). Conference participants discussed and debated Laramee’s term and ultimately adopted it as an Indigenous-centered, English-language alternative to Euro-American categories such as berdache and third gender. Two-spirit was originally defined in a fashion that expansively encapsulated “gay, lesbian, transvestite, transsexual, transgender, drag queens, and butches, as well as winkte, nadleeh, and other appropriate tribal terms” (Thomas and Jacobs 1999, 92). However, conference participants did not suggest that two-spirit—itself a calque translation—should be translated back into Indigenous languages or employed in ways that would supplant culturally specific terms and concepts. Rather, two-spirit was a term intended to foster pan-Indigenous alliances and transnational decolonization (Anguksuar 1997; Morgensen 2011).

After 1990, International Two-Spirit Gatherings were annually held in wilderness settings across North America. Two-spirit people and their supporters travel from far and wide to attend these gatherings, learn about the culture and traditions of host groups, and enjoy safe spaces “where people can share, laugh, and heal together” (McLeod 2003, 33). Throughout the 1990s many Indigenous LGBTQ groups changed their names to include the term two-spirit, and entirely new groups also adopted it. By the twenty-first century, two-spirit organizations existed from California to Ontario and British Columbia to Texas. The rapid, remarkable spread of two-spirit as a concept and identity was facilitated by periodicals such as Buffalo Hide (New York City), Two-Eagles (Minneapolis), Sacred Fire Relatively inexpensive to produce and distribute by mail across vast distances, these periodicals allowed two-spirit people to advertise local and regional events; collectively address issues of health and healing; communicate research on Indigenous history; share creative writing and artwork; and discuss issues of Indigenous sovereignty, self-determination, and decolonization.

HIV/AIDS and Community Acceptance

Two-spirit is bound up with the broad, decolonial process of recovering long-suppressed Indigenous traditions, histories, and worldviews. But as two-spirit as a social identity crystallized in the 1990s, it was not embraced by some Indigenous elders and community members who regarded queer sexuality and nonbinary gender expression with hostility or embarrassment. The reasons for this are complex and generally tied to colonialism. Many Indigenous Christians regarded two-spirit people as sinful and denied traditions of gender and sexual diversity (Gilley 2006). There was also a general reluctance to discuss issues of sexuality in some Indigenous communities given the traumatic legacies of Indian boarding and residential schools (Finley 2011). Usually operated by Christian churches, these schools were rife with sexual abuse, which was often perpetrated by adult staff.

Patriarchal power was (and is) another obstacle to two-spirit acceptance. In both Canada and the United States, Indigenous systems of governance and social organization were systematically dismantled by settler colonial governments. In the nineteenth and twentieth centuries Indian status was structured along patrilineal lines, and formerly powerful women were often excluded from band and tribal councils (Driskill 2004; Barker 2006; Carter 2008). Consequently, toxic formations of masculinity and male political power emerged in many Indigenous nations and communities. These power formations were frequently hostile to late-twentieth-century projects of reclaiming Indigenous gender and sexual diversity.

Nevertheless, two-spirit people have made major progress in terms of community acceptance and recognition. The HIV/AIDS crisis was an important catalyst for this. As HIV/AIDS expanded as a biomedical emergency in the 1980s and 1990s, Indigenous communities were severely and disproportionately affected as a result of inadequate access to health care and health disparities stemming from colonialism (Vernon 2001; Hunt 2016). While critical of slow and culturally inappropriate governmental responses to the epidemic, two-spirit organizations strategically accepted resources made available by federal, provincial, state, and local governments. With these funds, and with funds raised at the community level, two-spirit activists and their allies produced research on the scope of HIV/AIDS in Indigenous communities and provided such vital social services as food preparation and assisting with hospital visits (McLeod 2003; Gilley 2006). Moreover, two-spirit activists spearheaded public education campaigns that communicated with Indigenous people about the epidemiology of HIV/AIDS, dispelled harmful myths, and addressed safe sex in an Indigenous-centered fashion. For example, these campaigns debunked widespread notions that HIV/AIDS was an urban, white gay male problem and emphasized that the disease was present everywhere, including on reserves and reservations (Roscoe 1998; Morgensen 2011).

Also important were two-spirit efforts to communicate with Indigenous people in culturally appropriate ways, specifically through community presentations, pamphlets, posters, videos, and other educational materials that employed themes of multigenerational interconnection and holistic wellness. Two-spirit activists likewise demanded Indigenous-centered approaches to HIV/AIDS treatment that incorporated—or at least permitted—traditional medicines and spiritual practices such as smudging (a practice involving the burning of sacred herbs to produce a cleansing, purifying smoke). As Scott Morgensen puts it, “Native people in the United States and Canada responded to HIV/AIDS by creating new knowledge and services in urban and rural contexts and on reservations and reserves that answered health disparities by asserting native control over health” (Morgensen 2011, 198). By assuming a leading role in Indigenous responses to HIV/AIDS, two-spirit people have increasingly gained respect and recognition in Indigenous communities and nations (Albert McLeod interview by Scott de Groot, 18 December 2017).

Two-Spirit Luminaries

Despite continuing to face challenges such as health disparities, homophobia, and racism, in the twenty-first century two-spirit people are ever-more empowered and visible. Advancing this process are a number of eminent two-spirit artists, writers, scholars, and community leaders based in Canada or the United States. To give just a few examples, the Cree and Metis artist Kent Monkman (1965–) has created a body of work that subverts binaries between “artist and model, colonial explorer and colonized subject, gazer and gazed upon, male and female, straight and queer, past and present, real and imaginary” (Rayter 2012, xxiv). Originally from Manitoba but now based in Toronto, Monkman in his paintings, performances, installations, and video pieces playfully celebrates Indigenous gender and sexual diversity while critiquing the colonial power structures that suppressed this diversity for so long.

There has been an outpouring of two-spirit creative writing. At the forefront of this work is the Cherokee poet and scholar Driskill, originally from Colorado and now a professor at Oregon State University. Driskill’s writings challenge anachronistic projections of heterosexuality and homosexuality onto Indigenous pasts and explore interrelationships between sovereignty and eroticism, decolonization and the body, and historical trauma and healing. Driskill’s poetry confronts the painful and haunting legacies of land theft, genocide, and forced removal of Cherokees from their homelands, but also celebrates the erotic pleasure and sensuality of Indigenous embodiment and place (Rifkin 2012).

The Mohawk and Metis writer Beth Brant (1941–2015) is another important two-spirit literary figure. A member of the Tyendinaga Mohawk Reserve in Ontario, Brandt was born in Detroit, Michigan. Inspired by a spiritual encounter with an eagle, she began writing professionally in her forties. Encouraged and promoted by Adrienne Rich, in 1984 Brandt published the first anthology of poetry and prose penned by North American Indigenous women, A Gathering of Spirit, featuring the diverse voices and experiences of Indigenous women from across Canada and the United States. Brant went on to edit and author many more books, including Mohawk Trail (1985) and Testimony from the Faithful (2003). An influential educator and mentor, she lectured at the University of British Columbia and the University of Toronto, supported creative writing workshops and conferences, and was a vocal HIV/AIDS activist who facilitated Indigenous-centered AIDS education (Cullum 2004).

An Ojibwa-Cree community leader in northwestern Ontario, Ma-Nee Chacaby (1952–) has published an important autobiography that recounts her remarkable two-spirit journey. Raised north of Lake Nipigon, Ontario, Chacaby experienced physical and sexual abuse in Indigenous communities reeling from colonial displacement. She was also nurtured and encouraged by her elderly grandmother, who quickly identified Chacaby's two-spiritedness. After years of alcoholism and abusive relationships, Chacaby achieved sobriety and domestic stability. Over several decades, she became a two-spirit community leader and acknowledged elder in Thunder Bay and northwestern Ontario, given her work on issues of addiction, domestic violence, adoption and foster care, and HIV/AIDS education and advocacy. In 2013 Chacaby led Thunder Bay's first gay pride parade (Chacaby 2016).
All of the luminaries profiled here have articulated somewhat different understandings and definitions of two-spirit as a concept and identity. For example, they have variously placed different emphases on the term’s spiritual dimensions, historicity, and sexual meanings. However, they and other two-spirit people fundamentally concur that two-spirit is bound up with Indigenous self-determination, decolonization, and healing. An affirming identity that reconnects with the queerness of precolonial Indigeneity, two-spirit combats the imposition of Euro-American norms regarding gender and sexuality and rejects the universality of these norms.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Anguksuar, Richard Lafontune. “A Postcolonial Colonial Perspective on Western (Mis)Conceptions of the Cosmos and the Restoration of Indigenous Taxonomies.” In Two-Spirit People: Native American Gender Identity, Sexuality, and Spirituality, edited by Sue-

Driskill, Qwo-Li. “Stolen from Our Bodies: First Nations, Two-Spirits/Queers and the Journey to a Sovereign Erotic.” Studies in Native American Literatures 16, no. 2 (Summer 2004): 50–64.

The debate on sexuality in Africa has elicited various responses. As a result of the influence of missionary religions, especially conservative Christianity, some individuals and institutions insist that sexuality belongs to the private sphere and should never be debated in public. In particular, there has been disquiet over the visibility and even vibrancy of organizations that stand for the rights of LGBTQI individuals. This has generated diametrically opposed views regarding how to respond to sexual difference and gender variance. Some African politicians, such as presidents Robert Mugabe (1924–), Yoweri Museveni (1944–), and Uhuru Kenyatta (1961–), have, with varying degrees of diplomacy or crudeness, maintained that Africa has more pressing problems than reflecting on the rights of the LGBTQI community. They have been joined by some church leaders who contend that God has ordained heterosexuality as the only legitimate form of sexuality. In some African contexts, such as in Nigeria, Christian and Muslim leaders have joined forces to denounce LGBTQI individuals and communities.

The religious resistance to LGBTQI rights in Africa has also been supported by some African intellectuals. For example, although Emmanuel Katongole (2016), a Catholic theologian, is quite outspoken in challenging governance in Africa, on LGBTQI rights he is less forthcoming. Ever keen to contest cultural imperialism, these scholars have latched on to the argument that the LGBTQI movement is part of the West’s effort to consolidate its hegemony over Africa. Some African intellectuals find the appeals by African political leaders quite convincing. They contend that the West wants to impose its very specific approach to human sexuality on the entire human population. In this regard, they regard globalization as a process by which indigenous values and cultures are trampled on by the dominant cultures with impunity. Furthermore, they claim that the insistence on human rights is a ploy by those with power to impose their own interpretation of reality on others. If not analyzed critically, these arguments can be quite appealing, especially to people in the Global South who feel that the dividend of globalization has not been forthcoming.

In the politics of sexual and reproductive health and rights in Africa, conservative religious leaders (Christian, Muslim, and traditional) have joined forces with politicians to resist the call for LGBTQI rights. They make an ideological appeal to “African culture and traditions.” These conservative religious leaders, with their African intellectual/political allies, charge that Africa does not need to be lectured to about human rights by the West. Furthermore, they seek to propagate the idea that such notions as LGBTQI rights for Africans are sponsored by foreigners. Nebila Abdulmelik, an African feminist, expressed these dynamics as follows:

> These right-wing groups often use “African” culture and tradition to justify resistance to [sexual and reproductive health and rights]. They frame it, and women's human rights in general, as “un-African,” and the civil society organisations advocating for sexual and reproductive justice as pushing a “Western” agenda. These arguments appeal to many African policymakers, as they resonate with their “anti-imperialist” and “antineocolonial” agenda. The irony is that these (Western) proponents of preserving “African” culture are essentialising and instrumentalising what they deem as “African culture” to further their own agendas.

(2015,35)

Investigating the Traditional Approach to Sexuality in Africa

The past is itself very much contested in debates on sexuality in Africa. The challenges associated with retrieving the past continue to characterize efforts to determine how traditional African cultures negotiated sexual diversity. Critically, ideological reconstructions of the African past tend to project the image of a “pure and unadulterated” African culture. In reality, however, African cultures have never stood still at any given point in time. Like all other human cultures, they have been open and have always undergone change. In the specific case of responding to sexual diversity, however, one can argue that African traditional cultures have been characterized by remarkable levels of tolerance and accommodation of diversity. Perhaps this was made possible by the fact that the guiding religious ideology in African traditional religions has never been a codified set of beliefs to which every adherent has had to subscribe, but a loose system of beliefs and practices that could vary from one place to another.

One of the most dominant philosophies that guided African traditional communities was that of ubuntu (with its variants across most parts of Africa south of the Sahara). While a longer study is required to unpack the nuances of this key concept, it can be summarized as placing emphasis on communal solidarity. It expresses the idea that to exist is to belong to the larger social group. Essentially, ubuntu is the idea that the integrity of a human being is inextricably linked to her or his membership in the community. One is linked to others in an intricate web of relationships. Although some would like to illustrate this point by trying to create tension between individualism and collectivism (Matolino 2008), this does not logically emerge from ubuntu. The concept succeeds in holding both individual rights and collective responsibilities in creative tension.

It is the concept of ubuntu that provides the context for talking about the rights of individuals in all their diversity. The idea of inalienable rights is central to ubuntu. By dint of being umntu (a human being), one is entitled to dignified treatment in all aspects of life.
Among the Shona people of Zimbabwe, for example, there was a profound saying, “murombo munhu” (a poor person remains/is still a person). Such a proverb sought to eliminate discrimination on the basis of social class. Here, the insistence is that all members of society must be accorded their rights. As noted by the South African scholars Mluleki Munyaka and Mokgethi Motlhabi:

Every individual in African society values being recognised and treated as an equal and with respect. The requirement to show respect becomes evident should someone undermine or ill-treat another. Others may intervene by simply asserting and reminding the perpetrator that the victim ungumntu (is a person). The victim may also intervene directly by asserting ndingumntu nam (I, too, am a human being or a person). If the perpetrator has a conscience, he or she will immediately refrain from adverse actions. People are conscious of their common humanity, which has a certain dignity, integrity and value to be acknowledged, respected and valued.

(2009,66)

Without romanticizing traditional Africa—it had its fair share of bigotry, violence, and discrimination against various types of people—it can be argued that in general the intrinsic value of every person was respected. On the few occasions that some individuals’ actions were deemed antisocial, they could be ostracized and encouraged to form their own community. Thus, those who were accused of witchcraft, for example, could be expelled to form their own community. This was far more humane than the hanging of alleged witches in Europe, for example.

It is significant to note that individuals who had a different sexual orientation or gender identity were not among those who were expelled from their communities. Traditional communities were far more tolerant and sophisticated in their responses to sexual diversity. Unlike the homophobia that characterizes the contemporary period—mostly fueled by colonial pieces of legislation, Victorian ideals, and conservative religious ideologies—traditional African communities were quite adept at accommodating differences in sexual orientation and gender identities. By interpreting these through a religious idiom, they facilitated acceptance and respect for difference in relation to sex and sexuality.

One of the most strategic dimensions of African traditional religions and ubuntu is the openness and tolerance of multiple approaches to the sacred. Unlike missionary religions that suggest the existence of only one, exclusive, and decisive access point to the sacred, African traditional religions concede that there are many, divergent ways. As a result, individuals who did not conform to the expected heterosexual ideal of getting married and raising families were accommodated under alternative spiritual explanations. In many instances, it was suggested that such individuals were hosts of particular spirits that set them apart for particular tasks. In other settings, same-sex loving individuals were accorded respect as hosts of spirits.

To contend that there were no same-sex relationships among some traditional Africans is to make a tenuous ideological and nonhistorical claim (Chitando 2015). Some men and women definitely engaged in same-sex relationships. More critically, there were very few reported cases of individuals who were punished for their involvement in such interactions. Two possible conclusions are, therefore, possible. First, one could argue that individuals who engaged in same-sex relationships were extremely effective at disguising their activities in order to avoid detection. Second, it is likely that communities knew of such individuals but had devised strategies of tolerance, acceptance, and containment. It is this second conclusion that is more plausible and appealing.

The argument that only a functional attitude toward sex prevailed in traditional Africa (meaning that sex is only for the purpose of conceiving children), as many colonial-era anthropologists maintained, is unrealistic. As with all other human societies, in traditional African communities individuals engaged in diverse sexual activities for the sole purpose of deriving pleasure and expressing or fulfilling emotional desires. Although sexuality was policed because of its perceived potential danger, it remains critical to highlight that sex and pleasure have been constantly conjoined in Africa as across diverse human cultures. While there were spiritual overtones, it remains true that sex and sexuality were also associated with pleasure. The presence of sexually explicit praise poetry in different African communities confirms that men and women derived pleasure from sex.

African LGBTQI Activists and Ubuntu

As noted earlier, religious and ideological arguments have been marshaled to deny the rights of African LGBTQI activists. Some of the critics have deployed the idea that homosexuals can be characterized as lacking ubuntu or its variant unhu (Makamure 2015). In this regard, a full member of the community is one who is willing to abide by the dictates of ubuntu. These dictates are associated with a narrow worldview that is pushed by African cultural nationalists. By extension, ubuntu lays the boundaries of who can/must be included or excluded from the community. Thus, the concept of ubuntu must be read as a heavily contested one. It can be, and has been, used to exclude individuals who do not subscribe to heteropatriarchy. Furthermore, some African women scholars have critiqued how it marginalizes them. Although she identifies some positive aspects, the Zimbabwean scholar of religion Molly Manyonganise (2015) contends that ubuntu has been used to marginalize women.

Despite the deployment of ubuntu to silence LGBTQI activists in Africa, there have been efforts by scholars to reflect on the extent to which ubuntu can be appropriated to promote the rights of LGBTQI individuals and communities in Africa. This has been motivated by the realization that as long as the dominant ideas relating to the struggle for LGBTQI rights in Africa are framed in predominantly Western terms, it will be difficult to present these as legitimate African concerns. The memory of colonialism and Africa's marginalization in globalization have created a siege mentality among many African intellectuals and politicians. This has generated an ultra-vigilant state whereby all concepts and ideas that are deemed “foreign” are jettisoned immediately. In the quest to protect African identity, sovereignty, and cultural purity (despite these being loaded concepts), there has been a tendency to resist externally derived notions.

As was argued earlier, some African politicians and intellectuals have framed the quest for LGBTQI rights as a form of cultural imperialism. Although their arguments are fraught with fallacies and inconsistencies (for example, insisting on being “authentically African” while speaking fluently in foreign languages and accessing all the products of modernity), there is a need to acknowledge the rhetorical impact and emotive value of their pronouncements. They present Africa as a vulnerable and regularly abused member of the global family. Not only do foreigners pillage African resources and enslave Africa's children, they also want to impose their “un-African” and “un-Christian” sexual practices on Africans. The discourse ceases to be one concerning the rights of some Africans and instead focuses on all Africans against their erstwhile oppressors, the West.

By using ubuntu to promote LGBTQI rights in Africa, scholars and activists are seeking to provide an indigenous basis for supporting these rights. There is a need, however, to acknowledge the danger of romanticization and self-indigenization in such an undertaking (Chitando and Mateveke 2017). The appeal to ubuntu is motivated by its centrality to African traditional religions and philosophy. When one argues that every person's rights must be recognized because this is enshrined in the traditional worldview, one stands a better chance to interface with African cultural nationalists who would be willing to consider an indigenous African concept. One can, therefore, argue that the turn toward ubuntu by scholars and activists in the struggle for LGBTQI rights in Africa is a strategy meant to deflect the argument that the whole discourse is foreign and driven by external interests. By anchoring the struggle on a dearly held African concept, they seek to gain ideological mileage.

Musa W. Dube of Botswana has been a passionate defender of LGBTQI rights in Africa. From her earlier work with the World Council of Churches on HIV and AIDS, as well as her firm commitment to ubuntu as a valuable resource for fighting stigma and discrimination, she has maintained that every individual’s rights must be upheld. For Dube, ubuntu must not be reduced to an empty declaration. Neither must its meaning be restricted, she argues. She insists that every generation has the responsibility to work out what it means to say, “I am because we are and we are because I am”:

The concept of community, the Botho/Ubuntu/Buthu paradigm, should become the cornerstone for propounding the African philosophy of justice and liberation by constantly revisiting what it means to be community and live in community, what violates community, and how to live in community in the new and hybrid twenty-first century contexts. Being community is not set. It is a process that must be continually cultivated by its members. Relationships should be constantly assessed. Any that are oppressive should be reviewed. Only when society is healthy can it be claimed that “I am because we are and we are because I am.”

(2009, 202)

Other scholars and activists who have used the concept of ubuntu in an endeavor to secure LGBTQI rights in Africa include Marc Epprecht (2013), Kapya Kaoma (2016) and Elias Kifon Bongmba (2016). While a longer narrative is required to do justice to how each of these scholars appropriates ubuntu in his specific reconstruction efforts, their efforts can be viewed collectively. Essentially, they contend that homophobia is antithetical to ubuntu. Their main contention is that ubuntu upholds the rights and dignity of all members of the community. To harm, hate, kill, or ostracize any person on the basis of sexual orientation or gender identity is to fail to recognize that person’s inherent dignity, these scholars maintain. Kaoma and Bongmba additionally contend that ubuntu is consistent with the tenets of Christianity. In other words, they argue that neither ubuntu nor Christian teachings on the integrity of each created human being support homophobia.

Ubuntu and Human Rights in Africa
Scholars and activists who appeal to ubuntu to support LGBTQI rights in Africa seek to undercut the argument that the quest for human rights is informed by external players, using foreign idioms. Essentially, they are insisting that there is no tension between human rights and indigenous African notions of upholding the integrity of every member of the community. Theirs is an effort to Africanize, indigenize, localize, and vernacularize the discourse on sexuality and gender identity in contemporary Africa. They seek to provide an African flavor to the quest for LGBTQI rights in Africa.

The central argument is that both ubuntu and human rights have the goal of protecting life. No individual should be harmed because of his or her sexual orientation and gender identity. It is also argued that ubuntu is consistent with the emerging emphasis on human rights. It is envisaged that by appealing to ubuntu, the reservations that some critics have regarding human rights will be negotiated. As outlined above, such critics contend that there are double standards in the discourse on human rights globally. The same countries that pose as champions of human rights have not hesitated to disregard them the moment that their interests are threatened. It is further argued that it is only the Global South that is made accountable for not upholding human rights. The powerful disregard human rights with impunity, critics charge.

By positing that both ubuntu and human rights are premised on protecting life, scholars and activists pressing for LGBTQI rights in Africa have sought to apply an old concept to new realities. It is clear that, although sexual diversity was characteristic of traditional societies, organizing on this basis is a new and emerging phenomenon. It is the visibility, voicing, and organizing of the LGBTQI individuals and groups that have generated tension. As indicated earlier, traditional communities in Africa had devised strategies for accommodating and accepting individuals who did not fit the socially defined ways of self-presenting. Scholars and activists who put forward ubuntu as a resource for furthering LGBTQI rights in Africa seek to apply an old concept in a new context. The overarching goal is to uphold life in contexts characterized by denial, stigma, discrimination, and outright hatred.

The struggle for LGBTQI rights in Africa has become quite contentious. Religion, culture, and tradition are at the heart of this struggle. Conservative interpretations of religion, culture, and tradition have appealed to those who would deny LGBTQI rights in Africa. At the same time, however, some scholars and activists have sought to locate redemptive windows in the African religion, culture, and tradition to promote LGBTQI rights in Africa. Through the appeal to and appropriation of ubuntu, they have sought to promote more life-giving and liberative readings of an old concept in a new setting.

SEE ALSO Gender, Flexible Systems, in Africa; Marriage, Woman-Woman, in Africa

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Uganda

ADRIAN JJUUKO
Executive Director, Human Rights Awareness and Promotion Forum (HRAPF)–Kampala, Uganda
LLD Candidate, Centre for Human Rights, University of Pretoria

A historical and contemporary look at the LGBTQ community in this East African nation.

Uganda is a diverse community with forty-three living languages, forty-one of which are indigenous and two nonindigenous (Ethnologue 2017). There are sixty-five ethnic groups recognized in Article 10(a) and the Third Schedule of the Constitution of Uganda (1995). These ethnic groups can be subdivided into four large language groupings: the Bantu, the Nilotics, the Sudanic people, and the Kuliak pockets (Lewis 2009). With such diversity, traditional attitudes toward homosexuality vary from group to group.

It is important to note that traditionally what are now referred to as LGBTQ issues were regarded as behavioral peculiarities rather than questions of sexual orientation, gender identity, or sex determination (Epprecht 2008). With regard to homosexuality, some scholars, such as Apolo Kagwa (1905) have denied the existence of same-sex relations before the arrival of the Arabs into Buganda, the largest kingdom in the area that was brought together by the British to form present-day Uganda. The Arabs preceded the Europeans, and the first Arab into Buganda is said to have arrived around 1848 during the reign of Kabaka Ssuuna II (r. c. 1832–1856) (Gray 1947). The first European, John Hanning Speke (1827–1864), arrived in 1862 during the reign of Mutesa I (r. 1856–1884). Yet, there is enough evidence that same-sex sexuality existed in Africa, including in Buganda, before the arrival of foreigners (Epprecht 2008). John F. Faupel (1984) states that homosexuality was rife at the Kabaka’s court by the time the colonialists arrived. Homosexuality was also acknowledged among the Bahima (Mushanga 1973). Among the Lango, mukodo dako males (men who behaved liked women) were accepted and even allowed to marry men (Murray and Roscoe 1998). Homosexuality was also observed among the Sebei (Goldschmidt 1967).

Although each community had its own specific attitudes toward homosexuality and gender-bending, the attitudes can best be summarized as follows: that homosexuality was neither entirely accepted nor fully condemned (Tamale 2003). What is clear is that there was a veil of secrecy surrounding such practices, just as there was for all matters concerning sexuality. In terms of criminalization, homosexuality and gender-bending were not criminalized even though well-elaborated systems of punishing deviant sexual behaviors.
existed. There are numerous instances of prescribed punishments for sexual transgressions among traditional communities in Uganda. For example, among the Bakiga, a girl who became pregnant before marriage would be punished by being pushed off a cliff (Edel 1996). Among the Baganda, adultery was punished by death or, in cases where the sentence was reduced, by mutilation or fines (Roscoe 1911). No known punishment existed, however, for homosexuality or gender-bending. The lack of punishment, far from suggesting that homosexuality did not exist in these communities, suggests that it is an issue that was rather not dealt with within the public discourse.

Apart from the clear nonpenal approach toward homosexuality, for cross-dressing and gender-bending, there was acknowledgment of their existence. Among the Baganda, men who behaved like women or women who behaved like men were acknowledged, and sometimes the behavior would be frowned on but not punished. They were regarded as kyakulassajja (male-like woman) or nakawanga (she-cock) for women who behaved like men, and ekikazikazi (womanly male) for men who behaved like women (Nannyonga-Tamusuza 2009). Indeed, gender-bending by women of high status, such as the king’s mother and daughters, was required and they would be allowed to do what only men could do and would also be addressed as men (Nannyonga-Tamusuza 2009). Music also shows that women and men could be allowed to exchange roles. For example, the royal Bakisimba dance is an erotic dance in which males can act out roles of women and where men can dance with men in a visibly erotic way (Nannyonga-Tamusuza 2005). Among the Bagisu, transvestism was acknowledged and considered normal (La Fontaine 1959). Among the Banyoro, during certain cultural rites, a man would be required to behave as a woman (Needham 1973). Among the Iteso, effeminate men were accepted, and they could do work traditionally reserved for women and take on women’s names (Lawrance 1957). Among the Lango, mukodo dako (alternative gender status) men were seen as part of the social fabric and were accepted (Driberg 1923).

The Impact of Colonialism, Capitalism, and Religion on Attitudes toward Homosexuality

The Impact of Colonialism, Capitalism, and Religion on Attitudes toward Homosexuality

Traditional attitudes toward homosexuality, cross-dressing, and intersex persons have undergone transformation through religion, colonialism, and capitalism. Uganda is a predominantly religious country with Christianity and Islam being the dominant religious groups, even while traditional beliefs continue to influence how Islam and Christianity are practiced (Kassimir 1999). Both Islam and Christianity have teachings against homosexuality and cross-dressing. Religious leaders are at the front line of opposing homosexuality and usually preach against it (Jjuuko 2013). Because these teachings influence peoples’ perceptions of homosexuality and cross-dressing, the majority of Ugandans feel that homosexuality and crossdressing are wrong, despite a hitherto more
KABAKA MWANGA (1866–1901)

Danieri Basammula-Ekkere Mwanga II was the thirty-first Kabaka (king) of the Buganda kingdom of central Uganda. He reigned from 1884 to 1888 and again from 1889 to 1897. He is most known for ordering the killings, between 1885 and 1888, of more than fifty of his pages who had converted to Christianity, forty-five of whom are now celebrated by the Christian community as the Uganda Martyrs. It is important to note that such killings were, in fact, not out of place in precolonial Buganda. He reigned at a time of European incursion into the Great Lakes region of Africa along with the introduction of Christianity. Therefore, most of his reign is characterized by struggles between religion-inspired warring factions and an increasingly loosening hold on power. He was deposed twice, first by religious factions in 1888 and later by the British in 1897, who exiled him to the Seychelles islands, where he died in 1901.

Intertwined in the political story of Kabaka Mwanga is the issue of his sexuality. It is alleged that he engaged in same-sex relations with his subjects. In a country where it is persistently claimed that homosexuality is un-African and was a colonial import, he stands out as a prominent challenge to that assertion since he came to power before Buganda was declared a British protectorate. The main author of the claim about Kabaka Mwanga's sexuality is the Reverend John P. Faupel, who in his telling of the story of the Uganda Martyrs claims that the main reason why the young men were killed was because they had denied sexual favors to the king, who was an absolute monarch (Faupel 1984). Apolo Kagwa, who is famous for his chronicles on Buganda's precolonial history, and who was Mwanga's katikiro (prime minister), confirms that indeed the practice of homosexuality was known in Buganda at the time, having in his view been introduced by the Arabs before Europeans reached Buganda. But he was silent as to whether the Kabaka was involved in it or not (Kagwa 1971).

Other scholars, however, are of the view that the story about Mwanga's homosexuality is a fabrication or at best a misunderstanding of what was actually happening. Those who contend that it was a fabrication argue that Mwanga was married to more than sixteen women and was not involved in homosexual acts as alleged. It was the missionaries, Mwanga’s political enemies, who started the allegation with the aim of demonizing him and making him unappealing to his subjects (Lwanga-Lunyiigo 2011). Those who argue that this was a misunderstanding state that what was taking place at the time could not accurately be described as a matter of sexual orientation but rather a show of political power or a matter of rituals (Hoad 2007). One of the justifications for this argument includes the reference to the Kabaka by both men and women as Bbaffe (our husband) (Nsimbi 1956). Theoretically, therefore, he could have sex with both men and women and that would be acceptable.
Today, Mwanga’s alleged homosexuality stands as an example of homosexuality in precolonial Uganda, and as such his story is used by some LGBTQ activists to show that same-sex practices were not alien to precolonial Uganda (Rao 2015). However, it has not been as exploited by LGBTQ activists in Uganda as much as would have been expected. This is perhaps because of the fear of alienating the Baganda, who revere their kings, and, in light of current homophobia, would be uncomfortable with one of their late kings being described as a homosexual. Another reason is because Mwanga’s alleged homosexuality was largely practiced with young boys and could now be regarded as pedophilia, something that antigay groups purport to be part of the LGBT movement’s agenda (Rao 2015).

Antihomosexuality factions have also tried to use Mwanga's story for their campaigns, with religious leaders such as Martin Ssempa, a pastor and activist, using it to demonize homosexuality. From 2004 onward, Uganda Martyrs' Day celebrations have had pastors focus on Mwanga’s alleged homosexuality as an example of negative behavior that should not be tolerated (Rao 2015). Other persons also use it against Muslims, who were alleged to have introduced homosexuality in Buganda (Kagwa 1971). Mwanga’s alleged homosexuality therefore remains controversial and polarizing in modern-day Uganda.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Adrian Jjuuko
Executive Director
Human Rights Awareness and Promotion
Colonialism led to the adoption of an antagonistic sentiment toward homosexuality, harbored by the English at the time, into Uganda’s national laws. Using the powers granted to the governor under the 1902 Order in Council, the 1930 Penal Code Ordinance was specifically made for Uganda, modeled after the 1901 Griffith Code of Queensland. Its 1950 version is still the reigning law in Uganda and has been amended only a few times since its enactment. Although the laws criminalizing same-sex sex were barely enforced during colonial times, the official colonial policy was against homosexuality and, when combined with religion, resulted in the ostracism of homosexuals that continues into the twenty-first century. This has led to the argument that what was imported into Africa was homophobia rather than homosexuality (Hoad 2007; Tamale 2013).

This colonial legacy can then be said to have partly inspired the postcolonial developments, as there was a blueprint and the necessary attitudes to build on in further ostracizing LGBTQ persons. In 1990 the penal code was amended to increase the punishment for the offense of having carnal knowledge against the order of nature from fourteen years’ imprisonment to life imprisonment. This was at the height of the HIV/AIDS pandemic in Uganda. In 2005 the constitution was amended to specifically prohibit same-sex marriages (Mujuzi 2009). The reason for this action was partly concern that the South African courts were about to allow same-sex marriages using the constitutional provisions (which they soon thereafter did), and this could easily be done in Uganda. In 2007 Section 15(6)(d), which stopped the Equal Opportunities Commission from investigating matters regarded as immoral or unacceptable by the majority of the cultural groupings in Uganda, was inserted into the Equal Opportunities Commission Act, clearly to stop homosexuals from accessing the Equal Opportunities Commission (Tamale 2014). In 2014 the Anti-Homosexuality Act (AHA) expanded the definition of homosexuality beyond penetrative sexual acts to acts such as touching with the intent to commit homosexuality; prohibited “aiding and abetting” and “promotion” of homosexuality; described all houses where homosexuals would have sexual contact as brothels; made homosexuality an extraditable offense; and gave immunity to anyone who committed any crime while protecting themselves against homosexuality. In August 2014, however, the nation’s Constitutional Court nullified this law, as it had been passed without the constitutionally mandated quorum. In 2016 the NonGovernmental Organisations Act included vague provisions stopping nongovernmental organizations from engaging in activities that could be regarded as prejudicial to, among other things, the “dignity” of Ugandans. In November 2016, the Constitutional Court nullified section 15(6)(d) of the Equal Opportunities Commission Act, 2007 in the case of Jjuuko Adrian v. Attorney General, Constitutional Petition No. 1 of 2009. Antineocolonialism sentiments have played a big role in promoting some recent negative developments, since protection of LGBTI persons is perceived as one of the new ways in which the West is engaging in neocolonialism.

Capitalism was also introduced as part of the colonial package, promoting industrialization, independence, individual freedoms, and freedom of trade. This increased individualism (as opposed to communalism) in some respects introduced more tolerance for and discussion about homosexuality than before, because capitalists are more concerned with profits than morality. The human rights discourse, which is also based on the capitalistic model as it emphasizes individual rights, has unsurprisingly become the main route through which the recognition of LGBTQ persons is being sought in Uganda (Jjuuko 2013). Ideas such as ubuntu, which is the South African--developed world viewpoint that one is because the others are, is rarely employed with regard to LGBTQ rights in favor of human rights discourse. Indeed, in situations in which the economy is increasingly becoming more capitalistic, the demand for individual rather than communal rights makes sense.

What is clear, therefore, is that the current attitudes toward homosexuality and cross-dressing in Uganda are a result of multiple factors with resistance attributed more to religion and colonialism, and liberation attributed more to capitalism and the emergence of the human rights movement. Therefore, the move from tolerance to oppression and now the gradual move back to tolerance seem to be influenced by these different developments.

Attitudes toward Homosexuality Today and the Current LGBTQ Struggles

Socially, the community is generally opposed to homosexuality and transgender issues. Opinion polls have consistently shown disapproval ratings for these in the 90th percentile (Pew Research Center 2013; Dulani, Sambo, and Dionne 2016). These opinion polls should, however, be taken with a pinch of salt, because they may not actually represent the views of the majority, especially those in rural areas who have not interacted with LGBTQ people and therefore have no basis on which to give a satisfactory answer, as well as those who are most likely to say they are homophobic because it seems to be the fashionable thing to say. Patrick Awondo, Peter Geschiere, and Graeme Reid (2012) call for new ways of viewing and understanding homophobia in Africa, as there is a bias toward Africa being homophobic. In practice, not many LGBTQ people in Uganda are out and visible. However, where people come out as openly gay, bisexual, lesbian, or transgender, they are most likely to be ostracized and may not easily access education or employment. There is occasional violence against LGBTQ persons, which is usually in the form of violent evictions from rented premises, family rejection, police arrests leading to forced anal examinations and HIV tests, and forced parading before the media (HRAPF et al. 2016). There is limited access to specialized health services, although the Ministry of Health supports specialized clinics dealing with health matters concerning LGBTI persons under the Most at Risk Populations Initiative. Severe stigma is also exhibited within the communities and in mass media, both traditional and social media. There is witch-hunting and ostracizing from religious leaders. Worse still, there is little protection from law enforcement agencies and even extortion and blackmail when these violations occur (CSCHRCL and HRAPF 2013). Although attempts are made to document these violations, it is acknowledged that many more occur than are reported (HRAPF et al. 2016).

In response to these violations and the need for legal recognition and protection, the Ugandan LGBTQ community has come out strongly to struggle for equality. The first nascent steps of the movement were taken by spirited individuals speaking out about their sexual orientation and gender identity (Jjuuko 2013). One of the earliest efforts toward visibility and recognition was a press conference in 2007 organized by Sexual Minorities Uganda (SMUG) which included LGBTQ persons wearing masks to hide their identities (BBC News 2007). SMUG was founded by, among others, the human rights activist Victor Juliet Mukasa. In 2005 Mukasa’s house had been raided, and a visitor who was in the house at the time, Yvonne Oyoo, was arrested and subjected to degrading treatment. This led to the first court case on LGBTQ rights in Uganda, Victor Mukasa and Yvonne Oyoo v. Attorney General (2008).

The victory in this case galvanized LGBTQ efforts to struggle for equality but also spurred a backlash in the form of harsher reactions from the state and religious leaders. The efforts toward visibility were met with exacting responses from religious and political leaders coming out strongly against homosexuality, including the president, the minister of ethics and integrity, and prominent religious leaders (Jjuuko 2013). The police also joined the fray, and members of the community who wanted to be admitted to an HIV/AIDS conference were arrested (Uganda Radio Network 2008). An anti-LGBTQ conference was organized by the Family Life Network, headed by Pastor Stephen Langa, and it was addressed by, among others, the notorious American antigay minister Scott Lively (Nyanzi and Karamagi 2015). The conference castigated homosexuality, and the parents in attendance were informed of the “gay agenda” and how to bring up children who will not be swayed into homosexuality. The minister of ethics and integrity then promised a tougher law against homosexuality (Namutebi 2009).

The Anti-Homosexuality Bill (AHB) was subsequently introduced in the Ugandan parliament in 2009. The LGBTQ community and mainstream supporters came together under the umbrella of the Civil Society Coalition on Human Rights and Constitutional Law (CSCHRCL) to oppose the bill. The CSCHRCL’s efforts attracted international attention to the AHB, and Uganda soon became a key site for the global cultural wars (Kaoma 2009). The CSCHRCL’s major victory was the nullification of the AHA through court action on 1 August 2014.

The fight against the AHB occurred on all fronts: legal, political, social, and intellectual. On the legal front, Ugandan LGBTQ activists filed eight cases before Ugandan courts, at the regional East African Court of Justice, and in the United States. The Ugandan courts ruled in favor of the LGBTQ community in four out of the six filed before them; only one case was lost, and the other was still pending as of 2017. The case at the East African Court of Justice was dismissed as the court found it to be academic because the AHA had been nullified by the Ugandan Constitutional Court, although indeed the point was made that Ugandan LGBT activists were ready to go the whole way, including using regional and international courts to protect the rights of LGBT persons. A case brought by SMUG in the United States was dismissed but only because Lively was protected by the US Constitution. The court made it clear that his actions constituted persecution, which is a crime under international law, scoring a major symbolic victory for SMUG and thus leading to a strange appeal by Lively on this point.

Politically, the CSCHRCL persuaded its allies, which included other governments, to lobby and engage Uganda’s president and cabinet on the bill (Jjuuko 2013). Socially, LGBTQ people became more visible and were able to organize pride parades for the first time while also engaging the public on social media, particularly Facebook. The murder of David Kato, an LGBTQ activist considered the father of Uganda’s gay rights movement, in 2011 further galvanized the community and attracted more international attention, and criticism, to the bill.

Intellectually, the CSCHRCL involved itself in scholarly writings and studies and encouraged writings from its members and supporters. In 2013 the CSCHRCL together with the Human Rights Awareness and Promotion Forum (HRAPF) published a report on the enforcement of Section 145 of the penal code, which, as of 2017, still was the existing law criminalizing consensual same-sex conduct. The CSCHRCL also developed and presented a twenty-page memorandum to the Ugandan parliament’s Committee on Legal and Parliamentary Affairs during the public hearings on the Anti-Homosexuality Bill. The HRAPF also published violations reports showing how the rights of LGBTI persons were violated during the time the bill was being debated. Sylvia Tamale, Joe Oloka-Onyango, and Stella Nyanzi, scholars at Makerere University, also produced a great deal of scholarly writing on the bill and act, as did the activists Paul Semugoma, Adrian Jjuuko, and Andrew Karamagi, among others. Ugandan scientists, at the invitation of the president, also wrote the first-ever official report on the causes of homosexuality, which the president then misinterpreted as concluding that homosexuality was a matter of nurture rather than nature, and thus used it as a basis to sign the AHB into law.

The CSCHRCL and its members also gave interviews to foreign authors, who have also published widely on the issue of the AHA and on LGBTQ rights generally in Uganda. All this information helped to challenge widely held homophobic views and myths and contributed in different ways to the struggle against the bill. These various efforts were recognized through a number of international awards, including the US Department of State’s Human Rights Defenders Award, given to the CSCHRCL in 2011; the 2010 Human Rights First Award to the Ugandan intersex and transgender activist Julius Kaggwa; the Rafto Prize, awarded to SMUG in 2011; the Robert F. Kennedy Human Rights Award, presented to SMUG executive director Frank Mugisha in 2011; the Martin Ennals Award for Human Rights Defenders, given in 2011 to the LGBTQ activist Kasha Jacqueline Nabagesera (Jjuuko 2013); the 2016 Vera Chirwa Award by the University of Pretoria’s Centre for Human Rights to Jjuuko; and Jjuuko’s nomination as one of five finalists for the European Union’s Human Rights Defenders Award in 2017.

With the nullification of the AHA, the trends of violations against LGBTQ persons in Uganda changed from being state led to being led by the common people. Incidences of evictions from rented premises and villages, beatings and other forms of violence, including burning with gasoline, increased (HRAPF et al. 2016). Many LGBTQ leaders were forced to flee the country and seek asylum elsewhere, and these included pioneers such as Victor Mukasa, Val Kalende, John Abdallah Wambere, and Robert Karemire. International attention also largely moved away from Uganda, and the LGBTQ movement was weakened. Conversations, discussions, and debates continue, however, with social media continuing to serve as a major communication platform, and there seems to be a marked degree of tolerance at least among civil servants and print media and online commentators.

SEE ALSO Ubuntu

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Nyanzi, Stella, and Andrew Karamagi. “The Social-Political Dynamics of the Anti-homosexuality Legislation in Uganda.” Agenda: Empowering Women for Gender Equity 29,

The Ugly Law (1961–1965; Denmark)

PETER EDELBERG
External Lecturer, Saxo Institute
University of Copenhagen, Denmark

A law intended to crack down on male prostitution in Copenhagen, which was successfully challenged by Danish gay rights advocates.

The Ugly Law was a Danish anti-prostitution law specifically targeting homosexual customers of the increasing population of male prostitutes in the capital of Copenhagen in the early 1960s. The stated goal was to protect young men from homosexual seduction, which was thought to make them antisocial, parasites on society, and, indeed, homosexuals themselves, as well as to send a signal to gay men that they should stick to equal-age partners among themselves. The law, however, had the unintended effect of uniting certain centrist and left-wing politicians, progressive doctors and psychiatrists, and the few homosexual activists who dared stand in opposition to the law; together, they turned significant sections of public opinion, including two major newspapers, against what they saw as oppression and harassment of a minority. In 1965, only four years after its enactment, the law was repealed, an event celebrated among homosexuals and their allies as a major victory, effectively becoming the tipping point toward gay rights rather than gay prosecution in Denmark.

Homosexual relations had been legal in Denmark since the revision of the penal code in 1933. However, the age of consent was eighteen for homosexual relations and fifteen for heterosexual, both having a three-year-higher age limit for cases of abuse of authority. Male prostitution was completely prohibited, whereas part-time female prostitution had been legal since 1906.

In the 1950s growing concerns were voiced over male teenage prostitution in Copenhagen. Young men—mainly conscripted soldiers, but also younger teenagers—would offer themselves to men for money around City Hall Square and the Latin Quarter. Copenhagen at the time had several gay bars and other gay venues that seem to have been respected (though still under surveillance by the police), and male teenage prostitution seems to have been an integrated aspect of gay male culture at the time. The men could get prosecuted for having sex with a minor under eighteen, but the police could not prosecute the men in cases in which the prostitute was above eighteen. The police suggested that a law prohibiting the buying of sexual services from same-sex persons under twenty-one would effectively end the market for male prostitutes.
The law was introduced in 1961, but the debate that had been going on since the mid-1950s had already turned several opinion makers against what they saw as unfair discrimination against a minority. The day after the law had been voted through parliament, a leading Danish newspaper criticized it under the headline “An Ugly Law,” giving the law its name both in the debate at the time and in history since. The newspaper stipulated that the law would lead to blackmail and violence against gay men.

While only a few gay men were actually prosecuted under the law, the concomitant police campaign largely did manage to eradicate the market for male prostitution in Copenhagen for a decade or two. Much more important was that the law had put gay rights on the public agenda and that those who had advocated rights for homosexuals successfully campaigned for change. When outspoken and activist “American-style” gay and lesbian liberation came to Denmark in the early 1970s after the Stonewall riots in New York City, the public and the politicians were already much more sympathetic, because Denmark had already had its own “Little Stonewall.”

SEE ALSO The Wolfenden Report

BIBLIOGRAPHY

The role that urban milieus play in the production of queer culture, identity formation, and modes of socialization.

This entry discusses the rise of a modern queer urbanity in the early twentieth century, traces the consolidation of LGBTQ quarters in North American and European cities during and after the liberation period that started in the 1960s, and covers the complex relation between queerness and urbanism up to the current day, arguing that sexual and gender diversity are salient features of the urban world, but so are ongoing forms of discrimination, violence, and intersectional division lines. Variegated geographies of sexualities extend beyond the conspicuous “gayborhoods” that are located in metropolitan cores in the Global North. This complicates the narratives that equate the cultural globalization of sexualities to processes of diffusion and homogenization. The entry provides examples of specific cities in certain times. These have been selected for their singularity (e.g., Berlin between the two world wars and San Francisco in the 1970s) or because they illustrate broad trends of evolving urban queerness, as is case with Miami Beach, an example of the territorial dilution of LGBT enclaves and de-gaying. A broader scope is adopted to cover the contested emergence of spaces of inclusion and exclusion in cities throughout Latin America, the Asia Pacific region, and other locations where the emergence of a “gay-friendly” circuit is conjoined with processes of urban regeneration and global gentrification in the early twenty-first century. The entry makes reference to historical sites and legendary establishments, some of which have not left traces in the academic literature but are remembered in community narratives and media records. It concludes with discussion of the centripetal pull that major cities continue to exert in the age of global migration and the relation between urban and digital queer spaces.

The Invention and Survival of Queer Urbanity

The gay and queer histories that have been written for world cities such as New York (Chauncey 1994) and London (Ackroyd 2017) indicate the long-standing nexus between sexual dissidence, gender diversity, and urbanism. Evidence of a queer presence in cities dates from antiquity and is substantial since as early as 1600 (Aldrich 2004; Higgs 1999). Increased visibility in cities including London in the nineteenth century was met with repressive state reactions, such as the criminalization of “gross acts of indecency” in 1885
(Cook 2003). Yet, this hostility could not prevent the growth of a scene and the early formation of a community that began to make political claims for recognition (Houlbrook 2006).

Few cities in history rival Berlin in the creation and consolidation of modern forms of queer culture and socialization in the early twentieth century. During the Weimar Republic period (1919–1933) in Germany, the city gained international recognition for its permissiveness but also its liberationist politics and cultural creativity. In the so-called Golden Twenties, Berlin boasted a hedonistic nightlife. Visitors from throughout Europe and the United States were attracted in no small measure to the ease of sexual encounters in the city. In addition to conspicuous forms of male and female prostitution, blurrier entanglements of sex work and intimacy were observed in the context of international economic expansion and Germany's war repayment worries (Beachy 2015). The scene also comprised liberationist print media and research-based activism against criminalization, and both fed off and energized Berlin's creative milieu for cultural production and sex-social experimentation (Beachy 2015). Christopher Isherwood's 1939 novel Goodbye to Berlin is one of the best-known portrayals of this milieu.

The 1933 Nazi takeover of power in Germany brought Berlin's queer scene to a screeching halt. Violent repression ensued, and gay men were targeted as deviants and enemies of the regime; some were imprisoned in concentration camps. Among the few able to escape, sexologist Magnus Hirschfeld (1868–1935) continued spreading his science-based liberationist discourse internationally (Beachy 2015). Amid the harshness of the wartime period, gay men and lesbians from Allied countries found unlikely openings for socialization and self-awareness in military operations. Particularly for the United States, a country engaged on two different international fronts, massive drafts brought people together and out of their previous rural and small-town isolation, even if the military imposed homophobic rules, and the risk of dishonorable discharge was pervasive (Bérubé 2010). American writer John Horne Burns's best-selling autobiographical novel The Gallery (1947), set in and around a covered shopping arcade in occupied Naples, depicts some such openings and the queer interactions between Allied soldiers and local populations. Even more, by the time the war was over, as Randy Shilts (1982) speculated, the so-called blue discharges that removed suspected homosexuals from the military had fueled the initial clustering of known gay men in garrison and port cities such as Chicago, New York, and especially San Francisco. This process of urban clustering and enclave formation continued and multiplied in the years after the war.

The Roles of Cities and Neighborhoods in the Liberation Movement

Countries in North America and Western Europe experienced prolonged prosperity after World War II. LGBT visibility grew during decades of large-scale industrialization and metropolitan expansion. Institutionalized homophobia continued in the postwar period, and at least for London there is evidence that the planning mechanisms to rebuild war-torn cities included explicit measures to suppress urban queerness (Hornsey 2010). Yet, gay- and lesbian-oriented subcultures continued to thrive in cities big and small, as well as in vacation resorts such as Fire Island in New York (Newton 1993). In the decades following the war, gay and lesbian bars emerged in numerous US cities. John D’Emilio (1983) documents their presence in cities such as Worcester, Massachusetts; Buffalo, New York; Columbia, South Carolina; and Des Moines, Iowa. Cities also saw the rise of other types of establishments dedicated to socialization and the pursuit of sexual satisfaction. Whereas bathhouses have a well-documented historical presence in the city (Bérubé 2003), sex clubs and fetish bars multiplied and gradually replaced the “tearoom” culture of public cruising that had developed in earlier times (Edelman 1994). Outdoor sites for sexual encounters continued to exist, but these would receive less political support from the community over time in the face of ongoing policing and social pressures to disband them. Public pursuit of sex was more heavily stigmatized when it involved trade (exchange of cash for favors), which implicated trans women and other vulnerable groups, such as runaway queer youth. As a result, these groups began to organize around their own issues. In Paris, a preventive health organization focused on the transsexual community, Prévention Action Santé Travail pour les Transgenres (PASTT; Prevention Action Health Work for the Transgendered), began offering support in the form of clinic referrals and condoms at organizations and public places used by the community, including the Bois de Boulogne, a park well known for sex trade (Namaste 2009).

The urban clustering of queerness grew to include daytime activities and more places for socialization, such as community centers and dedicated bookstores (a famous example being Gay’s the Word in the Bloomsbury area of central London), and artistic expressions in public spaces, including graffiti. Thus, initial clusters grew into fully fledged neighborhoods, which came to be at the forefront of local and national struggles of the liberation movement. They would transform the standing of sexual and gender diversity in US cities and the broader society through the late 1960s and 1970s. The 1969 Stonewall riots in New York City’s Greenwich Village are now remembered as a major inflection point in the gay liberation movement and have inspired LGBTQ+ pride parades that are now held in cities around the world. As the liberation movement continued, the Castro neighborhood of San Francisco became a paradigm of the gay enclave. The territorial approach to concentrating in a given city district was intended to free everyday life from violence and prejudice but also to gain political and economic footholds into American mainstream society—a history that was mirrored in several other advanced industrial countries (see Wotherspoon 1991 for the case of Sydney, Australia). The Castro and its satellite neighborhoods have been studied in terms of identity-based urban social movements (Castells 1983), property-appreciation strategies in urban land markets (Knopp 1990), and more recently, urban cultural tourism based on queer identity (Howe 2001).

Residents of the metropolitan Los Angeles area took the strategy of territorial clustering and control further with the 1984 municipal incorporation of West Hollywood, a city that would be shaped by LGBT interests and whose population at the time was estimated to be 30 to 40 percent gay and lesbian (Forest 1995). But local backlashes, such as the movement against the Dade County antidiscrimination resolution in Florida, led by conservative political activist Anita Bryant (1940–), indicated the limits of the territorial approach. Therefore, LGBT interests began pursuing nationwide economic campaigns and political lobbying. For example, gay and lesbian activists organized a boycott of Florida orange juice, for which Bryant served as a brand ambassador, from 1977 to 1980, when she was fired by the Florida Citrus Commission. Throughout the 1980s and 1990s there were community responses to the HIV/AIDS crisis on multiple levels. Neighborhood-based networks of care and service provision joined with organizations at the city, state, and national levels to press for more satisfactory governmental support for medical research and drug development.

The Castro Neighborhood in San Francisco. The Castro neighborhood of San Francisco became the most paradigmatic example of the gay enclave approach to territorial organization, which was intended to free everyday life from violence and prejudice but also to gain political and economic footholds into American mainstream society.

Gayborhood Exclusions, the Rise of Homonormativity, and Gaytrification

Early commentators already noticed the underrepresentation of women since the initial stages of gayborhood development. Linda Peake (1993) critiqued gayborhood research itself as patriarchally focused on gay men, and Heidi J. Nast (2002) has claimed that male-oriented gayborhoods, such as Chicago’s Boystown, betray complicity with heteropatriarchy. Yet, a few communities, such as Northampton, Massachusetts, and Brighton in Sussex, United Kingdom, are more decidedly mixed or lesbian-oriented. Other critics of gayborhood research have sought to bring attention to the less-conspicuous urban landscapes, and pointed to income differentials and ideological divergences vis-à-vis material consumption (Adler and Brenner 1992; Binnie and Valentine 1999). Intersectional critiques of gayborhoods mention their whiteness, cisgenderism (preference for people whose presented gender matches the sex identity assigned at birth), and lack of support for, if not overt repression of, homeless queer youth, many of whom are low-income, nonwhite, and gender-nonconforming (Irazábal and Huerta 2016). Petra Doan (2007) discusses why the gendered nature of gay and lesbian villages results in continued levels of harassment and violence for transgender and gender-variant people.

Exclusionary dynamics played out similarly in different locations and on multiple scales. In Los Angeles, the now-defunct Jewel’s Catch One nightclub catering to queer black patrons flourished in a location away from the West Hollywood scene. In New York, diverse queer communities developed beyond the white middle-class Manhattan scene. Jennie Livingston’s 1990 documentary Paris Is Burning chronicles the ball culture that African American, Latinx (a gender-neutral way of rendering Latino/a), and trans communities created in the 1980s amid various hardships and violence. In the United Kingdom, London’s Club Kali has a history that spans over two decades, but in Birmingham the Asian gay club scene has been more unstable and subject to complex negotiations with club owners for its survival (Bassi 2006). In São Paulo, Brazil, reports that commercial establishments oriented toward gays, lesbians, and sympathizers (allies/supporters) do not consider travestis (a gender and sociopolitical identity specific to Latin America of femme or female-identified persons who were male-assigned at birth) and trans people as part of the clientele/community prompted antidiscrimination actions, such as the Blitz Trans event organized during the 2004 pride parade (França 2007). Fault lines between gay men and trans women also appear in more subtle forms. An ethnographic study in Tel Aviv demonstrated how tensions surface and separations take place within the microgeography of the dance floor at a mixed nightclub (Misgav and Johnston 2014).

Sometime in the 1990s, LGBTQ+ involvement in national US politics began to show an explicitly conservative dimension (Duggan 2003). Departing from the earlier days of liberationism, a so-called homonormative discourse was emerging with a focus on social conformity and advancement in the neoliberal and increasingly unequal economy.
Sarah Schulman (2012) has drawn attention to the implications of this shift for paradigmatic urban places of political dissent, such as Manhattan's Lower East Side. Since the late 1980s, activist queer creativity has been evicted and replaced by much tamer, politically demobilized, economically elitist, and socially conservative sexual identities. On the other side of Manhattan, the more uniformly gay neighborhood of Chelsea exemplifies these trends.

Gentrification not only brings higher rents and transformed demographics but also impinges on cultural production, community cohesion, and solidarity. Juan Miguel Kanai and Kai Kettamaa-Squires (2015) reported that the short-lived LGBT community center of South Beach in Miami was replaced by a tourism-oriented visitor center, which is now the community's most visible institution. As these processes play out in a larger number of cities, researchers have begun to use the term gaytrification to refer to processes of neighborhood change in which the influx of gay residents and businesses has played an upgrading role but also contributed to ongoing real estate and rent appreciation that causes original residents to be displaced. Gaytrification has been studied comparatively in Francophone cities such as Paris and Montreal (Giraud 2010).

Beyond Metrocentrism: Diverse Queer Urbanities

The focus of literature on queer urbanities has broadened in recent years, recognizing that engaging homonormativity in gaytrified spaces and premium city districts is not sufficient. Such a singular focus implies a metrocentrism that ignores numerous other “ordinary” queer lives in working-class, ethnic, and immigrant neighborhoods, expansive suburbs, regional cities, small towns, and even places that retain rural feel (Phillips et al. 2000). Moreover, a relational turn has led to the realization that cities exist in larger queer, multiracial, international, and imperial contexts, where dialectical relations between queer urbanity and other geographies of sexuality imply that multiple, overlapping stories constitute a key feature of every city (Potter 2014). Spatial relations are complex and flow in different directions; they are not limited to a diffusionist model that flows from metropolitan queer cores to heteronormative peripheries in the countryside. Larry Knopp and Michael Brown point out that “queer cultural and political interventions in small and nonmetropolitan areas are not necessarily dependent on the successful adoption of innovations, or procurement of resources, from elsewhere. Nor are big cities necessarily uninfluenced by the interventions and resources of their ‘hinterlands’” (2003, 422).

Commercially oriented nighttime scenes in the city still matter. LGBTQ establishments may be facing an uncertain evolution in North America and Europe (Collins 2004; Ghaziani 2014), but they continue to emerge in cities of Latin America (such as Mexico City’s Zona Rosa, Buenos Aires, São Paulo, and Rio de Janeiro), South Africa (particularly Cape Town), the Asia Pacific region (initially in Bangkok and Manila but also increasingly in Hong Kong, Singapore, Seoul, and older enclaves, such as Tokyo’s Shinjuku Ni-chôme), and more timidly in India’s largest cities. In cases such as Beijing’s burgeoning lesbian-oriented scene, interactions between lalas (a colloquial term used by women-loving women in mainland China since the 1990s) evince the tensions between expanding personal freedoms associated with economic prosperity and urban growth, the constraints that political authority places on civil society, and, as Elisabeth Engebretsen puts it, “[the] rigid system of social and familial norms that continues to define dominant ideals pertaining to family, gender, and desirable Chinese culture writ large” (2013, 5). More generally, if there is a model for the queer Asian city (and by extension, other cities beyond the West), it does not necessarily align with the Western progression of liberation, acquisition of rights, equality, and assimilation. Instead, Audrey Yue and Helen Hok-Sze Leung posit the concept of “disjunctive modernities” whereby “legislation, economic and cultural policies, activism and social movement, and the myriad quotidian practices of queer subjects do not align neatly but rather contradict or complicate one other” (2017, 261).

The globalization of queerness is not a linear process of diffusion, and the negotiation of Western and non-Western queer identities needs to be explored in detail (Oswin 2006). Sofian Merabet’s (2014) engagement with Beirut’s queer space brings to the fore the city’s class and sectarian structures. Alongside colonial history and wartime scars, these give shape to contested identities of sexual difference. Gavin Brown (2008) argues that different identities and forms of socialization exist in Chengdu, China, and these would be missed in analyses solely focused on self-identified gays. In the early 1990s, Michael Warner warned that “as the rights discourse of internationalism is extended to more and more cultural contexts, Anglo-American queer theorists will have to be more alert to the globalizing—and localizing—tendencies of our theoretical languages” (1993, xii). Peter Jackson’s (2011) edited book on Bangkok constitutes a contemporary application of this principle in its carefulness to engage the city’s variegated LGBT and queer cultures beyond the layers most conspicuously on offer to English-speaking visitors.

Internationally oriented gay scenes modeled after their North American and European counterparts represent only a portion of the urban queer population and tend to cater to elite interests. A case in point is Rio de Janeiro’s tourist-oriented Farme de Amoedo quarter of Ipanema, with its adjacent Posto 9 beach. The city’s places of visibility and socialization, both for locals and visitors, have shifted over time. In Copacabana, the now-extinct Galeria Alaska was the LGBT community’s epicenter in the early days of homosexual liberation of the 1970s and 1980s; up to the twenty-first century, the Posto 6 beach area was a well-known meeting point for tourists and so-called michê (young male sex workers). In earlier decades, sites for travesti sex trade and male same-sex cruising included the Lapa and Cinelândia areas of downtown (Higgs 1999). In contemporary metropolitan Rio, various manifestations of queer urbanity abound and include young people of color from economically disadvantaged backgrounds, such as those who organized a local pride parade in the Maré favela for the first time in 2012.
Queer visibility has increased dramatically in the contemporary Latin American metropolis. The 2017 Academy Award–winning film Una mujer fantástica (A fantastic woman) by Sebastián Lelio depicts a trans woman protagonist leading a life worth living with the gleaming landscape of Santiago de Chile as spectacular background to her everyday activities. But the film also reminds the viewer of her fragility and ongoing forms of discrimination when tragedy strikes. Diverse and oppositional queerness is present in metropolitan peripheries beyond the “gay-friendly” circuits that city governments not only tolerate but have come to sponsor in their pursuit of urban regeneration and international visibility (Kanai 2014). The social and cultural activism of queer youth, many of whom express nonbinary and genderfluid identities, is particularly visible in São Paulo (Ayerbe 2018). Kanai (2015) discusses tensions within the internationally oriented scenes developed in city centers and the challenges that even inclusionary initiatives such as the queer tango movement of Buenos Aires face in bridging metropolitan divides. Yet it is important not to preclude the possibilities of transformative practices. Writing in the regional context of postapartheid South Africa, Xavier Livermon (2014) draws attention to the creativity shown by queer black nightlife expressions in Soweto to construct livable lives. These strategies and formations should resonate with activists and researchers in Latin America and elsewhere.

The Remaking of Queer Urbanity: Migration and the Digital

The social and spatial boundaries of queer urbanity are in flux. Gayborhoods, gay villages, and LGBT enclaves that consolidated with the liberation movement have evolved over time and are undergoing major transformations in the twenty-first century. The relaxation of social mores allows a broader range of locational options to queer residents while regeneration policies and real-estate shifts make it harder to claim a stake in city centers. Yet, the push-and-pull factors reconstituting queer urbanity are multiple and complex.

The city, and its imaginary of sexual freedom and diversity, continues to exert a major role in the international migration of gay men (Carrillo 2018) and queer migrations in general (Luibhéid and Canó 2005). Cities often present harsh economic conditions for people starting over, but they also offer multiple resources and potentials for transnational and local connections for queer migrants, as Martin Manalansan’s (2003) vivid ethnography of Filipino immigrants in New York City exemplifies. In addition to a greater prominence in US cities, there is growing visibility of queer migrants in cities worldwide, including LGBTI refugees in cities from Berlin to Rio de Janeiro. Integration processes are challenging and full of friction—a theme treated in Tomer Heymann’s 2006 film Paper Dolls, which portrays the intersectional complexities in the lives of a group of Filipino transgender migrant workers in Israel.

Digital technologies are implicated in the reworking of urban queerness. Catherine J. Nash and Andrew Gorman-Murray (2016) point out that LGBTQ engagement with information and communication technologies in everyday life seems to be leading to the demise of traditional gay villages and the overall de-gaying of the public sphere. Yet, they argue, these transformations need to be understood relationally and in terms of the networks of online and offline spaces that queer users of digital platforms, new media, and mobile devices inhabit. These are geographically uneven and co-constituted with existing characteristics of places. Their hybridity enables new forms of queer appropriation of the city by affording greater mobility, but also by cementing the reputation and use of specific quarters and sites as queer-friendly. Important new questions about this digital remaking of queer urbanity will need to be addressed. This work should be vigilant of the pitfalls associated with place selectivity and intersectional neglect in research design, and more attention will have to be paid to how the digital is mobilized for urban activism around sexual rights and gender diversity. This is one of the topics Nicola Döring (2009) has identified as central to the research agenda on the internet’s impact on sexuality. The world of queer urbanity is broad and diverse. Emerging digital entanglements are potentiating, not diminishing, this reality.

SEE ALSO Bars and Cabarets in Europe; Bars, Workingclass, in Mexico; Bookstores; Cape Town; Cruising and Cruising Grounds; Gentrification in Europe; Metelkova Mesto (Slovenia); Migrant Queer Communities, US; Migration to Europe; Rural Queerness

BIBLIOGRAPHY

FILMOGRAPHY

El Vampiro de la Colonia Roma (1979; Luis Zapata)

HEATHER VRANA
Assistant Professor, Department of History
University of Florida, Gainesville

Novella that was one of the first in Mexican literature to feature a gay protagonist.

El vampiro de la colonia Roma (also known by its full title, Las aventuras, desventuras y sueños de Adonis García, el vampiro de la colonia Roma) is the second novella of Luis Zapata (1951–). It was published by Editorial Grijalbo in 1979 after winning the prestigious Juan Grijalbo prize for literature and sold around 25,000 copies in its first two months of publication. In 1981 it was translated into English as Adonis García: A Picaresque Novel. Zapata has written around two dozen novels, story collections, and critical works and has been hailed as the most prominent and prolific gay Mexican writer. He is often compared to Fernando Vallejo (Colombia) and Manuel Puig (Argentina).

Plot

The novella comprises seven taped interviews with a gay protagonist who goes by the name Adonis García. Through dreams and memories, García recounts his childhood in a peripheral pueblo and his first years in Mexico City, whence he begins to earn a living through sex work (or el talón in contemporary gay slang). García’s narrative details constant movement between the city and the provinces and between domesticity and desire. The text is framed by themes of appetite, space, desire, memory, and identity.

A solitary son of an ill mother and a preoccupied father, before long García is an orphan who ultimately abandons this natal identity by moving to the capital with a friend and taking the name Adonis. The space of Mexico City becomes the narrator-protagonist’s sensual playground as he pursues both labor and pleasure. As the title suggests, the fashionable districts of the Roma and Cuauhtémoc colonias (neighborhoods) are the primary setting for García’s adventures. There, he explores public baths, fabulous parties, cafés, hotels, shabby bedrooms, and Sanborns, the ubiquitous department store that caters to the city’s middle class, where he meets some of his most memorable tricks. During the day, impious García is often drunk, and he languishes in bedrooms located on well-known streets in the Roma. But at night, he ecstatically pursues tricks and trade for work and pleasure. In his nighttime exploits, García often barely skirts danger. Clients, jealous partners, and city authorities threaten him. Yet he is particularly lighthearted in his discussion of what he estimates to have been around thirty-two bouts of gonorrhea, a risk that, he says, “cannot be avoided, no, especially when one fucks a lot” (Zapata [1979] 2014, 69; translated by Heather Vrana). García strolls the city’s sidewalks but is not quite the flaneur or peripatetic voyeur theorized by scholars such as Michel de Certeau (1984) and Walter Benjamin (1999). Indeed, he would rather sell his body and time than buy the city’s delights.

Although cast as a gay Adonis and a vampire, García challenges dominant depictions of both archetypes. He lives for the night and for libidinal delights but is not a lonely, tragic vampire. Nor is he a pathetic, marginal underworld gay man slinking to dark movie theaters and bathhouses after dark. On the contrary, García is a gay protagonist who is neither ashamed nor repentant; his discussion of sex acts is almost clinical, and his celebratory use of gay slang invites readers into the “in crowd.” Even when he undergoes psychotherapy for addiction and ultimately leaves the hardscrabble Roma for the more reputable residential Cuauhtémoc, García refuses to renounce pleasure.

Source: GRIJALBO

Cover of the First Edition of El Vampiro de la Colonia Roma (1979), by Luis Zapata. Zapata's novella focuses on the character of Adonis García, who makes a living as a sex worker in the urban landscape of the García’s Mexico City is caught between two watershed moments: the 1968 massacre at Tlatelolco that ended the so-called soft dictatorship (dictablanda) of the Partido Revolucionario Institucional (PRI; Institutional Revolutionary Party) and the onset of neoliberalism in the early 1980s. Zapata plays with this tension by recasting iconic intersections, department stores, museums, and monuments through García’s eyes. Bathroom stalls in Mexico City’s consumer paradise, Sanborns, permit acts of corporeal consumption that their designers did not envision. In García's imaginative narration, the Torre Latinoamericana (a skyscraper) becomes an appetizing phallus and the Palacio de Bellas Artes (a cultural center), ample buttocks. He reflects, “Well, the Torre seemed to me like the biggest phallus in Latin America and the Palacio de Bellas Artes the fattest ass in the entire continent—heh—and the whole city was like this, no? Every little corner had a very particular, very sexual enchantment” (Zapata [1979] 2014, 200; translated by Heather Vrana). Intersections become more than just Xs on a map; they signify the potential for encounter. As the body becomes a map of desire in a sexual encounter, so does the Roma become “a metonymic extension of homosexual experience” through the narration of Zapata’s protagonist (Gutiérrez 2010, 245; translated by Heather Vrana). If sexuality is a social construction shaped by space and time, then Zapata’s novella suggests that 1970s Mexico City propagated gay desire at the gritty, rough fringes of bourgeois opulence and cosmopolitanism.

Structure

The text’s formal queerness is its most obvious feature: punctuation is all but absent, syntax and vocabulary are given free rein, and memory’s circumlocutions replace chronology. The text is divided into seven sections, called tapes (cintas), which open with epigraphs from well-known Spanish picaresque novels. Each section is written as if García were sharing stories or memories with an interviewer whose presence is barely noted. Some critics have noted that the text was based on taped interviews between Zapata and a hustler that Zapata later edited. This account of the text’s creation certainly explains the tension between textuality and orality that is one of the text’s most striking hallmarks. The same critics have noted that while editing the interviews Zapata was struck by the similarities between the man’s story and the picaresque novel, so he decided to explore and exploit those similarities.

El vampiro takes the impoverished masculine picaresque hero of the sixteenth- and seventeenth-century Spanish countryside and places him in the twentieth-century Mexican metropolis. Like other pícaros (rogues), Adonis García was orphaned at a young age and had to make his own way in the world. However, Zapata trades the traditional narrator for a tape recorder held by an unnamed interlocutor, replacing the textual formalism of the “lettered city” with a sort of postmodern orality. El vampiro appears spoken, rather than written. Other features of the traditional picaresque novel that are present in El vampiro include the episodic structure of the narrative, the use of colloquial language, and the pícaro protagonist. Yet where other picaresque novels ultimately condemn their willful protagonists, Zapata celebrates García’s rejection of the status quo. For some critics, the fluidity of the narrative suggests fugitive spaces within the capitalist metropolis. The text’s engagement with the picaresque novel is directly invoked in its English translation, which bears the subtitle “A Picaresque Novel.”

Reception and Significance

When it was published, El vampiro joined a rather short list of Mexican novels that featured gay themes or protagonists. Generally, it was a period of exciting growth in the Mexican gay rights movement. Around 1978, the Frente de Liberación Homosexual (Gay Liberation Front) and the Frente Homosexual de Acción Revolucionaria (Homosexual Front for Revolutionary Action) went public and allied with other leftist groups. Yet the novella attracted fierce criticism when it was first published, perhaps because of its frank portrayal of gay desire and because of one particularly provocative scene of group sex with two police officers. Mexico City, likely the home of the novella’s largest audience, was undergoing decades of vertiginous growth in population, consumerism, and the culture industries, especially film and rock ‘n’ roll. These were the years of the “Mexican miracle” or “golden age”—a much-celebrated period of economic growth and self-sufficiency that barely masked deep social inequalities. Many of these contradictions are visible in García’s narrative. Indeed, as Gilbert M. Joseph, Anne Rubenstein, and Eric Zolov have noted, “This cultural-political construct was shaped, resisted, and ultimately negotiated by a multitude of actors and interests, and lo mexicano came to serve counterhegemonic impulses as well as regime projects” (2001, 8).

Critics generally locate the text within two concurrent literary movements, La Onda and the Latin American Boom. The novella combines the experimentation with form and preoccupation with sex and other social taboos that are generally associated with La Onda, Mexico’s countercultural movement, and the playfulness with narrative, nonlinear time, use of slang, and the characteristic melding of the fantastical and the real of the Boom. Still other critics have located Zapata’s writing in the post-Boom and postmodern canons. More recently, critics have emphasized the novella’s contribution to alternative cartographies of urban space and gay utopias.

El vampiro was translated into English in 1981 by E. A. Lacey as Adonis García: A Picaresque Novel and published by Winston Leyland’s San Francisco–based Gay Sunshine Press. Even as it has found a place within certain canons of Mexican and Latin American literature, El vampiro de la colonia Roma continues to challenge audiences. In Mexico, where editor Ariel Rosales estimates it has sold around 300,000 copies, the novel is commonly read, debated, celebrated, and decried. More broadly, throughout Latin America and the Caribbean, it is lauded as one of the first novels to explore gay lives and queer subjectivities. Its success has made Zapata one of the most famous contemporary Latin American novelists.

SEE ALSO Antes que Anochezca (1992; Reinaldo Arenas); El Beso de la Mujer Araña (1976; Manuel Puig)

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Certeau, Michel de. The Practice of Everyday Life. Translated by Steven Rendall. Berkeley:

Covarrubias, Alicia. “El vampiro de la colonia Roma, de Luis Zapata: La nueva picaresca y el reportaje ficticio” [El vampiro de la colonia Roma, by Luis Zapata: The new picaresque and Franco, Jean. The Decline and Fall of the Lettered City: Latin America in the Cold War.

Gallo, Rubén, ed. The Mexico City Reader. Translated by Lorna Scott Fox and Rubén Gallo.

Gutiérrez, León Guillermo. “El vampiro de la colonia Roma: Función del espacio y el cuerpo en el discurso homoerótico” [El vampiro de la colonia Roma: Function of space and body in homoerotic discourse]. Revista de humanidades: Tecnológico de Monterrey, nos. 27–28

Joseph, Gilbert M., Anne Rubenstein, and Eric Zolov. “Assembling the Fragments: Writing a Cultural History of Mexico since 1940.” In *Fragments of a Golden Age: The Politics of Culture

Zapata, Luis. Las aventuras, desventuras y sueños de Adonis García, el vampiro de la colonia Roma [The adventures, misadventures, and dreams of Adonis García, the vampire of the 1979 by Editorial Grijalbo.
The Costa Rican–born Mexican singer Chavela Vargas (1919–2012) is an icon of Latin American popular song, and she remains a beloved performer after her death. Acclaimed by the public for her radical renditions of vernacular music, she is also a polemical figure that evoked lesbian butch eroticism, as she played with markers of masculinity on stage (and off): alcohol, cigars, and a style that fit the silhouette of a male campesino, or rural Mexican farmer. She is renowned for her singular performance of Mexican rancheras and pan-Latino boleros, songs about amorous defeat and anthems of desire, respectively. Rancheras, especially, are predominantly rendered from a male perspective, singing to and about their love of and betrayals by women; her renditions of these were as enticing as they were scandalous. Her songbook, however, also consisted of a varied set of Latin American rhythms, including Cuban son (a hybrid of Spanish song and African rhythms and percussion), Mexican corridos (narrative ballads typically sung from the perspective of the popular classes about folk heroes or historical events), Yucatecan trova (romantic music from the Mexican Yucatán Peninsula composed for a guitar trio), and Argentine milonga (a popular song and dance of African origin, precursor to the tango).
Chavela Vargas Performing at Carnegie Hall in New York City in 2003. An iconic Mexican singer, Vargas’s style echoed a male campesino, or rural Mexican farmer, while wearing her signature traditional Mexican poncho. Her song choices, their gender politics, and her masculine sartorial style combined to exude an exquisite lesbian tension in her extraordinary performances.

Nevertheless, her performance did not replicate traditional styles of any of these genres. From the outset of her professional singing career in the 1940s, Vargas defied the standard style of the repertoire she chose to perform by creating a melodic sound based on guitar and often slowing the tempo of the song. Wearing her signature jorongo, or traditional Mexican poncho, she modeled her voice in ways that distinguished her from her contemporaries, including Jorge Negrete, Amalia Mendoza, and Pedro Infante. Moreover, Vargas ventured to perform without the mariachis or trios typical of ranchera or bolero performance. Her singing voice fluctuated between tender headvoice, vigorous vibratos, and rough texture, this last characteristic especially evident later in her career. She also conveyed lesbian desire by retaining the lyrics of classic songs directed toward a feminine beloved, particularly in the rancheras and boleros that typically elicited a heteronormative politics in the work of the songwriters José Alfredo Jiménez, Cuco Sánchez, or Agustín Lara. Her song choices, their gender politics, and her masculine sartorial style combined to exude an exquisite lesbian tension in her extraordinary performances.

Vargas first sang in small venues in Mexico and throughout the Americas. Eventually, after a long pause during the 1970s, she reached the global stage and became the subject of countless tributes and honors throughout the Spanish-speaking world, from the written (Yarbro-Bejarano 1997; Cisneros 2015) and the sung (Mexico City’s Teatro de la Ciudad concert, 2009), to the national (Spain’s Orden de Isabel la Católica, 2000).

Life History

Born in Costa Rica on 17 April 1919, Vargas immigrated to Mexico City in her teenage years. Her memoirs refer to her time in Costa Rica as painful because of her family’s rejection of her owing to her rareza, or queerness. At the time of her arrival, postrevolutionary Mexico City’s effervescent nightlife was at its peak. The capital featured numerous entertainment venues, most notably cabarets. Vargas began performing as part of Lotería Nacional (National Lottery) radio features, and she eventually starred in cabarets such as El Quid, El Patio, and La Taberna del Greco, to mention but a few. Her early career also included stints across the Americas, including Acapulco and New York City, where she entertained and mingled with the elite and intelligentsia.

Despite the uniqueness of her artistic offering, Vargas remained underrated. In her remarkable style, she began recording contemporary songs, mentored by the major singer-songwriter of Mexican rancheras, Jiménez. Supported by Jiménez, her first album, Noche de Bohemia (1961; Bohemian night), featured a mélange of rancheras, boleros, corridos, and milongas. Such eclecticism was a hallmark of her work, which offered a radical curation of styles that, though they may be categorized as popular “Latin American music,” have distinct genealogies and histories. Vargas, however, did not necessarily consolidate these songs as folk music. She was an astute song selector, choosing boleros of high sensual tension and rancheras that ponder existential themes, in a language laced with romanticism. Vargas did so while also reinventing their sound. For example, her rancheras do not include the trumpets or guitarrónes (a type of bass guitar) typical of the genre, nor the flourishes of the violin—only a guitar played with dexterity. Her famous “Macorina” is included in this first effort. Vargas transformed the lyrics of “Macorina” by the Spanish-born Cuban poet Alfonso Camín into a sensual son celebrating a woman’s body and beauty, a daring performance that scandalized some listeners. The lyrics compare corporeal voluptuousness with luscious tropical fruit, the treats sung with ecstasy:

Put your hand here, Macorina your breasts, flesh of custard apple your mouth a blessing of ripe guanavana

(TRANSLATION BY LORENA ALVARADO)
Jiménez was also the composer of some of Vargas's most piercing selections, including "Las ciudades" (The cities) and "Un mundo raro" (A strange world)—haunting rancheras she continued to sing until her last album.

She continued recording throughout the decade, until a hiatus in the 1970s that she attributed to alcoholism. With the support of fellow artists and activists Jesusa Rodríguez and Liliana Felipe, Vargas returned to the stage in 1991 at El Hábito, a political cabaret bar in Mexico City. El Hábito was a chapel-turned-stage where numerous performances were held that tackled controversial political and social issues, satirizing the political and intellectual class with music, humor, and alcohol. Her residence there led her to Spain. In that country, she performed live to great acclaim—one of her concerts was later released as a live album, La llorona (1996; The weeping woman). Moreover, her music was a key feature in several of Pedro Almodóvar's films of that decade, including Kika (1993), La flor de mi secreto (1995; The flower of my secret), and Carne trémula (1997; Live flesh). This was a period of accolades for Vargas—she was the recipient of numerous notable awards across two continents. In 2000 she was granted the Order of Isabella the Catholic, a civil order that recognizes services to Spain. Universities, including the Complutense University of Madrid and the University of Alcalá, granted her the honorific “Excelentísima e Ilustrísima Señora” (Most Excellent and Illustrious Lady). She also received keys to cities, including Buenos Aires and Mexico City.

Subsequently, she published her autobiography with a title taken from the lyrics of one of her most memorable rancheras, Y si quieres saber de mi pasado (2002; And if you wish to know about my past), a testimonial that is especially significant given that it was here where she publicly discussed her lesbianism for the first time. While she always cultivated a butch aesthetic in her sartorial and lyrical politics, Vargas had never previously spoken about her sexuality so openly. The first chapter is staged in the Reserva Ecológica Nanciyaga, an ecological reserve in Veracruz, Mexico, where she lived for many years. Moreover, she equates her queerness—what she calls her rareza (rarity)—with sexual virtue, nature, and spirituality. This autobiography was published the same year of the release of the film Frida. In that American biopic about the Mexican artist Frida Kahlo, Vargas represents death who, singing “La llorona,” pays a visit all too early to Kahlo.

In her final years, Vargas was similarly active, recording and reconceptualizing the classics she always sang (Cupaima [2007]) or working on productions featuring duets with other singers (¡Por mi culpa! [2010; Because of me!]). Her final work, La luna grande (2012; The big moon), was a tribute to the Spanish poet Federico García Lorca (himself a queer icon). It combined the melodies of some of her songs with his poetry. Vargas died in Cuernavaca, Mexico, on 5 August 2012.

Cultural and Artistic Significance
lyrical politics, Vargas had never previously spoken about her sexuality so openly. The first chapter is staged in the Reserva Ecológica Nanciyaga, an ecological reserve in Veracruz, Mexico, where she lived for many years. Moreover, she equates her queerness—what she calls her rareza (rarity)—with sexual virtue, nature, and spirituality. This autobiography was published the same year of the release of the film Frida. In that American biopic about the Mexican artist Frida Kahlo, Vargas represents death who, singing “La llorona,” pays a visit all too early to Kahlo.

In her final years, Vargas was similarly active, recording and reconceptualizing the classics she always sang (Cupaima [2007]) or working on productions featuring duets with other singers (¡Por mi culpa! [2010; Because of me]). Her final work, La luna grande (2012; The big moon), was a tribute to the Spanish poet Federico García Lorca (himself a queer icon). It combined the melodies of some of her songs with his poetry. Vargas died in Cuernavaca, Mexico, on 5 August 2012.

Cultural and Artistic Significance

Vargas is simultaneously a symbol of Mexican music, a queer icon in popular culture, a referent of Latin American and US Latina/o popular music, and a lasting influence for a new generation of singers. Her style has been carried forward in the work of Los Macorinos, her two former guitarists who continue to record new music with artists such as Natalia Lafourcade and Tania Libertad, using the same technique of bare, languid guitar playing. Moreover, Vargas’s voice began to acquire legendary status, a standard that some media use in describing the timbre of other singers. Vargas has also influenced the work of the Spanish singers Buika and Martirio, as well as the Mexican American singer Lila Downs, and she has inspired songs by Café Tacuba, Joaquín Sabina, Lhasa de Sela, Martirio, Sara Baras, and Liliana Felipe, among others.

Vargas’s simultaneous positionalities suggest both her profound influence across various communities and the impact of her vision in music history. Vargas’s prodigious innovations disrupted commonplace practices of Mexican music, even as she herself became a famed symbol of mexicanidad (that is, of Mexican identity), as well as of the nation itself and of Mexican culture. Such contradictions were evident early on. An extract from the liner notes in her first album, Noche de Bohemia, reads: “Her art is reduced to a guitar and a voice. But the way in which she enunciates the meaning of each melody is notable for its professionalism and exceptionality.” Quite accurately, these remarks prime the listener for a rare musical experience that contrasts with the usual sounds and vocal qualities of Mexican artists performing the same tunes.

Vargas eliminated the mariachi and its embellishments and engaged unorthodox techniques. The mariachi is the typical music band that plays rancheras and is usually made up of guitars, the aforementioned guitarrón, violins, and trumpets. Only the guitar had a place in Vargas’s versions of musical genres. Without violin flourishes or the accent of the trumpet, her versions were both an innovation on and departure from such genres as the ranchera; it was her way of finding the song's core—the essential message and melody.
Accompanied by the guitarist Antonio Bribiesca, a renowned artist in his own right, Vargas manipulated her potent voice, a voice often criticized for its seemingly uncouth and untrained quality. She produced brilliant, trilling vibratos, took dramatic pauses, and made daring use of chest voice and larynx. It was Bribiesca’s guitar and Vargas’s vocal technique —departing strongly from the sound of a mariachi band—that imbued her songs with emotional, peculiar intensity. These arrangements implied a radical departure from the cultural nationalism and politics embedded in the making and marketing of the ranchera and the bolero.

In addition, Vargas’s sartorial selection embraced the clothing style typical of a traditional campesino: calzón de manta (crude cotton pants), huaraches (sandals), and eventually her iconic jorongo (a type of poncho). These choices did not coincide with any of her ranchera contemporaries, men or women. She left her face unadorned by cosmetics and pulled her hair back tightly—choices that gave her a masculine profile as she sang—and, earlier in her career, she smoked and drank on stage. She performed, and expanded the boundaries of, masculinity in evoking the humble male campesino, not the imperious charro (Mexican cowboy) attuned to the cultural nationalism of the time. Even as she claimed a Mexican identity, Vargas stripped the canción ranchera from the emerging tradition of charro ornamentation and mariachi glorification in favor of wringing a song’s emotional center while embodying working-class, rural identities. It was an operation that left many listeners surprised and seduced, wanting more.

Her art was also subject to much scrutiny and harassment, from criticisms about her lack of training or technique to the many misogynistic (and homonormative) epithets that decried her appearance and public persona. And yet, her maneuvering of the musical texts also entailed radical transgressions. As is typical in rancheras and boleros, several of the songs she sang speak to a female subject, a condition she did not alter but rather embraced. Her gestures while performing one of her most enduring songs, “Macorina,” a sensual declaration of desire, openly portrayed the ambiguous lyrics of “ponme la mano aquí” (put your hand here), directed toward a woman: Vargas on stage would place her hand over her crotch teasingly. She kept singing to and about desire into her nineties. This was an added transgression on her part: the geriatric voice and aging butch body singing about love and lust, death, and tenderness.

Impact in Academic and Popular Production

Since the 1990s, when Vargas was making a comeback, there have been increasing efforts to engage with her work in various media of cultural production and in academic discourse.
She has been especially influential in theoretical elaborations of Latin American and Latina/o sexualities, as the work of Yvonne Yarbro-Bejarano (1997) and, more recently, Laura G. Gutiérrez (2010) and Sofia Ruiz-Alfaro (2010) attest. Yarbro-Bejarano, in particular, pays special homage to Vargas as an essential voice who speaks to her own identity as a queer Chicana.

Such tributes occur beyond the essay form. Vargas’s work has left a lasting impression on an entire generation of singers from across the Spanish-speaking world. Vargas has been the subject of numerous paeans, including documentaries, musical projects, theater productions, and works of literature. While she enjoyed some of these tributes during her lifetime, many more have taken place posthumously. Among the latter is the film Chavela by the American filmmakers Catherine Gund and Daresha Kyi. Their award-winning work premiered in 2017 at the Berlin International Film Festival and features newly released twenty-year-old footage of Vargas in her seventies when she had yet to make her second comeback. Another of the posthumous works is the artist Eloisa Aquino’s “Chavela Vargas” zine, which is part of a series titled The Life and Times of Butch Dykes.

Vargas claimed her rareza through her daring artistic proposals, reinventing popular Mexican and Latin American song genres in the process and challenging restrictive gender patterns. She embodied a liberated method of performing music so often restricted to the world of heteronormative romance, as well as a freedom to explore the poignancy of life’s pleasures and pain using the tools of voice and guitar. As she herself told an adoring crowd in a public concert in the Mexico City Zócalo (main square) in 2010, she wished to bequeath her sense of freedom, her daring spirit, saying, “Les dejo de herencia mi libertad” (I leave you my freedom as your inheritance).

SEE ALSO Bars, Working-class, in Mexico; Cabaret Theater in Latin America and the Caribbean; Performance Artists in Latin America

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Vargas, Chavela, and J. C. Vales. Y si quieres saber de mi pasado [And if you wish to know about my past]. Madrid: Aguilar, 2002.

FILMOGRAPHY

Almodóvar, Pedro, dir. La flor de mi secreto [The flower of my secret]. El Deseo, 1995. Film.

DISCOGRAPHY

Vargas, Chavela. Noche de Bohemia [Bohemian night], 1961.

Vargas, Chavela. La llorona [The weeping woman]. Recorded live in Madrid, Spain, April 1993. WEA, 1996.

Vargas, Chavela. ¡Por mi culpa! [Because of me!] Corason, 2010.
Vietnam War

NICHOLAS BROMFIELD
Lecturer
University of Sydney, Australia

American, Australian, and Vietnamese LGBT participation in the war and their impact on gay liberation movements in those countries.

This entry analyzes the gay liberation movement and associated antiwar, feminist, and civil rights movements during the Vietnam War (1955–1975) in the contexts of the United States, Australia, and Vietnam, as well as the diffusion of LGBT culture, politics, and social movement activism. These areas are examined in three sections: (1) masculinity, femininity, sexuality, and defense force service in each country; (2) the exclusion and inclusion of homosexual personnel in the draft; and (3) the causal effects of the diffusion of social movement activism on LGBT culture and politics in these countries. Notably, the diffusion of gay liberation that occurred in the United States and Australia during the Vietnam War was less evident in Vietnam, where commercial accommodation of LGBT desires was tolerated but not politicized and public. The agency of actors and the structure of their societies enabled and constrained this diffusion.

Masculinity, Femininity, Sexuality, and Defense Force Service

This section briefly surveys the culturally situated gender roles that informed the service of personnel in each country. Gender permeated conceptions of duty, service, and honor, as well as conceptions of the enemy and the “other.” Each country was characterized by the dichotomization of gender into masculine and feminine roles (Connell 2005), but this demarcation also reflected cultural difference regarding the essentialism of gender and sexuality. Particularly prominent was the figure of the soldier hero, an idealized masculine figure. As Graham Dawson notes, “Military virtues such as aggression, strength, courage, and endurance have repeatedly been defined as the natural and inherent qualities of manhood, whose apogee is attainable only in battle” (1994, 1). These norms informed the ideals of the Western personnel serving in Vietnam, as well as their relationship with their Vietnamese allies and enemies.

The United States Dennis Altman (1971) describes a Vietnam War–era United States that was sexually repressed and heteronormative. The country's puritanical religious tradition institutionalized feelings of guilt regarding sex—and especially sex that fell outside prescribed norms. These norms included the utilitarian view of sex for purposes of procreation in the context of a heterosexual nuclear family and a negative view of any sexual urges and acts that fell outside heterosexual genital intercourse. The normalcy of heterosexuality was also informed by science, as American psychiatry had institutionalized its “naturalness” and homosexuality’s treatment as an “illness” (Herek 2010, 694).

These norms informed ideas about the appropriate gendered acts of US service personnel in Vietnam. Heather Marie Stur argues that for US personnel, this involved a Hollywood masculinity, informed by the figure of the actor John Wayne, who embodied American values of “martial prowess, ... patriotism, courage, Christian faith” (2011, 4) and the protection of femininity. US femininity was epitomized by “the American ‘girl next door’—white, middle class, and pure” (3).

Homosexuality was the pervasive antonym in this conception of gender, representing the lack of masculine aggression that was drilled into US soldiers in boot camp (see Levy 1971). The US military argued that the inclusion of homosexual personnel “would seriously impair discipline, good order, morals and the security of our armed forces” (quoted in Shilts 1994, 65). Violating essentialized gendered roles thus carried significant risk of exposure and dishonorable discharge for US service personnel. A “John W.” serving in Vietnam wrote of the pervasiveness of rigid gender dichotomization and of their inability to find space to cross-dress: “Imagine what it is like not to have any contact at all with femininity.... To not even see, much less wear the things, the symbols of femininity that I love” (Transvestia 1970, 56). It was clear, then, that failure to meet the military’s demarcation of gender and sexuality was unacceptable for personnel.

Australia Western gender norms were similarly dichotomized and essentialized in Australian martial narratives during the mid-twentieth century but were also characterized by local variation. The image of the “digger,” the Australian soldier of World War I (1914–1918), was central to Australian conceptions of masculinity. The masculine digger had “given birth” to the Australian nation at Gallipoli during the failed Dardanelles Campaign of 1915–1916. The digger represented a complex of masculine folk- and state-orientated Australian values: mateship, antiauthoritarianism, irreverence, and sardonicism, but also honor, duty, bravery, and selfless sacrifice. Women were maternal, and marginal, figures, selflessly offering their sons for sacrifice (see Lake 1992; Altman 1987; Seal 2004).

Australia was also influenced by the hegemony of church and science, which decried or pathologized homosexuality; sex between men remained illegal in all Australian states and territories until South Australia’s first law changes in 1975 (Smaal 2012). Furthermore, police harassment and entrapment of homosexual men, and the publishing of the names of offenders in the press, remained a strategy of enforcing heterosexual and gender norms (Wotherspoon 2016).
These gendered and heteronormative discourses of nation were strictly enforced by the Australian military during the war in Vietnam. Australian soldiers expressed hostility toward homosexuality, and the close quarters of military life regulated its open occurrence (Hart 1975). Military anxieties about femininity and lesbianism also saw Australian servicewomen disciplined for behavior and appearance that was not decidedly feminine and heterosexual (Ford 1996). So, while Australian gendered norms had a local inflection, their effects were similarly dichotomized and constraining as in the United States.

Vietnam Vietnamese conceptions of gender and sexuality displayed far more complexity and pluralism than Western norms during this period, reflecting patterns historically prevalent in Southeast Asia. Some, especially rural, Vietnamese accepted transgendered and same-sex relations and practices that would have been pathologized in a Western context. This included toleration of same-sex relations if filial responsibilities to procreate were fulfilled, the prevalence of transgendered shamans in rural Vietnam, and closer physical platonic contact between members of the same sex.

The French established colonial control over the area now known as Vietnam during the nineteenth century and quickly found themselves “confounded by the Vietnamese sex/gender system, in which virtually all of the signs that they took for natural and universal attributes distinguishing male from female were disrupted or inverted” (Proschan 2002, 436). Frank Proschan (2002) argues that this inversion involved the French colonials viewing Vietnamese men as androgynous and effeminate, and Vietnamese women being simultaneously masculine and hypersexualized. Relatedly, Michael G. Peletz contends that Western religious and scientific ideas regarding gender and sexuality also informed the attitudes of Southeast Asian elites during the period of Western colonialism, and these elites espoused these discourses as they sought to “modernize” (2009, 120). Significantly, then, Western conceptions of gender and sexuality had begun to penetrate the colonized urban centers of South Vietnam by the time of the war, and gender and sexual pluralism was less tolerated (see Peletz 2009; Heiman and Van Lê 1975; Forrest 1971).

The Vietnamese violation of Western norms of strict gender difference and heterosexual puritanism disorientated Western personnel deployed in Vietnam. Charles J. Levy notes:

The [US] marines heard lectures about Vietnamese men expressing friendship among themselves and with other men through physical contact. But this behavior became all the more inexplicable as a result of the lectures. For if handholding between men was a custom, it meant—as far as the marines were concerned—that these gestures were not aberrations within the Vietnamese society: rather the whole society was an aberration.

(1971, 20)
This “aberrant” behavior led some US personnel to distrust and abhor their South Vietnamese allies. This distrust was gendered and heteronormative; the South Vietnamese personnel did not conform to appropriate Western gender norms and were thus “queer,” “other,” and suspicious.

Homosexuality and the Draft

Both the United States and Australia used conscription during the Vietnam War, and both militaries actively excluded LGBT persons from service. This policy was used as a means to avoid service by both straight and LGBT draftees, but it also had the effect of ensnaring LGBT persons who willingly and proudly served, too. Furthermore, higher burdens of proof for homosexuality were required as the war progressed, meaning that some LGBT persons were knowingly enrolled in their country’s military, despite suspicions that would have excluded them in less pressing times (see Shilts 1994; Dapin 2014; Suran 2009).

In the United States, declaring one’s homosexuality during recruitment was a straightforward task, requiring only the checking of the box asking about homosexual tendencies on the medical history report. But doing so entailed admitting to desires that were illegal in every US state, except Illinois, in the 1960s. Furthermore, admitting, or feigning, homosexuality was far from confidential, especially in small communities, and had consequences for those seeking civil service employment (Shilts 1994).

Similar medical screening of recruits was conducted in Australia to weed out those too unhealthy, too mentally incapacitated, or too homosexual. A pamphlet titled “How Not to Join the Army: Advice for 20 Year Olds,” published by Resistance, Sydney, advised draft resisters, “Don’t answer any questions on homosexuality, just smile ... learn to touch the fellow you’re talking to suggestively. Be a little pathetic” (Wallace 1968, 13). Those brave enough to admit to, or feign, homosexuality in Australia faced similar social taboos if word leaked out regarding the reason for their draft rejection (Dapin 2014). Feigning or confessing to homosexuality when selected for the draft therefore had significant continuing consequences in both countries.

The Gay Liberation Movement and Diffusion

This section surveys the emergence of the gay liberation movement in the United States, its interaction with other social movements, and the success and failure of its diffusion to Australia and Vietnam. It employs the theoretical framework of social movement diffusion to provide a causal explanation of these shifts. Social movement diffusion refers to the spread of movements that seek to change social attitudes and public policy from one site to another, frequently internationally. Diffusion spreads in a multidimensional manner, via the “what” of diffusion (interpretative frames that construct and interpret issues, as well as any attendant protest tactics), the “how” of diffusion (relational and interpersonal, nonrelational and nonpersonal, and mediated and third-party contacts), and the “impact of diffusion” (especially the effects of agency and structure on the impact of gay liberation) (see Givan, Roberts, and Soule 2010). While this section does not purport to offer a definitive delineation of gay liberation's various groups and actions, it does note some of the more significant events to highlight its diffusion.

This entry focuses on the United States, Australia, and Vietnam, but it should be noted that the emergence of gay liberation and culture was also occurring in western Europe and Southeast Asia during this period. Early gay liberation activism was evident, if peripheral, to the May 1968 events in France, notable for their independence from the New York Stonewall riots of June 1969. While this quickly disappeared after calm was restored in France, gay radicalism reemerged in France in 1971 and adopted the frames and tactics of US gay liberation (see Sibalis 2009). Also inspired by the US movement, the British Gay Liberation Front began in October 1970 and adopted disruptive tactics and consciousness-raising as strategies (see Lent 2001). In Southeast Asia, according to Peter A. Jackson (2009), local queering began before the diffusion of US gay liberation frames and tactics in the 1970s, with the dynamics of local capitalism and urbanization being the crucial causal factors in the emergence of a local queer culture and sex work in Thailand as early as the 1930s. Bugis Street in Singapore was also a center for queer culture and sex work during the mid-twentieth century, emerging in the 1950s and catering to Western clientele and soldiers on leave during the Vietnam War (Ho 2012). This complexity points to the limitations of simple Westernized causal explanations that center on the diffusion and impact of American gay liberation activism of the late 1960s and 1970s. These local dynamics are crucial to note when assessing the Vietnam War's impact on Vietnamese queering, discussed below.

The Emergence of Gay Liberation in the United States The gay liberation movement sought societal transformation, moving beyond the liberal demand for rights that had characterized the homophile movement of the early 1960s. A two-step causal process facilitated the emergence of gay liberation: (1) gay liberation drew inspiration from the counterculture’s framing of dominant American social mores (Altman 1971); and (2) the draft’s requirement to prove homosexuality forced homosexual men to assert their homosexuality and aided their formation of a publicly gay identity, as opposed to a closeted, private, homosexual identity (Suran 2009).
Gay liberationists groups “piggybacked” the protests of the antiwar movements, both to oppose the war and to advance their own cause. Gay liberation existed in a dialectical relationship with the other social movements of the counterculture (Altman 1971). Opposition to the war in Vietnam provided one link, and gay liberationist groups “piggybacked” the protests of the antiwar movements, both to oppose the war and to advance their own cause (Suran 2009). Gay liberationists also learned from the Black Power and women’s liberation movements, borrowing notions of pride in identity from radical African American thought and tactics of consciousness-raising, diffuse structure, and personal politics from women’s liberation (Altman 1971). The shared opposition to the war in Vietnam held these disparate groups loosely together, but also masked the differences in their goals and levels of agency in a racist and patriarchal society, which curtailed further coordinated action as the Vietnam War ended.

Dennis Altman, a gay liberation scholar and participant, noted in 1977 that the movement had lost much of its radicalism as economic factors took over. More gay men were attracted to the flourishing commercial world of gay life, including gay bathhouses and saunas, clubs and bars, theaters, and restaurants, than to politics. Politicized LGBT persons, lacking the counterculture’s impetus for radical social change, soon found themselves co-opted into the structures of US pluralism, with tempered goals of interest group formation and incremental policy change. The commercial world of gay life thus took over the facilitation of identity formation during this period (see Altman 1979, 1989).

The Diffusion of Gay Liberation to Australia The Australian gay liberation movement adopted the frames, and some of the tactics, of its US cousin. The first openly homosexual and political organization in Australia, the Campaign Against Moral Persecution, or CAMP (a play on the locally preferred parlance), emerged in the mid-1970s. CAMP was initially reluctant to mobilize in public, and their first public protest in October 1971 was not an antiwar action but instead opposed a Christian fundamentalist who was challenging for preselection for the conservative Liberal Party of Australia (Altman 1987; Reynolds 2002). This type of campaigning against the curtailment of homosexual rights is a rough gloss of CAMP’s activities.

Early CAMP contained the breadth of Australian homosexuality: gay men and lesbians, rights-seeking politicos, transformational liberationists, and those who used the organization to connect with their community. Tensions quickly arose, and radical liberationists split from CAMP in January 1972 to form a group called Gay Liberation. Lesbian women soon began to leave too, “as they felt pressured by male demands for social and sexual space” (Altman 2013, 98; see also Reynolds 2002). Gay Liberation was more influenced by American and British theory and praxis of liberation than CAMP, adopting the frame of utopian liberation from heteronormative hegemony and employing the tactics of consciousness-raising (Reynolds 2002). This was primarily nonrelational, as the United States and Australia's shared Western values, and liberal democratic political institutions aided their common understanding of the world. Some relational links were evident, with Altman (1987, 2013) being an activist and scholar who shared ideas across the movements.

As in the United States, Gay Liberation in Australia was also influenced by other movements: women’s liberation’s theories of patriarchy and personal politics, as well as notions of pride drawn from African American politics (Johnston 1980). However, a survey of local literature and archives failed to uncover a Gay Liberation alignment with the analogous Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander struggle for liberation and self-determination. Furthermore, though Gay Liberation and elements of CAMP were unquestionably part of the counterculture, the late 1970 drawdown of Australian deployments in Vietnam meant that the impetus for antiwar radicalism had been somewhat negated by the time CAMP conducted its first public protest the following year.

Altman’s incisive critique of US gay liberation was echoed in Australian developments in commercialization and politics. As in the United States, the gay economy exploded in Australian capital cities in the late 1960s and into the 1970s, with drag shows, gay bars and pubs, and bathhouses facilitating the spread of gay culture and identity (see Wotherspoon 2016; Smaal 2012). Gay politics also soon found itself interacting with Australian democratic structures of trade union politics and the attendant influence of Marxism, a crucial difference from the US movement (Altman 1989; Johnston 1980). Writing in 1980, Craig Johnston argued that the Australian gay movement of the 1970s had fragmented, had achieved “dramatic” but not “earthshattering” advances in consciousness-raising and public opinion, and had created “liberated zones” (28) for homosexuals.

The Diffusion of Gay Liberation to Vietnam

The frames and tactics of gay liberation did not diffuse to Vietnam as they did from the United States to Australia. However, the commercial world of gay life that was evidently growing in the West was also tolerated in Vietnam during the war and catered to Western, Chinese, and local LGBT persons. Gay liberation failed to diffuse because of the historical moment, the structures of Vietnamese culture, economics, and politics, and the agency of those Vietnamese who did have limited relational and nonrelational contact with Western gay liberation.

That said, there is significant evidence to suggest that LGBT relations and sex in Vietnam were prevalent during the war, despite Vietnamese enculturation into Western gender and sexual norms and American and Australian attempts to eliminate homosexuality from the ranks. A 1970 survey of 488 Australian male personnel deployed to Vietnam found 3 percent of them admitting to homosexual experiences while in Vietnam itself (Hart 1975). Randy Shilts states that “by 1971, a vast gay subculture existed within the American military stationed in Vietnam. Six years of intense U.S. presence had been time enough to establish huge networks of gay servicemen throughout Southeast Asia” (1994, 149). This seems confirmed by contemporary sources such as Philip Marnais (1967) and the International Guild Guides of 1968–1973 that contained listings of gay venues catering to a Western clientele and GIs in Vietnam, Thailand, and Singapore. It should be noted, however, that the Marnais source (written under a pseudonym) was a salacious and questionably factual account of sex and sin in Saigon and should, therefore, be treated with caution (Copyright Office 1971). The International Guild Guides, in contrast, were guidebooks with the explicitly stated purpose of accuracy, thus making them an arguably more useful source.

There is, however, little evidence to suggest that the utopian ideals of gay liberation spread to Vietnam during this period. The commercial toleration of Western LGBT individuals in Vietnam echoed colonial patterns of subjugated acquiescence to Western hegemony, as the economic service of queer desires was catered for, but the politics of gay liberation was not. This is not surprising; the war hardly provided the structure of liberal freedoms that the Western movement exploited. There were also significant cultural differences between the countries that curtailed nonrelational connections; the Vietnamese emphasis on Confucian values, combined with sympathy for communism and the struggle for national freedom, emphasized collectivism over individualism.

There were some brief relational contacts between Western movement activists and the Vietnamese. Judy Tzu-Chun Wu (2013) has analyzed the 1971 Indochinese Women’s Conferences that gathered antiwar feminists from North America, Laos, and South and North Vietnam. But these conferences were characterized by significant identity-based conflict between factions of the North American movement, and racial, sexual, and national lines of opposition were drawn among attendees. The individualism that characterized the North American participants in the conferences, as well as their conflicts, failed to gel with the Vietnamese participants’ collective worldview. A question asked of North Vietnamese women and their answer to it illustrate this disconnect:

Q: In the U.S.A., there is disunity between the several kinds of anti-war groups, revolutionary groups, and oppressed groups (Third World Peoples, unemployed, poor people, youth, women’s groups).... We can’t find a basis for unity but we believe we should. What is your opinion?

A: You have raised the single-issue versus the multiissue question, to use American terminology.... We believe there are no multi-issues, only the single issue of the struggle against imperialism.

(PEDESTAL 1971, 10; EMPHASIS ADDED)

The Vietnamese distaste for Western identity politics was further evidenced by one participant’s recollection that some Indochinese women had walked offstage when questioned about Vietnamese lesbian sex by radical lesbian participants (Wu 2013). So, the North American and Indochinese women may have shared antiwar political goals, but they did not share the Western frame of individualism and self-liberation that had sustained the gay liberation movement in the United States and Australia.

Postwar Vietnam provides further evidence for the failure of gay liberation diffusion. Richard Quang-Anh Tran’s 2014 survey of Vietnamese news articles, literature, and government reports between 1986 and 2005 found no usage of the Western language of homosexuality (gay, lesbian, LGBT, etc.) before the 1990s. Ethnographic research during this same period reveals the Vietnamese belief that homosexuality was introduced by the French and Americans (Aronson 1999). Vietnamese socialism during and after the war decried the Western undermining of Vietnamese morality, and left little room for the liberation of LGBT persons. As such, the politics of gay liberation failed to diffuse to Vietnam during the period, and Western-style queering of culture and economics had limited continuing impact after the war’s end.

The Vietnam War was a crucial framing event for the emergence and diffusion of gay liberation. The operation of conscription in the United States, combined with the US military's exclusion of LGBT individuals from service, radicalized LGBT Americans. They quickly framed their own liberation as part of the counterculture's challenging of hegemonic gender and heteronormative social mores and operationalized tactics borrowed from other social movements.

These frames and tactics diffused to Australia, a Western, liberal-democratic country that was also fighting in Vietnam and employing conscription. This diffusion was aided by the obvious political, economic, and cultural similarities between the countries, but there was also local variation and relative caution in Australia.

These enabling mechanisms were less evident in Vietnam. North and South Vietnam did not offer the liberal-democratic freedoms or the cultural belief in individualism that underpinned gay liberation in the West. Despite tentative relational contact between North Americans and the Vietnamese, these differences proved too difficult to bridge. Thus, the globalization of LGBT culture and politics emerged much later in the Vietnamese context.

SEE ALSO Australia and New Zealand; Black Freedom Movement and Sexuality; Cold War and Sexuality in Latin America; Marches on Washington; Military Law and Policy in the United States; Sex Tourism in Asia; Vietnam War, LGBTQ+ Veterans

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Johnston, Craig. “Radical Homosexual Politics Today: A Legacy of the Seventies.” *Australian

One challenge when looking to history has been the silences surrounding LGBTQ+ military service, both in the records and from veterans themselves. Work on World War II (1939–1945) shows that LGBTQ+ people served in all theaters of war and came from all walks of life. The war was a formative experience for these men and women, as it was for that entire generation. Because so many men and women served in all combatant nations, not surprisingly many members of the homophile movements of the 1950s and 1960s were veterans. An even larger percentage of them remained guarded about their sexuality, though, whether choosing to marry and start families, to visit public places to cruise for sex (“beats” in Australian parlance), or to live quiet lives in relationships. Indeed, one of the state presidents of Australia's premier veterans' organization, the Returned and Services League, was a World War II veteran with a same-sex partner; this came out only posthumously when there was a fight over his will. Much the same silence surrounds veterans of the Korean War (1950–1953) and the Malayan Emergency (1950–1960).

Medical Issues

The Vietnam War affected a different generation and was the first conflict in which societies seriously grappled with not only the physical scars of war but also the mental and emotional traumas plaguing veterans. LGBTQ+ veterans faced trials common to all Vietnam War veterans, yet in many ways their stories diverged from the dominant Vietnam veteran narrative. Post-traumatic stress disorder is a common challenge experienced by many Vietnam veterans from Australia, New Zealand, and the United States, although there are differences in individual veterans’ symptoms and in how the nations’ veterans’ administrations responded. LGBTQ+ veterans, like straight and cisgender (those whose gender identity aligns with their sex at birth) personnel, often turned to alcohol, experienced flashbacks, and were prone to fits of anger. Veterans who were trying to repress or hide their homosexuality or gender identity only compounded the mental distress.
Vietnam Veteran Leonard Matlovich with His Honorable Discharge Papers, 1975. Matlovich, a highly decorated US Air Force sergeant, was discharged from the military in 1975 after he came out to his superior officer. He challenged the ban on homosexual service members and eventually settled with the air force in 1980.

The majority of LGBTQ+ service personnel who received honorable discharges retained their entitlements to pensions and medical services. Even so, many seeking medical treatment chose not to disclose their sexuality for fear of being discriminated against, and for decades support services did not cater to the different needs of LGBTQ+ veterans. Since the beginning of the twenty-first century, the veterans’ administrations have become more attuned to the needs of LGB veterans. In the second decade of the twenty-first century, as there has been an increase in transgender visibility globally, so, too, have veterans’ establishments had to consider transgender needs. In the United States, a 2011 Veterans Health Administration directive mandated medically necessary care for transgender veterans. In Australia and New Zealand there have not been transgender-specific directives from the respective departments of veterans’ affairs, but antidiscrimination legislation since 2013 and 1993, respectively, protects transgender veterans’ rights to health services.

Service Bans and Activism

After the war, many Vietnam veterans stayed in the armed forces, where they had to continue living a closeted double life. In Australia, which did not have a tradition of rights-based legal challenges, there are no known cases of service members challenging the ban on LGB service until 1990. (The government lifted the bans on LGB service in November 1992 and on transgender service in September 2010.) In the 1970s and 1980s the few gay and lesbian rights organizations in Australia and New Zealand focused primarily on law reform, and Vietnam veterans did not play significant roles in these groups. In the United States, though, there was a period of gay and lesbian activism in the mid-1970s that targeted the military establishment. The most famous challenge to the ban came from Leonard Matlovich, an air force sergeant. Matlovich did three tours of duty in Vietnam, was awarded a Bronze Cross and Purple Heart, and was discharged in 1975 when he came out to his superior officer. Matlovich appeared on the cover of Time magazine and had a high-profile battle with the air force, which he settled in 1980. Matlovich died of AIDS in 1988. The epitaph on his tombstone famously reads: “When I was in the military they gave me a medal for killing two men and a discharge for loving one.” Matlovich’s high-profile example was the exception, rather than the norm; Vietnam veterans largely were not involved in American activism against the LGB military ban.

Most LGBTQ+ Vietnam veterans in all three countries avoided both veterans’ and gay rights activism. Of course, some did become involved in grassroots movements, and this is most discernible during the AIDS epidemic, which took the lives of many gay Vietnam veterans. For instance, one of the cofounders of the New York organization Gay Men’s Health Crisis was the decorated Vietnam veteran Paul Popham (1941–1987). Ken Jones, portrayed in the television miniseries When We Rise (2017), fought in the 1970s for the gay liberation movement in San Francisco to be inclusive of people of color. Jones became the first black person to chair what was then called the San Francisco Gay Freedom Day Parade and Celebration Committee, worked with homeless LGBTQ+ young people, and pushed for needle exchange programs during the AIDS epidemic. The Australian Army veteran David Bradford was a sexual health doctor who was running Melbourne’s public sexual health clinic during the early years of the AIDS epidemic. Bradford treated patients and sat on numerous community, state, and national bodies that formulated Australia’s public health response to the epidemic.

Commemorative Events

Many LGBTQ+ veterans had little interest in participating in events commemorating the Vietnam War. This is partly attributable to the homophobia of key veterans’ organizations from the 1970s to the 1990s, such as the Returned and Services League in Australia. It is also not surprising that national narratives and commemorations of war avoided the topics of homosexuality and transgender identity. In early 1982 a group of disgruntled ex-servicemen in Melbourne, including the Vietnam veteran Max Campbell, formed the Gay Ex-Services Association (GESA). GESA planned to lay a wreath at Melbourne’s Shrine of Remembrance on Anzac Day, which is Australia and New Zealand’s public holiday to commemorate military service, past and present. The ribbon accompanying the wreath read: “For all our brothers and sisters who died during the wars. Gay Ex-Servicemen’s Association.” A group of five GESA members climbed the steps of the shrine, but the guards refused them access and escorted the men off the premises. Campbell alone returned on Anzac Day in 1983 and 1984 and successfully laid wreaths on behalf of GESA. GESA folded shortly thereafter.

The United States and New Zealand did not have similar moments of LGBTQ+ service commemorations, but those nations, too, excluded LGBTQ+ people from dominant narratives of military participation. LGBTQ+ veterans of more recent conflicts such as the Gulf War, Iraq War, and Afghanistan War, as well as peacekeeping missions such as those in Somalia and East Timor, have been leading the push for LGBTQ+ inclusion in the respective militaries. The first known post-Vietnam LGBTQ+ veterans’ group in the United States was the Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Veterans of America (GLBVA), founded in 1990 and renamed American Veterans for Equal Rights in 2005. Whereas GESA in Melbourne had focused on commemorations and social meet-ups, the GLBVA focused primarily on defending servicepeople under threat of discharge and advocated for the repeal of the infamous “don’t ask, don’t tell” policy. Transgender veterans of Iraq and Afghanistan have also been playing active roles contesting the ban on transgender service in the United States.

Partner Benefits

One final topic of significance for LGBTQ+ Vietnam veterans is partner benefits. When an LGBTQ+ service member died in the Vietnam War, there would be no notification for same-sex partners, whose identities were unknown to military authorities. That said, oral histories from the United States and Australia suggest that rarely did service members have same-sex partners when they went to Vietnam. Later in life, though, when many LGBTQ+ veterans did enter into lasting relationships, federal laws in both Australia and the United States denied access to partner benefits, including partner service pensions, counseling services, and education assistance. The Australian government passed legislation in 2009 to remove eighty-five areas of discrimination against same-sex couples. Among those reforms was the extension of veterans’ partner benefits to same-sex couples. In the United States, when the Supreme Court struck down part of the Defense of Marriage Act in 2013, spouses of LGBTQ+ veterans gained access to the same family entitlements.

Many LGBTQ+ Vietnam veterans remain guarded about their sexuality or gender identity, and many “out” veterans have long since cut ties to their military compatriots. One significant silence is also around South Vietnamese LGBTQ+ veterans; as homosexuality is still culturally taboo for many Vietnamese from the war generation, studies into both LGBTQ+ service and South Vietnamese refugee experiences have yet to come across LGBTQ+ veterans. From a 2015 oral history interview with Noah Riseman, the words of the Australian veteran Bradford are a fitting way to summarize openly LGBTQ+ veterans’ reflections on military service: “I think that LGBTI people can make an equal contribution, and that their contribution is as good and as solid as anything, any contribution made by heterosexual people.”

SEE ALSO Defense of Marriage Act (1996); Military Law and Policy in the United States; Vietnam War

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Since the reunification of Germany in 1990, Charlotte von Mahlsdorf has gained international fame as a queer icon who survived the brutally repressive regimes of Nazi Germany and socialist East Germany. Born in Berlin in 1928 as Lothar Berfelde, von Mahlsdorf changed her name after World War II (1939–1945) and consistently referred to herself using she/her pronouns, although she made clear in her autobiography that she was “not a transsexual,” explaining that she was not “self-conscious about [her] male sex organs” (von Mahlsdorf 1995, 43). Though difficult to categorize using contemporary identity terms, von Mahlsdorf nevertheless became a modern queer icon with the publication of her acclaimed 1992 autobiography Ich bin meine eigene Frau (I Am My Own Wife: The True Story of Charlotte von Mahlsdorf), the release that year of a film with the same name directed by acclaimed gay filmmaker Rosa von Praunheim, and Doug Wright's successful Broadway production I Am My Own Wife, which premiered in 2003, one year after von Mahlsdorf's death.

Early Life and Furniture Collection

From an early age, von Mahlsdorf developed an interest in furniture and decor of the Gründerzeit (founders' period), dating approximately from the foundation of the German Empire in 1871 to the turn of the twentieth century. Her interest was facilitated by her work with furniture dealer Max Bier, and she began collecting small pieces in the course of her employment with him. With the onset of the Holocaust, Bier and von Mahlsdorf were often tasked with clearing out the homes of Berlin Jews who had been sent to concentration and death camps. Addressing this troubling connection to the Holocaust, von Mahlsdorf claimed in her autobiography that she felt “a kinship with those who live at the edge of society” (von Mahlsdorf 1995, 30) and referred to instances when she attempted to return pieces to their rightful owners after the war.

Adding to the complexity of her life story, von Mahlsdorf wrote in her autobiography that she sometimes wore feminine clothing in public under the Third Reich, making her one of the few who dared to do so in the face of dire legal consequences. Recounting how she and her friend Christian were arrested for breaking curfew while dressed in their mothers' clothing, von Mahlsdorf surmised that their quick release was due to the officer's assumption that they were two “rascals” playing a joke (von Mahlsdorf 1995, 42).

In the years immediately after the war, von Mahlsdorf stored the pieces of furniture she had collected with items from the estate of her aunt—who, according to von Mahlsdorf, was also gender-nonconforming—in abandoned houses in Berlin in the partially destroyed Friedrichsfelde Palace. It was not until 1958 that von Mahlsdorf was able to move into the condemned Mahlsdorf manor house on the edge of East Berlin where, in 1960, she opened a museum of Gründerzeit furniture and decor that later became the Gründerzeit Museum.

Charlotte von Mahlsdorf in 1993. A famous German transvestite, von Mahlsdorf was a queer icon who survived the brutally repressive regimes of Nazi Germany and socialist East Germany.

Homosexuelle Interessengemeinschaft Berlin

The Gründerzeit Museum served an unexpected function in the 1970s. The founding of the Homosexuelle Interessengemeinschaft Berlin (HIB; Homosexual Interest Group Berlin) was very much the result of the permeability of the Berlin Wall, and both East and West German forces influenced the group’s activities throughout the duration of its existence. Founded by Michael Eggert and Peter Rausch, the HIB’s official founding date was 15 January 1973, the day von Praunheim’s Nicht der Homosexuelle ist pervers, sondern die Situation, in der er lebt (1971; It is not the homosexual who is perverse, but the society in which he lives) first aired on West German national television. Eggert, Rausch, and several close friends watched the film from Moccabar, one of the few gay bars in East Berlin, and formed a group that would provide community to isolated gay men and lesbians, educate a society that invisibilized homosexuality, and engage with the socialist state to advance homosexual rights (McLellan 2012).

Although male homosexuality had been decriminalized in East Germany in 1968, HIB activists had to contend with both a hostile government and a dearth of places in which to meet. Von Mahlsdorf quickly provided a solution to the latter problem. Beginning in 1974, von Mahlsdorf hosted regular meetings, gatherings, and parties of the HIB in the basement of her museum, which had been furnished with the interior fittings of the legendary Weimar-era bar Mulackritze, originally located in Berlin's Scheunenviertel (Giersdorf 2006).

Despite its location, the neighborhood of Mahlsdorf then quickly became a center for gay life in East Berlin, existing in a tense space between the emphasis on individualism under new general secretary of the Socialist Unity Party Erich Honecker (1912–1994) and resistance to nonstate groups (McLellan 2017). The HIB did apply for state recognition, having never conceived of itself as antistate; however, its petitions were denied. The beginning of the end of the HIB came in 1978, when the East German government prevented von Mahlsdorf from hosting a party for lesbians and subsequently banned her from hosting any gatherings at all. After this point, it became impossible for the HIB to find a suitable venue, and in 1979, following a discouraging meeting with the East German Council of Ministers, the HIB disbanded (McLellan 2012).

Stasi Controversy

Although banned from hosting meetings of the HIB, von Mahlsdorf was permitted to continue running her museum. By the early 1980s, gay organizing in East Germany had found a new home under the auspices of the Protestant church, beginning in 1982 with the creation of the first church-hosted gay group in Leipzig. By 1989, there existed twenty-three similar church groups and twelve to fifteen state-sponsored groups across East Germany (Giersdorf 2006). In 1988 the age of consent was equalized for homosexual and heterosexual contact, and on 9 November 1989, the day the Berlin Wall came down, the first state-sponsored gay film, Coming Out, was released; von Mahlsdorf played a minor role in the film, which was also notable for its English-language title. After the reunification of Germany in 1990, there was a brief period during which von Mahlsdorf was lionized as a queer hero of two repressive regimes. In 1992, the year von Mahlsdorf released her autobiography, she also was the subject of the von Praunheim documentary and was awarded the Federal Cross of Merit by the German government (Hightberg 2009).

The following year, however, it was reported that von Mahlsdorf had been a willing informant for the East German secret police, the “Stasi” (Staatssicherheits-dienst). Although there was no evidence that von Mahlsdorf had informed on the HIB, some in the international press reasoned that her testimony had led to the imprisonment of her friend and fellow antiques collector Alfred Kirschner (McLellan 2012; Giersdorf 2006). While the Stasi file itself was far from consistent, making it difficult to discern to what extent von Mahlsdorf had acted willingly, it did cause some to doubt whether von Mahlsdorf’s autobiography could be trusted (Schiavi 2006). Because of the negative press, von Mahlsdorf closed the museum in 1995 and moved to Sweden in 1997 where she lived until her death in 2002 while on a book tour in Germany. Nevertheless, Wright’s play I Am My Own Wife, which investigates the controversy as well as von Mahlsdorf’s biography, achieved great commercial and critical success when it premiered the following year.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

W v. Registrar of Marriages (2013)

JOHN NGUYET ERNI
Fung Hon Chu Endowed Chair of Humanics & Head of Department of Humanities and Creative Writing
Hong Kong Baptist University

Landmark court case granting transgendered persons the right to marry in Hong Kong.

W v. Registrar of Marriages is a case of a transgender person living in Hong Kong who sought to marry through the Hong Kong legal system. In 2010 and 2011 the Hong Kong Court of First Instance (CFI) and Court of Appeal (CA), respectively, rejected the appellant, a “Miss W,” who, as a certified male-to-female transgender person, wished to marry her boyfriend, a biological male. Undeterred, W took this case to the Court of Final Appeal (CFA), which eventually overturned the previous judgments and declared the obstruction of a transgender person’s right to marry unconstitutional. By the time the CFA issued its ruling in May 2013, this first-ever transgender marriage rights case in Hong Kong’s legal history had already stirred considerable debate in society and within legal circles. Because the judicial apparatus of Hong Kong after the handover to the sovereignty of the People’s Republic of China (PRC) remains adhered to the British/European system under the Basic Law (see Chiang 2017), the adjudication of this case will not only enjoy wide recognition in other countries (especially those under British Commonwealth law), it will be a valuable reference point for the PRC’s legal treatment of transgender rights.

Very little is known about W directly, and even the courts admitted that their order for nondisclosure of W’s identity to the public and the media reflected the stigma attached to being a transgender person in Hong Kong (W 2011, para. 24). In October 2009, after being refused permission to register their marriage by the Registrar of Marriages, W and her boyfriend sought legal action to demand from a Hong Kong court: (1) a recognition that both the Marriage Ordinance and the Matrimonial Causes Ordinance should include in the purview of the definitions of “man,” “woman,” “male,” and “female” an “updated” inclusion of postoperative transsexual persons in their acquired sex; and (2) a declaration that a denial of such recognition constitutes a violation of the freedom and right of marriage as expressly provided by both the Basic Law and the Hong Kong Bill of Rights. A year later, on 5 October 2010, the CFI squashed W’s judicial challenge; the judge held that Hong Kong laws would not permit—more precisely, did not enjoy the “societal consensus” to recognize—the marriage right of a transgender person.
At this point, W took her case to the CA. In the appeal, her legal team raised several legal challenges to the decision of the CFI, including the latter’s use of an outdated 1970 court case (Corbett v. Corbett) as a primary statutory reference. In the Corbett case, the court was asked by a husband to grant a declaration that his marriage was null and void on the grounds that his “wife” was in fact a postoperative male-to-female transsexual person who was, additionally, incapable of consummating a marriage (because she had only an artificial vagina). The court, which was able to rely only on the (limited) medical evidence of the time, restricted “sex” to chromosomal, gonadal, and genital factors (to the exclusion of psychological, social, or cultural factors), and thus construed the validity of a marriage as dependent on only biological criteria. W’s legal team also argued that the court’s view of gender did not keep up with advances in medical technologies, and that its view of marriage was not in accordance with advances in international family and marriage laws. But despite those challenges, on 25 November 2011, the CA upheld the original decision.

Sociolegal Contexts

In Hong Kong, marriage is governed by the Marriage Ordinance. It was enacted in 1875 but remains in force today statutorily, despite vast historical, social, and medical changes since its framing. According to its preamble, the ordinance is to provide for “the celebration of Christian marriage or the civil equivalent thereof, and for matters connected therewith.” Part 2 of Section 40 goes on to clarify that this form of marriage “implies a formal ceremony recognized by the law as involving the voluntary union for life of one man and one woman to the exclusion of all others.” Legally, the introduction of Christian marriage (or its civil equivalent) into Hong Kong at the time of British colonial rule—known as “registry marriage”—was “particularly natural given that otherwise, in those days, marriages were mostly conducted according to Chinese customary law” (W 2010, para. 114). Traditional marriage up to the early twentieth century was commonly known as “Chinese customary marriage,” which was likely to be an outcome of parental arrangement and was often polygamous in nature. After the introduction of the 1931 Civil Code in the mainland, people in Hong Kong contracted marriages by following the marriage provisions contained in the code, and those marriages, when formalized in Hong Kong, became known as “Chinese modern marriages.” No registration was required of a Chinese modern marriage, but an open ceremony was necessary. And, unlike a Chinese customary marriage, a Chinese modern marriage was bound by the code of monogamy.

Reforms in 1970 and 1971 did away with both Chinese customary marriage and Chinese modern marriage in Hong Kong. With the enactment of the Matrimonial Causes Ordinance (a direct adoption of the United Kingdom’s Nullity of Marriage Act of 1971), a marriage that took place after 30 June 1972 would be void if “the parties are not respectively male and female” (Pegg 1994, 8). The restriction of marriage to a monogamous heterosexual relationship is a direct inheritance of dogmatic stipulations by the Church of England.
Andrew Cheung, the judge who heard the W case in the CFI, made a forceful assertion: “According to the doctrine of the Church of England, marriage is in its nature a union permanent and life-long, for better or for worse, till death them do part, of one man and one woman, to the exclusion of all others on either side, for the procreation and nurture of children” (W 2010, para. 116). Therefore, a whole Judeo-Christian dogma was laid out by the judge, in which marriage was put in lockstep with heterosexuality, monogamy, procreation, and even the preferred form of intimacy. But he did acknowledge this: “There is, however, no relevant definition of ‘man,’ ‘woman,’ ‘male,’ or ‘female’ in either of the Ordinances [Marriage Ordinance and Matrimonial Causes Ordinance]. The matter is therefore left to the interpretation of the court” (para. 54).

Over the years, there was no legal challenge to the restrictive gender provisions of the two marriage ordinances (that is, until the groundbreaking W case), although there have been many challenges to inheritance rights and challenges arising from disputes between traditional customary marriage and modern registry marriage (see, e.g., Leung Lai Fong v. Ho Sin Ying [2009]). Neither have there been any policy changes to update those statutes to reflect changes brought about by new understandings of gender, family, and marriage. But, in fact, vast changes have occurred in Hong Kong outside of the court.

Transphobia in Hong Kong Culture

In Hong Kong, two primary terms are commonly used to label the transgender person in public discourse: bin tai and yan yiu. The term bin tai is a common lexicon referring to all real or imagined perversions seen as a deviation from reproductive, heterosexual, familycentered norms of the body, gender, and sexuality (Erni 2016). Yet the term’s basic meaning is rather innocuous: bin refers to change, whereas tai means a state of affairs, a condition, or a position. But when transposed into an insult to the cross-dresser, the pedophile, the polygamist, the same-sex lover, the masculine woman, the sissy boy, or the transgender person, bin tai exposes its ideological preference for reproductive, heterosexual, family-centered norms. As such, it achieves cultural ubiquity in a conservative society such as Hong Kong.

Yiu is possibly the unifying term that refers to the “transifying” gender and sexual identities and practices, something that the term queer has always tried to approximate in more global contexts. Seen in this way, yan yiu (literally translated as “human ghost,” “human monster,” or “freak”) is a term that arguably exceeds a narrow reference to transgender people. Like the term queer, yan yiu seems to gesture toward a larger realm of liminal sociosexual practices: all queerly sexed people are members of the “yan yiu family.”

Terms such as bin tai and yan yiu command a kind of cultural ubiquity that produces a sensation of shame and humiliation; they can mortify an individual into withdrawing from sociality (Cheung 2012). Even though the government of Hong Kong has been providing counseling and sex reassignment surgery since the mid-1980s, and despite the existence of a growing transgender rights movement since the first years of the twenty-first century (Emerton 2006), transgender people are almost entirely invisible in Hong Kong and continue to experience discrimination in the civil and criminal arenas (Erni 2013). As is the case in Taiwan and many other countries, however, transgender visibility typically arrives as a shock after the (sensationalized) death of a transgender person. This happened in Hong Kong in 2004 when, within a single week, two transgender women—Louise Chan and Sasha Moon—committed suicide. When Moon leaped from her high-rise apartment to her death, her plunge was captured in a morbid sequence of photographs published in the following morning’s local newspapers. “The media used to treat us like a freak show. Today, we’re seen as [ironically] a genuinely good story,” laments a friend of Moon and a member of the rights group Transgender Equality and Acceptance Movement (quoted in Watkins 2004).

It should be noted that transgender people in Hong Kong do not fully lack legal rights in the civil law domain. Records show that the first sex-change surgery for a transgender person in Hong Kong was performed in 1981 by an ad hoc group of doctors in a government hospital. In the following years, more transgender patients came to government hospitals to ask for the surgery. To treat these patients according to internationally acceptable standards, a gender identity team (GIT), composed of psychiatrists, clinical psychologists, medical social workers, geneticists, gynecologists, surgeons, and lawyers from both the public and private sectors, was formed in 1986 within the sex clinic of Queen Mary Hospital (Ma 1997). Between 1991 and 2001, thirty-four persons were assessed by the GIT (Cheung 2006). In spite of the GIT’s achievements, however, the Hospital Authority in Hong Kong closed the unit in 2005, citing budget deficits. As a result, transgender patients turned to private clinics, where many of the doctors they saw had little or no experience treating transgender patients (Cheung 2010; Ng et al. 1989).
Michael Vidler, Lawyer for W. Vidler speaks to the press outside the Court of Final Appeal in Hong Kong on 13 May 2013 after winning a landmark case on behalf of W, a transsexual woman petitioning for the right to marry her boyfriend. The ruling forced the government to rewrite the city’s marriage laws.

In addition, in her 2004 study of transgender rights in Hong Kong, Robyn Emerton discusses the administrative concessions that the Hong Kong government offers to transgender persons in an attempt to comply with international legal trends. The concessions include a transgender person’s ability to change his or her name and sex identification on his or her identity card, driver’s license, passport, and education certificates once that person has provided adequate evidence of a successful transition. The reissuance of the identity card is important because Hong Kong residents are required to produce their identity card at all times, even though the card does not establish a person’s sex for legal purposes. The latter can be established only by one’s birth certificate. Laws in Hong Kong do not allow for the alteration of the birth certificate for postoperative transgender persons as of 2017, a legal restriction that has a negative impact on rights related to marriage, custody of children, and use of public spaces (e.g., a public toilet or changing facility).

Sociolegal Implications

When the CFA judgment was handed down on 13 May 2013 declaring victory for W, the public expressed sympathy with her plight. The public debate throughout the three years of the case may have helped illuminate the moral argument that recognizing the right of a transgender individual to marry another person in a voluntary heterounion will not diminish the validity or dignity of conventional marriage, any more than recognizing the right of an individual to marry a person of a different race or nationality devalues the marriage of a person who marries someone of his or her own race or nationality. In the CFA judgment, the judges on the bench did not refute the validity of Corbett but ruled that its approach to confining transgenderism to merely biological realities reinforced by the fulfillment of “Christian duties”—to the exclusion of social and psychological facets of transgenderism—was inadequate for the purpose of determining the marriageability of a transgender person. They also rebuffed the argument that the meanings of man and woman should be read merely through “ordinary, plain meanings.”

Thus, the landmark case of W v. Registrar of Marriages has successfully reworked the statutory constructions of transgenderism to encompass sociopsychological and cultural-interpretive dimensions. This dealt a major blow to the statutory framework advanced in the lower courts; more importantly, it sent a strong message of antidiscrimination to society. Another significance of W’s case lies in challenging not only the established marriage laws by setting a legal precedent but also the underlying cultural biases against nonnormative intimate relationships. Yet the judges in the CFA ruling made a strong declaration that their judgment was to be strictly confined to transgender marriage rights and therefore was not to be applied to, or confused with, same-sex marriage rights (W 2013, para. 2). Pitting one kind of rights against another kind, this distinction complicates the long-term struggle for the rights of all sexual minorities. Potentially negative impacts on same-sex marriage rights may arise in the future, paradoxically, because of the “success” of transgender marriage rights.

SEE ALSO Marriage, Same-Sex, in Taiwan; Section 377 in South Asia; Transgender Organizations in Mainland China, Hong Kong, and Taiwan

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Cheung, Pui Kei Eleanor. “GID in Hong Kong: A Critical Overview of Medical Treatments for Transsexual Patients.” In As Normal as Possible: Negotiating Sexuality and Gender in Mainland China and Hong Kong, edited by Yau Ching, 75–85. Hong Kong: Hong Kong University Press, 2010.

Waria

SHARYN GRAHAM DAVIES
Associate Professor, School of Social Sciences and Public Policy
Auckland University of Technology, New Zealand

The historical and contemporary position of male-to-female transgender subjects in Indonesia.

In 2016 Indonesian politicians alongside religious leaders announced to a listening media that LGBTQ people were incompatible with Indonesia’s cultural and religious tradition. LGBTQ Indonesians were accused of being part of a proxy war funded by Western powers and blamed for bringing moral degradation to the nation. What these politicians and religious leaders left out, and what the media failed to investigate, however, was the incredible role of LGBTQ Indonesians not only in making Indonesia the country it is today but also in ensuring that Islam, and not Christianity, became the dominant religion in provinces such as South Sulawesi.

This entry discusses the position of one group of LGBTQ Indonesians, waria. After defining the term and providing a general outline of waria subjectivity, the entry provides details of the history of waria within Indonesia. The entry then fast forwards over the history of waria under authoritarian rule to provide a snapshot of waria in contemporary Indonesia.

Definition

Waria is a composite word derived from wanita (woman) and pria (man). As this amalgamation suggests, waria are a subject position that combines elements of women and men. While waria is the most commonly used, and most polite, word used to describe male-to-female transgender subjects, many other words are in use in Indonesia. Some of the words used to describe this subject position, which are more or less respectful and have waned in favor of waria, include banci, bencong, wadam (from wanita and Adam, or Eve and Adam), and walsu (from wanita palsu, or false woman). There are also indigenous languages with their own terms for waria, such as calabai (etymologically derived from the words for “false woman”) in South Sulawesi. Areas such as South Sulawesi also have a tradition of gender-androgynous priests known as bissu (Peletz 2009). While neologisms such as waria have been in use for only a few decades, there are documents from the sixteenth century that talk about the subject position of bissu. As many waria claim a contemporary stake in Indonesian society by drawing on this rich history of gender and sexual diversity, it is worth briefly considering the historical aspect.
History of Waria in Indonesia

While the subject position waria is relatively new, Indonesia has a much longer history of supporting gender and sexual diversity (Davies 2010). There are numerous ritual traditions across the archipelago emphasizing the generative power of a combination of masculine and feminine aspects (B. Andaya 1994; Oetomo 1996). One of the traditions for which there is good evidence comes from South Sulawesi. Origin narratives mentioning gender plurality began to be composed orally between the ninth and fourteenth centuries (Pelras 1996). Then in the fifteenth century writing developed among the Bugis ethnic group in South Sulawesi, and there are early documents mentioning bissu (Noorduyn 1965). For instance, the La Galigo cycle, which is a kind of cultural encyclopedia for the Bugis, discussed the role of bissu within the royal courts (Macknight 1993). In these documents bissu are described as combining female and male aspects and then using the resulting power of such a combination to take lead roles in battles against enemies, such as against the Dutch between the sixteenth and twentieth centuries (L. Andaya 2004). La Galigo manuscripts also provide advice on developing fulfilling marital sexual relations, the crucial role of foreplay, and how women can maintain a dry vagina to increase the pleasure of both wife and husband (Hadrawi 2016; Idrus 2003).

Information about bissu also comes from the letters and documents of various travelers to the region. In 1544 a Portuguese missionary and merchant, Antonio de Paiva, came to the island of Sulawesi (Pelras 1996). De Paiva recorded the significant influence bissu had over the king:

Your Lordship will know that the priests of these kings are generally called bissus. They grow no hair on their beards, dress in a womanly fashion, and grow their hair long and braided.... They marry and are received, according to the custom of the land, with other common men, and they live indoors uniting carnally in their secret places with the men whom they have for husbands.

(QUOTED IN BAKER 2005, 68)

De Paiva went on to record his frustration with bissu interfering in state affairs. Indeed, de Paiva held bissu responsible for the fact that the king converted to Islam rather than Christianity. De Paiva’s accounts of bissu are supported by a wealth of other evidence provided by other foreign travelers, including James Brooke (1848), B. F. Matthes (1872) and H. Th. Chabot ([1950] 1996). What all of this evidence shows is that Indonesia has a long history of supporting, and indeed at times celebrating, gender and sexual diversity.
A Waria and Child at Her Home in Yogyakarta, Indonesia. This house was host to Indonesia’s first Islamic school set up specifically for waria, or male-to-female transgendered persons in Indonesia. While some of Indonesia’s Islamic provincial governments have passed legislation that discriminates against them, the waria actually played an important role in the establishment of Islam in Indonesia.

Waria in Independent Indonesia

Following World War II (1939–1945) Indonesia declared independence, and just two subsequent presidents ruled the archipelago until 1998: Sukarno (ruled 1945–1967) and Suharto (ruled 1967–1998). During these decades, the position of waria and other LGBTQ subjects experienced both highs and lows. While waria often were able to live under the radar, there were a few times when government or religious groups specifically targeted them. One of these times was during the 1950s when the Kahar Muzakkar religious movement targeted a number of waria and bissu in South Sulawesi. Another time of overt persecution was during the communist purges of the 1960s when waria were seen as a potential threat to national security.

While the Indonesian state during the leadership of Sukarno and subsequently Suharto was definitely not supportive of homosexuality, it could be framed as a heteronormative state, whereby the focus of the government and others was on ensuring that people openly conformed to a vision of the heterosexual family, rather than persecuting private practices (Boellstorff 2005; Davies 2015). People who had homosexual relationships but who did not publicly flaunt these were often not paid punitive attention. Moreover, there was a recognized position for waria. For instance, almost every sitcom aired on television included waria characters who provided comic relief. Waria also legitimately worked as organizers of weddings and in beauty salons as hairdressers. More recently, Indonesian president Joko Widodo (in office starting in 2014) appeared on television in 2014 alongside trans woman Dorce Gamalama (1963–).

Waria in the Twenty-First Century

In 1998 Indonesia moved from authoritarian rule to a period of democratic reform. While democracy enabled many progressive laws to pass, such as press freedom laws, and enabled the development of centers such as the National Commission on Human Rights, democracy also permitted antiprogressive forces to emerge. For instance, while Islam had been suppressed to an extent under authoritarian rule, this was no longer the case in the democratic era. While religious freedom was welcomed by many, it also enabled the extremist Front Pembela Islam (Islamic Defenders Front) to emerge. The Front Pembela Islam took particular issue with LGBTQ Indonesians and promoted the passage of homophobic and transphobic laws. The process of decentralization that Indonesia experienced during the move to democracy meant that provincial governments had the power to pass homophobic laws. In 2002 South Sumatra implemented the Provincial Ordinance on the Eradication of Immoral Behavior, which classified anal sex between men as immoral and illegal. Two years later, the city of Palembang (the capital of South Sumatra) issued the City Ordinance on the Eradication of Prostitution, which conflated homosexuality with prostitution (Allen 2007). In 2008 an anti-pornography law was ratified at the national level prohibiting the depiction, production, and distribution of pornography; same-sex sexuality may be considered pornography. The province of Aceh in 2015 implemented the Qanun Jinayat, an Islamic criminal code bylaw penalizing homosexuality (Simanjuntak 2015). Sexual freedoms were thus being progressively dismantled as the democratic reform was carried out. The position of waria within Indonesia became increasingly precarious.

In early 2016 Zulkifli Hasan (1962–), chair of the People’s Consultative Assembly, said, “As a movement, the existence of LGBT must be opposed. We must limit its room to move. However, as individual people, they must be protected like any other citizen” (quoted in Nurbianto 2016). Hasan’s comment is interesting given that it implies that as individual citizens who abide by the norms of the nation and marry heterosexually, LGBTQ persons, including waria, must be protected. But if LGBTQ people as a movement begin to claim rights to collective citizenship, such as the right to marry, then this must be prohibited. A key feature of this hatred has been that it is directed at waria and LGBTQ individuals more generally as a visible collective group attempting to stake a claim as national subjects (Boellstorff 2016). What seems to be the issue is that sexual and gender diversity can be tolerated but only as long as LGBTQ people remain invisible (Davies 2016).

The history of waria positionality in Indonesia is thus complex. The fortunes of waria have waxed and waned according to political and religious will. Nevertheless, Indonesia has a long history of supporting gender and sexuality diversity. As such, when political or religious leaders state that waria are incompatible with Indonesia, history demonstrates that such a claim is not always the case. Indeed, if it were not for the power and influence of waria forebears, namely bissu, the region of South Sulawesi might have been persuaded to accept Christianity rather than Islam. As such, it remains clear that Indonesia is indebted to waria for their contributions to multiple histories of the region—and not least the continued embrace of Islam.

SEE ALSO Hijras; Kathoey

BIBLIOGRAPHY

“We Demand” Protest (1971)

PATRIZIA GENTILE
Associate Professor
Carleton University, Canada

The first major public demonstration by the Canadian gay and lesbian liberation movement, including an explanation of the ten demands made by the protesters.

In Ottawa, Canada, on 28 August 1971, more than 100 gay men, lesbians, and their supporters marched through the rain to Parliament Hill to mark the second anniversary of the proclamation of Bill C-150 (which was enacted as the Criminal Law Amendment Act of 1968–1969). In addition to marking this anniversary, the protesters presented a list of ten demands based on a brief submitted to the federal government by members of the August 28th Gay Day Committee, a coalition of twelve gay and lesbian liberation groups of which the Toronto Gay Action (TGA) was one. In solidarity with the Ottawa protest, a group called Gay Alliance toward Equality (GATE) simultaneously demonstrated in front of the courthouse in Vancouver, British Columbia. What became labeled as the “We Demand” protest was the first major public demonstration mounted by the Canadian gay and lesbian liberation movement.

Herb Spiers, a founding member of the TGA and one of the main authors of the brief submitted by the August 28th Gay Day Committee (McCaskell 2016), was also a board member of the Community Homophile Association of Toronto (CHAT) and a member of The Body Politic collective, a Toronto gay and lesbian newspaper published from 1971 to 1987. Spiers was supposed to be one of the main speakers at the 28 August protest in Ottawa but was involved in a car accident en route from Toronto and missed the opportunity. Instead, Charlie Hill, a founder of the University of Toronto Homophile Association (UTHA), delivered the main speech (penned by Spiers and David Newcombe) while standing on the front steps of the Parliament of Canada's Centre Block underneath the Peace Tower. The ten “demands” detailed in the original brief included a call to repeal gross indecency laws, end police oppression and the national security campaigns against queers, and fight against the higher age of consent for same-gender erotic practices. Other speakers included George Hislop and Pat Murphy from CHAT, Pierre Masson from the Montreal-based Front de Libération Homosexuel (FLH; Homosexual Liberation Front), and John Williams, an activist from the United States. The complete text of the brief was published in The Body Politic in its inaugural issue.
The catalyst for this landmark protest was the partial decriminalization of homosexuality and the privatization of queer sexualities in the 1968–1969 Criminal Code reform. Contrary to claims made by the Liberal government of Liberal prime minister Pierre Trudeau, the 1968–1969 reforms did not legalize homosexuality; instead, they functioned to maintain sexual regulation along the lines of differentiating between public and private sex and sex between consenting adults. This liberal strategy was adopted in the United Kingdom’s Wolfenden Report (1957) and became the basis of the Canadian approach to the partial decriminalization of homosexuality. The Wolfenden Report argued that the role of the criminal in society was to protect public decency and not impose moral judgment on private acts (Kinsman 1996). Essentially, the Wolfenden Report helped establish a distinction between the state’s interest in regulating sex in public and sex acts taking place in private. The Wolfenden Report helped shape both law reform in Canada and the approach to reform strategies by gay and lesbian liberation activists (Kinsman 2013).

In the Canadian context, the Criminal Law Amendment Act of 1968–1969 helped institute the distinction between the public and private spheres of sex by limiting the legal regulation of sex between consenting adults (defined as people aged twenty-one or over) in the private sphere—that is, behind closed doors. The 1968–1969 reforms entrenched Trudeau’s now famous statement made in December 1967: “There’s no place for the state in the bedrooms of the nation.” With these words, Trudeau supposedly drew the government’s attention away from the nation’s sexual activities in the private sphere, while effectively directing police work toward public sexual practices such as same-sex erotic exchanges in parks, restrooms, and bathhouses. The 28 August 1971 protest organized by the August 28th Gay Day Committee and the brief that accompanied it were the gay and lesbian liberation’s response to what was seen as continued injustice regarding and discrimination against homosexuals.

We Demand and the Road toward a Legal Agenda

In their cover letter that accompanied the brief, TGA members Brian Waite and Cheri DiNovo framed the document as a demand that the government “redress” the grievances “homosexual men and women” endured in their daily lives (Gentile, Kinsman, and Rankin 2017, 4). However, Waite and DiNovo also considered the brief and the 28 August 1971 protest as “the opening of a continuing public campaign until the just and reasonable reforms in the enclosed brief are achieved, and until the day when homosexual men and women are as free and equal as our heterosexual brothers and sisters” (Waite and DiNovo 1971, 4). While Canada’s first major protest and the brief to the federal government cannot be defined as a national mobilization, they did garner considerable support from several organizations, including CHAT, FLH, GATE, UTHA, the University of Guelph Homophile Association, the University of Western Ontario Homophile Association, the Vancouver Gay Activist Alliance, the Gay Liberation Front (Vancouver), Gay Sisters (Vancouver), University of Waterloo’s Gay Liberation Movement, and the York University Homophile Association. This level of support and coordination between the TGA and eleven other prominent gay and lesbian liberation organizations was unprecedented and therefore instrumental in creating the momentum for a larger and more expansive movement across the country, including sparking the birth of The Body Politic. By the mid-1970s, the gay and lesbian liberation movement in Canada would expand and solidify as a political force through a multitude of activities, including pride celebrations in several major cities, such as Toronto, Vancouver, Montreal, Ottawa, and Winnipeg; the founding of Gay Alliance toward Equality–Edmonton in 1972; the publication of the first Canadian lesbian journal, Long Time Coming, by the organization Montreal Gay Women; the establishment of the Community Homophile Association of Newfoundland; and the organization of a lesbian conference in Montreal in January 1974, followed by the National Gay Rights Conference in June 1975 in Ottawa, to name only a few examples (Jackson and Persky 1982).

One of the central motivations behind the emergence of these pride celebrations, conferences, organizations, and publications was the fight to end discrimination against homosexuals, especially in the legal arena. Consequently, the radical politics of resistance based on coalition building between the gay and lesbian liberation movement and other movements, such as the feminist movement, the antiwar movement, or organizations to end poverty, began to wane. The push toward identity politics, initiated by the tone and tenor of the 28 August 1971 protest and the brief that inspired it, translated into the movement’s trajectory toward an equality rights platform, also known as a human rights strategy.

Homosexuality and We Demand Activists as Security Threats

Based on an interview with Waite, members of the UTHA began an investigation into state policies in 1970 and 1971. This led to an exploration of whether recommendations made based on Paragraph 100 of the Canadian federal government’s Report of the Royal Commission on Security (1969) had been applied to the public service. Paragraph 100 of the Royal Commission report (also known as the Mackenzie Commission Report) stated that “homosexuals are special targets for attention from foreign intelligence service” and that “certain types” seemed to be more vulnerable to being compromised than “non-deviate persons” (Kinsman and Gentile 2010, 216–217). While the members of the TGA and the August 28th Gay Day Committee would not have understood then the extent to which the Canadian government and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police (RCMP) had established an elaborate antiqueer security campaign lasting from the early 1960s to the late 1980s, this particular subsection of the Mackenzie Commission Report led them to include in their brief several demands about the employment and security measures taken against queers. Demands #5 and #8 reflect a vague knowledge of and suspicion about the activities of the RCMP against homosexuals within the public services. Here, the authors of the brief insisted on the right of equal employment and promotion across all government levels for homosexuals (demand #5) and the right to know if it was the policy of the RCMP to identify homosexuals within any area of government service for the purposes of questioning them about their sexuality and the sexuality of others (demand #8). These particular demands reveal some understanding of how the security campaigns against queers were linked to larger issues around security clearances, police investigations and surveillance, and national security ideology that labeled homosexuals as suffering from “character weaknesses” that rendered them vulnerable to blackmail by foreign intelligence officers.

Extensive research conducted by the sociologist Gary Kinsman and the historian Patrizia Gentile—published in their 2010 book The Canadian War on Queers—demonstrates that the suspicion and preliminary knowledge of national security state policies against queers raised within the brief was well founded and even prescient. Ironically, as the activists gathered for the “We Demand” demonstration on Parliament Hill calling for the end to police surveillance and the right to equal employment and promotion of homosexuals at all government levels, the RCMP appointed a surveillance detail and produced security reports about the protest. Through its surveillance of the League for Socialist Action (LSA) forums and meetings in Toronto, the RCMP learned of the Ottawa demonstration. Evidence based on documents obtained through the Access to Information Act shows the RCMP took great interest in the August 1971 protest because of the involvement of LSA members in the newly formed TGA. The RCMP report describes the event as follows:

> The demonstration marched in front of the Peace Tower carrying signs and chanting slogans. The banners and signs displayed by the demonstrators carried various messages and slogans such as “Canada—True North Strong and Gay,” “Equal Rights for Gay People,” and “Smash Heterosexual Imperialism.” … After marching … the group gathered in front of the Peace Tower and were addressed by several speakers. The first speaker was [redacted] from Ottawa, [redacted] claimed the protesters represented groups from Toronto, Waterloo, Guelph, London, Montreal, and New York State.

>(QUOTED IN KINSMAN AND GENTILE 2010, 267)

Included in the report was the list of demands read to the protesters. In their study of the antiqueer security purges, Kinsman and Gentile uncovered how national security ideology and police surveillance were organized and structured to help sustain the heterosexist state for over thirty years, directly affecting the lives of queers working in the federal government and the military.
The Vancouver “We Demand” protest led by GATE was also under surveillance by the RCMP. The event included twenty activists who addressed a crowd of about 150 to 200 people at the courthouse in Robson Square (now the Vancouver Art Gallery). Speakers included Roedy Green, then chairperson of GATE-Vancouver, who read out the brief, as well as speakers from Gay Sisters and the Gay Liberation Front (GLF). One of the central aims of the Vancouver protest was to focus demands for an amendment to the British Columbia Human Rights Act to include sexual orientation. These demands were presented to the then-labour minister, William King of the New Democratic Party, who did not respond positively. The RCMP report of the event reveals that the federal police were not familiar with GATE before the demonstration but the “investigator’s comments” do mention that surveillance of GLF and the Canadian Gay Activists Alliance was a habitual practice taking place earlier than the 1971 event. Indeed, in the case of Vancouver, the RCMP seemed to focus on the participation of activists they would have considered radicals, such as the “gay faction” of the “Women’s Liberation Front.”

The Demands behind “We Demand”

The demands presented in the August 1971 brief included an array of issues beyond questions concerning surveillance and employment rights (such as demands #5 and #8), demonstrating the scope of social and political injustices against queers in the early 1970s. Activists involved in writing the brief also focused on the Immigration Act and the Canadian Armed Forces in demands #4 and #7, respectively. In both instances, a close reading of state policies related to the Immigration Act and against homosexuals serving in the armed forces helped build an understanding that led to related demands. For example, in his capacity as a member of the UTHA, Hill in January 1971 wrote to Otto Lang, then serving as minister of manpower and immigration, expressing disagreement with the antigay clauses of the Immigration Act. The August 1971 activists demanded that any references to the words homosexuals or homosexualism be removed from the act, arguing that denying immigration to Canada based on someone’s sexuality was “inconsistent” with the Criminal Code of Canada. In an important counterlogic, the authors of the “We Demand” brief argued that because “homo-sexualism” is not an illegal practice between consenting adults in private, the Immigration Act discriminated against a “minority group.”

Under demand #7, the authors of the August 1971 document included a short paragraph explaining its significance. In that explanation, activists drew on their knowledge of several state policies, including sections 103.25 (“Scandalous Conduct by Officers”) and 103.26 (“Cruel or Disgraceful Conduct”) of the Queen’s Regulations and Orders for the Canadian Forces and Paragraph 6 of Canadian Forces Administrative Order 19-20 (“Sexual Deviation —Investigation, Medical Examination, and Disposal”), to construct their arguments. The authors understood these documents as effectively contravening the Criminal Code in the case of the Queen’s Regulations and Orders sections mentioned above and the uncompromising dismissal of all homosexuals from service based on the idea that they were “sexual deviates.”

Arguably, the first three demands presented in the “We Demand” brief were considered the most important and critical for the protest organizers. These demands sought the removal of the terms gross indecency and indecent act from the Criminal Code and their replacement by a specific listing of offenses; the removal of “gross indecency” and “buggery” as grounds for indictment as a “dangerous sexual offender” and for vagrancy; and a call for a uniform age of consent for homosexual and heterosexual acts. For the authors of the brief, the fact that terms such as gross indecency and buggery were largely undefined left queers open to the personal biases of enforcement officers, with these biases being, they argued, largely “antihomosexual.” Consequently, they demanded a concise listing of public offenses related to these terms in order to circumvent these biases. The authors were specifically critical of the way that Sections 147 and 149 of the Criminal Code were invoked to discriminate against same-sex practices, suggesting that they were applied differently to heterosexuals engaged in public sex as opposed to queers. These subsections of the Criminal Code also applied to how Section 661 was invoked upon indictment, which meant that a person arrested under gross indecency would be labeled a dangerous sexual offender and thus denied access to places such as school grounds, bathing areas, or public parks. They viewed this application as “excessive,” especially because it entrenched the already widely held belief that all homosexuals were potential child molesters.

Changes to the age of consent were part of this larger debate. It is no surprise then that demand #3 included a call for a uniform age of consent for all sexual practices, whether they involved premarital heterosexual sex or queer sexual practices. Interestingly, it is under this demand that the issue of same-sex marriage is first mentioned. Here, the authors reveal the arbitrary decisions regarding federal laws concerning age of consent and legal age for entering into a marriage contract for heterosexuals and queer sexual practices. The failure to recognize same-sex marriages meant that queer sexual practices would always be subject to Sections 138, 143, and 144 of the Criminal Code.

Of the ten demands listed in the brief to the federal government and included in the speech read by Hill on 28 August, only demand #6 was listed without an explanation. In this demand, the authors called for the Divorce Act to be amended so as to omit references to homosexuality as grounds for divorce and to insist that homosexuality not preclude the equal right of child custody. While little research has been conducted on the impact of the Divorce Act on queers, this issue played a major role in the lives of gay men and lesbians who lived “double lives” throughout the 1950s and 1960s only to come out of the closet in the 1970s.

As a set, demands #9 and #10 were meant to capture and explain the broader inequalities that shaped the lives of queers in the early 1970s and to push for cultural and social changes in the way queers were perceived and treated by public officials and law enforcement agents. Demand #9 was a demand for “all legal rights for homosexuals which currently exist for heterosexuals,” with the brief including a list of seven points highlighting various categories that were seen as discriminatory and as continuing evidence of the “inequities with which homosexuals must contend.” In the broad parameters of demand #9, the authors emphasized the inability of queer couples to file joint income tax returns because they could not legally marry, the obstacles to benefiting from public housing, the ways in which the education system fostered narrow views on homosexuality, the problems faced by queer couples wanting to adopt children because they could not legally marry, the employment discrimination faced in the private sector and the exploitation by landlords, the direct and subtle harassment by police officers, and the exclusion of homosexuality in the Canadian Bill of Rights. Under this sweeping demand, the authors called for ending the “second-class citizen” status of homosexuals, an objective also voiced by the feminist movement in the 1970s.

Finally, demand #10 insisted on changes in social attitudes toward homosexuals from public and law officials, including “negative attitudes” and expressions of discrimination and prejudice born out of these attitudes. Under this demand, the authors of the brief called on public officials to “transcend prejudicial attitudes,” foster a system that is conducive to “democratic principles,” and be leaders in promoting the “principles of human rights.” In their final call, the authors and activists who penned the “We Demand” document asked that government officials meet with Canadian “homophile groups” to discuss the demands laid out and to support the “purpose of this brief.”

Small but Significant: “We Demand” as Springboard for Change

Despite the significant place the “We Demand” brief and the protest it provoked on 28
August 1971 hold in what is now called Canadian queer history, there exist inconsistencies as to how the event is remembered. In his 2011 obituary for Spiers, Ed Jackson, a Toronto-based activist and original member of The Body Politic collective, wrote that the “We Demand” brief was “a kind of strategic blueprint for the Canadian movement.” Rick Bébout (2003) echoes other activists in calling it “the first manifesto of Canada's nationwide gay liberation movement.” However, the activist Green recalled in an interview given on the fortieth anniversary of the “We Demand” protest that the event was not necessarily considered at the time “one of the biggies” (quoted in DiMera 2011). Jackson commented that gay liberationists were “too busy pushing for action,” but that the importance of the event loomed larger by 1981 (DiMera 2011), the year of another major gay and lesbian liberation flash point ignited by a massive raid on bathhouses in Toronto (Hooper 2016).
The 28 August 1971 event is considered a founding moment in Canada’s gay and lesbian history. While it did not involve the coordinated and national mobilization associated with the 1981 bathhouse raids, the significance of what is now known as the "We Demand" protest is squarely based on the ten demands articulated by gay and lesbian liberationists. The demands read out on that rainy Saturday afternoon to protesters stand as a reminder of the long road and struggles these activists endured as they fought against the heterosexist character of the state and its discrimination against queers.

SEE ALSO Bathhouse Raids, Toronto (1981); The Body Politic; Stonewall Riots, International Effects of; The Wolfenden Report

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Kinsman, Gary, and Patrizia Gentile. The Canadian War on Queers: National Security as

The Well of Loneliness (1928; Radclyffe Hall)

JODIE MEDD
Associate Professor, Department of English Language and Literature
Carleton University, Canada

A novel about a sexual invert, which was subject to obscenity charges upon publication.

Radclyffe Hall (1880–1943; born Marguerite Radclyffe Hall; preferred to be called “John”) was a British novelist at the height of her career when she decided to stake her name and “literary reputation in support of the cause of the inverted” by penning The Well of Loneliness (Hall 2007 [1934], 325). As she told her publisher, she aspired to write “the life of a woman who is a born invert” with “sincerity and truth” while avoiding “all unnecessary coarseness” (quoted in Baker 1985, 202). Arguably, it was the first English novel to focus on female homosexuality without disdain, irony, satire, salaciousness, or evasion. In an era when female homosexuality was emerging as an identity category in medical and sexological discourse, Hall’s earnest depiction was targeted by conservative media and purity organizations, resulting in legal trials and censorship. This backlash discouraged further open queer self-representation in English literature; at the same time The Well entrenched the figure of the “mythic mannish lesbian,” influencing Western constructions of female homosexuality for decades to come (Newton 2001 [1989]). As a work of literature, the novel has been debated as a (flawed) lesbian classic, an emancipatory plea, a conservative embarrassment, and a proto-transgender narrative.

The Sexual Invert in The Well of Loneliness

Hall claimed three didactic purposes in publishing The Well: (1) to encourage inverts to come out publicly; (2) to inspire inverts toward good citizenship and moral living in the face of an intolerant society; and (3) to promote “a more tolerant understanding” of inverts among “normal” (i.e., normatively sexed and gendered) readers. Undertaking the “task of a pioneer” (Hall 2007 [1934], 326), Hall expected to endure a “storm of antagonism” (325).
Radclyffe Hall, Author of The Well of Loneliness, in 1928. Hall’s classic 1928 work is regarded as the first English novel to focus on female homosexuality without disdain, irony, satire, salaciousness, or evasion. It drew the ire of conservatives, who targeted it for legal trials and censorship.

Hall’s choice of the term sexual invert speaks to the medico-historical terminology of the period and to Hall’s own sexological interests and identifications (although the novel is not a fictionalized autobiography). Well-read in British and German sexology, Hall supported the World League for Sexual Reform and hoped her novel, informed by lived experience, would extend sexological knowledge to the general public. Hall secured an endorsement by the British sexologist Havelock Ellis (1859–1939), which prefaced the first edition. The narrative mimics the case studies in Ellis’s Sexual Inversion (1897), directly cites the German sexologists Richard von Krafft-Ebing (1840–1902; author of Psychopathia sexualis [1886]) and Karl Heinrich Ulrichs (1825–1895), and draws on Edward Carpenter’s (1844–1929) championing of the “intermediate sex.” As an identity category, sexual inversion linked same-sex desire with cross-gender (or transgender) identification: congenital female inverted were considered “inverted” in both their sexual object choice (desiring women) and their gender identity (masculine identification). Hall selectively adapted sexology and even elements of psychoanalysis to present inversion as a benign natural variation rather than a sin, vice, crime, or pathological degeneration. While the novel includes a variety of sexual and genderqueer characters who do not conform to the invert medical model, the protagonist’s overdetermined combination of homosexual orientation and masculine identification has precipitated ongoing debates over how to assess the novel’s sexual and gender positions and politics.

Written in a sentimental realist style, The Well of Loneliness follows the development of Stephen Gordon, who is assigned female at birth but morphologically and psychologically presents as masculine, and exclusively desires women. An upper-class aristocrat devoted to her pastoral family estate, Stephen embodies idealized British masculinity: wealthy, educated, refined, Christian, skilled in fencing and riding, conservative in values, chivalric, patriotic, and self-sacrificing. Endorsing the norms of British citizenship to legitimize Stephen as a noble protagonist, the novel also enlists a range of international references—including racial, national, colonial, and religious stereotypes—to stage both Stephen’s sexual/gender difference and her essential Britishness. Thoroughly conventional in all but her sexuality and gender, Stephen is a reluctant and tragic misfit.

Stephen’s childhood and youth include her strained relationship with her mother; her identification with her father, whose hidden sexological knowledge bolsters his acceptance of her difference; her first crush, on a housemaid; a friendship with a Canadian that derails when he confesses his love; a loyal bluestocking governess; the sudden death of Stephen’s father; betrayal by a married bisexual American actress; Stephen’s discovery of her invert identity in her dead father’s sexology books; and her exile from home. Stephen then achieves literary success in London; moves to Paris and joins an international expatriate community of artistic but socially maligned inverts; and serves in the Great War (World War I) as an ambulance driver, where she meets Mary, her central love interest. Unable to provide Mary the protection and social respect afforded heterosexual married couples, Stephen sacrifices Mary, driving her into the arms of her Canadian friend. The novel ends with Stephen, bereft and brokenhearted, as an invert martyr begging God for “the right to our existence!”

Initial Reception and Trial

Hall had trouble finding a publisher, but early reviewers were unfazed by its content. Indeed, they praised the novel’s courageous subject matter, while criticizing its artistic weaknesses. Within weeks of publication, however, the novel was the target of an inflammatory article by James Douglas, editor of the Sunday Express (London), who had likewise attacked the work of D. H. Lawrence and James Joyce as obscene. In response, Hall’s publisher, Jonathan Cape, consulted the Home Secretary, who recommended withdrawing the novel. Cape then printed the novel in Paris and imported it to England until it was confiscated and charged under the 1857 Obscene Publications Act and the accompanying 1868 Hicklin rule. As this obscenity legislation disregarded literary merit or intended readership, all expert witnesses for the defense were dismissed by the magistrate. Although the novel contains no graphic or salacious prose, it was banned for its positive portrayal of sexual and gender variants and its appeals for their social acceptance. Indeed, the magistrate judged that the novel’s literary qualities and admirable, long-suffering protagonist made it more attractive, and thus more “poisonous,” to young readers. The novel was also tried for obscenity in the United States in 1929 at the prompting of the New York Society for the Suppression of Vice. The defense, led by Morris Ernst (who later successfully defended Joyce’s novel Ulysses), lost the initial trial but won on appeal.

The Well of Loneliness trials galvanized modern censorship debates, raising questions about the legitimacy of the Home Office to regulate literature, the appropriateness of Victorian obscenity laws in modern times, the censoring of sexological knowledge, and the right of popular journalism to influence legal and artistic standards. Prominent writers on both sides of the Atlantic defended the novel’s right to publication but tended to avoid defending homosexuality or the novel’s literary qualities. Widely publicized by its legal scandals, The Well became a best seller in the United States and a popular import to England by travelers to Paris. Hall claimed she received 10,000 fan letters. Never out of print, it was finally published legally in England in 1949.

Hall actively promoted The Well’s translation, and by her death in 1943 it had been translated into fourteen languages, with more to follow in the latter twentieth century. In some countries it encountered censure or suppression, but it also was defended and promoted. For example, references to inversion were excised in its 1933 Polish translation, but it was enthusiastically prefaced and publicly championed by an outspoken feminist journalist, Irena Krzywicka (Pająk 2017). While Western literatures from Germany, France, and Italy had their own lesbian literary histories prior to and contemporary with Hall’s novel, The Well maintains an iconic status within and beyond English-speaking countries, as evidenced by its use as a subcultural lesbian code in magazine personal ads by Czechoslovakian women during the communist era (Sokolová 2014).

Ongoing Reception, Influence, and Criticism

Considering that female homosexuality, unlike male homosexuality, has rarely been criminalized or subject to legal scandal, the trials of The Well constitute exceptional, widely reported legal events that focused popular attention on the question of female same-sex desire and crossgender practices. Because the novel’s ban discouraged other English writers from directly and sympathetically addressing similar content, it remained one of the only available novels on the subject in the era prior to the Stonewall riots in New York City in 1969, which is often regarded as the beginning of the gay rights movement. The novel and its trials have been credited with a range of cultural impacts: popularizing the figure of the masculine lesbian; rendering stylish women’s masculine fashion a lesbian signifier; shifting Victorian notions of socially accepted romantic female friendship toward lesbian suspicion; generating greater social and medical interest in female homosexuality; and advancing the transnational spread of sexological knowledge.
The Well is a common touchstone in twentieth-century accounts of lesbian and queer coming-out. Both postwar working-class butches and early transsexuals seeking gender reassignment identified with Stephen, whose relationship with Mary is also a model for midcentury butch/femme dynamics (see Nestle 1992b; Califia 1997). In the post-Stonewall lesbian feminist era of the 1970s and 1980s, the novel came under attack for Stephen’s masculine, patriarchal, and normative identifications. By the 1990s queer studies revived critical interest in the novel, reading it intersectionally within discursive histories of sexuality, while trans and other gender-sensitive readings variously defined Stephen as transsexual or transgender; invoked Stephen as a figure of female masculinity, butchness, or masculine femininity; and analyzed the secondary characters in relation to femme lesbianism.

An iconic text in Anglophone queer literature, The Well also influenced global readers, as evidenced by a Holocaust survivor’s claim that its 1933 Polish translation inspired her survival in a concentration camp: “I wanted to live long enough to kiss a woman” (quoted in Nestle 1992a, 4). In terms of transnational sexual discourses, whether a non-Anglo country has a well-established lesbian literary history, its own locally distinct and historically embedded discourses of female same-sex sexuality, or a limited and emergent literature of lesbian/queer self-representation, The Well of Loneliness and the Western sexological model it popularized are often invoked in literary and cultural comparisons. More research remains to be done on the novel’s global impact, but The Well of Loneliness stands as the most influential twentieth-century lesbian novel in English.

SEE ALSO Scandals in Europe

BIBLIOGRAPHY

The works of the nineteenth-century Irish author Oscar Wilde (1854–1900) were first introduced into China in the first decade of the twentieth century. In 1909 Lu Xun and his brother Zuoren Zhou translated Wilde's works and selected them for their co-edited Yuwai xiaoshuoji (1909; Collection of foreign fiction). From 1915 to 1923, almost every year, important periodicals and literary magazines such as Xin qingnian (Youth magazine), Minguo ribao (Republican daily), and Xiaoshuo yuebao (Fiction monthly) translated and published different works (mostly plays) by Wilde. Among them, Dafu Yu's introduction to The Picture of Dorian Gray (1890) was published in the 1922 inaugural edition of Chuangzao jikan (Creation quarterly). In the same year, Wilde's prose poetry, essays, and treatises on literature “were splashed across all manner of newspapers and magazines” (Yue 2016, 145–146). At the end of 1922, Shangwu Yinshuguan (The Commercial Press) published a collection of his essays under the title Yuzhong ji (Diary in the prison), including The Ballad of Reading Gaol (1898) and De Profundis (1905). In 1924 Shen Hong adapted Wilde’s play titled Lady Windermere’s Fan (1893), which garnered rave reviews after it was performed under the title Shao nainai de shanzi (The young lady's fan). The period from 1919 to 1923 was the peak in the wave of Wilde-mania. Almost all of Wilde’s major works were repeatedly translated. His four comedies and his play Salome (1893), his fairy tales, The Picture of Dorian Gray, De Profundis, and The Ballad of Reading Gaol, along with his essays and prose poems, sparked intense interest among intellectuals both in Wilde himself and in the aestheticist and decadent movements in vogue in Europe at the end of the nineteenth century.

It should be noted that, unlike in the West, the study of comparative literature in China did not originate in academic institutions; instead, it was closely related to political and social reform movements and was an integral part of those activities, as Zhouhan Yang (1990) has argued. Therefore, Wilde’s influence in China has never been simply literary or aesthetic. Instead, it has been entangled with China’s modernization. As noted by Daiyun Yue, the birth of Chinese comparative literature is inseparable from the desire to revive the nation and to renew and develop its literature: “It started with the introduction of foreign literature, and strove for a rediscovery of the Self in the light of foreign literature, seeking a new path for development,” which was the main agenda of the era’s cultural movements (2016, 4).

Wilde-Mania and the Decadent Dandies of Shanghai (1909–1949)

Chinese intellectuals of the early twentieth century were eager to get rid of entrenched Confucian conventions, and they identified their own revolutionary desires with Wilde’s Bohemian contempt for bourgeois virtues in Victorian Britain. Wilde’s influence was mostly felt in Shanghai, because of its geopolitical situation as a metropolitan treaty port, and was limited to the intelligentsia and the upper class. He was most popular among intellectuals who had studied in top universities overseas. Xunmei Shao (1906–1968), for instance, a Cambridge University alumnus, was the most glamorous literary dandy in Shanghai’s polite society. Born into an upper-class family, Shao was a handsome, fashionable young man and a true connoisseur of art, according to accounts from his contemporaries collected by Leo Ou-fan Lee (1999). Shao—along with Zhimo Xu, Dafu Yu, Han Tian (the first translator of Wilde’s Salome into Chinese), Lingfeng Ye, and other nonleftist members of the Chuangzao She (1921–1929; Creation Society)—was a vocal advocate of aestheticism in China. However, his foppish lifestyle and liberal attitude toward sex attracted heavy criticism from the League of Left-Wing Writers and from revolutionaries, such as Lu Xun (Lee 1999).

Another dandy who enraged Lu Xun was the bold Lingfeng Ye (c. 1905–1975). Although not as handsome and rich as his friend Shao, Ye was an aspiring trendsetter, painter, collector, decadent writer, and sexologist. After he fell in love with Wilde’s Salome, Ye actively promoted and imitated its illustrator, Aubrey Beardsley (1872–1898), earning himself the sobriquet of “China’s Beardsley” (Lee 1999). While the social ethos of the time was to rebel against tradition, Ye pushed the boundary further with his daring attempt to write a homoerotic love story, Jindi (1931; Forbidden zone). The male protagonist, who is evidently modeled on Wilde’s character Dorian Gray, is an incredibly beautiful college boy who starts to lose interest in women while he develops a strong passion for literature and is attracted to a like-minded male friend. This ambitious work was left unfinished, however, and ends just at the point at which the male friend bashfully praises the hero’s effeminate and beautiful looks. The reason for this sudden end to the narrative has remained a mystery; some scholars have conjectured that Ye lacked the fictional technique to proceed, but Lee (1999) suggests the reason for the work’s failure may have more to do with Ye’s “cultural memory” of the androgynous hero from classical Chinese literature—namely, Jia Baoyu from Honglou meng (1791; Dream of the red chamber). The Baoyu character bequeathed the aesthetic ideal of a Chinese dandy in the image of a young, handsome, and extremely sensitive “pale-faced” scholar (baimian shusheng) who is “neither defiant of social convention nor debauched in pursuit of wanton depravity” (Lee 1999, 261).

Therefore, the Chinese dandy is ultimately very different from Dorian Gray in terms of ideology; and Ye thus could not proceed further into the forbidden zone suggested by the story's title. Had Ye finished the work, a more decadent character might have emerged, and the mania for the fin de siècle aestheticist and decadent movements might have had a deeper impact in China's modern literary history.

The mania for Wilde and his aestheticist and decadent ideas continued into the late 1940s. Xiaoyi Zhou's 2000 account of Wilde's reception clearly documents that by the end of the 1940s there had been at least seven translators of Wilde's fairy tales, seven translations of Salome, seven of Lady Windermere's Fan, four of An Ideal Husband (1895), and two of The Picture of Dorian Gray, as well as translations of A Woman of No Importance (1893), De Profundis, The Importance of Being Earnest (1895), and The Ballad of Reading Gaol. This proliferation of translations clearly demonstrates Wilde's popularity in China.

A Period of Censorship (1949–1970s)

China witnessed two spikes in the translation of Wilde's plays: between the 1910s and the 1940s and from the 1980s to the twenty-first century. However, Wilde's works disappeared from the public eye in the period between 1949 and 1966 and maintained a marginal position until the late 1970s, which reflects a changing national consciousness.

With the establishment of the Communist regime in 1949, China's literary and educational spheres came under the purview of the League of Left-Wing Writers. The league basically adopted the ideological position of Soviet Marxism, which consistently denounced artistic decadence as corrupt and unhealthy—as anathema to socialist realism (Lee 1999). What Wilde represented was in conflict with the communists' social ethos. Additionally, while Wilde's conceited personality was deemed courageous and revolutionary in the pre-1949 period, in the Communist period, his flamboyant personality and his extravagant taste for luxurious commodities were disdained as features of capitalism.

Finally, Wilde's “unusual” sexual orientation was deemed as the “deadly sin” of capitalism, which was believed to be subtly played out in his works. Communist scholars considered his “unusual” relationship with “Bosie”/Lord Alfred Douglas (Wilde's lover) even more distasteful than his conceited personality. The government closely kept his relationship with Douglas a secret from the public for a long time through censorship. To English-speaking Chinese scholars, Wilde's sexual orientation was understood as a taboo subject, especially during the Cultural Revolution (1966–1976). It was not until the end of the twentieth century that his history with Douglas was finally disclosed to the Chinese public through a bibliography written by Wilde's friend Frank Harris, translated by Cai Xinle and Zhang Ning, and published in 1996 by Henan Renmin Press. To guide the Communists away from the “leprous sin of the capitalism” (homosexuality), scholars of the Cultural Revolution managed to demonize Wilde. His image in the eyes of the Chinese Communist scholars consequently became synonymous with the bad influence from the West. His name was essentially deleted from the collective memory of almost three generations of the Chinese people, with only his collection of stories for children, The Happy Prince, and Other Tales (1888), as an exception. Remarkably, high school textbooks in both English and Chinese during this period featured the Chinese version of "The Happy Prince" story.

The Revival Period (1980s Onward)

A backlash against the political censorship of literature and art in the 1980s followed the silencing of Wilde's voice. With Deng Xiaoping’s economic reform plan (1976), China expanded its contact with the outside world. Literature and other cultural trends were imported. Large groups of Chinese youths lined up to buy literary works, films, and other cultural products from all around the world, and especially from the West. These young adults became the earliest version of Chinese hipsters and were dubbed wenyi qingnian ("literary and artistic youth" or "cultured youth") by the general public of that period. Scholars gradually brought Wilde's works back into the public eye. Wilde's works became popular again, leading to the revival of the academic study of Wilde in the 1980s and 1990s. Jie Zeng, for instance, from Southwest Minzu University, was the first to call for scholars to study Wilde from an unbiased perspective (Zeng 1988). The most important Wildean scholar of that time, Xiaoyi Zhou, based at Peking University, contributed valuable criticism, such as the influential essay "Wilde, Dandies, and the Aesthetic Way of Living" (1994). "The Happy Prince" story was translated again and was dramatized as an audio play produced by the celebrated Shanghai Film Dubbing Studio.

The circulation of Wilde's works surpassed the levels of the 1920s and 1930s. More people from different areas of China became familiar with his works. In the twenty-first century, adaptations of Wilde's work include Liming Zhou's production, Buke erxi (2015; The Importance of Being Earnest), which incorporated China's current popular culture into Wilde's play, linking Wilde to China's “national husband”—the super-rich businessman Sicong Wang—and the extremely popular and notorious queer novelist Jingming Guo, both of whom have contributed to Chinese society's commodity fetishism. Zhou, the play's director and producer, stressed that China's current social milieu allowed the general public to truly understand Wilde's works because the rise of an affluent middle class and the awakening of a consumer culture were beginning to resemble the Victorian society of the nineteenth century (Southern Weekly 2015).

Indeed, in the second decade of the twenty-first century, interest in Wilde began to extend beyond literature. Affluent middle-class Chinese, with a desire to exhibit their economic and cultural capital, began to adopt Wilde as a guide to a glamorous and refined Western lifestyle. Among all the Western writers known in China, Wilde is viewed as the one who most perfectly combines inner talent and outer beauty. Unsurprisingly, Wilde the writer has become Wilde the fashion guide to a dandyish lifestyle, much desired among young affluent Chinese.
Oscar Wilde in Advertisements Targeting the Chinese Market

Oscar Wilde's status as an icon of physical beauty can readily be seen in the number of advertisements for beauty products targeted at young mainland Chinese consumers that feature his image. For example, the website Red Scarf, the most popular British lifestyle website in Mandarin Chinese, included a few images of Wilde in an advertisement for hydrating masks in 2014. Interestingly, this ad had been specifically modified for the Chinese market from the original ad targeting the UK market, with Wilde replacing an image of a young lady with East Asian physical features peeling off the beauty mask. Red Scarf's subscribers are mostly Chinese bobos (short for bourgeois bohemians) born in the 1990s. The marketing company had clearly understood Wilde's popularity among them. While the female model in the original ad represents conventional advertising strategy—appealing to consumers' narcissistic (mis)identification with a same-gender model—the original ad limited its target group to women only. In the Chinese ad, however, Wilde is able to attract not just heterosexual women, but also metrosexual and homosexual men. (Metrosexual is a term for heterosexual male urbanites who are meticulous about their appearance and are devoted to fashion, although bisexual and homosexual men can also be included in this category.) Wilde's image, given his association with a queer identity, speaks to a wider range of customers with different gender identities. Wilde’s own sexual orientation and his aestheticized body blur the gender boundary of the ad, opening up the otherwise tightly policed barrier of gender separation in the cosmetic industry. His aestheticized body is a manifestation of a more tolerant and inclusive commercial environment.

Deeply influenced by the Japanese fujoshi culture (a term for the young female fans of yaoi, a genre of malemale romance narratives) that has entered China in the form of animation and manga, bobos born in the 1990s are not only tolerant of but also zealous in welcoming gender and sexual diversity. Although this group represents only a fraction of the Chinese population, it is a major component of this ad’s target group, for the fujoshi phenomenon in China is largely class based. Fujoshi fandom requires participants to be active in commercial events such as cosplay (a contraction of the words costume and play, a performance art in which participants called cosplayers wear costumes and fashion accessories to represent a specific character from a work of fiction or film franchise), comic cons, and trade shows, where attendees can collect exclusive action figures. All the costumes, bric-a-brac, and books are expensive and available only in specialized stores in big cities; hence, only those from urban bourgeois families are likely to be able to afford such a frivolous hobby. Within the same social class, Chinese students who subscribe to Red Scarf overlap with the fujoshi group. Moreover, even with those who do not self-label as active fujoshis, Red Scarf’s subscribers are more or less influenced by a fujoshi youth culture that is omnipresent in Chinese social media. The original British version of the ad does not target queer consumers, and neither does the Chinese version, at least not per se. Yet the inclusion and appropriation of Wilde’s aestheticized body have enabled more possibilities for the representation of this marginalized group in mass media. To those who know Wilde’s queer identity, this ad can be read as a welcoming gesture to LGBT individuals. Whether intended or not, the ad exploits Wilde’s position as a gay martyr. Based on this, the tragic aura of a fallen hero amplifies the beauty of Wilde’s image in the ad. Therefore, while Wilde’s flamboyant aesthetic costume hooks viewers’ attention, the immaterial charisma of this tragic talent immediately enhances the attractiveness of the beauty product itself. To potential customers, the beauty masks are no longer just masks boasting a hydrating function, like those of other brands. Instead, this brand of beauty mask takes on the allure of the star-crossed romance between an artistic talent and the beautiful young aristocrat Lord Alfred Douglas. This feature is more attractive than the pragmatic hydrating function to LGBT individuals and the bobos’ romantic souls.

Similarly, a French perfume house named Jardins d’Écrivains has manufactured a perfume named after Wilde. This perfume was also introduced in China on a website dedicated to perfume appreciation. The writer of the perfume advertisement, Hao’er Zhang, retold the story of Wilde’s tragic life trajectory. The Chinese version is gripping in its emphasis on the carnation at the heart of the scent. As stated on the perfume’s official website, this eau de parfum’s olfactory pyramid is as follows: “top notes are bergamot and grape; middle notes are fig, carnation, and tea; base notes are oakmoss and vetiver.” The selection of ingredients wonderfully captures Wilde’s signature. The tropical fruits in the top notes represent Wilde’s fascination with the Hellenistic culture in his early style. The inclusion of carnation in the middle note is an obvious reference to the mysterious green carnation, a famous symbol for homosexual affiliation in nineteenth-century England popularized by Wilde (Stetz 2000). However, this reference to green carnations has not been established among Chinese customers. Hence, to make this perfume more appealing, the Chinese ad emotionally introduces the meaning of the flower, asserting that this carnation note added a strong sense of rebellion and also hints of homosexuality. The green carnation is the totem of a bohemian lifestyle in Robert Smythe Hichens’s infamous 1894 eponymous novel (The Green Carnation) based on Wilde’s life, which encourages defiance and contempt for bourgeois conventions.

Yet Wildean dandies and Wilde himself would not give up the glistening commodities and artifacts that encapsulate a glamorous lifestyle. This is particularly evident in the eleventh chapter of Wilde’s novel The Picture of Dorian Gray. This amalgamation of spiritual pursuit and material enjoyment comfortably, if not perfectly, matches the lifestyle standards that current Chinese bobos enjoy and aspire to. The Chinese ad interprets the green carnation as an uncompromising gesture that homosexuals hold against the heteronormative establishment, as well as art connoisseurs against philistine social confines. Wilde in the perfume ad becomes a heroic figure, conferring charisma on the product in question. The company sells its product by using Wilde’s identity as a gay martyr and his courageous gesture of living life “against the grain.”

The key point of a perfume ad is what the smell represents. Therefore, those sections of Chinese society who want to express their nonconformist attitude and their sympathy with Wilde may be tempted to buy this perfume. Thus, it has a symbolic value in terms of self-representation. This perfume’s original French ad is simply the perfume bottle pictured with a Greek goddess, lending it a classical but unimaginative feeling. Yet, in the Chinese version, Wilde’s photograph is again adopted to speak for the product. Wilde’s buttonhole flower has been digitally changed to the color green to symbolize the green carnation. Clearly, the color green creates a link with the green liquid in the perfume bottle. The intermediary object—Wilde’s buttonhole flower—in representing an intransigent attitude toward social norms, becomes attached to the perfume. Judith Williamson (1978) insightfully decodes ads, emphasizing that something represents a value, and its interchangeability with other things gives them “value” too, which is currency in advertisements. Because of this currency, Wilde’s immaterial charisma is securely attached to the otherwise meaningless bottle of perfume. When customers purchase the perfume, they purchase, in essence, a piece of Wilde’s identity.

Wilde’s charisma, perceived as that of a persecuted gay writer, becomes a surprisingly attractive selling point. His gay identity appeals to the LGBT community and to those who have a rebellious nature and wish to manifest their contempt for social conventions. It also appeals to those who feel compassion for the unfortunate genius. The tragic figure molded both by the public’s imagination and the advertising industry’s rhetoric is exploited to sell both the beauty masks and the perfume.

Wilde as Hero to China's LGBTQ Community

LGBTQ+ groups in China consider Wilde a hero. On the website Fridae: Chuanlian Yazhou Tongzhi (Fridae: Connecting Asian queers), a 2007 article titled “O, Wangerde!” (Oh Wilde!) emotionally narrates the author Wenfeng Ouyang’s admiration for Wilde’s courage to fight for the “love that dare not speak its name” in his trial for “gross indecency” a century ago. Ouyang, who is queer himself, commented as follows: “But now I don’t fear anymore because I know that I’m not alone. I know Oscar, a great man, made the same choice. He is with me, and I know if little boys or girls somewhere in the world after reading my article will stop fearing their identities, I can stop crying but smile and have a sweet dream.” Many different websites and social media platforms in China, such as the WeChat public platform Beijing Gay Center, the avant-garde website VICE China, and the Mtime film rating website, have published homages to Wilde by queer authors, who consider him a spiritual guide. Apart from the inspiration that Wilde’s martyrdom provides to the Chinese LGBTQ+ community, Wilde’s identity as a literary master also attracts cultured youth who adore his witty words and sensual descriptions. On the aforementioned websites, for instance, all the articles praised Wilde’s language genius and paradoxical philosophy.
SEE ALSO Aestheticism and Decadence, Nineteenth-Century; Boys Love (Yaoi) Manga; Wilde Trials, International Significance of

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Beijing Tongzhi Zhongxin [Beijing Gay Center]. “Dushe, wozhifu fuguo Wangerde” [Impressed by Wilde’s sharp tongue]. WeChat. 30 November 2016. https://freewechat.com/a/MjM5Nzg0OTQ3Mw==/2650486449/1

Zeng, Jie. "Jianlun Wangerde de Daolin Gelei de Huaxiang." [Discussion of Wilde’s The
In spring 1895 the Irish-born wit and playwright Oscar Wilde (1854–1900), then at the peak of his fame, underwent a pair of criminal trials for homosexuality. The trials helped set negative public images of gay men and thereby heightened their social ostracism and legal repression.

Background

In February 1895 Wilde received a card at his club in London from the Marquess of Queensberry, sent “to Oscar Wilde, posing as a somdomite [sic].” The card marked the climax of a campaign of harassment by Queensberry, who was disturbed by Wilde’s long-standing and relatively public love affair with his son Lord Alfred Douglas. Enraged by the card and egged on by Douglas, Wilde sued Queensberry for libel.

The Queensberry libel trial opened on 3 April 1895. The defense introduced evidence that led Wilde to abandon the case and resulted in his arrest shortly thereafter on charges of “gross indecency” (easier to prove than sodomy). The prosecution brought in two young men, who testified that they had had sex with Wilde for money and presents. Edward Clarke, Wilde’s counsel, introduced doubt as to the men’s reliability and moral character; one was revealed as a blackmailer, another a perjurer. When asked on the stand about a line in a poem by Douglas, “the love that dare not speak its name,” Wilde responded with an eloquent defense of platonic (and intergenerational) same-sex love. In the end, the jury was unable to agree on a verdict. Wilde was brought to trial a second time on 22 May. This time, he was convicted, and on 25 May 1895 he was sentenced to two years at hard labor. Wilde’s reputation was destroyed and his health shattered by his imprisonment. After his release in 1897, he moved to France, where he died three years later.

The case attracted widespread coverage both in Great Britain and beyond. In one sense, it was not homosexuality as such for which Wilde was judged, but his ideas and personality. As a leading figure of the Aesthetic movement, Wilde had proclaimed that art and artists could not be judged by common moral standards: he dressed eccentrically and acted in a theatrical manner, while his writings boldly satirized social hypocrisy and sexual double standards. Furthermore, Wilde was an Irishman from a prominent Nationalist family. Nonetheless, his sexuality was central to the hostility he inspired, as his homosexual practices were the visible sign and proof of his “decadence” and of the threat he posed to the social order. As in the case of Sir Roger Casement a generation later, British critics used Wilde to associate (Irish) political dissidence with sexual deviance.

European Coverage and Reaction

Public attitudes toward Wilde were both reflected and fueled by the daily accounts of the trials that filled the British press. Although a few papers, such as the Manchester Guardian, merely printed short descriptions of events on its back pages, the London Times daily printed lengthy front-page descriptions of the testimony. Meanwhile, other, more “popular” newspapers devoted extensive reportorial and editorial coverage to the affair and maintained a steady stream of invective against Wilde. Following his conviction, the Westminster Gazette, praising the verdict, claimed, “It will undoubtedly do much good, not only in punishing actual criminals and putting the fear of the law into others, but in checking unwelcome tendencies in art and literature” (quoted in Gay 1986, 203). The St. James Gazette went even further. Calling Wilde a “perverted criminal” and the sentence “heavy but well-deserved,” it decried the overuse of tolerance and claimed that intolerance was the only thing that could save society. “The painful and scandalous exposure of these weeks may do something to bring back a dash of wholesome bigotry into our art, our literature, our society, our view of things in general” (quoted in Gay 1986, 204). The Wilde case reinforced existing social taboos against homosexuality and placed gay men in danger of blackmail and prosecution. In E. M. Forster’s 1913–1914 novel Maurice (unpublishable when written because of its homosexual theme), a gay man describes himself as “an unspeakable of the Oscar Wilde sort” (Forster 1981, 159).

The Wilde trials attracted coverage across Europe. Dutch and German newspapers discussed the Wilde affair at length. Social Democratic theorist Eduard Bernstein, living in exile in London, wrote articles in Neue Zeit defending Wilde and denouncing laws against homosexuality (Bernstein 1977). German sexologist and militant Magnus Hirschfeld, who decried Wilde’s conviction as a case of judicial injustice, was directly inspired by it to help found the Wissenschaftlich-humanitäres Komitee (Scientific-Humanitarian Committee), a gay rights organization, two years later. Interest was especially high in France, where Wilde was well known, and public opinion was likely influenced by his Francophile reputation. Paris newspapers mixed condemnation of Wilde’s sexual crimes with sympathy for Wilde as a victim of the hypocrisy of British society. Le Radical proclaimed:

The outrageous trial of the symbolist poet Oscar Wilde has raised an obvious indignation in England. The virtuous Albion, very indulgent toward this kind of debauchery which she routinely practices, is only sorry when her mask of false modesty and Protestant hypocrisy is snatched from her.... Oscar Wilde is not a monstrous, abnormal Englishman, unrivaled in the British Isles; he is simply an awkward Englishman, who has let himself be caught.

(MONTMARTRE 1895; TRANSLATIONS HERE AND BELOW BY GREG ROBINSON)
British Press Coverage of the Oscar Wilde Trial. The front page of the Police News from 4 May 1895 illustrates scenes from Wilde's first trial. Accounts of the trials filled the British and international press, the coverage of which slanted heavily against Wilde.

Furthermore, the harshness of Wilde's prison sentence provoked a storm of French condemnation. In March 1896 the Mercure de France reported that Wilde’s French-language play Salome had been performed in Paris and that “the name of Oscar Wilde was acclaimed with all the admiring enthusiasm multiplied by indignation” (Mercure March 1896). The Mercure de France subsequently reported, “All free spirits are agreed in denouncing the English justice system in the condemnation of the unfortunate Wilde” (Mercure July 1896). On 4 June 1895 the conservative journal XIXe siècle stated, “Oscar Wilde, English writer who was sentenced to two years of ‘hard labour’ for having dreamed of ancient loves,” was “deranged in his senses and his brains, [and] was worthy of confinement in Charenton [a French mental hospital]…. He deserved two years in a cell making shoes or lampshades.” Yet its editors insisted that the British government, by its excessive sentence, had awakened universal sympathy for Wilde.

The first extended study of Wilde's trials was a chapter in a French book, Marc-André Raffalovich’s Uranisme et uniséKualité (1896; Uranism and unisexuality). Curiously, Raffalovich (lover of Wilde's friend John Gray) defended homosexuality (“unisexuality”) but stridently denounced Wilde as a criminal and public danger: “I do not mean [for] the sexual acts for which he was reproached, but the role he played” (224). Wilde, he pronounced, had been so flattered in his vanity by his popularity in English society that he thought he could act with impunity and not disturb social relations.

Reporting from North America and Elsewhere

The Wilde case also attracted particular attention in the United States, where Wilde was a well-known personality as a result of a successful lecture tour in 1882, and where his writings were popular. To be sure, the news did not reach all sectors of the American public. Mass-market weeklies such as the Nation, Harper’s, and Puck ignored the Wilde trials in their pages. The British scholar Bertrand Russell later noted that when he visited the United States in 1896, nobody he spoke to seemed to know anything of the Wilde affair (Katz 1976).

Still, many US newspapers reported on the trials, especially New York City papers. Apart from the sensational weekly National Police Gazette, which published its own correspondent’s reports, all the journals made use of United Press dispatches from England. The coverage of the trials was almost universally hostile toward Wilde. (The anarchist militants Emma Goldman and “Lucifer” [Moses Harman] were among the few to defend Wilde publicly.) That said, there were variations in newspaper coverage that reflected cleavages in public attitudes across class and ethnic lines in regard to the “unspeakable” subject of homosexuality. A striking feature of the lengthy New York Times coverage of the Wilde trials is its failure to state clearly the charges against him or the nature of the illegal conduct at issue. Jonathan Ned Katz later argued that such delicacy “either left readers quite in the dark about Wilde’s transgression, or forced them to use their imaginations to make sense of the reports” (1976, 258). For example, on 6 April 1895 the Times described the young men who testified for the prosecution. “The ages of these men varied from eighteen to twenty-three years. They were of the class of servants and valets, not of Mr. Wilde’s station in life, not interested in literature or art, yet they addressed this distinguished dramatist by his first name.” Although the Times did not describe Wilde’s precise offense, readers could be trusted to grasp the connection between intimate cross-class relations and immorality.

Reports in popular newspapers such as the New York Sun contained rather more free discussions of the more delicate (or lurid) portions of the trial testimony. These articles were also sharply moralistic in tone, mixed with a fair amount of calculated sensationalism. Because of Wilde’s Irish origins and renown as a social critic and socialist, the popular press was more balanced in its assessment of his life and achievements. Yet, one journalist admitted that he attacked Wilde even more harshly because his crimes discredited by association the social reforms he espoused.

Wilde’s trials were also reported in Canada (which had its own highly publicized “Oscar Wilde” case that same year, when three men in Regina, Saskatchewan, were indicted for “gross indecency”; see Dick 2009). The most diverse coverage was in the cosmopolitan city of Montreal, where comment broke down along linguistic and class lines. The Montreal Daily Star and the Quebec Daily Mercury, which served a largely elite and Anglophile clientele, covered the trials in great detail, relying primarily on dispatches from London. Neither took any editorial position on Wilde. Montreal’s other mainstream English-language daily, the Montreal Gazette, carried only a few brief reports on the Wilde affair. The French-language newspapers, such as La Patrie, La Minerve, and La Presse, reacted more ambiguously to the trials. Like their counterparts in France, French Canadian editors were venomous regarding Wilde’s homosexuality but also expressed sympathy for him as a victim of British hypocrisy over “le vice anglais.” On 20 April 1895 the drama magazine Le Passe Temps included an article by a pseudonymous critic, “Silvio,” who deplored Wilde’s “turpitudes” and lack of manliness:

```
He tried all over to bring about a reform of male dress, in the name of “écectisme.” He only wanted effeminate men. It was long thought that this mania concealed absurdity, before it was realized that it resulted from a shameful passion. As debauched as the residents of ancient Sodom, Oscar Wilde wilted the golden youth of London with whom he had relations.
```

(82–83)

Nine days later, on 29 April 1895, La Patrie commented, “One need not believe that the impure and pagan morals which this quintessential litterateur boasts are very common in England, although they are more common there than in central Europe.”

News of Wilde’s case passed on to other parts of the globe. In particular, British newspapers distributed in India and Africa offered significant coverage of the trials. The Australian daily press offered front-page attention to cabled dispatches from London about Wilde’s trials (even as performances of Wilde’s plays were enthusiastically received). It is unclear how much lasting impact Wilde’s case had in these regions, although it is fairly certain that they did nothing to inspire protest against British colonial antisodomy laws. Outside the British Empire, reactions to Wilde’s trials appear to have been more sporadic.

Wilde’s trials represent a rare moment of international attention to questions of (homo)sexuality. While Wilde’s challenge to established mores in his writings and friendships with young men provoked the most furious denunciations of him, his prosecution led foreign commentators to use Wilde as a stick to beat the British for their hypocritical prudery.
SEE ALSO  Blackmail; Scandals in Europe; Wilde in Sinophone Culture

BIBLIOGRAPHY

La Patrie. “Anglais et Français.” 29 April 1895.

Raffalovich, Marc-André. Uranisme et unisexualité: Étude sur différentes manifestations de Silvio [pseud.]. “La quinzaine.” Le Passe Temps, 20 April 1895.

The practice of demonizing African LGBTQ individuals by associating same-sex practices with witchcraft and the occult.

In many African countries, the moral panic about the supposed proliferation of homosexuality is increasingly translated in a pervasive vocabulary of occultism, malevolence, and devilry (Pierce 2016; Tonda 2016; Geschiere 2017). Indeed, across Africa, alarming rumors and frightening stories, often echoed by local media, now frame gays and lesbians as dangerous sorcerers or witches who reportedly congregate at night to indulge themselves in unnatural sexual practices, including same-sex acts (Izugbara 2011). Popular urban folktales also describe homosexuality as a new form of sexual vampirism permitting some powerful gays and lesbians to rob vulnerable and powerless people of their vital energy in order to reinforce their own power. In addition, homosexual people are said to use their alleged mystical and invisible sexual organs to infect their victims with dangerous diseases or to dispossess them of their good fortune and blessing (Abega 2002; Geschiere 1997; Mather 2005). It is widely believed that careless or unscrupulous people who consent to have sex with these so-called dangerous sexual vampires could experience misfortune in their lives (Abega 2002). Some men have reportedly lost their sexual organs as a result of such intimacy (Mather 2005).

Some ethnographic works on witchcraft in southern and West Africa indicate that many people strongly believe that members of homosexual sects not only mystically undermine their victims’ reproductive potentials and good luck, they also allegedly destroy their own procreative capacities in order to free themselves from the moral obligations to reproduce for the well-being of society (Auslander 1993). A study of Igbo cosmology revealed that these populations from the southeastern region of Nigeria believe that wizards and witches, who are widely believed to have proclivities for homosexual practices, “dance naked at night around big mystical trees or large bonfires deep in the heart of impenetrable forests, while drinking or eating their and others’ semen and wombs respectively, or engaging in sexual orgies among themselves” (Izugbara 2011, 545). That is why in many West African societies where homosexuality is generally associated with barrenness and infertility, middle-class unmarried men and women as well as childless adult persons are often viewed as selfish pédérastes sectaires (sectarian pederasts) and sorcières lesbiennes (lesbian witches).
Although in a number of African countries the political and social rejection of same-sex relations is increasingly backed by both nativist and culturalist ideologies (Ndjio 2012, 2013), one should be cautious about the temptation of exoticizing Africa, and especially of reducing the occultization of same-sex eroticism to a so-called African superstitious and irrational mentality, because both official and popular discourses on the occult sexualities often take up Pentecostal/Charismatic Christian moral concerns with “devilish sexual practices” (Kaoma 2009, 53). For example, in a 2014 article titled “Homosexuality, Politics and Pentecostal Nationalism in Zambia,” Adriaan S. van Klinken argues that the framing of Zambia as a Christian nation (by the former Zambian president Frederick Chiluba) has given rise to what he refers to as “Pentecostal nationalism” in which homosexuality is viewed as a threat to the purity of the nation, and is especially associated with the devil.

Homosexual: The Witch of the Village

The association of homoeroticism with sexual vampirism or evil is not something new in Africa, as contemporary narratives about so-called homosexual witchcraft only update the old nativist discourses that initially associated deviant sexual behavior with devilry (Rachewiltz 1964). Indeed, previous ethnographic accounts of witchcraft beliefs in Africa have pointed out the general tendency in most traditional African societies to interpret sexual inversion in terms of “occult sexuality” (Niehaus 2002). For example, in the traditional Azande society studied by E. E. Evans-Pritchard (1970), lesbians were generally regarded as witches who supposedly gave birth to cats and monstrous creatures. Because of these popular beliefs, homosexual women could be executed, flogged, or expelled from their households and the community at large.

The traditional Beti society from the forest region of Cameroon provides another example. Beti society was marked by deep-seated fear and prejudice concerning homosexual practices, which were generally seen as a kind of witchcraft that not only compromised both masculinity and femininity but also induced infecundity in women and impotency in men. According to the Beti cosmology, homosexual persons were involved in the “sorcery of evu”—that is, a kind of mystical cannibalism or vampirism of other people’s sexual potency and procreative power (Abega 2002; Ombolo 1990). The Beti believed that a homosexual person possessed an “invisible double” whose sex is generally different from that of his or her visible body. For example, female homosexuals allegedly possessed masculine doubles, while male homosexuals were said to have feminine doubles. That is why homosexuality was generally conceived of as the “heterosexuality of doubles” that typically took place in the mystical realm of sorcery (Abega 2002). The Beti also shared the belief that lesbian witches are endowed with an invisible virile and prominent phallus with which they sexually take possession at night of the bodies of their innocent victims while the latter are sleeping (Abega 2002).

This seemingly dystopian account of same-sex relations in precolonial Africa at large should not obscure the fact that not all traditional Bantu societies developed homophobic prejudices and stereotypes about homosexual persons or strongly believed that homosexuality was a dangerous sexual practice. In some cases, these traditional societies proved to be more tolerant of same-sex desires than many contemporary African societies that are marked by sexual intolerance (Epprecht 2014). For example, in his Sexe et société en Afrique noire (1990), which discloses the experience and imagination of sexuality in traditional Beti society, Jean-Pierre Ombolo noted that even though Beti culture tended to discourage same-sex relations, people tended not to ostracize their fellows who displayed homosexual proclivities. The same was true of socially unapproved sexual practices such as masturbation and hermaphroditism, characterized by Ombolo as “sexual perversions,” but tolerated by the local population. In addition, in Beti society, as in many Bantu communities, the social tolerance toward sexual inverts often took a form of strategic silence, feigning unawareness, and duplicitous dissimulation of deviant sexual behavior by their fellow villagers (Ombolo 1990).

Ombolo’s comments echo the observations made by the German ethnographer Günter Tessmann in the early twentieth century about the Bantu-speaking Pahouin from the southern region of Cameroon, northern Gabon, and Equatorial Guinea (Tessmann 1921b [1913]). According to Tessmann, these slash-and-burn farmers were not ashamed of engaging in homosexual acts generally considered either as “a medicine for health” (Tessmann 1921a, 133; translated by Murray and Roscoe 1998) or a funny game for both adults and youth (see also Murray and Roscoe 1998). The same author has noted greater understanding of same-sex relations, notably adolescent males’ reciprocal sodomitical intercourses among the Bafia from the central region of Cameroon (Tessmann 1934).

As in the past, contemporary Cameroonian society is also permeated with popular beliefs in homosexualité occulte (occult homosexuality), although current forms of “sexual occultism” are widely believed to originate from outside the country, notably from French neocolonialism and Western cultural imperialism, unlike the previous forms that were said to breed within Cameroonian society. For example, S. N. Nyeck’s work on the popular imagination of what she refers to as “invisible eroticism” points out the crucial role played by the well-known French colonial administrator and medical doctor Louis-Paul Aujoulat (1910–1973) in the spread of so-called esoteric homosexuality among postcolonial Cameroonian elites (Nyeck 2013, 153; see also Nken 2014). Contemporary nativist discourses on occult sexualities also relate their emergence and expansion in Cameroon to presentday global capitalism (Ayissi 2009; Ndjio 2015).

Homosexuality, Mokoagne Moni, and Sodomite Power

One of the most notable changes in the African imagination of homosexuality is the linking of same-sex sexuality with the sorcery of wealth, and especially what some anthropologists have termed “occult economies” (Comaroff and Comaroff 1999). The popular representation of homosexuality as a mystical sexual practice enabling some people to gain riches and power in society has induced the general perception of homosexuals as rich sorcerers who allegedly accumulate what is commonly known in Cameroon as mokoagne moni—that is, wealth obtained through occult means that often involves engagement in satanic or devilish sexual practices (Ndjio 2008). Across Africa, common beliefs assume that some people are involved in homosexuality in order to get “magic money,” which is reminiscent of the “juju money” known by many Ghanaians (Mather 2005). It is also widely believed that the local big men (members of the political and bureaucratic class who enjoy privileged positions within the society) become rich and powerful not only as a result of their predatory actions with regard to the state’s resources but also because of their connections with the so-called growing homosexual sects (L’Anecdote 2006, 4; translation by Basile Ndjio; see also Nouvelle Afrique 2006). In a number of African countries, there are widespread alarming rumors about prominent state officials and successful businessmen who are said to indulge in homosexual practices for magical ends, most notably, to achieve their political and economic ambitions. In Gabon, some popular homophobic and antigovernmental chants often depict the Gabonese political and bureaucratic elites indulging in pederastic relations with underprivileged young men (Aterianus-Owanga 2012). It is also alleged that to maintain their dominant positions in the society, these big men regularly perpetrate or condone the ritual killings of young girls, whose body parts are used for magical purposes (Tonda 2016).

In Cameroon, where decades of stark economic meltdown and deep social malaise have caused many Cameroonians to dub the authoritarian, corrupt, and clientelist presidentialist regime of Paul Biya (1933–) a pouvoir sorcier (sorcery power) (Ndjio 2015; Toulou 2007), popular rumors now relate members of the politico-bureaucratic elites to what the Cameroonian populist intellectual Charles Ateba Eyene (2012) called loges et sectes magico-anales (lodges and magico-anal sects), which are believed to be on the rise in the country. Growing popular worries about the elites’ perverted sexuality have led over time to the denunciation of their alleged implication in homosexualité occulte, and to speculation about the existence of a nébuleuse sectaire (nebulous world of sects) in which some so-called pédérastes sectaires defile the bodies of innocent and vulnerable youths in degrading homosexual acts (Toulou 2007). That is why the popular literature in Cameroon generally characterizes the current Cameroonian government either as a pouvoir sodomiseur (sodomite power) or an anusocratie (rule of the buttocks). The first expression makes reference to a wicked and villainous power that makes the anus of the weak a place for perverse sexual pleasures. The term anusocratie refers to the promotion of an “anal politics” that sublimates the practice of pederasty and sodomy either as the sanctioned way to achieve upward mobility and social promotion, or as the means to gain access to the state’s resources (Kenmogne 2006).

Since the outburst of the collective homophobic hysteria in early 2006—which had been triggered by an antihomosexual homily given on 25 December 2005 by Victor Tonyé Bakot (1947–), the then archbishop of the Yaoundé metropolitan area—the local press in Cameroon has portrayed some influential members of the bureaucratic and financial elite as the pédés de la république (gays of the republic), who now embody the despised image of devilish homosexuals (L’Anecdote 2006; La Météo 2006). In the twenty-first century, there has been a general tendency among Cameroonians to link these so-called gays of the republic with mystical societies such as the Freemasonry, the Rose Croix, and the Illuminati, members of which are said to occupy high positions within the state apparatuses (Geschiere 2017; Bambou 2006). These esoteric organizations reportedly promote homosexual promiscuity among their members as part of their initiation rites.

Homosexual: A Dangerous Witch Offender

However, it is not only ordinary Africans who view homosexual persons as malevolent witches and wizards. In many African countries, state or government authorities also actively use a rhetoric of devilry and occultism as part of a new political imagination of same-sex relations by the postcolonial African state. Indeed, in their desire to crack down on homosexual persons, some judges have no scruples about incorporating into the procedural artifices subjective and biased notions such as “sexual bewitchment,” “devilish and satanic sex acts,” or “homosexual sorcery” (see Toulou 2007).

A case of three lesbian women from the locality of Ndikinimeki in the central region of Cameroon, who were charged in February 2006 with homosexual offenses and witchcraft-related practices, provides a good illustration of the political invention of “bitch witches” by Cameroonian authorities. Like the forces of law and order that first profiled the accused as sorcières lesbiennes, the prosecution associated the alleged engagement of the three young women in same-sex relations with involvement in witchcraft-related practices, considered by the Cameroonian penal code a criminal offense liable to serious penalties, including five to ten years’ imprisonment or hefty fines. The prosecutor reportedly declared that “only women driven by evil spirits could engage in homosexual relations, whereas there were many virile men in the village, who could satisfy their sexual desires” (La Météo 2006, 5). One can understand why the gendarmes had few scruples about locking up in a cell one of the accused women who was accompanied by her nine-month-old child. In their eyes, the alleged lesbian woman was nothing but a dangerous sorcerer who deserved no compassion (Le Messager 2006).

The official antihomophobic rhetoric is backed by the hate speeches of some religious leaders who often use apocalyptic terms to depict the threat homosexual persons allegedly pose to the whole community. For example, in the homily alluded to earlier, the former archbishop of Yaoundé accused homosexual persons of plotting to “turn Cameroon into a Sodom and Gomorrah.” As he put it:
Without, however, insinuating that we are in the last days, we are nevertheless experiencing these difficult times when men are increasingly fond of dissolute pleasures and of counter-values such as homosexuality. Homosexuality is an infamy and deserves to be condemned. No society is built on homosexuality, but on values of honesty, the sense of duty, the sense of sacrifice, tolerance, and goodness. The pseudo modernity, otherwise called liberalism, must not lead the African to disown himself/herself to infamy. The so-called modernity cannot lead us to give away our values.

(L’EFFORT CAMEROUNAIS 2006, 3–4; TRANSLATION BY BASILE NDJIO)

He concluded his homily by urging “the people of God” to not let themselves be “overwhelmed or invaded by the powers of evil, at the risk of becoming a country or a society without benchmarks,” and by calling on them “to resolutely fight on many fronts for a spiritual and moral rearmament” (L’Effort Camerounais 2006, 3–4; translation by Basile Ndjio).

Overview of the Three Discourses Fueling Homophobia in Africa

Previous Africanist discourses on occult homosexuality could be viewed as part of the collective effort to prevent the expression of certain forms of sexual behavior and practices that transgress local sexual norms or destabilize the sexual order of the traditional African society at large. Contemporary narratives on evil sexuality, meanwhile, express a moral panic triggered by an upsurge in a much more active and publicized form of homosexual identity that is said to exacerbate the crisis of masculinity and femininity, as well as aggravate the “gender trouble.”

It is also important to distinguish elite from popular occultization of homosexuality in contemporary Africa. Although they both endorse moralizing discourses on occult sexualities, the elites and the masses have different views about those profiled as dangerous. For many ordinary Africans, the “gays of the republic” or the “sectarian pederasts” are always the big men, whereas for government officials it is the popular section of society that breeds sexual perversity and malevolence.

Acknowledging that popular nativist discourses on occult sexuality primarily target the big men and that the “invention” of the categories of pédés de la république and sodomiseurs en chef (chief sodomites) is above all the work of ordinary Africans, it is tempting to read these popular narratives as a “weapon of the weak,” and especially as a form of subtle bio-resistance against the alleged state’s institutionalized anusocratie or homocratie. In addition, the official discourses on the devilish homosexuality of the poor might be seen as the expression of a “bio-power,” because such mandarin narratives have been instrumental in the state’s bid to scapegoat homosexual persons for its other manifest failures of governance.

Between these two narratives are the religious discourses of some prominent church leaders that warn the masses against the danger of homosexuality, while formulating a sharp critique about the political instrumentalization of the alleged sexual evil by the ruling classes, as the comments by the archbishop of Yaoundé show. But whatever their nature, all three discourses, which often fuel both political and social homophobia (Currier 2010; Ladô 2011), present serious challenges to those who are engaged in the promotion of human rights or rational arguments for public health in Africa.

SEE ALSO Gangs and Street Kids in Africa; Ubuntu

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Bakot, Victor Tonyé. “Aucune société ne se batit sur l’homosexualité, mais sur des valeurs”
[No society is built on homosexuality, but on values]. L'Effort Camerounais (Douala, Cameroon), 7 January 2006, 3–4.

La Météo (Yaoundé, Cameroon). “Mœurs: Homosexualité au sommet de l’Etat” [Mores:
Homosexuality at the top of the State. 4 January 2006.

Nouvelle Afrique. (Yaoundé, Cameroon). “Voici les pédés de chez nous” [Here are our local faggots]. No. 189 (12 January 2006).

Tessmann, Günter. “Die Homosexualität bei den Negern Kameruns” [Homosexuality among the Negros from Cameroon]. Jahrbuch für sexuelle Zwischenstufen unter besonderer Berücksichtigung der Homosexualität [Yearbook for sexual intermediates with special Tessmann, Günter. Die Pangwe: Völkerkundliche Monographie eines westafrikanischen Negerstammes [The Pangwe: Ethnographic monograph of a West African Negro tribe].

Berlin: E. Wasmuth, 1921b. First published 1913.

Tessmann, Günter. Die Bafia und die Kultur des Mittelkamerun-Bantu [The Bafia and the culture of the Middle Cameroun Bantu]. Stuttgart, Germany: Strecker and Schröder, 1934.

Tonda, Joseph. “Fanon au Gabon: Sexe onirique et afrodystopie” [Fanon in Gabon:

Toulou, Lucien. “Des scènes dignes de Sodome et Gomorrhe?: Occulte, pouvoir et imaginaire du changement politique” [Scenes worthy of Sodom and Gomorrah?: Occult, van Klinken, Adriaan S. “Homosexuality, Politics and Pentecostal Nationalism in Zambia.”

The Wolfenden Report

BRIAN LEWIS
Professor of History
McGill University, Canada

Influential report published in Great Britain in 1957 recommending that homosexual behavior between consenting adults no longer be considered a criminal offense.

On 24 August 1954 the British Conservative government of Winston Churchill (1874–1965), upon the initiative of the home secretary, David Maxwell Fyfe (1900–1967), set up the Departmental Committee on Homosexual Offences and Prostitution. This committee was charged with assessing the state of the law on both of these perceived social evils, recommending changes, and considering appropriate treatment for homosexual offenders. The government was reacting because it thought it had a growing problem of public disorder on its hands. Female prostitution was not illegal, but soliciting was, and prostitutes seemed to be more numerous, visible, and shameless than ever before, especially on London’s streets. Sex between men was illegal in all its guises, in public or in private, and prosecutions for homosexual offenses (buggery, gross indecency, and indecent assault) had increased more than sixfold in England and Wales in the previous quarter-century, from 390 in 1931 to 2,504 by 1955 (Wolfenden Report, appendix I, table II, 131). This surge owed much to more targeted policing, but many preferred instead to blame a collective moral breakdown brought on by the wartime dislocation of family and society.

Some high-profile cases—particularly the trial and conviction in March 1954 of two upper-class landowners, Lord Montagu of Beaulieu and Michael Pitt-Rivers, and a journalist for the Daily Mail (London), Peter Wildeblood—shone a spotlight on the question of homosexuality. But it was not simply legal cases that focused attention. By the 1950s there had been several decades of scientific, medical, and religious discussion about homosexuality, reinforced by an increasing openness in the popular and the serious press. Some of the coverage continued to be hostile, treating sexual minorities as criminal or sick, but other commentary—such as a 1954 report commissioned by the Church of England Moral Welfare Council—called for reform, recognizing that at least some homosexuals were born that way and should not face criminal charges for sex in private with consenting adults. Maxwell Fyfe did not favor a relaxation of the law, but, in pitching to his cabinet colleagues the idea of an official inquiry, he recognized the “considerable body of opinion which regards the existing law as antiquated and out of harmony with modern ideas” (National Archives, CAB 129/66/10, memo by home secretary, 17 February 1954). This, in effect, left it up to the Departmental Committee on Homosexual Offences and Prostitution to recommend either a punitive or a reformist solution to the threat posed to public morals and family values by the marginal sexual figures of the prostitute and the homosexual.

The Committee

John “Jack” Wolfenden (1906–1985) chaired and gave his name to the departmental committee. He was a philosopher and educator and, starting in 1950, vice-chancellor of the University of Reading. He was joined by eleven male and three female committee members, all high-profile representatives of the law, medicine, religion, education, and government, with the women focusing in particular on the prostitution side of the mandate. The committee met periodically over the next three years in two locations: the Home Office in Whitehall, London, and the Scottish Home Department at Saint Andrew’s House, Edinburgh. More than 200 individuals and organizations presented written evidence to and/or appeared before the committee, and a principal part of the committee’s work involved the “oral examination” of these “witnesses.” The interviews were typed up by a team of stenographers and are now preserved at the National Archives at Kew, London. This material provides by far the most detailed information available on the range of opinions regarding homosexuality in mid-twentieth-century Britain.

Representatives of the armed forces and of the law enforcement community, ranging from the lord chief justice through the director of public prosecutions to ordinary constables on the beat, tended to prefer the status quo. Members of the medical and scientific professions, as well as representatives from the churches, morality councils, and ethical societies, were much more likely to treat homosexuality as a psychomedical problem rather than a legal problem. Certain specialists failed to see it as a problem at all: the biologists in particular, plus those impressed by the findings of the American sexologist Alfred Kinsey (1894–1956; who himself was interviewed by members of the committee), preferred to talk instead of a perfectly normal spectrum of natural variation in human sexuality as in the rest of the animal world. Others, variously drawing on sexologists such as Havelock Ellis (1859–1939) and Sigmund Freud (1856–1939), classified homosexuals into different types produced by a range of etiologies. Some homosexuals, they claimed, were “true inverts” whose homosexuality was innate and fixed; some acquired their homosexuality in early childhood, possibly through seduction; others experienced arrested development along the “normal” psychosexual path toward heterosexuality. The latter two groups might be coaxed back to the “correct” path through environmental changes, the intake of hormones, psychotherapy, or other forms of behavior modification.

In addition to the expert witnesses, three self-identifying homosexual men appeared before the committee: the journalist Peter Wildeblood, shortly after his release from prison; the London ophthalmologist Patrick Trevor-Roper; and Carl Winter, the Australian-born director of the Fitzwilliam Museum at Cambridge. All three were masculine-presenting, well-educated, professional, well-connected, “genuine inverts”—identical to the male members of the committee in all respects except for their sexual orientation. As Winter eloquently pointed out in his memorandum, many homosexual men had reached the highest offices in church and state and received the honors and rewards of a grateful nation, but they could be imprisoned and their reputations and careers ruined if the law discovered that they had departed “from a rule of total chastity that it demands of no other body of citizens.” Let the homosexual “be in every other respect the ablest, most honourable, and trustworthy of human beings, he is to be totally disabled and untrusted in the one single matter which, of all others, is to all of us our most private concern” (Wolfenden Papers, HO 345/8, “Memorandum by Mr. C. W.”).

The Report

The Wolfenden Report, which was published in September 1957, reflected the plea for acceptance of the discreet, respectable homosexual. After filtering all the competing arguments, it concluded that there was no single cause of homosexuality and that homosexuality was not a disease, illness, or pathology—though it did call for more research into the etiology of homosexuality and on the efficacy of different types of treatment. Its principal recommendations were “that homosexual behavior between consenting adults in private should no longer be a criminal offence” (Wolfenden Report, para. 62) and that street prostitution should be more strictly regulated. All but one of the committee members (James Adair, a Scottish lawyer and prosecutor who wrote a minority report) were persuaded by the logic of a strict private/public distinction that would have been familiar to any reader of On Liberty by the Victorian philosopher John Stuart Mill (1806–1873). As the report put it, “Unless a deliberate attempt is to be made by society, acting through the agency of the law, to equate the sphere of crime with that of sin, there must remain a realm of private morality and immorality which is, in brief and crude terms, not the law’s business” (para. 61). It was the law’s job to preserve public order and decency, not to police morals. There was no evidence, so far as the majority report could see, that male homosexual behavior was more damaging to the nation and to the family than adultery, fornication, or lesbian sex, none of which was criminalized; that allowing sex between adult males would encourage pedophilia; or that decriminalization would open the floodgates to unbridled license—so each of the arguments against the suggested reform was dismissed in turn. A majority on the committee preferred to set the age of consent at eighteen (it was sixteen for heterosexual sex), but Wolfenden, from a combination of caution and calculation as to what might be politically acceptable, persuaded them to adopt the age of twenty-one.

The report made quite clear the limits of toleration. It did not intend, in any way, “to condone or encourage private immorality” (para. 61), and there should be no relaxation in the policing of public misconduct, such as homosexual importuning: “It is important that the limited modification of the law which we propose should not be interpreted as an indication that the law can be indifferent to other forms of homosexual behaviour, or as a general licence to adult homosexuals to behave as they please” (para. 124). As one member of the committee, the Marquess of Lothian, later made clear,

I am certain that, without exception, we took the view that homosexual acts are wrong and harmful—some very gravely so—and, therefore, to be deplored.... From this, two things follow: first, that the young and the weak must be protected; and, secondly, that homosexuals must, so far as is practically and medically possible, be assisted towards cure.

(PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES, LORDS, 5TH SER., VOL. 266 [1965], COL. 136)

The message was that a certain type of domesticated homosexuality was tolerable, but public displays—queer sociability in pubs and clubs, flamboyance, male prostitution, and promiscuity—were not.

Impact

The higher-brow national press tended to support the Wolfenden Report’s recommendations on homosexuality, whereas the lower-brow, Scottish, and provincial press did not. The Church of England’s Church Assembly voted narrowly in favor. The Conservative government accepted the proposals on prostitution by implementing the Street Offences Act of 1959, which drove sex workers off the streets through increased fines and imprisonment and into brothels and call-girl agencies. But neither the government nor the Labour Party opposition was prepared to support the suggestions regarding homosexual offenses, fearing a backlash from their supporters. The home secretary R. A. Butler’s stated belief in the House of Commons was that, because so many people regarded homosexuality as “a great social evil,” it would take “education and time” before the report could be implemented (Parliamentary Debates, Commons, 5th ser., vol. 596 [1958], cols. 369–370).

Scholars have understood the Wolfenden Report in contrasting ways. One interpretation sees it as part of a liberal, progressive narrative heralding the more permissive era of the 1960s. However patronizing, condescending, and limited the report might be, it paved the way for the long march to freedom that followed: decriminalization, the gay liberation movement, and the raft of twenty-first-century reforms culminating in gay marriage and legislative equality. Another explication is much more critical. It sees the report as helping to create “the homosexual” and to crystallize a homosexual/heterosexual binary. By proposing a very limited toleration for this stigmatized class of congenital inverts, it hoped to eliminate manifestations of sexual and gender fluidity in the rest of the population, the better to control nonnormative and destabilizing desires. A third point of view accepts the premise of the second but insists that the Wolfendenian attempt at containment failed. The competing discourses swirling around the Home Office committee room could not be boxed into a single, hegemonic interpretation. As the moral conservatives feared, far from eradicating homosexuality to the greatest extent possible, the report and the 1967 Sexual Offences Act facilitated sexual minorities in breaking out of their newly legitimated space into a very visible, vibrant, and politically charged associational and commercial gay culture in the 1970s. And a fourth take credits Wolfenden’s strategy with at least some success, in that the straight-acting, respectable homosexual, given powerful shape by the report, has never disappeared. When the British prime minister David Cameron (1966–) gave his support to marriage equality in 2011, he famously insisted, "I don't support gay marriage despite being a Conservative. I support gay marriage because I'm a Conservative"—an eminently Wolfendenian principle.

SEE ALSO Sexual Revolution in Europe; The Ugly Law (1961–1965; Denmark)

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Zheng He (1371–1433)

GILBERT CHEN
PhD candidate
Washington University, St. Louis, MO

Famed admiral and explorer in China’s Ming dynasty who was also a eunuch.

Zheng He, the renowned imperial eunuch and oceanic explorer, was born in 1371 in China’s Yunnan Province, a southwestern frontier region adjacent to Myanmar (Burma) and Laos. His original name was Ma He, and he came from a devout Arab-Mongol Muslim family. His family claimed descent from Saiyid Ajall Shams al-Din (1211–1279), an early Mongol governor of Yunnan, and both his father and grandfather made the pilgrimage to Mecca. However, Zheng He’s own religious beliefs became eclectic in his adulthood, as he embraced Buddhism, Daoism, and other popular religious traditions.

Statue of Zheng He at His Grave Site in Nanjing, China. Zheng He was both a renowned imperial eunuch as well as a famous Chinese admiral who conducted seven naval expeditions on behalf of the Ming government.
Following the overthrow of Mongol rule by Ming (1368–1644) troops in Yunnan in 1382, Ma He was taken prisoner and castrated for imperial service as a eunuch, as were many other indigenous boys. Soon after, he was assigned to Prince Zhu Di (1360–1424) in Beijing. As Ma He grew into adulthood, he proved his military skills and won Zhu Di’s favor by participating in campaigns against the Mongols along China’s northern border. After Zhu Di usurped the throne in 1402 to become the Yongle emperor, he conferred the surname “Zheng” on Ma He in recognition of his contribution during the civil war that brought Zhu Di to power.

From 1405 until his death in 1433, Zheng He commanded a series of seven naval expeditions sponsored by the Ming government to Southeast Asia and the Indian Ocean. Comprising as many as 250 ships and 27,000 men, most of whom were soldiers, in a single voyage, Zheng He’s armada dwarfed the Portuguese fleets that reached India almost a century later. During the final voyage, the Ming fleet even reached the eastern coast of Africa. The establishment of the colossal Ming navy not only contributed to the state-directed commercial expansion but also stimulated unprecedented circulation of people and goods in this oceanic world. Some scholars even contend that Zheng He’s expeditions accelerated the process of Islamization in Southeast Asia, but convincing evidence is still lacking. Nevertheless, given that in the early twenty-first century legends related to and many cultural structures dedicated to Zheng He—including a museum in Melaka (Malacca)—are scattered across Southeast Asia, it is indisputable that the many Chinese Muslim and overseas Chinese communities still keep alive the memory of his expeditions. However, for some overseas Chinese intellectuals, like Singaporean playwright Kuo Pao Kun (1939–2002), who authored a play called Descendants of the Eunuch Admiral (1995), Zheng He stands for the cultural anxiety of rootlessness and posterity that has been associated with overseas Chinese.

The Role of Eunuchs in the Chinese Court

Historians disagree about the details of Zheng He’s voyages, such as their nature and purpose, the size of the fleet, and the countries visited. One reason for scholars’ endless debate derives from the scarcity of original materials on Zheng He and his expeditions, a scarcity which, in turn, testifies to eunuchs’ marginality in imperial Chinese historical writing. Under the Ming, eunuchs were consistently associated with the most negative traits; after the Ming, eunuchs were even blamed for the dynasty’s fall.

A eunuch’s unsavory reputation can partially be explained by his biological transformation: his emasculation made him incapable of procreation and continuing the patriarchal line, thereby challenging the Confucian tenet of filial piety. Nevertheless, because impotent, the eunuch was allowed to live on intimate terms with the emperor and his harem and therefore enabled to influence imperial politics. For Confucian scholar-officials, eunuchs thus became direct rivals in the competition for imperial favor. This rivalry is probably the most important reason for the permeation of anti-eunuch rhetoric in the dynastic histories, which constitute the most authoritative sources for the period.

However, of the estimated 1 million Ming eunuchs throughout the dynasty, only a few actually rose to power and influence. For the majority, eunuchism was merely one road to survival, as indicated in the prevalent yet illegal practice of self-castration during the Ming. Additionally, in spite of being described as biologically un reproductive and ideologically antifamilial, Ming eunuchs achieved sociocultural reproduction via adoption—Zheng He, for example, adopted as his heir a son of his brother—and played pivotal roles in constructing kinship organization among their relatives, implying that their masculinity remained intact as they continued to embrace Confucian family norms.

Zheng He in Late Sixteenth-Century Vernacular Literature

During the late sixteenth century, tales of Zheng He’s expeditions became a popular topic of a flourishing vernacular literature. In 1598 an obscure author known as Maodeng Luo published the famous novel Sanbao taijian Xiyangji tongsu yanyi (Popular romance of eunuch Sanbao’s journeys in the Western seas), a highly fictionalized account of Zheng He’s voyages. At the time, Japanese expansion in the Korean Peninsula aroused tremendous anxiety in Chinese society. Luo lamented the military weakness of his time and intended to use Zheng He’s maritime feats to inspire moral renewal by imagining a harmonious, China-centered suzerainty.

While Luo’s portrayal of Zheng He is generally so idealized as to lack individuality, at least in one episode the reality of castration is highlighted. In the fantasized Country of Women, Zheng He is depicted as sympathetic to women there who suffer from sexual starvation. However, when the queen attempts to seduce him, she fails to find his penis. Frustrated, she attempts to execute him for his impotence. The incident symbolically draws a connection between Zheng He’s absent phallus and late Ming China’s impaired national prestige, underscoring the association between anxiety of emasculation and the force of female sexuality.

The Modern Revival of Zheng He's Story

After the Ming, Zheng He and his voyages were largely forgotten until 1900. By then, Chinese nationalists attributed China’s recent humiliations at the hands of Western powers to their country’s maritime weakness. Against this background, they rediscovered Zheng He to boost national morale, underscoring his naval achievements as no less praiseworthy than those of Western explorers like Christopher Columbus (1451–1506). Since the late 1970s, the Chinese Communist government has picked up this thread and attempted to manipulate the story of Zheng He's expeditions to reconstruct the nation's maritime tradition, a propaganda campaign that reached its climax in 2005, the year that marked the 600th anniversary of Zheng He's first voyage. Depicting Zheng He as an “ambassador of friendship” and imperial China as an intrinsically peaceful maritime power, Beijing aimed to justify its claim in the South China Sea and reorient its citizens toward the sea.

Meanwhile, the narrative is contested by many Southeast Asian scholars who argue that Zheng He’s missions were intended to obtain, either through actual or threatened force, control over the main port-polities along the major southeastern Asian maritime trade network, thereby constituting a form of maritime proto-colonialism before the arrival of European forces in this region. As Zheng He’s role as a maritime explorer, either peaceful or not depending on one’s perceptive, rose to prominence in recent decades, his identity of being castrated was played down, which further attests to the long-lived negative image of eunuchs in historical writing.

SEE ALSO Eunuchs

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Zhongxing Phenomenon

EVA CHEUK-YIN LI
Graduate teaching assistant King’s College London, United Kingdom

A popular movement of gender ambiguity among women in postmillennial East Asian Chinese-speaking societies in China, Hong Kong, and Taiwan.

Zhongxing literally means “middle gender/sex” or “neutral gender/sex” in the Chinese language. Zhong means “being middle or in between,” and xing implies both sex and gender. The latter is the result of a historical quirk in the twentieth century that saw sex translated from Western medical literature as xing in Japanese texts, and gender later translated as xingbie—literally, “sex difference”—in Chinese feminist texts (Min 2008; Rocha 2010). The zhongxing phenomenon is a substantial mediated and gendered phenomenon referring to the discourse and embodiment of gender ambiguity, in particular among women, in postmillennial East Asian Chinese-speaking societies in China, Hong Kong, and Taiwan. Although the same written characters are used, transliteration differs across locales: zung sing in Cantonese spoken in Hong Kong and chunghsing in Mandarin in Taiwan.

The zhongxing phenomenon cannot be subsumed under the concepts of queer or LGBT both because of its sociocultural peculiarity and because it has been mainstreamed and practiced beyond the LGBTQ communities. Hence, it offers a unique lens for understanding the transformational contours of gender and sexuality in relation to media culture in East Asian Chinese-speaking societies. Zhongxing is neither an identity category nor a sexual practice. Instead, it is a liminal state of performing nonnormative gender without claiming a gender or sexual identity position within the binary system of masculine/feminine, male/female, and heterosexual/homosexual (E. Li 2015). Since the late 1980s, zhongxing has become a generic term for the expression of gender ambiguity associated with both individualism and homosexuality. It has proliferated by means of popular culture and, in particular, has been heightened by a generation of androgynous female idols in transnational Chinese-language popular culture. The linguistic ambiguity of zhongxing has provided a space for individuals to negotiate normativities and maneuver marginality. Nonetheless, such ambiguity is highly contested and gendered. In general, female zhongxing is more mainstreamed and tolerated in comparison with male zhongxing.

Peculiarity of Zhongxing

Zhongxing is socioculturally peculiar because of its linguistic ambiguity, mundanity, nonidentitarian inclination, and depoliticized overtones. There are no existing academic concepts in the English language able to sufficiently encapsulate it (E. Li 2015). Unlike androgyny, which celebrates the union of femininity and masculinity in one body, zhongxing is defined by negation—the lack of masculinity in the male sexed body and the lack of femininity in the female sexed body—captured by the Chinese expression bunan bunü (neither man/masculine nor woman/feminine), which expresses disapproval of a gender expression that is undecidable. Zhongxing also does not equate with queer, which is a derogatory term taken up by nonheterosexuals to destabilize categories and resist normalization politics. Zhongxing implies depoliticized overtones because of its surface meaning of “middle/neutral.” Furthermore, the Chinese translation of queer, ku’er, which literally means “cool (kid),” is seldom used outside of activist circles and academia.

Because zhongxing does not intrinsically refer to a particular sexual orientation, the term T-style does not capture its ambiguity and inclusiveness (Kam 2014). T, short for “tomboy,” refers to butch lesbians in China and Taiwan. In a similar vein, the concept of female masculinity only partially captures the peculiarity of zhongxing. In addition, the concept has been critiqued for lacking clarity and overlooking constraints of embodiment (Francis and Paechter 2015). Terms modeled on it, such as tomboy femininity, have similar issues (Yue and Yu 2008). “Gender neutrality” appears to be the closest and most direct translation (Hu 2017a); yet this may cause confusion with the Anglo-American postgenderism movement, which originates from distinct sociopolitical backgrounds.

The position of neither directly translating zhongxing nor subsuming it under “queer” because of its sociocultural specificity is not intended to essentialize a homogeneous Chinese culture. Instead, it acts as a point of departure to reveal the mutual transformation of transnational and local practices and norms in the process of modernities, hybridization, and globalization (Martin et al. 2008). The ambiguity of zhongxing opens a contested and contradictory space for exploring gender repertoires and negotiating alternative modes of subjectivity. This can be seen as an ongoing critical engagement with Western theories and local practices mediated by a transnational mediascape.

Historical Relevance

As Michel Foucault (1972) points out, the emergence of a new discursive formation does not imply the disappearance of an old one but rather signifies a transformation of relations between the concepts, objects, and enunciations within those formations. That said, although zhongxing is socioculturally and spatiotemporally specific, there are ample historical examples of ambiguous gender performance that provide a glimpse into the changing meaning attached to nonnormative gender performance in contemporary Chinese-speaking societies.

Chinese opera has been a significant site of gender crossing. The gender of roles on stage was recognized by costumes and bodily movements (shenduan) instead of the player's biological sex. Male players impersonating female roles (dan) can be dated back to the Han dynasty (206 BCE–220 CE); this practice had been predominant in theatrical performance until the Yuan dynasty (1271–1368) when Mongolian military rule undermined the Confucian ideology of gender and sexual division (Tian 2000). During that period, the phenomenon of female players cross-dressing to play leading male roles (sheng) was significant. Sometimes, the female sheng acted in fight scenes that were regarded as exclusively masculine (Chou 2004). During the Ming dynasty (1368–1644) and Qing dynasty (1644–1911), Confucian ideologies were restored and vigorously enforced, which led to the prohibition of female players performing in public. Nonetheless, theatrical male impersonation was maintained by private allfemale Kunqu troupes owned by male literati (S. Li 2003). The general ban on female players on stage during the Ming and Qing dynasties had resulted in the fetishization of the male dan's cross-gendered body in Beijing opera, and its cultural obsession culminated in the 1920s and 1930s; in the postwar years, however, the cultural significance of male dan declined as a result of the mainland Chinese state’s suspension of male dan training (S. Li 2003). On the contrary, theatrical performances of the female sheng have been sustained by the popular all-women Yue opera troupes in Shanghai from the late 1930s through the 1980s. The popularity of all-women Yue opera troupes among female audiences is considered unique evidence of women rising to public culture in modern China (Jiang 2009).

Theatrical performances aside, female cross-dressing was also considered an expression of class distinction and/or individuality in particular. It was documented that during the Tang dynasty (618–907), women cross-dressing as men were popular among nobles and the gentry class (Huang 1994; S. Li 2003). During the republican era in the early twentieth century, female gender-crossing reemerged when fashion became a symbol of modernity and the contested site of gender performance (Chou 2004). Actresses who cross-dressed in everyday life were considered fashionable, and women intellectuals such as Jin Qiu (1875–1907) and Zhang Zhujun (1876–1964) who passed as men in public were later seen as pioneers of the Chinese women’s liberation movement (Chou 2004; Luo 2008).

During the postwar era, different forms of female gender ambiguity have been observed. In Maoist China, female Red Guards, known as the “Iron Ladies,” were allowed to act as violently and brutally as men in public (Honig 2002). Nonetheless, this form of “socialist androgyny” served the particular political purpose of maintaining gender difference; women were required to be genderless workers in public and sacrificing wives at home to support the revolutionary work of their husbands (Young 1989). Outside Maoist China, women’s ambiguous gender performance emerged in popular culture in Hong Kong, a British colony between 1842 and 1997. Among numerous examples, during the 1940s and 1960s the Cantonese opera and film stars Leung Mo-sheung (Liang Wuxiang; 1930–?) and Yam Kim-fai (Ren Jianhui; 1913–1989) were widely acclaimed for their interpretation of cosmopolitanism, gentleness, and masculinity. This earned them the reputation of “ideal men,” which is a good demonstration of Judith Butler’s theory of gender performativity (Chan 2016; Butler 1993).

Proliferation in Popular Culture

During the 1980s and 1990s, zhongxing was largely regarded as a positive in popular culture despite occasional concerns about its implications for female sexuality. At that time, the discourse of female zhongxing was mostly centered on fashion aesthetics, which were attached to the desirable qualities of individuality, authenticity, and cosmopolitanism. In Taiwan, toward the end of the martial law period (1949–1987), the female singers Julie Su (Su Rui), Jessie Lin (Lin Liangle), and Eagle Pan (Pan Meichen), who were known for their masculine outfits and vocal quality, were distinctively featured by the local press and entertainment industry as “zhongxing” for their individualistic style and unique personalities (Kuo 2010; Lu 2015). In parallel, gender ambiguity blossomed in Hong Kong cinema and popular music during the 1980s and 1990s. This was showcased in a spring 2017 exhibition titled Ambiguously Yours: Gender in Hong Kong Popular Culture at the M+ museum in Hong Kong. Female and male stars such as Anita Mui (Yanfang Mei), Roman Tam (Luo Wen), and Leslie Cheung (Zhang Guorong) were transnationally renowned for their glamorous and ambiguous performances. The utopian discourse of zhongxing as cosmopolitan individuality was succinctly stated in Hong Kong’s City Magazine (January 1991 issue), which defined and translated zhongxing as the symbol of progressiveness, open-mindedness, cleanliness, and decency (Lai 2007).

In the twenty-first century, in addition to the utopian values celebrated in the 1990s, zhongxing has increasingly been seen as a euphemism for nonnormative gender and sexuality—female lesbianism and problematic singlehood. The proliferation of zhongxing in media representations, as well as self-representation among Chinese women, was heighten by a new generation of female idols in transnational Chinese popular culture during the century’s first decade (E. Li 2015). The usage of zhongxing to refer to ambiguous gender and sexuality in everyday life proliferated. According to an analysis of newspapers in WiseNews, the internet’s Chinese-language news archive, the number of news reports in China, Hong Kong, and Taiwan that used zhongxing in relation to gender and sexuality saw a sixfold increase, from 200 in 2000 to more than 1,200 after the middle of the first decade of the twenty-first century.

This new generation of female idols has been popularly categorized by the entertainment industry, media, and audience as zhongxing. Most of them rose to fame from reality talent shows (Au 2012). Their onscreen debut was typically characterized by a short and trendy hairstyle, unisex fashion such as jeans and rock ‘n’ roll accessories, and sharp bodily gestures (E. Li 2015). Well-known examples include Li Yuchun (also known as Chris Lee) of China, who won Super Girl in 2005 by receiving more than 3.5 million votes out of 8 million from audience mobile phone text messages and attracted the largest personal cult following in post-Maoist China (Xiao 2012). She appeared on the cover of Time Asia in October 2005 as one of Asia’s heroes of the year and remained popular a decade later. Other examples in China include Bichang Zhou (also known as Bibi Zhou), Gao Yayuan (also known as Seven Gao), and Liu Liyang. In 2017 the popularity of zhongxing female singers seemed to be continuing through Acrush, billed as “all-girl boy band,” which drew widespread attention with the release of several photos and a music video. In Hong Kong, Denise Ho (He Yunshi; also known as HOCC), a mentee of the Cantopop diva Anita Mui, is among the best-known zhongxing stars in the territory. She was one of the best-selling singers of the first decade of the twenty-first century and was selected as a trailblazer in Cantopop by Time Out Hong Kong in July 2011 (E. Li 2015). In Taiwan, well-known zhongxing singers include Jing Chang (Zhang Yunjing), champion of Super Idol in 2007; Ella Chen of the girl band S.H.E; and the girl band Misster, which consisted of five handsome young tomboys who emphasized that they were zhongxing rather than lesbians.

These zhongxing idols attracted considerable numbers of followers both domestically and transnationally, facilitated by new technologies such as mobile phones, internet discussion forums, and satellite television. This simultaneous popularity of zhongxing singers in China, Hong Kong, and Taiwan in the first decade of the twenty-first century can be seen as largely unconnected because of their respective market structures, the local gender and sexual norms, and the media policy of the state (if any). Nonetheless, there are parallels in terms of the situation faced by the local entertainment industry. During the twenty-first century’s first decade, the Chinese entertainment industry as a whole was still recovering from decreased revenue resulting from piracy and digitization, and those within the industry were motivated to experiment with new marketing strategies. After learning of the fervent audience response to female idols who did not embrace normative femininity, the industry quickly realized that marketing them as zhongxing appealed to a wide audience of both heterosexual and queer women and that, by emphasizing the values of individuality and authenticity, the social taboo of homosexuality could be sidestepped.

© CANCAN CHU/GETTY IMAGES

Li Yuchun, winner of China’s Super Girl (2005). The success of Li Yuchun follows the pattern of a new generation of zhongxing singers, most of whom rose to fame as contestants on reality-television talent shows and featured a look characterized by a short and trendy hairstyle and unisex fashions.
The popularity of zhongxing idols has unleashed heated speculation about their enigmatic sexual orientation. The utopian values of zhongxing, such as individuality, were frequently used as the justification for nonnormative gender performances. For example, on the television show Lady Guagua broadcast by Star TV in China on 21 February 2011, the zhongxing idol (Moraynia Liu [Liu Xin]) stressed that being zhongxing means to feel comfortable in her own skin and to ignore others’ criticisms. Over the years, some of the zhongxing idols, such as Ella Chen of S.H.E, have been openly heterosexual. There is also a dramatic example from Jing Chang, who publicly announced her change of sexual orientation from queer to heterosexual in 2014 and subsequently stirred up heated debate in Taiwan. A few others, such as Denise Ho and Jin Tai (Dai Anna) of Misster, subsequently came out as lesbians in public, whereas some others, such as Li Yuchun, remain enigmatic regarding their sexuality.

Aside from popular music, zhongxing has also become a recurring theme in television shows, where an ambivalent oscillation of meaning between lesbianism and individuality can be observed. For example, on two episodes of Wocai wocai wocaicaicai (Guess guess guess) on 28 July 2007 and 1 December 2007, broadcast by CTV in Taiwan, several tomboyish girls were given a makeover to “reembody” normative femininity and then presented to a group of teenage boys, who were presumably heterosexual. The hosts of the show described the tomboyish girls using the words zhongxing and shuai (handsome) interchangeably. A more explicit association of zhongxing with lesbianism is observed in an episode of Bama jiong hen da (About sex/Straight talk with parents) titled “My daughter is very zhongxing; how could she get married (to a man)?” which was broadcast by PTS on 22 June 2010. The show featured concerned parents and their zhongxing daughters. The relationship between zhongxing gender expression and lesbianism is implicitly drawn throughout the show. These examples suggest that the zhongxing phenomenon has paradoxically opened new space for discussing sensitive topics of gender and sexuality on the one hand, while perpetuating heteronormativity on the other (E. Li 2015; Hu 2017a).

In contrast with the contested mainstreaming of female zhongxing, male zhongxing remains relatively marginalized. Although the Japanese style of bishonen (beautiful boy), the Korean style of kkonminam (flower handsome man), and the burgeoning industry of male cosmetic products and aesthetic surgery in East Asia have contributed to the emergence of a new Pan–East Asian soft masculinity that has reshaped masculinity ideals in Chinese societies (Miller 2003; Holliday and Elfving-Hwang 2012; Jung 2011; Chua 2004; Louie 2012), everyday stigmatization of male gender ambiguity prevails, as evidenced by derogatory adjectives such as niang (sissy) and yao (monstrous), the latter being a term that has been associated with male same-sex sexuality (Chiang 2014). Therefore, the experiences of and implications between female and male zhongxing are not directly comparable. It has also been argued that attributing the mainstreaming of female zhongxing to the rise of Pan–East Asian soft masculinity is male-centric and overlooks the diverse subjectivity of female zhongxing (Hu 2017b).
Implications

Although female zhongxing idols have received much acclaim from their audiences, the zhongxing phenomenon has attracted a homophobic backlash from those concerned about the self-representation of zhongxing among young women (E. Li 2015). The reception of the zhongxing phenomenon also varies across locales. Whereas zhongxing is relatively well tolerated in Hong Kong and Taiwan, where it is more incorporated into the mainstream consumerist culture, the phenomenon remains relatively controversial in China.

On the one hand, the ambiguity of zhongxing renders it an at least less derogatory label for nonnormative gender performance by replacing negative terms such as nanrenpo (mannish women) in everyday life. Its discursive ambiguity has also opened an ambivalent space to verbally articulate and visually represent the desire to loosen gender norms. By associating zhongxing with individuality and cosmopolitanism, the phenomenon has normalized nonnormative gender performance and potentially expanded the socially acceptable repertoires of gender expression and embodiment for Chinese women.

Moreover, zhongxing as a space of in-betweenness has allowed individuals to question gender norms without taking up stigmatized identity positions, especially in a context where the concept “queer” is accessible to only a few within academia and social activism.

On the other hand, however, it is questionable whether the zhongxing phenomenon has yielded an actual transformation in the everyday lives of heterosexual and queer Chinese women or, to an even lesser extent, Chinese men. There is evidence that the increased social visibility and public awareness of lesbianism as a result of the zhongxing phenomenon have ambivalent consequences. The phenomenon has simultaneously improved social tolerance and nonnormative gender expression (Kam 2014; Hu 2017a). Yet, when zhongxing is presented as an individual aesthetics and is commodified by the entertainment industry, it raises doubts regarding the potentiality and resistance of everyday cultural politics.

In short, since the late 1980s, the zhongxing phenomenon has revealed the entanglement of subjectivity and hybrid normativities in Chinese societies within a transnational mediascape and local gender and sexual norms undergoing transformation. From the representations within popular culture to the self-representation of young women who are questioning gender norms, whether the zhongxing phenomenon has improved the actual terrain of the everyday lives of Chinese women is subject to further examination.

SEE ALSO Dissidence in Singapore; Otaku Sexualities in Japan

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Chan, Natalia. Youli sexiang: Xianggang dianying de nübannanzhuang [Gender crossing: Male impersonation in Hong Kong cinema]. Hong Kong: Joint, 2016.

Lu, Yi-Ting. “Women zhexie ‘zhongxing nühai’? Zhongxing wenhua fengchao li de duoyuan zhongxing zhuti” [We “other zhong xing nu hai”? Diverse subjectivity formation of young gender-neutral women in Taiwan]. MA diss., Kaohsiung Medical University, 2015.

Martin, Fran, Peter A. Jackson, Mark McLelland, and Audrey Yue. Introduction to AsiaPacifiQueer: Rethinking Genders and Sexualities, edited by Fran Martin, Peter A. Jackson, Mark McLelland, and Audrey Yue, 1–27. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 2008.

Min, Dongchao. “‘What about Other Translation Routes (East-West)?’ The Concept of the

In contemporary Zimbabwe, issues of same-sex relationships, as well as the rights of gay and lesbian people, have come to the fore of academic, sociopolitical, and religious debates. Most of these debates have illustrated that LGBTQ issues are contentious and always invite questions. The majority of Zimbabweans, including religious and political leaders, criticize minority sexualities on the basis that they are “un-African” (read: not Zimbabwean) and informed by Western concepts that aim to demean “authentic” Zimbabwean cultural values and traditions. Archetypal examples of such attacks on homosexuality include the former Zimbabwean president Robert Mugabe (prime minister, 1980–1987; president, 1987–2017), who described homosexuals as “worse than dogs and pigs” on multiple occasions.

Serious questions regarding the place and applicability of minority sexualities in the Zimbabwean context have arisen. In most cases, there has been a combination of sociocultural, political, and religious rhetoric seeking to police and contain minority sexualities. These attempts at policing and containing minority sexualities have manifested in contentious rulings, such as the Zimbabwean government’s Criminal Codification and Reform Act, effected in July 2006. The law basically criminalizes sexual intercourse or any other “indecent” acts involving physical contact between consenting males. Those found guilty of the act of sodomy could face imprisonment or a fine.

Zimbabwean history has classically been illustrated based on a tripartite model constituting its precolonial past, the colonial era under the British rule, and the postindependence context. Although this version of Zimbabwean history is problematic in the sense that it suggests that history is linear and progressively moving from savagery to civilization, it remains useful in the current study, which seeks to illuminate issues of same-sex practices and the ways in which these three stages of Zimbabwean history affected these practices.

Same-Sex Practices in Precolonial Zimbabwe

Research on precolonial sociocultural and religious systems is scarce, and this can be explained in terms of the complexities of oral storytelling as a vehicle of historicizing.
Researching precolonial sexual practices has consequently proven to be difficult because most aspects were lost during the processes of passing information from generation to generation. The subject of sexuality was and still remains characterized by silence and secrecy; it was not a subject that could be discussed openly, and this secrecy has also contributed to the overall difficulties in research. Marc Epprecht (1999) also concedes that anthropological records of homosexuality before the coming of whites were vague and flawed by the moral prejudices of the past. Even after colonialism, records on homosexuality continued to be vague and even repressed because, in Zimbabwe, sexuality is a subject that is wrapped up in silences, taboos, and privacies.

The major theme that has emerged from precolonial historical and scholarly accounts is that people who took part in same-sex practices occupied a marginal position in society; this theme has, to this date, remained a constant reality. The reason for this marginalization is that sociocultural and religious systems in precolonial Zimbabwe exalted the link between the act of having sex and reproduction. Sexuality that did not conform to heterosexual standards was regarded as a curse that could bring misfortunes, such as famine and diseases. Sex between a man and a woman was celebrated and viewed from deeply mystical and sacred lenses. The general belief was that if sex were “misused,” evil would befall the society (Mudavanhu 2010). Any sexual initiation rites that were performed on young boys and girls were meant to prepare them for their ultimate responsibility of producing children. Children ensured the longevity of the familial line, so precolonial Zimbabwean sexual systems were grounded within heteronormativity. In that context, homosexuality was not tolerated.

This does not mean that there were no cases of same-sex practices; rather, there were different ways in which the society dealt with and conceptualized homosexual practices. For instance, same-sex practices were tolerated among adolescent boys who experimented with one another. This experimentation was seen as a sort of “rite of passage” or a learning process. Adolescent boys could experiment sexually with other boys away from home, typically in the bush as they herded cattle. Adolescent girls had similar experiences when older girls gradually socialized younger girls into adult female roles and sexual relationships. As the boys and girls grew into adulthood, they were expected to outgrow these experimental phases (Epprecht 2004). These same-sex practices by adolescent boys and girls should thus not be construed as the society’s acknowledgment of a different sexual orientation, because society expected them to outgrow these “childish” tendencies.

In cases where an adult individual exhibited sexual attraction to a person of the same sex, traditional culture generally had more benevolent ways of dealing with and accepting such individuals than is exhibited in present-day Zimbabwe. For example, being sexually attracted to a person of the same sex could be understood in terms of spirit possession; as noted by Jannet Mudavanhu (2010), spirit possession was not necessarily regarded as evil. When conceptualized in terms of spirit possession, these same-sex practices could be seen as respectable attributes, because spirit possession overturned generally accepted gender roles and gave possessed individuals an unusual degree of status, allowing them to exercise authority inside and outside the natural context. There were also occasions when same-sex practices were encouraged for medicinal purposes, such as curing impotence, mental illnesses, and other ailments (Goddard 2004). Epprecht (2004) also provides examples of male ancestral or water spirits who would occupy a female body and not allow the body they occupied to have sex with a man. These possessed individuals were not shunned by society, but their families looked for ways to exorcise the spirit. Although heterosexuality was the ideal, precolonial Zimbabwean traditional cultural beliefs were sophisticated and exhibited open-mindedness when it came to individuals who failed to meet the heterosexual ideal.

Colonialism and Homosexuality

The colonial era (1890–1980) illustrates the complexities of the colonial experience for the homosexual individual in Zimbabwe. On the one hand, the colonial administration, in collusion with Christianity, affected the precolonial systems of handling homosexuality. Although African social systems afforded some status and even influence to the same-sex–practicing individual, these were completely eroded during the colonial era. Administratively, the colonial government criminalized the practice (Mudavanhu 2010). Religiously, the growing Christian religion was and remains overtly and unapologetically hostile to homosexual practices, with the standard argument being that God did not create men to marry other men or women to marry other women. Christian teachings and colonial laws were therefore hostile to homosexuality and encouraged hostile attitudes toward homosexual individuals.

On the other hand, the colonial government expected certain things from African men, mainly, their labor in the colonial farms, mines, and cities. With growing urbanization and a cash economy, African men were compelled to leave their families behind in the rural areas while they trekked the colonial spaces looking for jobs. Sex imbalances became more noticeable in such colonial spaces because African women’s presence was not tolerated. Such contexts augmented the chances for homosexual encounters, because African men lived in communal accommodations. The first generation of these migrant workers predominantly came from Nyasaland, which is now known as Malawi. These were then followed by Zimbabwean men, whose livelihood in the colonial reserve areas had rapidly deteriorated. Thus, whether it was because of sexual deprivation or long repressed sexuality, colonial urbanization provided what Mudavanhu describes as an “enabling environment to an already existing practice” (2010, 101). Male migrant labor, plus prisons and single-sex boarding schools, may also have enabled new forms of gendered sexual relations, as has been argued in other colonial contexts, such as South Africa (see, e.g., Gay 1985; Moodie with Ndatshe 1994; Epprecht 2004).
LGBTQ Issues in Postcolonial Zimbabwe

Zimbabwe gained independence from colonial rule in 1980, suggesting the potential for transformation and more tolerant handling of LGBTQ issues. However, for the LGBTQ individual, independence was characterized by disappointment because it was not all inclusive. Initially, LGBTQ organizing and advocacy were instigated by white Zimbabweans, who in 1990 formed the local gay and lesbian organization known as GALZ (Gays and Lesbians of Zimbabwe). GALZ offers critical explanations of the conditions of sexual-minority individuals in Zimbabwe. Its activities include publishing, counseling, and advocacy. The organization advocates for social changes that will make it possible for LGBTQ people to lead more fulfilling lives. GALZ's efforts have consistently been constrained by the hostility of the Zimbabwean government. This hostility culminated in the infamous Book Fair saga of 1995, when President Mugabe’s antihomosexuality rhetoric resulted in the government’s banning of GALZ from exhibiting its work at the Zimbabwe International Book Fair.

The Book Fair saga propelled issues of homosexuality in Zimbabwe onto a more public forum, including the local and global media. There are multiple angles from which the subject has been debated. Media reports increased in the late 1990s when Zimbabwe's first official president, the Reverend Canaan Banana (1936–2003), was brought to trial for, and found guilty of, eleven counts of sodomy. Banana was accused of abusing his presidential powers to sexually assault several men who were part of his staff. Banana’s trial and subsequent imprisonment afforded multiple discourses on homosexuality. The most insistent are discourses of abnormality and morality that continue to be informed by the colonial legacies of Christianity.
A Member of Gays and Lesbians of Zimbabwe (GALZ) Commemorates the International Day against Xenophobia and Transphobia in Harare, Zimbabwe, 2012. Efforts by GALZ to advocate for LGBTQ people have consistently been constrained by the hostility of the Zimbabwean government.

Debates on homosexuality are also rife with issues of politics and enactments of power. For example, links have been made between the repressive Zimbabwean government and the repression of sexual minorities. Cases in point include Mugabe's late 1990s attacks on British prime minister Tony Blair’s government as a government of “gay gangsters” and Mugabe’s 2015 jab at US president Barack Obama's support of the US Supreme Court's ruling in favor of gay marriage. Mugabe mockingly insinuated that he would travel to the rainbow White House to ask for Obama's hand in marriage. Molly Manyonganise (2016) argues that Mugabe’s virulent attacks on homosexuality were used to provide him with a rallying point to appeal for political legitimacy. Manyonganise insists that Mugabe’s homophobic statements were almost always uttered when campaigning for power or when Zimbabwe’s economic situation was deteriorating.

In light of the 2017 “resignation” of Mugabe as president of Zimbabwe, the future of LGBTQ people's rights remains hazy. First, Mugabe’s replacement, President Emmerson Mnangagwa, expressed rigid antihomosexual sentiments when he was vice president. So, it seems what has changed is the person but not necessarily the attitudes. Second, the major political opposition party, Movement for Democratic Change–Tsvangirai (MDC-T), appears to be ambiguous when it comes to its vision for the status of LGBTQ people. For example, the late MDC-T president, Morgan Tsvangirai, had this to say about homosexuality, it is “a controversial subject.... My attitude is that I hope the constitution will come out with freedom of sexual orientation, for as long as it does not interfere with anybody.... To me it’s a human right” (BBC News 2011).

Tsvangirai’s statement exhibits concealed aversion for homosexuality but tactfully insists on the human rights of LGBTQ people so as to sustain the moral integrity of his political party and its respect of democracy as an ideal. While this ambiguity renders the future of LGBTQ advocacy and organizing difficult, GALZ has been and continues to be resilient in the face of hate and brutality. The organization’s Affinity Groups Programme has led to an increase in membership and awareness of LGBTQ issues beyond the boundaries of Harare, Zimbabwe’s capital city. Although the state is generally considered homophobic, it implicitly considers the public health arguments surrounding homosexuality. In 2015 the state’s Ministry of Health confirmed its efforts to protect homosexual men having gay sex in prison from HIV, a move that was applauded by the LGBTQ community (Zimbabwe Today, 2015).

SEE ALSO Activism in Africa South of the Sahara; Christianity in Africa: Anglican; Colonialism in Africa South of the Sahara

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Manyonganise. Molly. “‘We Will Chop Their Heads Off’: Homosexuality versus Religio-political Grandstanding in Zimbabwe.” In Public Religion and the Politics of Homosexuality in

Zuqaq al-Midaq (1947; Naguib Mahfouz)

REBECCA JOUBIN
Associate Professor, Arab Studies
Davidson College, Davidson, NC

Egyptian novel that employs a judgmental colonialist gaze in its portrayal of a character who engages in same-sex sexual activity.

Middle East queer studies, as Hanadi Al-Samman and Tarek El-Ariss (2013) have poignantly argued, is often constricted by a premodern East/modern West binary where the East is viewed as mired in tradition while the West is seen as free and modern. In their examination of literature and culture, Al-Samman and El-Ariss propose an engagement with the intricate sites of multifarious meanings and transformations that move beyond viewing queer identities in the Middle East through the colonialist and imperialist gaze. Some scholars have attested to the fluid gender spaces and sexualities that existed in the Middle East in medieval times, before it was drastically altered by Western imperialism. In

© BARRY IVERSON/THE LIFE IMAGES COLLECTION/GETTY IMAGES

Crossing Borders: Love between Women in Medieval French and Arabic Literatures (2008), Sahar Amer explores the formative role that Arabic eroticism through intertextuality had in influencing alternative sexualities in Old French literary texts, sexualities that otherwise would have been not noticed. Her study shows that while same-sex sexual practices were considered taboo and silenced in the medieval West, this was not the case in the medieval Middle East. Amer’s study explicates the debt that the Old French tradition owes to the Arabic literary homoerotic tradition. Indeed, at the time, the West was imbued with negative judgments of the nonnormative sexualities that existed in the East. Joseph Massad argues in Desiring Arabs (2007) that Edward Said could easily have added “sexual deviant” to his long list of Orientalist tropes, due to Western perceptions of sexual depravity in the East. In his monumental study, Massad shows that the Orientalist fantasy once viewed the Arab world as degenerate due to homoeroticism, licentious sex, and the fluidity of gender spaces. Yet, with the colonial gaze, the West turned that framework around and instead judged the Arab world as backward and oppressive of the rights of homosexuals.

Massad expounds on how in the Arab world, some writers from the middle of the nineteenth century were overcome with a sense of crisis concerning the Arab present, its “culture,” its “language,” its political and economic order, its “traditions,” its views of its own “heritage,” even “Islam” itself, in short, a malady that afflicted the whole of Arab Islamic “civilization.” The diagnosis would echo Orientalist judgment of the Arabs, including “backwardness,” “decadence,” “moral decline,” “irrationality,” and most of all, “degeneration,” resulting from centuries of Ottoman rule characterized by stasis at best or retardation of things Arab (and sometimes Muslim) at worst.(2007, 8)

Naguib Mahfouz's Zuqaq al-Midaq (1947; Midaq Alley [1966]) is one such novel in which the novelist incorporates the judgmental colonial gaze in its queer subjectivities.

Mahfouz's Novel

The story commences in the early 1940s and examines a rapid transitional phase of Egyptian history. The novel’s characters struggle to overcome the confines of opportunities determined by one’s birth and search for upward mobility, often through work with the British army. The central character is the alley, which indifferently observes the difficulties that befall its inhabitants. It is in this context that we are introduced to Kirsha, the owner of the popular, albeit dilapidated, café on Midaq Alley. He is married with six unhappily married daughters and a son, Hussain. From the first pages, Kirsha is portrayed in a highly negative manner, as we see “Kirsha's unpleasantness” and his “angry exasperation” (Mahfouz 1992, 5) at an old man's recitations in his café.

Early on, we learn that Kirsha is not only unpleasant but also addicted to hashish. “Kirsha, the café owner, followed him with his heavy eyes, enjoying the numbing stream from the hashish flowing into his stomach and giving himself over to its delicious power” (11). His drug addiction is clear from the outset, and there is suggestion of scandal too:

> The hashish robbed him of any will to resist. He was a poor man, however, unlike the majority of café proprietors, not because his business was unprofitable, but because he was a squanderer, wasting his profits and throwing his money about with nothing to show for it. In fact, he gave free rein to his desires and passions and especially to that one unwholesome weakness of his. (45)

This quote is the first subtle reference to his homosexuality, which becomes more apparent as the scene continues and he slips out of the café, disguised in a black cloak, without telling anyone where he is headed. “His heart was throbbing violently. Strange as it seems, Mr. Kirsha had always lived a most irregular life, and he had rolled in its dirt so long that it appeared to him a perfectly normal one” (45). We then learn that he was a narcotics dealer and that it was during the night that he conducted his business. “Normal life had eluded him and he had become a prey to perversions. Thus, his submission to his vices was complete; he neither regretted them nor was he repentant” (45).

Once his moody demeanor and drug addiction is established, we learn more details of his “other vice” (46). He enters a shop and eyes a handsome young boy and engages him in conversation, asking him to wrap up six pairs of socks for him. After he leaves the shop he lurks around the corner, and when the boy leaves the shop he follows him. Taking advantage of the boy’s poverty, he promises him better fortune in his merciful hands. Then he invites the boy to his café and says that day should be remembered as a day of good fortune, the day the boy’s luck changed.

In “Out of the Closet: Representations of Homosexuals and Lesbians in Modern Arabic Literature” (2008), Al-Samman illustrates how modern representations of male homosexuality in the Arab world are often instrumentalized to show the Arab male’s loss of manhood and disempowerment by the state. Khalid Hadeed (2013) argues that representations of homosexuality in modern Arabic literature have sought to contain its menace through what he calls “epistemic closure.” He analyzes this essentialist paradigm of closure that identifies male homosexuality with passivity and femininity as inferior to a sexually dominant masculinity in Saʿdallah Wannous's Tuqus al-isharat wa-al-tahawwulat (1994; Rituals of signs and transformations) and as a result of abnormal development in Alaa al-Aswany's Imarat Yaʿkubian (2002; The Yacoubian Building [2004]). They are examples of constructionist closure, where gender anxieties caused by the heightened presence of homosexuality create a narrative of developmental deviance. Epistemic closure often cites a traumatic childhood experience as the cause for homosexuality, which is likened to an illness. In Zuqaq al-Midaq, the poor boy who is the object of Kirsha's flirtations clearly fits into Al-Samman’s analysis of instrumentalization of homosexuality to show the pressures on masculinity. Clearly, the young, impoverished boy sees no way out of his situation and thus submits to Kirsha’s advances. The boy is in a passive role, and we know nothing of his own preferences and pleasures. However, people in the alley gossip and refer to him as an immoral sexual deviant.

With respect to Kirsha, there is no reference to childhood trauma or another reason that has “caused” Kirsha’s homosexuality, as suggested by epistemic closure. But we are quickly informed that he is depraved and addicted to hashish and has homosexual tendencies, which supports the colonial view of sexual deviance in the Arab world. Massad (2007) recounts how writers themselves reproduced the European colonial gaze, because they had internalized it and felt inferior due to Western portrayals of Oriental debauchery. Massad delineates how the homoerotic poetry of Abū Nuwās (d. c. 814 CE) was judged harshly by the colonial gaze, and in turn, Arab historians experienced anxiety as they internalized the colonial gaze and deplored debauchery. This internalized critique is present in Zuqaq al-Midaq. When Kirsha asks the boy if he will visit his café, he responds, “Only a fool refuses generosity” (50). Back at his café, throughout the evening Kirsha looks absentmindedly at the door as he engages in lackadaisical conversations until even onlookers notice his face light up as the boy enters the café.

Meanwhile, Mrs. Kirsha realizes that Kirsha is back to what she calls “that filthy disease” (72). She is aware that everyone knows of his scandals. While Mrs. Kirsha is tormented, his son Hussain refuses to intervene: “The ‘sin’ itself did not bother him in the slightest. Indeed, when news of it first reached him, he merely shrugged his shoulders in indifference and said unconcernedly, ‘He is a man and men don’t care about anything’” (74). But he does resent that his family is the subject of cruel jokes and scandal. With respect to Mrs. Kirsha, “In fact, she was really proud of him, proud of his masculinity, of his position in the alley, and of the influence he had over his associates. If it were not for that abominable shortcoming of his, she would not have a single complaint against him” (75). When she sees she cannot influence him, she goes to Radwan Hussainy, who is known for his wisdom, and asks him to speak to her husband: “Every time I think he has given up his sinful behavior he brings a new disgrace upon me. He is completely immoral and neither his age, his wife, nor his children can cure his lechery. Perhaps you may have heard about that brazen boy he has with him every evening in the café? Well, that’s our new disgrace” (91).
There is a reductionist approach to homosexuality, which is depicted as a vice similar to drug abuse. While the characters speak, Mahfouz makes no attempt to redeem Kirsha. Mrs. Kirsha continues her conversation with Mr. Hussainy: “The brazen immoral fellow has disgraced us all. By God, if it were not for my age and the children, I would have left his house long ago and never returned. Do you approve of his disgusting business, Mr. Hussainy? Do you approve of his filthy behavior?” (91–92). Although Hussainy is not eager to get involved in the situation, he reminds himself, “The man who reforms a profligate does better than the man who sits with a believer” (93).

When Hussainy approaches Kirsha and tells him of the gossip, Kirsha remarks that people have been like that from the beginning of time. He asks if they are gossiping because they are shocked or because they are envious. Hussainy is appalled at the suggestion that people would envy “that filthy practice” (96). He tells Kirsha that everyone is talking about the immoral boy and that Kirsha’s wickedness will prevent him from attaining salvation. Hussainy asks Kirsha, “Doesn’t your lust for this filthy conduct make you ashamed?” (97). Later, during a fight between Kirsha and his wife, everyone stares in shock. Kirsha’s lover—again in a passive, weak role—runs off in fear. As his father’s scandals grow, Hussain wants to leave Midaq Alley because his sister has run off with someone and now everyone says his father will run off with someone, too. Kirsha’s wife laments that the “hashish addict” has passed his illness on to his son. In spite of his parents’ protests, Hussain says he wants to lead a different life. Kirsha is furious that his son wants to work for the British in order to secure electricity, live a “modern life,” and marry a respectable girl; he slaps Hussain and exclaims that in his eyes, his son is dead. When his son returns near the end of the novel, laid off, destitute, and married, Kirsha is full of hatred and refuses to accept him. It is only when he sees his new daughter-in-law’s young brother that Kirsha’s face lights up and he welcomes them into his home. The reader is left to imagine the later affair in which Kirsha will take advantage of the boy’s abject poverty.

The negative portrayal of Kirsha’s personality, his drug addiction and illegal dealing, and his attraction to poor, young boys all serve to demonize his homosexuality. Furthermore, he is portrayed as a hypocrite who had turned from patriotic activities in his youth to accepting bribes for his vote:

He excused his renunciation by pointing to the corruption in political life. He would say, “If money is the aim and object of those who squabble for power, then there is clearly no harm in money being the objective of the poor voters.” Now he was content to be corrupt, absentminded, and beset by his own passions. All the spirit of the old revolutionary was gone, except for those vague memories that return occasionally when he huddled over his warm brazier.
had rejected respectable life and now he cared only for the pleasures of the flesh.

(151–152)

Film Adaptations

Sixteen years after the publication of Zuqaq al-Midaq, Hassan El-Imām directed Saad el Din Wahba’s film adaptation of the novel. Starring Shadia as Hamida, another resident of Midaq Alley, the film centers on her desire to leave the alley for a better life and on the various contenders for her hand. In the film version, Kirsha, an unabashed, hashish-smoking, homosexual café owner, is relegated to the background; while he openly engages in same-sex relations, he maintains social respectability because he has the active (i.e., penetrative) role in these relationships. In one of the opening scenes, Kirsha sits at a table in the café, his arms around a young, soft-looking boy even as his friends look on and laugh. His strong masculinity is conveyed by his appearance, which features a large mustache, and also by the aggressive way he talks and throws people out the café. By contrast, the male belly dance instructor Susu appears in a loose flowing outfit halfway through the film, apparently for comic relief. He represents the effeminate form of masculinity devoid of respectability. While the original novel had placed queer subjectivities at the heart of the novel, the filmmaker focuses on Hamida’s story at the expense of the development of other characters, who appear as stereotypes.

Queer subjectivities in the original Zuqaq al-Midaq travel transnationally, with different interpretations according to context. Kirsha’s homosexuality is at the heart of the original Zuqaq al-Midaq, and thus the story commences with his affair with the poor young merchant and ends with the possibility of a new affair with his daughter-in-law’s young brother. Queer subjectivities in the novel are woven with discourses of authenticity and colonialism throughout the plot. The Mexican cinematic adaptation of Zuqaq al-Midaq, El Callejón de los Milagros (1995), is set in a downtrodden neighborhood in Mexico City. It also has a cast of characters who dream of escaping the narrow confines of their lives to attain a better future, but as in Zuqaq al-Midaq, the future looks inevitably bleak. The Mexican film begins with a scene in the café where the owner Rutillo publicly humiliates his son, Chavo, and his best friend, accusing them of being queer rather than “real men.” Although Rutillo’s companions in the café tell him to be easier on his son, he is intolerant of his son’s behavior, and clearly prejudiced against homosexuality. Though we are led to believe, briefly, that Chavo is gay, we quickly see that this is not the case. Next is a scene where Rutillo’s wife begs him for intimacy and reminds him of how they made their babies. With a look of displeasure and aversion on his face, he turns out the lights and agrees to have sex with her.
The next day, sparked by the pleasures of the flesh, he goes to the barber and has his haircut, but it is clear he is not rejuvenating himself for his wife. Newly groomed, he enters a shop and flirts with a young man (Jimmy) as he buys socks and boxer shorts. Whereas the young boy in Zuqaq al-Midaq is portrayed as a passive recipient of Kirsha’s advances, manipulated into acquiescence with promises of a better future, Jimmy appears to be confident in his homosexuality and welcomes Rutillo’s advances. Rutillo invites Jimmy to his café and soon they engage in an open love affair, which is cut short when Rutillo’s son attacks them together in the shower, nearly killing Jimmy. Thus, the opening scene, when Rutillo taunts Chavo for his close relationship with another man, is meant to suggest Rutillo’s confusion over his own sexuality. Although he comes “out of the closet” with Jimmy, the failure of their romance stifles Rutillo’s burgeoning desires, and afterward he is reintegrated into his heterosexual union. It is noteworthy that Rutillo is not depicted as a drug addict, dealer, or hypocrite with regard to politics. Also, Jimmy is portrayed as a young man in control of his own desires and sexual inclinations, rather than the manipulated boy of Zuqaq al-Midaq. In the nude shower scene, it is clear that both of the men enjoy the pleasures of the love affair.

Having escaped after nearly killing Jimmy in the shower, Chavo later returns with his wife and infant and eventually is accepted back into the family. At this point, there are no more hints of Rutillo’s homosexual leanings; the heterosexual family union has dominated queer desires. Rutillo’s story line is subsumed in the framework of the Mexican movie, which presents three separate story lines—Rutillo’s, Alma’s, and Susanita’s. The original Arabic novel links homosexuality with moral depravity, sexual license, drugs, and ill humor, and begins and ends with these themes, while the Mexican film relegates queer subjectivities to scenes secondary in importance to central plot development. Hussain’s reaction to his father’s homosexuality reinforces the colonial view of a sexually fluid Middle East, while Chavo’s violent reaction conveys a repressive, Western Catholic view of homosexuality. In the Mexican film, Rutillo’s same-sex sexual activity is not ignored and homosexuality is not judged negatively as in Zuqaq al-Midaq, though the Rutillo story line eventually fades into the larger plot and into a heteronormative marriage framework. Rutillo’s affair with Jimmy is cast as a midlife crisis and then disappears into an accepted Catholic family union in the context of the larger plot.

SEE ALSO HIV/AIDS in Egyptian Cinema; Imarat Ya’kubian (2002; Alaa al-Aswany); Iskandariyya … Leh? (1979; Youssef Chahine); Jannāt wa-Iblīs (1992; Nawal El Saadawi); Sharaf (1997; Sun’allah Ibrahim)

BIBLIOGRAPHY

FILMOGRAPHY

Geographic Index

Africa

Activism in Africa South of the Sahara, 8
African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights, 35
Afropop Music, 38
Anthropology in Africa South of the Sahara, 61
Archives in Africa, 91
Benga, François “Féral” (1906–1957), 218
Botswana, 259
Cabo Verde, 284
Cameroon, 287
Cape Town, 299
Christianity in Africa: Anglican, 319
Christianity in Africa: LGBT Friendly, 324
Christianity in Africa: Pentecostal and Charismatic, 326
Christianity in Africa: Roman Catholicism, 330
Cinema, African (Anglophone), 332
Cinema, African (Francophone), 343
Colonialism in Africa South of the Sahara, 384
Côte d'Ivoire, 422
Ethiopia, 505
Ethnopornography, 507
Ethnopsychiatry, 510
Feminism, African, 534
Gangs and Street Kids in Africa, 579
Gender, Flexible Systems, in Africa, 594
Ghana, 612
HIV/AIDS in Africa, 687
Homonationalism in Africa, 750
Internet in Africa, 827
Involuntary Servitude and Same-Sex Sexuality in Africa, 840
Islam in Africa South of the Sahara, 851
Kenya, 874
Language in Africa, 903
Literature, African (Anglophone), 952
Literature, African (Francophone), 964
Maghreb, 985
Marriage, Woman-Woman, in Africa, 1014
Mozambique, 1086
Namibia, 1115
Neoliberalism in Africa, 1132
Nigeria, 1150
Nkoli, Simon (1957–1998), 1156
Queer Theory, African, 1333
Rape, Corrective, in Africa, 1341
Refugees and Asylum in Africa, 1342
Senegal, 1428
Sex Work/Sex Tourism/Sex Trafficking in Africa, 1462
South Africa, 1522
Sports, Women in, Africa, 1542
Trans Issues in Africa, 1614
Ubuntu, 1677
Uganda, 1681
Witchcraft/Occult in Africa, 1735
Zimbabwe, 1750

Asia-Pacific Region

Archives in Asia, 95
Archives in Australia and New Zealand, 102
The Art of Identity in India, 123
The Art of Queering Asian Mythology, 127
Asia Pacific Transgender Network, 142
Athletes, Trans and Intersex, in Asia, 159
Australia and New Zealand, 165
Bakla, 187
Bhutan, 222
Boys Love (Yaoi) Manga, 262
Conversion Therapy in China, 418
Dissidence in Singapore, 468
Drag, Asian, 478
Family Law in Asia, 527
Fire (1996; Deepa Mehta), 556
Hijras, 666
HIV/AIDS in South and Southeast Asia, 726
Human Rights in Asia, 784
Kathoey, 869
Malaysia, 990
Marriage Migration in Asia, 997
Marriage, Same-Sex, in Taiwan, 1004
Militarism and Sexualities in the Asia-Pacific Region, 1054
Mishima, Yukio (1925–1970), 1069
Mongolia, 1083
MSM (Men Who Have Sex with Men) in Asia, 1089
Naz Foundation International, 1128
New Media in Asia, 1142
Otaku Sexualities in Japan, 1177
Pacific Island and Pacific Island Diaspora Identities, 1187
Pakistan, “Queer,” 1194
People Like Us (PLU), 1221
Pinhua Baojian (1849; Chen Sen), 1236
Pornography in Asia, 1268
QT v. Hong Kong Immigration Department (2017), 1307

Roopbaan, 1390

Samoan Fa‘afāfine, 1408

Section 377 in South Asia, 1424

Sex Reassignment Surgery in Asia, 1430

Sex Tourism in Asia, 1437

Sex Work in Asia, 1455

Sexology in Asia, 1465

Thai K-Pop, 1570

Tibet, 1597

Tongzhi, 1603

Tongzhi Literature, Taiwan, 1609

Transgender Muslims, 1627

Transgender Organizations in Mainland China, Hong Kong, and Taiwan, 1630

W v. Registrar of Marriages (2013), 1713

Waria, 1717

Wilde in Sinophone Culture, 1727

Zheng He (1371–1433), 1743

Zhongxing Phenomenon, 1745

Europe

Adoption and Surrogacy in Europe, 16

Anti-Gender Movement in Europe, 69

Anti-Racist Activism in Europe, 71
Anti-Semitism in Europe, 80
Archives in Europe, 103
Barbin, Herculine (1838–1868), 190
Bars and Cabarets in Europe, 196
Butt Magazine, 275
Chechnya, Detention Camps in, 315
Chevalier d’Éon or Mademoiselle Beaumont (1728–1810), 318
Classical Studies, 364
Comité d’Urgence Anti-répression Homosexuelle (CUARH), 397
Communism and Queers in Europe, 399
Cross-Dressing in the West, 424
Egymásra Nézve (1982; Károly Makk), 492
Elbe, Lili (1882–1931), 500
Eurovision Song Contest, 522
Female Husband, 532
Foucault, Influence of, 566
Friendship Societies in Europe, 573
Gay European Tourism Association, 581
Gentrification in Europe, 606
Grupo de Trabalho Homossexual and LES, 625
HIV/AIDS in Europe, 708
Human Rights in Europe, 789
Institut für Sexualwissenschaft, 823
Kinship in Europe, 885
Language in Europe, 909
Mädchen in Uniform (1931; Leontine Sagan), 983
Marriage, Universal, in Europe, 1008
Medicine, Complementary and Alternative, 1026
Metelkova Mesto (Slovenia), 1033
Migration to Europe, 1045
Military/Navy in the United Kingdom, 1066
Molly Houses, 1080
Nationalism and Sexuality in Europe, 1118
The Order of Chaeronea, 1165
Photography in Europe, 1233
Pink Triangle, 1238
Pride Demonstrations in Europe, 1278
Psychopathia Sexualis (1886; Richard von Krafft-Ebing), 1291
Queer Domesticity in Europe, 1312
Queer Themes in Italian Neorealist Cinema, 1321
Rescalvo, Sònia (1946–1991), 1377
Rüling, Anna (1880–1953), 1392
Russian Gay Propaganda Law, 1400
Sacred Band of Thebes, 1405
Sappho, Nineteenth-Century Rediscovery of, 1410
Scandals in Europe, 1412
Sexual Revolution in Europe, 1478
Strange Fruit, 1555
Tom of Finland (1920–1991), 1601
Transvestites/Transsexuals, 1640
Turkish Baths, 1667
The Ugly Law (1961–1965; Denmark), 1687
Von Mahlsdorf, Charlotte (1928–2002), 1710
The Well of Loneliness (1928; Radclyffe Hall), 1724
The Wolfenden Report, 1739

Latin America and the Caribbean

Antes que Anochezca (1992; Reinaldo Arenas), 59
Archives in Latin America, 106
Argentina’s Gender Identity Law, 118
El Baile de los 41, 183
Bars, Working-Class, in Mexico, 199
El Beso de la Mujer Araña (1976; Manuel Puig), 220
Bom-Crioulo (1895; Adolfo Ferreira Caminha), 243
Cabaret Theater in Latin America and the Caribbean, 279
Carnival and Sexuality in Brazil, 302
Central American Solidarity Movement, 310
Cinema, Latin American (Early Twentieth Century), 347
Cinema, Latin American (Late Twentieth and Twenty-First Centuries), 351
Cold War and Sexuality in Latin America, 379
Confessional Manuals in Colonial Latin America, 406
Conquest and Sodomy in Latin America, 415
The Cuban Revolution and Homosexuality, 432
Digital Cultures in Latin America, 461
Erauso, Catalina de (1592–1650), 502
Fin de Siècle Sexuality, 550
Florentine Codex and Nahua Sexuality, 559
Frente de Liberación Homosexual, 570
Gendered Violence and Feminicide in Latin America, 599
Grupo Gay da Bahia, 628
Hemispheric Institute Digital Video Library, 651
HIV/AIDS in Latin America and the Caribbean, 716
Human Rights and Activism in Latin America, 767
Inquisition, Criminal Courts, and Sexuality in Colonial Latin America, 818
Jamaica Forum for Lesbians, All-Sexuals and Gays (J-FLAG), 857
Jotería Studies, 863
Language in Latin America, 913
Lesbian Feminist Encuentros of Latin America and the Caribbean, 928
Lesbian Mothering and Adoption in Latin America, 938
Literature, Caribbean (Anglophone and Creole), 971
Literature, Caribbean (Francophone), 976
Madame Satã (1900–1976), 981

Marriage, Same-Sex, in Latin America, 1001

Mexican Revolution and Sexuality, 1035

Moche Pottery, 1076

Museo Travesti del Perú, 1097

Muxes, 1108

Neoliberalism in Latin America, 1138

The Nicaraguan Revolution, 1147

Parada do Orgulho LGBT de São Paulo, Brazil, 1197

Performance Artists in Latin America, 1223

Poets in Latin America, 1248

Pornoterrorismo and Post-Porn, 1273

Psychoanalysis in Argentina, 1287

Puerto Ricans in the Diaspora, 1294

Queer in Latin America, 1315

Sex Tourism in Latin America and the Caribbean, 1443

Sins against Nature in Colonial Latin America, 1494

Slavery and Sodomy in Brazil, 1507

Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz (1648–1695), 1518

Sports and Sexuality in Latin America, 1536

tatiana de la tierra (1961–2012), 1567

Transfeminism, 1619

Travesti and Trans Activism in Latin America and the Caribbean, 1649
El Vampiro de la Colonia Roma (1979; Luis Zapata), 1695
Vargas, Chavela (1919–2012), 1698

Middle East

Al-Akharun (2006; Seba al-Herz), 44

alQaws, 48

Amer, Ghada (1963–), 51

Anā Hiya Anti (2000; Elham Mansour), 55

Anti-Semitism and Zionism, 75

Asrar ‘Ailīyyah (2013; Hany Fawzy), 148

Aswat, 152

‘Awdat al-Almani ilā Rushdīh (2006; Rashid al-Daif), 177

Bareed Mista3jil: True Stories (2009), 192

Bayrūt ‘75 (1975; Ghāda al-Sammān), 207

The Bubble (2006; Eytan Fox), 270

Coming-Out/Coming-In Discourses in the Middle East, 394

Al-Dizil (1994; Thani al-Suwaidi), 474

Einayim Pkuhot (2009; Haim Tabakman), 495

The Gay International and Mideast LGBTQI Organizations, 583

Ghilman, 615

Hajar al-Dahik (1990; Hoda Barakat), 631

Halat Shaghaf (1998; Nihad Sirees), 635

Helem, 651

Hena Maysara (2007; Khaled Youssef), 657
HIV/AIDS in Egyptian Cinema, 704
Homoerotic Poetry of Abū Nuwās, 743
Homoeroticism in the Plays of Ibn Daniyal, 747
Homosexual Acts in Shari‘a, 755
Human Rights and Queer Arab Refugees, 775
I Luv U But (2012–2014; Fadia Abboud), 801
Imarat Ya‘kubian (2002; Alaa al-Aswany), 805
Internet Queer Sites in the Middle East, 831
ISIS Gay Trials, 844
Iskandariyya ... Leh? (1979; Youssef Chahine), 847
Jannāt wa-Iblīs (1992; Nawal El Saadawi), 858
Khookha McQueer (1987–), 878
Lesbanese (2008; Alissar Gazal), 925
Literary Discourses in the Ottoman Middle East (1500–1900), 948
Masculinity in Iranian Cinema, 1018
Meem, 1030
Misk al-Ghazal (1988; Hanan al-Shaykh), 1072
Mufākharat al-Jawārī wa-al-Ghilmān (al-Jā⊠i⊠), 1092
Mukhannath, 1095
Nuzhat al-Albāb Fīmā Lā Yujad Fī Kitāb (A⊠mad ibn Yūsuf al-Tifāshī), 1157
Orientalism in Gay Pornography about the Middle East, 1172
Ottoman and Persian Miniature Paintings, 1181
Pasolini’s Cinematic Adaptation of A Thousand and One Nights, 1204
Pinkwashing, 1244
Queen Boat Trials (2001–2002), 1308
Queer Names and Identity Politics in the Arab World, 1317
Sex Reassignment Surgery in Iran, 1434
Sex Tourism in the Middle East, 1452
Sharaf (1997; Sun'allah Ibrahim), 1486
Shifting Sexual Norms in Nineteenth-Century Iran, 1491
Spectra Project, 1534
Sufi Treatment of Same-Sex Relations in Poetry and Prose, 1556
Transgender Identity in Iranian Cinema, 1623
Transgendered Subjectivities in Contemporary Iran, 1634
Travel/Travelogues on the Middle East, 1644
Tuqus al-Isharat wa-al-Tahawwulat (1994; Sa'dallah Wannous), 1663
Zuqaq al-Midaq (1947; Naguib Mahfouz), 1753

North America

ACT UP, 1
AIDS Memorial Quilt—The NAMES Project, 40
Archives in North America, 113
Bathhouse Raids, Toronto (1981), 202
Black Freedom Movement and Sexuality, 230
The Body Politic, 239
Brokeback Mountain, 268
Canadian Criminal Code Reform (1969), 295
Combahee River Collective, 390
Compton’s Cafeteria Riot (1966), 403
Darnell v. Lloyd (1975), 439
Daughters of Bilitis, 443
Defense of Marriage Act (1996), 447
Dyketactics!, 483
Femmes and Butches, 538
Fortune and Men’s Eyes, 563
FTMInternational, 575
Gay Latino Alliance (GALA), 587
Gay Liberation Front, 590
Harlem Renaissance, 638
Hate Crime Law and Policy in the United States, 644
Higher Education and LGBTQ+ Communities in the United States, 661
HIV/AIDS in the United States, 734
Human Rights Campaign, 781
Kinsey Scale, 881
Lambda Legal Defense and Education Fund, 891
Lavender Menace, 919
Lavender Scare, 922
Lesbian Herstory Archives, 932
Lesbian Lands, Women’s Lands, and Separatist Communes, 934

The Lesbian Music Movement, 942

Marches on Washington, 993

Mattachine Society, 1023

Migrant Queer Communities, US, 1039

Military Law and Policy in the United States, 1057

Parenting Rights in North America, 1199

Pulp Fiction, Gay and Lesbian, 1300

Rural Queer Communities, US, 1393

Sexual Revolution in the United States, 1483

Sodomy Laws in the United States, 1512

Southern Comfort Conference, 1531

Stone Butch Blues (1993; Leslie Feinberg), 1546

Thomas/Thomasine Hall Court Case (1629), 1589

Two-Spirit, 1669

“We Demand” Protest (1971), 1720

Transnational

Adoption, Fostering, and Surrogacy (International), 20

Aestheticism and Decadence, Nineteenth-Century, 26

Antisodomy and Buggery Trials, 83

Asexuality, 134

Athletes, Trans and Intersex, 156

BDSM (Bondage and Discipline, Dominance and Submission, Sadism and Masochism), 210
Biological Essentialism, 224

Blackmail, 236

Bookstores, 247

Boston Marriage and Women's Romantic Friendships, 254

Camp, 290

Cavafy, C. P. (1863–1933), 305

Cisgender or Cis, 357

Clitoris, 367

The Closet, 372

Cruising and Cruising Grounds, 428

Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders (DSM), 452

Diasporas, Queer, 457

Ecology and Environmental Issues and Activism, 487

Eunuchs, 514

Film Festivals, 543

Graffiti and Graphic Art, 618

Historical Sexes, 671

HIV/AIDS, 677

Human Rights, 759

Imperialism and Colonialism, 809

Intersex Identities, 836

Language, 894

Museums and Memorials, 1101
Offences Against the Person Act (1861), 1161
Orgasm and Orgasmology, 1168
Penis, 1213
Phone Apps, 1228
Popular Music and Queer Identities, 1254
Pornography, 1260
Pride Parades and Marches, 1281
Queer Theorists, 1323
Refugees and Immigration Policies, 1346
Religion and Same-Sex Behaviors: Christianity, 1353
Religion and Same-Sex Behaviors: Islam, 1363
Religion and Same-Sex Behaviors: Judaism, 1370
Resorts, 1379
Rituals and Same-Sex and Trans Experience, 1383
Rural Queerness, 1396
Scouting, 1415
Section 377 and Section 377A, 1419
Sexperts and Sex Education in the West, 1473
Situational Homosexuality, 1501
Stonewall Riots, International Effects of, 1548
Theater, Queer, 1573
Third Genders, 1581

A Thousand and One Nights, 1592
Treason and Queerness, 1658

Urban Queerness, 1688

Vietnam War, 1701

Vietnam War, LGBTQ+ Veterans, 1708

Wilde Trials, International Significance of, 1731
Subject Index

Boldface page numbers refer to the main entry on the subject. Page numbers in italics refer to photos and figures. Page numbers followed by t refer to tables.

A

A (pseudonymous organization) 1195

A (Sadeghi) 1638

A, B and C v. Staatssecretaris van Veiligheid en Justitie (Court of Justice of the European Union; 2014) 1048 1050

A dos aguas (performance art show) 1226

À rebours (Huysman) 28

The Abandoned Baobab (Bugul) 966

Abani, Chris 957

Abbas, Hakima 538 952 956 1136-1137

ʿAbbas I (Persian shah) 1183 1184

ʿAbbasi, Riza-i 1183

Abboud, Fadia 801-805 802

Abdi, Akbar 1624

Abdoh, Reza 1577

Abdullah II (king of Jordan) 1647

Abdullatif, Hussein 1367

Aboulmelik, Nebila 1677-1678

Abelove, Henry 375

ABGLT (Associação Brasileira de Gays, Lésbicas, e Travestis) 629

ABIGALE (Association of Bisexuals, Gays and Lesbians) 694 1334

Abod, Jennifer 944
About Sex/Straight Talk with Parents (television series) 1748

Abraham Geiger College 1373

Abraham, Ibrahim 193

Abramovic, Marina 1223

Absences sans frontières (Trouillot) 978

Absolutely Tame Is a Horse (film) 1637

Abu Arab, Muhammad 477

Abu Bakr ibn Abi al-Wafā 1560

Abu Ghraib prison scandal (2003–2004) 1173 1244

Abū Nuwās
  Burton, Richard Francis depiction 1593 1594
  Massad, Joseph analysis 1755
  Queen Boat Trials connection 1309
  Tifāshī, Aḥmad ibn Yūu al-on 1158 1160
See also Homoerotic poetry of Abū Nuwās

ABVA (AIDS Bhedbhav Virodhi Andolan) 669 1426-1427

ACA (Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act) 742

Acanfora v. Board of Education of Montgomery County (1973) 375-376

Acción de tutela, in Colombia 1141

Accord Alliance 838

Acento Frenético (Frenetic Accent) 1274 1276

Acervo do Grupo Identidade 107

Acevedo, David Caleb 1297

Achebe, Nwando 93 595

Achilles (mythical figure) 1406

Achmat, Taghmeda (Midi) 300 1334

Achmat, Zackie 697
activism 300 336 693-695 1334 1530
writings 335-336 906 960

ACHPR See African Commission on Human and Peoples’ Rights (ACHPR)

Achvah (organization) 1375

ACLU (American Civil Liberties Union) 450 892 1517

Acrush (band) 1747

Act of Gender Equality in Employment (2002) (Taiwan) 1633

ACT UP (AIDS Coalition to Unleash Power) 1-8
activism 4-6 4 5 229 739-740
connection with South African activists 1334 culture and organization 2-4 demise of national movement 6
in Europe 2-3 711
Latino caucus 1297 museum exhibit 1105 origins 1-2
pink triangle symbol 1241
Queer Nation formation 1325

ACT UP Oral History Project 1105

Actitud Gay 466

Active role in male-male sexual behavior
amrad relationships 1492
Arab queer literature depiction 1159
Arabic terms for 1318 1319-1320
arsenokoitai term 1354
Bangladesh 1130
blackmail and 236
Boys Love 267
colonial Latin America 821 1500 1508
fin de siècle sexuality 551
medieval Judaism 1370
Mexican gay men 377 1110
Mexican youths 377
Middle East 810 813
Ottoman and Persian miniature paintings 1185-1186
premodern Islamic world 1364
ritualized same-sex practices in Melanesia 1192-1193
Sufi literature 1557
Zuqaq al-Midaq depiction 1756

Activism and advocacy
Africa 1134-1137 1335 1616-1617 1679-1680
Arab world 1317 1320-1321 1367
Argentina 121 220-222 570-573 939-940 1290 1500 1554
Asia 1470-1471
Australia 1553
Bangladesh 1390-1392
Brazil 379-383 628-630 1197-1199 1198 1282 1500 1553
Canada 203-207 203 592-593 1200-1201 1720-1724
Chile 768-769
China 765 786-787 1604-1605 1606 1630-1634
Cold War sexuality 379-383
Colombia 769 771-772 1500
contribution of Lavender Scare 924
Cuba 382-383 432-437 1282 1500
Denmark 1552
East Asia 998
Europe 1012 1013 1551-1553
feminicide and violence 603-605
France 1009 1552 1704
Germany 1240-1241 1551 1552 1711-1712
HIV/AIDS 4-7 720-723 1476-1477
Hong Kong 1604-1605 1607 1630-1634
India 1422 1422 1426-1427
indigenous peoples 1671-1672
Indonesia 1367
intersection of queer theory and citizenship with 1335-1336
Iran 1638-1639
Israel 1374
Jewish communities 1371 1373 1374-1375
kathoey 873
Kenya 9 12 876-877 876
Kinsey Reports influence on 884
Latin America 1001-1003
Lebanon 927 1030-1033 1030
Malaysia 990
Mexico 201 768 770 939-940
Middle East 927 1647-1648
Mongolia 1083-1084
Namibia 1117-1118
nationalist masculinity in Europe and 1127-1128
Netherlands 1551-1552 1555-1556
new media in Asia and 1144-1145
Nicaragua 1149-1150
Nigeria 1154-1155
Pakistan 1194-1195 1196-1197
parenting rights 1200-1201
performance artists 1228
phone apps and 1231
pink triangle symbol and 1240-1241
Poland 1552
queer migrants in Europe 1051-1052
queer theory development 1324-1326
refugees and asylum seeking 1347-1349
Russia 1401-1402 1402
Senegal 1429-1430
sex tourism influences on 1440-1441
sex worker organizations 1449-1450 1460
sexual revolution and 1484
Singapore 1423
South Africa 1334 1335 1525-1528 1617
South Asia 1426-1427
Switzerland 1481
Taiwan 786-787 1004-1007 1598 1604-1607 1630-1634
Thailand 873 1704
Uganda 10 907 908 1684-1685
United States 1200-1201 1367 1513-1517 1642 1704-1705
Uruguay 769 772 1500
Venezuela 721
veterans’ rights 1709
Vietnam 788 1705-1706
virtual media 465-466 467
Western intervention in Africa 904
Zimbabwe 1751-1752 1752

See also Gay liberation movement Pinkwashing Pride parades and marches Travesti and trans activism in Latin America and the Caribbean specific actions; specific groups

Activism in Africa south of the Sahara 8-16 accomplishments in twenty-first century 11-13 activism in twenty-first century 9-10 10 285 286 299-301 African feminism 534-538
future focus 15
homonationalism 750-755 811
internet 828-830 829
LGBTQI issues and debate 13-15 15 260-262 300-301 424 536-538
Mozambique 1087 1088
overview (1950s–1990s) 8-9 political backlash in twenty-first century 10-11 423-424
South Africa 1156 1157

Acton, Harold 812
Acuña y Rosetti, Elisa 1038-1039
Ad-Hoc Task Force to Challenge Sodomy Laws 1515
Adab works 1092 1594 1595
Adair, James 1741
Adam barfi (film) 1624 1624 1636
Adam, Barry D. 375
Adam, Margie 946
Adam, Zed 991
Adams, Leo 116
Adaralegbe, Stephanie 961
Addicted (online drama) 1145
Adé, King Sunny 38
Adeboye, Enoch 1153
ADEFHO (L’Association pour la Défense des Droits des Homosexuels) 289
Adelphopoiēsis rites 1357
Adenauer, Konrad 1240
Adesanmi, Pius 957
Adetiloye, Joseph 321
Adichie, Chimamanda Ngozi 957
Aditya, Yudho 1399
Adl, Mohammed el 813
Admission category, LGBT Military Index 1055

Adobeland (collective) 935

Adolescents See Youths

Adonis García: A Picaresque Novel (Zapata) 1695 1697

Adonis (Japanese publication) 99

Adoption and surrogacy in Europe 16-20 1008

Adoption, fostering, and surrogacy (international) 20-26 assisted reproductive technology (ART) 18
by eunuchs 1744
intercountry adoption 20-21 international law 21
kinship models and 886
lesbian mothering and adoption in Latin America 938-942 939
LGBTQ youth 24-25
national laws and impacts 21-22
North American rights 1199-1204 1202 1203 queer parenting and transracial adoption 22-24 surrogacy 23 24

Adorno, Theodor 956

Adrien, Alix 728

The Adventures of Priscilla, Queen of the Desert (film) 175

The Adventures of the Lieutenant Nun (Nanin) 505

Advertencias para los nuevos confesores 410

Advice literature 1473-1475

Advocate (periodical) 107 682-683

Aelred of Rievaulx 1357

Aestheticism and decadence, nineteenth-century 26-35 aesthetes, decadents, and the visual arts 32-34 backlash against 34
Cavafy, C. P. 305-310
early influences 26
Europe and the United States 30-31 33-34
Latin America 554
Pater, Walter 27
Symonds, John Addington 27-28
Wilde, Oscar 28-29 31-32 1732
women writers and the coteries 29-30

Afary, Janet 1492

Affirmation (Mormon group) 1357

Afghanistan
bacha baazi relationships 1385-1386
pornography and erotica development 1270

AFLaGA (Armed Forces Lesbian and Gay Association) 1068

Afolayan, Kunle 341

Africa
anthropology in Africa south of the Sahara 61-69
archival research 91-95
British colonial sodomy laws 1163
Christianity and same-sex acts 1360-1361
circumcision practices 1217
criminalization of homosexuality 11 691-692 997 1342
francophone cinema 343-347
gender fluidity and same-sex behaviors among Islamic people 1364
HIV/AIDS incidence and prevalence 7 690-692 importation of slaves into Brazil 1507-1508 internet in 827-830 829
koro outbreaks 1214
language in 903-909
LGBTQ rights movement 1134-1137 1335 1616-1617 1679-1680 mythology and gender 875 neoliberalism in 1132-1137 1134 postcolonial context 904-906 precolonial tolerance of same-sex desire 1523
pride events 1282 1335
queer migration to Europe 1048
queer theory approaches to globalization 1330
queer theory development 1333-1339
rape, corrective, in 1341-1342 1341 refugees and asylum in 1342-1346 1344
sex work/sex tourism/sex trafficking in 1462-1465
situational homosexuality 1503 slavery and same-sex relations 840-843
third sex/gender categories 1586-1587
traditional approach to sexuality 1678-1679
trans issues 1614-1619 1617
ubuntu concept 1677-1681 1684
Western fascination with African sex organs 1214 witchcraft/occult in 1735-1739
woman-woman marriage 64 387 1014-1018 1014
women's sports involvement 1542-1546

Africa Dances: A Book about West African Negroes (Gorer) 218-219

African American people drag queens 901
gay liberation activism 1709 limited access to white queer spaces 1395 queer pop artists 1259
queer theater 1577
soul porn 1266

See also Black people

African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights 699-700 1087 1152 1153

African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights (ACHPR) 12 35-37 36 1087

African Men for Sexual Health and Rights (AMShER) 36 37 692

African National Congress 1157

African sexuality studies 906

African Trans Feminist Charter 1618

Africa's Last Taboo (film) 334 337-338

Afrika, Tatamkhulu 959

Afropolitanism 219

Afropop music 38-40 39
'Afsa (dramatic character) 1665-1667

Afsayd (film) 1636

After Eunuchs: Science, Medicine, and the Transformation of Sex in Modern China (Chiang) 521

Against Equality 1136

Against Nature (exhibit) 491

Agard-Jones, Vanessa 1653

Age differences
  amrad relationships 1491-1492 1492
  ancient Greek same-sex relationships 1406 1407 1502
  bacha baazi relationships 1385-1386 catamites 1425
  classical studies 366
  colonial Brazil 1509
  houseboys at resorts 1380 1381
  Middle Eastern homosexual relationships 114 1094
  mine marriages 386 812
  mummy-baby relationships 1015 1016 1505
  Ottoman and Persian miniature paintings 1185 1186
  samurai model 813
  situational homosexuality 1502 1503 1504
  Sufi literature 1557 1558
  A Thousand and One Nights depictions 1594-1595

Age of consent
  Canada 295 297 298 1723
  France 398 399 401
  Hong Kong 1307
  Hungary 402
  United Kingdom 592 792 1741

Agenda (journal) 537

Agender people
  pop artists 1259
  transgender umbrella for 136 362 455

Agha, as term 1628

Aghacy, Samira 633 634
Aghay-e gharn-e bistom (film) 1019
Agosto, Moisés 1297-1298
Agudah (organization) 1374
Agüeros, Jack 1297
Aguiar y Seijas, Francisco de 1521
Aguilar, Juana ("Juana la Larga") 280-281 674 839 1498-1499 Aguilar, Laura 1568
Aguilera, Mariano 1498
Aguirre, Lorenzo 1497
Agustín, Laura 1621
Ahebi, Ugbabe 93 595
AHG (American Heritage Girls) 1418
Ahidjo, Ahmadou 287
Ahluwalia, Sanjam 1466 1467
Ahmad, Ali Nobil 1270
Ahmad, Jalal Al-i 1635
Ahmadi, Mohammad 1626
Ahmadinejad, Mahmoud 1173
Ahmed I (Ottoman sultan) 1184
Ahmed, Shahab 1364
Ai (Chinese emperor) 1238
AIDES (organization) 2-3 710
Aidoo, Ama Ata 953
AIDS See HIV/AIDS
AIDS Action Group 301
AIDS Action Pledge 314
AIDS Bhedbhav Virodhi Andolan (ABVA) 669 1426-1427
AIDS Coalition to Unleash Power See ACT UP (AIDS Coalition to Unleash Power)
AIDS Committee of Toronto 207
AIDS Demo Graphics (Crimp and Rolston) 622
AIDS-Hilfe Schweiz 712
AIDS in the Barrio (film) 1297
AIDS in the World (Mann) 719
AIDS Memorial Quilt—The NAMES Project 4 40-44 41 682 1107
The AIDS Show: Artists Involved with Death and Survival (film) 683
The AIDS Show (play) 1576
AIDS Treatment News 739
AIDSNow (magazine) 1297
Aïnouz, Karim 983
AJAAS (Association for Jotería Arts, Activism, and Scholarship) 863 865
Ajamu X 74 105 1235
Ajen, Nii 613
‘Ajib wa gharib (Ibn Daniyal) 750
Aken'ova, Dorothy 537
Al-Akharun (2006; Seba al-Herz) 44-48 45
Akinola, Peter 322
Akufo-Addo, Nana Addo Dankwa 614
Al-Fitrah Foundation/The Inner Circle 1367
Alam, Faisal 831
Albania
   pride events 1283
   sworn virgins 887

Alberti, Fay Bound 673

Alberton, Paulo 336

Albion, California, lesbian community 937

Album distribution companies 945

Albuquerque, Severino J. 1578 1579

Alcaraz, José Antonio 1223

Alcibiades (Athenian general) 1406

Aldeguer, Tomás v. Spain (European Court of Human Rights; 2016) 796

Aldrich, Robert 1503 1575

Alejandro, Ana de 940

Alekseyev v. Russia (European Court of Human Rights; 2010) 763 797

Alexander, Lewis Grandison 642-643

Alexander, M. Jacqui 972-973 1440

Alexander, Olly 1259

Alexandria Books 483

Alexandria . . . Why? (Chahine) 847 847-851 848

Alexeyev, Nikolay 1279

Alf layla wa layla (Middle Eastern story collection) See A Thousand and One Nights (Middle Eastern story collection)

ALGA (Australian Lesbian and Gay Archives) 102 168 1101

Algeria
   queer European travelers to 1046
   terminology for nonnormative sexualities 1320

ALI See American Law Institute (ALI)
Ali, Amadou 1360
Ali, Osman 992
ʿAli Shar/Nur ed-Din (fictional character) 1206-1207 1210
Aliaga, Juan Vicente 1225
Alianza Trans Chile (Trans Alliance Chile) 1449
ALITT (Asociación de Lucha por la Identidad Travesti y Transexual) 120-121
All-Africa Rights Initiative 35
“All-American Boy” (song) 1259
All-sexuals, as term 1650

All That False Instruction (Higgs), 175

All the Women Are White, All the Blacks Are Men, but Some of Us Are Brave: Black Women’s Studies (Hull, Bell Scott, and Smith) 393

Allan, Maud 1661
Allatini, Rose 1504
Allen, Chloe 1068
Allen, Grant 30
Allen, Jafari Sinclaire 1445
Allen, Paula Gunn 456 1583
Allende, Salvador 1225 1275
Allison, Dorothy 252 1331
Alloula, Malek 509
Allums, Kye 158 664
Alma-Tadema, Lawrence 32
Almaguer, Tomás 864
Almeida, Miguel Vale de 626
Almeida, Pedro Miguel de 1508
Almodóvar, Pedro 684 1699
Alqaisiya, Walaa 49
alQaws 48-51 585-586 832-833
Alter, Levi (rabbi) 575 577
Alteration of Sex Description and Sex Status Act (2003) (South Africa) 1616
Alternative and complementary medicine 1026-1030
Alternative Côte d’Ivoire 424
Alternatives-Cameroun 289
Altman, Dennis
  gay liberation critique 1705 global gays hypothesis 871 1282
  queer theory views 1330
  sex tourism 1453
  themes and works 169 171-173 174 871
  Vietnam War-era US 1702
Alva, Bartolomé de 409-410 413
Álvares, Frutuoso 284
Álvarez, Arturo 1225
Álvarez, José ("Pepe") 1226 1297
Álvarez, Marta 772
Alvarez, Raphael 1224
Amachicken relationships 1505
Amadiume, Ifi 535 594 1016 1017
Amador, Víctor Manuel 917
Amankotshane, as term 1503
Amaranto (organization) 314
Amarranavajas (performance art show) 1227
Amateurs, as term 895
Ama[t]shikini, as term 1336
Amazing Grace (Guttman) 272
Amazon Quarterly (periodical) 488
“Amazon” (song) 945
Ambiguous Adventure (Kane) 965
Ambiguously Yours: Gender in Hong Kong Popular Culture (exhibition) 1747
Ambrosiaster 1354
Amer, Ghada 51-55 53 54
Amer, Sahar 584-585 1753-1754
America, the Beautiful (Bustamante) 655
American Academy of Pediatrics 1217
American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) 450 892 1517
American Foundation for AIDS Research (amfAR) 680
American Heritage Girls (AHG) 1418
American Indian Gays and Lesbians 1671 1672
American Law Institute (ALI) 884 1514
American Psychiatric Association (APA) 452-457 1027 1470
American Veterans for Equal Rights 1709
Amigas Latina (Latina Friends) 1042
Amigos de las Mujeres de Ciudad Juárez 603
Amin, Elwi 659
Amini, Amin 1624
Amini, Faramarz 1626
Amirani, Amir 1626

Amistad funesta (Martí) 554 1656

Amman, Jordan, as gay tourism destination 1647-1648

Amnesty International
- advocacy for LGBTQI refugees 1348 1349
- archival records 111
- Chimalalanga, Tiwonge case 1614
- gatekeeper role 763
- Latin American feminicide 600
- Queen Boat Trials 1308 1309

AMNLAE (Asociación de Mujeres Nicaragüenses Luisa Amanda Espinoza) 1149

Amory, Deborah P. 906 908

Amory, Richard 1304

Amos, James 1062

L’amour aux colonies (Jacobus X) 815 1428-1429

Amparos, in Mexico 1003

Amrad relationships 1491-1492 1492 1625 1634 1639

Amradnuma, as term 1492

AMSHeR (African Men for Sexual Health and Rights) 36 37 692

Amsterdam, Netherlands
- LGBTQ-friendly climate 1048 1052
- photography practices 1233 1235

Anā hiya anti (Mansour) 55-59 55

Anabitarte, Héctor 570-572 768

“Anaconda” (song) 1259

“Anactoria” (poem) 1410

Anahita (film) 1627

Anamù Theatre Group 283
Anatrella, Tony 70

Ancestral wives 1016

Ancient civilizations cultural references to the penis 1213
  erotic images 1260-1262 1261
See also specific civilizations

And Still We Rise (film) 334

And the Band Played On (Shilts) 678

And Yet They Move (play) 1223

Andean Triangle 772

Anders als die Andern (film) 400 1123

Anderson, Benedict 1040

Anderson, Paul 1520-1521

Anderson, Robert 1574

Anezi, Ali Ali ʿAjil Naji al- 1666

Ang Pagdadalaga ni Maximo Oliveros (2005) 188 189

Ang Tatay kong Nanay (Nadres) 189

Angel Haze (pop artist) 1259 1260

Angels (affinity group) 1348

Angels in America: A Gay Fantasia on National Themes (play) 1576 1577

Anglican Church in North America 1360

Anglican Communion
  Hong Kong 1714
  ordination of LGBTQI people 1359-1360
  self-affirming LGBTQ movement 1357 1360 1361

Angola
  asylum seeking 1343
  third sex/gender categories 1508
  trans issues 1615
Angounou, Ebale 287

“Angry Atthis” (song) 944-945

Animacies: Biopolitics, Racial Mattering, and Queer Affect (Chen) 1330

Animal epithets 916-917

Animal studies, intersectionality with queer theory 1329-1330

Anime and manga
  otaku sexualities and 1177-1181
  pornography and erotica in 1266 1272
See also Boys Love (yaoi) manga

Anitafríka, D’bi Young 974

Anna Blaman Huis 106

Annes, Alexis 1396

Annual Reminder event 1550

Anohní (musician) 1256 1259-1260

Añonma, Genoveva 1544

Another Love (Galgóczi) 493

Another Way (film) 492-495

Ansáí, Khwāja ‘Abdollāh 1559

Anselm of Canterbury 1262

Antes que anochezca (Arenas) 59-61 59 382-383

Anthony, Adelina 865

Anthropology criminal, in Brazil 243-247 integration with sexual science 1467 1471 interest in rituals 1383-1387 need for collaboration with queer theory 1330 third gender characterizations 1581-1582

Anthropology in Africa south of the Sahara 61-69
  African anthropologists and researchers 67-68 anthropological literature 66-67
archival research 92
ethnographies of contemporary struggle 65-66
ethnopornography 509
ethnopsychiatry 510-514 512-513
flexible gender systems 594-598
historical perspectives 61-62 612-613 minimizing same-sex relationships 64-65 same-sex relationships defined 63-64 63 388

Anti-gender movement in Europe 69-71 373-374 524-525

Anti-Homosexuality Act (2014) (Uganda) 1343 1618 1683-1684 1685

Anti-racist activism in Europe 71-75 72 623-625

Anti-Semitism and Zionism 75-79

Anti-Semitism in Europe 71 75-79 80-83

Antigua and Barbuda
  criminalization of homosexuality 1500
  travesti and trans activism 1652 1656

Antiretroviral therapies (ARTs) access to 721-723 724 742
  AZT cost 4 5 effectiveness of 740-741
  introduction of 685
See also HAART (highly active antiretroviral therapy)

Antisodomy and buggery trials 83-91
  Africa 260 613
  Australasia 171
  early religious definitions 83-84
  Europe 84-87 85 236-237
  European colonies 87-89 110 810-811 814-816
  Latin America 280-281 284-285
  legal records 95-97
  North America 295-299
See also Criminalization of homosexuality Sodomy laws

Antoinette, Michelle 130

Antonios, Seyoum 1153
Antoniou, Laura 216
Antony (musician) 1256
Anusocratie, as term 1737 1738
Anwar Ibrahim 1423
Anzaldúa, Gloria 397 517 863 1327
APA See American Psychiatric Association (APA) Asociación Psicoanalítica Argentina (APA)

Apartheid
  historical background 1524-1526
  Nkoli, Simon activism 1156-1157
  policing of gender 1616
  South African queer literature exploration of 958

Apata, Aderonke 1351
APCOM (Asia Pacific Coalition on Male Sexual Health) 142-143
APNSW (Asia Pacific Network of Sex Workers) 1460
APOGLBT (Associação da Parada do Orgulho LGBT de São Paulo) 1197 1198
Apostles of Civilised Vice (film) 336
The Apparitional Lesbian (Castle) 1326
Apps See Phone apps
APQ (AsiaPaciQueer) 1330
April Ashley: Portrait of a Lady (exhibit) 1105
APTN (Asia Pacific Transgender Network) 142-148 144
Apuzzo, Virginia 644
Aqaee, Farkhondeh 1638
Aqi third-gender role 1584
‘Aqqad, ‘Abbas Mah·m_od al- 746
Aquellarre Trans (Trans Coven) 1652
Aquelarre (Witches’ Sabbath) 931
Aquino, Eloisa 1701
Arab Convention on Regulating Status of Refugees in the Arab Countries (1994) 1343
Arabesque (film) 1174 1175
Arabian Nights (Middle Eastern story collection) See A Thousand and One Nights (Middle Eastern story collection)

Arabic language
  Bekhsoos use of 1032
  maghreb term 985-990
  queer identities and 1317-1321
See also Middle East

Arabish, as term 927

Arac de Nyeko, Monica 339
Arastoo, Saman 1627
Araújo Neto, Agenor de Miranda (Cazuza) 1257
Arauz, Rita 312
Arboleda, Manuel 1079
Arbuthnot, F. F. 1596
Arc-En-Ciel Plus 424
Arcadie 198 574 1552
Arcadie (journal) 574

Architecture, queer domesticity and 1313-1314

The Archival Turn in Feminism (Eichhorn) 117
An Archive of Feelings (Cvetkovic) 117

Archives in Africa 91-95 cinema as 333-338 339
  queer theory 1334
  trans issues 1618-1619
Archives in Asia 96-101

Archives in Australia and New Zealand 102-103

Archives in Europe 103-106

Archives in Latin America 106-112

Archives in North America 113-118

The Body Politic 107 114 239-240
Lesbian Herstory Archives 932-934 933
lesbian music movement 943
Ramos Otero, Manuel 1297

Archivo Edgard Leuenroth 107

Archivo General de la Nación (Mexico) 108

Arcigay (Associazone LGBTI Italiana) 713

Arco Iris (collective) 937

Ardant, Fanny 989

Are You Addicted (Jidan) 1145

Arenas, Reinaldo

Antes que anochezca 59-61 59 351 382-383 432 persecution 436 suicide of 1248-1249

Aretino, Pietro 1263

Argentina
activist organizations 770
archival records 106
cinema 348 349 350 355-356 355
constitutional reforms 1139
decriminalization of homosexuality 1500
decriminalization of transvestism 1140 dictatorship 1224 1252 1253 1288 1289-1290
fin de siècle sexuality 551-552
Frente de Liberación Homosexual 570-573 768
full citizenship for gender and sexual minorities 1347 gender identity law 118-123 119 720
HIV/AIDS 717 719-720
identification document changes for trans people 1141
Jewish population 1373
language 362
lesbian mothering and adoption in 938-940 941-942
LGBTQ rights movement 939-940 1290 1500 1553
neoliberal economic policy effects 1139 1140
online activism 465-466
performance artists in 1223 1224 1225-1226
pornoterrorismo and post-porn 1274 1275 1276 1277 psychoanalysis in 119-120 570 1287-1291
queer slang 914
rural queer communities 1399
same-sex marriage 1002 1003 1140 1290 1450
same-sex partnerships 1002
sex workers 1449
Stonewall Riots impact 1554
transgender organizations 1651
travesti and trans activism 1651 1654
urban queerness 1691
visibility of LGBTQ athletes 1542

Argentina's gender identity law (2012) 118-123 119 1225 1290 1651 1655

Argots 895-900 See also Language

Argüello, Leonel 1149

Ariel (Rodó) 554

Arisa party 1454

Armed Forces Legal Challenge Group 1068

Armed Forces Lesbian and Gay Association (AFLaGA) 1068

Armenia hatred of LGBT people 1055
    restrictions on same-sex marriage 1012

Armisen, Mariam 1136

Armstrong, Toni, Jr. 946

Army Rumour Service (ARRSE) 1069

Arnold, Thomas W. 1181

Arondekar, Anjali 97 516 569
Arousi-ye khouban (film) 1022

Arresting Dress (Sears) 116

Arriaga, Camilo 1038

Arriaga-Jordán, Patricia 1521

ARRSE (Army Rumour Service) 1069

Arrufat, Antón 436

Arsenokoitai, as term 1353-1354

ART See Antiretroviral therapies (ARTs) Assisted reproductive technology (ART)

Art

Mongolia 1085
Ottoman and Persian miniature paintings 1181-1186 1183 1185
t travesti and trans activism 1656
See also Moche pottery Performance artists in Latin America specific artists

Art Attack 39

The art of identity in India 123-127 125 128

The art of queering Asian mythology 127-134 myths connected to legends 128-131 129 130 myths naturalizing norms 131-134 131 133
overview 127-128

Arte de la lengua moxa: con su vocabulario, y cathecismo (Marban) 408

Articles of War (1916; US) 1057-1058

Articles of War (1920; US) 1058

Artists Striving to End Poverty (ASTEP) 1134

Arus Pelangi 1367

l'Arxiu Nacional de Catalunya 105

As Is (film) 683

As Is (play) 1576

Asb heyvan-e najibi ast (film) 1637
Asch, Sholem 1375 1574

ASEAN (Association of Southeast Asian Nations) 998

Asexual Visibility and Education Network (AVEN) 134 135-137

Asexuality 134-142
  defining 134-137 135 455
  queer and feminist approaches 139-140 science and 137-139 138 455

Ashbee, Charles Robert 1166 1313

Ashley, April 1105

Ashley, Laith 1260

Ashour, Amir 833

Ashqar, Nidal al- 1664

Ashtime, as term 906-908 1614

Asia
  archives in 96-101
  Asia Pacific Transgender Network (APTN) 142-148 144
  criminalization of homosexuality 997 1471
  family law 527-532 529
  homosexual argots 897-900
  houseboys from 1381
  koro outbreaks 1214
  marriage migration 997-1000
  museum exhibits 1105-1106
  mythology queered 127-134 129 130 131 133 new media in 1142-1147 1143
  phone apps 1143 1144 1145 1146 1229-1230
  pornography and erotica development 1268-1273
  queer European travelers to 1046
  queer migrants to the US 1040 1042
  queer theory approaches to globalization 1330
  rural queer communities 1399 sex reassignment surgery in 1430-1434
  sex workers 1455-1462 1458
  sexology in 1465-1472 1469 stereotypes of masculinity 1214 1266
  as term 1437-1438 1458 1459 1460
See also MSM (men who have sex with men) in Asia Sex tourism in Asia specific countries

Asia Pacific Coalition on Male Sexual Health (APCOM) 142-143

Asia Pacific Network of Sex Workers (APNSW) 142 1460

Asia-Pacific region
  militarism and sexualities in 1054-1057
  pride events 1282
  urban queerness 1691

Asia Pacific Transgender Network (APTN) 142-148 144

Asian Pacific Islander Coalition on HIV/AIDS 1043

Asian/Pacific Lesbians and Gays 1042

AsiapacifiQueer (APQ) 1330

Askey, Brooke 521

Asmaa (film) 705 706-707

Asociación de Lucha por la Identidad Travesti y Transexual (ALITTT) 120-121

Asociación de Mujeres Nicaragüenses Luisa Amanda Espinoza (AMNLAE) 1149

Asociación de Travestis Argentinas (ATA) 720

Asociación de Travestis, Transexuales y Transgéneros de Argentina (ATTTA) 121 462-463 1651

Asociación Psicoanalítica Argentina (APA) 111 1287 1288 1289 1290

Asociación Trans del Uruguay (Trans Association of Uruguay) 1652

The Asphalt Kiss (play) 1575

Asquith, Margot 1661

Asrar ‘ailiyah (film) 148-152

Assaf, Sahar 1664

Assisted reproductive technology (ART)
  Europe 16-19
  North America 1203
Associação Brasileira de Gays, Lésbicas, Bissexuais, Travestis e Transexuais (Brazilian Association of Gays, Lesbians, Bisexuals, Transvestites, and Transsexuals) 629 1651

Associação da Parada do Orgulho LGBT de São Paulo (APOGLBT) 1197 1198

Associação das Travestis e Transexuais do Estado do RJ 628-629

Associação Gay Cabo-Verdeana Contra a Discriminação 286

Association des Médecins Gais (AGM) 710

Association for Bisexuals, Gays, and Lesbians (ABIGALE) 694

Association for Jotería Arts, Activism, and Scholarship (AJAAS) 863 865

Association for Progressive Communications (APC) 463

Association for Social Knowledge 296 297 1025

Association of Bisexuals, Gays and Lesbians (ABIGALE) 694 1334

Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN) 998

L’Association pour la Défense des Droits des Homosexuels (ADEFHO) 289

Associazione Nazionale per la Lotta contro l’AIDS (ANLAIDS) 713

Assuming a Body (Salamon) 1329

ASTEP (Artists Striving to End Poverty) 1134

Astraea Lesbian Foundation for Justice 111 153 613

Aswany, Alaa al- 151 805-809 806 1754

Aswat 152-156 153 583 831-832

Asylum seeking
  - Africa 1342-1346 1344
  - Europe 1047-1051 1052
  - queer migrants to the US 1043

At Odds with AIDS: Thinking and Talking about a Virus (Dülttmann) 711

Atash bas (film) 1638

Atatürk, Mustafa Kemal 1668
‘Atayi, Nev‘izade 1185
Ateba Eyene, Charles 289

O Ateneu (The Athenaeum) (Pompeia) 245

Atherton, John 84

Athletes, trans and intersex 156-159 157
Africa 158 1542-1546
Australasia 175
US colleges 664
See also Sports and sexuality in Latin America Sports, women in, Africa

Athletes, trans and intersex, in Asia 159-165
activism 163-164 female birth assignment 161-162 161 male birth assignment 162-163 163 sex segregation in international sports 160-161
Thailand 157

Athletic Model Guild 1264

Atirattana, Apichet (*"Madaew") 482

Atkins, John 1590

Atlanta Lesbian Feminist Alliance 116

‘Attā, Farid al-Din 1559 1560

Atta Mills, John 612 612

Attorney General, Jjuuko, Adrian v. (Uganda; 2007) 1684

Attorney General, Victor Mukasa and Yvonne Oyoo v. (Uganda; 2008) 1684

ATTTA (Asociación de Travestis, Transexuales y Transgéneros de Argentina) 1651

Au, Alex 472

Auden, W. H. 306 1046

Auerbach, David M. 678

Die Aufklärung (journal) 826

Augiéras, François 986
August 28th Gay Day Committee 1720 1721

Augustin-Billy, Andia 979

Aujoulat, Louis-Paul 1736

Auntie Victoria 1614 1616

Aurélia, Dominique 977

Australia and New Zealand 165-177
  African refugees in 1344
  AIDS epidemic response 171
  archival records 102-103
  British colonial sodomy laws 1163
  circumcision 1217 1218
  cultural changes 174-175
  decriminalization of homosexuality 167-170 1163 1421
  diffusion of gay liberation 1705 1706
  early Kamp culture 167-169 fracture and reaction from Right 170-171 gay liberation emergence 169-170
  homophobic behaviorist therapy 1169
  increased visibility 171-174 173 174
  Jewish population 1373
  LGBT military service 1055 1056 1703
  marriage migration 999
  overview 165-167
  Pacific Islands colonization 1189
  persecution of homosexuals 924
  phone apps 1229
  pride events 1281 1282 1553 1553
  queer theory approaches to globalization 1330
  Radical Faerie movement 1384-1385
  refugees and immigration policies 1350 1351
  removal of LGBT military service ban 1055
  repeal of antisodomy laws 1055
  rural queer communities 1397
  Section 377 legacies 1420
  Stonewall Riots impact 1553
  subincision practices 1219
  theater, queer 1577-1578 1579
  trans and intersex rights 175-176 175
  Vietnam War–era masculinity and feminity expression 1702-1703
  Vietnam War veterans 1708-1710
Australia, Toonen v. (United Nations Human Rights Committee; 1994) 167 1421

Australian Human Rights Commission 176

Australian Lesbian and Gay Archives (ALGA) 102 168 1101

Austria

Jewish same-sex behaviors 1371
memorial for Nazis' gay victims 1242
same-sex marriage 1008 1011

Austria, Karner v. (European Court of Human Rights; 2003) 18 796 1011

Austria, P. B. and J. S. v. (European Court of Human Rights; 2010) 795

Austria, Schalk and Kopf v. (European Court of Human Rights; 2010) 794-795 794 796 1011

Austria, X v. (European Court of Human Rights; 2013) 796

Las Auténticas Intrépidas Buscadoras del Peligro (organization) 1111-1112

“The Author of Beltraffio” (James) 34

“Automating Gender” (essay) 1329

Autonomous woman-woman marriage, in Africa 1015

Avellaneda, Raúl 1226

AVEN (Asexual Visibility and Education Network) 134 135-137

Avendaño, Lukas 1227

L'aventure ambiguë (Kane) 965

Aventurera (film) 349

Aversa, Pierro 1382

Aversion Project 1616

Avery, Gwen 946

Les aveux de la chair (Foucault) 569

Avicolli Mecca, Tommi 485
Avril, Paul 1173-1174
Awad, Nadia 1175
The Awakening (Ganesh) 130-131 130
‘Awdat al-Almani ilā rushdih (al-Daif) 177-181 178
Awekotuku, Ngahuia Te 169
Awondo, Patrick 67 1684
AWP (A Woman's Place) 937
Axgil, Axel 104
Axgil, Eigil 104
¡Ay, María! (play) 1299
Aya (genderqueer Tunisian person) 879-880 880
Ayari, Khalil See Khookha McQueer
Ayari, Ramy 878
Ayāz (slave boy) 1558
Aynehaye rooberoo (film) 1626-1627 1637 1638
Ayurveda 1026 1028
Azande people 63-65 1735
Azarbajani, Negar 1626 1637
Azerbaijan
   LGBT Military Index score 1055
   public morality laws 1368
‘Aziz and ‘Azizah (fictional characters) 1205-1206 1207 1208
AZT (AIDS treatment) 4 5
Aztlán (journal) 863-864
Azuah, Unoma 960 1154
B (pseudonymous organization) 1195

B. v. France (European Court of Human Rights; 1992) 793

Bà, Mariama 966

Baartman, Saartje 904

Bab el hadid (Chahine) 848 849

Babenco, Héctor 571

Baby Dandy (film) 1021

Baca, Judith 620-621

Bacchetta, Paola 484 485

Bacha baazi relationships 1385-1386

Bachcheh-raqqas (transvestite male adolescent dancers) 1635

Bachofer, Johann Jakob 885

Bacigalupo, Ana Mariella 1585

Baczkowski v. Poland (European Court of Human Rights; 2007) 797

Bad Attitude (magazine) 1266

Bad Beti’s (performance) 482

Badaire, Mélanie 398

Badé (two-spirit) 1670 1671

Baden-Powell, Robert 1415 1416 1418

Baehr v. Miike (Hawaii; 1993) 448

Baganda people 1681 1682 1683

Bagemihl, Bruce 228-229

Bagger, Mianne 157
Bagisu people 1682
Bahar, Milad 1627
Bahasa gay (gay language) 897
Bahati, David 322
Bahrami, Sadegh 1624
Baidu Tieba online community 1631
Bailar, Schuyler 158-159 664 1532
El Baile de los 41 (1901) 183-187 184
   coverage of 183 185 1500 1651 number 41 reference 186 1038 positivist approach 552-554
Bailey, Marlon M. 1387 1579
Baird, Eisenstadt v. (US; 1972) 1485
Bakare-Yusuf, Bibi 537
Baker, Jack 448
Baker, Newton D. 1058
Baker, Paul 911
Baker v. Nelson (Minnesota; 1971) 448
Bakhtiar, Behnoosh 1638
Bakla 187-190 188
   art identity 129-130 129
   Asian drag 481
   as term 897 1091
Bakot, Victor Tonyé 287 1360 1737
Bal, Mieke 509
The Balcony (play) 1575
Balderston, Daniel 111
Balduu, Sharav 1085

Baldwin, James 233-234 233 1046 1303

Balkan region
  pride events 1283
  sworn virgins 886-887 887

Balkans-to-Bengal complex 1364

“The Ballad of Reading Gaol” (essay) 31 1727 1728

Ballroom communities
  HIV/AIDS services 739 ritual as performance at 1387

Balsamo, Anne 41-42

Balslev, Sivan 1021 1493 1494

Balter, Michael 228

Baltic Pride events 1280 1281

The Baltimore Waltz (play) 1576

Baltrop, Alvin 618

Balzac, Honoré de 1217

Bama jiong hen da (television series) 1748

Bambara, Toni Cade 140 392

Ban Ki-moon 759 1349 1614

Bañales, Xamuel 863

Banana, Canaan 1421 1422 1752

Banana v. State (Zimbabwe; 2000) 1421 1422

Bananot (film) 1377

Banat al-‘ishreh 636-637 1320

Banda de Ipanema (street celebration) 303 304
Banda, Hastings Kamuzu 698-699

Banda, Joyce 700 904

Bandi shuumriin yos, as term 1085

Bangladesh
   asylum seeking 1349
   HIV/AIDS 728 731
   legal recognition of third gender category 1471 1585
   LGBT Military Index score 1055
   men who have sex with men 1092 1130
   pornography and erotica development 1270
   Roopbaan magazine 1390-1392
   Section 377 legacies 1420 1424-1428 1471
   third sex/gender categories 1629

Bank, Klaas 1524

Banks, Azealia 1259

Banks, William D. 93

Bannon, Ann 1265 1303

Banyoro people 1682

Bao, Hongwei 376

Le baobab fou (Bugul) 966

Baptista, Juan 409 413-414

Bara manga 1272

Baraka, Amiri 1577

Barakat, Hoda 476-477 631-635

Baran (film) 1625

O barão de Livos (Botelho) 245

Barazoku (magazine) 1270

Barbados
   criminalization of homosexuality 1500
   sex tourism 1446
travesti and trans activism 1652

Barbara (Côte d'Ivoire trans woman) 1616

Barbin, Herculine 190-191 568 674

Barcellos, Lisset 1220

Barcelos, Ciro 1224

Barebacking 2-3 1387

Bareed Mista3jil: True Stories (Meem) 154 192-195 1032

Barinthia, as term 1319

Barker, Meg-John 455

Barlow, Sean 38

Barnes, Robert 369

Barr, Bob 447 447

Barr, James 1304

Barra (Helem) 832

The Barracks 204

Barragán, Jesús 587-588 589

Barrett, Rusty 901

Barriault, Marcel 894

Barrington, John 1264

Barros, Marcelo Campos 1199

Bars and cabarets in Europe 196-199 197

Benga, François 218-220 218

leather bars 211-212

Bars, working-class, in Mexico 199-202 200

Barthé, Richmond 219
Barthes, Roland 127-128 521 986 988 1217
Bartlett, Neil 1574 1576 1577
Bartolo Marcial, Elí Valentín 1109
Barton, Bernadette 1397
Barzakhiha (film) 1020
Barzanji, as term 1319
Basil of Caesarea 1355
Basile, Vic 782
Basquiat, Jean-Michel 619 620 977
Bass, Nathaniel 1589-1590 1591
Bassam, Sulayman Al 1664
Bastard Out of Carolina (Allison) 252
Bathhouse Raids, Toronto (2000) 431
Báthory, Erzbeth 1249 1250
Bathrooms access as human right issue 765
   graffiti 622
   Southern Comfort Conference recommendations 1533 Baths
   Ottoman and Persian miniature paintings 1185
   Turkish baths 1667-1669 1668
Baudelaire, Charles 28 30 1410
Baudinette, Thomas 1180 1272
Baudry, André 574 1552
Bauer, Heike 1466
Baumgardt, Manfred 104
Bawa, Geoffrey 1106
Bawer, Bruce 253
Bay Area Gay Liberation 312
Bayartogtokh, Batregzedmaa 1085
Bayev v. Russia (European Court of Human Rights; 2017) 763 797
Bayly, Jaime 351 354
Bayrūt ’75 (al-Samman) 207-210
Bazán, Osvaldo 1315
BC Gay and Lesbian Archives 114
“B.D. Woman’s Blues” (song) 641
BDS movement 1032
BDSM (bondage and discipline, dominance and submission, sadism and masochism) 210-218 definitions and legal concerns 210-211 edge play and issues 214-215 feminism and 214
  fetishism 212
  Folsom Street Fair 1283
  history of 211-212
  houseboys at resorts 1380
  impact on public perceptions 1476
  Japanese practices 215-216 215
  Operation Spanner case 1164 organizations and events 212-214 213 popularization 216
  as ritual 1387-1388
  sex aids for 1171
  Tom of Finland art 1602

Be Like Others (film) 530 1626 1637

Beach boys
  Africa 1463
  Barbados 1446
  Mexico 1447-1448
Bear Arabia tour 1453 1645
Bearchell, Christine ("Chris") 205 242
Beardsley, Aubrey 26 32-33 33 1728
Beasts of No Nation (film) 340-341
The Beatles 1254 1255 1485
Beaulieu, Lord Montagu 1740
Beaumont Society 426
Beautiful Boxer (film) 157 163 872 Beauty pageants
kathoey 870 872
Pacific Islands 1190 1190
travesti and trans activism 286 1656
Bebel, August 400
Bébout, Rick 1723
Bechdel, Alison 251 252-253
Beck, Copp and Bazeley v. United Kingdom (European Court of Human Rights; 2003) 797
Becker, Gary 1140
Beckett, John 1068
Beckett, Samuel 986
Becoming Visible: An Illustrated History of Lesbian and Gay Life in Twentieth-Century America 116
The Beebo Brinker Chronicles (play) 1303
Beebo Brinker pulp fiction series 1303
Beechtree (collective) 937
Beeman, William O. 1094
Beeston, A. F. L. 1094
Before Night Falls (Arenas) 59-61 59 382-383
Before Night Falls (film) 61
Before the Birth of the Moon (Mudimbe) 965
Bégéja, Liria 989
Beggs, Mack 159
Behbahani (ayatollah of Iran) 1436-1437
Behind the Mask 35 94
Beijing Gender Health Education Institute 1607
Beijing LGBT Centre 419-420 419
Beijing Story (internet-based novel) 1145
O beijo no asfalto (play) 1223 1575
Beirut Beirut (Ibrahim) 1488
Beirut Boy (blog) 834
Beirut, Lebanon
blog 834
as gay tourism destination 1645 1647-1648
Tuqus al-isharat wa-al-tahawwulat production 1664 1665
urban queerness 1692
Bejel, Emilio 434
Bekhsoos (online magazine) 192 1032
Le bel immonde (Mudimbe) 965
BelAmi Studio 1266
Belarus
discrimination against LGBTQ people 1374
restrictions on same-sex marriage 1012
Belcher, Wendy Laura 506
Belgium
African refugees in 1344
collection of LGBTQ refugee statistics 1049
LGBTQ military service 1069
pride events 1279
refugees and immigration policies 1349
same-sex partnerships 1008

Belgrade Pride, ban of 1280

Belk, Russell W. 1284

Bell, Cei 485

Bell, David 1396 1397

Bellamy, Chyrell D. 1578

Belle Reprieve (drag show) 1579

Bemberg, María Luisa 1521-1522

Ben Jelloun, Tahar 985-986 989

Ben, Lisa 943

Benedict of Nursia 1355

Benedicto, Bobby 1091

Benemann, William 1503

Benga, François ("Féral") 218-220 218

Benin, woman-woman marriage 1014 1015

Benjamin, Harry
  archival records 115
  Hirschfeld, Magnus influence on 1235 1642
  Sex Orientation Scale 884
  situational homosexuality 1505 transsexuality concept 1640 1642 1643 transsexuals and transvestites 358 405 425-426 454

Benjamin, Jessica 214

Benjamin Standards of Care 1643

Benjamin, Walter 1695
Bennett, Edward 1589
Bennett, Gwendolyn 642-643
Bennett, Jane 535
Bennett, Richard 1589 1591
Bennholdt-Thomsen, Veronika 1108-1109
Benson, Mary ("Minnie") 1414
Bent (play) 1576
Bentham, Jeremy 365 1161
Bentley, Gladys 641 943
Berdaches
criticism of term 1672
Great Plains 1395
misuse of term 1582
Pacific Islands 1189
South America 1584
See also Two-spirit
Beresford, Stephen 1398
Berfelde, Lothar See von Mahlsdorf, Charlotte
Bergk, Theodor 1410
Bergler, Edmund 1467
Bergman, David 290
Bergman, Ingmar 1481
Beria, Lavrentiy 87
Berkes, Niyazi 950
Berkins, Lohana 120 122 1655
Berkman, Pieter 88
Berkowitz, Richard 735 1476
Berlin, Germany
lesbian music movement 943
LGBTQ-friendly climate 1046 1048 1052
Schwules Museum* 1101 1102 1103
urban queerness 1688 1712

Berman, Kim 954-955
Berman, Steve 253
Bernard of Clairvaux 1357
Bernaza, Luis Felipe 916
Bernstein, Eduard 1732
Bernstein, Leonard 1375
Bernstein, Mary 1513
Berridge, Virginia 710
Bersani, Leo 680 1170
Berson, Ginny 945
Bérubé, Allan 115 374 1505
Besnier, Niko 901

El beso de la mujer araña (Babenco) 220-222 220
Beth Chayim Chadashim 1374-1375
Bethe, Erich 366
Beti, Mongo 965-966
Beti people 1736
Bettcher, Talia M. 1621

Better Angel (Meeker) 1304
Better Than Chocolate (1999) 252
Beurs, as term 1266
Beuys, Joseph 1223

Bevándorlási és Menekültügyi Hivatal, F. v. (Court of Justice of the European Union; 2016) 1050

Beyala, Calixthe 965 966 967 968-969 970

Beyer, Georgina 175-176 175

Beyond Brokeback: The Impact of a Film (anthology) 1398

Beyond Carnival: Male Homosexuality in Twentieth-Century Brazil (Green) 109 304

Beyond Flesh: Queer Masculinities and Nationalism in Israeli Cinema (Yosef) 498

BFI Flare 546-547

Bhabha, Homi K. 1021

Bharosa Trust 1130

Bhatt Bapoji, Government v. (India; 1884) 1425

Bhupen Khakhar: You Can't Please All (exhibit) 1105

Bhutan 222-224 223 1420 1424-1428

Bhuwakul, Kunpimook (“BamBam”) 1572

Bi khoss, as term 1032

Bianxingren, as term 1432

Biblical Witness Fellowship 1359

Bicycle Thieves (film) 1322

Biden, Joseph 647

Biella, Peter 1297

Bier, Max 1710

Big Ass She-Male Road Trip (film series) 1266

Big men, in Africa 1736-1737 1738

Bijli (drag performer) 480-481
Billing, Noel Pemberton 1661
Bin tai, as term 1714-1715
Binet, Alfred 425
Bingham, Sallie 116
Binghao, Wong 1105
The Bingonovel (Ramos Otero) 1297
Bint el nas (journal) 625
Bio-power, as term 1738
Bio queening 1259
Biography (film) 1638
Biological essentialism 224-230
Biological Exuberance (Bagemihl) 228-229
Biomyth monodramas 974
Biomythography, as term 974
Birch, Elizabeth 782-783 783
Biren, Joan E. 946
Birth control
  Communist Europe 1481 impact on sexual revolution 1483 1484 1485
  India 1466-1467 1469 1470
Bisexuality
  asylum seeking 1343
  Namibia 1115-1116
  Pakistan 1196
  popular music and 1256
  rak-sorng-phet term 900
Bishonen (beautiful boy) 1748
Bison (play) 1578
Bissu, as term 1431 1628 1717-1718

“Bitch I’m Posh” (song) 1259

_Bitter Eden_ (Afrika) 959

Biya, Paul 1737

BL See _Boys Love (yaoi) manga_

Black Book (Germany) 1661

_Black Bull, Ancestors and Me: My Life as a Lesbian Sangoma_ (Nkabinde) 962

Black Butterflies 768

_The Black Christ, and Other Poems_ (Cullen) 642

Black Cracker (pop artist) 1260

Black feminism

  queer theory influenced by 1327 1329

  transfeminism connections 1621 1622

Black Freedom Movement and sexuality 230-235 231 233

  anti-racist activism in Europe 71-75 72

  Combahee River Collective 390-394 392

  Harlem Renaissance 638-643 639 641

Black LGBT Archive 1235

Black Lives Matter 235 393-394

_Black on Both Sides: A Racial History of Trans Identity_ (Snorton) 1329

Black Panther Party 1296

Black people

  museum exhibits 1105

  photographic portrayals, in Europe 1235

  sex tourism involvement 1444-1445 1446

See also _African American people_

Black Power movement 1704

Black queer studies 972

_Black Queer Studies: A Critical Anthology_ (Johnson and Henderson, eds.) 972
Black Skin, White Masks (Fanon) 512

The Black Woman (Bambara) 392

Black Youth Project 100 235

Blackmail 236-239 237
  in Europe 1413-1414 1661-1662 vulnerability to 1662 1663

Blackmun, Harry 88

Blackshirts (Italy) 1124

Blackstone, Elliott 404 405

Blackwell, Maylei 1569

Blackwomon, Julie 485

Blackwood, Evelyn 1582

Blair, Carole 43

Blair, Tony 1752

Blanchard, Ray 228

Blanco, Mykki 1259 1260

Blank, Klaas 299

Blanket Boy's Moon (Lanham and Mopeli-Paulus) 953

Blas, Zach 1329

Blasted (play) 1577

Blatter, Sepp 1543

Blessed Assurance (Hughes) 642

Blessol, Gathoni 1360-1361

Bleys, Rudi C. 1614
Blignaut, Charl 1529
Blitz Trans event (2004) 1691
Bloco das Coca-Cola 304
Blocos afro 305
Blok, Diana 1234 1235

Blood: Biya’s Power Lotion (Angounou) 287
Blookips (drag group) 1579
Blue Card (European Union) 1048
Blue Diamond Society 729 1563
Blue military discharges 1059 1689
Blue, Violet 1475

Blued (phone app)
  as part of new media 1143 1144
  as part of pink economy 1606
  PFLAG chat group 1607 pornography development and 1267
  size of 1229

Blues music lesbian performers 943 queer identities in 1255

Blüher, Hans 1123
Blunt, Anthony 237 237
Boag, Peter 1503

Board of Education of Montgomery County, Acanfora v. (1973) 375-376
Bobadilla, Rosa 1036
Bobos (bourgeois bohemians) 1729 1730
Bocahut, Laurent 344-346 423 1616
Bochow, Michael 711
Bodies That Matter (Butler) 1328

Body 2 Body: A Malaysian Queer Anthology (Kugan and Pang, eds.) 990-991

The Body Politic (newspaper) 239-243
archival records 107 114 239-240
HIV/AIDS coverage 1476
influence of 169 204
“We Demand” protest connection 240 1720 1721

Boellstorff, Tom
  dubbing concept 1091
  MSM identities 668
  queer language 897 915
  queer theory 1330
  transgender Muslims 1628

Boes, Maria R. 86

Bogaert, Anthony F. 137-138 139 228

Bogan, Lucille 641

Bohemian Night (album) 1699

Bojórquez, Josefina 1036 1037

Bokoum, Saïdou 965

Bolaños, Lucy 283

Boleros (song type) 1698 1699 1700

Bolivia
  constitutional reforms 1139
  identification document changes for trans people 1141
  lesbian activism 462
  performance artists in 1228
  sex workers 1449
  travesti and trans activism 1652

Bom-Crioulo (Caminha) 243-247 244 554 1316 1509-1510

Bonaparte, Marie 510 674-675

Bond friendships
  Africa 1015-1016
Japan 1467

Bond, Johanna 66-67

Bondage and discipline, dominance and submission, sadism and masochism See BDSM (bondage and discipline, dominance and submission, sadism and masochism)

BONELA (Botswana Network on Ethics, Law, and HIV/AIDS) 260

Bong, Sharon 990

Bongers, Wolfgang 348

Bongmba, Elias Kifon 1680

Bonner, Gay Student Organization of the University of New Hampshire v. (376 F. Supp. 1088; 1974) 891

Book Fair saga (1995) (Zimbabwe) 1752

Book of Gomorrah (Damian) 1355

The Book of the Thousand Nights and a Night (Burton, tr.) 1264 1592 1593

The Book of the Thousand Nights and One Night (Payne, tr.) 1592

Bookshop Darlinghurst 248

Bookstores 247-254
evolution and digital age 252-253 functions and legal challenges 247-249 history 249-252 252t

Boom Boom Room (drag cabaret venue) 1578

Boone, Joseph A.
Orientalism 1173
sex tourism 1452 1454 1464
tourism 988

Boonyapisomparn, Sitthiphan (Hua) 143 146

Booth, Mark 291

Boots of Leather, Slippers of Gold (Kennedy and Davis) 1546-1547

Borderlands/La Frontera: The New Mestiza (Anzaldúa) 863 1327
Borges, Miguela 937

Born This Way (film) 289 334 343 346

Bornstein, Kate 367

Borren, Sylvia 929

Borruso, Marinella Miano 1109

Bosche, Susanne 252

Boston Area Lesbian and Gay History Project 115

Boston marriage and women’s romantic friendships 254-259
imperialism and colonialism 814-816
passing women 539-540

The Bostonians (James) 254

Boswell, John 366 567 948 1357

Botelho, Abel 245

Botero, Veronica 939

Both (film) 1220

Botha, Martin P. 333 335 340

Botre, Shrikant 1470

Botswana 259-262
HIV/AIDS activism 9 12
LGBTQI activism 260-262 1335
Section 377 legacies 1420 1421-1422
trans issues 1615 1617

Botswana Network on Ethics, Law, and HIV/AIDS (BONELA) 260

Bouajila, Sami 989

Boudour (film character) 1205 1206 1208

Bound to Violence (Ouologuem) 964-965 966-967

Bouraoui, Nina 988
Bourdet, Édouard 1574

Bourdieu, Pierre 1538

Bourget, Paul 30-31

Bousiou, Pola 1382

Bousselmi, Ali 878

_Boutilier v. Immigration and Naturalization Service_ (US; 1967) 1040

Bouzid, Nouri 1464

_Bowers v. Hardwick_ (US; 1986) activism spurred by 2 995
overturning of 88 892
as setback in decriminalization efforts 1514-1516 1517

Bowie, David 1256

Bowles, Jane 986 987

Bowles, Paul 986 987 1454

Boy Scouts See _Scouting_

Boy Scouts of America (BSA) 1415-1417

_Boy Scouts of America v. James Dale_ (US; 2000) 1416 1417

Boy-wives 842-843 See also _Mine marriages_

_Boy Wives/Female Husbands_ (Murray and Roscoe) 93

Boyarin, Daniel 76 498

Boyat, as term 1319 1320

Boyce, Paul 1398 1471 1562 1563

Boyd, Danah 377

Boyd, Helen 361

_The Boys in the Band_ (film) 1376 1485 1485

_The Boys in the Band_ (play) 1223 1575
Boys in the Sand (film) 1265

Boys Love (yaoi) manga 262-268 263 266
  China 265 1729-1730
  otaku sexualities and 1179-1180
  pornography and erotica development 1271 1272

The Boys on the Rock (Fox) 375

A Boy's Own Story (White) 375

Boystown neighborhood, Chicago 1041 1690

Bradford, David 1709 1710

Bradford, Mark 293

Bradley, Katharine 256 888 1410-1412

Brahmacharya (sexual self-constraint) 1470

Brainer, Amy 530

Brand, Adolf 81 373 1167 1264

Brand, Dionne 973 976

Brando, Marlon 1602

Branner, Djola Bernard 1577

Brant, Beth 1673

Brave Confusion (Touré) 38

Bray, Alan 416 1081

Bray, Julia 1094

Brazil
  activist organizations 628-630 768 770 772
  archival records 107
  BRIC/S membership 1459
  cabaret theater 282-283 350
  Christian missionary activity 1356
  cinema 350
  Cold War sexuality 379-383
  constitutional reforms 1139
cruising 430
decriminalization of homosexuality 1500
decroenro of 1985 929
full citizenship for gender and sexual minorities 1347
gender identity 119 122
HIV/AIDS 717 719 721 723 770
Inquisition 1495
Jewish population 1373
LGBTQ rights movement 1197-1199 1198 1500
Madame Satã 981-983
masculinity and sports 1539 1540 murders of trans people 1050-1051
museum exhibits 1106
Olympic Games 1539 1540-1541
performance artists in 1223 1224
phone apps 1229
pride events 1197-1199 1198 1282 1553
same-sex marriage 1002-1003 1140 1510
same-sex partnerships 1002 1002
sex tourism 1446-1447
Stonewall Riots impact 1553
theater, queer 1578 1579
transfeminism 1622
travesti and trans activism 1651-1652 1656
urban queerness 1691 1692
visibility of LGBTQ athletes 1542

See also Slavery and sodomy in Brazil

Breaking Out of the Box (film) 336

Breaking the Silence (Amnesty International) 771

Brecht, Bertolt 1664

Breeding rituals 1387-1388

Bretton Woods institutions 1133

Bribiesca, Antonio 1700

BRIC/S (Brazil, Russia, India, China, and South Africa) phenomenon 1459

The Bride, the Bridegroom, and Sad Love (Solomon) 32 32

Bridges, Styles 922
Bright, Susie 1475 1476

Brincando el charco: Portrait of a Puerto Rican (film) 1297

Brinig, Myron 1376

Britain See United Kingdom

Britain, Sloane 1303

British Columbia, Canada, parenting rights 1201

British Gay Liberation Front 1704

British Museum 1103-1104 1105 1183

British Sexological Society 1166

British Society for the Study of Sex Psychology 1166

Britton, Andrew 292

Brixton Faeries (gay theater company) 1576

Broekmans, Marlo 1234 1235

Brokeback Mountain (film) 268-270 269 1004 1398

Bronski, Michael 910 1304 1305

Brooke, James 1718

Brooks, Philip 344-346 423 1616

Broschi, Carlo 518

Brotto, Lori A. 138-139 455

Brouillon pour un dictionnaire des amantes (Wittig and Zeig) 366-367

Brown, Anthony 1164

Brown Book of the Reichstag Fire and the Hitler Terror (Communist propaganda) 1126

Brown, Gavin 1135 1692

Brown, Helen Gurley 1475

Brown, Jonathan 1368
Brown, Judith C. 1502
Brown, Lisa 974
Brown, Michael 590 592 1691

Brown, Regina v. (UK; 1993) 1164
Brown, Rita Mae 375 920 920
Brown, Wendy 1135
Browne, Harrison 158
Browne, Kath 1396-1397
Browning, Barbara 303 305
Brownmiller, Susan 919
Brownshirts (Nazi Germany) 1124
Brubaker, Rogers 458

Brundage, John Herbert  See Herbert, John

Brunei
  attitudes toward LGBTQ population 998
  British colonial sodomy laws 1163
  Section 377 legacies 1420

Bruner, Arnold 205

Bry, Theodore de 508-509 508
Bryant, Anita 170-171 945 994 1553 1689
Bryant, Charity 533
Bryant, Lia 1397

The Bubble (film) 270-275 271 274 1377
Buck Angel (porn actor) 1267

Buddenbrooks: Verfall einer Familien (Mann) 1293 Buddhism
   Mongolia 1083
   Tibet 1597-1598 1599

Buddies in Bad Times (gay theater company) 1576

Las Buenas Amigas (The Good [Women] Friends) 930

Buffington, Robert 863

Buggery See Antisodomy and buggery trials Sodomy laws

Buggery Act (1533) (UK) 84 1412 1419 1420

Bugul, Ken 966

Buijs, Carl 359

Bujo, Bénézet 331

Bukak Api (film) 992

Buke erxi (play) 1729

Bukhontxana, as term 1087

Bulgaria
   decriminalization of homosexuality 402 1481
   lack of registered partnerships 1011
   restrictions on same-sex marriage 1012

Bullers, as term 974

Bulletproof Butches (Villanueva) 485

Bullough, Bonnie 426

Bullough, Vern L. 426 1026

Bund für Menschenrecht (BfM) 573-574

Buntinx, Gustavo 1100

Burchard, Ernst 358

Burchiello (Giovanni, Domenico di) 895

Burden, Chris 1223
Burg, Barry Richard 89
Bürgel, J. Christoph 948
Burgess, Guy 237 237 1661 1662
Burggraf, Jutta 70
Burhan, Abbas 1626
Burke, Sean D. 517
Burma See Myanmar (Burma)
Burne-Jones, Edward Coley 32
Burnett, Victoria 1109
Burns, John Horne 1689
Burns, Ken 1024
Burroughs, William S. 987 1454
Burston, Paul 911
Burton, Richard Francis
   The Book of the Thousand Nights and a Night translation 1592 1593
   ethnopornography 509
   legal records 97
   same-sex relations 810
   sotadic theory of homosexuality 1263-1264 1594-1596
Burundi
   anti-gay legislation 10
   asylum seeking 1343 1614
Bush, George H. W. 680 995 1060
Bush, George W. 449-450 742 1310
Bustamante, Nao 655
Busted (film) 335
Butches See Femmes and butches
Butler, Eleanor 1106
Butler, Heather 1265

Butler, Judith 1328
  anti-racist movement 73-74 777-778
  drag and camp 293
  Foucault critique 191 568
  gender performativity 227 427 803 1747
  kinship 885 886
  pornoterrorismo influenced by 1276
  queer theory contributions 1328 1329 radical projects vision 531 refusal of Civil Courage award 396 1280

Butowsky, Rochelle 902

Butt Magazine 275-277 276

Butterflies Trans Foundation 916

Butterfly Boy: Memories of a Chicano Mariposa (González) 864

Butterfly (phone app) 1144 1229-1230

The Butterfly's Evil Spell (play) 1125

Buzaid, Alfredo 380 381

Bwakaw (film) 1399

Byamugisha, Gideon 322 324

Byrd, James, Jr. 647

Byron, George Gordon (baron) 1046

Byzantine Empire, eunuchs 518-519

C

C (pseudonymous organization) 1195

Cabaret theater in Latin America and the Caribbean 199-202 200 279-284 280-281
655-656

“Cabeleira do Zezé” (Kelly) 304-305

Cabeza de Vaca, Alvar Núñez 418
Cabo Verde 284-286 285

Cabral, Dom Cristóvão 284

“Cadáveres” (poem) 1253

Cadden, Joan 673

Cadinot, Jean-Daniel 1174 1265 1668

Cagan, Leslie 994

Cahun, Claude 1375

Caine Prize for African Writing 955

Cairo 52 1308-1311

Cairo, Egypt
  Queen Boat Trials 1308-1312 1309
  travel to 1647
  Tuqus al-isharat wa-al-tahawwulat production 1664 1667

CAISO (Coalition Advocating for Inclusion of Sexual Orientation) 972

CAL (Coalition of African Lesbians) 35-37

Calabai, as term 1431

Calalai, as term 1431

Calamus flower symbol 1167

Califia, Pat/Patrick 216 1475

Çalışkan, Dilara 362

Call, Hal 1024

Call Me Kuchu (film) 334 337 338 907

El Callejón de los Milagros (film) 1756

Callen, Michael 735 736 1476

Camara, Fatou Kiné 1429

Camara, Mohamed 343-344
Cambodia
men who have sex with men 1090
sex tourism 1438

Cambridge Five 1414

Cameron, David 1742

Cameron, Deborah 894 901

Cameron, Edwin 693-694 960

Cameroon 287-290 288
asylum seeking 1343 1350
Christianity and same-sex acts 1360
cinema 346-347
conflation of witchcraft with homosexuality 1736 1737
queer migration to Europe 1048

Cameroon Tribune 288

Cameroonian Foundation for AIDS (CAMFAIDS) 289

Camín, Alfonso 1699

Caminha, Adolfo Ferreira 243-247 554 1316 1509-1510

Camminga, B 1336

Camp 290-295 292
Eurovision Song Contest 523 524
language 910-911
Mercado, Walter 462-463
Merchant Navy ships 1067
United Kingdom military ships 1068

Campaign against Moral Persecution (CAMP) 168-169 1553 1705

Campbell, Alyson 1573

Campbell, Bobbi 736

Campbell, Max 1709

Campbell, Topher 74 105 1235

Campesino clothing 1698 1700
Canada
advocacy for LGBTQI refugees 1347-1348
African refugees in 1344
archival records 113-118
Association for Social Knowledge founding 1025 asylum for LGBTQI refugees 1347
British colonial sodomy laws 1163
Caribbean diaspora 975
circumcision opposition 1218
Cold War gay persecution 402
coverage of Oscar Wilde trials 1734 criminal code reform 295-299 563-565
decriminalization of homosexuality 203 295-298 1163 1720 1742
eugenics movement 1122
homophobic behaviorist therapy 1169
indigenous peoples activism 1670-1672
Islamic LGBTQI activism 1367
Jewish population 1373
LGBTQ rights movement 203-207 203 592-593 1200-1201 1720-1724
parenting rights 1199-1204 1203 1723
persecution of homosexuals 924
pink triangle symbol 1241
pinkwashing concerns 1247
pride events 1247 1282 1721
refugees and immigration policies 1349
ritual practices 1385-1386
rural queer communities 1398
same-sex marriage 1201 1360
sex education in schools 1477
situational homosexuality 1503
theater, queer 1576 1579
third sex/gender categories 1582-1584
"We Demand" protest 1720-1724
Wolfenden Report influence on 1742

Canaday, Margot 116 374

Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms 1199
Canadian Council on Religion and the Homosexual 296 297
Canadian Lesbian and Gay Archives (CLGA) 113 114 240
The Canadian War on Queers (Kinsman and Gentile) 1722
Canby, Vincent 1209
Cane (performance piece) 472-474 472
Cantique des tourterelle (Pépin) 977
Cantonment Act (1864) (UK) 1419
Caparas, Maria 237
Cape, Jonathan 1726
Cape Minstrel Carnival 299-300
Cape Town 299-302 301
Cape Town Pride 300
Capistrán, Miguel 915-916
Capote, Truman 986 1255
Capozzola, Christopher 44
Caprio, Frank S. 369
The Captive (play) 1574
Caputo, Mina 1259 1260
Caraës, Marie-Haude 986
Caramel (film) 926
Caravan for the Rights of Refugees and Migrants 74
Caravan (London club) 1106
Carbery, Graham 102
Cárdenas, Micha 1329 1622
Cárdenas, Nancy 767 768 940 1223

The Care of the Self (Foucault) 568

Careaga Pérez, Gloria 940

Caribbean

- Anglophone and Creole queer literature 971-976
- British colonial sodomy laws 1163
- cabaret theater 279-284
- criminalization of homosexuality 1500
- Francophone queer literature 976-979
- HIV/AIDS 720-723 722
- legacy UK antisodomy laws 1420
- pride events 1282

See also HIV/AIDS in Latin America and the Caribbean, Sex tourism in Latin America and the Caribbean, Travesti and trans activism in Latin America and the Caribbean, specific countries

Caribbean Sex Work Collective 1449

Carion (desert father) 1354-1355

Caritas-Chile 723-724

Carlier, François 1659

Carlini, Benedetta 1355 1502

Carlyle, Thomas 1167

Carnal intercourse, Section 377 and 1419-1420

The Carnal Prayer Mat (erotic novel) 1269

Carnation symbol of homosexuality 1730

Carnival and sexuality in Brazil 279-280 302-305 303 1447

Carnival celebrations
- cabaret theater and 279-280
- travesti and trans activism 285 1649 1650 1655-1656

Carothers, J. C. 510 511 512-513

Carpenter, Edward advocacy for Uranians 1581
archival records 98
Burton, Richard Francis influence on 1594
Hall, Radclyffe influenced by 1725
Order of Chaeronea involvement 1165 1166 1167
philosophy 675
Sacred Band of Thebes inspiration 1407
themes and works 34 225 425 642 809

Carranza, Venustiano 1035 1037
Carrier, Joseph 1315
Carrilche, as term 1654
Carrillo, Héctor 377
Carroll, Dick 1302
Carter, Ashton 1064
Cartes de visites 1263
Carvalho, Herbert Eustáquio de See Daniel, Herbert
Casa Amiga 603
Casas, Francisco 1224-1225
Case file photography 1235
Case of the Missing Diplomats (UK) 1661
Casement, Roger 1660-1661 1660 1732
Casey, George, Jr. 1062
Cash Askew (pop artist) 1260
Cassata, Ryan 1260
Castelán, Alida 929-930
Castellanos, Rosario 1521
Castilla, Margarita 1568
Castillo, Adelaida del 865
Castillo, Debra A. 350
Castle, Terry 257 258 1326
Castlehaven, Earl of 236

Castration
eunuchs 1628
hijras 1431
as part of sex reassignment surgery 1219-1220 1641 1642 types of 1217

Castrejón, Eduardo A. 185 553-554

Castro Espín, Mariela 1651

Castro, Fidel 434 436 1537 1538 See also The Cuban Revolution and homosexuality

Castro neighborhood, San Francisco as gayborhood 1041 1281 1689 1690
sexual revolution involvement 1485

Castro, Yan María 940

Catacombs (San Francisco) 1387

Catamites, as term 1425

Catfishing 1230

Cather, Willa 31

Catholicism
Africa 330-332 331
anti-gender movement in Europe 69-70
colonial Brazil 1508 1509
HIV/AIDS 716 720 723-724
Latin America 121 279-280 284-285 559-563 601 716 720 771 772
LGBTQ rights 326 771 772
reform efforts 1355
self-affirming LGBTQ movement 1357 1358 1361
sexual abuse scandal 1359
sins against nature in colonial Latin America 1494-1501
situational homosexuality 1502
sodomy in medieval Europe 83-84 86
See also Inquisition, criminal courts, and sexuality in colonial Latin America
Cauldwell, David O. 358 1642
Causey, Paul 143
Cavafy, C. P. 305-310 1104 1106
Cavafy Museum (Egypt) 1106
Cavallaro, Sahli 932
Cazorla, Óscar 1111
Cazuza (Agenor de Miranda Araújo Neto) 1257
CCAR (Central Conference of American Rabbis) 1373
CDC (Centers for Disease Control) 5-6 678
Ce sexe qui n'en est pas un (Irigaray) 1327
Cease Fire (film) 1638
CEDAW (Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women) 529
Celestino antes del alba (Arena) 60
Celibacy, in Christian communities 1354-1355
Cell 16 140
Cellini, Benvenuto 364
CENESEX (Centro Nacional de Educación Sexual) 110 436 1651
Center for Culture and Leisure See Cultuur en Ontspanningscentrum (COC)
Center for Economic and Policy Research 602-603
Center for the Study of Sexualities (Taiwan) 99-100 1606
Centers for Disease Control (CDC) 5-6 678
Central American solidarity movement 310-315 310 313 1148-1150
Central Conference of American Rabbis (CCAR) 1373
Centre des Archives, Recherches, Cultures Lesbiennes 104
Centre for LGBT Refugees 1347
Centre for Popular Education and Human Rights, Ghana (CEPEHRG) 613-614
Centre for the Development of People 699 700
Centro Académico de la Memoria de Nuestra América 106-107
Centro de Apoyo a las Identidades Trans (Center for the Support of Trans Identities) 1651
Centro de Documentación e Investigación de la Cultura de Izquierdas 106
Centro de Documentación Luis Gauthier 107
Centro de Documentación y Archivo Histórico Lésbico “Nancy Cárdenas,” 107
Centro de Información y Documentación de las Homosexualidades en México 107
Centro de Información y Servicios de Asesoría en Salud (CISAS) (Nicaragua) 1149
Centro de Investigación y Capacitación de la Mujer (Mexico) 462
Centro Latino-Americano em Sexualidade e Direitos Humanos 110
Centro Nacional de Educación Sexual (CENESEX) 110 436 1651
Centro Sperimentale di Cinematografia (Experimental Center of Cinematography) 1321-1322
CEP-SIDA (Colectivo de Educación Popular contra el SIDA) 1150
CEPEHRG (Centre for Popular Education and Human Rights, Ghana) 613
Cerankowski, KJ 139
Certeau, Michel de 1695
Cerullo, Isadora 1540
Cervulle, Maxime 1464
Céspedes, Eleno/Elena de 1498
C'est le soleil qui m'a brûlée (Beyala) 966 967 970
CHA (Comunidad Homosexual Argentina) 719-720 770 940
Chabot, H. Th. 1718
Chacaby, Ma-Nee 1673 1675
Chaclacayo (performance art group) 1226
Chaddock, Charles Gilbert 225
Chadraabal, Lodoidamba 1085
Chahine, Youssef 847-851 847 848
Chaîne (Bokoum) 965
Chakka, as term 1563
Chalker, Rebecca 371
Chambers, Elaine 1068
Chamorro, Violeta 1148
Champain, Frank 85
Chan, Ka 1632
Chan, Louise 1632 1715
Chancer, Lynn S. 214
Chancy, Myriam 978
Chand, Dutee 158 162 1540
Chang, Jing (Zhang Yunjing) 1747 1748
Chang, Larry 857
Change moi ma vie (film) 989
The Changer and the Changed (album) 945
Channel Orange (album) 1259
Un chant d'amour (film) 1264
Un chant écarlate (Bà) 966
Chapin and Charpentier v. France (European Court of Human Rights; 2016) 795 1011
Chapman, Tracy 947
Charcot, Jean-Martin 225-226
Le Charivari 76
Charles I (king of Württemberg) 1412
Charles, Jack 1578
Charley's Aunt (film) 1624
Charlie Hebdo (magazine) 1176
Charly Boy 39-40
Charoenphol, Parinya (Nong Toom) 157 163 163
Charpentier, Guillaume 1552
Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union 1279
Charter of Rights and Freedoms (Canada) 1199
Chase, Cheryl See Laurent, Bo
Chassériau, Théodore 1410
CHAT (Community Homophile Association of Toronto) 241 1720 1721
Chatterjee, Partha 727 731
Chaucer's Sexual Poetics (Dinshaw) 521
Chauncey, George 373 374 395 639
Les chauves-souris (Nanga) 966
Chavannes, Pierre Puvis de 33
Chavela (film) 1701
Chavela Vargas (zine) 1701
El Che de los Gays (film) 1225
El Che de los Gays (performance art persona) 1225 1225 1228
Chebel, Malek 988
Chechia (Tunisian cap) 879
Chechnya
   international advocacy for LGBTQI refugees 1347-1348 violence against gay men 1231 1283 1351 1403
Chechnya, detention camps in 315-318 316 1351
Chee, Kenneth 1423
Chemical castration 1217
Chemsex (drug use preferences) 1231
Chen, Abby 132
Chen, Chi-nan 1004
Chen, Ella 1747 1748
Chen, Mel 492 1330
Chen, Sen 1236-1238
Chen, Wei-Jhen 1633-1634
Chen, Ying-chen 1612
Cherry Grove Community House and Theatre 1381
Cherry Grove, New York community space at 1326
   resort areas 1379 1380
Chesley, Robert 1576
Chester, Alfred 987
Cheung, Andrew 1714
Cheung, Leslie (Zhang Guorong) 1747
Cheung, Pui Kei Eleanor 1632
Cheuse, Alan 477-478
Chevalier d’Éon or Mademoiselle Beaumont 318-319 319

Chew, Paddy 1578

CHhaka, CHhaka, CHhaka, CHhaka, CHhaka, CHhaka (Jani) 125

Chi, Chia-wei 1004 1005 1005 1006

Chi, Ta-wei 1004 1610

Chiang, Howard 521 1465 1468 1469

Chiang, Kuei 1610

Chicago, Illinois
    Boystown neighborhood 1041 1690
    National Gay and Lesbian Sports Hall of Fame 1102-1103
    pride events 1281-1282
    Young Lords Party 1296

Chicago Women’s Liberation Rock Band 944

Chicana Lesbians: The Girls Our Mothers Warned Us About (Trujillo) 601 864

“Chicano Men: A Cartography of Homosexual Identity and Behavior” (Almaguer) 864

“Chicks with a dick,” 872

Childe, John 84

The Children’s Hour (play) 1574

Chile
    activist organizations 768-769
    archival records 107
    decriminalization of homosexuality 110
    dictatorship 1224 1225
    gender identity 119
    HIV/AIDS 717 721 723-724
    identification document changes for trans people 1141
    lesbian activism 929
    Museo Travesti del Perú exhibit 1100
    neoliberal economic policy effects 1138-1139 1140
    performance artists in 1223 1224-1225
    pornoterrorismo and post-porn 1274 1275 1276
    sex workers 1449
    sports crowd homophobic chants 1538
transfeminism advocacy 1622
travesti and trans activism 1652
Zamudio Law 721

Chiluba, Frederick 1735

Chimbalanga, Tiwonge 699 700 1349 1614

Chin, Timothy 972 973

China anxieties about the penis 1215 1216
attitudes toward LGBTQ population 998
Boys Love manga 265
BRIC/S membership 1459
castration practices 1217
Christian missionary activity 1356
conversion therapy 418-422 419
decriminalization of homosexuality 1598 1604 economic transitions of 1459 1460
eunuchs 515-516
homoerotic traditions 812-813
homosexual argots 897-899
Hua Mulan legend 1055
koro outbreaks 1214
legal records 96
LGBTQ rights movement 765 786-787 1604-1605 1606 1630-1634
male prostitution 1236-1237
men who have sex with men 1091
militarism and sexualities in 1054-1057
museum exhibits 1106
new media popularity 1142 1143 1143 1144 1145
pathologization of homosexuality 1028
phone apps 1143 1144 1229
pornography and erotica development 1262 1269 1270-1271
pride events 1282
queer feminist art 132-133 133
queer theory approaches to globalization 1330
rural queer communities 1398
self-affirming Christian LGBTQ movement 1361
sex reassignment surgery 1433
sex workers 1459-1461
sexology development 1169 1468-1469
situational homosexuality 1502
Taiwan relationship 1610
Tibet relationship 1597-1600
tongzhi identities 898 1090 1603-1609
tourism development 1438
transgender organizations 1606-1607 1630-1634
urban queerness 1691 1692
Wilde, Oscar importance to culture 1727-1731
zhongxing phenomenon 1745-1750 1748

See also Hong Kong Taiwan

China Rainbow Witness Fellowship 1361

Chiñas, Beverly Newbold 1108

Chinchilla, Maya 865 866

Chinese Classification of Mental Disorders (CCMD-3) 419-420

Chinese modern marriages (Hong Kong) 1714

Chinkhoswe (engagement ceremony) 1614

Chisholm, Shirley 392

ChiShona (language) 905

Chitando, Ezra 324

Chiu, Hiker 1633

Choi, Ryan 1441

Choinkhor, Naidandorj 1085

Chomarat, Michel 105

Chongyang (Chiang) 1610 1612

Chopin, Kate 29

Chorier, Nicholas 1263

Chosen Few (lesbian football team) 1545

Chou, Wah-shan 376 530 1604

Choukri, Mohamed 986 987

Christian, Meg 945 946
Christianity

Hong Kong 1714
Kenya 875
Pacific Islands 1189 1193
queer domesticity and 1314
ritual practices 1386 1387
rural queer communities and 1397 same-sex acts and 1359-1360
Samoa 1409
Scouting groups 1417 1418
sexual revolution and 1481
South Africa 1524
Sufi poetry depiction 1560-1561
Taiwan 1006
Ugandan martyrs 1682 1683
views on orgasm 1170

See also Religion and same-sex behaviors: Christianity specific types

Christianity in Africa: Anglican 319-324 321 335 1152

Christianity in Africa: LGBT friendly 324-326 325

Christianity in Africa: Pentecostal and Charismatic 326-330 328 335
Cameroon 288-289
queer decolonization 1360-1361

Christianity in Africa: Roman Catholicism 330-332 331
Holy Inquisition 284-285
Nigeria 1152

Christianity, Social Tolerance, and Homosexuality: Gay People in Western Europe from the Beginning of the Christian Era to the Fourteenth Century (Boswell) 366

Christopher and His Kind (Isherwood) 825

Christopher Street Days 1278 1282 1548 1550-1551 See also Pride demonstrations in Europe Pride parades and marches

Christopher Street (Gupta) 128

Christopher Street Liberation Day Umbrella Committee (CSLDUC) 1550-1551

Chrononormativity concept 1331

Chu, Tien-hsin 1611
Chu, Tien-wen 1612
Chua, Lynette J. 471-472 1423
Chuangzao She (Creation Society) 1728

Chuchote pas trop (Ekotto) 968 969

Chuchu, Jim 339

Chueca neighborhood, Madrid, as gayborhood 1281

Chughtai, Ismat 556

Chumash third gender 1584

Church of England 1714

Churchill, Winston 1163 1739

Chutzpah (organization) 1375

CIDH (Comisión Interamericana de los Derechos Humanos) 772

Cieza de León, Pedro 1078

Ciming Health Exam Center 1607

Cinema

Asia 1270 1271
Egyptian, depiction of HIV/AIDS in 704-708 growth of pornographic 1264 1265 1266
Hong Kong 1747
Iranian, masculinity in 1018-1023 1019 1022 1637-1638
Italian neorealist 1321-1323
Jewish LGBT themes 1376-1377
Latin America and the Caribbean 1656
Malaysia 991 992
new media role 1144 1145
new queer cinema 1609
Orientalism in gay pornography 1174-1176 pornoterrorismo genre 1275 resort themes 1380
rural queer narratives 1398-1399
sex work themes 1464
sexual revolution themes 1481 1482 1485
Taiwan 1004
Thailand 872
transgender identity in Iranian cinema 1623-1627 1624 1636
Turkish bath depiction 1667-1668
See also specific films

Cinema, African (Anglophone) 332-343 documenting LGBTQ lives 333-338 337 factors in analysis 332-333 feature films 338-341
Nigeria 1154
sexual taxonomies 333

Cinema, African (Francophone) 343-347

Cinema, Latin American (early twentieth century) 347-351 349

Cinema, Latin American (late twentieth and twenty-first centuries) 112 351-357 353 355 434-435
Cinemachismo (Mora) 349
Cinemateca Uruguaya 112

Circuit parties 1439
Círculo de Familias Diversas (Circle of Diverse Families) 941
Circumcision 1214 1217-1219 1218 1528-1529
CISAS (Centro de Información y Servicios de Asesoría en Salud) (Nicaragua) 1149
Cisgender or cis 357-363 359 360
Citationality concept 1328

The City and the Pillar (Vidal) 1303

Ciudad Juárez, Mexico, feminicide and violence 599-600 599 601 602-603
“Las ciudades” (song) 1699

Civic Committee for Nicaragua in the United States 311

Civil Partnership Act (2004) (UK) 1348

Civil partnerships
Canada 1201
Europe 886 1348
heterosexual, in France 1009
Latin America 1002
QT v. Hong Kong Immigration Department case 1307-1308
See also Same-sex partnerships

Civil Rights Act (1968) (US) 645

Civil service See Government employment

Civil Society Coalition on Human Rights and Constitutional Law (CSCHRCL) 1685

CJEU See Court of Justice of the European Union (CJEU)

CJLS (Committee on Jewish Law and Standards) 1373

CLAGS: The Center for LGBTQ Studies 115

Clair, Jean-Noël René 1266

Clans, in kinship models 886

Clap, John 1081-1082

Clap, Margaret 1082

Clare, Eli 1331

Clarke, Edith 1651

Clarke, Edward 1732

Classical studies 305-310 364-367 364

Clean Car, Dirty Conscience (performance art piece) 1275-1276 1276

Cleland, John 1263

Clement, Antoine 1503

Clement of Alexandria 1354

Clemmer, Donald 1505

Cleo, Fabio 290 291

Cleveland Street scandal (UK) 1122
Cleves, Rachel Hope 532 533

Clinical Guidelines for the Management of Disorders of Sex Development in Childhood (Intersex Society of North America) 838

Clinton, Bill
  Don’t Ask, Don’t Tell policy 1060-1061
election of 995
HIV/AIDS 742
LGBTQ rights record 447 448-449 451 security clearances executive order 925

Clinton, Hillary 753 1349

The Clitoral Truth (Chalker) 371

Clitoris 367-372 368
in intersex people 1220
orgasm considerations 1170-1171
role in female pleasure 1473 1474 1475-1476
surgical creation of 1219 testosterone therapy effects on 1219

The Closet 372-379
coming out versus 376-378 394-395 invention of modern 373-376 394-395
overview 372-373

Clover families, as term 887

Club Arak 801

Club Kali (London) 1691

Coalition Advocating for Inclusion of Sexual Orientation (CAISO) 972

Coalition against Violence 603

Coalition of African Lesbians (CAL) 12 35-37 537

Coalition of Asia Pacific Regional Networks on HIV/AIDS 143

Cobain, Kurt 1258

Cobbinah, Mac-Darling 613

COC See Cultuur en Ontspanningscentrum (COC)
Cocks, Harry G. 84
Cocteau, Jean 33 218
Code-mixing 897
Coenobitic monasticism 1355
Coetzee, J. M. 340
Coffignon, Ali 895
Cohen, Cathy 1331
Cohen, Eliad 1454
Cohen, Lawrence 668 1471
Cohen, Nathan 565
Cohen, Sherrie Joyce 484 485
Cohn, Roy 924

A Coincidence of Desires: Anthropology, Queer Studies, Indonesia (Boellstorff) 1330

Coke, Edward 1659

Col·lectiu de Transsexuals de Catalunya (Catalan Group of Transsexuals) 1378

Cold War
- LGBTQ military service in the US 1059-1060
- nationalist masculinity in Europe 1127
- treason associated with sodomy 1661-1662

Cold War and sexuality in Latin America 379-383

Cole, Teju 957

Colectivo de Acciones de Arte (CADA) 653

Colectivo de Educación Popular contra el SIDA (CEP-SIDA) 1150

Colectivo Sol (Sun Collective) 107 929

Colectivo Universitario de Disidencia Sexual (CUDS) 1225 1274 1276

Coleman, Angela 614
Coleman, Eli 884
Coleman, Lonnie 1303
Coleridge, Samuel Taylor 26
Coletivo Coiote (Coyote Collective) 1224
Collectif Féministe contre le Racisme et l'Antisémitisme 73 624
Collectif Lesbien contre le Racisme et le Fascisme 73
Collective communities See Lesbian lands, women’s lands, and separatist communes Colleges and universities See Higher education
Collins, Dana 1439 1440
Collins, Jason 1103
Collumbien, Martine 729
Colombia
  constitutional reforms 1139 1141
  encuentro of 1981 928
  full citizenship for gender and sexual minorities 1347
  Inquisition 1495
  LGBTQ rights movement 769 771-772 1500
  Museo Travesti del Perú exhibit 1100
  neoliberal economic policy effects 1139 1140 1141
  performance artists in 1228
  pornoterrorismo and post-porn 1274 1275 1276
  same-sex marriage 1002-1003 1140
  sex workers 1448 1449
  travesti and trans activism 1652
Colombia Diversa (Diverse Colombia) 1652

The Colonial Harem (Alloula) 509
Colonialism See Imperialism and colonialism
Colonialism in Africa south of the Sahara 384-390 anthropology and ethnopsychiatry 388 510-514
  archival research 91-92
  educated African elites 388-389
  European/African same-sex relations 384-385
flexible gender systems 594-598 laws and governance and same-sex relations 386-388 liberation struggle 389 migrant labor system same-sex relations 385-386 same-sex relations 61-62 612-613 875
sodomy laws 87-89 284-285
Western homophobia 691

The Color of Gold (film) 336

The Color of Kink (Cuz) 214-215

Colorado Civil Rights Commission, Masterpiece Cakeshop v. (US; 2018) 1202

Colorado, United States, boycott 995

Columbia University 1297

Colville, Jim 1093

Coman, Adrian 1012

Combahee River Collective 234-235 390-394 392

Come Together (newspaper) 592

Comfort, Alex 1475

Comic Market (Tokyo) 264

Coming of Age in Samoa (Mead) 1189

Coming out
African queer literature portrayals 956 athletes 1539
Kenya 875 876-877
Latin American performance artists 1223
National Coming Out Day 375 782
North African queer literature portrayals 988-989 popular musicians 1256 1257 1258 pornography and 1272
ritual practices 1387
Singapore 1578
South African queer literature exploration of 958
Wainaina, Binyavanga 961

See also The Closet
Coming-out/coming-in discourses in the Middle East 394-397 396
Anā hiya anti 55-59 55
Aswat in 152-156
The Bubble 272-273
the closet 377 394-397
I Luv U But 801-805 802
Israel 272-273 395
Lebanon 193-195
Meem involvement 1030-1032

Coming Out (film) 545 1712
Coming to Power (Samois) 214
Coming Up! (newspaper) 588 589

Comisión Interamericana de los Derechos Humanos (CIDH) 772
Comiskey Park disco demolition night (1979) 1258
El Comité Cívico pro Nicaragua en los Estados Unidos 311
El Comité de Salvadoreños Progresistas 311
Comité d’Urgence Anti-répression Homosexuelle (CUARH) 397-399

The Commission: From Silence to Resistance (film) 1527 Commission on European Family 1013

Committee for Homosexual Freedom 1704
Committee on Jewish Law and Standards (CJLS) 1373
Commodification of pride parades 1284

Common Language (China) 362

Common Threads: Stories from the Quilt (1989) 43

Communism
Lavender Scare and 922 923 924
masculinity and sports 1538
Mattachine Society beginnings and 1023 1024
McCarthyism views on homosexuality 1610
sexual revolution 1479 1481
Tibet 1597 1598
Communism and queers in Europe 399-403

Community Homophile Association of Toronto (CHAT) 241 1720 1721

Community Queer (blog) 831

Complementary and alternative medicine 1026-1030

Completely With/Out Character (show) 1578

Compton's Cafeteria riot (1966) 403-406 403 1550

“Compulsory Heterosexuality and Lesbian Existence” (Rich) 361

Compulsory sexuality 139-140 361

Comstock, Anthony 1263

Comstock Law (1873) 1484-1485

Comunidad de Madres Lesbianas (Lesbian Mothers Community) 941

Comunidad Homosexual Argentina (CHA) 719-720 770 940

Comvalius, A. C. 973

Conde, Maite 348

La condesa sangrienta (Pizarnik) 1249 1249 1250

Conferencia Feminista (2009) 1620

Confessionario para los curas de Indios—con la instrucción contra sus ritos y exhortacion para ayudar a bien morir y suma de los privilegios y forma de impedimentos del matrimonio (Concilio Provincial Limense) 411

Confessional Manual of Fray Sebastian de Totanes 188

Confessional manuals in colonial Latin America 406-415
  Andean bilingual manuals 410-412 confusion and mistranslation 412-414 conversion tool 406-407 descriptions 188
  history 407-408
  New Spain bilingual manuals 408-410

Confessionario en lengua mexicana y castellana (Baptista) 409
Confessionario mayor, y menor en lengua Mexicana (Alva) 409-410

Confessionario para los curas de indios (manual) 409

Confessions of a Mask (Mishima) 1069 1070-1071

Confessions of the Flesh (Foucault) 569

Confusion Na Wa (film) 338

Congress of South African Students (COSAS) 1156

Congress of Traditional Leaders of South Africa (CONTRALES) 1529

Conigrave, Timothy 175

conmoción: revista y red revolucionaria de lesbianas latinas (magazine) 1567 1568 1569

Connecticut, Griswold v. (US; 1965) 1485 1515

Connell, Kathleen 213

Connell, Raewyn 172

Conquest and sodomy in Latin America 415-418 417
  archival records 108
  ethnopornography 508-509 508
  Nahuas 559-563 561 562
  sodomy laws 88 110 720 816

See also Inquisition, criminal courts, and sexuality in colonial Latin America Slavery and sodomy in Brazil

La conquista de América (performance art show) 1225

Consciousness-raising (CR) 932 1476

Conservative Judaism, views on same-sex behaviors 1372 1373

Consortium of Higher Education LGBT Resource Professionals 661

Constansis, Alexandros N. 1259

Constitutio Criminalis Carolina (Holy Roman Empire) 86

Contagious Diseases Act (1868) (UK) 1419

Contemporáneos (magazine) 1316
Los Contemporáneos movement 1250-1251

Contraception See Birth control

Contracorriente (film) 356-357

CONTRALESNA (Congress of Traditional Leaders of South Africa) 1529

Contras (Nicaragua) 1148

“Controversy” (song) 1256

Conundrum (Morris) 375

Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW) 529

Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees (1951) 1048

Conversion Our Goal 405

Conversion therapy
  Christian 1359
  homophobic nature of 1169

Conversion therapy in China 418-422 419

Convocatoria Lesbiana (Lesbian Convocation) 940

Conway, Terry 626

Cook, Edmund 89

Cook, James 1188

Cook, Matt 84 895

Cook, Susana 655

Cooper, Danielle 139

Cooper, Edith 256 888 1410-1412

La Coordinadora del Encuentro Lesbico Feminista (Coordinating Group for the Lesbian Feminist Conference) 931

Coordinadora Latinoamericana de Archivos de Imágenes en Movimiento 112
Copi (playwright) 1223 1225

_Corbett v. Corbett_ (Hong Kong; 1970) 1713 1716

Corbman, Rachel 214

Core, Philip 290 291

_Corinne_ (Staël) 1410

Corley, Carl 1301

Cornish, Richard 87-88

Corpus linguistics 901-902

Corrales, Javier 107

Corre, Armand 1429

Corrêa, Sonia 773

Corrective rape, in Africa _See_ Rape, corrective, in Africa

Corridos (song type) 1698

_La corruption à Paris_ (Coffignon) 895

Cortés, Hernán 415 416 417-418

Cory, Annie Sophie _See_ Cross, Victoria

Cory, Donald Webster 894 896

COSAS (Congress of South African Students) 1156

Cosplay 1729-1730

_Cossey v. United Kingdom_ (European Court of Human Rights; 1990) 793

Costa, Pêdra 1224

Costa Rica

HIV/AIDS 723

lesbian encuentro of 1989 931

performance artists in 1228

sex workers 1449

travesti and trans activism 1652
Côte d'Ivoire 422-424
  cinema 344-346
trans issues 1616
  woman-woman marriage 1015

Cottam, Samuel Elsworth 1167
Coulavin, Luc 2

Council, D. and Kingdom of Sweden v. (European Court of Justice; 2001) 798

Council of Europe 790-791 1051 1283
Council on Religion and the Homosexual 403
Counter-Reformation 1248

The Country and the City (Williams) 1396

A Country Lesbian Manifesto 489

Country Women (periodical) 935 937

Courage, James 168

Courageous Sisters 614

Court of Justice of the European Union (CJEU)
  family law 1012
  interpretation of spouse term 1051
  LGBTQ cases 797-798 1048

Courvant, Diana 1620

Couse, William 87-88

Coutinho, Thomé da Madre de Deus 1509

Cover art and cover copy, in pulp fiction 1301

Cowan, T. L. 1578

Coward, Noël 1106 1574

Coyle, Daniel 1562 1563

Craigslist 1506
Crane, Stephen 31-32
Crane, Walter 33
Credibility, of asylum seekers 1345 1346 1350-1351
Cree language 1670
Crenshaw, Kimberlé 1327 1621 1622
Creole queer literature 971-976
Creoli, Jan 88
Crépuscule et défi: Kitè na kitè (Yavoucko) 966
Crichlow, Wesley 974
Crimes Act (1900) (Australia) 1421
Crimes (Amendment) Bill (1991) (Hong Kong) 1421
Crimes rituels, loges, sectes, pouvoirs, drogues et alcools au Cameroun (Ateba Eyene) 289
Criminal Code of Canada 1722 1723
Criminal Law Amendment Act (1885) (UK) 1163 1166 1412
Criminal Law Amendment Act (1968–1969) (Canada) 295 1720-1721
Criminal Law Consolidation Statutes (1861) (UK) 1162
Criminalization of homosexuality
   Africa 11 691-692 997 1342
   Asia 997 1471
   Bangladesh 1391
   Barbados 1500
   Caribbean 1500
   colonialism and 810-812
   Egypt 1308-1311
   Germany 1240
   Hong Kong 1307
   India 1128 1129 1131
   Indonesia 1719
   Iran 1434 1435-1436
   Islamic countries 1368
See also Section 377 and Section 377A Section 377 in South Asia

Crimp, Douglas 1476

“Crimson Waves” (short story) 956

Crip, as term 1331

Crisis of Democracy (report) 1138

Critical in Queeries 172

Critical Path 739

Crivelli, Bartolomea 1502

Croatia
decriminalization of homosexuality 1481
pride events 1280 1283 1285
registered partnerships 1011
restrictions on same-sex marriage 1012
sports crowd homophobic chants 1538

Croatia, Pajic v. (European Court of Human Rights; 2016) 795 1011

Croesus's Treasure (film) 1019

Croissant, Marc 398

Crompton, Louis 84

Cross-dressing
- Africa 1508
- Asian drag 481-482
- El Baile de los 41 1038 1651
- China 1746
- Cuba 1445-1446
decriminalization of, in Latin America 1140
- Erauso, Catalina de 502-505 503
- Euro-American theory on 1640-1644
- Eurovision Song Contest 523-525 524
- Institut für Sexualwissenschaft advocacy 824-826
- Iran 1635-1636
- Iranian cinema 1021 1623-1624
- Islamic views 1436
- Latin America 550-555 559-563
- Mademoiselle Beaumont 318-319 319
- Maghreb region 989
- on Merchant Navy ships 1067
- mukhannathin 1095 1096
- Museo Travesti del Perú 1097-1101 1097 1103 1226
- muxes 1108 1110 1227
- Nepal 1563
- origin of transvestite term 1640
- pre-Columbian Mexico 1109
- rural queer people 1395
- Senegal 1428
- third sex/gender categories and 1583
- Thomas/Thomasine Hall court case 1589-1592
- A Thousand and One Nights depictions 1595
- Uganda 1682
- von Mahlsdorf, Charlotte 1710-1712 1711
- women fighters passing as men 1054-1055
See also Passing as other sex Transvestites/transsexuals Travesti and trans activism in Latin America and the Caribbean

Cross-dressing in the West 424-428

Cross, Victoria 29

Crossing Borders: Love between Women in Medieval French and Arabic Literatures (Amer) 1753

Croutier, Alev Lytle 515-516 520

Crow people, badés 1670 1671

Crowder, Enoch H. 1057

Crowder, Michael 1429

Crowley, Mart 1223 1575

Crui ses, LGBTQI-oriented 1379

Cruising and cruising grounds 428-432

Asian 469
bathhouse raids 202-207 203 298 431 1723
blackmail 236-237
bookstores 247-249
graffiti and graphic art 619-620
lesbian 430-431
in literature 376 430
molly houses 1080-1082 1081
phone apps and 1231
South Africa 1525
Turkish baths 1669
urban areas 1689

Crush (phone app) 1229

Cruz, Ariane 214-215

Cruz, Enrique 1266

Cruz, Lorenzo 39

Cruz-Malavé, Arnaldo 1296

Cruz, Ted 1174
Cruz, Vanessa 1568

Cryle, Peter 455

Crystal Boys (Pai) 1610

CSCHRCL (Civil Society Coalition on Human Rights and Constitutional Law) 1685

CSLDUC (Christopher Street Liberation Day Umbrella Committee) 1550-1551

Los cuarenta y uno: Novela crítico-social (Castrejón) 185 553-554

CUARH (Comité d'Urgence Antirépression Homosexuelle) 397-399

Cuarterolo, Andrea 350

Cuba

Antes que anochezca depiction 59-61 59 382-383
HIV/AIDS 722 723
LGBTQ rights movement 382-383 432-437 1500
masculinity and sports 1538
modernity and queerness 1316
Museo Travesti del Perú exhibit 1099
performance artists in 1228
pride events 1282
sex tourism 1445-1446
sexual culture of revolution 382-383 432-436
travesti and trans activism 1651 1655

Cuban Adjustment Act (1966) 433

The Cuban Revolution and homosexuality 432-437
Antes que anochezca depiction 58-61 382-383 conceptual art emergence 1223 inherited conditions 432-433 leaders on 433-435 436
post-UMAP treatment 436
UMAP camps and internment 435-436

CUDS See Colectivo Universitario de Disidencia Sexual (CUDS)

“El cuento de la Mujer del Mar” (short story) 1297

Cuerpos desobedientes (Fernández) 1654

Cui, Zi'en 1142
Cuir, as term 1223 1315
Cuir theory 1276-1277
Cullen, Countee 639 642
“Cultura Jotería (Jotería Culture): The Ins and Outs of Latina/o Popular Culture” (essay) 865 Culture, Health, and Sexuality (journal) 362
The Culture of Gender and Sexuality in the Caribbean (Lewis, ed.) 1657 Cultuur en Ontspanningscentrum (COC) activities 74 574
  archival records 103
  early leadership in LGBTQ activism 1282
  pride events 1278
  Strange Fruit collective 1555-1556
  success of 1551-1552
Cum Clean (pamphlet) 1476
Cumbia, copeteo y lágrimas: Informe nacional sobre la situación de las travestis, transexuales y transgéneros (anthology) 107
Cummings, Katherine 681
Cunha, Maria Clementina Pereira 304
Cureau, Adolphe Louis 511
Currah, Paisley 1328
Curran, Tim 1416
Currier, Ashley 65
Cushman, Charlotte 254-255
Custodio Arce, Ángel 435
Cut sleeve, as term 898 1238
Cvetkovic, Ann 117
Cyborg figure 1329
“A Cyborg Manifesto: Science, Technology, and Socialist-Feminism in the Late Twentieth Century” (essay) 1329

Cyprus
  British colonial sodomy laws 1163
decriminalization of homosexuality 1163

Cyprus, Modinos v. (European Court of Human Rights; 1993) 791-792 1163

Cyrus, Miley 1259

Czech Republic
  gay pornographic productions 1266
  pride events 1283
  refugees and immigration policies 1350
  registered partnerships 1011

Czechoslovakia
  homosexuality decriminalized 402
  sexual revolution 1481
  The Well of Loneliness impact 1726

D

D. and Kingdom of Sweden v. Council (European Court of Justice; 2001) 798

da Costa, Luiz 1510

Dab (rape of a sleeping man) 1158

D'abella, as term 1587

Daboul, Samer 926

Daddy and the Muscle Academy (film) 1601

Daddyhunt (phone app) 1229

Daddy's Roommate (Willhoite) 252

Daedalus and Icarus (Leighton) 32

Dai Anna (Jin Tai) 1748

Daif, Rashid al- 177-181

Daily Beast (newspaper) 1541
Dakan (film) 343-344 345-346
Dalai Lama 1599
Dalam botol (film) 991 992
Dale, James 1416 1416 1417
Dale, James, Boy Scouts of America v. (US; 2000) 1416 1417
Dale, Lennie 1224
Dalí, Salvador 1125
Dalilah (fictional character) 1205-1206 1208
Dall’Orto, Giovanni 895
Dama/Namara people 1016 1017 1116
Dame-Griff, Avery 117
Les dames de la terre (Fanon) 512
Damian, Peter 1355
Dan, Oniroku 216
Dana International (pop artist) 78 1259
Dance of the 41 (1901) See El Baile de los 41 (1901)
“Dancing Lasha Tumbai” (Serduchka) 523 524
Dandies
Chinese literature 1728 1729
fin de siècle sexuality 554-555
Iranian cinema 1021
Daniel, Herbert 718-719
The Danish Girl (film) 362
Danish State Archives 105
Dankwa, Serena Owusua 67
Dannecker, Martin 712
Dar al-Hilal (publishing house) 1491
D’Arcy, Ella 29
Darío, Rubén 554 1249
Dark and Lovely, Soft and Free (film) 336
Dark continent discourse 903-904
DarkMatter (performance group) 1579
Darnell, Diana 440-441
Darnell v. Lloyd (US; 1975) 439-443
Darsey, James 901
Darwich, Lynn 50
Darwin, Charles 1122
Dasgupta, Rohit K. 1398
Dash Akol (film) 1019
Dash mashti films 1019-1020
Date My Family (television series) 1530
Dating and sex advice literature 1475
Dating apps See Phone apps
Daughters of Bilitis 443-447 444
archival records 113
assimilationist approach of 541-542 1325
eyear leadership in LGBTQ activism 1282
The Great Wall of Los Angeles 620-621
Lavender Menace and 920 921
Lavender Scare and 924
March on Washington 993
philosophy 229 247-248
song recorded for 943
Daughters of the Sun (film) 1625
Dave, Naisargi 1396 1427
David Hockney: Fourteen Poems from CP Cavafy (exhibit) 1104

David, Jacques-Louis 1119

Davidson, Julia O'Connell 1440

Davies, Dave 1256

Davis, Angela Y. 943

Davis, Madeline D. 117 1546-1547

Davis, Paul 7

Davis, Thomas 236

Dawson, Graham 1702

Day, F. Holland 33-34 642

Day without Art 682

Days of... (poem series) 308

De ambiente, as term 1650

De khwar lasme spogmay (film) 1270

De la Calancha, Antonio 1078

De la Cruz, Sor Juana Inés See Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz

De la Peña, Vicente Bonifacio Isidro 1497

de la tierra, tatiana See tatiana de la tierra

De Lauretis, Teresa 1324-1325 1333

De Lind van Wijngaarden, Jan Willem 729

De Nyeko, Monica Arac 956 958

De Paiva, Antonio 1717-1718

“De Profundis” (essay) 31 1727 1728

De Waal, Shaun 952

Deadly Nightshade (band) 945
Deaf LGBTQI+ people 902

Dean, James 1602

Dean, Robert D. 924

Dean, Tim 1387-1388

Dear Abby (newspaper column) 1475

Dearden, Basil 1482

Death penalty for homosexuality
   Cape Town 299
   colonial Latin America 1495 1499 1507 1509
   ISIS gay trials 844-846
   Islamic law 1365-1366 1557 medieval Europe 86
   Middle East 758 845
   South Africa 1524
   United Kingdom 84 1066 1161
   United States 1512
See also Murders of LGBTQ people

Le déboussolé (Doukouré) 965

Debt bondage 1459

Debussy, Claude 33

Decadence movement See Aestheticism and decadence, nineteenth-century

Il Decameron (film) 1205

Decker, Julie Sondra 136

“Declaration in Support of the Just Struggle of Homosexuals and Women” (Newton) 73

Decolonising the Mind: The Politics of Language in African Literature (Thiong'o) 877

Decriminalization of homosexuality
   Argentina 1500
   Australia 167-170 1163 1421
   Brazil 1500
   Bulgaria 402 1481
   Canada 203 295-298 1163 1720 1742
Chile 110
China 1598 1604
Croatia 1481
Czechoslovakia 402
Denmark 1687
Ecuador 772
efforts in South Asia 1426-1427
El Salvador 1500
Europe 1481-1482
Fiji 1163 1421 1563
Germany 402 1240 1243 1482 1662
Guatemala 1500
Hong Kong 1163 1307 1421 1604
as human rights issue 763-764
Hungary 402 493 1481
India 1131 1163 1426-1427
influence on photography practices 1235
Israel 78
Latin America 1500
Mexico 1500
Mongolia 1083
Mozambique 1087 1088
Netherlands 1481
New Zealand 166 1163 1421
Northern Ireland 1163 1421 1742
Peru 1500
Poland 1481
Russia 1123 1401
Scotland 1163 1421 1742
Serbia 1481
Slovenia 1481
South Africa 1163 1529
United Kingdom 1104 1163 1421 1481 1662 1742
United States 1512 1513-1517 1662
Wolfenden Report recommendations 1742

Decter, Midge 1380

Dedh Ishqiyā (film) 559

Deedeh-ban (film) 1020

Deen, Faizal 973-974

The Deep Blue Sea (play) 1574
Deep Breath (film) 1022

Deep Green Resistance (DGR) 490

Deep inside Annie Sprinkle (film) 1275

“Deeper and Deeper” (song) 1256

Defeat AIDS 711

Defert, Daniel 2 710

Defiant Desire: Gay and Lesbian Lives in South Africa (Gevisser and Cameron, eds.) 8 960

Defosse, Dana Leland 359

Degeneration (Nordau) 34 81

Degeneration theory 1291-1292 1293

Dehnamaki, Masoud 1021

Dehner, Durk 1602

Del Poggio, Carla 1322

Delaney, Shelagh 1577

Delany, Samuel R. 430 609

Delgado, Luis 23

Delhi High Court 1130-1131

Delkash (singer) 1625

Delmas Treason Trial 1156-1157

DeLuca, Kevin 43

D'Emilio, John 115 373 1325 1689-1690

Deming, Barbara 937

Dempster, Walter, Jr. 814
Deng Xiaoping 1729

Denmark
  African refugees in 1344
  archival records 104
  LGBTQ-friendly climate 1048
  LGBTQ military service 1069
  pornography and erotica development 1265 1481
  queer slang 912
  same-sex partnerships 1008
  sexual revolution 1481
  sodomy laws 87
  Stonewall Riots impact 1552
  Ugly Law 1687-1688

Densmore, Dana 140

Denver Principles 736

Deonism, as term 1640

DePalma, Renée 1528

Dependent woman-woman marriage, in Africa 1015 1017

Der Kreis 574

Desai, Poulomi 1129

Descendants of the Eunuch Admiral (play) 1744

"Descuento" (short story) 1296

Desde allá (film) 357

Desert Fathers 1354-1355

Desert Hearts (Deitch) 545

Desire, Love, Identity: Exploring LGBTQ Histories (exhibit) 1104

Desiring Arabs (Massad) 583 751 1311 1330 1666-1667 1754

Despentes, Virginie 1276

Desperate Remedies (film) 175

Despised and Rejected (Fitzroy) 1504
Dessaix, Robert 175

The Destiny of Me (play) 1576

Deutsche AIDS-Hilfe 711

Deutsche Freundschafts-Verband (DFV) 573-574

Deutsche Gesellschaft für Sexualwissenschaft (German Society for Sexual Research) 1480

Deutsches Historisches Museum (German Historical Museum) 1102

Devereux, George 510

Le devoir de violence (Ouologuem) 964-965 966-967

Devor, Aaron 1328

Dewey’s Lunch Counter sit-ins 403

Deya, Karim 968 970

DGR (Deep Green Resistance) 490

d’Halmar, Augusto 554 1316

Dhat (Ibrahim) 1488

Dhumbra (dance) 1563

Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders (DSM) 452-457

- asexuality 137 139
- BDSM 211
- desire disorders 455
- development disorders 455-456
- gender dysphoria classification 1063
- homosexuality 227 453-454 1320 1484
- introduction of transsexualism 1643
- paraphilias 426
- trans diagnoses 146 454-455

The Dialogues of Luisa Sigea (Chorier) 1263

Diamanda, Frau 1276

Diamond, Shea 1260
Diary of a Transsexual (Raskin) 1265

Diasporas, queer 457-461
   Caribbean 975
   Filipino 189 459 1330 1692
   Islamic 1367
   Latinx 587-590
   Lebanese 801-805 802
   Muslim 193 459
   North African 985 1464
   Pacific Islands 1191-1192
   Puerto Rican 1294-1300 1295 1298
   queer theory approaches to globalization 1330
   Tibetan 1598-1599 1600

Díaz, Bernal 417-418

Díaz, Jorge 1276

Díaz, Porfirio 1035 1038

Díaz, Robert 189

Díbia, Jude 957-958 1154

Dickinson, Goldsworthy Lowes 1166

Dickinson, Robert Latou 368

Dictionaries, gay 894

Dictionnaire philosophique (Voltaire) 365

The Diesel (al-Suwaidi) 474-478 475

Different from the Others (film) 1123-1124

A Different Light bookshop (San Francisco) 252

Difficult Love (film) 336

Diggers (Australian soldiers) 1702

Digital archives
   Africa 94 338 830
   Asia 99-100
   Europe 105
Digital cultures in Latin America 461-468 activism networks 465-466 465 blogging 465 466-467
mixed media 466
online media in counterpublics 462-464 private space, public platform 464-465

Digital divide 1145

Digital technology
Asia 1142-1147 1143
Khookha McQueer art 878-880 879 880
pornography and erotica development 1270-1271
rural use 1396
urban queerness and 1692-1693
See also Internet

Digital Transgender Archive (DTA) 117 1619

Dignity (Catholic group) 1357 1358

Dildo Roza festival 1277

Dildos
as instrumental penis 1216 1216 1219
orgasm considerations 1171
use in pornography 1266
woman-woman marriage in Africa 1017

Dillon, Laurence Michael 674

Din, Muhammad 1426

Din, Muhammad v. The State (Pakistan; 1981) 1426

Ding, Naifei 376-377

DiNovo, Cheri 298 1721

Dinshaw, Carolyn 521 1327

Dionis, Pierre 369

Diop, Barbara 1615
Diop, Cheikh Anta 384
Diop, Massamba 1429
DiPietro, Pedro 866
Direct flight migration 1343 1344
Disabilities, people with Beechtree collective serving 937
desexualization of 139-140
Disability studies, intersectionality with queer theory 132 1331 Discharges, military blue tickets 1059 1689
  United Kingdom 1067-1068 1069
  United States, Cold War 1059-1060
  United States, Don't Ask, Don't Tell policy 238 449 783 1061 1061 1069
  United States, World Wars I and II 1057-1059
Disco Disco (film) 706
Discretion reasoning, in asylum cases 1050
Discrimination against LGBTQI people
  Africa 1335 1345 1614-1616 1677 1735-1739 black freedom movements 230-235
  Cameroon 1360
  Canada 1241 1720 1721
  China 1631 1632
  Denmark 1552
  Europe 1051-1052
  Homomonument memorial 1107
  Hong Kong 1714-1715
  Indonesia 1717 1718 1719
  Iran 1434-1437 1637
  Islamic countries 1368
  Jewish communities 1371 1372-1374
  kathoey 872-873
  Kenya 875-876 876877
  Khookha McQueer 878
  kinship models and 888
  Latin America 930 931
  Lavender Scare 922-925 923
  military organizations 1055
Mongolia 1083 1084-1085
Mozambique 1087 1088
Namibia 1117
Nazi regime 1239-1240
Nepal 1563-1565
new media and 1145
Nicaragua 1149
Nigeria 1150-1154 1677
phone apps and 1230
refugees 1534-1536
Scouting groups 1415-1417
Senegal 1428-1429
South Africa 1522-1528
sub-Saharan Africa 10-11
Taiwan 999-1000 1006-1007 1633
Tunisia 878
Uganda 1681-1686
United States 1201-1202 1513
veterans’ benefits 1709-1710
Zimbabwe 1750-1751 1752

See also Homophobia

_Discriminatory Laws and Practices and Acts of Violence against Individuals Based on Their Sexual Orientation and Gender Identity_ (United Nations) 760

Disease view of homosexuality See _Pathologization of homosexuality_

_Disgrace_ (film) 340

_Disorderly Families: Infamous Letters from the Bastille Archives_ (Farge and Foucault) 569

Disponível (phone app) 1229

Disposable Boy Toys (troupe) 1579

Dissidence in Singapore 468-474 469 472

Ditsie, Beverley Palesa 335 1157 1526-1527

Ditto, Beth 1259

_Divan şiiinde sapik sevgi_ (study) 949

Diversiles (Diverse Lesbians) 941

_The DiVida Poems_ (Hand) 485
The Divided Path (Kent) 1304

Divinas Divas 282-283

Divinas Divas (film) 282-283

Al-Dizil (al-Suwaidi) 474-478 475

Dlamini, Edgar (pseudonym) 1337

Dlugacz, Judy 945

DMSC (Durbar Mahila Samanwaya Committee) 731 1460

Doan, Laura 86

Doan, Petra 1690

Dobkin, Alix 944 945 947

Docking 1215

Doctrina cristiana y cathecismo, con un confesionario, arte y vocabulario breves en lengua Allentiac (Valdivia) 408

Document changes See Identification document changes

Dodson, Betty 1476

Doherty, Benjamin 1454

Dokhtaran-e khorshid (film) 1625

Dokhtari be nam-e Tondar (film) 1625

Dollimore, Jonathan 291 293

Domesticity, queer, in Europe 1312-1314 1313

Domínguez Ruvalcaba, Héctor 915

Dominican Republic
   Carnival celebrations 1650
guevedoces 839
   performance artists in 1228
   sex tourism 1446
   sex workers 1449
travesti and trans activism 1652

Don (magazine) 1482

Doña Herlinda y su hijo (film) 352-353

El donador de almas (Nervo) 186

Donaldson, Stephen 592 661

Donham, Donald L. 506 842

Donna Curry Investments, LLC, et al., Hickman v. (US; 2006) 892-893

Donnell, Alison 971

Donoso, José 351 352

Donovan, Casey 1265

Don’t Ask, Don’t Tell policy (United States) 238 449 783 1060-1063 1709

"Don’t Touch Me“ (song) 38-39

Dorane asheghi (film) 1638

Döring, Nicola 1693

Die dorische Knabenliebe (Bethe) 366

Dorji, Passang 223

Dorotheos of Sidon 1318

Dorsey, Sean 1532-1533

Las dos Fridas (performance art show) 1225

Dos Santos, João Francisco (Madame Satã) 981-983

Doseiai, as term 1603

Dossani, Shahid 758

Doty, Mark 308

Douglas, James 1414 1726

Douglas, Lord Alfred
themes and works 372
Wilde, Oscar relationship 31 1728 1731-1732 1732

Douglas, Mary 1383
Doukouré, Abdoul 965
Doumbi-Fakoly 966-967
Dowd, Harrison 1303

“Down at the Cross” (Baldwin) 233-234
Dowson, Ernest 33

Dr. 90210 (television series) 1220

Drag
   conflation with trans women, in migrant communities 1042 language considerations 901
   mashoga term 908
See also Cross-dressing

Drag, Asian 478-483 479

Drag kings 1579

Drag performers
   bio queening 1259
   Latin America 1650 1656
   lesbian 943
   Madame Satâ 981-983
   queer theater connections 1578-1579 ritual as performance for 1387
   travesti and trans activism 1656

The Drag (play) 1574

Draga, as term 1650

Drake, Sylvia 533

Dramouss (Laye) 965

A Dream of Africa (Laye) 965

Dream of My Handicapped Life (Krishan) 132
Dreger, Alice 837 838

Drei Abhandlungen zur Sexualtheorie (Freud) 425

Dreyfus affair (1894) 76 1659-1660

Dreyfus, Alfred 76 1659-1660

Drill Hall (London) 1576

Driskill, Qwo-Li 1669 1673

Drucker, Peter 626

Drug abuse 946

Drushel, Bruce 679

Društvo Študentski Kulturni–Lezbična Lilit (Student Cultural Association–Lesbian Lilith) 104

DTA (Digital Transgender Archive) 117 1619

du & ich (magazine) 1482 1551

Du Bois, W. E. B. 640

Du Plessis, Gabriel R. 62

Dual descent societies 1016

Duanxiu, as term 1238

Dubai, United Arab Emirates, travel to 1647

Dubbing concept 1091

Dube, Daisy 1614

Dube, Musa W. 1680

Duberman, Martin 405 1550

Dubois, Frank 533

DuBowski, Sandi Simcha 1373

Dudgeon, Jeff 1163
Dudgeon v. United Kingdom (European Court of Human Rights; 1981) 791 1163

Duffy, Carol Ann 255
Dufoix, Stéphane 458
Dugas, Gaëtan 678
Dugdale, William 1263
Duggan, Lisa 886 1135 1139 1388
Duiker, K. Sello 959 1463 1529
Duke University Press 1328
Dunbar-Ortiz, Roxanne 140
Duncan, George 169-170
Dunton, Chris 953 955 957 965
Dunya (fictional character) 1208 1211
Duque, Andrés 466
Durand, Sophia 1099 1100
Durban Declaration 680
Durbar Mahila Samanwaya Committee (DMSC) 731 1460
Durrant, John 89
Dustan, Guillaume 2
Dutch Judicial Division of the Council of State 1048
Dutta, Aniruddha 669 1471
Düttmann, Alexander Garcia 711
Duyvendak, Jan Willem 375
D.W. Outpost 935
Dworkin, Andrea 1266 1275
Dyer, Rebecca 178
Dyer, Richard 291-292 544
Dyke Action Machine 620
Dyke marches 1283

Dyke Power (blog) 467

Dykes to Watch Out For (Bechdel) 251 252-253

Dyketactics! 483-485

Dyketactics et al. v. Fencl et al. (US; 1976) 484

Dzi Croquettes 282 1224

Dzi Croquettes (film) 1224

E

E. B. v. France (European Court of Human Rights; 2008) 19 796

e-misférica (online journal) 652

An Early Frost (film) 683

Earth, Barbara 1441

The Earth Trembles (film) 1322

“Earthling” (short story) 956-957

EASO (European Asylum Support Office) 1051

East Asia 998

East Coast Homophile Organizations (ECHO) 1025

East/West binaries See West/East binaries

Eberhardt, Isabelle 989

ECHO (East Coast Homophile Organizations) 1025

ECHR See European Court of Human Rights (ECHR)

Ecology and environmental issues and activism 487-492 488 491
Ecology, queer 1330

Ecosexuality 490

Ecuador
  constitutional reforms 1139
  decriminalization of homosexuality 772
  identification document changes for trans people 1141
  LGBTQ rights activism 721 770 772
  transfeminism development 1620 1622

Edel, Deborah 115 932

Edelberg, Peter 1552

Edkins, Don 336

Edozien, Chike Frankie 962

The Education of Little Cis (Enke) 362

Edward II (Jarman) 546

Edwards, Alice 1346

Edwards, Brian T. 986

Edwin, Shirin 536

Effeminacy
  Arabic terms for 1318 1320
  Mexican stereotypes 183 186 553 914 915
  South African stereotypes 690
  as term 1582

Efya 40

Egaña Rojas, Lucía 1274 1620

Eger, Denise 1375

Eggert, Michael 1711

Egymásra nézve (film) 492-495

Egypt
  Cavafy Museum 1106
  cultural references to the penis 1213
desert fathers 1354-1355 homosexuality and cinema 148-152 658-660 847-851 847 848
LGBTQ migration attempts 1051
Queen Boat Trials 1308-1312 1309 same-sex behaviors 1366
sexology development 1470
Sharaf depiction of 1486-1491
terminology for nonnormative sexualities 1096 1320
travel and travelogues 1646-1647
Tuqas al-isharat wa-al-tahawwulat production 1664 1667

“An Egyptian Cigarette” (Chopin) 29

EHAIA (World Council of Churches’ Ecumenical HIV and AIDS Initiatives and Advocacy) 324

Ehlers, Christine 1615

Eichhorn, Kate 117

Der Eigene (journal) 373

Einayim Pkuhot (film) 495-500 496 497

Eisenhower, Dwight D. 922 924 1059 1060

Eisenstadt v. Baird (US; 1972) 1485

Ejército Popular de Alfabetización (Nicaragua) 1148

Ekrajiha (film) 1021

Ekikazikazi (womanly male) 1682

Ekine, Sokari 538 952

Ekitiibwa principle 907

Ekotto, Frieda 968 969 970

El-Ariss, Tarek 56-57 1753

El E bar (Mexico) 201

El Hábito (cabaret bar) 280-282 655-656 1699

El Menyawi, Hassan 1367
El-Rouayheb, Khaled 373

El Saadawi, Nawal 536

El Salvador
decriminalization of homosexuality 1500
feminicide 600
HIV/AIDS 717 721
sex workers 1449
sports crowd homophobic chants 1538
travesti and trans activism 1651 1653

El-Tawhid Juma Circle 1367

Elbe, Lili 362 500-502 501 1642

Elden, Stuart 710

Eldorado 197

_Eldorado—the History, Everyday Life, and Culture of Homosexual Women and Men, 1850–1950_ (exhibit) 1102

Eliot, George 1167

Elizabeth Taylor AIDS Foundation 111

Elliott, Beth 1259

Elliott, Carolyn M. 727

Ellis, Havelock
Burton, Richard Francis influence on 1595
deonism 1640
eonism 319 358
Hall, Radclyffe influenced by 1725
homosexual rights advocacy 1166
impact on public perceptions 1473
Krafft-Ebing, Richard von influenced by 1294
philosophy 225 226 425 675
sexology work 1121 1466 1467 1468
situational homosexuality 1504 transvestism vs. transsexualism 1641
Wolfenden Committee influenced by 1741

Ellis, Joan 1303
Elliston, Deborah A. 1384

“Ellos y yo” (poem) 1251

Elmaleh, Gad 989

Elman, Miriam 1247

Eloína dos Leopards 283

Elphinstone, Mountstuart 1419

Eltitkolt vek (film) 104

El Vicio (cabaret) 656

Ely, Robert 1068

Elyot, Kevin 1576

Embarcados 1447

Emens, Elizabeth F. 139

Emerson, Ralph Waldo 30

Emerton, Robyn 1715

Emojis 1231

Emotional Crack (film) 335 338

Emperor, Khanu v. (India; 1925) 1425

Emperor, Noshirwan v. (India; 1935) 1425

“The Empire Strikes Back: A Posttranssexual Manifesto” (essay) 1328

Employment

Africa 1345

Lambda Legal Defense and Education Fund work 892

Mongolian LGBTQ people 1083

Nigeria 1154

Southern Comfort Conference expo 1533

See also Government employment

En tierra de vaqueros (film) 199
“En voz baja . . . a un efebo” (poem) 1296

Encuentros (conferences) 462 928-932 941 1568

The Encyclopedia of Pleasure (Amer) 52 53

Endean, Steve 781-782

Enderuni, Fazıl-ı 950 1182

Enduring Passion (Stopes) 1474

Eneas (twelfth-century French work) 1658

L’enfant de sable (Ben Jelloun) 989

Eng, David 459 979

Engebretsen, Elisabeth 1396 1691

Engel, Stephen 1552

Engendering Social Sciences in Africa (essays) 535-536

England See United Kingdom

England, Francis 1590-1591

English Heritage 1107

English language use
   Lebanon 927-928 1032
   Tonga 901

Enke, A. Finn 359 362 1621 1622

Ensler, Eve 603

Enslin, Gotthold Frederick 1057

Entartung (Nordau) 81

Las Entendidas (The Understood Women) 931

Entendido, as term 1650

Entreteneurs, as term 895
Epanga relations (Namibia) 1115-1116

Epidemic of Hate (Mott) 772

Episcopal Church
ordering of LGBTQI people 1359-1360
self-affirming LGBTQ movement 1357

Episcopalians United for Revelation, Renewal and Reformation 1359

Epistemology of the Closet (Sedgwick) 373 375 376 1325 1327

Epistemology, transfeminism as 1621

Episthenes (ancient Greek soldier) 1406

Epprecht, Marc
African queer literature analysis 952 953 queer theory concerns 906 same-sex practices in Africa 65 700 1523 1525 1570 1571
ubuntu concept 1680

Epps, Brad 1315 1316

Epstein, Brian 1255

Epstein, Steven 677

Equal Opportunities Commission Act (2007) (Uganda) 1683 1684

Equal protection claims, in decriminalization efforts
Nepal 1563 1564
South Africa 261 1526 1529 1530
United States 1516 1517

Equality Begins at Home (federation) 996

Erauso, Catalina de 502-505 503

Ererun, Sertab 523

Erickson, Bruce 1330

Erickson, Reed 116 405 1643

“Ernest Borgnine” (song) 1259

Ernst, Claire E. 711
Ernst, Morris 1726

Ero-guro nansensu (cult genre) 1269

_Eros: Die Männerliebe der Griechen_ (Hössli) 365

Eros (student group) 570-571

_Erotic Ghost Story_ (film series) 1270

Erotica

Moche pottery sex pots 1077-1078 1077 pornography vs. 1260

See also Pornography

_Erotica_ (album) 1256

_Die Erotik der Kabbala_ (Langer) 1376

_Érotisme africain_ (Hanry) 513-514

_Eryu shouji_ (Qiu) 1613 1613

Escales Documentaires festival (La Rochelle) 346

Escoffier, Jeffrey 1502 1505-1506

Escola Superior de Guerra (ESG) 380

Eshaghian, Tanaz 530 1626 1637

Eskridge, William N., Jr. 1513

Eslen-Ziya, Hande 1527

Esparragosa, Narciso 1498 1499

Espedal, Kristian Eivind (Gaahl) 1258

Espejo, Bea 1378

Espinosa Islas, Sara 940 941

Espionage Act (US) 1662

Esta Noche (bar) 589

_esto no tiene nombre_ (magazine) 1567 1568
L'etat honteux (Tansi) 966

Eteraz (film) 1022 1022

Etheridge, Melissa 947

Ethiopia 505-507
   ashtime 1614
   asylum seeking 1343

Ethnopornography 507-510 507

Ethnopsychiatry 388 510-514 512-513

Ética amatoria del deseo libertario y las afectaciones libres y alegres (Ludditas Sexxxuales) 1276

EU See European Union (EU)

Eugenics
   essentialism in 226
   European movements 1121-1123
   India 1466-1467
   Nazi program 1027-1028 1127

Eugenides, Jeffrey 191 836 1220

Eulenburg affair (1907–1909) 376 1027 1122 1412 1413 1660

Eunuchs 514-522
   Africa 841-842
   ancient Greece and Rome 674
   Byzantine Empire 518-519 674
   castrati in Europe 517-518
   China 515-516 674
   contemporary representation 520-521
   India 516-517
   in Islamic culture 1628
   in King James Bible 517
   Middle East 517
   modern castration 520
   Ottoman Empire 519-520 616 674
   skoptsi in Russia 518 types and roles 514-515
   Zheng He 1743-1745 1743

Europe
ACT UP branches 2-3 711
adoption and surrogacy 16-20 22 23
advocacy for LGBTQI refugees 1347
aestheticism and decadence, nineteenth-century 30-31
anti-gender movement 69-71 anti-racist activism 71-75 72 anti-Semitism 75-77 80-83
archival records 103-106
bars and cabarets 196-199 197
Boys Love manga 266
calls for migration reform 1345
circumcision opposition 1218
cross-dressing 424-428
eyearly pornography and erotica 1262-1263
Eurovision Song Contest 522-525 524
friendship societies 573-574
gender identity law 119 120 122
government scandals involving same-sex relationships 1412-1415 1413 1659-1662 influence on heteronormativity shift in Iran 1493 kinship in 885-889 887
koro outbreaks 1214
language 909-913 911t
LGBTQ rights organizations 625-628 liberalism development 1132-1133 perceptions of North Africa 986-987
phone apps 1229
photography in 1233-1236 1233 1234
pinkwashing concerns 1244-1245 portrayal in African queer literature 965 post-World War II political divisions 1479
postrevolutionary conservative period 1120-1123 pride demonstrations 396 1278-1281 1282 1283 1284 1285 queer domesticity in 1312-1314 1313
refugees and immigration policies 1349
sexology development 1465 1468
sexual revolution 1478-1483 1480
treason associated with sodomy 1659
universal marriage 1008-1014 1010t

See also European Union (EU) HIV/AIDS in Europe Migration to Europe Nationalism and sexuality in Europe specific countries

European Asylum Support Office (EASO) 1051
European Center for Law and Justice 1013
European Commission on Sexual Orientation Law 1013

European Convention on Human Rights 763 790-797 1011

European Court of Human Rights (ECHR)
  adoption and surrogacy 18-19
  immigration policies 1048 1051
  LGBTQ rights 791-797 mandate 789-790
  marriage cases 1011-1012
  Operation Spanner case 1164 pride events ruling 1279
  support for LGBTQ people in Eastern Europe 1283

European Court of Justice See Court of Justice of the European Union (CJEU)

European Parliament 790

European Union (EU)
  family law 1012
  LGBTQ law 797
  refugee status for persecuted LGBTQ people 1048-1050
  support for LGBTQ people in Eastern Europe 1283
See also Europe

EuroPride events 1279 1282 1284

Eurovision Song Contest 522-525 524

Eva Perón (play) 1223

Evans, David T. 1284

Evans, Harriet 1598

Evans, Jennifer 401

Evans-Pritchard, E. E. 63-65 65 1015 1735

Evans, Richard G. 892

Evans, Romer v. (US; 1996) 892

Everard, James 1069

“Everything Under the Sun” (short story) 953
Everything You Wanted to Know about Sex (But Were Afraid to Ask) (Reuben) 1480

Evolution’s Rainbow: Diversity, Gender, and Sexuality in Nature and People (Roughgarden) 491

d’Évreux, Yves 1355 1356

Ex Nilalang (film) 129-130 129

Exclusion category, LGBT Military Index 1055

Execution of homosexuals See Death penalty for homosexuality

Executive Order 9835 (United States; 1947) 922

Executive Order 10450 (United States; 1953) 922 1059-1060

Exhivilización: Las perras en cello (performance art show) 1226

Exiles (Gupta) 128

Exodus International 1359

Extracción de la piedra de locura (Pizarnik) 1249

Eyene, Charles Ateba 1737

Eyes Wide Open (film) 495-500 496

Eyre, Banning 38

Eyres, Robert 1590 1591

Eyū shōji (Qiu) 1004

Eyubolu, İsmet Zeki 949

Ezra, Moses ibn 1370

F

F. v. Bevándorlási és Menekültügyi Hivatal (Court of Justice of the European Union; 2016) 1050

Fa’aafāfine 1189-1190 1191 1408-1410

Faces and Phases 2006–2014 (exhibit) 1105
Faces and Phases (film) 1399

Facing Mirrors (film) 1626-1627 1637

Facing Mount Kenya (Kenyatta) 874

Faderman, Lillian
  blues music 943
  female same-sex relationships 1325-1326
  Foucault on 567
  themes and works 254 257 258

Fadl, Fathi 1490

Fahs, Breanne 140

Faint Heart 534 (painting) 1674

Fair Courts Project 893

Fairytales for Lost Children (Osman) 955 957

Faith, Karlene 946

Fakaleitīs 901 1187 1189 1585

Fake orgasm 1169

Falconí, Diego 1315 1316

FALGBT (Federación Argentina de Lesbianas, Gays, Bisexuales y Trans) 121 1290 1651

Fall, Aminata Sow 965

The Fall of the House of Usher (Poe) 30

Fallon, Paul 1282 1284

False positives scandal (Colombia) 1139

The Fame Monster (album) 1259

Families
  African queer literature portrayals 955-956
  heterosexual norms 885-886
  lesbian mothering and adoption in Latin America 938-942 939
  Malaysia 990
tongzhi literature depictions 1612
See also Kinship in Europe

FamiliesAndSocieties research project 1013

Family law in Asia 527-532 529 adoption, fostering, and surrogacy 21 22
  kinship 527-528
  patriarchy and marriage law 528-530

Family Life Network 1685

Family (performance art show) 1226

Family reunification immigration policies
  European Union 1051
  United States 1040 1043

The Famished Road (Okri) 959

The Famous 41 (Irwin et al., eds.) 186

Fan cultures, in pornography 1271

Fanchonos (faggots) 1508

Fanny Hill (Cleland) 1263

Fanon, Frantz 389 510 512-513

A Fantastic Woman (film) 1656 1692

Farage, Nigel 3

Farahani, Mitra 1626

FARC (Fuerzas Armadas Revolucionarias de Colombia) 1139

The Farce of Sodom, or the Quintessence of Debauchery (play) 1263

Fardin, Mohammad ‘Ali 1019

Farge, Arlette 569

Farhat, Sherif 1310

Faria, Nino R. 679
Farkhondeh, Reza 51 54

Farm Boys (Fellows) 1398

Farrāj, ‘Afīf 208

Farrakhan, Louis 679

Farrier, Stephen 1573

FARUG (Freedom and Roam Uganda) 537 907

Farzand-i bimar-i tabī‘at (television special) 1626

Fascism

association with hypermasculinity 1124-1126 1322

Italian neorealism cinematic portrayals 1322

Fashanu, Justin 337

Fassbinder, Rainer Werner 1482 1601

Fatale Media 1266

Al-Fatiha (website) 831

Faubert, Ida 977

Fault-Lines: Disparate and Desperate Intimacies (exhibit) 1105

Faupel, John F. 1681 1682

Fausto-Sterling, Anne 1329

Favez, Enrique 816

Fawcett Gold Medal 1301 1302

Fawzy, Hany 148-152

Fayad, Mona 632 633-634 635

FDA (Federal Drug Administration) 4-5

Fè zanmi, as term 1650

Federación Argentina de Lesbianas, Gays, Bisexuales y Trans (FALGBT) 121 1290 1651
Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) 922-923
Federal Compensation Law (1956) (Germany) 1242
Federal Drug Administration (FDA) 4-5
Fédération Internationale de Football Association (FIFA) 1538 1543
Fedotova v. Russian Federation (UN Human Rights Committee; 2012) 763
The Feeling of Kinship (Eng) 459
Feinberg, Leslie 1331 1546-1548
Feinstein, Moshe 1371
Felbeck, Friederike 1664
Felbrigg Hall (UK) 1106-1107
Feldman, Jamie L. 710
Feldman, Maxine 944-945
Felipe, Liliana 280-281 655-656 1699
Felix, Diane 588 589
Félix, María 349 349
Fellows, Will 1398
Fellowship of Affirming Ministries (TFAM) 326
Felsenthal, Julia 362
Female Ejaculation Practical and Experimental Workshop 1277
The Female Eunuch (Greer) 521
Female genital mutilation (FGM) 369-370 967
Female husband 532-534
Africa 64 93 387
passing women 539-540 815-816
The Female Husband (Fielding) 532
Female marriage See Boston marriage and women’s romantic friendships Woman-woman marriage, in Africa

Female masculinity
- butch women 540 541
- Igbo people 595
- Latin America and the Caribbean 1650-1651
- queer theory approaches 1328
- sports and 1539-1540
- zhongxing phenomenon vs. 1746

Female Masculinity (Halberstam) 1328

Female soldiers
- Mexican Revolution 1036
- Nicaraguan Revolution 1148-1149 1148

Female-to-male cinema characters 1623 1624-1625

“The Female World of Love and Ritual” (Smith-Rosenberg) 255 257

Femfest (Chile) 1622

Feminicide, in Latin America 599-606 599

Femininity
- Africa 63
- anti-Semitism and 76 81
- athletes 158 160
- biological essentialism views 226 228
- butch-femme roles and 540 541
- camp and 291-292 293
- Christian acceptance of same-sex acts and 1357
- French Revolution era beliefs 1120
- Iran 1623
- Italian neorealism cinematic portrayals 1322-1323
- kathoey 869-870
- Khookha McQueer digital art 879 879 880
- Native American cultures 1583
- Pasolini’s cinematic adaptation of A Thousand and One Nights 1210
- queer theory approaches 1328
- Samoan fa’afafine 1408-1409
- sports and sexuality in Latin America 1539-1540
- Vietnam War era 1702-1703

Feminism
BDSM views 214
black and LGBTQ rights 234-235 390-394 bookstores 250-252 252t
camp and 292-293
discontinuities between lesbian activism and heterosexual feminism 940 Ditsie, Beverley Palesa activism 1526-1527 gay liberation activism connection 1704-1705
impact on public perceptions 1475-1476 influence on lesbian lands 936
Iran 1639
kathoey 872 873
Lavender Menace 593 919-921 920 936
lesbian writing and 859
Meem 1031-1032
mixed embrace of lesbianism 919-921 pornoterrorismo and post-porn concerns 1276-1277 sex wars and contemporary pornography 1266-1267 1275 1456
sexology criticism 1466 1471
Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz contributions 1518 1519 varieties of 936

Feminism, African 534-538
Coalition of African Lesbians (CAL) 12 corrective rape concerns 1342

Feminism Imposes Itself (Posada) 185

The Feminist Bookstore Movement (Hogan) 250

Feminist Bookstore News (Seajay) 251

Feminist Library (London) 104

“Femme noire” (poem) 967

Femme nue, femme noire (Beyala) 968-969

Femmes and butches 538-543 539
Asia 469
bar culture 1546-1547
cruising 430-431 540-542
in film 293
gender identities 361-362 538-542
Stone Butch Blues depiction 1546-1548
tongzhi literature 1611 1613
The Well of Loneliness depiction 1725 1726
Fencl et al., Dyketactics! et al. v. (US; 1976) 484

Fernandes, Alécio Nunes 629

Fernández de Kirchner, Cristina 121

Fernandez, Jean 986

Fernández, José Antonio 23

Fernández, Josefina 1654

Ferré, Rosario 1297

Ferreira, Eduarda 626

Ferreira, Gabriel Dias 284

Ferreira, Ruby 1656

Ferreyra, José Agustín (“El Negro”) 348

Festival de Films LGBT de Toulouse 346

Festival International du Film Lesbien et Féministe de Paris 346

Le fétichisme dans l’amour (Binet) 425

Fetishism
  corporatization 212
  leather 212-216 213
  Pasolini’s cinematic adaptation of A Thousand and One Nights 1209 1211

Few, Martha 1498

FFC-Acrush (band) 1145

FGM (female genital mutilation) 369-370 967

FHAR See Frente Homosexual de Acción Revolucionaria (FHAR) Front Homosexuel d’Action Révolutionnaire (FHAR)

Field, Michael (pseudonym) 256 888 1410-1412

Fielding, Henry 532

Fierce Love (play) 1577 fierce pussy (art collective) 620 621
Fierro, Pancho 1097
Fierstein, Harvey 1377 1576
FIFA (Fédération Internationale de Football Association) 1538 1543
Fifi—The Goodbye (Amer) 52
Fifty Shades of Grey (James) 216
Fig Trees (film) 336
Figari, Carlos 768
Fiji
decriminalization of homosexuality 1163 1421 1563
Section 377 legacies 1420
Fiji National Crimes Decree (2010) 1421
Fiks, Yevgeniy 105
Filicide concept 1288
Fillod, Odile 371
Film-e abgushti (stewpot films) 1019
Film festivals 543-549 See also Cinema specific films
Filmoteca at the Universidad Nacional Autónoma de Mexico 112
Un fils (film) 1464
“The Filth of Freedom” (short story) 956
Filthy Exhibition (Muestra Marrana) 1277
Fimí Sîlè. Forever: Heaven Gave It to Me (Ikpo) 958 1154
Fin de siècle sexuality 550-555
aestheticism and decadence 26-35 554-555
Argentina 551-552
Mexico 552-554
naming in 256-257
Finland
  adoption of adults 886 887
  archival records 105
  gentrification 607 608-610 609
  kinship models 887 888
  LGBTQ military service 1069
  queer domesticity arrangements 1314
  queer slang 912
  sodomy laws 87
  Tom of Finland 609 1601-1603 1601

Finland, Hämäläinen v. (European Court of Human Rights; 2014) 794

Finn, David 1024

Finocchio, as term 912

Il fiore delle mille e una notte (film) See Pasolini’s cinematic adaptation of A Thousand and One Nights

Fire!! A Quarterly Devoted to the Younger Negro Artists (journal) 642-643

Fire (film) 556-559 557 558

A Fire in My Belly (Wojnarowicz) 738

Fire Island: House Boy (film series) 1380

Fire Island Pines, New York, resort areas 1379 1380 1387

The Fire Next Time (Baldwin) 233-234

Firebrand Books 1546

First Congress to Unite Women (1969) 920

The Fish Child (film) 357

Fisher, Gary 430

Fisher, Kate 1467

Fisher, Simon D. Elin 1622

“Fistful of Love” (song) 1256
Fisting, as ritual 1387
Fitzroy, A. T. (pseudonym) 1504
Five sexes, Thailand 871
Five Women at Work (Amer) 62
Fiyabo (Mac-Iyalla) 323
Le flamant noir (Matoko) 968 970
Flaubert, Gustave 33 1452 1644 1668
Flaugh, Christian 1657
Fleshlight sex aid 1171
Flete, as term 1448
FLH See Frente de Liberación Homosexual Front de Libération Homosexuel
FLHM (Frente de Liberación Homosexual Mexicano) 768 940
Floor, Willem 1494
Florentine Codex 1315
Florentine Codex and Nahua sexuality 559-563 561 562
Flores, Lourdes 1098
Flores Magón brothers 1036
Flores Magón, Ricardo 1038
Flores, Policarpo 1496
Flores, Valeria 1315
Florida Legislative Investigation Committee 923
Florida, Richard 606-607 611
Florida, United States
   ban on LGBT adoption and fostering 1200 1201
   Pulse Nightclub shooting 846 1298-1299 1298 repeal of antidiscrimination ordinance 1278 resort areas, LGBTQI-oriented 1381
Southern Comfort Conference 1532 1532
Stonewall National Museum and Archives 1101-1102
urban queerness 1689 1691

The Flower and the Scorpion (Sigal) 560

Flowers, Nina 918

Flunder, Yvette 1361

Fluorescent Sin (film) 339

Flying Lesbians 946

Flynn, Arcus 620

Flynt, Josiah 1504

Fokoli, as term 1021 1022 1635

Folsom Street Fair 213-214 1283

Folx, as term 870

Fon people 1015 1017

Fonseca, Carlos Alberto 1296

Fontdevila, Jorge 377

Football (soccer) masculinity/femininity considerations 1538 1539-1540
  visibility of LGBTQ athletes 1542
  women’s participation 1543-1545

For Bread Alone (Choukri) 986

For the Hard Ones: A Lesbian Phenomenology (de la tierra) 1569

Forberg, Friedrich Karl 1173

Forbes, Malcolm 1173

Forbidden Colors (Mishima) 1070 1070 1071

Forbidden Games: The Justin Fashanu Story (film) 338
Forbundet af 1948 (League of 1948) 104 105

Ford, Dominic 1380

Foreskin docking act 1215 restoration of 1214
surgical creation of 1219
See also Circumcision

Forest Town raid (1966) 1525

Forgotten man themes, Iranian cinema 1021-1022

Forster, E. M. 306 812 1173 1452 1732

Förster, Till 65

Fortin, Jacques 398

Fortune and Men’s Eyes (play and film) 563-566 564

Fortuyn, Pim 1244 1245

Forty-one, as term 1038 1039

41; o, El muchacho que soñaba en fantasmas (Po) 186

Forum (Institute for Multicultural Development) 73

Foster, David William 111

Foster, Lauren 1615

Fostering
LGBTQ youth 24-25
North America 1200-1201

Foucault, influence of 566-570 566

Foucault, Michel
archive importance 98 117 on BDSM 211
BDSM 211
Butler, Judith influenced by 1328
Canadian politics 240
the closet 372-373
confession role 412-413 critiques 568-569
death 2
emergence of new discursive formations 1746 female relationships 258
on identity 224 227 395 on intersex states 190-191 673-674 medical science 453 567-568 modern homosexual identities 1081 1109 1325 1384
queer theory contributions 568-569 1325 sexual acts and identities 567 sexuality as historical construct 566-567 673-674
sexuality studies 1465-1466
specification of individuals 1425 transnational critiques of 1468
views on orgasm 1169 1170

Foundation for AIDS Research (amfAR) 723

Foundation for Full Personality Expression (FPE) 426

Fourie and Another, Minister of Home Affairs and Another v. (South Africa; 2005) 11

14: We Are Flowers (online magazine) 1154

Fourth World Conference on Women (1995) 771

Fox, Eytan 78 270-275 1377

Fox, John 375

FPE (Foundation for Full Personality Expression) 426

Fra mand til kvinde 502

Fragoso, Víctor 1296

Frameline (film festival) 544-545 548 1247

França, Larissa 1540

France
    advocacy for LGBTQI refugees 1348
    aestheticism 30
    backlash against LGBTQ rights 1013
    changing homosexuality laws 1481
    civil partnerships 886
control of women’s reproduction 1122-1123 coverage of Oscar Wilde trials 1733
cruising 428
Dreyfus affair 1659-1660
family policies 1008
friendship societies 574
gay liberation activism 1704
HIV/AIDS approaches 710-711
Jewish population 1373
nineteenth-century taxonomy of homosexual types 895
North Africa colonization 987 1462
Pacific Islands colonization 1189 1190 1192
pacte civil de solidarité 886 1009
persecution of homosexuals 924
pride events 1278 1279 1282
queer slang 912
racial fetishization 1266 regulation of sex work in Africa 1462
same-sex marriage 1192
same-sex partnerships 1008
Senegal colonization 1428 1429
Société Mattachine 1023-1024
sodomy and buggery laws 84-86 85 791
Stonewall Riots impact 1552
transfeminism advocacy 1620 1622
Vietnam colonization 1703

France, B. v. (European Court of Human Rights; 1992) 793
France, Chapin and Charpentier v. (European Court of Human Rights; 2016) 795 1011
France, E. B. v. (European Court of Human Rights; 2008) 19 796
France, Fretté v. (European Court of Human Rights; 2002) 796
France, Gas and Dubois v. (European Court of Human Rights; 2012) 19 796
France, Manenc v. (European Court of Human Rights; 2010) 795-796
France, Mennesson v. (European Court of Human Rights; 2014) 19

Francis, Dennis 1528
Francis (pope) 1356
Franco, Francisco 1481
Frangella, Luis 619
Frank, Barney 996 1040
Frank, Liz 537
Frasqueri, Destiny Nicole (Princess Nokia) 1259
Fraternidad Sin Fronteras 1449-1450
Die Frau und der Sozialismus (Bebel) 400
Frazier, Demita 391 392
Freedman, Estelle B. 115
Freedom and Roam Uganda (FARUG) 537 907
Freedom, neoliberalism views 1135-1136
Freeman, Brian 1577
Freeman, Elizabeth 258 655 1331
French, Cecil 1167
French Polynesia
   same-sex marriage 1192
   transgender people 1187 1190
French Revolution (1789–1799) 1118-1120 1119
Frente de Liberación Homosexual 570-573
   alliances 939 1697
   Argentine repression of 1139
   founding 570 768 1252 1554
Frente de Liberación Homosexual Mexicano (FLHM) 768 940
Frente Homosexual de Acción Revolucionaria (FHAR) 768 1697
Frente Nacional por la Ley de Identidad de Género (Argentina) 121
Frente Sandinista de Liberación Nacional (FSLN) 1147-1150
Fresa y chocolate (film) 434-435
Fresco, as term 982
Fretté v. France (European Court of Human Rights; 2002) 19 796

Freud Café-Bar (London Club) 1106

Freud, Sigmund
  Burton, Richard Francis influence on 1595
  ethnopsychiatry 510
  female orgasm 370 five stages of psychosexual maturation 1468
  gender inversion 226 425
  Krafft-Ebing, Richard von influenced by 1294
  psychoanalysis development 1287
  scholarship in sexology 1371
  views on orgasm 1170
  views on the penis 1215
  Wolfenden Committee influenced by 1741

Die Freundin (magazine) 574

Die Freundschaft (newspaper) 573-574 1551

Das Freundschaftsblatt (magazine) 574

Frey, Leonard 1376

Frida (film) 1700

Fridae: Chuanlian Yazhou Tongzhi (website) 1222 1731

Friedan, Betty 919 920

Friedlaender, Benedict 81-82 366

Friedman, Sara L. 1398

Friendship, female “ʿAziz and 'Azizah” story 1205-1206
  mummy-baby relationships 1015 1016 1505
  same-sex bond friendships 1015-1016 1467

Friendship societies in Europe 196-198 573-574

Frigidity 1467

From Afar (film) 357

From Female to Male: The Life of Jack Bee Garland (Sullivan) 576
From Here to Eternity (Gupta) 128

From Juliet to Julius (Kaggwa) 1616

From Social Silence to Social Science: Same-Sex Sexuality, HIV and AIDS, and Gender in South Africa (essay collection) 695

Front d'Alliberament Gai de Catalunya 105

Front de Libération Homosexuel (FLH) 592 1720 1721

Front Homosexuel d'Action Révolutionnaire (FHAR) 72 1552

Front Pembela Islam (Islamic Defenders Front) 1719

Frookh, as term 1319

Fruit machine 924

Fry, Stephen 1375

FSLN (Frente Sandinista de Liberación Nacional) 1147-1150

FTMInternational (FTMI) 575-577 576

Fudanshi (rotten men) 1180

Fuechtner, Veronika 1465 1467 1468 1469 1470

Fuentes-León, Javier 356-357

Fuerzas Armadas Revolucionarias de Colombia (FARC) 1139

Fujimori, Alberto 1139

Fujimoto, Yukari 1179

Fujoshi culture 1179-1180 1729-1730

Fujur (debauchery) 1310 1311

La Fulminante (Granados, Nadia) 1274 1275-1276

Fun Home (Bechdel) 253

Fundación Ecuatoriana de Ayuda, Educación y Prevención del SIDA 770

Fundación Escorpio del Uruguay 769
Fundación Huésped 770
Fundar (organization) 770
Fung, Richard 974 1266 1381
Funke, Jana 1467
FUORI! (organization) 713
Fureurs et cris de femmes (Rawiri) 966 967-968
Furman, Ezra 1260
The Fury and Cries of Women (Rawiri) 966 967-968
The Fury of the Gods (Cook) 655
Fuskova, Ilse 940

G

G-Kenya Trust 855
G-Man (magazine) 1180
G-zine (online journal) 1143
GAA (Gay Activists Alliance) 1550
Gaahl (Espedal, Kristian Eivind) 1258
Gaard, Greta 487
Gabirol, Solomon ibn 1370
Gabra people 1587
Gadis metropolis (film) 1270
GAFCON (Global Anglican Future Conference) 1360
Gaff, Billy 1255
Gai Pied 2
Gaia’s Guide International 252
GAIDE (Gay Aid Identification Development and Enrichment) 1526

Gair, Cloe 1615 1617

Gaizu, as term 1604

GALA See Gay and Lesbian Memory in Action (GALA) Gay Latino Alliance (GALA)

Galarte, Francisco J. 864

Galbraith, Patrick W. 1179

GALCK (Gay and Lesbian Coalition of Kenya) 876

Galgóczy, Erzsébet 493

Galgut, Damon 958

Galindo, María 653-654

Galland, Antoine 1592 1595

The Gallery (Burns) 1689

Gallo, Robert 680

Galt, Rosalind 333

Galton, Francis 226 1121

GALZ (Gays and Lesbians of Zimbabwe) 9 692 905 1752 1752

Gamalama, Dorce 1719

Gambia
  queer migration to Europe 1048
  Section 377 legacies 1420 1421
  sex tourism 1463

Gamboa, Federico 186

Game of Thrones (television series) 521 1217

Ganesh, Chitra 130-131 130

Gangs and street kids in Africa 579-581

Ganj-e Qarun (film) 1019
Ganymede story 364-365 364
Gao, Ling 133 133
Gao Yayuan (Seven Gao) 1747
Garber, Eric 115
Garber, Marjorie 427
García Echeverría, Olga 1569
Garcia, J. Neil C. 897
García, José María 1496
García, Lia 1227
García Lorca, Federico 914-915 915 1125 1575 1700
García, Lorena 1657
García Márquez, Gabriel 779-780
García, Sara 350
Garden of Hesperides (Leighton) 32
Gardner, Kay 947
Garland, Judy 1255
Garland-Thomson, Rosemarie 1331
Garma, Angel 1288
Garnier, Tyron 892 1517
Garotos de programa 1447
Garrity, Terry 1475
Garvey, Johanna X. K. 460
Garza Carvajal, Federico 916
Garza, Olivia 941

Gas and Dubois v. France (European Court of Human Rights; 2012) 19 796
GASA (Gay Association of South Africa) 300 693 1156 1526
Gaspar de Alba, Alicia 1520 1522 1568
La Gata (pop artist) 1259
GATE (Gay Alliance toward Equality) 1720 1721 1722
GATE (Global Action for Trans Equality) 120
Gates Foundation 1131-1132
Gates, Robert 1063
A Gathering of Spirit (anthology) 1673
Gathings Committee 1302
GAU (Gay Academic Union) 932
Gaudio, Rudolf Pell 389
Gautam, Sanjay K. 569
Gautier, Théophile 30
Gay Academic Union (GAU) 932
Gay Activists Alliance (GAA) 1550
Gay Activists of South Africa 9
Gay Aid Identification Development and Enrichment (GAIDE) 1526
Gay Alliance toward Equality (GATE) 1720 1721 1722
Gay American History (Katz) 114-115 644 1505
Gay American Indians of San Francisco 1671
Gay and Lesbian Archives of Western Australia 102
Gay and Lesbian Association of Ghana (GALAG) 613
Gay and Lesbian Coalition of Kenya (GALCK) 855 876
Gay and Lesbian Latinos Unidos 930
Gay and Lesbian Memory in Action (GALA)
African queer life writings 961 archives 93 1619
photographic exhibit 1336-1337

Gay and Lesbian Organisation of the Witwatersrand (GLOW) 960 1156 1157 1526

Gay and Lesbian Studies Quarterly (journal) 1327-1328

Gay, as term activist use of 1550
Africa 1336
Arab world 1320
Asia 1089 1091 1604
changing meanings of 909 emergence of 896
in Latin America 914 915
in Mexico 1109-1110
MSM term vs. 1089
Pakistan 1196
queer theory views 1330
Thailand 871
United States 915

Gay Asian Pacific Alliance 738

Gay Association of South Africa (GASA) 300 693 1156 1526

Gay Black Group (London) 249

Gay Chat (university group) 1605

Gay Christian Network 1357

Gay Community News 314

Gay Disabled Group (London) 249

Gay European Tourism Association 581-583

Gay Ex-Services Association (GESA) 1709

Gay-for-pay actors 1505-1506

Gay Freedom Movement (GFM) 857

A Gay Girl in Damascus (blog) 834 835
Gay History Group 114-115

The Gay International and Mideast LGBTQI organizations 583-587
  alQaws 48-51
  the closet and 394-397
  homonationalism 65 395-396 583-587 751-752

Gay International, as term 1626

Gay, Judith 387 1015 1016 1017

Gay Latino Alliance (GALA) 93 312 587-590

Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Veterans of America (GLBVA) 1709

Gay Liberation (Australia) 169 1705

Gay Liberation Front (GLF) 590-594 591
  activism 375
  expansion of 1552
  formation of 1550
  Lavender Menace connection 919
  queer theater influenced by 1576
  “We Demand” protest involvement 1722

Gay Liberation Front UK 592-593

Gay liberation movement city and neighborhood roles in 1689-1690
  Germany 1240-1241
  indigenous peoples involvement 1671
  Mattachine Society and 1025-1026
  Vietnam War impact on 1703-1706

Gay Male S/M Activists 210

Gay marriage See Marriage, same-sex

Gay Medical Association (United Kingdom) 710

Gay Men Fighting AIDS (GMFA) 711

Gay Men's Health Crisis 735 1709

Gay People for the Nicaraguan Revolution (GPNR) 312

Gay (periodical) 113
Gay Plays (Wilcox, ed.) 1574
Gay Rights National Lobby (GRNL) 781-782
Gay Sisters 1722
Gay Student Organization of the University of New Hampshire v. Bonner (US; 1974) 891
Gay Sunshine (fanzine) 305-306
Gay theater 1573 1574 See also Theater, queer Gay Theatre Company 1577
Gay tourism See Tourism, LGBTQI-oriented
GAYa Nusantara 1367
Gayborhoods pride event connections 1281
  South Africa 1525
  as term 1041
  urban queerness and 1689 1690-1691
Gayle (queer language) 899 900
Gayline (information service) 593
GayMiddleEast.com (website) 1245-1246
Gays and Lesbians of the First Nations 1671
Gays and Lesbians of Zimbabwe (GALZ) 9 692 905 1752 1752
Gay’s the Word (bookstore) 248-249 1689
Gays und Lesbians aus der Türkei 1280
Gayspeak 900 901-902 See also Language
Gaystencil (organization) 622
Gaytrification, as term 1691
Gazal, Alissar 925-928
Gazelle figure 1075-1076
Gear, Sasha 579

Gebhard, Paul H. 1078

Gedanken über die Nachahmung der griechischen Werke in der Malerei und Bildhauerkunst (Winckelmann) 365

Geduld, Allison 580

Gei komi (gay comics) 1180

Gelfand, Michael 64-65

Geller, Pamela 1245

Gender and sexual minorities, as term 1196

Gender-confirming surgery 1431 1532 See also Sex reassignment surgery (SRS)

Gender DynamiX
  activities 9-10
  African queer life writings 961
  African trans issues 1616 1617

Gender dysphoria as diagnostic classification 227 453 454 1063 1620 documentation of 1431
gender identity laws and 119 120
  Hong Kong facilities for treatment 1433

Gender Equity Education Act (2004) (Taiwan) 1633

Gender, flexible systems, in Africa 594-599
  Ethiopia 506-507
  involuntary servitude 841-843

Gender identity
  Argentine law 118-122 119 1225 1290 1651 1655
  Asian countries 1368 asylum seeking and 1343
  conflation with sexual orientation, in Africa 1614 conflation with sexuality 1581
  Kinsey scale 884-885
  language considerations 910 queer migration to Europe and 1046 1050
  sex vs. 1465 1466-1467
Gender identity disorder, as diagnostic classification 120 145 146 454 1063 1617

Gender realignment surgery 1431 See also Sex reassignment surgery (SRS)

Gender realignment surgery 1430-1431 See also Sex reassignment surgery (SRS)

Gender roles
    Africa 345-346 387 595-597
    Argentina 1288 1289 1290
    butch-femme relationships 540
    Carnival traditions 305
    colonial Latin America 821
    domesticity and 1312 1313
    French Revolution era 1118-1120 1119
    Iran 1623
    Latin America 601
    Mexico 184-185
    neoliberal economic policy effects in Africa 1134
    Pasolini’s cinematic adaptation of A Thousand and One Nights 1210 postrevolutionary conservative period in Europe 1120-1123 prisons 580
    sex vs. 1465 1466-1467
    Thailand 871
    women's sports involvement 1542-1546
    World Wars period 1123-1127 1124

Gender Sexuality Rights Association Taiwan 1606

Gender testing (sports) 1539 1544

Gender Trouble (Butler) 191 568 1276 1328

Gender verification testing (sports) 158 160 1539 1544

Genderdoc-M v. Moldova (European Court of Human Rights; 2012) 797

Gendered violence and feminicide in Latin America 599-606
    activism 603-605 604
    factors and incidence 599-600 599 globalized economy and 602-603 patriarchal culture in 600-602

Genderqueer, origin of term 359

Generación de Hombres Trans de El Salvador 1651
General History of the Things of New Spain (de Sahagún) 560-563
General War Consequences Act (1957) (Germany) 1242
Generations (television series) 1529-1530
Genet, Jean 986 987 1264 1574-1575
Geneva Convention (1951) 1048
Geng Le 1606
Genitals/Genitalia See Clitoris Penis Vagina
Genitor role, in woman-woman marriage 1017
Gente computada igual a você (performance art show) 1224
Gentile, Patrizia 1722
The Gentlemen's Club (play) 482
Gentrification in Europe 606-612 607 609
Georgia, Identoba v. (European Court of Human Rights; 2015) 792 Georgia, United States
decriminalization of homosexuality 1516
Southern Comfort Conference 1531-1534
Georgis, Dina 397 460
Gerber/Hart Library and Archives 114
Gerber, Israel 1376
Gere Foundation 1130
Gergo burchiellesco (argot) 895
Gerling, Reinhold 1027
Germania anno zero (film) 1322
Germany
adoption of adults 887
advocacy for LGBTQI refugees 1347
African refugees in 1344
anti-racist movement 73-75
changing homosexuality laws 1481 1482
circumcision opposition 1218
civil partnerships 886
colonization of Namibia 1115 1116
coverage of Oscar Wilde trials 1732
decriminalization of homosexuality 402 1240 1243 1482 1662
eugenics programs 1027-1028 1122
Eulenburg affair 376 1027 1122 1412 1413 1660
family policies 1008
Finland relationship during WWII 1601 first sex reassignment surgery 1431
friendship societies 573-574
government scandals involving same-sex relationships 1412-1413 1413 historical same-sex perspectives 81-82
HIV/AIDS approaches 711-712
homosexuality associated with 1659 1661
Italian neorealism cinematic portrayals 1322
Jewish population 1373
Jewish same-sex behaviors 1371
Lebensreform (life reform) movement 1027
LGBTQ military service 1069
LGBTQ rights movement 1240-1241 1551 1552 1711-1712
memorial for Nazis' gay victims 1241-1242 1242
nationalist masculinity 1120-1121 1122
nationalist masculinity in World Wars period 1123 1124
Pacific Islands colonization 1189
phone apps 1229
pornographic magazines 1264
pride events 1278 1280 1282
protection of persecuted LGBTQ people 1048
queer slang 912
Redl affair 1660 1661
sex education in schools 1477
sexual revolution 1479
sodomy laws 86 791 810-811
Stonewall Riots impact 1551 1552
theory of transvestites and transsexuals 1640-1641
transfeminism 1622

See also \textit{Nazism}

Gérôme, Jean-Léon 1668

GESA (Gay Ex-Services Association) 1709
Die Geschichte der Kunst des Altertums (Winckelmann) 365

Geschiere, Peter 1684

Geschlecht und Charakter (Weininger) 81

Gestern und heute (play) 983 984 1574

Gevisser, Mark 960 1525 1526 1614

GFM (Gay Freedom Movement) 857

Ghaderi, Iraj 1020

Ghafari, Iman al- 58 859

Ghana 612-615 612
- anti-gay legislation 10
- asylum seeking 1343
- neoliberal economic policy effects 1133
- same-sex relations in history 612-613
- Section 377 legacies 1420
- supi term 1336
- women’s sports involvement 1543

Gharbzadegi (Ahmad) 1635

Gharbzadeh figure 1635

Gharīzī, Wafīq 209

Ghazal form (poetry) 1559-1561

Ghazāli, Ahmad 1558

Gherovici, Patricia 1290

Ghilman 615-618 1094

Ghosh, Shohini 556 558

Ghost City (Khakhar) 124

Ghost marriages, in Africa 1015

Ghosting 1230

Ghulām (slaves) 1158 1159 1160
Giannaris, Constantine 309

GID ([Iranian Society for Supporting Individuals with] Gender Identity Disorder) 1638

Giddings, Paula 393

Gide, André 986 1173 1452

Giese, Karl 825 826

Gifen, Lois Anita 1094

Gifford, Edward Winslow 1189

Gill, Sabrina 454-455

Gilley, Brian 1396

Gillies, Harold 674

Gilpin, Margaret 916

GinGin Books 248

Ginks, as term 1096

Ginsberg, Allen 1375 1376 1454 1549

Giordano, Simona 1431

Giorgi, Gabriel 1284

Giovanni, Domenico di (Burchiello) 895

Giovanni's Room (Baldwin) 233 1303

Giovanni's Room bookstore (Philadelphia) 250

A Girl Named Tondar (film) 1625

Girl Scouts 1417 1418 See also Scouting

Girlfriend (film) 559

Girls' Love (GL) 1271

Girls Take a Stand (Aswat) 154

Girlswholikeporno 1274
Gitonga, David ("Tosh") 338
Gittings, Barbara 445-446 1025
GLAAD (formerly the Gay and Lesbian Alliance against Defamation) 1417
Glad Day bookstore (Toronto) 248 249
Gladwin, Francis 948
Glasgow Women's Library 105
Glaskin, Gerald See Jackson, Neville
Glave, Thomas 976
GLBT Historical Society
archival records 107 114 117 576
founding 115
GLBT History Museum (San Francisco) 1101 1102
GLBVA (Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Veterans of America) 1709
GLF See Gay Liberation Front (GLF)
Glide Memorial United Methodist Church 404
The Glines (arts center) 1576
Global Action for Trans Equality (GATE) 120
Global Anglican Future Conference (GAFCON) 1360
Global Day of Rage (2013) 1131
Global Divas (Manalansan) 1330
Global Fund for Women 111 153
Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis, and Malaria 698 721-723 724-725
Global gay, as term 1282
Global gays hypothesis 871 1143
Global Report on LGBT Tourism (UNWTO) 1441
Global Sex (Altman) 173 1453

Globalization
- African LGBTQI movement and 1677
- Asian values and 788
- feminicide and 602-603
- LGBTQI rights as global issue 1347
- Middle Eastern travel and travelogues influenced by 1647-1648
- pride events and 1282-1283
- queer theory approaches 1330-1332
- Samoan fa'afafine identity and 1409
- sex tourism in the Middle East and 1452-1453
- sex tourism market forces 1438 1439-1440
- Sharaf exploration of 1486-1491
- South Africa effects 1530
- tongzhi identities and 1608
- urban queerness and 1691-1692
- Western LGBTQ activism and identities 377 396 586 752 777-779 904-906

Globe and Mail (Toronto) 205 241

Glocalization, as term 1441-1442

Glocalqueering, as term 1579

Gloeden, Wilhelm von 307 1233 1234 1263

GLOW (Gay and Lesbian Organisation of the Witwatersrand) 960 1156 1157 1526

GLQ: A Journal of Lesbian and Gay Studies 115 492 865

GMM (music company) 1570

Gning, Ndèye Ndiagna 1428

Go Fist Foundation 1274 1277

God Loves Uganda (film) 334

The God of Vengeance (play) 1375 1574

God’s Own Country (film) 1399

Goethe, Johann Wolfgang von 365

Goffman, Erving 373
Goh, Joseph N. 1272
Gohrbandt, Erwin 1642

The Golden Lotus (Chinese text) 1262

Goldenrod music distribution network 945

Goldie, Terry 513

Goldman, Emma 1375 1733

Goldschmidt, Richard 836

Goldwater, Barry 1060-1061

Golestān (Saʿdi) 1557

Goluboi (Russian queer slang) 912

Gomez, Brian 991

Gomez, Letitia 112

Gonadal tissue implants 1642

Goncourt brothers 33

Gonnard, Catherine 398

Gonzaba, Eric 117

González Castillo, José 553-554

González de Alba, Luis 1223

González, Guadalupe 941

González, José Luis 1296

González, María de Jesús 1037

Gonzalez, Maya 865

González Pérez, César O. 1448

González, Rigoberto 864

González, Rosario 350
González-Torres, Félix 738

_Goodbye Gauley Mountain: An Ecosexual Love Story_ (Sprinkle and Stephens) 490

_Goodbye to Berlin_ (Isherwood) 1688

Goodstein, David B. 116

_Goodwin, Christine v. United Kingdom_ (European Court of Human Rights; 2002) 793 798

Goorjigeen, as term 965 966 1428 1429 1430 1614

Gopalan, Anjali 1129

Gopinath, Gayatri 458 460 1327

Gorbachev, Mikhail 1401

Gordillo, Manuel 1496

Gordon, H. L. 510 511

Gordon, Lewis R. 513

_Gordura trans_ (performance art show) 1224

Gore, Dorothee 116

Gorer, Geoffrey 218-219 1429

Gorman-Murray, Andrew 1397 1692

Gorriti, Fernando 1287

Gorton, R. Nick 577

_Gossip Boys and Girls_ (book series) 1633

Gould, Deborah B. 2

Government employment

Cold War purges 1127

Executive Order 10450 922 1059-1060

Kameny, Frank case 925 993 1025

Lavender Scare purges 922-925 1127

scandals in Europe 1412-1415 1413 1661-1662
treason associated with sodomy 1661-1662
US Justice Department discrimination 2

Government of NCT of Delhi, Naz Foundation v. (India; 2009) 786

Government v. Bapoji Bhatt (India; 1884) 1425

Goytisolo, Juan 987

GPNR (Gay People for the Nicaraguan Revolution) 312

GPS (Grupo de Política Sexual) 571

Gqola, Pumla Dineo 952

Grace, Laura Jane 1260

The Graduate (film) 1485

Grady, Graeme 1068

Graffiti and graphic art 618-623 619 622 878-881

Grahn, Judy 251 946

Gramsci, Antonio 70

Gran Fury (organization) 620

Granados, Nadia (La Fulminante) 1274 1275-1276 1276

Grand, Sarah 30

Grand, Steve 1259

Grant, John 1259

Grant v. South-West Trains Ltd. (European Court of Justice; 1998) 798

Grant v. United Kingdom (European Court of Human Rights; 2006) 793-794

Grant, Vernon W. 426

The Grapevine (Stearn) 446

Grattet, Ryken 644-646 650

Gray, Carey 212
Gray, John 1733
Gray, Mary L. 377 1396 1397
Gray, Peter B. 690
Gray, Stephen 958

Great Britain See United Kingdom

The Great Wall of Los Angeles (Baca) 620-621

Greece collection of LGBTQ refugee statistics 1049
gay tourism 911
HIV/AIDS approaches 713 influence on Islamic same-sex literature 948
language considerations 912
LGBTQ military service 1069 queer refugee 1049
resort areas 1382

Greece, ancient cultural references to the penis 1213
erotic images 1260-1261
as icon of masculinity 1120 1123 photograph themes 1233
situational homosexuality 1502
See also Sacred Band of Thebes

Greece, Vallianatos v. (European Court of Human Rights; 2013) 795 1011

Greek love, as term 895

The Green Bay Tree (play) 1574

The Green Carnation (Hichens) 1730

Green carnation symbol of homosexuality 1730

green, debbie tucker 1578

Green, James N. 109 303 1446-1447

Green, Jonathon 895

Green Movement (Iran) 1638-1639
Green, Nick 242
Green, Richard 454
Green, Roedy 1722 1723
Greenberg Press 1304
Greenberg, Steven 1372-1373
Greenleaf Classics 1304 1305
Greenwich Village
  as gayborhood 1041 1281
  sexual revolution involvement 1485
Greer, Germaine 521
Gregory, Sara 1569
Greve, Germán 1287
Grewal, Inderpal 1090
Greyson, John 336
GRID (gay-related immunodeficiency) See HIV/AIDS
Griego, Adán 111
Grier, Barbara 113 445-446
Griffin, Chad 783
Griffith Code (1901) (Queensland) 1683
Griffith, Samuel Walker 1163 1420
Grimké, Angelina Weld 255 642
Grinding
  Arabic terms for 1031 1032 1074 1318-1319
  Tifāshī, Ah· mad ibn Y· usuf al-on 1158-1159
  woman-woman marriage 1017
Grindr (phone app)
  introduction of 1228
  popularity of 1229 1230 1231
pornography development and 1267 usage at Rio Olympic Games 1541

Grinspan, Mauro Cabral 120

Le griot de la peinture (Pépin) 977

Griswold v. Connecticut (US; 1965) 1485 1515

Grizzly (phone app) 1229

Gross, Sally 13 1616

Groupe du 6 Novembre: lesbiennes issues du colonialisme, de l’esclavage et de l’immigration 623-625

Grover, Anand 1130

GRUMALE (Grupo de Madres Lesbianas) 940-941

GRUMALE II (Grupo de Madres Lesbianas II) 941

Gründerzeit Museum 1711 1712

Grupo de Acción Lésbica Feminista 768

Grupo de Apoio à Prevenção de AIDS/ Rio Grande do Sul (GAPA/RS) 720

Grupo de Encuentro por la Libertación de los Güeis 769

Grupo de Lesbianas Feministas Socialistas Oikabeth (Socialist Feminist Lesbian Group Oikabeth) 940

Grupo de Madres Lesbianas (GRUMALE) 940-941

Grupo de Madres Lesbianas II (GRUMALE II) 941

Grupo de Política Sexual (GPS) 571

Grupo de Trabalho Homossexual and LES 625-628

Grupo Gay da Bahia 628-630
  activism 628-630 770
  archival records 107
  criticism of 719
  founding 628 768

Grupo-Grupo 768
Grupo pela Valorização, Integração e Dignidade do Doente de AIDS 719

Grupos de los Martes y los Viernes 768

Gruzinski, Serge 413 1497 1509

GSD (gender and sexual diversities), as term 910

Guadeloupe
  queer literature 977
  travesti and trans activism 1650

Guaitai, as term 1604

Guardado, Maria 600

Guardians of the Flutes (Herdt) 1384

Guatemala
  advocacy for LGBTQI refugees 1347
  decriminalization of homosexuality 1500
  feminicide 600
  HIV/AIDS 717t 721
  masculinity and sports 1537
  sex workers 1449
  travesti and trans activism 1652

Guénif-Souilamas, Nacira 985

Guérin, Daniel 986

Guerneville, California, resort areas 1379

Guerre, Martin 1214

Guess Guess Guess (television series) 1748

Guevara, Ernesto ("Che") 434

Guevedoces (intersex persons) 839

Guibert, Hervé 711

Guide to Gay and Lesbian Writing in Australia (Hurley) 168

Guidelines on Claims to Refugee Status Based on Sexual Orientation and/or Gender Identity (UNHCR) 765
Güido, Gibrán 865
Guild Press 1305
"Gulian hua" (short story) 1611
Gund, Catherine 1701
Gunnarsson, Jonas 790
Guns N' Roses 1258
Guo, Jingming 1729
Guoyu (ancient Chinese text) 1603
Gupta, Kristina 139
Gupta, Sunil 126 128
Gupton, Eric 1577
Gurba, Myriam 1569
Gurdián, Roberto 312
Gusiatinskaya, Elena 105
Gutheil, Emil 426
Gutiérrez Alea, Tomás 434-435
Gutiérrez de Mendoza, Juana Belén 1038-1039
Gutiérrez, Laura G. 1701
Guttmann, Amos 272
Guy, Donna J. 111
Guzmán, Manuel 1296
Gyamfi, Eric 614
Gyang, Kenneth 338
Gyatso, Janet 1597
Gyr, Hugo 623
H

H., M. v. (Canada; 1999) 1199 1201

ha-Levi, Judah 1370

ha-Nagid, Samuel 1370

Haan, Jacob Israel de 1375

HAART (highly active antiretroviral therapy)
  ACT UP campaign 1 4 5 6-7
  Africa 692
  use and concerns 740-741

Habib, Conner 1176

Habib, Samar 55-56 58 861 1158

El Hábito (cabaret bar) 280-282 655-656 1699

Hackman, Melissa 66

Hadad, Astrid 282 654-655 654

Hadeed, Khalid 1667 1754

Hadith
  gender dimorphism views 1627-1628
  homosexuality 755-758 845
  ISIS interpretation 845
  mukhannathin 1318 1627-1628
  prohibition of same-sex behaviors 1365 1367
  transgenderism views 194 1627-1628

Hadood Ordinance (Pakistan) 1425-1426

Hafez (Sufi poet) 1559

Haflat samar min ajl al-khamis min huzyran (play) 1664

Hagel, Chuck 1064

Hagio, Moto 263
Hague Adoption Convention (1993) 1203

Hague Centre for Strategic Studies 1055

Hague Convention on the Protection of Children and Co-operation in Respect of Intercountry Adoption 21

Hahnemann, Samuel 1026 1027

The Hairdresser of Harare (Huchu) 959-960

Hairy Breast (digital art) 879 879

Haiti

- HIV/AIDS 722-723
- queer literature 977-979
- travesti and trans activism 1649 1650 1656

Hajar al-dahik (Barakat) 631-635 632 633

Hajez al-samt (television show) 707

Halat shaghaf (Sirees) 635-638 636 637

Halban, Joseph von 674-675

Halberstam, Jack (Judith)
- archival records 117
- butch/FTM border wars 1547
- identity 227
- importance of queer studies 979
- metronormativity concept 1393
- queer theory contributions 1328 1329 1331

Halevi, Yossi Klein 1244

Halford, Rob 1258

Hall, Edmund 1068

Hall, Radclyffe 1725
- gender identity 426
- Housman, Laurence on 1167
- influence on gay theater 1574
- Krafft-Ebing, Richard von reference 1294
- obscenity accusations 1264
- prosecution of 1414
rural queer themes 1398
same-sex relationship 258
situational homosexuality 1504
The Well of Loneliness authorship 1724-1727

Hall, Shibden 1106

Hall, Thomas/Thomasine See Thomas/Thomasine Hall court case (1629)

Halliday, M. A. K. 895

Halperin, David
the closet 375-376 378
Foucault, Michel 569
molly houses 1081
queer theory development 1325 1327 1331
situational homosexuality 1502
views on orgasm 1170

Ham, Carter 1063

Ham jens bazi/gara, as term 1494

Hämäläinen v. Finland (European Court of Human Rights; 2014) 794

Hamam (film) 1667-1668

Hamam (public bath) 1185

Hamatoon manno meshnasin (film) 1627

Hamawi, Ibn Hijja al- 1594

Hamburg, Jürgen Römer v. Freie und Hansestadt (Court of Justice of the European Union; 2011) 1012

Hamed, Marwan 809

Hämeen-Anttila, Jaakko 746

Hamer, Dean H. 228

Hames-García, Michael 864 865

Hamilton, Mary/Charles 532 815-816 815

Hammam (film) 1174
“Hammamiye” (poem) 951
Hzamm_ud, Muh’ammad 746
Hamori, Andras 746
Hamoun (film) 1022
Hampton, Mabel 117
Hamza, Abubakar 1152
Han, Heesung 1271
Han Hong 1599
Hana monogatari series (Yoshiya) 1467
Hana to hebi (Dan) 216
Hanafi legal school 1365
Hanbali legal school 1365
Hand, Monica A. 485
Handbook for Girl Guides (Baden-Powell) 1415
Hanna, Kifah 208 633 634 635
Hannon, Gerald 204 241
Hanry, Pierre 513-514
Hansberry, Lorraine 445
Happening de las gallinas (performance art show) 1224
“The Happy Prince” (short story) 1729
Haqi an a’eesh an akhtar an akun (Aswat) 154 192
Haraway, Donna 1329
Hard-core pornography 1265 See also Pornography
Hard Corps (lesbian theater company) 1576
Hard Dollar Hustler (film) 1265
Harden, Maximilian 1412 1660

Hardwick, Michael 1515-1516 1516

Harem (film) 1174

Harem: The World behind the Veil (Croutier) 515-516

Haring, Keith 619-620 619 738

Harlem Renaissance 638-644 639 641

Harman, Moses (“Lucifer”) 1733

Harrington, Imani 1578

Harris, Bertha 1475

Harris, Frank 1728

Harrison, Regina 411 412 414

Harrison v. Mattis (US; pending 2018) 893

Harry Benjamin International Gender Dysphoria Association 1643

Harry (prince) 1068

Hart, Donn 897

Hart, H. G. 1167

Hart, Harriett 897

Hart, Lois 592

Harthern, Ernst 501-502

Hartman, Michelle 1075

Harvard Art Museums 1105

Harvey, David 1138

Harvey, Elizabeth 673
Harvey, Jonathan 1577
Harvey, Karen 1260
Hasan, Zulkifli 1719

Haseena atimbum (film) 1270

Hasidic Judaism 1372
Hassan, Kamoga 338-339

¡Hasta no verte Jesús mío! (Poniatowska) 1036 1037
Hastings, March 1303
Hatamikia, Ebrahim 1020 1021-1022

Hate crime law and policy in the United States 644-650 648

Háttér Társaság (Background Society) 104
Hau, Chi-kuk 898
Havana, Cuba, sex tourism 1445-1446

HAW (Homosexuelle Aktion Westberlin) 1240

Hawaiʻi, United States
ˈāikane 1188
māhū 1585 1586

Hawkes, Brent 204 205

Hay, Harry
Mattachine Society involvement 924 1023 1024 neo-shamanism beliefs 1028
Radical Faerie movement 1384

Hayat al-Nufus (fictional character) 1210

Hayden, Dwight 858

Hayes, Jarrod 988

Haynes, Douglas E. 1470

Hays, Matilda 254-255
He Yunshi (Denise Ho) 1747 1748

Healey, Dan
   the closet 374 376
   pornography 1263 1266
   sodomy laws 87 400

Healing the Divide 1130

Heals, Pangina 480

Health Division, K v. (US; 1977) 440

Health Global Access Project Coalition (Health GAP) 6

Heart (sculpture) 1134

Heartland Alliance 37 585-586

Heather Has Two Mommies (Newman) 252

The Heavenly Twins (Grand) 30

Heavy metal music 1258

Hebrew Union College 1373-1374

Hee, Wai Siam 1610

Hegemonic masculinity
   Europe 1120
   Iran 1637-1638

See also Masculinity

Heger, Heinz 1241

Hekma, Gert 1581

Helem 651
   activism 651 832 1367
   founding 651 1031
   Lesbanese feature 927
   Massad, Joseph and 585-586 travel writing criticism 1647

Helem Girls 1031

Helfer, Joachim 177-181
Hell or High Water (film) 339 1154

Hell upon the Earth (tract) 429

Heller, Lukas 1575

Hellman, Lillian 1574

Helms, Jesse 646 736 995

Helsinki, Finland
gentrification 607 608-610 609
postwar gay culture 1601 1602

HemiPress 652 656

Hemispheric Institute Digital Video Library 651-657 654

Hena maysara (film) 657-660 659

Henderson, Mae G. 972

Hendricks, Muhsin (imam) 854 855

Hendricks, Thomas 66 1134

Hendrix, Jimi 1485

Henfry, Lee-Anne 1600

Heng, Russell 469

Henne, Kathryn E. 160

Henríquez, Patricio 1112

Henry, George 226 1376

Henry, Todd 99

Henry VIII (king of England) 1161

Hentai shinri (magazine) 99

Hentig, Hans von 1480

Hera (newspaper) 484
Heradien, Simone 698 1616
Herbart, Pierre 986
Herbert, John 563-566 564
Herdt, Gilbert 191 1192 1382 1384
Here TV 548

Here’s to You, Jesusa! (Poniatowska) 1036

Hermana, as slang term 896-897
Hermaphrodite, as term 1220 1582
Hermaphroditism 1498-1499 1628 See also Intersex identities
Hermosillo, Jaime Humberto 352-353
Hernández, Ellie 865
Hernández, Juan Jacobo 1223
Hernández, Juan José 571
Hernández Valadéz, Manuel 587-588
Herndon, April 838
Herrera y Lozano, Lorenzo 865
Herri, Scott 1394
Herskovits, Melville J. 1015 1017
Herz, Seba al- 44-48
Herzog, Dagmar 401
Heteroflexibility, as term 1506
Heterosexuality–homosexuality scale (Kinsey scale) 881-885 882

L’heure hybride (Mars) 978
Hewitt, Robert 89

Hey! TTTTouch Me! (Gao) 133 133
Heymann, Tomer 1692
Heyward, Carter 1359
Hi-NRG disco 1257
HIB (Homosexuelle Interessengemeinschaft Berlin) 1552 1711 1712
Hichens, Robert Smythe 1730

Hickman v. Donna Curry Investments, LLC, et al. (US; 2006) 892-893

“Hidden Things” (Cavafy) 306 307
Higgs, David 1509
Higgs, Kerryn 175

“High Flying Woman” (song) 945

Higher education
archival records 104 109-110 115-116
classical studies 305-310 364-367
jotería studies 863-867
Lavender Scare 923-924
Nigeria 1153
nineteenth-century rediscovery of Sappho and 1410
psychoanalysis development 1288-1289 rights of LGBTQ organizations 891
Taiwan student groups 1605

See also Queer theory

Higher education and LGBTQ+ communities in the United States 661-666 663 665

Highly active antiretroviral therapy (HAART) See HAART (highly active antiretroviral therapy)

Hija de Perra (trans artist) 1274 1276 1622

Hijikata, Tatsumi 1070

Hijras 666-671
Bangladesh 1391 1392 1426
collection to mukhannathin 1096
defining identity 145 667-668
eunuchs and 516-517
Humsafar Trust support for 1129
legal recognition of 1471 politics and legal issues 480 530 667-670 religious issues 145-146
rituals and 1384 1385 1585 1586 sex reassignment surgery access 1431 1433
as term 1090
transgender vs. 1628 1629
varied castration practices 1217 1431

Hill, Charlie 1720 1722

The Hill of Devi (Forster) 813

Hillman, Ben 1600

Him applause (magazine) 1482

Him Exclusive (magazine) 1265

him (magazine) 1551

Himmler, Heinrich 792 1127 1238

Hinderliter, Andrew 139

Hindle, Annie 1579

Hines, Nico 1541

Hinge (phone app) 1229

Hinkle, Curtis 838-839

Hinojosa, Claudia 929

Hinttari, as term 912

Hintti, as term 912

Hip hop music, queer identities and 1259

Hippies 1484

Hiraoka, Kimitake See Mishima, Yukio

Hirschfeld, Magnus 824
activism 81 103 373 400 791
archival records 103
Eulenburg affair 376
human sexuality 358 365-366 400 425 809
impact on public perceptions 1473
Institut für Sexualwissenschaft 103 400 823-827 1123 1235 1642 intermediate sexual types term 1581
Krafft-Ebing, Richard von influenced by 1294
in-between model 984
Nazi persecution of 1126 1689
philosophy 76-78 225 226 365-366 675
scholarship in sexology 1371
sexual reform activism 1027 1479 1551 1640-1641
visit to India 1467-1468 wartime sexual practices 1504
Wilde, Oscar influence on 1732

Hislop, George 205 1720

L’histoire de la sexualité (Foucault) 566 1325

Historia de la Monja Alférez, Doña Catalina de Erauso, escrita por ella misma (Muñoz and Ferrer) 503-504

Historia general de las cosas de Nueva España (de Sahagún) 560-563

Historic England 1107

Historical sexes 671-677
  historical sex determinations 672-674 nonbinary sexes 672 674-675 sex vs. gender 671-672
  twenty-first-century studies 675

The History of California (Baca) 620-621

A History of Penal Methods (Ives) 1166

A History of Queer Street Art (exhibition) 623

The History of Sexuality (Foucault) 372-373 395 566-569 583 1466

“History, (Re)Memory, Testimony and Biomythography: Charting a Buller Man’s Trinidadian Past” (essay) 974

Hite, Shere 368 1473

Hitler, Adolf 1124 1125 1126-1127 1412-1413
HIV/AIDS 677-687
admissibility for asylum status and 1350 affordable treatment access 1
Asia 1470-1471
Australasia 171-173
barebacking culture 1387-1388
Canada 207 240
Caribbean queer literature depiction 978
in cinema 704-708
circumcision in prevention of 1217 1218 complementary and alternative medical treatment 1028 criminalization laws 737-738 decriminalization of homosexuality influenced by 1515 early theories and coverage 679-680 education 223 695-696 735 739-740 focus on sexual ethics from 1476-1477 gay porn depictions 1266 health pornography 276 impact on immigration law 1040
indigenous peoples activism 1672-1673 initiatives aimed at men who have sex with men 1089 1090 1091-1092 international conferences 680
Las Intrépidas advocacy 1112 legal cases 892-893
in literature 59-61
media and 682-684
memorials 1107 metaphors 681-682 683 multifactorial theory of 1476
museum exhibits 1105
Naz Foundation International work 1128-1130 origin of queer term adn 1325 parenting rights impact 1201
pink triangle symbol and 1241 politics and social practices 685 popular music and 1256 1257
prehistory 677-679
pride events spurred by 1282
Puerto Rican activism 1297-1298 queer migrants to the US and 1042-1043 queer theater impacted by 1576-1578
queer theory influenced by 1334 recent infection rates and risk populations 684-685 728-729 734
Red Ribbon Project 681
sero-status and phone apps 1230-1231 sex tourism facilitation of spread of 1439 1448 sex worker organizational advocacy 1449 1450
travesti and trans activism 1653-1655 1656-1657
urban community responses 1690
World AIDS Day 679 680

HIV/AIDS in Africa 687-704
ACT UP and 7
Botswana 260-261
the closet 377
Côte d'Ivoire 424
feminist responses 536-537 health injustice and medication access 692
Kenya 876
Malawi 698-700 699
most-at-risk populations (MARPs) 688-689
Nigeria 1154
Nkoli, Simon activism 1156-1157
risk populations 684-685
Senegal 1429-1430
South Africa 300-301 580-581 692-698 1530 studies of prevalence 690-692 691 terms and concepts 688-690
Uganda 700-702

HIV/AIDS in Egyptian cinema 704-708 706

HIV/AIDS in Europe 708-716
AIDS history in Europe 709-710
Eastern Europe 713-715
France and United Kingdom 710-711
Germany and Switzerland 711-712
Netherlands and Scandinavia 712-713
PrEP (pre-exposure prophylaxis) 708-709 same-sex partnerships influenced by 1009
Southern Europe 712

HIV/AIDS in Latin America and the Caribbean 716-726 activist mobilization 769-770 857
Brazil 717t 719 721 723 770
history 716-717
legality 720-723 722
Mexico 1448
Nicaragua 1149-1150
partnership with health authorities 723 prevalence 717-724
risk populations 684-685
same-sex partnerships influenced by 1001-1002 trends and concerns 724-725 visibility 717-720

HIV/AIDS in South and Southeast Asia 726-734
Bhutan 223
civil society and 727
HIV service organizations 729-731
India 667-668
Pakistan 1195-1196
Phuket, Thailand, resort areas 1382 prevalence and overview 726-727 726
risk populations 684-685
statist intervention 731-732 surveillance society 727-729
Taiwan 1612

HIV/AIDS in the United States 734-743 changing political landscape 740-742 741 civil liberties concerns 736-738 communities of color and 737 738-739
cruising 429-430
eyearly activism 314 782-783
eyearly responses 735-736 graffiti art 619-620
overview 734-735
Second National March on Washington influenced by 994-995 treatment activism 739-740 739
Vietnam War veterans 1709

Hively, Kimberly 892

Hively v. Ivy Tech Community College (US; 2017) 892

Hj (Iran) and HT (Cameroon) v. Secretary of State for the Home Department (UK; 2010) 1350

Ho, Denise (He Yunshi) 1747 1748

Ho, Josephine 99-100

Hoad, Neville 752 811 1330

Hock Soon Ng, Andrew 992
Hockney, David 308 1104
Hocquenghem, Guy 710

Hodges, Obergefell v. (US; 2015) See Obergefell v. Hodges (US; 2015)

Hodgson, Marshall G. S. 1092
Hoey, Clyde R. 922 923
Hoey Committee 1661 1663
Hoffman, William M. 1576
Hogan, Kathy 484 485
Hogan, Kristen 250
Holcomb, Briavel 1381
Holder, Eric 450

Holding the Man (Conigrave) 175 Hole, Ernest 248-249
Holiday, Billie 1255
Hollibaugh, Amber 115
Holmes, John 1174
Holmes, M. Morgan 191

Holocaust See Nazism

Holy Inquisition
-Mexico 1495-1496
-Portugal 1507 1508 1509
sodomy laws 86 284-285

"Hombres necios" (poem) 1518

Homelands (Gupta) 128

Homeopathy 1026 1027-1028

L'homme au landau (Makhele) 966 Homo Riot 621

Homodok (documentation center) 104 105-106

Homoerotic poetry of Abū Nuwās 583 616 743-747 1158 1160

Homoeroticism in the plays of Ibn Daniyal 747-750

The Homoerotics of Orientalism (Boone) 1173

Homogenic Love and Its Place in a Free Society (Carpenter) 225

Homomonument memorial (Amsterdam) 1107

Homonationalism

  Israel 272
  Orientalism combined with 1173
  pinkwashing and 1244-1245
  Zionism and 78

Homonationalism in Africa 750-755

Homonormativity, as term 1135 1139

Homophile, as term 1550

Homophile Reform Society (Canada) 296 297

Homophobia

  AIDS-related 691-692 art and 126-127
  Brazil 982
  Cameroon 287-289
  Cuba 436
  false accusations towards migrants 1042 influence on queer Caribbean literature 972 978
  Lavender Scare 922-925 923
  Lebanon 1030
  lesbian 390-394
  Mexico 1037-1038
  Namibia 1117
  Nazi regime 1238-1240
  in postcolonial Africa 904
  sports and 1538-1539
  within the women's movement 919-920

See also Discrimination against LGBTQI people
Homophobia (Helem) 651

Homophonies (journal) 398-399

Homosexual acts in shari’a 755-759 See also Qur’an Religion and same-sex behaviors: Islam

Homosexual, as term 914 1495 1582

“The Homosexual International” (article) 924

Homosexual Land Reform Fund 1525-1526

Homosexual Law Reform Act (1986) (New Zealand) 1421

Homosexual Law Reform Society 1553 1742

Homosexual Law Reform Society of the Australian Capital Territory 168

Homosexual Liberation Front See Frente de Liberación Homosexual Front de Libération Homosexuel

El homosexual, o la dificultad de expresarse (play) 1223

Homosexual: Oppression and Liberation (Altman) 169 172-173 174

“The Homosexual Role” (essay) 567 1466

Homosexuales Unidos 769 772

Homosexualité, église et droits de l’homme (Kenmogne) 288

Homosexuality
  coining of term 80 1121 1514 instrumentalization of 1754 1755 language for 895-900 origin of 10% estimate 884 sexological emergence of 1465-1466
See also Criminalization of homosexuality Decriminalization of homosexuality Pathologization of homosexuality Situational homosexuality

Homosexuality in Perspective (Masters and Johnson) 1473

“Homosexuality in Tibet: We Are No Different” (interview) 1598

Homosexuality_ies (exhibit) 1102

“Homosexuals for Peace” pin 1704
Homosexuelle Aktion Westberlin (HAW) 104 711 1240

Homosexuelle Interessengemeinschaft Berlin (HIB) 1552 1711 1712

Honduras
  decriminalization of homosexuality 1500
  HIV/AIDS 717 t 721
  sex workers 1449
  sports crowd homophobic chants 1538
  travesti and trans activism 1656
  violence 725

Honecker, Erich 1712

Hong Kong
  attitudes toward LGBTQ population 998
  conversion therapy 419
  decriminalization of homosexuality 1163 1307 1421 1604
  diminishing of queer public spaces 1146
  LGBTQ rights movement 786-787 1604-1605 1607
  men who have sex with men 1090
  museum exhibits 1106
  new media popularity 1142 1144
  new queer cinema 1609
  phone apps 1144 1229
  pornography and erotica development 1269 1270 1271
  pride events 1282 1605
  QT v. Hong Kong Immigration Department case 1307-1308
  Section 377 legacies 1420
  sex reassignment surgery 1431 1433
  tongzhi identities 1604-1605 1610
  tourism development 1438
  transgender organizations 1606-1607 1630-1634
  urban queerness 1691
  W v. Registrar of Marriages case 1601 1713-1717 1715
  zhongxing phenomenon 1745-1750 1748

Hong Kong Immigration Department, QT v. (Hong Kong; 2017) 1307-1308

Hong Kong Lesbian and Gay Film Festival 548 1603-1604

Hong Kong Transgender Equality and Acceptance Movement (TEAM) 1606 1632

Hong Kong Transgender Resource Center (TGR) 1632-1633

Hong Lim Park (Singapore) 469
Honglou meng (classical Chinese text) 1236 1728

Hooker, Evelyn 453

Hooker Solano, Franklin Leonel 467

hooks, bell 1209 1211

Hooper, Edward 678

Hopgood, Stephen 773

Hormonal treatments
  Argentina 119 120
  development of 1642
  Latin America 1654-1655

Hormone Imbalance (lesbian theater company) 1576

Horner, York 1082

Hornet (phone app) 1229

Hornick, R. v. (Canada; 2002) 431

Horswell, Michael 412 1584 1585

Horton, Paul 730 732

Horvejkul, Nichkhun Buck 1572

Hosayn (shah) 1560

Hosken, Fran 370

Hossain, Adnan 1565

Hössli, Heinrich 365

Hot Flash (organization) 485

“Hot, Horny and Healthy!” (workshop) 735-736

Hotteh, as term 1319

Hottentot apron, as term 1017

Houlberg, Laura 490
Houlbrook, Matt 85 1504
House of Rainbow Fellowship 324-325 1152 1154-1155
Houseboys at resorts 1380-1381
Housman, Laurence 1167-1168
How Many Hands Do I Need to Declare My Love to You (Khakhar) 124
How Sex Changed: A History of Transsexuality in the United States (Meyerowitz) 115 662
How the German Came to His Senses (al-Daif) 177-181
How to Do the History of Homosexuality (Halperin) 569
How to Have Sex in an Epidemic: One Approach (Berkowitz and Callen) 735 1476
How 2 Gay Men Live in a Country Where Homosexuality Is Illegal (film) 337-338
Howard, John 1395 1397 1504
Howell, Charles Gough 1422
“Howl” (poem) 1376
HRAPF (Human Rights Awareness and Promotion Forum) 1685
Hsiao, Bi-khim 1005
Hsu, Hsiu-wen 1005
Hsu, Yu-sheng 1004-1005
Hsuan, Hsiao-fo 1611
Hua Mulan legend 1055
Hua pok (shaven head or short hair) 870
Huang, Fish 529
Huangren shouji (Chu) 1612
Huapu (flower registers) 1236
Al-hub fi Taba (film) 705
Al-hub wa al-ruʿb (film) 705-706 706

Hubanname (Enderuni) 950 950 1182

Hubbard, Jim 117
Huchu, Tendai 959-960
Huestis, Marc 545
Huffer, Lynne 569
Huggins, Buell Dwight 1025
Hughes, Holly 1578
Hughes, Langston 642 1106
Hukin, George 1166
Hull, Bob 1023 1024
Hull, Gloria T. 255
Hultzer, Karen 1545
Humala, Ollanta 1098

Human Life International 331

Human rights 759-767
Africa 35-37 260 1680
Australasia 176
black movements 230-235 231 233
Canada 240
Cuba 436
debate against 761-763 debate in favor of 760-761 761 762 future of LGBTQ rights 765-766 health care 765 immigration 764 intersex 839
kathoey 873
key indicators of LGBTQ rights 763-764 marches and propaganda 763 NGOs 763
Nigeria 1154
Queen Boat Trials 1308 1309-1310 question of LGBTQ rights 759-760 role in refugee and asylum policies 1348 sexual orientation persecution 765
South Asia 123-124 189
Thailand 873
Uganda 1684
United Nations 760
United States 390-394 392 644-645

Human rights and activism in Latin America 767-775 democratization and transnational groups 770-772 eyearly organizations 767-769 gendered violence 601-605
HIV/AIDS impact 769-770
Nicaragua 1148-1150
overview 767 773
same-sex marriage efforts 1001-1003

Human rights and queer Arab refugees 775-781 cconcerns for future 779-780 experience of home and 459-460 international queer identity 777-778 intersectionality challenges 778-779 778
ISIS-related 845-846
Syrian crisis 775-777 776 845-846

Human Rights Awareness and Promotion Forum (HRAPF) 1685

Human Rights Campaign 375 781-784 783 1348

Human Rights Council 1088 1348

Human rights in Asia 784-789 cconversion therapy 418-422 419
East Asia 786-787
South Asia 123 784-786
Southeast Asia 787-788

Human rights in Europe 789-799 adoption and surrogacy 16-20 23 796-797
anti-gender movement 69-71
Chechnya detention camps 313-317 316 criminal law and humane treatment in ECHR 791-793 before ECHR and EU 791
European Union and Council of Europe formation 790-791 European Union (EU) LGBTQ law 797 legal structures 789-790
LGBTQ gender identity rights in ECHR 793-794
LGBTQ rights in European Court of Justice 798
LGBTQ rights movement 375 397-399 401-402 623-628
LGBTQ social rights in ECHR 795-796 military service and free speech in ECHR 797 same-sex marriage and civil union in ECHR 794-795 794 transgender cases in European Court of Justice 797-798

Human Rights Watch
  gatekeeper role 763 Ghana report 614
  as part of global network 1348
  Queen Boat Trials 1308 1309 1310

Human Sex Anatomy (Dickinson) 368

Human Sexual Response (Masters and Johnson) 368 371

Human Sexuality Collection (Cornell University) 116

Human trafficking 1456 1459

Humphreys, Laud 430

Humsafar Trust 1129 1460

Humus (Kanor) 977

Hungary
  archival records 104
  decriminalization of homosexuality 402 493 1481
  gay pornographic productions 1266
  homosexuality decriminalized 402
  Jewish population 1374 lesbian cinema 492-495 marriage laws 764
  pride events 1283
  registered partnerships 1011
  restrictions on same-sex marriage 1012

Hungary, O. M. v. (European Court of Human Rights; 2016) 792-793 1048

Hunger's Brides (Anderson) 1520-1521

Hungochani, as term 905
Hunt, Lynn 1262-1263
Hunter, Andrew 142
Hunter, Mark 1524
Hunters (Lovci) Building (Slovenia) 1034
Hurley, Michael 168
Hurricane Maria (2017) 1299
Hurston, Zora Neale 642-643
Hutchins, William Maynard 475
Hutton, Isabel Emslie 1474
Huysmans, Joris-Karl 28 30-31
Hyam, Ronald 812 1503
Hydrotherapy 1026 1027
“Hymn to Aphrodite” (poem) 1410
Hysteria (film) 1171

I-aep (closeted gay men) 870
“I Am a Homosexual, Mum” (letter) 961
I Am Curious: Yellow (film) 1481
I Am Jazz (television series) 1220
I Am My Own Wife (play) 1710 1712
I Am My Own Wife: The True Story of Charlotte von Mahlsdorf (von Mahlsdorf) 1710
I Know You Know (album) 945
I Luv U But (film) 801-805 802
I, the Worst of All (film) 1521-1522
IAAF (International Association of Athletics Federations) 1540 1544 1545
Iantaffi, Alex 455
IAS (International AIDS Society) 680
Ibn al-ʿArabi 1558
Ibn al-Jawzi 1558
Ibn Daniyal See Homoeroticism in the Plays of Ibn Daniyal
Ibrahim, Anwar 89 788 990
Ibrahim, Saad 805
Ibrahim, Sunʿallah 1486-1491 1488
ICASA (International Conference on AIDS and Sexually Transmitted Infections in Africa) 692
Ice in the Lungs (Kraak) 958-959

Iceland
    same-sex marriage 794
    same-sex partnerships 1008

Ich bin meine eigene Frau (film) 1710
Ich bin meine eigene Frau (von Mahlsdorf) 1710

ICPR (Instituto de Cultura de Puertorriqueña) 1297
IDA (Tennessee community) 938
IDAHO (International Day against Homophobia) 1605

An Ideal Husband (play) 1728

Identification document changes
    Argentina 120 721
    Asia 787 1433
    China 1631
    Hong Kong 1632 1716
    intersex people 839-840
    Kenya 1618
    Latin America 1141
    Mongolia 1085
Nepal 1563 1564
sex reassignment surgery and 1433
South Africa 1616
trends in issuing 1587
United States 440

Identoba v. Georgia (European Court of Human Rights; 2015) 792

Ideología (performance art show) 1225 1275

Idol, Ryan 1266

Idowu-Fearon, Josiah 321

Igbo people 1015 1016 1735

Ightisab (film) 705

IGLHRC See International Gay and Lesbian Human Rights Commission (IGLHRC)

Ihimaera, Witi 174

Ijil khuisten (play) 1085

Ijma’ (juridical consensus) 1365

Ikpo, Nnanna 958 1154

ILGA See International Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, Trans and Intersex Association (ILGA)

ILIS (International Lesbian Information Secretariat) 929

Illustrations for Fourteen Poems on C. P. Cavafy (Hockney) 308

Image (magazine) 264

Imagining Transgender (Valentine) 1329

Imam, Ayesha 535-536

Imām, Hassan el- 1756

Imarat Ya’kubian (al-Aswany) 151 805-809 806 1754

Immigration See Migration

Immigration Act (1965) (United States) 1040
Immigration Act (Canada) 1722

Immigration and Nationality Act (1990) (US) 1350

Immigration and Naturalization Service, Boutilier v. (US; 1967) 1040

Immoral Trafficking (Prevention) Act (2008) (India) 1458

Immorality Act (1927) (South Africa) 1524-1525

Imperato-McGinley, Julianne 839

Imperial Eyes: Travel Writing and Transculturation (Pratt) 1645

Imperialism and colonialism 809-817
   Africa 811 1614 1677 1679
   African literature 953 965-966
   Arab world 56-57 1366
   Asia-Pacific region 1055
   assumption of obligatory African heterosexuality 955 background of European 809-810
   Brazil 1507-1512
   British colonial sodomy laws 1162-1163
   Caribbean 1650
   Caribbean queer literature and 973 975
   confessional manuals 407-408 cross-cultural homoerotic relationships 812-813
   Egypt 1311 1754
   Hong Kong 1714
   houseboys at resorts 1380-1381
   impact on queer migration in Europe 1046-1047
   Japanese Empire 813-814
   juridical uniformity in UK colonies 1424
   Kenya 875 877
   Latin America 1001 1315-1316 1650
   legacy in African sexuality 903-904
   legal records 95-96
   Malaysia 990
   Middle East 927-928 1074 1753-1754
   Middle Eastern travel and travelogues influenced by 1644 1645-1646 missionary activity and 1355-1356
   Mozambique 966 1086-1087
   Namibia 1115 1116
   Nigerian sculpture symbolizing 1134
   North Africa 985 986-987
   Pacific Islands 1189 1190 1192
Peru 1098 1099
Puerto Rico 1298
queer decolonization 1360-1361
regulating male homosexuality 810-812
Senegal 1428-1429
sex tourism in Asia and 1438 1441 1442 sex tourism in Latin America and the Caribbean and 1444 sex work in Africa and 1462-1463
sexology development and 1470
Sharaf exploration of 1487
sins against nature in colonial Latin America 1494-1501
situational homosexuality 953 1502 1503
South Africa 1523 1524 1524-1526
third gender concepts impacted by 1581 1584 travesti and trans activism against 1650 two-spirit people impacted by 1670-1671 1672
Uganda 1682-1684
Vietnam 1703
women, romantic friendship, and gender crossing 814-816 815
Zimbabwe 1751
See also Colonialism in Africa south of the Sahara Section 377 and Section 377A
Section 377 in South Asia

The Imperiled (film) 1020

The Importance of Being Earnest (play) 1728 1729

In Stahlgewitter (Jünger) 1123

“In the Dark Room” (Touré) 38

In the Name of Identity (Maalouf) 803

Inclusion category, LGBT Military Index 1055

Indecent (play) 1574

Independent woman-woman marriage, in Africa 1015

India

ancient pornography and erotica 1262
art of identity 123-127 125
Asian drag 480-482
birth control movement 1466-1467 1469 1470
BRIC/S membership 1459
cinema 556-559 557 558
complementary and alternative medicine 1026 1028
decriminalization of homosexuality 1131 1163 1426-1427
eunuchs 516-517
hijras 666-671
HIV/AIDS 727-728 729 730-731
homoerotic traditions 812-813
koro outbreaks 1214
language 362
legal recognition of third gender category 1471 1585
men who have sex with men 1090 1092
Naz Foundation International 1128-1132
new media popularity 1142 1143 1145
phone apps 1230
pornography and erotica development 1269 1270 1271
pride events 1283
repeal of antisodomy laws 1055
rural queer communities 1397-1398 1399
Section 377 legacies 1420 1422 1422 1424-1428 1471
sex workers 1458 1459 1460
sexology development 1466-1467 1468 1470
situational homosexuality 1503 1505
sodomy laws 89 96-97 765 811
third sex/gender categories 1629
urban queerness 1691

See also Hijras

India, Union of, v. Justice K. S. Puttaswamy (India; 2017) 1422

Indian Penal Code (1860) 1046 1419-1420 1424-1425 See also Section 377 in South Asia

Indian Supreme Court 1131

IndigNation (Singapore Pride Season) 1222 1283

Indigo Girls 947

Indochinese Women's Conferences (1971) 1706

Indonesia
  attitudes toward LGBTQ population 998
  homosexual argots 897
  intersectionality of queer theory and anthropology 1330
  Islamic LGBTQI activism 1367
  koro outbreaks 1214
  men who have sex with men 1089 1091
new media popularity 1144
pornography and erotica development 1269 1270
rural queer communities 1399
third sex/gender categories 1431
transgender Muslims 1628
waria 1089 1628 1717-1720 1718
INERELA+ (International Network of Religious Leaders Living with or Personally Affected by HIV or AIDS) 324

Inetto character 1322

Infamous Desire (Sigal, ed.) 1585

Infants of the Spring (Thurman) 642

Information Project (Aswat) 832

Ingenieros, José 551-552

Ingres, Jean-Auguste-Dominique 1668

The Inheritance (play cycle) 1380

Initiative for Equal Rights (Nigeria) 339 537 1154

Initiative for Strategic Litigation in Africa 537-538

Inkanyiso (website) 94

Inkotshane (mine marriage) 1525

Inner Circle Mosque (Cape Town) 854 855

The Innocence of the Devil (El Saadawi) 858-863 859 862

Inquiries into Human Faculty and Its Development (Galton) 1121

An Inquiry into the Nature and Causes of the Wealth of Nations (Smith) 1138

Inquisition, criminal courts, and sexuality in colonial Latin America 818-823 820
archival records 108-109 628-629
history 818-819
Manananggal 129-130
sodomy laws and cases 88 108-109 820-821

Institut für Sexualwissenschaft 823-827 824
archival records 103
Elbe, Lili involvement 500-502
founding 791 824
photography work 1235
sex reassignment surgery 1642
sexual reform activism 400 1479

Institute for Research on Sexuality and Gender 100
Institute for Sex Research 115
Institute for Sexual Science. See Institut für Sexualwissenschaft
Instituto de Cultura de Puertorriqueña (ICPR) 1297
Integración (Brazil) 769
Integrity (Anglican group) 1357 1360 1361
Inter-American Court of Human Rights 1003
Intergroup on LGBT Rights (European Parliament) 790 1012
Interior design, queer domesticity and 1313-1314
The Intermediate Sex (Carpenter) 225 425 1581 1594
Intermediate sexual types, as term 1581
Intermediate Types among Primitive Folk (Carpenter) 1594
Internationaal Homo/Lesbisch Informatiecentrum en Archief (IHLIA) 106
International AIDS Conference 680
International AIDS Prevention Initiative 41 43
International AIDS Society (IAS) 680
International Association of Athletics Federations (IAAF) gender testing and criteria 157-158 161 164 840 sports in Africa 1544 1545
sports in Latin America 1540
International Centre for the Legal Protection of Human Rights (Interights) 37
International Conference on AIDS and Sexually Transmitted Infections in Africa (ICASA) 692 International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights 763

International Day against Homophobia, Transphobia, and Biphobia 223 1605

International Gay and Lesbian Archives 113-114

International Gay and Lesbian Film Festival (Amsterdam) 544

International Gay and Lesbian Human Rights Commission (IGLHRC)
  activism 771
  archival records 111
  Chimbalanga, Tiwonge case 1614 1616
  Nowhere to Turn report 1153
  Queen Boat Trials 1309
See also OutRight Action International

International Gay and Lesbian Travel Association 1646

International Guild Guides (Guild Press) 1705-1706

International Homo/Lesbian Information Center and Archive (IHLIA) 106

International Journal of Sexology (periodical) 98 1170 1467

International Lesbian and Gay Association. See International Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, Trans and Intersex Association (ILGA)

International Lesbian and Gay Human Rights Commission 1348

International Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, Trans and Intersex Association (ILGA)
  activism 763 771
  archival records 111
  encuentros involvement 929
  European branch 1012 1013
  formation of 1348
  Rainbow Index 1046
  survey on attitudes toward LGBTQ population 997 world survey of sexual orientation laws 1439

International Lesbian Information Secretariat (ILIS) 929

International Monetary Fund 1133

International Network of Religious Leaders Living with or Personally Affected by HIV or AIDS (INERELA+) 324

International Olympic Committee (IOC) 157-158 161 164 675
International Psychoanalytical Association (IPA) 1287 1289

International Statistical Classification of Diseases and Related Health Problems (WHO) 120

Internationale Tagung für Sexualreform auf Sexualwissenschaftlicher Grundlage (International Meeting for Sexual Reform on a Sexological Basis) 1473

Internet

- African queer literature connections 961
- Chinese online communities 1631-1632
- Chinese sites on Oscar Wilde 1731
- Kinsey scale online availability 884
- Latin American lesbian mothering connections 941
- Malaysian virtual communities 992
- Pakistani organizations 1194-1195
- pornography development and 1267 1270-1271
- as source of information about sex and sexuality 1477
- Tibet 1598-1599
- travesti and trans activism 1656
- urban queerness and 1692-1693

See also Digital technology New media in Asia Social media

Internet in Africa 827-830 829

- same-sex platforms 94 827-828
- social media and activism 828-830

Internet queer sites in the Middle East 153 831-836 834

The Interpreters (Soyinka) 953 967

Interracial relationships

- adoption and 22-24
- African queer literature 970

Intersectionality

- asexuality 139 140
- Combahee River Collective 393
- Groupe du 6
- Novembre 624
- Grupo Gay da Bahia 630
- HIV/AIDS 691 696
- jotería studies 864-865 866
- queer theory influenced by 1327 1329-1330
- sex tourism in Asia, analysis of 1438
- transfeminism 1618 1619-1623
Intersex identities 836-840
- athletes 156-165
- Australasia 175-176
- in cinema 354-356
- Europe 190-191
- global human rights 839
- historical definitions 369 532-534 667 673-674 836-837
- HIV/AIDS and Africa 698
- kathoey 869-874
- Latin America 354-356 839
- medical science 455-456 825-826 836-838
- military service in the United States 1063-1064
- Mongolia 1085-1086
- orgasm considerations 1171
- penis considerations 1220
- pride events 1283 1615
- sports involvement 1540 1544
- sub-Saharan Africa 13
- Taiwan 1633
- Thomas/Thomasine Hall court case 1591
- United States military service 1057

See also Hermaphroditism Hijras

Intersex Society of North America 369 838

Intersex, Transgender and Transsexual People Care Association 1633

Intertribal Native American/First Nations Gay and Lesbian Conference 1669 1672

Intrépida Vela (annual festival) 1110 1111 1111 1112

Las Intrépidas (organization) 1109 1110 1111-1112

The Invention of Women: Making an African Sense of Western Gender Discourses (Oyêwùmí) 535

"Inversion du sens genital" (Charcot and Magnan) 225-226

Invert, as term. See Sexual invert, as term

Invertido (invert), as term 552-553

Los invertidos (González Castillo) 553-554

The Invisible Ghetto (Krouse and Berman, eds.) 954-955

Invisible: Stories from Kenya's Queer Community (Mwachiro) 960
Invitación al polvo (Ramos Otero) 1297

Involuntary servitude and same-sex sexuality in Africa 840-843

Inxeba (film) 38 1528-1529 1530

Iolaus: An Anthology of Friendship (Carpenter) 1407

Iolaus (legendary Theban hero) 1405 1407

IPA (International Psychoanalytical Association) 1287 1289

Ipas, as term 1584

Iran
  asylum seeking 1350
  eunuchs 517
  historical background on sexuality 1435
  Islam in 1364
  LGBT Military Index score 1055
  LGBTQI refugees 1347
  masculinity in cinema of 1018-1023 1019 1022 1637-1638
  queer migration to Europe 1048 ritual practices for transitioning people 1388
  sex reassignment surgery 1434-1437 1630 shifting sexual norms during the nineteenth century 1491-1494 1492 trans and intersex athletes 163-164 trans and intersex policies 454 530 transgender identity in cinema of 1623-1627 1624 1636
  transgender Muslims 1630
  transgender people’s rights 1368
  transgendered subjectivities in 1634-1640 1636

Iran-Iraq War (1980–1988) 1020 1021

Irani, Shayesteh 1626

Iranian Lesbian and Transgender Network 1638

Iranian Queer Organization 1638

Iranian Railroad for Queer Refugees 1347 1638

Iranian revolution (1979) 1018 1020

Iranian Society for Supporting Individuals with Gender Identity Disorder 1437 Iraq
public morality laws 1368
queer migration to Europe 1048
terminology for nonnormative sexualities 1319

IraQueer 833

Ireland
anti-racist movement 73-74
decriminalization of homosexuality 1163
kinship models 887
LGBTQ military service 1069
same-sex marriage 764

Ireland, Norris v. (European Court of Human Rights; 1988) 791 1163

Irigaray, Luce 1327

Irish Queer Archive 105

The Iron Ladies (film) 163 872

“Is the Rectum a Grave?” (essay) 680 1170

Isabelle l’Algérien (Sebbar) 989

Iseisou dosei ai shoshi meroku (report) 100

Isherwood, Christopher 825 1046 1688

Ishtar-MSM (Kenya) 9 876

Isidore (monk) 1354

ISIS gay trials 844-847

IsiZulu (language) 905

Iskandariyya ... leh? (film) 847-851 847 848

Islam
adab works 1092-1094
circumcision practices 1217 cross-dressing prohibition 1635
historical background 1363
Indonesia 1717 1719 influence in Southeast Asia 998
Iran 1018 1020-1021 1635
Iranian research on 1638
lack of reference to female homosexuality 1075 as law and religion simultaneously 1364-1366
Lesbanese depiction 927
LGBTQI issues in the modern period 1366-1369
mukhannathin 1095-1096
mysticism in 949-950
Netherlands queer youth 1555
pinkwashing and 1245
prohibition of same-sex behaviors 1557
reform efforts 1366-1367
refutation of theory of figural imagery prohibition 1181-1182 same-sex literary discourses in the Ottoman Middle East 948-952 950 sex reassignment surgery in Iran and 1435-1436
trans issues 145-146
transgender Muslims 1627-1630 1629
See also Homosexual acts in shariʿa Religion and same-sex behaviors: Islam Religion and same-sex behaviors: Islam, Africa

Islam in Africa south of the Sahara 851-856 854
Kenya 875
Nigeria 1150-1152 1153
Senegal 1429
See also Homosexual acts in shariʿa

Islas, Alejandra 1112

Israel
alQaws opposition 48-51
cinema 495-500 496 497
decriminalization of homosexuality 78
films with LGBT Jewish characters 1377 homonationalism charge 395 homosexuality and Zionism 77-79 invasion of Lebanon in 2006 1032
Jewish population 1373
lesbian organizations 152-156
LGBTQ expressions 82-83 152-156 mixed record of LGBTQI inclusion 1374
pinkwashing concerns 1244-1248 1246 1374 1452 1646 portrayal in gay pornography 1174-1175 1176
pride events 1282
recognition of same-sex civil partnerships 999
refugees and immigration policies 1351
sex tourism 1452 1453-1454
travel and travelogues 1646

Israel Defense Forces (IDF), masculinity in 78-79

Israel-Hezbollah War (2006) 926

Issa, Tatiana 1224

Istanbul, Turkey, as hub of art production 1182

It Gets Better Project 377

It Is Not the Homosexual Who Is Perverse, But the Society in Which He Lives (film) 712
1482 1551 1711

Italian cinema, neorealist 1321-1323

Italian League for the Fight against AIDS 713

Italy
  backlash against LGBTQ rights 1013
  HIV/AIDS approaches 713
  homosexual argots 895
  lack of same-sex marriage 1011
  nationalist masculinity in World Wars period 1124
  photography in 1233 1234
  pride events 1279 1282
  queer migration to 1045-1046
  queer slang 912
  registered partnerships 1011
  sex trafficking 1463
  sexual revolution 1481
  situational homosexuality 1502
  transfeminism advocacy 1620

Italy, Oliari v. (European Court of Human Rights; 2015) 795 1011

Italy, Taddeucci and McCall v. (European Court of Human Rights; 2016) 795 1011

Iteso people, gender variations 1682

“It’s Dirty But Good” (song) 640

It’s My Life (film) 336

It’s Showtime (reality show) 1144
Ives, George Cecil 1166-1168 1407
Ivory Coast Transvestites Association 344-346
Ivy Tech Community College 892
Ivy Tech Community College, Hively v. (US; 2017) 892
Iweala, Uzodinma 340-341 957
Iweto, as term 908
Izharuddin, Alicia 992
Izinkotshane, as term 1503
Izitabane, as term 1614

J

J-FLAG (Jamaica Forum for Lesbians, All-Sexuals and Gays) 857-858 972 1650 1652
J. M. v. United Kingdom (European Court of Human Rights; 2010) 796-797
Jabb, Lama 1599
Jack and Jill (Ravelo) 188
Jack'd (phone app) 1229
Jackman, Michael Connors 240
Jackson, Ed 241 1723
Jackson, Julian 574 1552
Jackson, Neville 167-168

Jackson, Peter A.
  kathoey 1431
  language in Thailand 899-900
  othered spaces 729
  queer theory 1330
  Southeast Asia local queering 1704
  Thai media and travel 1143 1270 1382
  urban queerness 1692
Jackson, Rebecca Cox 255
Jacobs, Katrien 1270
Jacobs, Sue-Ellen 1583
Jacobus X 509 1428-1429
Jacques, Cheryl 783
Jafar, Arif 1130
Jag är nyfiken—en film i gult (film) 1481
Jagger, Mick 944 1173 1255
Jagose, Annamarie 1331
Jahangir, Junaid 1367
Jahelha va zhigoloha (film) 1021
Jaheli films 1019-1020 1625
Jahels (tough guys) 1019 1021 1625
Jāḥiẓ, al-(Abu ʿUthman ʿAmr ibn Bahr) 616 1092-1095 1594
Jahrbuch für sexuelle Zwischenstufen (journal) 824
Jai Jai (bakla performer) 129 129

Jamaica
  criminalization of homosexuality 1500
  Gully Queens 362
  pride events 1282
  travesti and trans activism 1650 1652

Jamaica Forum for Lesbians, All-Sexuals and Gays (J-FLAG) 857-858 972 1650 1652
Jamaican dancehall music 972
Jamal, Ahraf 959
Jamal, Amreen Mohamed 756

“Jambula Tree” (short story) 339 956 958
James, E. L. 216
James, Henry 30 31 34
James, John S. 739
Jami (Sufi poet) 1167
Jane Crow, as term 1622
Janer (pop artist) 1259
Jani, Jehangir 125-126 125

_Jannāt wa-Iblīs_ (El Saadawi) 858-863 859 862

Japan
archival records 96 99-100
asexuality 138
Asian drag 481
attitudes toward same-sex marriage 998 bondage practices 215-216 215
Boys Love (yaoi) manga 262-265 263
circumcision practices 1218
the closet 374
imperialism and post-imperialism 813-814
LGBT military service 1056
LGBTQ rights 786-787
militarism and sexualities in 1054-1057
new media popularity 1142 1144 1145
otaku sexualities in 1177-1181 1178
phone apps 1229
pornography and erotica development 1262 1266 1269-1270 1271
pride events 1282 1283
sexology development 1467
shunga artwork 1105
Taiwan colonization 1610
third sex/gender categories 1586
transfeminism 1622
urban queerness 1691

Jaques, Emanuel 241

Jarawi, as term 1319

_Le jardin des supplices_ (Mirbeau) 31
Jardins d’Écrivains (perfume house) 1730

Jarman, Derek 546

J’attends mon mari (Deya) 968 970

Javanmardi code 1018 1019 1020

Jawari, as term 1094

Jay, David 135 138

Jay, Karla 592 921

Je suis vivant (Mars) 978

Jean-Nickolaus Tretter Collection in Gay, Lesbian, Bisexual and Transgender Studies 116 117

Jenkins, Roy 1742

Jenness, Valerie 644-646 649

Jennifer, Annet 1618

Jenny Lives with Eric and Martin (Bosche) 252

Jensen, Ted 253

Jepkosgei, Joyciline 1543

Jerusalem Open House 49 1245 1374

Jessie’s Song, and Other Stories (Villaneuva) 485

Jésus, as term 895

La jetée (film) 126

Jewel’s Catch One nightclub 1690

Jewett, Sarah Orne 254 255

Jewish Gay Group 1374

Jewish Mosaic 1375

Jia Baoyu (fictional character) 1728
Jimbandaa, as term 1508
Jiménez, José Alfredo 1699
Jindi (Le) 1728
Jinetera/o, as term 1445
Jinpingmei (Chinese text) 1262
Jins, as term 1320
Jjuuko, Adrian 1685
Jjuuko, Adrian v. Attorney General (Uganda; 2007) 1684
Jobriath (glam rocker) 1256
Joburg Tracks: Sexuality in the City (photographic exhibit) 1336-1337
John Chrysostom 1354
John, Elnathan 1154
John, Elton 1256 1259 1310
John Holmes: The Man (film) 1174
John, Mary 668
Johns Committee 923
Johns Hopkins University 1171 1643
Johnson, Colin 1396
Johnson, David K. 925
Johnson, E. Patrick 972
Johnson, Gail 993
Johnson, Jeh 1063
Johnson, Marsha P. 448 593 1295 1642
Johnson, Thomas W. 520
Johnson, V. M. 214
Johnson, Virginia 137 368 1473 1474
Johnston, Craig 172 1705
Johnston, Lynda 1284
Joint United Nations Programme on HIV/AIDS 111
Joji Baro 39
Jonathan, Goodluck 1152 1153
Jonbesh-e sabz (Green Movement) 1638-1639
Jones, Cleve 41 42 682
Jones, Ken 1709
Jones, LeRoi 1577
Jooje fokoli (film) 1021
Joplin, Janis 1256 1485
Jordan
   public morality laws 1368
   terminology for nonnormative sexualities 1320
   travel and travelogues 1646-1647
Jorgensen, Christine artistic work 1259
   media attention 454 1432 1642 terminology used 358
Jornada (newspaper) 1287
Jorongos (Mexican ponchos) 1698 1700
Joseph A. Labadie Collection 115-116
Joseph, Gilbert M. 1697
Jotería, as term 916
Jotería Storytelling Project 865
Jotería studies 863-867
Joto, as term 863 915-916 1038 1223
Jounouss, as term 880

Journal of Language and Sexuality 910

Journal of Nervous and Mental Disease 426

Journal of Women’s History 255-256

The Joy of Gay Sex (Silverstein and White) 1475

The Joy of Lesbian Sex (Sisley and Harris) 1475

The Joy of Sex (Comfort) 1475

Joya third-gender role 1584

Joyce, James 82

Juana Inés (Netflix series) 1521

Juana la Larga. See Aguilar, Juana (“Juana la Larga”)

Juana la Larga (Rodríguez) 280

Juchitán, Mexico, muxes 1108-1112 1111 1223 1227 1227 1584

Judaism
  circumcision practices 1217
  lesbians 945 religion and same-sex behaviors 1370-1377 1375 1376
See also Anti-Semitism and Zionism Anti-Semitism in Europe

Judge, Melanie 1350

Jūichigatsu no gimunajiumu (manga work) 263

Juliana Mi Mi Hua Yuan (organization) 1631

Julien, Isaac 546

June L. Mazer Lesbian Archives 114

June (magazine) 263 264

Jung, Carl 510
Jünger, Ernst 1123
Jungle justice, in Nigeria 1151 1152
Juntunen, Jacob 1576
Juste une femme (film) 1626
Justicia para Nuestras Hijas 603
Justiniano, Gonzalo 354
Juvenile behavior 874
Juvonen, Tuula 105

K

K. B. v. National Health Service Pensions Agency (European Court of Justice; 2004) 797
K-dramas 1570
K-Pop Cover Dance Festival 1571
K-pop, Thai 1570-1573 1571
K. v. Health Division (US; 1977) 440
Kaas, Hailey 1621
Kaggwa, Julius 1616 1618 1685
Kagwa, Apolo 1681 1682
Kahan, Benjamin 258
Kahani, Abdolreza 1637
Kahiu, Wanuri 339
Kahlo, Frida 1225 1227 1700
Kaimin Rou Qing Wang Ye (organization) 1631
Kains-Jackson, Charles 1167
Kalende, Val 1686
Kalenjin people 1016-1017
Kalha, Harri 1313
Kaliarda (Greek argot) 912
Kallio, Finland, gentrification 607 608-610
Kama Shastra Society 1596
Kama Sutra (Sanskrit text) 1170 1262
Kamba people 875 908
Kambal sa Lusog (Comrades in Arms) 1042
Kambugu, Cleopatra 334-335 1618
Kamen no kokuhaku (Mishima) 1069
Kameny, Frank 925 993 1025 1550
Kamikaze music 1570
Kanai, Juan Miguel 1691 1692
Kanak Attak 74
Kanane, Utjiwa 260 1421-1422
Kanane v. State (Botswana; 2003) 1422
Kane, Cheikh Hamidou 965
Kane, Sarah 1577
Kang, Dredge Byung'chu 143 869 1382 1439
Kanor, Fabienne 977 979
Kant, Immanuel 30
Kanun (secular law) 948
Kaoma, Kapya 904 1680
Kaos GL v. Turkey (European Court of Human Rights; 2016) 797
Kaplan, Caren 1090
Kaplan, Morris B. 88
Karamagi, Andrew 1685
Karawane für die Rechte von Flüchtlingen und MigrantInnen 74
Karemire, Robert 1686
Karimi-nia, Hujjat al-Islam 477 1626
Karma 871
Karmen Gei (film) 343 344-345 346-347
Karner v. Austria (European Court of Human Rights; 2003) 18 796 1011 Karo, Joseph 1370-1371
Karris, Yarra 155
Karsch-Haack, Ferdinand 1014 1016 1017
Karungi, Beyonce Amooti 1618
Karve, R. D. 98 1470
Kasaija, Nelson 1618
Kâsim-i Envâr (poetry collection) 1184
Kassem, Hisham 1310
Kassim, Dina al- 377
Kates, Steven M. 1284
Kathodey thae 869

Kathoey 869-874
- athletes 162-163
- defining identity 145 869-870
- drag queens 480
- language considerations 899
- sex reassignment surgery and 1431 1432-1433

Kathoey-noi (a little bit kathoey) 870
Kato, David activism inspired by 1685
  Call Me Kuchu 338 753 funeral 1360
  murder 11 238 322 701 753 907

Katola, Michael T. 875

Katongole, Emmanuel 1677

Katyal, Sonia 777

Katz, Jonathan Ned ethnography 426
  Gay History Group founding 114-115 history of violence against LGBTQ people 644
  situational homosexuality 1505
  Wilde, Oscar trials 1734

Katz, Sidney 297

Katz, Zebra 1259

Kaunda, Chammah 65

Kavi, Ashok Row 668 1090 1091 1129

Kavuma, Lovinsa 336

Kāvus, Kay 1557

Kazaki (film) 1266

Keene, Donald 1071

Keen, Donald 1071

Keffiyeh (scarf) 880

Keitany, Mary 1543

Keiyo people 1017

Kelle, Guadalupe 1345

Keller, Richard C. 987

Keller, Yvonne 1303

Kelly, João Roberto 304-305
Kempadoo, Kamala 976 1444-1445

Ken-el (art piece) 1099

Kenmogne, Jean-Blaise 288

Kennedy, Anthony 892 1517

Kennedy, Dane 1594

Kennedy, Elizabeth Lapovksy 117 1546-1547

Kennedy, Philip 746

Kent, Nial 1304

Kentish, Benjamin 845

Kenttamaa-Squires, Kai 1691

Kentucky, decriminalization of homosexuality 1516

Kenya 874-877 876
  asylum seeking 1343 1344 1348 1349
  cinema 339
  documentation of same-sex intimacies 904-905
  HIV/AIDS activism 9 12
  Islam and same-sex relations 854-855
  kuchu term 1336
  LGBTQ activism 876-877 876
  LGBTQ migration attempts 1051
  neoliberal economic policy effects 1134
  refugees and asylum in 1345
  Section 377
  legacies 1420 1421
  sex tourism 1463
  sociocultural contexts 874-875
  subincision practices 1219
  trans issues 1617 1618
  transgender people 1335
  woman-woman marriage 1014 1015 1016-1017

Kenyatta, Jomo 389 874

Kenyatta, Uhuru 612 1677

Kepner, Jim 114
Kerkhoven v. Netherlands (1992) 18
Kermāni, Owhad al-Din 1559
Kershaw, Sarah 808
Kertbeny, Karl Maria 914 1293
Keshet Ga’avah (World Congress) 1375
Keshet (organization) 1375
Ketton-Cremer, Robert Wyndham 1106-1107
Kgositau, Tshepo Ricki 1615
Khabam miad (film) 1624
Khadim, as term 1628
Khairati, Queen-Empress v. (India; 1884) 97 1425 1426
Khakhar, Bhupen 124-125 126 1104 1105
Khaki, Aslam 1197
Khalifa, Fatima Ahmad 477
Khalifa, Mia 1176
Khalili, David 1309
Khama, Ian 261-262 261
Khamsa (ʿAtayi) 1185 1185
Khamsa (Nizami) 1182
Khan, Faris A. 1091
Khan, Shivananda 143 668 1089 1129-1130
Khanani, Muhammad R. 728
Khaneeth, as term 1318
Khanith, as term 1096
Khanna, Akshay 1091
Khanu v. Emperor (India; 1925) 1425

Khashab, Sumaya al 658

Khasi, as term 1628

Khatami, Mohammad 1022 1624 1625

Khawal, as term 1096 1320

Khawani, as term 1319

Khaxas, Elizabeth 537

Kheswa, Busi 336

Khiosgon, as term 1085

Khoisan people 1017

Khomeini, Ruhollah (ayatollah of Iran)
  fatwa on sex reassignment surgery 229 1435 1626 1630
  Islamic republic establishment 1020 Molkara, Maryam Khatoon meeting 1436 1437 1636-1637
  poetry 1560

Khontha/mokhannath (intersex) 1634

Khookha McQueer 878-881 879 880

Khreua-khai Pheuan Kathoey Thai (Thai Transgender Alliance) 869

Khumalo, Fred 959

Khumalo, Siza 1016

Khunāth, al-(intersex person) 1158 1159

Khunsa, as term 1628

Khuntha, as term 1320

Khus email list 1142

Khush (Happiness) 1042

Khwaja siras (transgender persons) 1091 1195 1196-1197 1587 1628
Kiarostami, Abbas 1020
Kihara, Toshie 263
Kikuyu people 874 875 1015
The Killing of Sister George (play) 1575
Kim, Eunjung 139
Kimiai, Masud 1019 1022
Kimpa Vita, Beatriz 597
Kimundu, Michael 325
Kin-chung, Matthew Cheung 1307
Kinbaku (bondage play) 215 216 215
Kincaid, Cliff 1663
King and beggar theme 1558-1559
The King (film) 1265
King, Helen 673
King, Hetty 1579
King, John 348
King Kong Theory (Despentes) 1276
King, Martin Luther, Jr. 993
King, Rosamond 971 1649 1650-1651 1657
King, William 1722
Kingston, Richard 89
Kinjiki (Mishima) 1070 1070
Kinkakuji (Mishima) 1070
Kinney, Nan 1266
Kinsey, Alfred C.
asexuality 115 137
Benjamin, Harry influence on 1642 female sexuality and orgasm studies 370-371 1467
Hirschfeld, Magnus influence on 1235
impact on public perceptions 1473
impact on sexual revolution 1479-1480 1483-1485
Kinsey scale 137 227 881-885
Moche pottery research 1077 1078
philosophy 227 453
research 227 368
sexuality studies 1168 1376 1465
Wolfenden Committee interview 1741

Kinsey scale 137 227 881-885 882

Kinship
Asia 527-528
same-sex relationships 255-256
United States 256

Kinship in Europe 885-889 887
adoption and surrogacy 16-20 23
queer domesticity arrangements 1312-1314 1313

Kinsman, Gary 1722

Kinyili, Happy Mwende 956

Kioko, Angelina Nduku 908

Kipsigi people 1017

Kirschner, Alfred 1712

Kirsten, Lex 1617

Kiss of the Spider Woman (Babenco) 220-222 220

Kiss of the Spider Woman (film) 571

The Kiss on the Asphalt (play) 1223

Kitan Club 216

Kitchen Table/Women of Color Press 251

Kitchener, Herbert 1067
Kitetu, Catherine Wawasi 908
Kitkal, as term 1319
Kituluni Hills (Kenya) 875
Kizuna: Koi no kara sawagi (Kodaka) 266
Konminam (flower handsome man) 1748
Klebs, Theodor Albrecht Edwin 837
Kleeber, Gene 993
Klein, Fritz 884
Klein, Melanie 1289
Klein Sexual Orientation Grid (KSOG) 884
Kleinfeld, Mala Silverman 902
Klimmer, Rudolf 401
Klippert, George Everett 296
Klyuev, Nikolai 87
Knauft, Bruce M. 1384
Knauss, Stefanie 495 499
Kniel, Nicholas 681
Knopp, Larry 1691
Kodaka, Kazuma 266
Koedt, Anne 371
Kogan, Jane 113
Kogan, Valentina 1540
Kohler, Bob 592
Kolawole, Mary 535
Kolodny, Robert C. 137
Kolyada, Nikolai 1085
Kommunalkas (Russian flats) 1313 1314
Kondakov, Aleksandr 1402 1403
Kong, Travis S. K. 1381 1460
Koni people 1015
Konstitutionsbiologie (constitutional biology) 1027-1028
Koogi (performance artist) 1271
Koraan, René 580
Korea. See North Korea South Korea
Korea Queer Archive 100
Korean Sexual-Minority Culture and Rights Center (KSCRC) 100
Kórima Press 865
Koro (belief in shrinking penis) 1214
Koskovitch, Gerard 113
Kostenbaum, Wayne 521
Kothis
  hijras and 667-668
  HIV/AIDS 728
  legal recognition of 1471
  as term 1090 1091 1129 1427
Kot'singi tradition 973
Koubek, Zdenek 156
Koubková, Zdeňka 156
Koushal, Suresh Kumar 1422
Koushal, Suresh Kumar v. Naz Foundation (India; 2013) 669 1422 1427
Kováts, Eszter 70
Koyama, Emi 359 1620

Kozak v. Poland (European Court of Human Rights; 2010) 796

Kozin, Vadim 87

Kozma, Liat 1469 1470

Kraak, Gerald 958-959

Krafft-Ebing, Richard von 1292
  female same-sex sexuality considerations 1466 gender variance views of homosexuality 1470
  Hall, Radclyffe influenced by 1725
  impact on public perceptions 1473
  metamorphosis sexualis paranoica 1640
  philosophy 225 400
  Psychopathia sexualis 896 1291-1294
  sexology work 1121
  use of lesbian term 1410

Krahulik, Karen Christel 1380-1381

Kraipet, Natt 146

Kramer, Larry 1-2 735 741 1576

Kratiam (garlic), as slang 869

Kraus, Cynthia 456

Kredsen af 1948 (Circle of 1948) 104

Der Kreis (journal) 574 1481

Der Kreis (organization) 1282

Krige, Eileen Jensen 1017

Krishan, Balbir 126 128 131-132 131

Kronfeld, Arthur 824

Krost, Barry 1255

Krouse, Matthew 954-955

Krouwel, André 375
Krupp, Friedrich 1046 1122
Krzywicka, Irena 1726
KSOG (Klein Sexual Orientation Grid) 884
Kua Er Zhong Xin (organization) 1632
Kua Xing Bie Sheng Huo (organization) 1631-1632
Kua Xing Bie Wei Ji Yuan Zhu Yu Zi Xun (organization) 1632
Kua Xing Bie Zhong Xin (organization) 1632
Kuagbiaru (Zande man) 63 63
Kuby, Gabriele 70
Kuch, Judith 993
Kuchu, as term 907 908 1336
Kucing, as term 1089
Ku'er, as term 1604 1746
Kugan, Jerome 991
Kugle, Scott Siraj al-Haqq 1094 1367 1628 Kulick, Don ethnographic work 914
   language 894 895 900 901
   themes and works 303 304
   travestis 1447
Kuloba, Robert W. 753
Kumu Hina (film) 1586
Kun, Kuo Pao 1744
Kuntsman, Adi 87
Kuntzler, Paul 993
Kunzel, Regina 117 374 1501 1502
Kuo, Liang-hui 1610-1611
Kupona Network 738
Kuromiya, Kiyoshi 739
Kushner, Tony 1576
Kuti, Fela 38
Kwan, Stanley 1145
Kyakulassajja (male-like woman) 1682
   Kyaputen Tsubasa (Takahashi) 264
Ky, Daresha 1701
Kyoko (Murakami) 684
Kyrgyzstan
   public morality laws 1368 repression of LGBTQ people 1283
Kytka, Carlos 582

L

The L Word (television series) 1312
La Fountain-Stokes, Lawrence 1226 1296 1657
La Galigo cycle (Indonesian text) 1717
Laaksonen, Touko. See Tom of Finland
Labadie, Joseph Antoine 115-116
Labaki, Nadine 926
El laberinto de la soledad (Paz) 199

Labia
   elongation of 1016 1017
   surgical creation of 1219

Labouchère Amendment (1885) (UK) 84-85 1163 1166 1420
Labouchère, Henry 84-85 1420
Labrisz Leszbikus Egyesület 104
The Labyrinth of Solitude (Paz) 199
Lacan, Jacques
   Argentine psychoanalysis influenced by 1289 1290 phallus theory 1215
   philosophy 520
   tripartite model of human subjectivity 1179
Lacey, E. A. 1697
Ladder (magazine) 113 445-446 541-542
Ladlad (political party) 788
Ladri di biciclette (film) 1322
Lady Gaga (musician) 1258 1259
Lady Guagua (reality show) 1748
“Lady Tal” (Lee) 29
Lady Terminator (film) 1270
Lady Windermere’s Fan (play) 1727 1728
Ladyboy culture 1382
Ladyslipper 945
LAGAI (Lesbians and Gays Against Intervention) 312-313
LAGANZ (Lesbian and Gay Archives of New Zealand) 102
Lagarde, Marcela 599
LAGO (Lesbians and Gays against Oppression) 300
Lagrange, Frédéric 634-635
Lahore, Asifa 479
Laius (mythical Theban king) 1405 al-Lajna (Ibrahim) 1488
Laki-laki, as term 1089
Laking, Michael 204
Lakota Sioux people, two-spirit meanings 1670
LAL (Latina Americana Lesbian) 930
Lala Alliance 1144
Lala, as term 1604 1691
Lalake, as term 1090
Lambda Archives of San Diego 112
Lambda Legal Defense and Education Fund 891-893 1517
LAMBDA Mozambique 1087 1088
Lambda Rising Bookstore 248 250 253
Lambek, Michael 1386
Lambert, Mary 1259
Lambeth Conference 320-321 327
Lamm, Norman 1371
O lampião da esquina (journal) 107 628
Lan Yu (film) 1145
Lana, Jun 1399
Lands, lesbian. See Lesbian lands, women's lands, and separatist communes
Lane, Bettye 620
Lane, Edward 1592
L’Anecdote (newspaper) 287
lang, k.d. 947
Lang, Otto 1722
Language 894-903
Africa 93 344-345 377 423
Arab world 755 1317-1321
asexuality 135-137
Asia Pacific 145 162 187-188
Australasia 167 171-173
BDSM use 211
Boys Love–related 267
Caribbean queer literature 973 977 changing LGBTQ vocabularies 900-902 coded speech 949
homosexual argots 895-900
Hong Kong 1714-1715
language of and language about LGBTQI or homosexuality 894-895
Latin America 183 185 199-200 lavender linguistics 900-901 910-911 914
in Lebanon 927-928
in the Maghreb 988
Middle East 150 154 427 584 636 names of women’s sports teams 1543 nicknames 256-257
Pakistan 1195-1196
sex work in Asia 1456-1457
Southeast Asia 187-188 263 267 427 667 869-870 871 1604 trans and intersex issues 159-160 319 344-345 358-359 362-363 426-427 490 667 869 901 two-spirit meanings 1669-1670
Vietnam 1706
women on lesbian lands 935
x ending, in inclusive Spanish language 1651

Language in Africa 903-909
African queer literature 956 957 965
queer theory development 1336
Language in Europe 909-913 911t

Language in Latin America 913-919 915
confessional manuals 408
HIV/AIDS 717
Nahuas and Florentine Codex 559-563

"The Language of Homosexuality: An American Glossary" (Legman) 895

Language of Love (film) 1265

Lanham, Peter 953

Laos
   attitudes toward LGBTQ population 998
   sex reassignment surgery 1433

Laporte, Rita 446

Lapunov, Maxim 316

Laqueur, Thomas 293 673 1582

Laramee, Myra 1672

The Laramie Project (play) 1578

Larco Hoyle, Rafael 1076 1077-1078

Larson, Jonathan 1576

Las Casas, Bartolomé de 415-416

Lashmankin v. Russia (European Court of Human Rights; 2017) 797

The Last Generation (Moraga) 864

The Last Summer of La Boyita (film) 355-356 355

Last Words from Montmartre (Qiu) 1613

Lat, as term 1018-1019

Al-lāta (sodomizers) 1158 1159-1160

Latin America
   adoption laws and policy 21-22 23 24
   archival records 106-112
Latvia
   lack of registered partnerships 1011
   pride events 1279
   restrictions on same-sex marriage 1012

Laubscher, B. J. F. 510 511-512

Launda community (India) 1397-1398

Laurent, Bo 456 838

Lauritsen, John 1551

Lavender Jane Loves Women (album) 944 947

Lavender Languages and Linguistics conferences 900 910

Lavender linguistics
   Europe 910-911
   Latin America 914
   overview 900-901

Lavender Menace 593 919-921 920 936

Lavender Scare 237-238 922-925 923 1127

Lavery, Bryony 1577

Lavrin, Asunción 1497

Law of Religious Freedom (Argentina) 1141

Law Reform (Homosexual Land Reform Fund) 1525-1526

Lawrence, John 892 1517

Lawrence v. Texas (US; 2003) 88 892 1512 1516-1517

Lawyers Collective 1131 1427

Laye, Camara 965

Lazar, Berel 1374

Lazzarato, Maurizio 1138 1140

Le Mans, Vivien 1265
Le Pen, Marine 1244 1245
Le1f (pop artist) 1259
Lea, Henry Charles 412-413
League for Socialist Action (LSA) 1722
League of 1948 104
League of Left-Wing Writers 1728
Leal, Américo 282
Leal, Lourenço Ferreira 245
Leap, William L. 900 910 914 915
Leather fetishism history 211
  modern 212-216 213
  as ritual 1387
Leaves of Grass (Whitman) 1167
Leaving Tangier (Ben Jelloun) 986-987
Lebanese Civil War (1975–1990) 926
Lebanese LGBT Media Monitor 832
Lebanon
  internet activism 832 833-835
  Islamic LGBTIQ activism 1367
  Israeli invasion of 2006 1032
  Lebanese film 925-928
  Meem organization 927 1030-1033
  pinkwashing concerns 1452
  portrayal in Orientalist gay pornography 1175 1176
  pride events 1282
  public morality laws 1368 same-sex literature 192-195 207-210 631-635
  sex tourism 1452 1453
  travel and travelogues 1645 1646 1647
  urban queerness 1692
Lebensreform (life reform) 1027 1641
LebTour 1453
Lechedevirgen Trimegisto (Felipe Osornio) 1227 1274 1276
Leck, Ralph 1467
Lee, Ang 1004 1398 1609
Lee, Chris (Li Yuchun) 1144 1747 1748
Lee, Francis 1399
Lee Hsien Loong 1423
Lee, John Alan 205
Lee, Leo Ou-fan 1728
Lee, Loletta 1269
Lee, Vernon 26 29 256-257
Leeuwen, Jaap van 103
Lefferts, Daniel 247
Lega Italiana per la Lotta Contro l'AIDS 713
LeGaBiBo (Lesbians, Gays, and Bisexuals of Botswana) 9 260-261
Legal issues. See Criminalization of homosexuality Decriminalization of homosexuality specific cases; specific groups; specific laws; specific people
Legal-lyrical contradiction 1366
Legman, Gershon 895
Leiderman, Ana Elisa 939
Leighton, Frederic 32 1106
Leighton House Museum 1106
Leitsch, Dick 590 1025
Lek, Satree 162-163
Lelio, Sebastián 1656 1692
Lemaitre Ripoll, Julieta 773
Lembembe, Eric 289
Lemebel, Pedro 1224-1225 1315
Lems, Kristin 945
Lenin, Vladimir 1123-1124
Leo Baeck College 1373
Leonard, Erika. See James, E. L.
Leppe, Carlos 1224-1225
Lerner, Max 1661
LES—Grupo de Discussão sobre Questões Lésbicas 625-628
LES Online: Digital Journal on Lesbian Issues (online journal) 627
Les+ (online magazine) 1143
Lesbanese (film) 925-928
Lesben-und Schwulenverband in Deutschland 73
Lesbi, as term 1091
Lesbia Brandon (Swinburne) 32
Lesbia (magazine) 398
Lesbian and Gay Archives of New Zealand 102 168
Lesbian and Gay History Project 114-115
Lesbian and Gay Liberation Collection at Yale University Library 107
Lesbian and Gay Rights Project (ACLU) 1517
Lesbian Archives (Netherlands) 104
Lesbian, as term
Africa 1336
Arab world 1320
Asia 1091
Lesbian lands 935
Pakistan 1196

Lesbian bookstores 249-252 252t

Lesbian Concentrate (album) 945 945

Lesbian Connection (newspaper) 484

Lesbian Discussion Group (London) 249

Lesbian feminism 936 1326-1327

Lesbian feminist encuentros of Latin America and the Caribbean 462-463 928-932 1568

Lesbian/Gay History Researchers Network Newsletter 115

Lesbian Heritage 115

Lesbian Herstory Archives (LHA) 932-934 933
archival records 115 116 117 932-934
founding 113 114 932
graffiti 620 622

The Lesbian in Literature (Grier) 113

Lesbian Land (Cheney) 488

Lesbian lands, women’s lands, and separatist communes 934-938 937 back-to-the-land communities 488-490
Finland 609-610
gentrification 609-610
Middle East 636-637
rural queer communities 1394 1397

Lesbian mothering and adoption in Latin America 22 938-942 939

Lesbian mothering, Europe 16-19

The lesbian music movement 942-948 944t 945

Lesbian Natural Resources 489

Lesbian Peoples: Material for a Dictionary (Wittig and Zeig) 366-367

Lesbian separatism
African queer literature 970
lesbian music movement and 946 947
See also Lesbian lands, women’s lands, and separatist communes

Lesbian women
- in cinema 353-354 357 556-559
- domesticity arrangements 1312-1314 1313
- gayborhood exclusion of 1690-1691
- HIV/AIDS risk populations 685 696-698
- identity issues for migrants 1041-1042
- in Islam 756-759 861-862
- kinship models 888
- language used by 894
- Orientalism in pornography for 1174
- overlap with trans men 1547
- phone apps use 1229 1231
- photographic portrayals, in Europe 1234 1235
- rape, corrective, in Africa 1341-1342 1341
- scandals in Europe 1414
- sex tourism 1440
- sexual revolution involvement 1482
- tourism for 1379-1380
- transphobia among 1336

See also WSW (women who have sex with women)

Lesbiana, as term 1319

Lesbianas Unidas (United Lesbians) 930

Lesbianism
- African queer literature depiction 966-970
- anthropology in Africa south of the Sahara 63-68
- anxiety about, in marital advice literature 1474
- Arab queer literature depiction 1158-1159
- Arabic terms for 756 832 1318-1319 1320
- assimilationist vs. gender liminal views 984-985
- butch-femme bar culture 1546-1547
- Caribbean queer literature depiction 977 978
- early Christian times 1355
- early pornography and erotica 1263
- Hungary 493-494
- Iran 1494
- Judaism views 1371-1372
- Krafft-Ebing, Richard von views 1292-1293
- Lebanon 1030-1032
- Mädchen in Uniform depiction 984 1503
Mexican Revolution impact on gender norms 1038-1039
Misk al-ghazal depiction 1072-1076
Mistral, Gabriela poetry 1253 1254
new media in Asia and 1143-1144
North African queer literature depiction 988
NOW opposition to 919-921
origin of term 1410
Pasolini’s cinematic adaptation of A Thousand and One Nights 1210
Pizarnik, Alejandra poetry 1249-1250 1252 play depictions 1574 1575
pornography and erotica portrayals 1262 1264-1265 1266 1271 pulp fiction 1300-1306 1302
queer theory approaches 1325-1326
Sappho association with 1410-1412
Senegal 1430
sexology views 1466-1467
as sin against nature in colonial Latin America 1497
situational homosexuality 1501-1506
spirit mediumship 1386
sports involvement associated with 1544-1545
Thailand 869-873
A Thousand and One Nights depictions 1595
urninde figure 1393
The Well of Loneliness depiction 1724-1727
zhongxing vs. 1747 1748-1749

See also Boston marriage and women’s romantic friendships Femmes and butches Lavender Menace Lavender Scare

Lesbians and Gays Against Intervention (LAGAI) 312-313
Lesbians and Gays against Oppression (LAGO) 300
Lesbians and Gays Support the Miners (LGSM) 249 1399
Lesbians, Gays, and Bisexuals of Botswana (LeGaBiBo) 9 260-261
Lesbians in Love and Compromising Situations (LILACS) 300
Lesbiennes contre le racisme, l’antisémitisme et le fascisme 624
Lesbiennes of Color 74
Lesbische und bisexuelle Migrant_innen, Schwarze Lesben und Trans* (LesMigraS) 1280
Lesbos (organization) 768 940
“Lesbos” (poem) 1410
Lesi, as term 1604
Leslie-Lohman Museum of Gay and Lesbian Art 619 620 1101
Lesmadres (Lesmothers) 941
LesMigraS (Lesbische und bisexuelle Migrant_innen, Schwarze Lesben und Trans*) 1280 Lesotho
  asylum seeking 1343 same-sex sexual practices 1017
  Section 377
legacies 1420
Lestrade, Didier 2
LeSVOZ (magazine) 464 466
Lethe Press 253
Letsike, Steve 696
“A Letter from Huey Newton to the Revolutionary Brothers and Sisters about the Women’s Liberation and Gay Liberation Movements” (Newton) 571
Leung, Helen Hok-Sze 1441 1691
Leung, Joanne 1632-1633
Leung Mo-sheung 1746-1747
Leung T. C. William Roy v. Secretary for Justice (Hong Kong; 2005) 1307 1421
LeVay, Simon 227-228
Levee en masse (French Revolution) 1118-1119
Leverson, Ada 29
Lévi-Strauss, Claude 885
Leviticus, book of 1371 1372
Levy, Charles J. 1703
Levy, Robert 1190
Lewis, Heather Parker 579
Lewis, Jack 335 693-694
Lewis, Linden 1657
Lewis, Vek 1450
Lewisohn, Leonard 1557

Lexicon: Ambiguous and Debatable Terms Regarding Family Life and Ethical Questions (Pontifical Council for the Family) 70

Lexikon des gesamten Sexuallebens (Burchard) 358

Lezama Lima, José 436
Lezhin (website) 1271

LGBT, as term
  Bangladesh 1390 1391
  Pakistan 1195
  Singapore 1222

LGBT Centre (Mongolia) 1084

LGBT/I/Q, as term 1334

LGBT Military Index 1055

LGBTQI, as term 952 1650

LGBTQ2 movement 1584

LGBTTTTI (lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender, transsexual, travesti, and intersex) identities 1315

LGSM (Lesbians and Gays Support the Miners) 249 1399

LHA. See Lesbian Herstory Archives (LHA)

Lhak-Sam 223

Lhamana, as term 1670

Li, Yinhe 787
Li, Yuchun (Chris Lee) 1144 1747 1748
Liancheng Read website 1145
Liangzhong yiwai de (Kuo) 1611 1612
Liberace (entertainer) 292
Liberal clubs (Mexico) 1035-1036
Liberalism neoliberalism vs. 1138
  overview 1132-1133
See also Neoliberalism in Africa Neoliberalism in Latin America
Libération (newspaper) 2
Liberty (organization) 1068 1164
Libson, Micaela 941
Libya
  LGBTQ migration attempts 1051
  terminology for nonnormative sexualities 1320
The Lictors Bring to Brutus the Bodies of His Sons (painting) 1119
Lie Down with Dogs (film) 1380
The Lies of Liberty (film) 1084
Lieutenant Nun: Memoir of a Basque Transvestite in the New World (Muñoz and Ferrer) 503-504
Life writings
  Caribbean queer literature 974
  South African queer literature 960-963
Liffran, Hervé 398
Ligiéro, Zeca 652
“Like a Prayer” (song) 1256
LILACS (Lesbians in Love and Compromising Situations) 300
Lim, Eng-Beng 1579
Lim Meng Suang, Gary 1423
Lima-Hincapié, Andrés 350
Limite (film) 348
Lin, Hazel 1610
Lin, Jessie (Lin Liangle) 1747
Linck, Catharina Margaretha 86
Lingam (phallic symbol) 1213
Lion of Chaeronea 1405 1406
Lipschutz, Barbara. See Ruth, Barbara

List of Articles on the Social History of Transgenderism/Homosexual in Postwar Japan (report) 100
Lister, Anne 256 1106

Literary discourses in the Ottoman Middle East (1500–1900) 373 948-952 950 See also Sufi treatment of same-sex relations in poetry and prose

Literat, Ioana 41-42

Literature
  gay and lesbian pulp fiction 1300-1306 1302 1304 1610 1611 marital and dating advice 1473-1475 paperback revolution 1301 Persian 1183 1435 1638
  post-porn publishing 1277
  rural queer narratives 1398-1399
  Sufi treatment of same-sex relations 1556-1562
  Tibet 1599
  tongzhi 1609-1613 1611 1613
  travesti and trans activism 1656

Literature, African (Anglophone) 952-964 colonial archives 92 contemporary queer turn 952-954 life writings 960-963
  Nigeria 1154
  novels 957-960 short stories 954-957
See also specific works

Literature, African (Francophone) 92 964-971 1737

Literature, Arab
  adab works 1092-1093 1594 1595
  Islamic golden age 1157-1158 1363-1364 Middle Eastern travel writing 1645 modern novels 1072
  queer identities and 1317
  representation of same-sex relations 56-57 153-155

See also specific works

Literature, Asian
  China 1236-1238 1727 1744
  Malaysia 990-991
  Mongolia 1085
  new media role 1142 1143 1145
  Taiwan 1004 1605

Literature, Caribbean (Anglophone and Creole) 971-976 1656

Literature, Caribbean (Francophone) 976-979

Literature, Latin American boom in 1697
  La Onda movement 1697
  poetry 1248-1254
  Puerto Rican diaspora 1296-1297
  queering of 1316
  travesti and trans activism 1656

Literature, North African
  cross-dressing 989
  gay literary canon 986-987
  tourism 988

Lithuania
  backlash against LGBTQ rights 1013
  lack of registered partnerships 1011
  pride events 1280
  restrictions on same-sex marriage 1012

Litigators' Roundtable 1515

Littauer, Dan 1245 1246
A Little Gay History—Desire and Diversity around the World (Parkinson) 1104

Little Richard (Richard Penniman) 1255 1255 1256

Little Sister’s Book and Art Emporium 248

Littmann, Enno 1595

Litvin, Margaret 1667

Liu jai yim taam (film series) 1270

Liu, Jen-peng 376-377

Liu, Liyang 1747

Liu, Moraynia (Liu Xin) 1748

Lively, Scott 753 1685

Livermon, Xavier 1692

Lives of Great Men: Living and Loving as an African Gay Man (Edozien) 962

Living the Spirit: A Gay American Indian Anthology (Roscoe, ed.) 1583 1671

Livingston, Jennie 546 1690

Ljubljana Gay and Lesbian Film Festival 544

Ljubljana, Slovenia, Metelkova mesto 1033-1035 1034

Llach, Lluís 308

Llopis, María 1274 1275 1276

“La llorona” (song) 1699 1700

Lloyd, Darnell v. (US; 1975) 439-443

Lo, Joseph 1221

Loaded (Tsiolkas) 175

Lobe, Max 968 970

Lobo, Andréa 286

Loca, as term 917-918 1223 1650
“Loca de la locura” (short story) 1297

Locas, chongos y gays (Sívori) 914

Location features, phone apps 1230

Lock, Amanda 1527

Locke, Alain 639 639

Lockman, Joseph 1255

Lockwood, Lee 434

Logo (cable channel) 548

Lokas (film) 354

Lollobrigida, Gina 1322

Lombardi, Francisco 354

London, Charles 1576

London, England
  archives 104 105
  British Museum 1103-1104
  Holywell Street pornography 1263
  Leighton House Museum 1106
  LGBT travelers to 1046
  LGBTQ-friendly climate 1048
  molly houses 1080-1082 1081
  Soho neighborhood 1281
  Tate Britain museum 1104
  urban queerness 1688 1691

London Lesbian Archive 104 105

London Metropolitan Archives 105

Long Ago (Field) 1410-1412

Long, Scott 1245-1246 1310 1311

Longstreet, Augustus Baldwin 1395

Longtime Companion (film) 683
Loo, Zihan 472-474 472

“Looking for My Penis: The Eroticized Asian in Gay Video Porn” (essay) 1266

Loos, Tamara 99

López Austin, Alfredo 1109

López de Gómara, Francisco 416

Lopez, Erika 1568

López, Gregorio 819

Lopez, Matthew 1380

López, Miguel 1100

Lorca, Federico García. See García Lorca, Federico

Lorde, Audre 1326
  anti-racism activities 73
  archival records 117
  influence of 392
  naming relations 974
  queer theory 1327 1331

Loren, Sophia 1322

Lorway, Robert 386

Los Angeles, California
  Mattachine Society founding 1023
  pride events 1281-1282
  urban queerness 1689 1690

Lot/Lut story
  luti term from 1318
  reinterpretation of 1367 1368
  as source of prohibition of same-sex behaviors 755-756 1365 1557

Lothian, Marquess of 1742

Loubet, Pascal 2

Lousu (Taiwanese man) 97

Lovci (Hunters) Building (Slovenia) 1034
Love Ends (textile art piece) 54

Love Themes for the Wilderness (Jamal) 959

Love, Undetectable (Gupta) 128

Love! Valour! Compassion! (play) 1576

Lovedu people 1015

The Lovers (photograph) 1234

Love’s Coming of Age (Carpenter) 225

Lovetown (Witkowski) 376

Loving in the War Years: lo que nunca pasó por sus labios (Moraga) 864

Loving v. Virginia (US; 1967) 1485

Lowell, Amy 1412

Lowell, H. D. 1412

Lowell, James Russell 1167

Lowell (pop artist) 1259

Lowrey, Sassafras 215

Lowrie, Claire 521

Lozada, Ángel 917

LSA (League for Socialist Action) 1722

Lu, Longguang 420

Lu, Xun 1238 1727 1728

Lubiewo (Witkowski) 376

Lubunca (Turkish queer slang) 912

Luby (Lebanese woman) 927

Lucas, Michael 1174-1176 1175
Lucia Jerez (Martí) 554
Luciano, Dana 492
Lucina’s Music 946
Lucknow, India, Naz Foundation International work 1130
Ludditas Sexxuales 1274 1276 1277
Ludlam, Charles 1576
El lugar sin límites (film) 351 352
Lugones, María 1583
Luibhéid, Eithne 1040
Luk thung (Thai music genre) 1570
Las Lunas y las Otras 940
Lund, Crick 456
Lunsing, Wim 1180
Lunuganga Estate 1106
Luo, Maodeng 1744
Luo, Wen (Roman Tam) 1747
Luongo, Michael 1381
Lust, Erika 1275
Lustig-Prean and Beckett v. United Kingdom (European Court of Human Rights; 2000) 797 1068
Lustig-Prean, Duncan 1068
Lut story. See Lot/Lut story
Luther, Martin 1355
Luti, as term 928 1018 1318
Luti films 1018-1019 1020 1021 1022
La Luz de la Lucha (The Light of the Struggle) 936
Lwanga, Charles 1356
Ly, Mien 992
Lynch, Lee 1305
Lyon, Phyllis 444 445-446 541
Lyons, Malcolm C. 1595
Lyotard, Jean-François 1209
Lysistrata (band) 946

M

M (pseudonymous organization) 1194-1195 1196
M. v. H. (Canada; 1999) 1199 1201
Ma He. See Zheng He
Maale people, ashtime term 906-908
Maalouf, Amin 803
Maalouf, Rabih 926
Ma'bun, al-, as term 1318 1319 1320 1492
Mac-Iyalla, Davis 323
Macaulay, Rowland Jide 324-325 1150 1152 1154
Macaulay, Thomas Babington 1163 1419 1424-1425
Maccubbin, Deacon 253
Machacek, Jan 1226
Macharia, Keguro 1334
Machi weye gender variance 1585
Machismo
   Mexico 186
queer migrants to the US 1042
sports and sexuality in Latin America 1537-1542

Machuca, Germaín 1100
Mack, Mehammed Amadeus 459 460
Mackenzie Commission Report (Canada) 1721
MacKinnon, Catharine A. 1266 1275
Maclean, Donald 1661 1662
MacMaster, Tom 834 835
Macomère, as term 1650
Macommères-sodomites, as term 977
"Macorina" (song) 1699 1700
Macri, Mauricio 1141

Madam Satan (film) 982
Madame Satã 981-983
Madame Satã (film) 983

Mädchen in Uniform (film) 983-985 984 1503 1574
Maddy, Yulisa Amadu 953 954-955

Mademoiselle Aunty (film) 1624
Mademoiselle de Beaumont (Chevalier d'Éon) 318-319 319
Mademoiselle de Maupin (Gautier) 30
Madero, Francisco I. 1035 1038 1039
Maddivine (organization) 175

Madmazel Khaleh (film) 1624
Madonna (singer) 1256 1259
Madres lesbianas (Espinosa Islas) 940 941

Madres Lesbianas Feministas Autónomas (Autonomous Lesbian Feminist Mothers) 941

Madrid, Alejandro 865

Madrone, Hawk 935 938

Magazines
- erotic and pornographic 1264 1265 1266
- gay 1481-1482 1551
- homophile movement 113-114
- indigenous peoples activism 1672
- lesbian 1567 1568
- sexology reporting 1480
- Taiwan 1605
- Tom of Finland art 1602

Maggiorate fisiche (Italian sex bombs) 1322

Maghreb 985-990 1174

Magnan, Valentin 225-226

Magnani, Anna 1322

Mahala, Siphiwo 956

Mahdawi, Dalila 209

Mahdi, Muhsin 1595

Mahfouz, Naguib 1753-1757 1753

Mahmud (sultan) 1558

Mahtaa (Markaz-e Hemayat az Tarajensiyyati-ha-ye Irani) 1638

Māh_u 1187-1188 1190-1191 1585 1586

MAI (Minority AIDS Initiative) 741-742

Mai, Thanh (“Nu”) 128

Maiden names, at molly houses 1082

The Maids (play) 1574-1575
Maikey, Haneen 50
Maimonides 1372
Maiti Nepal 1565

Maize: A Lesbian Country Magazine 488

Majidi, Majid 1625

Majority Report (newspaper) 484

Mak nyahs, as term 992 1628
Makarem, Ghassan 585-586
Makerere University 1348
Makgoba, Thabo 323
Makhele, Caya 966

Makhmalbaf, Mohsen 1021-1022

“Making Invisible Histories Visible: Preserving the Legacy of Lesbian Feminist Activism and Writing in Los Angeles,” 117

Making Sex: Body and Gender from the Greeks to Freud (Laqueur) 673

Makley, Charlene E. 1597 1600
Makso, Bertho 833 1453 1646
Mal-fanm, as term 1650

Mala Mala (film) 916 1655

Malakoi, as term 1353-1354

Malandros (rogues) 981 982

Malawi anti-gay legislation 10 699-700
  asylum seeking 1343
  criminalization of homosexuality 699-700
  HIV/AIDS 692 698-700 699
  Section 377
  legacies 1420 1421
  trans issues 1349 1614
women’s sports involvement 1543

Malaysia 990-993 991
  - antisodomy laws 1055
  - attitudes toward LGBTQ population 998
  - British colonial sodomy laws 1163
  - Islamic LGBTQI activism 1367
  - koro outbreaks 1214
  - LGBT Military Index score 1055
  - new media popularity 1142 1143
  - PLU term 1222
  - pornography and erotica development 1269 1272
  - Section 377
  - legacies 1420 1423
  - sex reassignment surgery 1433
  - sodomy laws 89
  - transgender Muslims 1628

Male Daughters, Female Husbands (Amadime) 535

Male Model Monthly (magazine) 1264

Male prostitution
  - Brazil 1252
  - China 256 257 1460
  - Denmark 1687
  - Midnight
    - Cowboy depiction 1265
    - Sharaf depiction 1489-1490
  - Spain 1413

Malè revolt (1835) 1508

El maleficio de la mariposa (play) 1125

Males having sex with males. See MSM (men who have sex with men)

Mali
  - queer literature 966-967
  - third sex/gender categories 1587

Maliki legal school 1365

Malinowski, Bronislaw 509

Malinwa, D. N. 953
Mallah, Hawas 844
Mallarmé, Stéphane 28 30-31 33
Maloney, Kellie 1533
Maloney, Peter 204
Malti-Douglas, Fedwa 859 861
Mama, Amina 535-536 1334
Mamluks (slaves) 841-842

LA MAMUTCANDUNGO (multimedia piece) 1297

Man Alive: The Magazine of Britain’s Top Physique Photographers (magazine) 1264

Man into Woman (Elbe) 501-502 501

Man on a Pendulum (Gerber) 1376

Man royal, as term 1650

Man to Man Bookshop (London) 250

The Man Who Drove with Mandela (film) 335

A Man Who Is Not a Man (Mgqolozana) 1528

Managerialism, in Africa 1136

Managers, music 1255

Manalansan, Martin F.
   bakla term 1091
   coming out rituals 1387
   Filipino immigrants in New York City 1330 1692 houseboy role 1381
   queer diasporas 189 459
   queer theory approaches 1330
   swardspeak term 897

Manana, Mduduzi 1527

Manananggal (mythological figure) 129-130 129

Mandela, Nelson 1157 1615
Manenc v. France (European Court of Human Rights; 2010) 795

Manga. See Anime and manga

Manganang, Aprilia Santini 162

Mangcu, Xolela 1524

Manicongo, Francisco 628 1508-1509

La Manif pour Tous (Demonstrations for Everyone) 69

“A Manifesto for Cyborgs” (essay) 1329

Manin, as term 1085

Mann, Jonathan M. 719

Mann, Stephen L. 901

Mann, Thomas 1293

Mannan, Xulhaz 1390 1391 1392

Mannell, Jenevieve 362

Die Männer mit dem rosa Winkel (Heger) 1240-1241

Manning, Chelsea (formerly Bradley) 1662-1663 1662

Manning, Morris 204

Mansour, Elham 55-59 55

Manuel, Carlos 865

The Many Faces of Homosexuality (Blackwood) 1582

Manyonganise, Molly 1679 1752

Manzuoli, Giovanni 518

Mao Zedong 1028 1598

Mapplethorpe, Robert 1214 1233 1601

Mapuche people 1585

Mapuranga, Tapiwa P. 324
Marat/Sade (play) 1664
Marban, Pedro 408
Marcha Lésbica 604-605
Marches on Washington 993-997 994 1241
Marcia, James E. 884
Marcus, Frank 1575
Marcus, Sharon 257-258 1503 1504
Marcus, Steven 1260
Marcuse, Max 1641
Mard-i zan-numa (woman-presenting males) 1635
Mardi Gras events, Australia 1553 1553
Mardrus, Joseph-Charles 1592 1595
Mari-(prefix) 896
Maria (film) 1626
Maricones, as term 863 914-915 1038
Marimacha, as term 1650
Marimacho, as term 896
Mariner, William 1188
Marins, José Mojica 350
Mariposa, as term 916
Mariposas en el andamio (film) 916
Mariposas Negras 768
Mariposas Rojas 768
Mariquita, as term 917
Marital advice literature 1473-1475

Marius the Epicurean (Pater) 27

Markan, Mridu 362

Markova: Comfort Gay (Dempster) 189 814

Markwell, Kevin 1379 1382

Marnais, Philip 1705 1706

Maroney, Terry 644-645

Márquez, Rosa Luisa 283

Marriage
  Boston 254-259 254
  colonial Latin America 1500
  heterosexual marriage by LGBTQ people 1358-1359 1562
  Iran 1493-1494
  iweto marriage 908
  marital advice literature 1473-1475
  neoliberal economic policy effects in Latin America 1139-1140
  as ritual 1388
  Tibet 1597 1598
  W v. Registrar of Marriages case 787 1606 1713-1717 1715

Marriage migration in Asia 997-1000

Marriage of the Blessed (film) 1022

Marriage Ordinance (Hong Kong) 1714

Marriage, same-sex
  Africa 1014-1018 1014
  Argentina 940 1002 1003 1140 1290 1450
  blessings of unions prior to legal marriage 1359
  Brazil 1002-1003 1140 1510
  Canada 1201 1360
  Christian 1359-1360
  connection to reproductive heterosexual family model 886
  Europe 1008-1014 1010
  France 1192
  human rights debate 764
  lack of, in Asia 997
  Latin America 721 1001-1004 1002 1450
Malaysia 990
Mexico 940
mine marriages 1087
neoliberal economic policy effects in Latin America 1139-1140
Nepal 1564-1565
Netherlands 1008 1359
Oduber-Lamers case 972
Pacific Islands 1192
parenting rights and 1199 1200
Taiwan 529-530 529 997 998 999-1000 1004-1008 1005
United Kingdom 764 1742
United States 121 447-452 529 529 1192 1517
See also Obergefell v. Hodges (US; 2015) Windsor, United States v. (US; 2013)

Marriage, same-sex, in Latin America 1001-1004 1002
Marriage, same-sex, in Taiwan 529-530 529 1004-1008 1005
Marriage, universal, in Europe 1008-1014 1010t
Marriage, woman-woman, in Africa 64 387 1014-1018 1014
Mars, Kettly 978 979
Marshall, George 1058 1479
Marshall Plan 1479
Martí, José 554 1656
Martin, Bob 592
Martin, Del 444 445-446 541 921
Martin, Fran 1330 1611
Martin, George R. R. 1217
Martín, Jorge 61
Martin, Richard Joseph 211
Martínez Ávila, Erick 725
Martínez, Ernesto J. 865
Martínez, María Elena 1498 1499
Martinez, Omar 1345
Martínez-Patiño, María José 158
Martínez-San Miguel, Yolanda 1296 1650 1652

Martinique
  queer literature 977
  travesti and trans activism 1650

Martire d'Anghiera, Pietro 416

The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian (D'Annunzio) 33

Maruf (organization) 1367

Maruko, Tadao 798

Maruko v. Versorgungsanstalt der deutschen Bühnen (European Court of Justice; 2008) 798

Marx, Karl 1211

Mary Lou (film) 1377

Masculinity
  anti-Semitism and 76-77 80-83 biological essentialism views 226 228
  China 1748
  Christian acceptance of same-sex acts and 1357 colonialism effects on indigenous peoples 1672 Egyptian 149
  fascism associated with 1124-1126 1322
  French Revolution-era beliefs 1120
  Iran 1623 1625
  Italian neorealism cinematic portrayals 1322
  K-pop influence on 1572
  Khokha McQueer digital art 879 879 880
  Mexican Revolution impact 1035 1036-1037 mixed effects of castration 1217
  neoliberal economic policy effects in Africa 1134
  Orientalism views of 1173
  Pasolini's cinematic adaptation of A Thousand and One Nights 1210 penis and 1213-1214 1214 1215
  photographic portrayals, in Europe 1233-1235 1233
  post-porn movement 275-277
postrevolutionary conservative period 1120-1123
queer theory approaches 1328
Sharaf exploration of 1486-1490
sports and sexuality in Latin America 1536-1542 1537 1541
sports association 1543 1544
stereotypes of Asian men 1214 1266 1600
Tom of Finland art 1601-1603 1601
Vietnam War era 1702-1703
World Wars period 1123-1127 1124
Zuqaq al-Midaq depiction 1755-1756

See also Female masculinity

Masculinity in Iranian cinema 1018-1023 1019 1022 1637-1638

MASGD (Muslim Alliance for Sexual and Gender Diversity) 831 1367

Mashoga, as term 852-853 908 1587

Mashpritzot 1246

Masisi, as term 1650

Masked Muskequeers 620

Masood, Syed Ross 813

Masorti Judaism, views on same-sex behaviors 1372 1373

Masotta, Oscar 1289

Mass, Lawrence 1070

Massad, Joseph A.
  on Arab same-sex relations 56-57
  the closet 377 395
  Gay International term 65 395-396 583-587 751-752 1626
  Orientalist tropes 1754 1755
  Queen Boat Trials 1311
  queer theory views 1330
  sex tourism in the Middle East 1453
  Sharaf analysis 1488
  Tuqus al-isharat wa-al-tahawwulat analysis 1666-1667

Masson, Pierre 1720

Mast, Jane (pseudonym) 1574
Masterpiece Cakeshop v. Colorado Civil Rights Commission (US; 2018) 1202

Masters, William H. 137 368 1473 1474

Masturbation
- circumcision as cure for 1217
- feminism views 1475-1476
- Kenya 874
- loss of vitality associated with 1170
- penile 1216
- sex aids for 1171
- as sin against nature in colonial Latin America 1495 1496-1497

Masvidal, Paul 1258

Mata Estevez v. Spain (European Court of Human Rights; 2001) 795

Matabane, Khalo 340

Matamoro, Blas 571

Match.com (dating platform) 1230

Matebeni, Zethu 336 1336

Mateen, Omar 846 1298

Mathebula, Mzuzephi 579-580

Mati, as term 973 1386

Matlovich, Leonard 1708 1709

Matoko, Bertrand Nguyen 968 970

Matory, James Lorand 93 594

Matos, Carolina 466-467

Matos, Ian 1540

Matronic, Ana 1259

Matsumoto, Tōru 1071

Mattachine Review (periodical) 113 1023 1024-1025

Mattachine Society 1023-1026 1025
assimilationist approach of 1325
early leadership in LGBTQ activism 1282
founding 113
Gay Liberation Front 590
Lavender Scare and 924-925
March on Washington 993
philosophy 229 247-248
Stonewall Riots commemoration proposal 1550

A Matter of Life and Sex (Moore) 375

Matthes, B. F. 1718

Matthew Shepard and James Byrd Jr. Hate Crimes Prevention Act (Shepard/Byrd Act) 450 647 648

Mattis, Harrison v. (pending 2018) 893

Mattis, James 1064

Maujila Manilal (Khakhar) 124

Maupin, Armistead 252 1312

Maurice (Forster) 307 1732

Mavor, Elizabeth 257

Mawanda, Nikilas 1618

Maxwell Fyfe, David 1421 1739

Maxwell, William 1066

Maya people, third gender among 1584

Mayate, as term 1110 1447

Mayema, Junior 1351

Mayer, Stefanie 70

Mazer, June 117

Mbeki, Thabo 7 681-682 694-695 697

Mbiti, John S. 875
Mbugua, Audrey 12-13 1336 1618
McAllister, John 1136
McAlmon, Robert 1046
McBride, Sarah 1533
McCarthy, Joseph 922 924 1024 1610
McCarthyism
in Taiwan 1610
targeting of LGBTQ civil rights organizers 231 232
McCluskey, Martha T. 1134
McConnell, Michael 448
McCormick, Jared 1453
McCoskar v. the State (Fiji; 2005) 1563
McDiarmid, David 1104
McFeeley, Tim 782-783
McGlynn, Nick 1396-1397
McIntosh, Mary 567 1466
McKellen, Ian 1310
McKinney, Cait 113 115 117
McKnight, Ian 857
McLean, Neish 858
McLelland, Mark 99 1330
McNally, Terrence 1576
McRuer, Robert 1331
MDC-T (Movement for Democratic Change–Tsvangirai) 1752 me and Nina (Hand) 485
M.E. v. Sweden (European Court of Human Rights; 2015) 793 1048

Mead, Margaret 1189

The Meadow of the Gazelles: In Praise of Beautiful Youths (Islamic text) 1262

Meaker, Marijane 1302

Measure of Sexual Identity Exploration and Commitment (MoSIEC) 884

Medical Therapy and Health Maintenance for Transgender Men (Gorton) 577

Medical tourism
  sex reassignment surgery 1431
  Singapore 1431
  surgical transitions 1220
  Thailand 1431 1432-1433

Medicine, complementary and alternative 421 1026-1030

Medicines and Related Substances Amendment Act (South Africa) 695

Medieval Arab Lesbians and Lesbian-Like Women (Amer) 584-585

Medina, Bartolomé de 819

Medina, Luz María 940

Medley, Kevin 253

Meeker, Martin 1024

Meeker, Richard 1304

Meem (organization) 154 192-195 927 1030-1033 1030

Mehrez, Samia 807-808 1488

Mehrjui, Dariush 1021 1022

Mehta, Deepa 556-559 557 558

Mei, Yanfang (Anita Mui) 1747

Meiners, Christoph 365

Mektoub (film) 1174
Melanesia
  ritualized same-sex practices in 1192-1193 1383-1384
  transgender people 1188-1189 1191

Mellor, Bob 592

Melodrom: The Making of a Rebellious Telenovela (multimedia production) 1226-1227

Melzer, Margarete 984

Memba, as term 1604

Memoirs See Life writings

Memoirs of a Woman of Pleasure (Cleland) 1263

Men and Women: The World Journey of a Sexologist (Hirschfeld) 1468

Men in Love (film) 335 338

"Men Loving Boys Loving Men" (Hannon) 204 241

Men of Israel (film) 1174 1175-1176

Men who have sex with men. See MSM (men who have sex with men)

The Men with the Pink Triangle (Heger) 1240-1241

Mendoza, Cirilo 1038

Mendoza, Mónica 653-654

Menén dez, Ronaldo 61

Mengin, Charles 1410

Mennesson v. France (European Court of Human Rights; 2014) 19

Menon, Nivedita 164 1089

Ein Mensch Wechselt das Geschlecht (Elbe) 501-502 501

Menstrual, Naty 1225

Menyawi, Hassan El 396

Merabet, Sofian 1691
Mercado, Freddie 1226
Mercado, Victoria 313
Mercado, Walter 462-463
Mercedes (film) 1022
Mercer, Kobena 513
Merchant Navy LGBTQ servicemembers 1067
Mercure de France (newspaper) 1733
Mercury, Freddie 1256 1259 1601
Mernissi, Fatima 536
Merrill, James 308
Mesquita, Cláudio 718-719
Messing, Simon David 506
Metelkova mesto (Slovenia) 1033-1035 1034
Methodist Church of Britain 1359
Meti, as term 1471 1563
Metoidioplasty 1219
Metronormativity concept 1393-1394
Metropolitan Community Churches (MCC) 324
Metrosexual, as term 1729
Mette bor hos Morten og Erik (Bosche) 252
Metzger, Céline 346
Mew, Charlotte 29
Mexican Liberal Party 1038
Mexican Revolution and sexuality 1035-1039 1037 1251 See also El Baile de los 41 (1901)
Mexico activism 201 768 770 939-940
  advocacy for LGBTQI refugees 1347
  archival records 106-107
  bars and cabarets 199-202 200 280-282 655-656
  cinema 349-350 352-354
  Los Contemporáneos movement 1250-1251
  cross-dressing 183-187 184
  decriminalization of homosexuality 1500
  drag queens 1500
  execution of sodomites 1509
  feminicide 599-600 599
  gender identity 122
  impact of 1910 revolution on gender norms 1035-1039 1037
  Inquisition 1495
  lesbian encuentro of 1987 929-931 lesbian mother encuentro of 1995 941
  lesbian mothering and adoption in 938-942
  LGBTQ rights movement 939-940
  masculinity and sports 1537 1539
  modernity and queerness 1316
  performance artists in 1223 1224 1226-1227 1227 popular songs 1698
  pornoterrorismo and post-porn 1274 1275 1276
  pre-Columbian mixed-gender way of life 1109
  pride events 1001 1282
  same-sex marriage 1002 1003 1450
  same-sex partnerships 1002
  sex tourism 1447-1448
  sex workers 1449
  sexual initiation 377
  sodomy laws 88
  sports crowd homophobic chants 1538
  transfeminism 1622
  travesti and trans activism 1654 1655
  urban queerness 1691
  El vampiro de la colonia Roma depiction 1695-1697
  visibility of LGBTQ athletes 1542

See also Muxes

Mexico City massacre (1968) 1223

México se escribe con J: Una historia de la cultura (Schuessler and Capistrán, eds.) 915-916

Meyeer, Patrice 710-711
Meyer-Bahlburg, Heino 837
Meyer, Sabine 501-502
Meyerowitz, Joanne 115 662
Mgqolozana, Thando 1528-1529
Mia (Lebanese woman) 927
Miano Borruso, Marinella 1315
Michael, George 1257-1258 1257 1259
Michals, Duane 308
Michel, Neil 43
Michês 1447
Michigan Womyn's Music Festival 943 945 946 947 1394
Micronesia, transgender people 1188-1189 1191

Middle East
background on sexualities 56-57 673 challenges to West/East binary 1032
circumcision practices 1217
the closet 373 377 394-397
eunuchs 517
GayMiddleEast.com website 1245-1246
homoaffectivity 985-986
Lesbanese film 925-928
modern Islam 758
mukhannathin 1095-1096
Orientalism in gay pornography about 1172-1177 1175 1263-1264
queer European travelers to 1046
queer migration to Europe 1048
queer names and identity politics in 1317-1321
refugees 777-779
sex tourism 1452-1455
sodomy laws 845
Spectra Project for refugees from 1534-1536 1535
third genders 530
travel and travelogues 1644-1649
travelers to Africa 1681

See also A Thousand and One Nights (Middle Eastern story collection) Coming-out/coming-in discourses in the Middle East Literature, Arab Orientalism Pasolini’s cinematic adaptation of A Thousand and One Nights specific countries

Middlesex (Eugenides) 191 836 1220

Midnight Cowboy (film) 1265

Migraine-George, Thérèse 347

Migrant queer communities, US 459 460 777-780 1039-1045 1041

Migration
  - Africa 1335-1336
  - marriage-related, in Asia 997-1000 1307-1308
  - Namibia 1116
  - Pacific Islands 1191-1193
  - Puerto Rico 1226
  - refugees and asylum in Africa 1342-1346 1344
  - refugees and immigration policies 1346-1353
  - rural LGBTQI people 1397
  - sex workers 1459 1464
  - transgender people in Latin America 1140
  - United States immigration law 1040
  - urban queerness and 1692

Migration to Europe 1045-1054 1047 1049
  - anti-racist activism in Europe 71-75
  - historical background 1045-1047
  - reception of LGBT migrants 1051-1052 1348
  - types of immigration 1048-1051

Migué, Jean-Luc 1140

Miguel, Francisco 286

Miike, Baehr v. (Hawaii; 1993) 448

Milan Project 1130

Milani, Tahmineh 1638

Milano, Laura 1276 1277

Milashina, Elena 315

Miles, Catharine Cox 226-227
Military law and policy in the United States 1057-1066
- blue discharges 1059 1689
- Cold War 1059-1060
- discharges of LGBTQ people 1061
- Don't Ask, Don't Tell policy 238 449 783 1060-1063 1709
- intersex and transgender servicemembers 1063-1064
- Manning, Chelsea case 1662-1663
- public opinion changes 1062-1063 1062
- Vietnam War 1702 1703 1709
- World Wars I and II 1057-1059

Military/Navy in the United Kingdom 1066-1069

Military Pride (exhibit) 1068

Military service
- ancient Greece 1406-1407 1502
- ban on LGBT persons in various countries 1709
- China 1746
- discrimination based on HIV status 893
- French Revolution 1118-1119
- situational homosexuality 429 1504-1505
- trans women in Thailand 873
See also Sacred Band of Thebes

Milk, Harvey
- Jewish affiliation 1375
- March on Washington 994
- memorials to 42 1102
- murder 781

Milks, M. 139

Les mille et une nuits, contes arabes traduits en français (Galland) 1592

Millenium Boy (music group) 1571

Millennium March on Washington for Equality (2000) 783 996

Miller, Merle 1575

Miller, Tim 1577

Miller-Young, Mireille 1266
Millet system (Ottoman Empire) 948
Millo, Yiftach 1345
Milonga (song type) 1698
Min tochnit (television series) 1475
Minaj, Nicki 1259
Mine marriages characteristics 386 597 811-812
HIV/AIDS 698
as term 1087 1525
Mines, in Africa 1087 1525
Ming dynasty (China) 1743 1744 1746
Ming Gwong Se (Society for Truth and Light) 1307
Miniature paintings, Ottoman and Persian 1181-1186 1183 1185
Minister of Home Affairs and Another v. Fourie and Another (South Africa; 2005) 11
Minister voor Immigratie en Asiel, X, Y and Z v. (Court of Justice of the European Union; 2013) 1048 1050
Ministerio de Salud (MINSA) (Nicaragua) 1149 1150
The Ministry of Utmost Happiness (Roy) 521
Minogue, Kylie 1259
Minority AIDS Initiative (MAI) 741-742
Minority AIDS Project 738
MINSA (Ministerio de Salud) (Nicaragua) 1149 1150
Minwalla, Omar 756
#MiPrimerAcoso 604
Mir-Bagheri, Davood 1624 1636
Miranda, Deborah 1584
Mirandé, Alfredo 1109
Mirbeau, Octave 31
Miriam, Pauline 485
Miroir des justices (legal treatise) 1659
Mis Mamás Rosario (My Mothers Rosario) 941
Mishima, Yukio 1069-1072 1070
Mishkav zchar (lyings of a male) 1370 1371
Misk al-ghazal (al-Shaykh) 1072-1076 1073
Miss Galaxy Pageant (Tonga) 1190
Miss Meena and the Masala Queens (play) 482
Miss Mona (film) 1464
Misster (band) 1145 1747 1748
Mistral, Gabriela 1253-1254 1253
Misztal, Barbara A. 716
Mithliyya, al-, or al-mithliya, as term 150 927 1320
Mitra, Payoshni 164
Mitterrand, Frédéric 988 1464
Mix Brasil (festival) 548
Miyazaki, Tsutomu 1178
Mizer, Bob 1264 1602
Mizulina, Yelena 1402
Mkasi, Lindiwe P. 67
Mkhize, Nonhlanhla 696
Mnangagwa, Emmerson 1752
Mo (Chi) 1004
Mobile apps See Phone apps

Mobilization for Survival 994

Moche pottery 1076-1080 1077 1078 1079 1098 1262

Moche society 1097-1098

Mod revival, in popular music 1255-1256

Model Penal Code (US) 1514

Modern Family (television series) 1312

Modernismo (modernism), same-sex relations 554-555

Modernity, connection with queerness 1316-1317

Modi, Narendra 1131

Modinos v. Cyprus (European Court of Human Rights; 1993) 791-792 1163

Moffat, Wendy 813

Moffie (van der Merwe) 899

Moffies
  language considerations 898-899 roles 299-300 301
  as term 690 959

Moffietaal (queer language) 899

Mogae, Festus 261

Mogrovejo, Norma 107 940 1315

Mohamad, Mahathir 89 990

Mohebali, Mahsa 1637

Mokoagne moni (occult wealth) 1736-1737

Moldova, Genderdoc-M v. (European Court of Human Rights; 2012) 797

Molefhe, Wame 956
Molina, Alonso de 561-562
Molkara, Maryam Khatoon 1436-1437 1626 1636-1637 1636
Moll, Albert 1393
Molly houses 426 429 1080-1082 1081
Moment without Television 682
Monahan, Jim 932-933
Monárrez Fragoso, Julia 599
Monastic rules 1355
Monckton-Milnes, Richard 1596
Money boys 1459-1461
Money, John 358 454 674 837 1643
MONFEMNET National Network 1084
Mongolia 1083-1086
   LGBTQ rights 786-787 1083-1085
   militarism and sexualities in 1054-1057
Mongolian Lesbian Information and Community Center 1084
Mongolian People’s Party 1085
Mongolian University of Science and Technology 1083
Mongoliin neg udur (painting) 1085
La Monja Alférez See Frauso, Catalina de
La Monja Alférez (play) 504-505
Monjeza, Steven 700 1614
Monkman, Kent 1673 1674
Monmate yishu (Qiu) 1613
Monsieur Vénus (Rachilde) 31
Monsiváis, Carlos 183 186 349 1223 1315
Monson, Dayon 39
Monster (album) 1258
Montagnier, Luc 680
Montagu, Mary Wortley 1668
Montagu of Beaulieu (lord) 1414
Montané, Luis 552-553
Montañés, Mariano Ruiz See Castrejón, Eduardo A.
Monteflores, Carmen de 1568
Montenegro
decriminalization of homosexuality 1481
pride events 1285
restrictions on same-sex marriage 1012
Montgomery, Bernard 1067
Moon, Michael 1327
Moon, Sasha 1632 1715
Moon Vow (Lin) 1610 1611
Moore, Alison 455
Moore, Oscar 375
Moore, Sarah E. H. 681
Mootoo, Shani 974 975 976 1656
Mopeli-Paulus, A. S. 953
Mor lam (Lao-Thai folk music) 1570
Mora, Sergio de la 349
Moraga, Cherríe 864 1327 1568
Moran, Kate 1536
Moravian Brotherhood 1357
Moreau, Gustave 33
Morel, Bénédict Augustin 1291-1292
Moreno, María 1654
Moreschi, Alessandro 518
Morgan, Lewis Henry 885
Morgan, Lynn M. 1384 1386 1587
Morgan, Robin 904
Morgan, Ruth 93 696-697 1523
Morgensen, Scott Lauria 1384 1673
Mori, Mari 263
Mormon Church
  Boy Scouts sponsorship 1417 1418
  self-affirming LGBTQ movement 1357

Morne Câpresse (Pineau) 977
Morocco
  Cole, Ray 1454
  queer European travelers to 1046
  sex tourism 1454
  terminology for nonnormative sexualities 1319 1320
  tourism 988

Morocco-Clarke, Ayodele 1154
Moroles, Maria Christina (Sun Hawk) 936-937
Morris, Bonnie 944
Morris, Jan 375
Morris, William 26
Morrison, Toni 392

Morrison, United States v. (US; 2000) 647
Mortimer-Sandilands, Catriona 1330
Moscone, George 42 781

Moscow (Fiks) 105
MoSIEC (Measure of Sexual Identity Exploration and Commitment) 884
Mosier, Chris 1540
Mossop, Brian 204

Mothering See Lesbian mothering and adoption in Latin America
Mothers Against Drunk Driving 681

A Mother's Disgrace (Dessaix) 175
Motlhabi, Mokgethi 1678
Motschenbacher, Heiko 910

Mott, Luiz
archival records 107
criticism of 719
Grupo Gay da Bahia 628-630 768 1508
themes and works 628-629 772
Tibira canonization efforts 1361

Moulton, Ian 1260

Mountain Moving Day (album) 944
Mountbatten, Louis 1067

Mouta v. Portugal (European Court of Human Rights; 1999) 19 795
Mouvement d'Information et d'Expression des Lesbiennes 398-399
Movement for Democratic Change– Tsvangirai (MDC-T) 1752
Movimento Brasil Livre 1106

Movimiento de Integración y Liberación Homosexual (Movement for Homosexual Integration and Liberation) 1652
Movimiento de Liberación Homosexual Colombiano (MLHC) 769
Movimiento por la Diversidad Sexual (Chile) 107 1652
Movimiento Revolucionario Túpac Amaru 1098-1099

Moving Politics (Gould) 2
Mowlabocus, Sharif 1396

Mozahem (film) 1624

Mozambique 1086-1089
  asylum seeking 1343
  LGBTQI activism 1335
  neoliberal economic policy effects 1134
  queer literature 966

Mphela, Nare 1615

MPV (Muslims for Progressive Values) 831

Mr. Benson (Preston) 216

Mr. Malhotra's Party (Gupta) 128

Mrabet, Mohammed 986

Mreža za Metelkovo (Network for Metelkova) 1033-1034

Msibi, Thabo 904 1336

MSM & TG (males who have sex with males as well as trans women) 870

MSM and Transgender Community Center (Mongolia) 1084

MSM (men who have sex with men)
  Africa 92-93 260-261 300 689-690 1087 1336 1525
  Arabic terms for 1318
  Argentina 914
  Asia 143
  Bangladesh 1391
  Christian community structures 1354
  creation of category 1043
  HIV/AIDS awareness for 1477
  HIV/AIDS prevalence 684 689-692 698 700 701-702
  Islamic world 1363-1364
  Kinsey, Alfred C. research 882-883
  Malawi 700
Nigeria
1152 1154
phone apps use 1228 1229 1231
pornography and erotica development 1262-1263 1265 queer slang for 911-912 914
Senegal 1429
shifting sexual norms during nineteenth-century Iran 1491-1494 1492
situational homosexuality 953 1501-1507
sub-Saharan Africa 11-12
A Thousand and One Nights depictions 1594-1595
tourism for 1379-1383
Tuqus al-isharat wa-al-tahawwulat depiction 1665-1666
UK military services 1066-1067

See also Active role in male-male sexual behavior Receptive role in male-male sexual behavior

MSM (men who have sex with men) in Asia 1089-1092 1090
bakla 187-189 188
Bangladesh 1092 1130
hijras and kothis 667-668 670
HIV/AIDS 728
HIV/AIDS intervention projects 1471
India 1128-1130
Mongolia 1084 1085
Pakistan 1195-1196
sex work 1457

MTV 1257

Mubarak, Hosni 1490 1491

Mubasbiss, as term 1319

Mudavanhu, Jannet 1751

Mudimbe, V. Y. 965

Muestra Marrana (Filthy Exhibition) 1277

Mufākharat al-Jawārī wa-al-Ghilmān (al-Jāh· iz-) 616-618 1092-1095 1594

Mugabe, Robert
on homosexuality 9 62 612 1750 1752
problems of Africa 1677

Mughamarat ras al-Mamluk Jabir (play) 1664
Mugisha, Frank 1685

Mugumo tree (Kenya) 875

“Muhammad al-Dimashqi wa Sa’d al-Baghdadi” (short story) 1595

Muholi, Zanele

  activism 696
  exhibits 1105 1527
  themes and works 336 538 1399

Mühsam, Richard 1641

Mui, Anita (Yanfang Mei) 1747

Maia, Maureen 1618

Una mujer fantástica (film) 1656 1692

Mujeres Creando 462 653-654

Mujeres Creando Comunidad 654

Mujeres de Negro (Women in Black) 603

Mujeres Urgidas de un Lesbianismo Auténtico (MULA) 929-930

Muj_ un literature 1158

Mukasa, Victor and Yvonne Oyoo v. Attorney General (Uganda; 2008) 1684

Mukasa, Victor Juliet 1618 1684 1686

Mukhannath 1095-1096

  hadith references 1318 1627-1628
  Malaysia 1628
  Sufi literature 1558
  as term 928 1318 1492
  Tifāshī depiction 1158 1159

Mukodo dako (alternative gender status) 1681 1682

MULA (Mujeres Urgidas de un Lesbianismo Auténtico) 929-930

Mullen, Mike 1062

Müller, Gin 1226
Las multitudes argentinas (Ramos Mejía) 552

Mulvey, Laura 1217

Mummy-baby relationships 1015 1016 1505

“Munazarat al-rajul” (short story) 1594

“Un mundo raro” (song) 1699

Munnithi Sittoe (Sisters Foundation) 873

Muñoz, José Esteban 276 979 1328

Muñoz, Juan Bautista 503-504

Muñoz, Vic 1621

Munro, Brenna 1523

Munt, Sally 431

Munyaka, Mluleki 1678

Muparamoto, Nelson 67

Murakami, Ryū 684

Murders of LGBTQ people
Australia 169-170
Bangladesh 1390 1392
Brazil 1199
Cameroon 289
Canada 241
Chechnya 1403
China 1632
Europe 1047-1048 1051
Honduras 725
indigenous peoples 508 1670
Jamaica 858
Nazi regime 1240
Nigeria 1151 1152
Peru 1098-1099
Rescalvo, Sonia case 1377-1379 1378
Russia 1402 1403
South Africa 580 1527 1545
Turkey 776 845-846 1535
See also Death penalty for homosexuality Gendered violence and feminicide in Latin America

Murillo, Rosario 1150
Murphy, Pat 1720
Murray, David 65 459 977 1446
Murray, Pauli 231-232 231 392 1622
Murray, Stephen O. 93 843 1333 1614
Murtagh, Ben 1270
Murungi, Kaarai Betty 537
Musa, Mariam 657
Musaheqeh (same-sex acts between women) 1634
Musavvir, Mu‘in 1183
Muscat Confidential (blog) 831
Museo Travesti del Perú 107 1097-1101 1097 1103 1226
Museum of London Docklands 1104-1105
Museum of Transology (exhibit) 1105
Museum Secretum 1104
Museums and memorials 1101-1108 1102 1103 1241-1242 1242 See also specific museums and memorials
Museveni, Yoweri 62 700-701 1677
Music See Popular music and queer identities
Music festivals, women-oriented 943 945 946-947
Muslim Alliance for Sexual and Gender Diversity (MASGD) 831 1367
Muslim Youth Forum (MYF) 1196
Muslims for Progressive Values (MPV) 831
Mussolini, Benito 1124

Mustaches
   as marker of beauty 1492 1639
   as sign of masculinity 1666

Mustarjilāt, as term 1320

Mustola, Kati 87

Mutarajjilat, as term 1320 1627-1628

Al-Mutayyam wa al-da‘ī al-Yutayyim (Ibn Daniyal) 748

Muthakārat, as term 1320

Mutharika, Bingu wa 1614

Mutola, Maria 1543

Mutua, Ezekiel 339

Mutunga, Willy 904

Muxes 1108-1113 1111
   ethnographic research on 1584 performance art and 1223 1227 1227

Muxes (film) 1584

Muxets bar (Mexico) 201

MuXi (performance artist) 128 132

Mwachiro, Kevin 960

Mwaitu (female husband) 908

Mwanga II (king of Buganda) 1047 1356 1682-1683

My Beautiful Laundrette (film) 545 1398

My Brother the Devil (film) 1398

“My Childhood as an Adult Molester: A Salt River Moffie” (book chapter) 960

My Confession Diary (film) 992
“My God, Help Me to Survive This Deadly Love” (Vrubel) 622

My Mother Who Fathered Me (Clarke) 1651

My Night with Reg (play) 1576

Myanmar (Burma)
attitudes toward LGBTQ population 998
same-sex relations 788
Section 377 legacies 1420

Myers, Robert 1667

MYF (Muslim Youth Forum) 1196

Mykonos, Greece, resort areas 1381-1382

“The Myth of the Vaginal Orgasm” (Koedt) 371

Mythologies (Bathes) 127-128

N

N (pseudonymous organization) 1195

Nabagesera, Kasha Jacqueline 538 1685

Nabatchi, as term 1487-1488

NACHO (North American Conference of Homophile Organizations) 297 446 1025-1026

NACO (National AIDS Control Organization) 1130

Nadan, Dhirendra, and Another v. State (Fiji; 2005) 1421

Nadel, Norman 565

Nadja, Nadika 1272

Nafas-e amigh (film) 1022

Naficy, Hamid 1019 1021 1626

Nagaike, Kazumi 1180

Nagy, Phyllis 1577

Nahas, Subhi 1534 1535 1536
Nahua people
  colonial translation of sexual practices 1315 preconquest views 1109 sexuality 559-563 561 562
  third sex/gender categories 1584

Nair, Janaki 668

Nair, Yasmin 1043

_Nairobi Half Life_ (film) 338

Najmabadi, Afsaneh
  amrad relationships 1491 1492
  heteronormativity shift 1493 1494 1634 historiography 1638 1639 marriage imperative 1625 media discussion of transgender issues 1626
  ritual practices 1388
  sex reassignment surgery 1435 1437
  themes and works 164 361 477
  transgender Muslims 1630
  transsexuality category 1635

_Najmat Aghustus_ (Ibrahim) 1488

Nakamori, Akio 1177-1178

Nakawanga (she-cock) 1682

NALSA (National Legal Services Authority) 669-670

Namara/Dama people 1016 1017 1116

Name choices
  Argentina 1655
  pet names 256-257

NAMES Project See _AIDS Memorial Quilt—The NAMES Project_

Namibia 1115-1118 1117
  anti-LGBTQI laws 1335
  woman-woman marriage 1014 1016 1017

_Nan-dung Chao_ (Chen) 1612

Nanda, Serena 667
Nandi people 1015 1017
Nanga, Bernard 965 966
Nanrenpo (mannish women) 1748
Napier-Bell, Simon 1255
Napoleon Bonaparte 1120
NAPWA (National Association of People with AIDS) 736
Naraghi, Arash 1638
Narrain, Arvind 1427
Narváez, Zoilamérica 1150
Nasawiya (collective) 1031-1032
Nash, Catherine J. 1692
Nasser, Gamal Abdel 1490-1491
Nast, Heidi J. 1690
National Agency for the Control of AIDS (Nigeria) 1154
National AIDS Control Organization (NACO) 1130
National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) 923
National Association of People with AIDS (NAPWA) 736
National Black Feminist Organization 391-392
National Center Against Violence (Mongolia) 1084
National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality (NCGLE) 694 1156 1157
National Coalition for Sexual Freedom 211
National Coming Out Day (NCOD) 375 782
National Democratic Alliance (NDA) 1131
National Federation of Temple Sisterhoods 1373
National Gay and Lesbian Human Rights Commission (Kenya) 237 877
National Gay and Lesbian Sports Hall of Fame 1102-1103
National Gay and Lesbian Task Force (NGLTF) 644 646
National Health Service Pensions Agency, K. B. v. (European Court of Justice; 2004) 797
National Human Rights Commission of Mongolia (NHRCM) 1083 1084
National Institutes of Health (NIH) 5
National Latina/o Lesbian and Gay Organization 1042
National Legal Services Authority (NALSA) v. Union of India (India; 2013) 669 National LGBTQ Task Force 1245
National Library of Ireland 105
National Minority AIDS Council (NMAC) 738
National Museums of World Culture (Sweden) 1105
National Organization for Women (NOW) 919-921
National Park Service (US) 1107 National Socialism See Nazism
National Transsexual Counseling Unit (NTCU) 405
National Trust (UK) 1106
National Women Commission et al., Rajani Shahi v. (Nepal; 2012) 1565
National Women’s Music Festival 946 Nationalism and sexuality
  homonationalism 78 272 750-755 1173 1244-1245 intersection with masculinity and sports 1537-1538 link to heteronormalization in Iran 1493-1494
  sexology in Asia 1469-1470
  Thailand 1570
Nationalism and sexuality in Europe 1118-1128
  anti-racist activism in Europe 71-72
  anti-Semitism and Zionism 75-77 80-81
  French Revolution impact 1118-1120 1119
  postrevolutionary conservative period 1120-1123
  postwar and contemporary period 1127-1128
  World Wars period 1123-1127 1124

Native Americans
  imperialism and colonialism impacts 1670-1671
  rural queer communities 1395
  situational homosexuality 1503
See also Two-spirit specific peoples

Naturalismo (naturalism) 554-555

Nature's Sick Child (television special) 1626

Naturopathy 1027 1028

Natuwa, as term 1563

The Naughty Girl (film) 1625

Nava, Michael 864

Navajo people, gender variations 1670

Nawadj, Muhammad al- 1262

Naz Foundation International 1128-1132 challenges to Section 377 669 730-731 1128-1130 1422 1427 pride event participation 1283 support for queer Muslims 1367

Naz Foundation, Suresh Kumar Koushal v. (India; 2013) 669 1422 1427

Naz Foundation v. Government of NCT of Delhi and Others (Delhi High Court; 2009) 786 1131 1422 1427

Nazar-bāzi (gaze game) 1557-1558

Nazism
  eugenics program 1027-1028 1127
  Italian neorealism cinematic portrayals 1322
  LGBTQ persecution 792 1046 1479 1688-1689 memorials for gay victims 1241-1242 1242 nationalist masculinity of 1124 1127 paradoxical embrace and rejection of sexual dissidents 1124-1125 1126-1127 photography use 1235 pink triangle label 1127 1238-1243 1239 1242
situational homosexuality 1504
treason associated with sodomy 1661
von Mahlsdorf, Charlotte crossdressing 1710

NCGLE (National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality) 694 1156 1157
NDA (National Democratic Alliance) 1131
N'DéeSses (organization) 624
Ndungane, Njongonkulu 323
Neale, Steve 1209
Near, Holly 943 945 946
Nederlandsch Wetenschappelijk Humanitair Komitee 103
Nederlandse Vereniging tot Integratie van Homoseksualiteit—Cultuuren Ontspanningscentrum 712
Nedim, Ahmed 950-951
Nefando, Javi 1100
Nefarious sin (pecado nefando) 821 1507 1509

O negócio do michê: Prostitutas viril em São Paulo (Perlongher) 1252
Les Négresses Sapphiques 624
Negrón, Luis 1297
Negrón, Mickey 1299
Negrón-Muntaner, Frances 1297
Neilsen, Graham 145

Neither Man nor Woman (Nanda) 667

Nelson, Baker v. (Minnesota; 1971) 448
Neo-Druids 1028
Neo-Nazism
Mongolia 1084
Rescalvo, Sònia murder 1378

Neo-shamanism 1028

Neoliberalism
ARV access 691 695 697-698 principles of 1132 1133 1138-1139 sex work in Asia and 1459 1460
Western homophobia 691 779

Neoliberalism in Africa 1132-1137 1134

Neoliberalism in Latin America 602-603 1138-1142

Neorealismo rosa (pink neorealism) 1322

Neorealist Italian cinema, queer themes in 1321-1323

Nepal
HIV/AIDS 728 729
legal recognition of third gender category 1471 1585
LGBT military service 1056
LGBTQ rights 786
sex tourism 1438

Nepomuceno Beltrán, José Eugenio 1497

Neruda, Pablo 1254

Nervo, Amado 186 1249 1316

“Nesf sefid, nesf banafsh” (short story) 1637

Nesse, Randolph M. 456

Nest Collective 339

Nestle, Joan 115 932-933 1300

Netanyahu, Benjamin 1244

Netball, African women’s participation 1543

Netherlands
advocacy for LGBTQI refugees 1348
African refugees in 1344
anti-racist movement 73
archival records 104
colonial African governance 386
coverage of Oscar Wilde trials 1732
decriminalization of homosexuality 1481
friendship societies 574
funding for Latin American encuentro attendance 929
HIV/AIDS approaches 712-713
Homomonument memorial 1107
Islamic LGBTQI activism 1367
LGBTQ military service 1069
pinkwashing concerns 1245
pride events 1278 1279
refugees and immigration policies 1349
same-sex marriage 1008 1359
same-sex partnerships 1008
sex education in schools 1477
sodomy laws 86 236
South Africa colonization 1524
Stonewall Riots impact 1551-1552
Strange Fruit collective 1555-1556

Nettie Lee Benson Latin American Collection (University of Texas) 110

Neue Freundschaft (periodical) 574

Neuwirth, Thomas 524

Nevins, Greg 892

New Alexandria Library for Women 114

New Festival 544

New Haven Women's Liberation Rock Band 944

New household economics 1140

New Imperialism 810-811

New media in Asia 1142-1147 1143
India 556-559 557 558
Malaysia 992
The New People of Lot (Qawm Lut al-judud) 1308

The New Pre-Raphaelites (Gupta) 128

New Queer Cinema 545-547 1609

New York City
gay liberation activism 1704
Greenwich Village neighborhood 1041 1281 1485
Leslie-Lohman Museum of Gay and Lesbian Art 1101
Mattachine Society leadership 1025
phone apps 1229
pink triangle symbol 1241
pride events 1278 1281-1282
Puerto Rican diaspora 1295-1296 1297-1298 1299
sodomy laws 1513
Stonewall Riots commemoration 1107 1551
theater, queer 1574 1575
urban queerness 1688 1690 1691 1692
Young Lords Party 1296

New York City Trans Oral History Project 117

New York, New York (Ragawa) 266

New York Public Library (NYPL) 116

New York Times (newspaper) 1733-1734

New Zealand
archival records 102-103
British colonial sodomy laws 1163
decriminalization of homosexuality 166 1163 1421
LGBT Military Index score 1055
LGBT military service 1056
mâh_u 1188
refugees and immigration policies 1349 repeal of antisodomy laws 1055
Section 377 legacies 1420
superincision practices 1219
Vietnam War veterans 1708-1710

New Zealand Homosexual Law Reform Society (NZHLRS) 168

Newcombe, David 1720
Newell, Alex 1259
Newell, Stephanie 384
Newman, Lesléa 252
Newman, Nicky 1157 1527
Newton, Esther drag artists 293 294 1579 history of gay and lesbian communities 1326 1380
  mannish lesbians 540 place of theater 1387
Newton, Huey P. 73 571
Newton-King, Susie 88
Ng, Josef 472-474
NGLTF (National Gay and Lesbian Task Force) 644 646
Ngochani, as term 905
NGOization 14-15
Ngubeni, Kindiza 579
Ngũgĩ wa Thiong’o 877
Nguyễn, Aiden 128
Nguyen, Tan Hoang
  Asian American masculinity 1266 embodied affective responses 1268 1271 homonormative timelines 1331
  houseboy paradigm 1381
NHRCM (National Human Rights Commission of Mongolia) 1083 1084
Ni Una Menos (Not One Less) 604 604
Niagara (Bradford) 293
Niang, Cheikh 1428
Niang, Mbaye 1429
Niang (sissy) 1748

Nicaragua
- HIV/AIDS 717 t 721 723
- media activism 466 467
- revolution effects on LGBTQ activism 1147-1150
- sex workers 1449

The Nicaraguan Revolution 311-314 313 1147-1150 1148

Nichiwakan (organization) 1671 1672

Nichols, Jack 993

Nicholson, John Gambril 1167

Nicht der Homosexuelle ist pervers, sondern die Situation, in der er lebt (film) 712 1482 1551 1711

Nicol, Nancy 334 338

Nicolson, Paula 1466

Nietzsche, Friedrich 365

Nietzu (Pai) 1610 1611 1612

Nigeria 1150-1156 1151
- African queer novels publication 957-958
- anti-gay legislation 10 322-323 329
- asylum seeking 1343 1349 1351
- the closet 377
- colonization of 1134
- concubinage 1462
- conflation of witchcraft with homosexuality 1735
- discrimination against LGBTQ people 1677
- gender fluidity and same-sex behaviors among Islamic people 1364
- neoliberal economic policy effects 1134
- Nollywood and sexuality 334-335
- queer migration to Europe 1048
- sculpture symbolizing colonization 1134
- Section 377 legacies 1420 1421
- sex trafficking 1463
- woman-woman marriage 1014 1015 1016
- 'yan daudu 1614

Nigerians Talk (online magazine) 1154
The Night Air (Dowd) 1303

Night Letters (Dessaix) 175

Night of the Long Knives (1934) 1126 1413

Night Sweat (play) 1576

NIH (National Institutes of Health) 5

Niles, Blair 641 1303

Nimeh-ye gomshodeh (Aqaee) 1638

9 Monsters (phone app) 1229

“1972” (essay) 1612

1992 Deluxe (album) 1259

Ning, Zhang 1728

El niño pez (film) 357

Nirvana (music group) 1258

Nishida, Mieko 1508

#NiUnaMas 604

Nixon, Angelique 1450

Njinga (Mbundu ruler) 63 596-597

Njino, Joseph K. 331

Nkabinde, Nkunzi Zandile
  ancestral wives 1523 life as lesbian healer 93 1399 memoir 962
  Zulu culture analysis 1016 1017

Nkoli, Simon 1156-1157
  AIDS activism 693-694 coming out 9
  death 694
  Ditsie, Bev relationship 335 1527
Nkom, Alice 288 289 334 346-347
NMAC (National Minority AIDS Council) 738
Nnaemeka, Obioma 534
No End to the Way (Jackson) 167-168
No Human Being Is Disposable (Ordoñez) 772
No Past, No Present, No Future (Maddy) 953 954-955
No se lo digas a nadie (film) 354
Noche de Bohemia (album) 1699 1700
Noche de las Tres Pes (Havana) 435
“Nocturno Solo” (poem) 1252
Nogueira, Helena 340
Nollywood 334-335 338
Nomades (film) 1174
Nomades’Langues 625
None on Record 338
Nong Toom See Charoenphol, Parinya (Nong Toom)
Nongayindoda, as term 1336
Noor, Nadiya al- 1245 1247
Nordau, Max 34 81
Noriega, Núñez 199-200
A Normal Daughter: The Life and Times of Kewpie of District Six (film) 335
The Normal Heart (play) 1576
Norman, Samuel 89
Norman, Tom 1304

Norng-toey (younger sibling kathoey) 869-870

Norrie, Graham 260

Norris v. Ireland (European Court of Human Rights; 1988) 791 1163

North Africa

European perceptions 986-987
LGBTQI refugees 1534-1536
Maghreb region 985-990
queer European travelers to 1046
sex tourism 988 1464

North America See Canada United States

North American Conference of Homophile Organizations (NACHO) 297 446 1025-1026 1550

North Korea

LGBT military service 1056
militarism and sexualities in 1054-1057

North/South binaries

African LGBTQI movement 14-15 1677-1678 queer as concept 1315-1316
queer theory approaches 1335
queer theory development 1333-1334
sex tourism 1444
sexual revolution 1480-1481
theater, queer 1579
violence against LGBTQI people 1653

Northern Ireland

criminalization of homosexuality 791
decriminalization of homosexuality 1163 1421 1742 demonstrations against internment 593
lack of same-sex marriage 764

Northrup, Ann 621

Norton, Rictor 910

Norway

African refugees in 1344
collection of LGBTQ refugee statistics 1049
LGBTQ military service 1069
queer slang 912
refugees and immigration policies 1349
same-sex partnerships 1008
sodomy laws 87

Noshirwan v. Emperor (India; 1935) 1425

Nossiter, Adam 1151

“Not Just (Any) Body Can Be a Citizen: The Politics of Law, Sexuality, and Postcoloniality in Trinidad and Tobago and the Bahamas” (essay) 972-973

Not Only Voices 377

Not Suitable for Work: A Chairman’s Tale (Samma) 105

Notes of a Crocodile (Qiu) 1004 1613 1613

Notes of a Desolate Man (Chu) 1612

“Notes toward a Politics of Location” (lecture) 934

Noti Flow (rapper) 39

La novelabingo (Ramos Otero) 1297

Novo, Salvador 1251

Novoselic, Krist 1258

Novy, Jeremy 623

NOW (National Organization for Women) 919-921

Nowhere to Turn: Blackmail and Extortion of LGBT People in Sub-Saharan Africa (report) 1153

Ntagali, Stanley 322-323

Ntahoturi, Bernard 321

The Nuer (Evans-Pritchard) 64

Nuer people 64 1015

Nuestras Hijas de Regreso a Casa 603 604-605
Nuestro Mundo (Our World)
activism 570 571 768
formation of 939 1003
solidarity work 1223

Nugent, Richard Bruce 640 642-643

Nujoma, Sam 62 1117

Number 96 (television series) 174

The Number (film) 340

The Number: One Man’s Search for Identity in the Cape Underworld and Prison Gangs (Steinberg) 340

Numbers (Rechy) 430

Núñez de Balboa, Vasco 508 1356

Núñez de Miranda, Antonio 1520 1521

Nunn, Sam 1060

Nunokawa, Jeff 1325

Nur ed-Din/ʿAli Shar (fictional character) 1206-1207 1208 1209 1210

Nureyev, Rudolf 1255

Nurius, Paula S. 137

Nuwayhī, Muh·ammad al- 746

Nuzhat al-Albāb Fīmā Lā Yujad Fī Kitāb (Tifāshī) 584-585 1157-1160

Nwandu, Adaora 339-340

Nyadani, Daveson 699

Nyanzi, Stella
activism 322 1685
African same-sex relations 67 537
queer theory 1335 1337

Nyeck, S. N. 1736

Nyerere, Julius 389
O Pasquim (newspaper) 982

O., Rachid 988 1464

Ó Searcaigh, Cathal 308

“O, Wangerdel!” (article) 1731

Oates, Charles 1166

Oath of the Horatii (painting) 1119 1119

Obama, Barack
   Defense of Marriage Act 450-451
   HIV/AIDS 742
   LGBTQ activist concerns about 996 policy on LGBTQ people in national service 1060 1061-1063
   refugees and immigration policies 1349
   Stonewall National Monument dedication 1107 support for same-sex marriage 1752

Obergefell v. Hodges (US; 2015) controversy 764
   domestic partner benefits 663
   history 451
   impact on family reunification policies 1040 1043 Lawrence v. Texas as breakthrough for 892 1517 parenting rights and 1199 1202

Objeas, Achy 1568

Oboin, Viktor 105

Obolenski, Prince 87

Oboler, Regina Smith 1017

O’Brien, Denise 1015

O’Brien, Lucy 947

Obscene Publications Act (1859) (UK) 1263

Occult in Africa See Witchcraft/occult in Africa
Ocean, Frank 1259
Ocha, Witchayanee 1441
Ochoa, Marcia 1315 1650 1655 1657
Ocholla, Akinyi 538
O'Connor, Sandra Day 1517
“Oda a Walt Whitman” (poem) 914-915
Odd Girl Out (Bannon) 1303
“Ode: Salute to the French Negro Poets” (poem) 374-375
“Ode to Aphrodite” (poem) 1411
Odunga, George 1618
Of Men and Gods (film) 979
“Of Men and Little Boys” (Hannon) 241
Off Our Backs (newspaper) 484
Offence of Zina Ordinance (1979)(Pakistan) 1425-1426
“Offences against One's Self: Paederasty” (Bentham) 365 Offences Against the Person Act (1861)(UK) 84-85 1161-1165 1419
Offside (film) 1626
O’Hara, Frank 374-375
Ohlsson, Birgitta 1280
Oii-Chinese (Organization Intersex International Chinese) 1633
OIi (Organisation Intersex International) 838-839
Oikabeth group 768
Oiticica, Hélio 1224
Okada, Toshio 1178
Okanlawon, Kehinde 1153
OkCupid (dating platform) 1230
Okereke, Kele 276-277
Okoh, Nicholas 322
Okotie, Chris 1151
Okparanta, Chinelo 958
Okra Ridge Natural Labs 936
Okri, Ben 959
OLA-Archiwum (OLA–Archives Association) 105
“The Old Fig Council” (essay) 991
Oldham, Andrew Loog 1255
O’Leary, Dale 70
O’Leary, Jean 782
Olha o boneco (Titica) 38
Oliari v. Italy (European Court of Human Rights; 2015) 795 1011
Oline, Pamela 932
Olivia Records 945 946 947
Oloka-Onyango, Joe 1685
Olumide, Akinnifesi 1151
Olympic Games, sexuality concerns 156-159 164 1539 1540-1541
O.M. v. Hungary (European Court of Human Rights; 2016) 792-793 1048
Oman
Muscat Confidential blog 831
terminology for nonnormative sexualities 1319
Omar, Sara 757
Ombolo, Jean-Pierre 1736
On Monday of Last Week (film) 340
On Our Backs (magazine) 1266 1476
Once upon a Time (Haring) 619 619
La Onda literary movement 1697
One Day I Will Write about This Place (Wainaina) 960-961 962
One Day in Mongolia (painting) 1085
120 battements par minute (film) 2 711
ONE Inc. 113-114
ONE Institute of Homophile Studies 113
ONE National Gay and Lesbian Archives 107 113-114 116 622
One Thousand and One Nights (Burton) 97 509 810
O'Neal, Collin 1175 1176
O'Neill, Eugene 1574
Online connections See Internet
Onu, Face 335
Onu, Lisa 335
Oogachaga (organization) 1222
Oosterhuis, Harry 1293
Open City (Cole) 957
Open Society Forum (Mongolia) 1084
Open Society Initiative of Southern Africa 1614
Opera, Chinese 1746
Operation Bootstrap 1296
Operation Hyacinth 1552
Operation Soap 202-203 203 205
Operation Spanner 1164
Optimum gender of rearing (OGR) model 837-838
Opus Gay 621-622
Oputa, Charles 39-40
“La oración de la maestra” (poem) 1253-1254
ORAM (Organization for Refuge, Asylum and Migration) 1347 1350 1535
Orange Is the New Black (television series) 1506
Orchiectomy 1219-1220
The Order of Chaeronea 1165-1168 1407
Ordination of LGBTQI people
  Christianity 1359
  Judaism 1373
Ordoñez, Juan Pablo 772
The Oregon Trail (Parkman) 1503
Oregon Women's Land Trust 489
Orejudos, Dom 1174
Organisation Intersex International (OII) 838-839
Organización Trans Reinas de la Noche (Trans Queens of the Night Organization) 1652 Organization for Refuge, Asylum and Migration (ORAM) 1347 1350 1535
Organization Intersex International Chinese (OII-Chinese) 1633
Orgasm and orgasmology 1168-1172 1466 1467
OrgulloLGBT (blog) 465 466
Orientalism
  African colonialism 385
  Arab and Middle Eastern sexualities 56-57 460 583-587
  Asian drag 481-482
  homoeroticism and 1173
Middle Eastern travel and travelogues 1644-1649
Pasolini’s cinematic adaptation of A Thousand and One Nights 1204-1211
sex tourism in the Middle East and 1452 1453 1454
stereotypes about queer migrants to the US 1042
A Thousand and One Nights translations 1593-1596
Turkish bath stereotypes 1668
Zuqaq al-Midaq exploration 1753-1755

Orientalism in gay pornography about the Middle East 52-53 1172-1177 1175 1263-1264

Orientalism (Said) 56 1452 1644

Origen (theologian) 1357

Orígenes (magazine) 1316

Orobator, Agbonkhianmeghe 326

Orombi, Henry Luke 321 322

Orozco (cabaret performer) 282

Orozco, Roberto 866

Ortega, Daniel 1148 1150

Orthodox Judaism protest against gay pride parade 1376 views on same-sex behaviors 1372-1373 1374

Orthofer, M. A. 477

Ortiz, KC 1260

Ortiz, Rosa María 941

Ortiz Taylor, Sheila 1568

Orton, Joe 988 1454 1575

Os Leopards 283

Oscar Wilde bookshop (New York) 249

Osh-Tisch (warrior) 1670 1671

Óskar, Páll 524
Osman, Abdi 1615
Osman, Diriye 955 956-957
Osornio, Felipe (Lechedevirgen Trimegisto) 1227 1274 1276
Ossessione (film) 1322
Otaku sexualities in Japan 1177-1181
The Other
- African anthropology 62
- African queer literature 953
- ethnopsychiatry 510
- European colonies as 1047
- migrants as 1039
- Netherlands queer youth 1555
- Orientalism in gay pornography and 1175-1176
- othered spaces 729
- Pasolini’s cinematic adaptation of A Thousand and One Nights 1205-1211
- racial concerns 1266
- sex tourism and 1438 1440 1442 1444
- transgender people 362
Other Sheep 325
The Other Victorians: A Study of Sexuality and Pornography in Mid-nineteenth-Century England (Marcus) 1260
Otomo, Rio 1179
El Otro (newspaper) 769
Los otros cuerpos: Antología de temática gay, lésbica y queer desde Puerto Rico y su diáspora (Agosto et al., ed.) 1297
Ottoman and Persian miniature paintings 1181-1186
Ottoman Empire
- bathhouses 1668
- eunuchs 519-520
- Islam in 948 1364 1668
- Jewish same-sex behaviors 1370
- miniature paintings 1181-1186
- same-sex literary discourses 948-952 950
- sexology views of sexual discourses 1470
Ouida (pseudonym) 30

Oumapanga or oupanga, as term 1016

Ouologuem, Yambo 964-965 966-967

Oupanga relations (Namibia) 1115-1116

_Our Caribbean: A Gathering of Gay and Lesbian Writing from the Antilles_ (Glave, ed.) 976

_Our Sister Killjoy_ (Aidoo) 953

Our World See _Nuestro Mundo (Our World)_

_Our Young Man_ (White) 1380

Ouseley, William 1182

Out and Proud Diamond Group 72

Out for Sustainability (Out4S) 490

_Out Here and Now_ (Krishan) 130-132 131

Out in Africa (film festival) 300

_Out in the Country: Youth, Media, and Queer Visibility in Rural America_ (Gray) 377

_Out Loud_ (film) 926

“Out on Main Street” (short story) 975

_Out Our Way_ (Riordon) 1398

Out-Right Namibia 1118

OutCast Theatre 1577

_Outed: The Painful Reality_ (film) 338-339

Outfest 544

Out4S (Out for Sustainability) 490

OutLoud Bookstore (Nashville) 253

Outrage! (organization) 593
OutRight Action International
activism 585 763 771
ISIS gay trials 844
renaming of 1348

OutServe-SLDN 238 893

Outside Edge (exhibit) 1104-1105

“Outside” (song) 1257

Ouyang, Wenfeng 1731

Overload theory 1476

Ovesey, Lionel 426

Ovid 1410

Owen, Ianna Hawkins 140

Owens, Sharon 484 485

OWL Farm 489

Owusu, Akosua Adoma 340

Oyêwùmí, Oyèrónké 535 594

Oyoo, Yvonne 1684

Ozaki, Minami 265 266

Özpetek, Ferzan 1667

P (pseudonymous organization) 1194-1195 1196

P. B. and J. S. v. Austria (European Court of Human Rights; 2010) 795

P. v. S. and Cornwall County Council (European Court of Justice; 1996) 797

P. V. v. Spain (European Court of Human Rights; 2010) 19

PACE (Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe) 790

Pacific Island and Pacific Island diaspora identities 1187-1194 1189 1190 1219 1408
Packer, Vin (pseudonym) 1302 1303
Packing 1219
Pacte civil de solidarité (PACS) 886 1009
Padilla, Mark 1446
Pagano, Ernesto 585
Page Act (1875) (United States) 1040
Paget, Violet See Lee, Vernon
Página en blanco y staccato (Ramos Otero) 1296 1297
The Pagoda (Powell) 975
Pahlavi dynasty (1925–1979) 1018 1020
Pahouin people 1736
Pai, Hsien-yung 1610 1611 1612
Paidaria, as term 1354
Paige, Caroline 1068
Paisà (film) 1322
Pájaro/Pájara, as terms 916 917
Pajic v. Croatia (European Court of Human Rights; 2016) 795 1011
Pakistan
  asylum seeking 1349
  bacha baazi relationships 1385-1386
  HIV/AIDS 728 731
  Islamic LGBTQI activism 1367
  Islamification of law 1425-1426
  legal recognition of third gender category 1471 1585
  men who have sex with men 1091
  pornography and erotica development 1270
  queer migration to Europe 1048
  Section 377 legacies 1420 1424-1428 1471
  third sex/gender categories 1587 1629
  transgender Muslims 1629
transgender people's rights 1368

Pakistan, “queer,” 1194-1197

Palacios-Jiménez, Luis 735-736

Palacios, Monica 865

Palafox, Manuel 1037-1038 1037

Palermo protocols 1344

Palestine
  Aswat 152-156 153 583 831-832
  asylum seeking 1351
  British colonial sodomy laws 1163 conflict with Israel 1244 1245 1246
  internet activism 831-833
  persecution of homosexuals 1244 1247
  pride events 1282

Palm Springs, California, resort areas 1379

Palmares quilombo 1508

Pan, Eagle (Pan Meichen) 1747

Pan, Guangdan 1468

Pan, Suiming 100

Panahi, Ja‘far 1636

Panama
  Christian missionary activity 1356
  sex workers 1449
  travesti and trans activism 1656

Panambi (organization) 1652

Pang Khee Teik 991

Panizza, Oskar 1294

Pant, Sunil Babu 786
Panteras Rosa (Pink Panthers) 626
Panthi, as term 1090 1092 1129
Pantomime, queer 1578
Panzarino, Concetta 937
Papaioannou, Dimitris 308

Paper Dolls (film) 1692

Paperback originals (PBOs) 1301
Paperback revolution in publishing 1301
Papp, Robert, Jr. 1062

Papua New Guinea
   criminalization of homosexuality 1351
   ritualized same-sex practices in 1192-1193
   Section 377 legacies 1420 1421
   subincision practices 1219
   transgender people 1191

Para las duras: Una fenomenología lesbiana (de la tierra) 1569

Parada do Orgulho LGBT de São Paulo, Brazil 1197-1199 1198

Paradiso (Lezama Lima) 436

Paradjanov, Sergei 87

Paragraph 175 (German criminal code) 400-401 912 1239 1240

Paraguay
   decriminalization of homosexuality 1500
   sex workers 1449
   sports crowd homophobic chants 1538
   travesti and trans activism 1652 1656

Paranaguá, Paulo Antonio 347

Paredes, Julieta 653-654

Paredes, María Luisa, La Condesa de 1518 1519 1520 1521-1522

Parental relationships, tongzhi literature depiction 1612
Parentela (performance art show) 1226

Parenting rights in North America 22 1199-1204 1202 1203 1723 See also Lesbian mothering and adoption in Latin America

Paris, France
  LGBT travelers to 1046 1048
  urban queerness 1689

Paris Is Burning (film) 546 1690

Park, Eun-seon 162

Park, Jessica 1632

Parker, Pat 946

Parker, Richard G. 1649

Parkinson, Richard B. 1104

Parkman, Francis 1503

Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe (PACE) 790

Parlorista bakla, as term 1089-1090

Parnes, Larry 1255

Parr, Bruce 1577 1578

Parry v. United Kingdom (European Court of Human Rights; 2006) 793

Parting Glances (film) 683

Partners for Law in Development (Delhi) 531

Partnerships See Same-sex partnerships

Parvaresh, Roodabeh 776

Pasa en las mejores familias (radio) 466

Paşa, Ahmed 949

Paşa, Ibrahim 950 951

La pasión y muerte del Cura Deusto (d'Halmar) 554
Pasolini, Pier Paolo 1204-1211 1322 1482

Pasolini's cinematic adaptation of A Thousand and One Nights 1204-1213 1207 homosexual others 1208-1211
overview 1204-1205
women as other 1205-1208

Le Passe Temps (magazine) 1734

Passing as other sex
  Boston marriages and 539-540
  early Christians 1357
  Iranian cinema 1623-1627 1624
  male impersonators 1579 during the mexican Revolution 1036-1037

See also Cross-dressing

Passive role in male-male sexual behavior See Receptive role in male-male sexual behavior

PASSOP (People Against Suffering, Oppression and Poverty) 1347

Pastre, Geneviève 398

PASTT (Prévention Action Santé Travail pour les Transgenres) 1689

Patel, Alpesh Kantilal 130-131

Pater, Walter 27 32 366

Pathologization of homosexuality
  Argentina 1288
  biological essentialism views 224-229
  China 419-420 1028 1468-1469 colonial periods 385
  Cuba 434-435
  Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders 227 453-454 455
  Europe 1480
  Hungary 493
  mental disorder designation 1027
  Middle Eastern literature 148-149 209-210
  Psychopathia sexualis 225 896 1121 1291-1294 1292 sexological challenges to 1465-1466 stage depictions 1574
  theory of transvestites and transsexuals 1640-1641
  treason associated with sodomy 1659
United Kingdom 592
Zuqaq al-Midaq depiction 1754 1755

Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act (ACA) 742

Patlatonalli (organization) 941

Pato, pata, as terms 916 917

Pato salvaje (Villanueva-Collado) 917

La patografía (Lozada) 917

La Patrie (newspaper) 1734

Patroclus (mythical figure) 1406

Patrulla Legal (Legal Patrol) 1620

Pattanaik, Devdutt 127

Patton, Cindy 458 682

Paul (apostle) 1353-1354 1356

Paulón, Esteban 466

Pavin, Shivan 32

Payne, John 1592 1593 1595

Pays, Petit 287

Paz, Octavio culture and sexuality 199 male violence 601
  sexual identity 111 200
  Sor Juana analysis 1520 1521

Paz, Senel 351

p'Bitek, Okot 62

PBOs (paperback originals) 1301

Peacock Room (Whistler) 34

Peake, Linda 1690
The Pearl of Africa (film) 334-335 1618
Pearson, Kyra 42

Peau noire, masques blancs (Fanon) 512
PEC French Line 1304
Pecado nefando (nefarious sin) 821 1507 1509
Peccadillo Pictures 547 549
Pecheny, Mario 107 770
Pecic, Zoran 976

Pederastas, as term 552-553 1038
Pederasty See Pedophilia Youths, seeking out for sexual activity

Pédés de la république, as term 1737 1738

"Les pédés" (song) 287

Pedophilia
  activism 398-399
  amrad relationships 1492
  Arab terminology 1319 child sex tourism 1438
  cinema 340-341
  conflation with homosexuality 1319
See also Youths, seeking out for sexual activity

Peel, Robert 1162
Peel's Acts 1162
Peeters, Marguerite A. 70
Peixoto, Mário 348

Pelé (soccer player) 1215
Peletz, Michael 98 1585 1703
Pellat, Charles 1092 1093 1094
Pelser, P. C. 1525
Pema Tsering 1599

Pembalasan ratu pantai selatan (film) 1270

PEN/Toni and James C. Goodale Freedom of Expression Courage Award 1176

Peña, Terri de la 864

Penal Code Ordinance (1930) (Uganda) 1683

Pence, Mike 996

Penetrating/penetrated roles in male-male sexual behavior See Active role in male-male sexual behavior Receptive role in male-male sexual behavior

Peng, Yanhui 421

Penis 1213-1221
  alterations of 1214 1216-1219 1218 gender transition and 1219-1220 masculinity and 1213-1214 1214 1215
  orgasm considerations 1168-1171
  phalloplasty 674
  role in sexuality 1215-1216 1216
  testicles vs. 1214-1215
  A Thousand and One Nights depiction 1208

Penis snatching 1214

Pennachetti, Joseph P. 1247

Penniman, Richard ("Little Richard") 1255 1255 1256

Pentecostal and Charismatic churches See Christianity in Africa: Pentecostal and Charismatic

People Against Suffering, Oppression and Poverty (PASSOP) 1347

People Like Us (PLU) 472 1221-1223

People Like You and Me (PLUME) 1222

People with AIDS Coalition 1297

Pépin, Ernest 977

Pépin, Jacques 678
Pereda, Ferran 896 897
Pereira, Charmaine 537
Pereira-Pujol, Patricia 1568
Peretti Scioli, Martin 466
Pérez Bocanegra, Juan 409 411
Pérez, Daniel Enrique 863 866
Pérez de Montalbán, Juan 504-505
Pérez, Emma 864
Pérez, Lourdes 929-930
Pérez-Malláina, Pablo E. 1502

Performance artists in Latin America 1223-1228 1225 1227
   cabaret theater 279-284 654-656
   Caribbean traditions 973 974
   Carnival 304-305
   Madame Satã 981-983
   pornoterrorismo 1273-1278 1276 1277
   travesti and trans activism 1655-1656
   Vargas, Chavela 1698-1701 1698

Performance, ritual as 1387
Performance studies, as field 1328

Perkins and R. v. United Kingdom (European Court of Human Rights; 2003) 797
Perko, Gudrun 906
Perlongher, Néstor 571-572 767 1252-1253 1297
Perón, Juan Domingo 571-572
Perry, Troy 1357

Persecution category, LGBT Military Index 1055
Persian miniature paintings 1181-1186 1183 1185 1668
Person, Ethel 426
Personnel Security Board 922

Pertusa, Inmaculada 916

Peru
  cinema 354 356-357
  constitutional reforms 1139
  decriminalization of homosexuality 1500
  encuentro of 1983 928
  Inquisition 1495
  Moche pottery 1076-1080 1077 1078 1079 1098 1262
  Museo Travesti del Perú 107 1097-1101 1097 1103 1226
  neoliberal economic policy effects 1139 1140
  performance artists in 1226
  pornoterrorismo and post-porn 1275 1276
  sex tourism 1448-1449
  sex workers 1449
  sports crowd homophobic chants 1538
  street volleyball 1539
  travesti and trans activism 1652

“Perversity” (poem) 1294

Pessoa, Mayssa 1540

Pet Shop Boys 1257 1258 1259

Peters, Arnold 297

Pétits-jésus, as term 895

Petropoulos, Elias 912

Peurifoy, John 922

Pfizer 1215

PFLAG (Parents and Friends of Lesbians and Gays) 1606 1607

Pflugfelder, Gregory 96 374

Phaedrus (ancient Greek figure) 1165 1406 1407

Phallic mothers and girls 1179

Phalloplasty 1219
Phallus, penis as 1213-1214 1214 1215 See also Penis

Phayul (web portal) 1598

Phet, as term 1431

Philip II (Macedonian king) 1405 1407

Philipp (prince of Eulenburg) 1027 1122 1412 1413 1660

Philippines
attitudes toward LGBTQ population 998
bakla culture 129-130 129 187-190 188
Boys Love manga 266
HIV/AIDS 729
homosexual argots 897
men who have sex with men 1089-1090 1091
new media popularity 1142
New York City diaspora 1330 1692
pornography and erotica development 1269 1270 1272
pride events 1282
removal of LGBT military service ban 1055
rural queer communities 1399
sex reassignment surgery 1433
sex tourism 1438
sodomy laws 787
urban queerness 1691

Phillips, John 1266

Phillips, Kenneth D. 681-682

Phillips, Richard 384

Phillips, Scott 650

A Philosophical Dictionary (Voltaire) 365

Philpott, Lachlan 1578

Phimosis 1218

Phoenix Society 1616

Phone apps 1228-1233 1229
Asia 1143 1144 1145 1146 1229-1230
cruising 428 431
pornography development and 1267

Photography in Europe 1233-1236 1233 1234
ethnopornography 509
nineteenth century 307

Phuket, Thailand, resort areas 1382

Phuying kham-phet (cross-gender woman) 870

Physical culture magazines 1264

Physique Pictorial (magazine) 1264 1602

Piao piao (Chinese homosexual identity) 898

Piao yu (homosexual argot) 898

Picaresque figure 1695-1697

Pickering, W. S. F. 320

Pickett, Nellie 1395

The Picture of Dorian Gray (Wilde) 28 31 1727 1728 1730

Picture Taken on Their 30th Wedding Anniversary (Khakhar) 124

Piedra, Gregoria 1497

Pieds noirs, as term 987

Pierce, Charles 1255

Pierro’s (bar) 1382

Pierson, Henry H. 368

Pikuach nefesh principle 1372

Pilgrimage, as ritual 1388

The Pill 1484

Pillay, Alyappin Padmanabbha 98 1170 1466 1467

Pine, Seymour 1549
Pineau, Gisèle 977
Piñera, Virgilio 436
Pinguero, as term 1445

Pinhua baojian (Chen) 1236-1238

Pini, Barbara 1397

Pink Divas 481

Pink dollar/pound, as term 1284

Pink Dot event (Singapore) 998 1283 1423

Pink economy 1145 1606

Pink films 1271

Pink Theatre Company 1577

Pink tide, in Latin America 1141

Pink triangle 1238-1243 1239 1242
  Silence=Death Project 4 620 621 736-737 transformation of symbol by activists 1127 1243 1551

Pink Triangle Press (PTP) 242

Pinkwashing 1244-1248 1246
  alQaws opposition 48-50
  The Bubble 270-275 extremist killings 846
  homonationalism 395-396
  Israel 1244-1248 1246 1374 1452 1646
  Meem critique of 1032
  Orientalism in gay pornography and 1173 1174-1175
  sex tourism and 1439 1452

Pinkwatching Israel 1246

Pinochet, Augusto 1224 1225

Piracy, digital 1144

Pirie, Jane 814-815
Pitcairn Island, marriage equality 1192

Pitt, Kenneth 1255

Pitt-Rivers, Michael 1740

Piwowar, Katarzyna 1079

Pizarnik, Alejandra 1249-1250 1252 1253

The Place Without Limits (film) 351 352

Plaine, William 88

PlanetRomeo (phone app) 1229

PLAPERTS (Plataforma Latinoamericana de Personas que Ejercen el Trabajo Sexual) 1449

Plas Newydd (home) 1106

Plataforma Latinoamericana de Personas que Ejercen el Trabajo Sexual (PLAPERTS) 1449

Plato 1165 1406 1407

Play Fair! (pamphlet) 1476

Pleshkas of the Revolution (Fiks) 105

Plomer, William 308

PLU, as term 1222

PLU (People Like Us) 472 1221-1223

PLU Travel Orbit (PLUTO) 1222

Pluma Blanca (bar) 200 200

PLUME (People Like You and Me) 1222

Plural-queer variation concept 906

Plüschow, Guglielmo 307

Plutarch 1405 1407
PLUTO (PLU Travel Orbit) 1222

Po, Paolo 186

La Pocha Nostra 653

Pocholo character 348-349

Poe, Edgar Allan 30

Poenitentiales (penance books) 1355

Poetry, queer
  Caribbean 973-974
  medieval Arab world 1160
  Ottoman and Persian 1183
  Ottoman Middle East 948 949-951
  Sufi treatment of same-sex relations 1556-1562

Poets in Latin America 1248-1254 1249 1250 1253

Põim, Maari 70

Poison (Haynes) 545-546

Poland
  collection of LGBTQ refugee statistics 1049 contraceptive clinics 1481
  decriminalization of homosexuality 1481
  HIV/AIDS approaches 714-715
  lack of registered partnerships 1011
  LGBTQ military service 1069
  pride events 1279 1283 1285
  restrictions on same-sex marriage 1012
  Stonewall Riots impact 1552
  The Well of Loneliness impact 1726

Poland, Baczkowski v. (European Court of Human Rights; 2007) 797

Poland, Kozak v. (European Court of Human Rights; 2010) 796

Polari (gay slang) 896 911-912 911 t 1067

Political activism See Activism and advocacy

The Political Palate (Bloodroot) 251
Poll, Christabel 168
Polyandry, in Tibet 1597
Polygyny
  Nigeria 322-323
  woman-woman marriages 1016 Polynesia
  third sex/gender categories 1585
  transgender people 1188-1191
Poma, Guamán 1099
Pomo Afro Homos (theater company) 1577
Pompeia, Raul 245
Poniatowska, Elena 1036 1037
Ponsonby, Sarah 1106
Pop-Up Museum of Queer History 1103
Popert, Ken 241
Popham, Paul 1709
Popular culture
  Asian drag 481-482
  BDSM 216
  camp and 290 293
  castration references 1217
  China 1746-1748
  influence on queer Caribbean literature 972
  Iran 1635
  Jewish LGBT people and themes 1375-1377
  Mexico 186
  new media in Asia and 1142-1147 1143
  otaku sexualities and 1177-1181 1178 sexual revolution influences 1485
  South Africa 1529-1530
  surgical transition references 1220
  Taiwan 1605
  Tibet 1599
  zhongxing phenomenon 1747-1748

See specific types; specific people
Popular music and queer identities 1254-1260 1255 1257 1258
  Afropop music 38-40
  China 1747
  Harlem Renaissance 640-641 641
  Latin American song types 1698 1699 lesbian music movement 942-948 944t 945
  Thai K-pop 1570-1573 1571

Por un feminismo sin mujeres (Díaz, ed.) 1276

Por Vida (digital mural) 622-623

PorNo PorSi festival 1277

Pornography 1260-1268 1261
  activist concerns 247-249
  African queer literature 969
  Amer, Ghada 52-53
  ancient worlds 1260-1262
  contemporary times 1264-1267 1456 depictions of the penis 1213 1214 1215
  ethnopornography 507-510 507
  fetishism 212 216
  gay-for-pay actors 1505-1506
  as language source 894
  Latin American cinema 350 lesbian/gay pulp fiction and 1304 1305
  nineteenth century 1263-1264
  Orientalism in 1172-1177 1175
  Os Leopardo 283
  Ottoman and Persian miniature paintings 1181-1186 1183 1185
  photography in Europe 1233-1236 1233 1234
  post-porn movement 275-277
  seventeenth and eighteenth centuries 1263
  tenth to seventeenth centuries 1262
  Tom of Finland art 1602

Pornography in Asia 1268-1273
  Boys Love manga 262-268
  India 131-132 131

Pornoterrorismo and post-porn 1273-1278 1276 1277 1619-1620

Pornoterrorismo (Torres) 1274 1276 Pornoterrorist Manifesto 1274
Porot, Antoine 510 511

Portrait d’une jeune artiste de Bona Mbella (Ekotto) 968 970

The Portrait of a Lady (James) 34

Portugal
- colonization of Africa 386 966 1086-1087
- colonization of Brazil 1507-1509
- Grupo de Trabalho Homossexual and LES 625-628
- LGBTQ military service 1069
- sins against nature in colonial Latin America 1494-1501

Portugal, Mouta v. (European Court of Human Rights; 1999) 19 795

Portuguese Americans, at Provincetown, Massachusetts 1380-1381

Portuguese Inquisition (1536–1821) 1507 1508 1509

Portuguese language, stigmatized vocabulary 913-914

Portuguese penal code (PPC) 1087

Posada, José Guadalupe 184 185 553

Positive African Men's Project 1156

Positive (film) 712

Positive/Negative: Women of Color and HIV/AIDS (play collection) 1578

Post-op (performing group) 1274

Post-porn 1273-1278 1276 1277 1619-1620

Post-porn Marathon (2003) 1276

Post Porn Modernist Show (theater piece) 1275

Post-traumatic stress disorder, in veterans 1708

Postcards, pornographic 1263

El postporno era eso (Llopis) 1276

Potencia Tortillera (blog) 467
Pouliquen, Jan-Paul 398
Povinelli, Elizabeth A. 1383
Powell, Adam Clayton, Sr. 640
Powell, Patricia 974 975
Power, Bet 114

Power dynamics
  amrad relationships 1492-1493
  BDSM 215
  cis privilege 362
  Latin American lesbian networks 930
  LGBTQ activism in Africa 14-15 master-slave relationships 114
  Pasolini’s cinematic adaptation of A Thousand and One Nights 1209-1210
  pedophilia 399
  sex tourism 1446 1464
  sex work 1457
  Sharaf exploration of 1487 1489
  situational homosexuality 1502 1504
  Sufi literature same-sex relationships 1558
  Tuqas al-isharat wa-al-tahawwulat depiction 1666
  witchcraft/occult in Africa 1736 1737 1738
  Zimbabwean repression of LGBTQI people 1752
  Zuqaq al-Midaq depiction 1754 1755 1756

Power, Michael 958
Power, Samantha 1349

Poz (magazine) 682

PPC (Portuguese penal code) 1087

Pramanik, Pinki 161

Prater, Tzarina 975

Pratt, James 1162
Pratt, Mary 1645
Pratt, Nicola 1311
Praunheim, Rosa von gay character development 1482 1711
  HIV/AIDS documentaries 683 712
  Stonewall Riots impact 1551
  von Mahlsdorf, Charlotte film 1710 1712

Preciado, Beatriz (Paul B.) 1276 1277

Preexposure prophylaxis See PrEP (HIV preventive preexposure prophylaxis)

President's Emergency Plan for AIDS Relief 698 701 729

President's Emergency Plan for AIDS Relief 698 701 729

Prejudice and Pride (exhibit) 1106-1107

Prem Kumari Nepali 1565

PrEP (HIV preventive preexposure prophylaxis) 692 740-741 1231 1388

“Presentimiento” (poem) 1252

Prejudice and Pride (exhibit) 1106-1107

Prem Kumari Nepali 1565

PrEP (HIV preventive preexposure prophylaxis) 692 740-741 1231 1388

“Presentimiento” (poem) 1252

PrEP (HIV preventive preexposure prophylaxis) 692 740-741 1231 1388

“Presentimiento” (poem) 1252

President's Emergency Plan for AIDS Relief 698 701 729

Presley, Elvis 1256

Preston, John 216

“Pretended” Family Relationships (Gupta) 128

Pride and Progress (Northrup) 621

Pride, as term 910

Pride demonstrations in Europe 396 1278-1281 1282 1283 1284 1285

Pride (film) 249 252 1398-1399

“Pretended” Family Relationships (Gupta) 128

Pride and Progress (Northrup) 621

Pride, as term 910

Pride demonstrations in Europe 396 1278-1281 1282 1283 1284 1285

Pride (film) 249 252 1398-1399

Pride History Group (Sydney) 102

Pride Houses (Olympic Games) 1540

Pride of Place: England’s LGBTQ Heritage (heritage project) 1107 Pride parades and marches 1281-1287 1283
Africa 300 301 1282 1335
Australasia 167 170-171 172
Australia 1281 1282 1553 1553
Bangladesh 1392
Botswana 1615
Brazil 1197-1199 1198 1553
Canada 1247 1282 1721
Caribbean 858
East Asia 998
Europe 396 1278-1281 1282 1283 1284 1285 gay ski weeks coinciding with 1379
Hong Kong 1605
human rights 763
Israel 999 1245 1246-1247
Latin America 285 286 629 1001
Marcha Lésbica (Mexico City) 604-605
Middle East 78 82 846
Namibia 1116 1116
Olympic Games 1540
Pakistan 1196
protests against 1376
Singapore 1222 1282-1283 1423
South Africa 1157 1282 1334 1335 1526
Southeast Asia 189 470
Stonewall Riots impact 1278 1281-1282 1548 1553 1689
Taiwan 1282 1605 1607
trans issues 138
Uganda 1282 1335
United Kingdom 593 1279 1280 1282 1399 1552
United States 213 313 588 591 737
See also Marches on Washington

Pride Toronto 1247

Pride Walk (Hong Kong) 1605

PrideNZ.com 102

Prieur, Annick 1315 1448

El primer nueva crónica y buen gobierno (chronicle) 1099

“Primero sueño” (poem) 1519

Prince (musician) 1256-1257
Prince, Virginia 426 1642

Princess Nokia (Destiny Nicole Frasqueri) 1259

Prins, Yopie 1411

Prinz Eisenherz Buchladen (Berlin) 250 711

The Prison Community (Clemmer) 1505

Prisoner (television series) 174

Prisonization, as term 1505

La prisonnière (play) 1574

Prisons

Sharaf depiction of 1487-1491

situational homosexuality 374 563-565 579-580 1505 1506

Pritchard, Annette 1440

Private Room (Amer) 53

“A Problem in Greek Ethics” (Symonds) 27-28

A Problem in Modern Ethics (Symonds) 1594

Problem plays, as term 1574

Producing Desire: Changing Sexual Discourse in the Ottoman Middle East, 1500–1900 (Ze'evi) 948

Profesionales (organization) 570-571

Professing Selves: Transsexuality and Same-Sex Desire in Contemporary Iran (Najmabadi) 361 1437 1635

Profumo affair (1963) 1662

Profumo, John 1662

Progressive Judaism 1372

Prohibition of Mixed Marriage Act (1949) (South Africa) 1524

Pronouns

agender pop artists 1259
Khookha McQueer 878
Spanish and Portuguese languages 918

Property of the State: Gay Men in the Apartheid Military (film) 335

Proposition N (San Francisco) 312

Proschan, Frank 521

Prosser, Jay 258 1329

Prostitution
  Brazil 1252
    changes over time, in Asia 1457 1458 courtesans as literary trope 1237
    male 1489-1490
  Page Act of 1875 interpretation 1040
  Pinhua baojian depiction 1236-1237
  raid and rescue operations in Asia 1457 1458
  Thailand 872
  trafficking vs. 1456-1457
  Ugly Law in Denmark 1687-1688
  United Kingdom 1419 1740 1741 1742

See also Male prostitution Sex work

Protection against Violence and Discrimination Based on Sexual Orientation and Gender Identity Resolution (UN) 1527

The Protest (film) 1022 1022

Protest music, lesbian music movement and 943-944

Protestantism
  reform efforts 1355
  self-affirming LGBTQ movement 1357 1358

See also specific denominations Proteus (film)

Proteus (film) 299 340

Protocol Relating to the Status of Refugees (1967) 1048

Proud Lebanon (organization) 833 1453

Proud Shoes: The Story of an American Family (Murray) 232

Proud2Serve (organization) 1068
Proulx, Annie 268-269 1398

Proust, Marcel 82 1375 1658

"Prove It on Me Blues" (song) 640 1255

Provencher, Denis M. 912

Provincetown, Massachusetts, resort areas 1379 1380

Przybylo, Ela 139

Psotta, Helmut 1226

Psychoanalysis
  differentiation among types of homosexuality 1505 influence on homeopathy 1027

Psychoanalysis in Argentina 1287-1291
  Communist Party 570 transgender identity 119-120

Psychological transsexualism, as term 1641

Psychology of Sex (Ellis) 1468

Psychopathia criminalis (Panizza) 1294

Psychopathia sexualis (Krafft-Ebing) 1291-1294 1292
  female same-sex sexuality considerations 1466
  influence of 225 400 425
  lesbian term in 1410
  metamorphosis sexualis paranoica 1640 sexology field and 1121 1291-1294 sister term 896

PT Foundation 990

Puar, Jasbir K.
  gay and lesbian tourism 1284 1440
  homonationalism 395 459 584 750
  pinkwashing 1244 1247
  queer secularism 1386
  sex tourism 1464

Public Cervix Announcement (theater act) 1275
Puero Rican Resilience Fund 1299

Puerto Ricans in the diaspora 1294-1300 1295 1298

Puerto Rico
lesbian encuentro of 1992 931
performance artists in 1226
travesti and trans activism 1655

Puig, Manuel 220-222 220 351 571

Pullen, Christopher 1398

Pulp fiction, gay and lesbian 1300-1306 1302 1304
Boys Love manga 262-268 263 265
tongzhi literature 1610 1611

Pulp Friction (Bronski) 1305

Pulse Nightclub shooting (2016) 846 1298-1299 1298

Puñal, as term 1227

Punavuori, Finland, gentrification 608-610 609

Purev, Oyunchimeg 1084

Purnell, Alan 1265

Pusić, Vesna 1280

Pussy Riot (music group) 1401

Putin, Vladimir 1374 1401 1403

Puto, as term 863 1495 1538

Puttaswamy, Justice K. S. v. Union of India (India; 2017) 765 1422

Q

Qader, Mohamed Abdel 148

Qahreman-e qahremanan (film) 1625

Qaisar (film) 1019-1020 1019 1021
Qalandars (mystics) 1560-1561
“Qamar al-Zaman” (short story) 1595
_Qamus al-jindir_ (gender dictionary) 832
Qasim, Muhammad 1183 1184
Qawm Lut al-judud (The New People of Lot) 1308
QEP (Queer Ecojustice Project) 490
Qian, Shu 1631
Qing dynasty (China) 1746
_Qingcao qingqing_ (Kuo) 1610-1611 1612
Qiu, Jin 1746
Qiu, Miaojin 1612-1613
Qiyas (analogical reasoning) 1365
QT _v._ Hong Kong Immigration Department (Hong Kong; 2017) 1307-1308
QuAIA (Queers against Israeli Apartheid) 1247
_Quatrefoil_ (Barr) 1304
Quebec, Canada, civil unions 1201
Quebec Gay Archives 114
Queen Boat Trials (2001–2002) 1308-1312 1309
Queen-Empress _v._ Khairati (India; 1884) 97 1425 1426
Queen Harish (drag performer) 480
Queen Victoria (Banksy) 621
Queens, as term 869 1446
_The Queen’s Throat: Opera, Homosexuality, and the Myth of Desire_ (Kostenbaum) 521
_The Queens’ Vernacular: A Gay Lexicon_ (Rodgers) 896
Queensberry, Marquess of 1731-1732
Queensland Penal Code of (1901) (Australia) 1163 1420-1421

Queer Africa: New and Collected Fiction (Martin and Xaba, eds.) 956

Queer African Reader (Ekine and Abbas, eds.) 538 952 956

Queer Alliance Nigeria 1154

Queer Archives Institute 105

Queer as Folk (television series) 548 1312

Queer, as term
  Africa 1334 1335-1336 applied to migrants 1040
  changing meanings of 909
  Khookha McQueer use 879 lack of specificity of 1331
  in Latin America 914 915
  LGBTQI vs. 952
  origins of 1323 1324-1325
  Pakistan 1194-1197
  problems of translation 1315-1316
  Western origins of 1091

“Queer” Asia (collective) 1330

Queer Britain 1103

Queer British Art, 1861-1967 (exhibit) 1104

Queer Brown Voices (2015) 112

Queer Diasporas (Sánchez-Eppler and Patton) 458

Queer Digital History Project 117

Queer domesticity in Europe 1312-1314 1313

Queer Ecojustice Project (QEP) 490

Queer Ecologies: Sex, Nature, Politics, Desire (Mortimer-Sandilands and Erickson) 1330

Queer ecology 1330

Queer French (Provencher) 912
Queer in Aztlan: Chicano Male Recollections of Consciousness and Coming Out (del Castillo and Güido) 865

Queer in Latin America 863-867 1315-1317

Queer Indigenous Studies: Critical Interventions in Theory, Politics, and Literature (Driskill et al., eds.) 1584

"Queer Inhumanisms" (Luciano and Chen) 492

Queer Ink 248

The Queer Insurrection and Liberation Army (TQILA) 845

Queer Kampala festival 341

Queer Kitchen Brigade 1299

Queer language 909-910 See also Language

Queer Malawi (Watson, ed.) 960

Queer names and identity politics in the Arab world 148-152 154 1317-1321

Queer Narratives of the Caribbean Diaspora (Pecic, ed.) 976

Queer Nation 229 1324 1325

Queer Nations: Marginal Sexualities in the Maghreb (Hayes) 988

Queer Pulp (Stryker) 1305

Queer Sarajevo Festival 1283

Queer secularism 1386-1387

Queer studies problems of translation 1315-1316
  sexology criticism 1471

Queer themes in Italian neorealist cinema 1321-1323 See also Pasolini's cinematic adaptation of A Thousand and One Nights

Queer theorists 1323-1333
  American queer activism and scholarship 1324-1326 1324 1327-1328 1328 globalization concerns 1330-1332 interdisciplinary approaches 1329-1330
  intersectionality 1326-1327 1326
transgender studies and queer theory 1328-1329

Queer theory
  economic analysis of Africa and 1134-1136
  Foucault, Michel influence on 568-569 1325
  influence on queer Caribbean literature 972 orgasm and sexual pleasure in 1169-1170
  origins of 1324-1326 1333
  pornoterrorismo influenced by 1274 1275 1276-1277
  questions of applicability to Africa 906

Queer theory, African 536-538 1333-1339

Queer Theory: Lesbian and Gay Sexualities (1990 conference) 1325-1326

Queer tourism See Tourism, LGBTQI-oriented

The Queering of the World (Helfer) 178

Queermuseu: Cartografias da Diferença na Arte Brasileira (exhibit) 1106

Queers against Israeli Apartheid (QuAIA) 1247

Queers for the Climate 490

Queers Undermining Israeli Terrorism (QUIT) 313 1247

Queeruption festival 1277

Quesada, Uriel 112

Quest for Love (film) 340

Quiebre (breakup of Nicaraguan LGBTQ activism) 1149-1150

The Quiet Violence of Dreams (Duiker) 959 1463 1529

Quilombos (settlements) 1508

Quilter, Harry 33

Quimera Rosa 1274

A quinta dimensão do sexo (film) 350

QUIT (Queers Undermining Israeli Terrorism) 313 1247

Qur’an
gender dimorphism views 1627
homosexuality 755-758 844-845 851-852 861-862
Iranian research on 1638
lack of reference to female homosexuality 1075 lack of reference to transsexuality 194
Lut story 755-756
as source of Islamic law 46 1364-1365 1557

Qzine 94

R

R (pseudonymous organization) 1195

R. and F. v. United Kingdom (European Court of Human Rights; 2006) 793

R Siam music 1570

R. v. Hornick (Canada; 2002) 431

Ra, Bhenji 129-130 129

I racconti di Canterbury (film) 1205

Rachilde (pseudonym) 31

Racial concerns
anti-racist activism in Europe 71-75 72
black feminism 1327
colonialism legacy in Brazil 1510
fetishization of differences in pornography 1266-1267
HIV/AIDS activism issues 4 6 9
Lavender Scare purges 923-924
lesbian land movement 936
mixed race sexual relations in Namibia 1116 nationalist masculinity in postrevolutionary conservative Europe 1121 penis size 1214
political exclusion 242-243
Pulse Nightclub shooting 1298-1299
queer migrants to the US 1041 1042
rural queer communities 1397
sex tourism in Latin America and the Caribbean 1444-1445 sexology approaches 1467-1470
Sharaf exploration of 1489
South African LGBTQ activism 1526
Strange Fruit collective 1555-1556
See also Apartheid Intersectionality

RACK (risk-aware consensual kink) 210

Radhakrishnan, K. S. 669-670

“Radical Archiving: A Lesbian Feminist Perspective” (article) 933

Radical Faerie movement
activities 489
alternative medicine understandings 1028
ritual practices 1384-1385 1385
rural queer communities 938 1394 1397

Radical History Review (journal) 117

Radicalesbians
Lavender Menace connection 919 921
split from Gay Liberation Front 1550 woman-identified woman term 935

Rado, Sandor 453

Radszuweit, Friedrich 1264

Radványi, Géza von 983

Radziszewski, Karol 105

Raerae identity 1191

Rafael, Vicente 408 411

Raffalovich, Marc-André 225 1733

Rafiki (film) 339

Rag Tag (film) 339-340

Ragawa, Marimo 266

Rahman, Khir 992

Rahman, Momin 384 750

Rahman, Nasser Abdel 657-660 659

Raijenstein, Pablo 1274
Rainbow Action 1607
Rainbow Coalition 1296
Rainbow families, as term 887
Rainbow Identity Association 1615
Rainbow Index 1046
Rainbow Mountain Resort 1379
Rainbow of Hong Kong 1308
Rainbow Project 9
Rainbow Railroad 315 1347-1348
Rainbow Refugee 1347
Rainbow Rose 1012
Rainey, Gertrude (“Ma”) 640 1255
Raisian, Alireza 1638
Raizenberg, Theresa 300 1334
Raj, Shumail 1426 1629
Rajah, Jothie 471
Rajaram, Poorva 1271
Rak-ruam-phet, as term 900
“Rak Tong Poet (Naen Ok)” (song) 1572
Ramaka, Joseph Gai 344-345 346-347
Ramdev, Baba 1131
Ramdohr, Wilhelm Basilius von 365
Ramé, Maria Louise See Ouida (pseudonym)
Ramos Mejía, José María 551-552
Ramos Otero, Manuel 917 1296-1297
Ramsey, Glenn V. 882
Rana, Akm Masud 729
Rancheras (song type) 1698 1699 1700
Rand, Erin J. 41 42
Randell, John B. 426
Rane, Abhijeet 482
Rangayan, Sridhar 1399
Rania (queen of Jordan) 1646-1647
Rank Outsiders (organization) 1068
Rant, James 1164
Rao, Nina 1438
Rap music, queer identities and 1259
Rape, corrective, in Africa 1341-1342 1341
HIV/AIDS 696
South Africa 580-581 696 1341 1342
See also Sexual violence
Rape for Who I Am (film) 336
Rapp, Claudia 1357
Rappori: Yaoi tokushu go (1979) 264
Los raros (Darío) 554
Rascovsky, Arnaldo 1288
Raseboya, Violet 1545
Raskin, Lyn 1265
Ratjen, Heinrich (Dora) 156
Ratnam, S. S. 1431
Rattigan, Terence 1574
Raupp Rios, Roger 773
Rausch, Peter 1711
Ravenhill, Mark 1577
Rawiri, Angèle 966 967-968
Rawson, K. J. 117
Ray, Johnnie 1255
Raymond, Janice 935-936
Rayones (video) 622
RCMP (Royal Canadian Mounted Police) 1721 1722
“Re-orienting Desire: The Gay International and the Arab World” (Massad) 751-752
ReachOut (organization) 1280
Read, Charles Hercules 1183
Reagan, Ronald AIDS policies 680 994 1241 liberalism philosophy 1133 military policies 1060 support for contras 1148
Rebel without a Cause (film) 1602
Rebentisch, Juliane 294
Rebman, Francis Joseph 1466
Receptive role in male-male sexual behavior
  amrad relationships 1492
  Arab queer literature depiction 1159
  Arabic terms for 1318 1319-1320
  blackmail and 236
  Boys Love 267
  colonial Latin America 821 1500 1508
  fin de siècle sexuality 551 813
  houseboys at resorts 1381
malakoi term 1354
medieval Judaism 1370
Mexican gay men 377
Mexican youths 377
muxes 1110
Ottoman and Persian miniature paintings 1185-1186
Pacific Island māh_u 1187
premodern Islamic world 1364
ritualized same-sex practices in Melanesia 1192-1193
Sharaf depiction of 1487 1490
Sufi literature 1557

Rechenberg, Georg Albrecht Freiherr von 810-811 811

Rechy, John 430 864

Reconditioning therapy 1169

Recuay culture 1078 1079

Red de Mujeres Trabajadoras Sexuales de Latinoamérica y el Caribe (RedTraSex) 1449 1654

Red de Organizaciones con Trabajo en SIDA 770

Red Hot + Blue (album) 1257

Red Hot Organization 1257

Red Latinoamericana y del Caribe de Personas Trans (REDLACTRANS) 1652

Red Nacional LGBT 770

Red Pepper (Ugandan periodical) 907

Red por la Despatologización de las Identidades Trans del Estado Español (Spanish Network for Depathologization of Trans Identities) 1620

Red power movement 1671

Red Ribbon Project 681

Red Scarf (website) 1729 1730

Red Trans (Trans Network) 1652

Red Trebol (Clover Network) 1652
Redbird (collective) 935
Reddie, James Campbell 894
Reddy, Gayatri 668 1385 1388
Rede Trans Brasil (Trans Brazil Network) 1651
Redekopp, Julie Elizabeth 1509
Redl, Alfred 1413 1660 1661
REDLACTRANS (Red Latinoamericana y del Caribe de Personas Trans) 1449 1652
Redlin, Meredith 1396
Redon, Odilon 33
Redwood Records 945
Reed, Lou 1256
Rees-Rob, Nick 1464

Rees v. United Kingdom (European Court of Human Rights; 1986) 793
Reform Judaism, views on same-sex behaviors 1372 1373-1374 1375
Refugee Law Project 1348
Refugees and asylum in Africa 1342-1346 1344 1614
Refugees and immigration policies 1346-1353
anti-racist activism in Europe 71-75
Central America 310-315 310 313 migration to cities 1692
queer diasporas 459
Turkey 1347 1534-1536
US-Cuba 432-433

Regeneración (newspaper) 1036 1038

Regina v. Brown (UK; 1993) 1164

Registrar of Marriages, W v. (China; 2013) 787 1606 1713-1717 1715
Registry marriages (Hong Kong) 1714
Religion

African queer literature portrayals 955-956
African traditions 1678-1679 importance in Scouting 1415 intersex spiritual deities 908 percentage of unaffiliated LGBTQ Americans 1358 ritual practices and 1386 1387

See also specific religions

Religion and same-sex behaviors: Christianity 1353-1363 1358 1360 anti-gender movement in Europe 69-70
archival records 108-109
Argentina 121
Asia 187-188
Asian drag 481
Australasia 168
colonization of sexuality 1355-1356 “conversion” churches 66
Egypt 149
Europe 84-87
HIV/AIDS 716 720 723-724
India 669
Latin America 279-280 284-285 559-563 716 818-823
Lebanon 192-195
medieval homoerotic text and images 1262
Middle East 155 192-195
Pacific Islands 1189 1193
queer decolonization 1360-1361
same-sex acts as Christian acts 1356-1357 same-sex acts in community structures 1353-1355 1358-1360
United States 781

Religion and same-sex behaviors: Christianity, Africa anthropology in Africa south of the Sahara 67
Botswana 259-260
Cameroon 288-289
Ethiopia 506
flexible gender systems 595-598
Ghana 612-613 614
HIV/AIDS 701
Kenya 875
Mozambique 1087
Namibia 1116
Nigeria 1150 1152
queer decolonization 1360-1361
South Africa 1524-1525
Uganda 1682-1683
witchcraft/occult and 1736 1737-1738
Zimbabwe 1751

Religion and same-sex behaviors: Islam 1363-1369
Al-Akharun 44-48 45
Asian drag 481
Asrar ‘ailiyah 148 149
Chechnya 315-317
female-female relations 387
India 669
Indonesia 1717 1719
internet activism 831
Iran 1435-1436
ISIS gay trials 844-847
Lebanon 193 194-195 209
Malaysia 990
medieval homoerotic text and images 1262
North America 458
Pakistan 1196
refugee issues 779-780
slavery 840-843

See also Homosexual acts in shariʿa Islam

Religion and same-sex behaviors: Islam, Africa
Anglican relations 323
Cameroon 288-289
colonialism legacies 387
Egypt 149
Ethiopia 506
Ghana 612-613 614
Kenya 875
Mozambique 1087
Nigeria 1151-1152 1151 1153
North Africa 1363-1367
Senegal 1429
sub-Saharan Africa 851-856 854
Uganda 1682-1683

Religion and same-sex behaviors: Judaism 1370-1377 1375 1376
anti-Semitism and Zionism 75-79
cinema 495-500 496 497

Reluctantly Queer (film) 340

R.E.M. (music group) 1258

Remember Ruben (Betí) 965-966

Rémès, Érik 2

Remoto, Danton 189

DIE RENAISSANCE DES EROS URANIOS (Friedlaender) 366

The Renaissance in Italy (Symonds) 28

The Renaissance (Pater) 27

Rendón, Oliver 199

Rent (musical) 1576

Repo, Jemima 191

Republic (Plato) 1406

Réquiem para un alcaraván (performance art show) 1227 1227

Rescalvo, Sònia 1377-1379 1378

Reset DOC (magazine) 585

Resorts 581-582 1379-1383

Response to Sister Filotea (de la Cruz) 1518

Responsibility ethics, in neoliberalism 1135

La respuesta a Sor Filotea (de la Cruz) 1518 1519 1520

Restrooms See Bathrooms
Returned and Services League (Australia) 1708 1709

Reuben, David 1480

Le revenant (Fall) 965

La révolte des Galsénésiennes (Doumbi-Fakoly) 966-967

Rey, Michel 428

Reyes, Ale 941

Reyes, Rodrigo 314 587-588

Reyes, Yosimar 865

Reynolds, Malvina 943

Reza Shah Pahlavi (shah of Iran) 1018

“The Rhodora” (Emerson) 30

Rhyme, Abdul 89

Ribeiro de Souza, Wagner 1224

Ricci, Matteo 1356

Rich, Adrienne

  lesbian feminism contributions 934 1326 1327

  themes and works 257 361

Richards, Renée 157

Richards v. Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (European Court of Justice; 2006) 797-798

Richardson, Matt 1657

Richardson, Tony 1482

Richter, Dora 674 824

Richter, Rudolf 1641

Ricketts, Charles 33

Rieger, Marilyn 1024
Ries, Marilyn 944
Rifkin, Mark 1671
Riga Pride event 1280
Riggs, Marlon 737 738
Right to Privacy Committee (RTPC) 204-207
Rights of Transgender Persons (Protection of Rights) Bill (2015 (India) 670
The Rights of Transvestites in Argentina (Berkins) 771
Rihab al-mithliya (Helem) 651
Rikki Swin Institute 116
Rimbaud, Arthur 31 1205
Rimbaud in New York (Wojnarowicz) 619
Riordon, Michael 1398
Ríos Montt, Efraín 600
Riot grrrl movement 947
Ripstein, Arturo 352
Riquelme, Cecilia 929
The Rise of the Creative Class (Florida) 606-607
Riseman, Noah 1710
Risks and Responsibilities Consultation on Male Sexual Health and HIV in Asia and the Pacific (2006) 142-143
Ritchie, J. F. 510 511
Ritchie, Jason 1244
Ritter, Hellmut 1558
Ritual formulario (Pérez Bocanegra) 409 411
Ritualized homosexuality, in Melanesia 1192-1193 1383-1384
Ritualized Homosexuality in Melanesia (Herdt, ed.) 1384

Rituals and same-sex and trans experience 1383-1390 1385
  - Asia 98
  - third sex/gender categories in Latin America 1584-1585

Rituals of Signs and Transformations (play) See Tuqus al-isharat wa-al-tahawwulat (play)

Rivas San Martín, Felipe 1277
  - cuir term 1276-1277
  - performance art work 1225
  - pornoterrorismo 1274 1275

Rivera, Sylvia 1295
  - activism 592 593
  - Puerto Rican diaspora membership 1295-1296
  - Stonewall Riots involvement 1295 1550 1642

Rivers of Life: Lesbian Stories and Poems (anthology) 960

Roba la Gallina character 1650

Robertson, Pamela 293

Robinson, Gene 1360

Robinson, Marty 592

Robles, Amelia/o 1037

Robles, Víctor Hugo 1225 1225

Rocha, Leon Antonio 569

Roderick Hudson (James) 30

Rodes, Roger 1590-1591

Rodgers, Bruce 896

Rodó, José Enrique 554

Rodrigues, Nelson 1223 1575

Rodríguez Acosta, Ofelia 1316

Rodríguez de Ruiz, Alexandra 866
Rodríguez, Jesusa
  performance artists in 1224
  themes and works 280-282 655-656
  Vargas, Chavela relationship 1699

Rodríguez Matos, Carlos 917 1296

Rodwell, Craig 1550

Roe v. Wade (US; 1973) 1485 1515

Roehrborn, Claus 518

Rofel, Lisa 1331

Roffiel, Rosamaría 1568

Röhm, Ernst attacks on 401
  Nazism involvement 1124 1125 1126 publicity about private life 1412-1413

Rolling Stone (newspaper) 701

Rolling Stones 944

Roma città aperta (film) 1322

Roman Catholic Church See Catholicism

Román, David 1576 1578

Roman, Geraldine 189

Romania
  Coman, Adrian case 1012
  lack of registered partnerships 1011
  restrictions on same-sex marriage 1012

Romantic friendship See Boston marriage and women's romantic friendships

Romartz, Zen 941

Rome, ancient cultural references to the penis 1213
  erotic images 1261-1262 1261

Rome, Open City (film) 1322
Rome Pride event 1279

Romer v. Evans (US; 1996) 892

Römer, Jürgen, v. Freie und Hansestadt Hamburg (Court of Justice of the European Union; 2011) 1012

Romero, Doris 1378

Romero, Jaime 1099

Romesburg, Don 23-24

Ronson, Mick 1256

Roodt, Darrell 684

Roopbaan (magazine) 1390-1392

Roosevelt, Eleanor 1253

Rops, Félicien 1410

Roque Ramírez, Horacio N. 587 589

Rosa Cordis (performance tableau) 1226

Rosales, Ariel 1697

Rosario Laguna, Rafael 917

Rosario, Vernon A. 225

Roscoe, Will
  African same-sex relations 93 843
  berdaches, study of 1582 historical accounts of African gender expression 1614 two-spirit people, study of 1583 1670

Rose, Axl 1258

Rose, Dinah 1307

Rosenberg, Jordana 1331

Rosenblum, Nancy L. 730
Rosenbrock, Rolf 712
Rosenthal, Franz 1094
Ross, Andrew 290 291 292-293
Rossetti, Christina 32
Rossetti, Dante Gabriel 32
Roth v. United States (US; 1957) 1484
Roth, Walter E. 507-508
RotZSchwul (Red Cell Gays) 1241
Roughead, Gary 1062
Roughgarden, Joan 491
Rouhani, Farhang 460
Roumagnac, Carlos 185
Round the Horne (radio show) 911
Rouputuan Er Yunuxinjing (film) 1269
Rouputuan (erotic novel) 1269
The Routledge Handbook of Latina/o Pop Culture 865 Row Kavi, Ashok See Kavi, Ashok Row
Rowbotham, Sheila 1166
Rowland, Chuck 1023 1024
Rowson, Everett K. 616 1628
Roy, Arundhati 521
Roy, Deboleena 1329
Roy, Raina 1471
Royal Canadian Mounted Police (RCMP) 1721 1722
Royal Navy Compass (organization) 1068
Royal Ontario Museum 1105
Royal Vauxhall Tavern (London) 1578
Roze Zaterdag (Pink Saturday) 1278
RS (music company) 1570
RTPC (Right to Privacy Committee) 204-207
Ruan, Fang-fu 897
Rubenstein, Anne 1697
Rubera, Alexandra 1614
Rubin, David 836
Rubin, Gayle S. 114 1327 1387 1388
Rubyfruit Jungle (Brown) 375
Rudner, William A. 902
Ruiz, Agustina 1497
Ruiz-Alfaro, Sofia 1701
Ruiz, Augustina 88
rukus! Federation 74 105 1105 1235
Rüling, Anna 1392-1393 1414
Rumi (Sufi poet) 1167 1559
Running and Other Stories (Xaba) 955 956
RuPaul's Drag Race (television show) 481-482 901 918
Rupp, Leila J. 255 367

Rural queer communities, US 1393-1396 1394
back-to-the-land communities 488-490
lesbian land movement 934-938 937

Rural queerness 268-270 269 1396-1400
Russia
advocacy for LGBTQI refugees 1347-1348 attacks on pride events 1279 1280
backlash against LGBTQ rights 1013 1348 1374
blackmail 238
BRIC/S membership 1459
Chechnya detention camps 315-318 316
criminalization of homosexuality 1123 1400-1403
decriminalization of homosexuality 1401
domesticity arrangements 1313 1313 1314
gay pornographic productions 1266
gay propaganda law 1400-1403 1402
HIV/AIDS approaches 713-714
interactions with Iran 1493
interclass homosexuality 1122
Jewish population 1373
LGBT Military Index score 1055
nationalist masculinity in 1123 1128
Olympic Games 1540
pride events 1283 1285
queer migration to Europe 1048
queer slang 912
restrictions on adoption 1204
restrictions on same-sex marriage 1012
sodomy laws 86-87 399-400

See also Soviet Union

Russia, Alekseyev v. (European Court of Human Rights; 2010) 797

Russia, Bayev v. (European Court of Human Rights; 2017) 763 797

Russia, Lashmankin v. (European Court of Human Rights; 2017) 797

Russian Federation, Fedotova v. (UN Human Rights Committee; 2012) 763

Russian gay propaganda law 1400-1403 1402

Russian LGBT Network 315
Russo, Vito 374

Rustin, Bayard 232-233 233 923

Ruth, Barbara 484 485

Rwanda
  Christianity in 321 326
  colonial-era homosexuality 387 389

Ryan White Comprehensive AIDS Resources Emergency (CARE) Act 740 783

Rydstrøm, Helle 730 732

Rydström, Jens 87

S

S. and Cornwall County Council, P. v. (European Court of Justice;1996) 797

S/Z (Barthes) 521

SA Leather 1615

Saab, Nada 1667

Saadawi, Nawal El 858-863 859

Sabry, Maher 1309

Sabsay, Leticia 1139 1141

Sabyat, as term 1319 1320

Sacasa, Martha 1149

Sacayán, Diana 1655

Sachs, Wulf 510 512

Sacred Band of Thebes 1405-1408 1406
  Blüher, Hans reference to 1123
  Order of Chaeronea and 1165 1166 1407

Sadat, Anwar 1490 1664

Sadeghi, Leila 1638
SADF (South African Defence Force) 1616
Sadoet (singer) 1570
Sadomasochism See BDSM (bondage and discipline, dominance and submission, sadism and masochism)
Sadr, Hamid Reza 1022
Safai, Reza 1021
Safavid art 1182 1183
Safe Sex (play) 1576
Safe sex practices
   barebacking and 2-3 1387
   bookstores 248
   HIV/AIDS crisis and 1476
Saffique Black Women 175
Safismo, as term 1038
Safitri, Dian Maya 1628
Sagan, Leontine 983-985
Sagat, François 1174 1176
“A Sage Conversation” (short story) 1395
Sahagún, Bernardino de 559-563 1315
Said, Edward W. media power 704
   Middle Eastern travelogues 1644
   Orientalism 56 812 1754
   sex tourism 1452 1454
Saint, Assotto 979
Saint Foucault (Halperin) 569
St. George, Katharine 1661
St. Paul’s Reconciliation and Equality Centre (Kampala) 324
Saitō, Tamaki 1178-1179
Salaam Canada 1367
Salama, Amr 705 706-707
Salamah, Mohammad 844
Las Salamandras de Ambiente (organization) 1568
Salamon, Gayle 1329
Salas, Lesley 1569
Salcedo, Bamby 864
Salem, Randy 1303
SALGA (South Asian Lesbian and Gay Association) 1042
Salgado, Julio 865
Sallie Bingham Center for Women's History and Culture 116
Salome (play) 29 33 1727 1728 1733
Salon Oriental (organization) 74
Salzmann, Ariel 950
Sam (Coleman) 1303
Samakhom Bukkhon Kham-phet Haeng Prathet (Transsexual Association of Thailand) 870
Samāʿ (musical audition) 1559
“Same Love” (song) 39
Same-sex–desiring people, as term 910
Same-sex marriage See Marriage, same-sex
Same Sex Marriage (Prohibition) Act of 2014 (Nigeria) 1152-1153
Same-sex partnerships
   Europe 1008-1009 1010
   France 886 1009
Latin America 1001-1002
Slovenia 1011 1034
Vietnam War veterans 1709-1710

Samma, Jaanus 105

Sammān, Ghāda al- 207-210

Samman, Hanadi al-
  Arab and Middle Eastern sexualities 56-57 208
  Hajar al-dahik 634 635
  lesbianism 705 861
  Middle East queer studies 1753 1754 1755

Samoa
  Section 377 legacies 1420
  transgender people 1189 1191

Samoa Fa'afāfine Association 1409

Samoaan fa'afāfine 1189-1190 1191 1408-1410 1585-1586

Samois (organization) 214 1476

Samudzi, Zoe 362

San Francisco AIDS Foundation 735

San Francisco, California
  Castro neighborhood 1041 1281 1485 1689 1690
  Catacombs 1387
  coming out rituals 1387
  Compton’s Cafeteria riot 1550
  Folsom Street Fair 1283
  gay liberation activism 1704
  GLBT History Museum 1101 1102
  hippies 1484
  Mattachine Society leadership 1024 1025
  pilgrimage to 1388

San Francisco Gay History Project 115

San Francisco International LGBT Film Festival 1247

San Francisco Lesbian and Gay History Project 115

San Francisco Transgender Film Festival 547
Sanāʾi (poet) 1559

Sanbao taijian Xiyang ji tongsu yanyi (Luo) 1744

Sánchez-Eppler, Benigno 458

The Sand Child (Ben Jelloun) 989

Sanders, Douglas E.
  activism 296 297
  sodomy laws 89 297
  trans issues 145

Sandinista Revolution See The Nicaraguan Revolution

Sandino, Augusto 1147

Sando to Samantha: Aka the Art of Dikvel (film) 335

Sandoval, Chela 864

Sandoz, Helen 445-446

Sandstrom, Boden 945

Le sang d’un poète (Cocteau) 218

Sang, Tze-lan Deborah 1610

Sanger, Margaret 1466 1474

Sangomas (traditional healers) 1523-1524

Sankar, Andrea 255

Sankari, Muhammad Wisam 776 845-846 1535

Sanky pankies, as term 1446

Santa (Gamboa) 186

Santander Cultural 1106

Santiago, Néstor 1111

Santillána, José Manuel 864

Santini, Antonio 916
Santos-Febres, Mayra 1656

“Sao Kaoli” (song) 1570

Sao prophet-sorng (second category woman) 870

Sao thi-ji (transgender woman) 870

Sapfo (engraving) 1410

Sapphism, as term 1410

Sapphistries: A Global History of Love between Women (Rupp) 255 367

Sappho
  classical studies 364
  Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz compared to 1518 1519

Sappho and Erinna in a Garden at Mytilene (painting) 32 1410 1411

Sappho: Memoir, Text, Selected Renderings, and a Literal Translation (Wharton) 1410

Sappho, nineteenth-century rediscovery of 1410-1412 1411

“Sappho to Phaon” (poem) 1410

Sappho und Sokrates (Hirschfeld) 824

Sappho Was a Right-On Woman (Abbott and Love) 366

Saqafi, Fatemeh 1638

Sarabia, Manuel 1038

Sarah (desert mother) 1355 1357

Sarakhsi, Ahmad ibn al-Tayyib al- 1094

Saraya, Samira 154

Sarayrah, Lili 477

Sarduy, Severo 1097 1297 1656

Saria, Vaibhav 530

Sarif, Shamim 340 958
Sarlo, Beatriz 348

Sarrasine (Balzac) 1217

SASOD (Society against Sexual Orientation Discrimination) 972

Sassafras (collective) 937

Sassine, Williams 966

Satō, Masaki 1180

Saturday Group 1526

Saturday Night Thriller y Otros Escritos (anthology) 1100

Saudi Arabia

Al-Akharun 44-48 45
eunuchs 515 1628
lack of rights for LGBTQ people 761
terminology for nonnormative sexualities 1319 1320

Sauer, Birgit 70

Savage, Dan 1475

Savage Man in Central Africa (Cureau) 511

Savinova, Mariya 1545

Sawt Al Niswa (blog) 834-835 1031

Sayanaa Welfare Association 1084

Sayers, David Selim 1093-1094

Sayoni (organization) 1222

Scalia, Antonin 1517

Scandals in Europe 1412-1415 1413 1659-1662

Scandinavia

African refugees in 1344
eugenics movement 1122
HIV/AIDS approaches 712-713
pornography and erotica development 1265
queer slang 912
sexual revolution 1481
suspicion of divorced women 1312
See also specific countries

Scarce, Michael 677

Scarlet Song (Bâ) 966

Schalk and Kopf v. Austria (European Court of Human Rights; 2010) 794-795 794 796 1011

Schalk, Horst Michael 794-795 794
Schimmel, Annemarie 949
Schine, G. David 924
Schinegger, Erika (Erik) 157
Schlesinger, John 1265

Schlumpf v. Switzerland (European Court of Human Rights; 2009) 794

Schmidt, Heike I. 384
Schmidt, Johanna 1585
Schneemann, Carolee 1223
Schneider, David M. 886
Schneider, Sue 366
Schoeps, Hans-Joachim 1240

Scholar and the Feminist Conference (1982) 214

Scholz, Piotr O. 517
Schoonover, Karl 333
Schooyans, Michel 70
Schopenhauer, Arthur 31

Schorer, Jacob 103
Schouten, Joost 88
Schreiner, Olive 26 30
Schuessler, Michael K. 915-916
Schulman, Sarah
    archival records 117
    desecration porn 1175
    gentrification 606 607 610 611
    urban queerness 1691
Schunger, Bettina T. 729
Schwartz, Norton 1062
Schwarz, Judith 115
Schwarz, Shaul 1584
Schweighofer, Katherine 1397
Schwob, Lucy 1375
Schwules Museum* (Berlin) 104 105 1101 1102 1103
SchwuZ (community center) 711
Scientific-Humanitarian Committee See Wissenschaftlich-humanitäres Komitee (Scientific-Humanitarian Committee)
Scissor Sisters (music group) 1258-1259
Sciusscià (film) 1322
Scopophilia 950
Scotland
    decriminalization of homosexuality 1163 1421 1742
    same-sex marriage 764
Scott, E-J 1105
Scouting 1415-1418 1416
Scouting for Boys (Baden-Powell) 1415
Scouts Canada 1417
Scouts for Equality (SFE) 1417
Scruff (phone app) 1228 1231 1267
Seajay, Carol 251-252
Searle, Andy 144-145
Sears, Clare 100
Sebastian (saint) 1234
Sebbar, Leïla 989
Sebreli, Juan José 571
Seccombe, Shelley 620

The Second Coming: A Leatherdyke Reader (Samois) 214

Second Congress to Unite Women (1970) 919 920 920 921

Second ILGA Pink Book (van der Veen et al., eds.) 929

Second-parent adoptions, North America 1201

Second Red Scare 922

Second Skins (Prosser) 1329

Secret Asian Man (film) 1266

Secret Garden (organization) 1555-1556

Secret Love (exhibit) 1105

Secret Years (film) 104

Secretary for Justice, Leung T. C. William Roy v. (Hong Kong; 2005) 1307 1421

Secretary of State for the Home Department, HJ (Iran) and HT (Cameroon) v. (UK; 2010) 1350

Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, Richards v. (European Court of Justice; 2006) 797-798

Section 28 amendment (UK) 1401 1402

Section 377 and Section 377A 1419-1424 1422
art of identity 123-127 125
blackmail 237 colonies 1162-1163
decolonization 811-812 enforcement against women 814 history and effects 89 765 787 811
HIV/AIDS 730-731
legal records 96-97
Singapore 471 788
United States 1512

Section 377 in South Asia 1424-1428
   art of identity 123-127 125
   Asia-Pacific region 1055
   Bangladesh 1391
   blackmail 237
   history of 89 785 787 811
   HIV/AIDS 730-731
   Hong Kong 1307
   India 669
   as legacy British colonial law 1163 1471 legal actions 765
   legal records 96-97
   Malaysia 990
   Naz Foundation International work 1128 1130-1131
   Pakistan 1196-1197
   Raj, Shumail case 1629
   reinstatement of 1131
   Singapore 471

Secularism, queer 1386-1387

Sedgwick, Eve Kosofsky antiheterosexual politics 293
   the closet 373 375 376
   cruising 430
   Foucault, Michel 568
   homosocial continuum 636 on Jewish queerness 82
   queer themes in film 1323 1325 1327

Seedat, Fatima 536

Segregated communities, situational homosexuality and 1502-1504

Seigneurie, Ken 177-181
Seinto Seiya (manga) 264 265
Seiyu, Ito 216
Seksualinen Tasavertaisuus 105
Seksualiti Merdeka 1367
Sekula, Allan 1235
Selerowicz, Andrzej 1046
Selitsch, Wolfgang 1551
Selvaggi, Gennaro 1431
Semashko, Nikolai 1123
Seme no kenkyu (Seiyu) 216
Semen ingestion, ritual 1192-1193
Semenya, Caster 158 161 1540 1544-1545
Seminario Marxista Leninista de Lesbianas Feministas (Marxist Leninist Lesbian Feminist Seminar) 930
Semley, Lorelle D. 595
Sempol, Diego 769
Semugoma, Paul 1685
Sénac, Jean 986
Sendak, Maurice 1375
Sendero Luminoso (Shining Path) 1098 1226
Senegal 1428-1430
  asylum seeking 1343
  Benga, François (“Féral”) 218-220 218
  cinema 343 344-345
  gorjigeen 1614
  Islam and same-sex relations 855
  queer migration to Europe 1048
Senegalese Penal Code (1965) 1429
Senghor, Léopold Sédar

Sension, Nicholas 88

_The Sensuous Man_ (M) 1475

_The Sensuous Woman_ (Garrity) 1475

Senyonjo, Christopher 322 324 1360 1361

_Senzenki doseiai kanren bunken shusei_ (collection) 99

September 11, 2001 terrorist attacks 1274

Sequeira, Lupita 1149

Serano, Julia 359 359

Serbia
  - ban on pride event 1280
  - decriminalization of homosexuality 1481
  - pride events 1283 1285
  - restrictions on same-sex marriage 1012

Serduchka, Verka 523 524

Serhane, Abdelhak 988

Šerifović, Marija 524

Serna, Cristina 866

Serna, Javier 652

Serrano-Amaya, José Fernando 769

Serreau, Jean-Marie 1664

Sestre (trans group) 524

"Sethunya Likes Girls Better" (short story) 956

Settlement house movement 1504

7 Days (music group) 1570

Seven Sisters (coalition group) 143
Seven Steps to Heaven (Khumalo) 959
Sevengi, Refik Ahmet 950
Sewell, John 205
Sex and Character (Weininger) 81
Sex and Conquest (Trexler) 1584
Sex and Personality: Studies in Masculinity and Femininity (Terman and Miles) 226-227
Sex and Repression in Savage Society (Malinowski) 509
Sex and the Single Girl (Brown) 1475
Sex and Zen (film series) 1269 1270
Sex Bazaar (film) 1174
Sex, Custom, and Psychopathology (Laubscher) 511-512
Sex education, in the West 1473-1478 1474
Sex, Edy 39
Sex (Madonna) 216
Sex Orientation Scale (Benjamin) 884
Sex-Pol (organization) 768 940
Sex pots (Moche pottery) 1076-1080 1077 1078 1079
Sex reassignment surgery (SRS)
   Argentina 1290 1654 cinema depiction 992
development of 1641-1642
Judaism views 1372 1373
Latin America 1654-1655
Malaysia 1628
penis considerations 1219-1220
Saudi Arabia 1320

Sex reassignment surgery in Asia 1430-1434 1631
   Hong Kong 1632 1715
   Taiwan 1633
Sex reassignment surgery in Iran 229 1434-1437 1626 1630 1636-1637

Sex roles See Gender roles

Sex tourism
  Africa 1462-1465
  North Africa 988 1464
See also Sex work

Sex tourism in Asia 1437-1443
  kathoey 872 873
  resort areas 1381 1382
  Thailand 872 873 1382

Sex tourism in Latin America and the Caribbean 1443-1452 1448 colonial power relations and 1444-1445
  queer sex work in specific countries 1445-1449
  sex-worker organizations 1449-1450

Sex tourism in the Middle East 1452-1455

Sex trafficking
  Africa 1462-1465
  African refugees 1343 1344
  Asia 1456

Sex Variants (Henry) 226

Sex verification testing (sports) 158 160 1539 1544

The Sex Warriors and the Samurai (film) 189

Sex wars contemporary pornography and 1266-1267 1275 1456 discussion of culturally taboo sex practices 1476
  queer theory development 1327

Sex work
  Africa 1462-1465
  African refugees 1345
  Argentina 1654
  bacha bazi relationships 1385-1386
  Brazilian travesti 914
  Cuba 1445-1446
  French Polynesia 1191
  gendering of 1457
hijras 1585
HIV/AIDS 720
houseboys at resorts 1380-1381
India 1130
kathoey 872 873
Maghreb region 989
at military bases 1054 1055
neoliberal economic policy effects in Latin America 1140
Peru 1099
phone apps 1230
Phuket, Thailand, resort areas 1382
as term 1456
Thailand 872 873
transfeminism advocacy 1620 1621
travesti and trans activism 1653-1655 1656-1657
El vampiro de la colonia Roma depiction 1695-1696
violence against 601-602
vulnerability to prosecution 1427
See also Prostitution Sex tourism headings

Sex work in Asia 1455-1462 1458
Asia Pacific Transgender Network (APTN) 142-143 146
HIV/AIDS 730-731
kathoey 872 873

Sex work/sex tourism/sex trafficking in Africa 1462-1465
Cape Town 301
involuntary servitude 840-843
Islam and 851-852

Sex worker organizations 1449-1450 1460

Sexe et société en Afrique noire (Ombolo) 1736

Sexile, as term 1296 1297

Sexilio (sexile) and migration, Cuba 432-433

Sexing the Body: Gender Politics and the Construction of Sexuality (Fausto-Sterling) 1329

Sexo-ästhetische Inversion, as term 1640

Sexology
archival records 98
Europe 1479-1480
impact on public perceptions 1473
The Well of Loneliness influenced by 1725 1726
See also Orgasm and orgasmology

Sexology in Asia 95-101 1465-1472 1469

Sexperts and sex education in the West 1473-1478 1474 1480 1480

Sexploitation films 350 352 1265

Sexual Behavior in the Human Female (Kinsey et al.) 881 883-884 1467 1479-1480 1483

Sexual Behavior in the Human Male (Kinsey et al.) 881 883 884 1479-1480 1483

Sexual commerce, as term 1456-1457

Sexual dimorphism paradigm 1581-1582

Sexual Inversion (Ellis and Symonds) 425 1466 1725

Sexual invert, as term
- anti-Semitism and 76 82
- biological essentialism views 225 227
- female husbands 534
- fin de siècle sexuality 551 552 553
- Hall, Radclyffe use 1294 1724 1725
- sexology use 1466 1473

Sexual Minorities Archives 114

Sexual Minorities Uganda (SMUG)
- activism 334 337 338 701
- court case 1685
- formation of 1618
- on homosexuality 62 537 701
- kuchu term 907
- press conference 1684

Sexual nationalism, as term 750-751

Sexual Offences Act (1957) (South Africa) 1525

Sexual Offences Act (1967) (UK)
- colonial legacies of 1420
- fiftieth anniversary program 1104 1106
- impact on UK activism 1552 military exceptions to decriminalization 1068 provisions of 1421
superseding of Offences Against the Person Act 1163
Wolfenden Report influence on 1742

Sexual Politics, Sexual Communities: The Making of a Homosexual Minority in the United States (D’Emilio) 115 1325

Sexual Psychopathy (Krafft-Ebing) See Psychopathia sexualis (Krafft-Ebing)

Sexual revolution in Europe 196-198 1478-1483 1480

Sexual revolution in the United States 1483-1486 1485

Sexual science integration with anthropology 1467 1471
as term 1465
See also Sexology headings

Sexual violence
amrad relationships 1493
Brazil 1507-1512
Mexico 1036
prosecution of, under Section 377 1425
Sharaf exploration of 1487-1488 1489-1490
South Africa 1527
See also Gendered violence and feminicide in Latin America Rape, corrective, in Africa

Sexualities, Genders, and Rights in Asia: The First International Conference of Asian Queer Studies (2005 conference) 1330

Sexually Liberated Asian Artist Activist People! (SLAAP!) 131

Sexually Speaking (radio show) 1475

Sexually transmitted infections (STIs)
Mexico 1448
phone apps and 1231
sex worker organizational advocacy 1449
See also HIV/AIDS

SFE (Scouts for Equality) 1417

Shadhdha, as term 928 1074 1075

Shadia (actress) 1756
Shadman, Fakhr al-Din 1021

Shadow Game (Power) 958

The Shadowed Mind (film) 340

Shaffer, Perrin 993

Shafiʿi legal school 1365

Shah, Nishant 1270

Shāh-o Gedā (king and beggar) theme 1558-1559

Shah, Tejal 126

Shahbaji Khanom (film) 1624

Shahbazi, Parviz 1022

Shāhed-bāzi (witness playing) 1557-1558

Shahids (martyrs) 1020 1022

Shahin, Abdel-Sabour 658-659

Shahrayar (legendary king) 1205

Shahrazad (literary figure) 1205

Shahriar, Maryam 1625

Shairp, Mordaunt 1574

Shaka (Zulu emperor) 1462

Shakeela (actress) 1270

Shakerifar, Elhum 1626

Shakhsari, Sima 458

Shakya, Tsering 1597

Shamaya, Otep 1258

The Shameful State (Tansi) 966
Shamsi pahleoon (film) 1625
Shangaan people 1087
Shanghai Nvai (organization) 133
Shangwu Yinshuguan (publisher) 1727
Shannon, Charles Haslewood 33
Shao nainai de shanzi (play) 1727
Shao, Xunmei 1728
Shapiro, Eve 1579
Sharaf (Ibrahim) 1486-1491 1487 1488
Sharif, Khawaja Muhammad 1426
Sharma, Maya 1397
Shaw, George Bernard 31 34
Shawa, Mary 700
Shawnee (pop artist) 1260
Shayevich, Adolf 1374
Shaykh, Hanan al- 1072-1076
Shazzeh, as term 1032
She Guevara (performance art persona) 1227
She Must Be Seeing Things (film) 505
S.H.E. (Social, Health and Empowerment Feminist Collective of Transgender and Intersex Women of Africa) 1618
Shear, Linda 947
Shears, Jake 1259
Sheffield and Horsham v. United Kingdom (European Court of Human Rights; 1998) 793
Shelley, Martha (Altman) 592
Shemale porn 1266
Shemales 872
Shen Hong 1727
Shenglai tongzhi (film) 421
Shepard, Matthew college ally programs 663 murder 250 647 648 662 663
play about 1578
Shepard, Todd 987
Sherman, Martin 1576
Shernoff, Michael 735-736
Shi fei nan nv (book series) 1633
Shibari (bondage practice) 215-216 215
Shibusawa, Naoko 924
Shields, Ella 1579
Shifting sexual norms in nineteenth-century Iran 1491-1494 1492 1634
Shi ji mo shaonian’ai duben (Wu) 1238
Shilluk people 1015
Shilts, Randy 678 682-683 1688-1689 1705
Shin, Hyunjoon 1570 1571
Shining Path (Sendero Luminoso) 1098 1226
Shiosai (Mishima) 1069-1070
Ship’s Operatic and Dramatic Society (SODS) 1068
Shishani 39
Shiv Sena (political party) 557-558 557
SHL (Student Homophile League) 661

Shock, Susy 1225

Shoeshine (film) 1322

Shokhi-e tabiat (film) 1626

Shōnen Jump 264

Shopping and Fucking (play) 1577

Shoulder, Justin 129-130 129

Shu, Qi (actress) 1269

Shudhudh al-jinsi, al-, as term 1320

Shukrī, Ghālī 208

Shulchan Aruch (Karo) 1370-1371

Shunga (Japanese artwork) 1105 1262

Shuttleton, David 1396

Sickles, Dan 916

Sida-sida, as term 1628

SIDAhora (magazine) 1297

Sidoti, Palmore v. (1984) 1200

Siebers, Tobin 1331

Siegfrids, Krista 524

Sigal, Pete

  Nahua people 1315
  pre-Columbian Mexico homoeroticism 1109
  South American third gender categories 1584 1585
  themes and works 560

Sigel, Lisa 1260

Sigheh-ye khahar-khandegi (sisterhood vows) 1634
Sign language 902
Sigusch, Volkmar 358-359
Sikri, A. K. 669-670
Silber, Mark N. 114 1102
The Silence (film) 1481
Silence=Death Project 4 620 621 712 736-737
Silva, Hector 865
Silva, Rafaela 1540 1541
Silveira, Lucas 1259 1260
Silver Moon Bookshop (London) 250
Silvera, Joey 1266
Silverblatt, Irene 412
Silverman, Kaja 1217
Silverstein, Charles 1475
Silvestri, Leonor 1274 1276 1277
Simelane, Eudy 1544-1545
Simes, Gary 897
Simon and I (film) 335 1157 1527
A Simple Revolution (Grahn) 251
Simpore, Bilguisa 1544
Simpore, Salimata 1544
Sims, David 657
Simultaneous orgasm 1169
Sin máscaras (radio show) 466
Sinclair, Jo 1376
SiNdebele (language) 905

Sindicato Nacional Independiente de Trabajadoras Sexuales Travestis, Transgéneras, y Otras “Amanda Jofré,” 1449

Sinfield, Alan 1574

Singapore
  attitudes toward LGBTQ population 998
  British colonial sodomy laws 1163
  dissidence in 468-474 469 472
  first sex reassignment surgery 1431
  gay liberation activism 1704
  gross indecency laws 89
  koro outbreaks 1214
  LGBT military service 1055 1056
  LGBTQ identities 1573
  LGBTQ rights 788
  militarism and sexualities in 1054-1057
  museum exhibits 1105 1106
  new media popularity 1142 1143 1145
  People Like Us 1221-1222
  pinkwashing concerns 1245 1439
  pornography and erotica development 1269
  pride events 1282-1283 1423
  Section 377 legacies 1420 1422-1423
  sex tourism 1441
  tourism development 1438
  urban queerness 1691

Singapore Penal Code 1420 1422

Singapore Pride Season (IndigNation) 1222

Singer, Isaac Bashevis 1376

Singermann (Brinig) 1376

Singing from the Well (Arenas) 60

Sins against nature in colonial Latin America 1494-1501
  Erauso, Catalina de 502-505 503
  Florentine Codex and Nahuas 559-563
See also Slavery and sodomy in Brazil
The Sins of the Cities of the Plains; or, The Recollections of a Mary-Anne, with Short Essays on Sodomy and Tribadism (Reddie and Solomon) 894-895

Sinvergüenza, as term 917-918

Sirees, Nihad 635-638

Siren Theatre Company (lesbian group) 1576

Sirena Selena vestida de pena (Santos-Febres) 1656

Siricius (pope) 1354

Siriyuvasak, Ubonrat 1570 1571

Sisley, Emily 1475

Sister Namibia (organization) 537

Sister Outsider (collective) 73 1556

Sister Outsider (Lorde) 1327

SisterGirls (transgender community) 172 173

“Sisterhood Is Powerful” (article) 919

Sisterhood vows, in Iran 1494 1634

“Sisters and Brothers, Lovers and Enemies: Marriage Resistance in Southern Kwangtung” (Sankar) 255-256

Sisters Foundation 873

Sisters of Perpetual Indulgence 1476

Sisterspace bookstore (Washington, DC) 251

SisterWrite bookstore (London) 250

Situational homosexuality 1501-1507

African literature 953

Brazilian literature 244-246

Military service 429 1504-1505

Prisons 374 563-565 579-580

Siva, Tiruchi 670
Sivan, Troye 1259
Sívori, Horacio Federico 914 915
Sjöman, Vilgot 1481
Ski resorts, LGBTQI-oriented 1379
Skin Two (club) 212
Skoonheid (film) 340
Skrapec, Candice 601
Skuy, David 1424
SLAAAP! (Sexually Liberated Asian Artist Activist People!) 131
Slamah, Khartini 143 146 slave david stein (activist) 210
Slavery
  Abbasid society 1094
  involuntary servitude and same-sex sexuality in Africa 840-843 legacy in African sexuality 903 904
  South Africa 1524
Slavery and sodomy in Brazil 1507-1512
  archival records 108-109
  Bom-Crioulo 243-247
  legacies of 981 1510
See also Conquest and sodomy in Latin America Sins against nature in colonial Latin America

Slovakia
  gay pornographic productions 1266
  lack of registered partnerships 1011
  restrictions on same-sex marriage 1012

Slovenia
  decriminalization of homosexuality 1481
  Metelkova mesto 1033-1035 1034
  pride events 1280
  registered partnerships 1011 1034
  restrictions on same-sex marriage 1012
Slovenian Lezbična Knjižnica (Lesbian Library and Archive) 104

“The Slow, Tragic Death of the LGBT Publishing Industry” (Berman) 253

Smalls, James 219

Smartphone apps See Phone apps

Smedley, Agnes 98

Smit, Estian 698 1616

Smith, Adam 1138

Smith and Grady v. United Kingdom (European Court of Human Rights; 1999) 797 1068

Smith, Artemis 1303

Smith, Barbara 251 391 392

Smith, Bessie 640-641 641 1255

Smith, Beverly 391 392

Smith, Donna 857

Smith, Geoffrey S. 922

Smith, George 205

Smith, Ian 973

Smith, J. D. 238

Smith, Jeanette 1068

Smith, John 1162

Smith, Miriam 1513

Smith, Paul 892

Smith-Rosenberg, Carroll 255 257

Smith, Sam 1259

Smith, Zadie 291 293

“Smoke, Lilies, and Jade” (Nugent) 643
SMUG See Sexual Minorities Uganda (SMUG)

SMZ Tomboy Crew (band) 1145

Snorton, C. Riley 1329

Snow Cake (film) 139

Snow, Jess X 623

Snowman (film) 1624 1624 1636

Soares, António 1509

Socarides, Charles W. 454

Soccer See Football (soccer)

Social, Health and Empowerment Feminist Collective of Transgender and Intersex Women of Africa (S.H. E.) 1618

Social media African activism 828-830
dating platforms 1230
  Middle East activism 831-835 834
  travesti and trans activism 1656
See also Internet New media in Asia Phone apps

El socialismo y el hombre en Cuba (Guevara) 434

Sociedad Gay (SOGA) 770

Société Mattachine 1023-1024 See also Mattachine Society

Society against Sexual Orientation Discrimination (SASOD) 972

Society for the Second Self 426

Socrates 1406 1407

Sodatic theory of homosexuality 1593-1596

Sodom, biblical story of 1356

Sodomiseurs en chef, as term 1738

Sodomite, as term 1080 1582
Sodomy laws

British colonies 1162-1163
Canada 1723
Germany 1240
Indonesia 1719
Nazi regime 1239 1240
Offences Against the Person Act 84-85 1161-1165 1419
treason associated with 1659

See also Antisodomy and buggery trials Criminalization of homosexuality Section 377 and Section 377A Section 377 in South Asia Sexual Offences Act (1967) (UK)

Sodomy laws in the United States 1512-1518 1516

Bowers v. Hardwick case 2 88 892 995 1514-1516 1517
historical overview 87-88 236 1512-1513

Sodomy, origin of term 1355

SODS (Ship's Operatic and Dramatic Society) 1068

Soft-core pornography 1265

SOGIE (sexual orientation and gender identity and expression), as term 1222

Sohbet (all-male pleasure party) 1184

Soheili, Vahid Zare 1626

Soho neighborhood, London, as gayborhood 1281

Solá, Miriam 1620

Solace Brothers Foundation 614

Solanas, Valerie 139 140

Soldaderas (female soldiers) 1036

Solé Arrondo, María Elena 436

Solomonese, Joe 783

Solomon, Simeon artwork 1410 1411
gay lexicon 894
themes 26 32

Solomonoff, Julia 355-356 355
Somalia
asylum seeking 1343
Section 377 legacies 1420
tans issues 1615

Somitigos (sodomites) 1508

Somizi (celebrity) 1530

Sommer, Allison Kaplan 1247

Sommer, Matthew 96

Somopremi (same-sex loving) 1390-1391

Somos Hermanas 314

Somos (magazine) 107 572 768

Somoza Debayle, Anastasio 1147

Somoza García, Anastasio 1147

Son (Cuban song type) 1698 1699

A Son (film) 1464

Sonenschein, David 894

Song in a Weary Throat: An American Pilgrimage (Murray) 232

A Song of Ice and Fire (novel series) 1217

A Song of Love (film) 1264

The Song of the Loon (Amory) 1304 1304

Sonnabend, Joseph 1476

Sontag, Susan 290 291 681 1375

Sor Juana, el primero sueño (Rodríguez) 280

Sor Juana en Almoloya (Rodríguez) 280

Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz 1248 1251 1518-1522 1519

Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz, o, Las trampas de la fé (Paz) 1520
Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz (telenovela) 1521

Sor Juana's Second Dream (Gaspar de Alba) 1520 1522

Sordi, Alberto 1322

Sortir du nkuta (film) 343 346-347

Sotadic Zone 1263-1264 1593 1595

Le souci de soi (Foucault) 568

Soul porn 1266

Souleiman, Haya 155

Souleman, Ali al- 1666

The Sound of Waves (Mishima) 1070

Soundarajan, Santhi 161-162

Sounding, of the urethra 1215

Sounding the Inner Landscape (Gardner) 947

Souteneurs, as term 895

South Africa 1522-1531

- AIDS and activism 3 7 300 692-698 697
- apartheid 958 1156-1157 1524-1526 1616
- BRIC/S membership 1459
- Cape Town 299-301 301
- cinema and activism 335-336
- colonial and apartheid eras 1523 1524-1526
- colonization of Namibia 1115 1116
- criminalization of homosexuality 1524 1525
- decriminalization of homosexuality 1163 1529
- Dutch legacy antisodomy laws 1420
- feminism and queering 537
- homosexual argots 900
- introduction of queer, as term 1334
- Islamic LGBTQI activism 1367
- legal reforms 13 323
- LGBTQ-inclusive churches 329
- migration to 1335-1336
- mine marriages 1087
moffie term 898-899
neoliberal economic policy effects 1133 postapartheid era 1526-1528 precolonial era 1523-1524
pride events 1157 1282 1334 1335 1526
queer literature publication 954-955 957 958-959 961-962
queer theory development 1336-1337
rape, corrective, in 1342
refugees and asylum in 1343 1345 1347 1349 1351
rural queer communities 1399
situational homosexuality 1505
trans issues 1615 1616 1617
urban queerness 1691 1692
visibility and opportunity for queer people 1528-1531
woman-woman marriage 1015 1016 1017
women's sports involvement 1544 1545

South African Civil Union Act (2006) 11

South African Defence Force (SADF) 1616

South Asia
    gender fluidity and same-sex behaviors among Islamic people 1368
    hijras 1384
    marriage migration 998-999
    Naz Foundation International 1128-1132
    new media popularity 1142 1143
    third sex/gender categories 1470-1471 1585-1586
See also specific countries

South Asian American Digital Archive 100

South Asian Lesbian and Gay Association (SALGA) 1042

South Korea
    Boys Love manga 265
    LGBT military service 1056
    LGBTQ rights 786-787
    militarism and sexualities in 1054-1057
    new media popularity 1142 1144
    pinkwashing concerns 1439
    pornography and erotica development 1271 1272
    sex reassignment surgery 1433
    sex tourism 1441
    urban queerness 1691
South/North binaries See North/South binaries

South-West Trains Ltd., Grant v. (European Court of Justice; 1998) 798

Southall, Carol 1282 1284

Southeast Asia
  gay liberation activism 1704
  gender fluidity and same-sex behaviors among Islamic people 1364 1368
  ladyboy culture 1382
  LGBTQ rights 787-788
  marriage migration 998
  Naz Foundation International 1128-1132
  third sex/gender categories 1585-1586
See also specific countries

Southern Comfort Conference 1531-1534 1532

Souza, Felipa de 628

Sovereign Erotics: A Collection of Two-Spirit Literature (Driskill et al., eds.) 1584

Soviet Union
  changing homosexuality laws 1481
  criminalization of homosexuality 1083 1126
  discrimination against LGBTQ people 1046 disintegration of 1127 great retreat 1126
  nationalist masculinity in World Wars period 1123 1124 1125-1126
  UK spies for 1661-1662
See also Russia

Sow, Fatou 535-536

Sowell, Richard L. 681-682

Soyinka, Wole 953 967

Sozialdemokratische Partei Deutschlands (SPD) 1122

Spade, Dean 1331

Spain
  changing homosexuality laws 1481
  Chueca neighborhood 1281 colonization of Peru 1098 1099
  gay tourism 911
gender identity law 120
HIV/AIDS approaches 713
homosexual argots 896-897
Jewish queer literature 1370
LGBTQ-friendly climate 1052
LGBTQ military service 1069
nationalist masculinity in World Wars period 1125
Pacific Islands colonization 1189
pornoterrorismo 1273-1275
pride events 1278 1282
scandals in 1413
sins against nature in colonial Latin America 1494-1501
transfeminism development 1619 1620 1622

Spain, Mata Estevez v. (European Court of Human Rights; 2001) 795
Spain, Nancy 1067
Spain, P. V. v. (European Court of Human Rights; 2010) 19
Spain, Tomás Aldeguer v. (European Court of Human Rights; 2016) 796
Spambots 1230
Spanish Civil War (1936–1939) 1125
Spanish Inquisition 1495
Spanish language poetry in 1251
stigmatized vocabulary 913-914

Spartacus International Gay Guide (Bedford) 428 469 1454
SPD (Sozialdemokratische Partei Deutschlands) 1122
Speak No Evil (Iweala) 957
Speaking in Queer Tongues: Globalization and Gay Language (Leap and Boellstorff, eds.) 915
Spearing, A. C. 951
Speck, Tim 589
Spectra Project 1534-1536 1535
Speke, John Hanning 1681
Spender, Stephen 308
Spengler, Otto 1640 1642
Sperm donation 1203
Spermatorrhea 1216
The Spiderweb (web platform) 1569
Spiers, Herb 1720 1723
Spinelli, Miro 1224
Spinnboden Lesbenarchiv und Bibliothek (Spinnboden Lesbian Archive and Library) 104 105
Spinoza, Baruch 256
Spiral Wimmin's Land Cooperative 935
Spirit of Haiti (Chancy) 978 Spirit possession
  by male ancestors 1016
  rituals and 1386
  Zimbabwe 1751
Spitzer, Robert 453-454
Spivak, Gayatri Chakravorty 417
“Splash Out” (song) 1572
Split Britches (drag group) 1579
Sports and sexuality in Latin America 1536-1542 1537 1541
Sports, women in, Africa 158 1542-1546 See also Athletes, trans and intersex
Spring Fire (Packer) 1302
Springfield, Dusty 1254 1256
Sprinkle, Annie 490 1274-1275 1277
Sprüngli, “Theo” Anna See Ruling, Anna

Spurlin, William J. 906

Spyer, Thea 450

Squirting and Prostate Massage Practical Workshop 1277

Sri Lanka
homosexuality 785
Section 377 legacies 1420 1424-1428
sex tourism 1438

Srivastava, Sanjay 1466 1469 1470

SRS See Sex reassignment surgery (SRS)

SSC (safe, sane, and consensual) 210

Ssempa, Martin 1683

Ssuuna II (king of Buganda) 1681

Staatssecretaris van Veiligheid en Justitie, A, B and C v. (Court of Justice of the European Union; 2014) 1048 1050

Staël, Germaine de 30 1410

Stag films 1264

Stalin, Joseph
death 1059
recriminalization of homosexuality 1481
repression of LGBTQ people 1124 1126
sodomy laws 87 401

Standards of Care for the Health of Transsexual, Transgender, and Gender Nonconforming People 1643

Stangos, Nikos 308

Stanley, Julia Penelope 932

Star Blazers 264

STAR: Street Transvestite Action Revolutionaries 1295 1296

Stasi (East German secret police) 1712
State, Banana v. (Zimbabwe; 2000) 1421 1422
State-based LGBTQ advocacy 996
State, Dhirendra Nadan and Another v. (Fiji; 2005) 1421
State, Kanane v. (Botswana; 2003) 1422
State, McCoskar v. the (Fiji; 2005) 1563
State v. Muhammad Din (Pakistan; 1981) 1426
States of Passion (Sirees) 636-638
Stay Queer (Masked Muskequeers) 620
Steakley, James 376 1241
Steam: The Turkish Bath (film) 1667-1668
Stearn, Jess 446
Stein, Arlene 1395
Stein, Dan J. 456
Stein, Gertrude 1046 1375
Stein, Gloria 1533
Stein, Marc 241 782 1548
Steinach, Eugen 98 1642
Steinberg, Jonny 340 580
Stella, Francesca 376
Stellar, Stanley 618
Stema, Qamile 887
Stephens, Elizabeth 490 1277
Sternheim, Bernardien 1234
Sternweiler, Andreas 104 573
Stevens, Joe 1259
Stewart, Catherine 340
Stewart, William Drummond 1503
Stewpot films (film-e abgushti) 1019
Stichting Aanvullende Dienstverlening (SAD) 712
STICHWORT, Archiv der Frauen und Lesbenwegung 104 105
Stigwood, Robert 1255
Stipe, Michael 1258
STIs See Sexually transmitted infections (STIs)
Stobie, Cheryl 952
Stöcker, Helene 826
Stofile, Makhenkesi 1544
Stohr, F. O. 513
Stolberg, Michael 673
Stoler, Ann Laura 569 812
Stoller, Robert 358 426 454
Stone Butch Blues (Feinberg) 1546-1548
The Stone of Laughter (Barakat) 476-477 631-635 632 633
Stone, Robert 89
Stone, Sandy 935-936 946 1328
Stonewall Immigration Group 1348 See also United Kingdom Lesbian and Gay Immigration Group (UKLGIG)
Stonewall National Monument 1107
Stonewall National Museum and Archives 112 114 1101
Stonewall Riots (1969) as beginning of modern LGBTQ movement 993 1689 pride events commemorating 1278 1281-1282
Rivera, Sylvia involvement 1295 1550 1642
Vietnam War protests and 1704

Stonewall Riots, international effects of 1548-1555 1549 1553
Gay Liberation Front 590-594 591
pride events commemorating 1689
Toronto bathhouse raids 202-207 203

Stonewall UK (organization) 455 1066 1068 1069

_Stoning Mary_ (play) 1578
Stopes, Marie 1414 1474

_Stories of Our Lives_ (film) 339
Storms, Michael D. 137 884

Storms scale 884

_The Story of an African Farm_ (Schreiner) 30

_Story of the Night_ (Tóibín) 375

“The Story of the Woman of the Sea” (short story) 1297

_The Straight State_ (Canaday) 116 374

_Strange Brother_ (Niles) 641 1303

Strange Fruit (collective) 74 1555-1556

_Strange Sisters_ (Zimet) 1305

Strap-on videos 1266

Strap-ons 1216 1219

Stree Sangam 558 558

Streelekha bookstore 248

Street Transvestite Action Revolutionaries 593

_A Streetcar Named Desire_ (play) 1579

Streitmatter, Rodger 1024
Stryker, Jeff 1266

Stryker, Susan
   Compton’s Cafeteria riot 404 405
   on Feinberg, Leslie 1546 lesbian/gay pulp fiction 1303 1305
   themes and works 662
   transfeminism 1621
   transgender, as category 1471
   Transgender Studies Quarterly editorship 1328

Student Homophile League (SHL) 661

Studies in the Psychology of Sex (Ellis) 1504 1595

Studio Beurs (film series) 1266

Stulo, Lindeka 1341

Stur, Heather Marie 1702

Su, Julie (Su Rui) 1747

Subincision 1219

Sublime love, in Chinese literature 1236 1237

Sudan
   criminalization of homosexuality 1163
   Section 377 legacies 1420
   terminology for nonnormative sexualities 1320

Suddenly Last Summer (play) 1574

Sufi treatment of same-sex relations in poetry and prose 1556-1562

“Suggestion” (Leverson) 29

Suhaq
   Arab queer literature depiction 1158-1159 1363
   as term 1318-1319

Suhaqiyya, as term 1032 1074 1318 1320

Suharto (Indonesian leader) 1718

“The Suit Continued” (short story) 956
“The Suit” (short story) 956
Sukarno (Indonesian leader) 1718
Sulaiman, Raja Azmi Raja 991
Sullivan, Gerard 729
Sullivan, Louis Graydon 575 576
Sumaya (trans woman) 1615
Summers, Montague 1167
Sun City (Gupta) 128
The Sun Hath Looked upon Me (Beyala) 966 967
Sun Hawk (Maria Christina Moroles) 936-937
Sun Thaenchoerin 873
Sun Yat-sen 1603
Sundstrom, Cedric 340
Sunil Babu Pant 1562 1563-1565
Sunil Babu Pant and Others v. Nepal Government (Nepal; 2007) 1562-1566 1562
Sunna (precedent and practice of prophet Muhammad) 1365
Super Girl (reality show) 1144 1747 1748
Superincision 1219
Supi, as term 1336
Supplemental Nights to the Book of the Thousand Nights and a Night (Burton) 1596 Support Initiative for People with Atypical Sex Development 1618
Suriname, travesti and trans activism 1652 1656
Surpassing the Love of Men (Faderman) 254 257 567 1325-1326
Surrogacy, North American rights 1199 1203 See also Adoption, fostering, and surrogacy (international)
Surrogate marriage, as term 1015

SUSPECT (organization) 1280

Süssmuth, Rita 712

Sutherland v. United Kingdom (UK; 1994) 792

Suwaidi, Thani al- 474-478 475

Suzuki, Michiko 1467

Swahili people
  - gender fluidity and same-sex behaviors among Islamic people 1364
  - third sex/gender categories 1587

Swahili terminology 908

Swann, Glenn 1266

Swanson, Jon 993

SWAPO Party (Namibia) 1116 1117

Swardspeak 897

Swaziland
  - anti-LGBTQI laws 1335
  - mummy-baby relationships 1016
  - Section 377 legacies 1420

Sweat (television series) 174

Sweden
  - advocacy for LGBTQI refugees 1348
  - African refugees in 1344
  - National Museums of World Culture 1105
  - pornography and erotica development 1265
  - queer slang 912
  - refugees and immigration policies 1349
  - same-sex marriage 1359
  - same-sex partnerships 1008
  - sex education in schools 1477
  - sexual revolution 1481
  - Unstraight Museum 1103
  - WelcomeOUT event 1051
Switzerland
  family policies 1008
  friendship societies 574
  HIV/AIDS approaches 711-712
  ILIS conference of 1986 929
  Der Kreis activism 1282
  lack of same-sex marriage 1011
  LGBTQ military service 1069
  sexual revolution 1481

Switzerland, Schlumpf v. (European Court of Human Rights; 2009) 794

Sworn virgins 886-887 887

Sydney Mardi Gras Parade 1281 1282

“The Symbolist Movement in Literature” (Symons) 26

Symonds, John Addington
  Burton, Richard Francis influence on 1594
  Sappho translation 1410
  themes and works 26 27-28 366 425
  Whitman, Walt analysis 1408

Symons, Arthur 26

Symons, Jonathan 173

Symposium (Plato) 1165 1406 1407

Synagogues, LGBT-friendly 1374-1375

Syncletica (desert mother) 1355

Syria
  Halat shaghaf 635-638
  persecution of LGBTQ people 1534-1535 1536
  queer migration to Europe 1048
  terminology for nonnormative sexualities 1320
Tuquš al-isharrah wa-al-tahawwulat production 1663-1667

Szulc, Łukasz 1552

T, Lea 1540

T-style, as term 1746

Tabari, Omar al- 1318

Tabesh, Ali 1624

Tabío, Juan Carlos 434-435

TAC See Treatment Action Campaign (TAC)

Taddeucci and McCall v. Italy (European Court of Human Rights; 2016) 795 1011

Tafdíl al-batn ‘ala al-zahr (al-Jāḥ· iz-) 1093

Tagame, Gengōrō 1180

Tagg, John 1235

Tahiti, māhū 1187-1188 1190-1191 1585 1586

Tahtawi, Rifa‘ah, al- 1366

Tai, Jin (Dai Anna) 1748

Taïa, Abdellah 988 1464

Taichīgch khuvguud ba saaral gudamj (play) 1085

Taipei Golden Horse International Film Festival (1992) 1604

Taiwan

Asian drag 481

Boys Love manga 265

conversion therapy ban 419

LGBTQ rights movement 786-787 1004-1007 1598 1604-1607 1630-1634

marriage migration 999-1000

militarism and sexualities in 1054-1057 movement toward same-sex marriage 997 998 999-1000

museum exhibits 1106
new media popularity 1142 1143 1144 1145
pinkwashing concerns 1439
pornography and erotica development 1270 1271 1272
pride events 1282 1605 1607
removal of LGBT military service ban 1055
same-sex marriage 1004-1008 1005
sex reassignment surgery 1431 1432 1433
tongzhi identities 1604-1605
tongzhi literature 1609-1613 1611 1613
tourism development 1438
transgender organizations 1606-1607 1630-1634
zhongxing phenomenon 1745-1750 1748

Taiwan Alliance to Promote Civil Partnership Rights (TAPCPR) 1005-1006
Taiwan LGBT Family Rights Advocacy 1005
Taiwan TG Dieyuan 1606
Taiwan Tongzhi Hotline Association 1633
Taiwan Xingbei Buming Guanhuai Xiehui (Beyond Gender) 1607
Taj al-Muluk (fictional character) 1208 1211
Tajdin, Amirah 339
Takács, Mária 104
Takahashi, Yoichi 264
Takashi, Ōtsuka 1104
Take My Tool (Le Mans) 1265
Takemiya, Keiko 263
Taking Up Too Much Space (blog) 360
Talbis iblis (al-Jawzi) 1558
“Tale of Kamar al-Zaman” (short story) 1595
Tales of the City (miniseries) 252 1312
Tallis, Vicci 696 697
Talmey, Bernard S. 1640
Tam, Roman (Luo Wen) 1747

Tamale, Sylvia
   activism 322 1685
   African feminism 537
   kuchu communities 907
   missionary religions 62

Tambor, Jeffrey 1377

Tambour-Babel (Pépin) 977

Tamid oto chalom (film) 1377

Tan, Chris K. K. 468

Tan, Eng Hong 1423

Tan, Jia 489-490

Tan, Roy 469

Tandon, Yash 1133

Tang dynasty (China) 1746

Tangerine Community Health Center 873

Tansi, Sony Labou 966

Tant, as term 1320

Tantes, as term 895

Tanzania
   asylum seeking 1343
   persecution of transgender people 1614 1616
   Section 377 legacies 1420 1421

Taormino, Tristan 1475

TAPCPR (Taiwan Alliance to Promote Civil Partnership Rights) 1005-1006

Tara Ryst (drag performer) 481

Tarf, as term 1320
Tarafeh, as term 1320
Taraud, Christelle 1462
Tariq, Shahzina 1426 1629 1629
Tarnovskii, V. M. 1504
Tashabboh (cross-dressing) 1635
A Taste of Honey (film) 1482
A Taste of Honey (play) 1577
Tata, Mohammed 1151
Tatchell, Peter 593 626 1552
Tate Britain (museum) 1104
tatiana de la tierra 864 1567-1569 1568
t.A.T.u. (pop artist) 1259
Tausig, Ben 1572
Tava (graffiti artist) 619
Tavares, José Carlos 626
Tavilan (Destiny) 1084
Taxonomy of homosexual types 895
Tayf al-khayal (Ibn Daniyal) 748 750
Tayfur, Ibn Abi Tahir 1094
Taylor, Diana 462-463 652
Taylor, Gary 520
Taylor, Valerie 1303
Tayyib, Majdy al- 151
TB (tomboy) 1604
TBG (tomboy girl) 1604
Tcherkézoff, Serge 1191
Tchiroma, Issa 288
Te Puranga Takatapui o Aotearoa (LAGANZ) 102
Tea and Sympathy (play) 1574
TEAM (Hong Kong Transgender Equality and Acceptance Movement) 1606 1632
Tearoom Trade (Humphreys) 430 Teenagers See Youths
Teh, Yik Koon 1433 1628
Teik, Pang Khee See Pang Khee Teik
El Teje: Primer Periódico Travesti Latinoamericano (newspaper) 107 1654-1655
Tel Aviv Love Parade 999
Tel Aviv Pride Parade 1245 1246-1247
La Telaraña (web platform) 1569
Teleny; or, The Reverse of the Medal (unknown) 894 Television shows
  K-pop influenced 1570 1572
  new media role 1144 1145
  queer domesticity depictions 1312
  sexual revolution themes 1482
  situational homosexuality 1506
  South Africa 1529-1530
  zhongxing themes 1748
See also specific shows

“Tell the Sun Not to Shine” (short story) 956
Téllez, Dora María 1148 1149 1150
Tellier, André 1304
“Telling Stories” (short story) 956
Temer, Michel 1141
The Temple of the Golden Pavilion (Mishima) 1070

Tendencies (Sedgwick) 1323

Tenducci, Giusto 518

Tentative Transgressions: Homosexuality, AIDS, and the Theater in Brazil (Albuquerque) 1578

Tenth Muse See Sappho Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz

Tenzin Mariko 1598

Terman, Lewis M. 226-227

Terminology See Language

La terra trema (film) 1322

Terrence Higgins Trust 710

Terrorism, in pornoterrismo 1274

Terrorist Assemblages (Puar) 584

Tesro lingi, as term 1471

Tessmann, Günter 288 1736

Testicles
  castration practices 1217 1219-1220
  penis vs. 1214-1215 removal of, in trans women 1219

Testo Junkie (Preciado) 1276

Testosterone therapy 1219

Texas, Lawrence v. (US; 2003) 892 1512 1516-1517

TFAM (Fellowship of Affirming Ministries) 326

TG (transgender), as term 1195

TGA (Toronto Gay Action) 1720 1721 1722

TGR (Hong Kong Transgender Resource Center) 1632-1633
Thai K-pop 872 1570-1573 1571

Thai Queer Resource Center 100

Thai Rainbow Archive 100

Thai Transgender Alliance (Khreuakhai Pheuan Kathoey Thai) 869

Thailand

Asia Pacific Transgender Network (APTN) 142-148 144

gay liberation activism 873 1704

gender expression legal protections 1441

gender identity 454

HIV/AIDS 728 731

homosexual argots 899-900

K-pop 1570-1573 1571

koro outbreaks 1214

ladyboy culture 1382

new media popularity 1142 1143 1144 1145

orchietomy practices 1219-1220

PLU term 1222

pornography and erotica development 1270 1271

pride events 1282

removal of LGBT military service ban 1055

resort areas 1382

same-sex relations 529-530 788

sex reassignment surgery 1431 1433

sex tourism 1438 1439 1441

surgical transitions 1220

urban queerness 1691 1692

See also Kathoey

Tharifa, as term 1320

Tharu people 1563

Thatcher, Margaret 1133

Theater, gay 1573 1574

Theater of the Ridiculous 1576

Theater, queer 1573-1580 1575 1577 1746 See also specific works

Theis, Wolfgang 104
Themba, Can 956

“Theodora: A Fragment” (Cross) 29

Theodora (desert mother) 1355

Theology, queer 1632-1633

Theophilus (bishop of Alexandria) 1354

Theron, Liesl 961 1136 1617

Thieving Sugar: Eroticism between Women in Caribbean Literature (Tinsley) 973 976-977

Thiele, Hertha 983-985 984

The Thing around Your Neck (Adichie) 957

“Thinking Back Lesbian” (poem) 366

“Thinking Sex” (essay) 1327

Thiong’o, Ngugi wa 877

Third-country resettlement 1348-1349

Das 3. Geschlecht (magazine) 1235

A Third Gender: Beautiful Youths in Japanese Prints (exhibit) 1105

Third genders 1581-1589

  in the Americas 1582-1585 1583
  Andean region 1097-1098
  Asia 1431 1470-1471
  Asian and African countries 1585-1587 1586
  biological essentialism 224-229 controversy over term 1587 gays and lesbians as 984
  historical definitions 671-675 history of term 1581-1582 jimbandaa 1508
  kathoey term 869-874
  Latin American positivism 551-552
  legal recognition of, in Asia 1471 Moche pottery depiction 1078-1079 1080
  muxes 1108-1113 1111
Nepal 1562-1566
Pakistan 1196-1197
Tibet 1597-1598
transgender vs. 1629
See also Berdaches Hijras Two-spirit

The Third Part of the Institutes of the Laws of England: Concerning High Treason (Coke) 1659

Thirteen Cents (Duiker) 959 1463

39, rue de Berne (Lobe) 968 970

This Alien Legacy: The Origins of “Sodomy” Laws in British Colonialism (Human Rights Watch) 875

This Bridge Called My Back (Anzaldúa and Moraga, eds.) 864 1327 1568

This Is Not Dark Life (Krishan) 131-132 131

This Man Is My Brother (Brinig) 1376

This Sex Which Is Not One (Irigaray) 1327

Thistlethwaite, Polly 116

Thokri, as term 1320

Thom, William J. 891

Thomas Aquinas 1495

Thomas, Brandon 1624

Thomas/Thomasine Hall court case (1629) 1589-1592

Thomas, Wesley 1583

Thompson, Emma 1310

Thongchai, Bird 1572

Thoreson, Ryan 65 237

Thornton, John K. 1614

Thorpe, Jeremy 1414
Thorstad, David 1551

_The Thousand and One Nights_ (Lane) 1592

_A Thousand and One Nights_ (Middle Eastern story collection) 509 1592-1597 See also Pasolini’s cinematic adaptation of _A Thousand and One Nights_

_Three Essays on the Theory of Sexuality_ (Freud) 226 425 1595

Three Seals Law (1805) (Thailand) 871

Thurman, Wallace 639 642

Tian, Han 1728

Tian Yong (pseudonym) 1599

Tibet 1597-1601 1599

Tibira (Brazilian man) 1356 1361

TIERS (Initiative for Equal Rights) 339 537

Tietmeyer, Elisabeth 1017

Tifāshī, Ah·mad ibn Yūsuf al- 1157-1160

Tiffin, Helen 974

Tijerina Revilla, Anita 864

_Tilka alra’iha_ (Ibrahim) 1491

Tillery, Linda 946

Tilley, Brian 336

Tilley, Vesta 1579

Timbo, Jholerina 1116

_Time Binds_ (Freeman) 1331

_Time of Our Darkness_ (Gray) 958

Time, queer 1331

_Time to Love_ (film) 1638
The Times of Harvey Milk (Epstein) 545
Times Square Red, Times Square Blue (Delany) 430
Tinder (phone app) 1229 1230
Tinkuy, as term 1078
Tinsley, Omise’eke Natasha 972 973 976-977 1651 1657
Tipton, Billy 1259
Tirado, Katia 1226-1227
Titica (musician) 38-39 1615
Title VII, Civil Rights Act of 1964 892
TLF Sexuality, Health, and Rights Educators Collective 729
TLUSA (Trail Life USA) 1418
To Love, to Obey, to Serve: Diary of an Old Guard Slave (Johnson) 214
Tobias, Sara 1650 1652
Tocco, Jack Ume 377
Todo el mundo tiene a alguien menos yo (film) 357
Todo sobre mi madre (film) 684
Tóibín, Colm 375
The Toilet (play) 1577
Tokyo Babylon (CLAMP) 266
Tokyo Rainbow Pride Parade (2014) 1283
Tolasa, Harun 949
Tolerance category, LGBT Military Index 1055
Tom (butch lesbians) (Thailand) 869-873 899 1571 1572
Tom of Finland 609 1601-1603 1601
Tom of Finland Foundation 1602
Tomboi, as term 1628

Tomboys
- China 1746
- Tahiti 1191
- Thailand 871 899

Tonga
- fakaleitis 1187 1189 1585
- language used by 901
- Miss Galaxy Pageant 1190
- Section 377 legacies 1420
- transgender people 1188 1191

Tongues Untied (Riggs) 545 737 738

Tongxing lian
- as term 1603 1604 1606
- tongzhi as replacement for 1610

Tongxing'ai, as term 1603

Tongxinglian literature, as term 1610

Tongxinglian Qinyou Hui (Parents and Friends of Lesbians and Gays) 1606

Tongyu 362

Tongzhi 1603-1609
- coming home 376
- piao piao vs. 898
- as term 1090

Tongzhi literature, Taiwan 1609-1613 1611 1613

Tonini, Maria 730 732

Tonoy, Mahbub Rabbi 1390 1392

Toonen, Nicholas 167

Toonen v. Australia (United Nations Human Rights Committee; 1994) 167 1421

Top-bottom dynamics, in Asian gay pornography 1266 1269 1271

Topkapi Palace Museum 1182 1184 1185
Torch Song Trilogy (film) 1376-1377

Torch Song Trilogy (play) 1576

Tornovoi, Vladislav 1402

Toronto, Canada
  archival records 113 114 240
  bathhouse raids 202-207 203 298 431 1723
  pinkwashing concerns 1247
See also The Body Politic (newspaper)

Toronto Gay Action (TGA) 1720 1721 1722

Torrealba, María José 348

Torres, Diana J. 1227 1274 1276 1277

Torres, Justin 1298-1299

Torres, Lourdes 916 1657

Torrès, Tereska 1302

Tortilleras, as term 916

Tortorici, Zeb 1315 1497 1509

Törvényen kívül és belül (Galgóczi) 493

TOSOS (gay theater company) 1576

Totò (actor) 1322

Touré, Nakhane 38 39

Tourism, LGBTQI-oriented
  Asia 1439-1440 1441-1442 1705-1706 commodification of pride events and 1284
  French Polynesia 1190-1191
  Lebanon 1176 1453
  Middle East 1644-1649
  North Africa 988 1464
  resorts 1379-1383
  as ritual of pilgrimage 1388 spreading of language and 911
  Tangier 986-987
Turkish baths 1669
urban queerness and 1692
See also Medical tourism Sex tourism

“Toward a Queer Ecofeminism” (Gaard) 487
Towle, Evan B. 1384 1386 1587
Townleton, John 1082
Townshend, Pete 1256
Township AIDS Project 1156 1157
TQUILA (The Queer Insurrection and Liberation Army) 845
Track and field, African women’s participation 1543
Traditional Chinese medicine 1026 1028 1170
“The Traffic in Boys” (Rowson) 616
Trafficking See Human trafficking Sex trafficking
Traffic in Persons Report (US State Department) 1459
La trahison de Marianne (Nanga) 965
Trail Life USA (TLUSA) 1418
Tramping with Tramps (Flynt) 1504
Tran, Richard Quang-Anh 1706
Tranny Fest 547
Tranny porn 1266
Trans, as term 1650
Trans-Gender Archive (University of Ulster) 116

Trans issues in Africa 1614-1619 1617
archival records 93-94
Cape Town 299-301
Côte d'Ivoire 422-424
legal reforms 12-13
Trans masc people 869

Trans men overlap with butch lesbian women 1547 penis considerations 1219-1220
  Thailand 872

Trans Murder Monitoring Project 122 1047-1048

Trans October events 1620

Trans of color feminism, as term 1622

Trans pride events 1283

Trans-sexuality in Iran (news episode) 1626

Trans Siempre Amigas (Trans Always Friends) 1652

Trans: Transgender Life Stories from South Africa (Morgan et al., eds.) 961 Trans women

  kathoey 869-874
  ladyboy culture 1382
  lesbian land conflicts 935-936
  penis considerations 1219-1220
  seafarers from the UK 1067 tension with lesbian separatists 946
  Thailand 872

TransCreations 1130

Transfeminicide, in Latin America 599-600 602 604

Transfeminism 1618 1619-1623

“Transfeminist Manifesto” (Koyama) 1620

Transformista, as term 1650

Transgender Archives (University of Victoria) 116

Transgender Education and Advocacy (Kenya) 877 1618

Transgender Equality Uganda 1618

Transgender Europe 122 601
Transgender Health Handbook (Kang) 143

Transgender History (Stryker) 662

Transgender identity in Iranian cinema 1623-1627 1624 1636

Transgender, Intersex, and Transsexuals Uganda 1618

Transgender Liberation (pamphlet) 1546

Transgender Muslims 474-478 1627-1630 1629

Transgender organizations
- Africa 1616 1617-1618
- Ecuador 1620
- Iran 1638
- Latin America and the Caribbean 1651-1654
- transfeminism advocacy 1620-1622

Transgender organizations in mainland China, Hong Kong, and Taiwan 1606-1607 1630-1634

Transgender people
- Africa 1335 1336 1614-1619 1617
- African queer life writings 961-962
- African queer literature depiction 966-970
- Arabic terms for 1320
- Argentina 1290
- Asia 1470-1471
- asylum seeking 1050 1343
- Canada 1200
- Caribbean 1650
- Compton's Cafeteria riot 403-406
- Cuba 436 1445-1446
- identification document changes 1085 1141
- India 668-670 1130
- Iran 1368 1434-1437 1625-1627 1630 1634-1640 1636
- Jewish, in popular culture 1377
- Judaism views 1372 1373
- Kenya 875 1336
- Kuwait 1319
- lack of, in Caribbean queer literature 979
- language used by 901
- Latin America 1498-1499
- lesbian relationships 258
- Malaysian queer cinema depiction 992
Mexican Revolution impact on gender norms 1037
Mexico 1109-1110
Middle East 474-478
military service in the United States 1063-1064
museum exhibits 1105
neoliberal economic policy effects in Latin America 1140 1141
orgasm considerations 1171
Orientalism in pornography for 1174
Pacific Island and Pacific Island diasporas 1187-1191 1189 1190
Pakistan 1195 1196 1197
pathologization of 1620
photographic portrayals, in Europe 1235
pop artists 1259-1260
pornography and erotica portrayals 1266 1267 1272
pride events 1615
protections in some Islamic countries 1368 reconditioning therapy 1169
ritual practices 1388
Samoan fa'afafine 1189-1190 1191 1408-1410
Scouting participation 1417 1418
sex worker organizations 1449-1450 1460
sex workers 1464
South Asia 1470-1471
Southern Comfort Conference 1531-1534 1532
sports involvement 1540
Stone Butch Blues depiction 1547-1548
Stonewall Riots importance 1550
sub-Saharan Africa 12-13
Taiwan 1607
Thailand 872
third genders vs. 1587
tongzhi identities 1606-1607
Tunisia 878
United Kingdom military service 1068
United States military service 1057
violence against 1047-1048
W v. Registrar of Marriages case 1601 1713-1717 1715
waria 1089 1628 1717-1720 1718
See also Sex reassignment surgery (SRS) specific people

Transgender studies emergence of field 1470 queer theory and 1328-1329 1335

Transgender Studies Quarterly (journal) 1328
Transgendered subjectivities in contemporary Iran 1634-1640

TransLatin@ Coalition

Translatina (film)

Translocas, as term

Transsexual in Iran (film)

The Transsexual Phenomenon (Benjamin)

Transsexual (Trans Female) Association of Thailand

Transsexuales por el Derecho a la Vida y la Identidad (TRANSDEVI)

Transsexuals, as term

Transvestites/transsexuals 1640-1644

Die Transvestiten (Hirschfeld)

Transvestism See Cross-dressing
Caribbean 362 858
Carnival 303-305 303
cross-dressing in West 424-428 479 502-505 503 639-640
Europe 318-319 319 500-502 501 502-505 503 793-794 history in medicine 358 454-455 500-502 575-577 576
HIV/AIDS activism 720
HIV/AIDS risk populations 684-685 696 698
immigration issues 764
Latin America 118-120 183-187 184 285-286 285 303-305 303 352 412 502-505
503 839 864
scientific research 227 824-826 split in West 425-426
violence against 601-602
virtual networks 465-466
See also Cross-dressing Transgender people

Transvida 1652

TransWave 858 1651 1652

Trapence, Gift 15 729

Traub, Valerie 373 378

Travel/travelogues on the Middle East 1644-1649

Travesti and trans activism in Latin America and the Caribbean 1649-1658 1650 1653
antiviolence activism 1652-1653
Argentina 120-122
Brazil 282-283 303-305 303 628-630 1447
Cabo Verde 285-286 285
definitions and terms 1649-1651
documentation of 1656-1657 health-related activism 1653-1655
jotería studies 866
legal activism 1651-1652
Museo Travesti del Perú 107 1097-1101 1097 1103 1226 social activism 1655-1656
travesti term 1650
virtual networks 465-466

Travesti: Sex, Gender, and Culture among Brazilian Transgendered Prostitutes (Kulick) 914

Travestura (transvestism) 1650 See also Cross-dressing
Treason and queerness 237-238 237 1658-1663 1660 1662

Treat, John Whittier 1245

Treatment Action Campaign (TAC)
activism 3 7 9 300 694-695 697-698
founding 300 694
success of 1530

Treatment Action Group (TAG) 6 7

Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union 1012

Trebol (Clover) 1449

Treichler, Paula 682 704

* Trembling before G-d* (film) 1373

Trengove, John 1528-1529

Los tres berretines (film) 349

Trespass (Gupta) 128

Tretter, Jean-Nickolaus 116

Trevor-Roper, Patrick 1741

Trexler, Richard 1584 1585

Triangle Project 698

Triángulo Andino 772

Tribadism, as term 1410

Trikone (Enlightenment and Balance) 100 1042

Trilateral Commission 1138

Trilogy of Life (film series) 1204 1205 1210

La trinité bantoue (Lobe) 970

Tripathi, Laxmi Narayan 146

Tripiitaka (religious text) 870-871
Triple jeopardy of LGBTQI refugees 1345 1351
Tron, Fabiana 467
Tropical Malady (film) 1399
Tropicana, Carmelita 1568
Troubridge, Una 258 1167
Trouillot, Evelyne 978 979
Trova (song type) 1698
Troyano, Alina 653
Trudeau, Pierre 295 296 1720 1721 1742
True Confessions (magazine) 1505
Trujillo, Carla 601 864
Truman, Harry S. 922
Trump, Donald
HIV/AIDS 742
immigration policies 1345 1350 military service policies 893 1064
pinkwashing 1244-1245
protests against 996
queer migrant political action in response to election 1043 travel policies 1536
Truth and Reconciliation Commission (Peru) 1098
Truvada See antiretroviral therapies (ARTs)
Tsai, Yung-mei 897
Tsang, Daniel 932-933
Tsarouchis, Yannis 308
Tsedevdamba, Oyungerel 1084
Tshabalala-Msimang, Manto 697
Tsiolkas, Christos 175
TSQ: Transgender Studies Quarterly (periodical) 662 1622

Tsvangirai, Morgan 1752

Tu t’appelleras Tanga (Beyala) 967 970

Tuan-hsiu-pien (Chinese text) 1262

Tugbiyele, Adejoke 1134

Tuke, Henry 32

Tungalag Tamir (Chadraabal) 1085

Tunisia
   Khookha McQueer 878-881
   sex tourism 1464
   sexual minorities 878
   tourism 988

Tuqus al-isharat wa-al-tahawwulat (play) 1663-1667 1754

Turing, Alan
   chemical castration 1217
   gross indecency charge and death 85 86 1127
   queer theory influenced by 1329

Turkey
   asylum seeking 1348
   gay refugee 1047
   language 362
   LGBT Military Index score 1055
   LGBTQ migration attempts 1051
   LGBTQI refugees 1347 1534-1536
   Persian miniature paintings 1181-1186 1183 1185 1668
   pride events 1282 1285
   queer slang 912
   same-sex literary discourses 948-952 950 temporary protections for refugees 1048 transgender singers 1096

Turkey, Kaos GL v. (European Court of Human Rights; 2016) 797

Turkey, X. v. (European Court of Human Rights; 2012) 792

Turkish baths 1667-1669 1668
Turner, Victor 63 1383
Turville-Petre, Francis 825
Tut, as term 1571
“Tutti Frutti” (song) 1255
Tutu, Desmond 320 325
Twells, Edward 320
28s (gang) 579
Twilight Men (Tellier) 1304
2 Boys, 2 Girls and a Beat-Up Car (film) 992
“Two Loves” (poem) 372
Two Men in Banaras (Khakhar) 124
Two-spirit 1669-1676 1670 1674
  colonialism effects 1670-1671 indigenous activism 1671-1673 luminaries 1673-1674 meanings of term 1669
  origin of term 1672
  precolonization 1669-1670
  rituals and 1384-1385
  rural queer communities 1395
  third gender vs. 1583-1584

Two-Spirit People: Native American Gender Identity, Sexuality, and Spirituality (Jacobs et al., eds.) 1583-1584

Two-Spirit Society 1583
Tyler, Robin 944
Tyos, John 1590 1591
Työväen Arkisto (Labor Archive) 105
Tyson, Tiger 1266
Tystnaden (film) 1481
U

Ubuntu 1677-1681 1684

UCAA (United Coalition of Affirming Africans) 326

Uchovsky, Gal 1377

Uchu senkan Yamato (anime) 264

UFA (Unión Feminista Argentina) 571

Uganda 1681-1687
  activism 10 907 908 1684-1685
  AIDS medication access 692
  anti-gay legislation 10 238 322 328
  asylum seeking 1041 1343 1348 1349
  backlash against LGBTQ rights 1348
  Christianity and same-sex acts 1356 1360 1361 cinema as activism 334-335 337
  criminalization of homosexuality 701 907 1343 1349 1618 1683-1684 fluid understandings of gender 1047
  HIV/AIDS 700-702
  homonationalism debate 753-754
  kuchu communities 907 908 1336
  neoliberal economic policy effects 1134
  pride events 1282 1335
  queer migration to Europe 1048
  Section 377 legacies 1420 1421
  trans issues 1616 1618
  women’s sports involvement 1543

Uganda Health and Science Press Association (UHSPA) 701 702

The Ugly Law (1961–1965) (Denmark) 1687-1688

UHAI (East African Sexual Rights Initiative) 37

Ukah, Asonzeh 1152

UKLGIG (United Kingdom Lesbian and Gay Immigration Group) 1348 1350

Ukraine
  discrimination against LGBTQ people 1374
restrictions on same-sex marriage 1013

Ulrich, Otto 993

Ulrichs, Karl Heinrich activism of 1640
gender inversion 454
Hall, Radclyffe influenced by 1725
LGBTQ rights activism 81
philosophy 225 675
Sacred Band of Thebes inspirations 1408
sexuality studies 1168 1291
themes 358
Uranians term 1581
Urnings term 1470

El último verano de la Boyita (film) 355-356 355

Ultra-orthodox Judaism 1372

Ulwaluko (ritual circumcision) 1528-1529

Ulysses (Joyce) 82

Um homem gasto (Leal) 245

UMAPs (Unidades Militares de Ayuda a la Producción) 435-436

Umberto D. (film) 1322

Umpierre, Luz María 1568

UN High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) 765

UNAIDS (United Nations Programme on HIV/AIDS) infected rates 684
MSM (men who have sex with men) risks 1089 1091
Titica appointment 1615
World AIDS Day 679 680

Uncle Gloria: One Helluva Ride (film) 1533

Unda, Emilia 983

“Under My Thumb” (song) 944

Under the Udala Trees (Okparanta) 958
Undercover Dragon (alias) 831

Understanding Asexuality (Bogaert) 138

Undestnii Toim (magazine) 1085

Uneins mit AIDS: Wie über einen Virus nachgedacht und geredet wird (Düttmann) 711

The Unfinished Portrait (film) 1106

UNHCR See United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR)

UNHCR Guidance Note on Refugee Claims Relating to Sexual Orientation and Gender Identity 1347 1348 1350

Unheroic Conduct: The Rise of Homosexuality and the Invention of the Jewish Man (Boyarin) 498

Unidades Militares de Ayuda a la Producción (UMAPs) 435-436

Uniform Code of Military Justice (United States; 1951) 1059 1060

Unión Feminista Argentina (UFA) 570 571

Union of India and Another, Puttaswamy and Another v. (India; 2017) 765

Union of India, National Legal Services Authority (NALSA) v. (India; 2013) 669

United Arab Emirates, travel and travelogues 1646-1647

United Church of Christ 1359

United Coalition of Affirming Africans (UCAA) 326

United Fruit 314

United Kingdom

advocacy for LGBTQI refugees 1348
African refugees in 1344
anti-racist movement 73
Case of the Missing Diplomats 1661
Cleveland Street scandal 1122
collection of LGBTQ refugee statistics 1049 colonial governance 386 811-812
criminalization of homosexuality 875 877 907 1046-1047 1066 1068
cruising 429
decriminalization of homosexuality 1104 1163 1421 1481 1662 1742
Egypt colonization 1754
eugenics movement 1122
gender identity law 120
geography of homosexuality 895
government scandals involving same-sex relationships 1413-1414
HIV/AIDS approaches 710-711
homophobic behaviorist therapy 1169
homosexual/queer argots 896 911-912 911t Hong Kong colonization 1714
interactions with Iran 1493
Islamic LGBTQI activism 1367
Jewish population 1373
LGBTQ rights law 792 military service of LGBTQ people 1066-1069
museum exhibits 1105
National Trust 1106
nationalist masculinity 1120 1121
neo-Druids 1028
nineteenth-century pornography 1263
Offences Against the Person Act 84-85 1161-1165 1419
Pacific Islands colonization 1189
persecution of homosexuals 924
photography practices 1235
popular music and queer identities 1255-1256
pornography and erotica development 1264 1265
pride events 1279 1280 1282 1399 1552
Profumo affair 1662
QT v. Hong Kong Immigration Department case 1307-1308
refugees and immigration policies 1050 1349 1350-1351
rural queer communities 1396-1397 1398-1399
Sacred Band of Thebes inspirations 1407
same-sex marriage 764 1742
Scouting activities 1415-1416
Section 28 amendment 1401 1402
sex education in schools 1477
sexology development 1466
situational homosexuality 1504
sodomy and buggery laws 84-86 85 236-237
South Africa colonization 1524
Stonewall Riots impact 1552-1553
theater, queer 1573-1580 1575
transfeminism 1622
treason associated with sodomy 1661
urban queerness 1690-1691
Zimbabwe colonization 1751

See also Section 377 and Section 377A Section 377 in South Asia Sexual Offences Act (1967) (UK) Wilde, Oscar The Wolfenden Report

United Kingdom, Beck, Copp and Bazeley v. (European Court of Human Rights; 2003) 797

United Kingdom, Christine Goodwin v. (European Court of Human Rights; 2002) 793 798

United Kingdom, Cossey v. (European Court of Human Rights; 1990) 793

United Kingdom, Dudgeon v. (European Court of Human Rights; 1981) 791 1163

United Kingdom, Grant v. (European Court of Human Rights; 2006) 793-794

United Kingdom, J. M. v. (European Court of Human Rights; 2010) 796-797

United Kingdom Lesbian and Gay Immigration Group (UKLGIG) 1348 1350

United Kingdom, Lustig-Prean and Beckett v. (European Court of Human Rights; 2000) 797 1068

United Kingdom, Parry v. (European Court of Human Rights; 2006) 793

United Kingdom, Perkins and R. v. (European Court of Human Rights; 2003) 797

United Kingdom, R. and F. v. (European Court of Human Rights; 2006) 793

United Kingdom, Rees v. (European Court of Human Rights; 1986) 793

United Kingdom, Sheffield and Horsham v. (European Court of Human Rights; 1998) 793

United Kingdom, Smith and Grady v. (European Court of Human Rights; 1999) 797 1068

United Kingdom, Sutherland v. (UK; 1994) 792

United Nations Convention on Refugees (1951) 1342 1343 1346 1347

United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child (UNCRC) 21

United Nations Development Fund for Women 111
United Nations Development Programme 111

United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR)
  African refugees 1342 1343 1344 1346
  asylum for LGBTQI refugees 1347
  international human rights lobbying of 1348 rejection of discretion reasoning 1050
  Russian campaign for traditional values 1403 sexual and gender asylum 765 third-country resettlement policies 1349

United Nations Human Rights Council 1055

United Nations Human Rights Council’s SOGIE violence resolution (Resolution 17/19) 36 760

United Nations Protection against Violence and Discrimination Based on Sexual Orientation and Gender Identity Resolution 1527

United Nations World Tourism Organization (UNWTO) 1441

United States
  adoption and surrogacy 20-24
  advocacy for LGBTQI refugees 1347 1348
  African refugees in 1344
  archival records 113-118
  Boys Love manga 266
  British colonial sodomy laws 1162-1163
  calls for migration reform 1345
  circumcision opposition 1218
  circumcision practices 1217-1218
  the closet 373-376
  coverage of Oscar Wilde trials 1733-1734
  criminalization of homosexuality 1512-1513
  cruising 429-430
  decriminalization of homosexuality 1512 1513-1517 1662
  eugenics movement 1122
  gay liberation activism 1704-1705
  homophobic behaviorist therapy 1169
  Islamic LGBTQI activism 1367
  Jewish population 1373
  koro outbreaks 1214
  LGBTQ rights movement 1200-1201 1513-1517 1642 1704-1705 migrant queer communities 1039-1045 1041 obscenity regulation 1263
Pacific Islands colonization 1189
parenting rights 1199-1204 1202
phone apps 1229
pink triangle symbol 1241
pinkwashing concerns 1244-1245 1247 political and medical development of gender identity issues 1642-1643 popular music and queer identities 1255-1256
pornography and erotica development 1264 1265
queer theory development 1327-1328
refugees and immigration policies 1349-1350
ritual practices 1385-1386
rural queer communities 1393-1396 1394 1397 1398
same-sex marriage 1192
self-affirming Christian LGBTQ movement 1361
sex education in schools 1477
sexual revolution 1483-1486 1485
situational homosexuality 1503-1504
sodomy laws 87-88 812 1512-1518 1516
theater, queer 1573-1580 1577
third sex/gender categories 1582-1584 1583
tongzhi literature depictions 1612
transfeminism development 1620 1622
treason associated with sodomy 1661 1662
urban queerness 276 403-406 587-590 639-640 1691
Vietnam War-era masculinity and feminity expression 1702

See also HIV/AIDS in the United States Military law and policy in the United States Native Americans

United States Department of Defense 1059

United States Department of State 1459

United States, Roth v. (US; 1957) 1484

United States v. Morrison (US; 2000) 647

United States v. Windsor (US; 2013) 450 451 764

Universal Fellowship of Metropolitan Community Churches 1357

Universal periodic review (UPR) process 1088

Universities and colleges See Higher education University Collective of Sexual Dissidence See Colectivo Universitario de Disidencia Sexual (CUDS)

University of Buenos Aires 1289
University of London 1330
University of New Hampshire 891
University of Toronto Homophile Association (UTHA) 1720 1721
University of Victoria 1328
Unspeakable Love (Whitaker) 1310
Unspoken Rules (IGLHRC) 772
Unstraight Museum 1103
Untrodden Fields of Anthropology (Jacobus X) 509 815
UNWTO (United Nations World Tourism Organization) 1441
Unyago (female initiation) 852
UPR (universal periodic review) process 1088
Ur kärlekens språk (film) 1265
Uranians, as term 1581
Uranisme et unisexualité: Étude sur différentes manifestations de l'instinct sexuel (Raffalovich) 225 1733
Uranista, as term 552

Urban queerness 1688-1694 1690
    Africa 345-346 389
    Europe 196-198 197 276 606-612
    gentrification 606-612
    Harlem Renaissance 638-643 639 641
    Latin America 199-202 200 modern times 373-374
    pornography 276
    rural queer communities vs. 1393-1394
    United States 276 403-406 587-590 639-640
    urban renewal effects 403-404
See also specific cities

Urethra, sounding of 1215

Urgent Action (organization) 537

Uribe, Álvaro 1139

Ur ninde figure 1393

Urning, as term 225 454 1470 1659

Urquizo, Francisco L. 186

Uruguay
  civil unions 1450
  gender identity law 120
  LGBTQ rights movement 769 772 1500
  masculinity and sports 1537
  same-sex marriage 1002 1003 1140
  travesti and trans activism 1652

L’usage des plaisirs (Foucault) 568

“Uses of Camp” (Ross) 290 291

Usina posporno (Milano) 1276

Ustra, Carlos Alberto Brilhante 380

UTHA (University of Toronto Homophile Association) 1720 1721

Uuriin tuya (Rinchen) 1085

Uyangithandana (television series) 1530

V

Vaal uprising (1984) (South Africa) 1156

Vagina
  orgasms and 1170-1171 1467
  secretion of fluid during orgasm 1168-1169
  surgical creation of 1219 1642

The Vagina Monologues (Ensler) 603
Vagrancy Act of 1898 (UK) 1163
Vaid, Mobeen 1368
Vaincre Le Sida (community group) 711
Valderrama, Azael 1276
Valdivia, Luis de 408
Valencia, Sayak 1621
Valentine, David 1213 1329
Valentine, Gill 1396 1397
Valerio, Michael 213
Vallejo, Fernando 351
Vallette-Eymery, Marguerite (Rachilde, pseudonym) 31
Vallianatos v. Greece (European Court of Human Rights; 2013) 795 1011
Valverde, Mariana 204
VAMP (Veshya Anyay Mukti Parishad) 1460
El vampiro de la colonia Roma (Zapata) 1695-1697 1696
Van Buren, Abigail 1475
Van der Lubbe, Marinus 1126
van der Merwe, André Carl 899
Van Gelder, Geert Jan 1094
van Gennep, Arnold 1383 van Kempen, Wink 1274
van Klinken, Adriaan S. 1735
van Riebeeck, Jan 1524
Vanguard (American magazine) 404
Vanguard (youth organization) 404
Vanguard (Vietnamese magazine) 133-134

Vanita, Ruth 530

Vanzan, Anna 1627

Vargas, Chavela 1698-1701

Varshney, Ashutosh 732

Vasconcelos, Julia 1540

Vasconcelos, Tito 1223

Vassall, (William) John 1662

Vaughan, Thomas 236

VAWA (Violence Against Women Act) 646-647

Veil of Silence (film) 334

Velandia Mora, Manuel 767

Velas (festivals) 1110-1111

Velluti, Giovanni 518

Venda people 1015

Venezuela
  constitutional reforms 1139
  LGBTQ rights activism 721
  performance artists in 1228

Venus Urania (Ramdohr) 365

Veracruz, Mexico, sex tourism 1447

Vergara, Ximena 348

Verismo tradition 1321

Verité (Zola) 76

Verlaine, Paul 31
Verniolles, Arnaud de 83-84

_Die Verschwulung der Welt_ (Helfer) 178

_Versorgungsanstalt der deutschen Bühnen, Maruko v._ (European Court of Justice; 2008) 798

Veruska (artist) 625

Vesalius, Andreas 1213

Veshya Anyay Mukti Parishad (VAMP) 1460

_Vésper_ (newspaper) 1038 1039

Veterans
  [Iran] 1021-1022
  [Vietnam War] 1708-1710 1708

Veyga, Francisco de 551-552 553

Viado, as term 982

Viagra 1215

Vibrators
  as instrumental penis 1216 1216 orgasm and 1171

Vicinus, Martha 1504

_Victim_ (film) 1482

Victoria Mercado Brigade 313 314

Vidal, Gore 1303

Vidal-Ortiz, Salvador 112

Vidler, Michael 1715

Vieira, Antônio 1508

Vienna Declaration (1993) 763

Vietnam
  attitudes toward LGBTQ population 998
  diffusion of gay liberation 1705-1706
HIV/AIDS 728 730
LGBT military service 1055-1056
LGBTQ rights movement 788
militarism and sexualities in 1054-1057
mythology queered 132-133
new media popularity 1142 1144
same-sex marriage 529
sex tourism 1438
Vietnam War–era masculinity and femininity expression 1703
Vietnam War veterans 1710

Vietnam Moratorium Day (1969) 1704

Vietnam War (1955–1975) 1701-1708 1704
gay liberation movement and 1703-1706 sexuality and defense force service 1702-1703

Vietnam War, LGBTQ+ veterans 1708-1710 1708

Vieyra, Emilio 350
Vigas, Lorenzo 357
Vigelaar, Adam 89
Vignal, Daniel 952 953
Viljoen, Sunette 1545
Villa-Flores, Javier 350
Villa, Francisco (“Pancho”) 1035
Villalobos, Manuel 517
Villanueva, Chea 485
Villanueva-Collado, Alfredo 917
Villarejo, Amy 1331
Villarreal, Antonio I. 1038
Villarreal, Antonio 1035-1038
Villaurrutia, Xavier 1250-1252 1250
Villiers de L'Isle-Adam, Auguste 30-31
Vincent, J. Keith 1070 1179
Violence against LGBTQI people

Africa 35-37 336 338-339 340-341 614 878 1335 1342 1345
Argentina 122 1253 1652
Australasia 169-170
Brazil 1199 1510 1652
Cameroon 1360
Caribbean 1652-1653
Chechnya 315-317
China 1632
Colombia 1652
Egypt 1310
Ghana 614
hate crime law and policy in the United States 644-650 648
Homomonument memorial 1107 Honduras 1652
Iran 1637
ISIS-related 844-847
Latin America 352 355 381 629 725 1652-1653
Malaysia 1628-1629
Mexico 1652
Mongolia 1084-1085
Nazi regime 1239-1240
Nigeria 1150-1551 1152 1153
Peru 1098-1099
pride events and 1284-1285
Pulse Nightclub shooting 1298-1299 1298 as reason for migration 1047-1048 1050-1051
refugees 1534-1536
Russia 1279 1280 1402
sex workers 1450 1456-1457
South Africa 580 1527
Spain 1378
sub-Saharan Africa 10-11 12 13 338-339 340-341 579-580
travesti and trans activism 1652-1653
Tunisia 878
Uganda 1684 1685
United Nations on 36-37 760
Venezuela 1652

See also Gendered violence and feminicide in Latin America Murders of LGBTQ people Sexual violence

Violence Against Women Act (VAWA) 646-647
Violent Crime Control and Law Enforcement Act (1994) 646

The Virgin of Flames (Abani) 957

Virginia, Loving v. (US; 1967) 1485

Virgins, Guerrillas, and Locas: Gay Latino Men Write about Love (Cortez) 864

Ein Virus kennt keine Moral (film) 684

Visconti, Luchino 1322

Visibilidades (cultural space) 941

A Vision of Love Revealed in Sleep (play) 1576

Visual AIDS Artists Caucus 681

Vitorino, Sêrgio 626

Viturro, Paula 1654

Viva Cazuza 1257

Vivien, Renée 1412

Vocabulary See Language

Voces Sin Eco (Voices without Echo) 603

Voeller, Bruce 116

Vogel, Paula 1574 1576

“The voice,” in homosexual argots 897

Voices against Section 377 1130 1427

Voices of Witness Africa (film) 335

Vold, Simonette 87

Voltaire 365

Von Gloeden, Wilhelm 1045

von Krafft-Ebing, Richard See Krafft-Ebing, Richard von

von Mahlsdorf, Charlotte 1710-1712 1711
Vox (organization) 466

Voyage Out 2 (Blackwomon) 485

Voyageurs 1503

Voz en construcción (performance art show) 1227

Vrubel, Dmitri 622

Vykhod (organization) 238

W

Wv. Registrar of Marriages (China; 2013) 787 1606 1713-1717 1715

Waaldijk, Kees 1009

Wade, Otis 1264

Wade, Roe v. (US; 1973) 1485 1515

Wagner, Ewald 746

Wahab, Amar 753

Wahba, Saad el Din 1756

Wahlert, Lance 454-455

Wainaina, Binyavanga 538 876-877 960-961 962

Waite, Brian 298 1721

Waitt, Gordon 1379 1382

Wakashe, Themba 1529

Wakashu, as term 1586

Walcott, Rinaldo 242 972 973

Waldeck, R. G. 924

Waldenberg, Eliezer 1373

“Walk on the Wild Side” (song) 1256
Walk on Water (film) 1377
Walker, Alice 535
Walker, Ann 256
Walker, Willie 115
Walking with Shadows (Dibia) 957-958
Wall Newspaper-West Street at 11th Street (Seccombe) 620
Walonen, Michael K. 987
Walt Whitman Birthplace (museum) 1106
Walter, Aubrey 592
Walther, Daniel J. 385
Wambere, John Abdallah 1686
Wang, Bruno 547
Wang, Di 362
Wang, Sicong 1729
Wanlov the Kubolor 40
Wannous, Sa’dallah 1663-1667 1754
Waqfet banat (Aswat) 154
Ware, John 168
Ware, Syrus Marcus 242-243
Warhol, Andy 1255 1256
Waria 145 1089 1628 1717-1720 1718
Warnekros, Kurt 500 502 1642
Warner, Michael 373 1330 1388 1692
Warner, Noni 902
Warner, Tom 204
Warren Cup 1104 1261

Warriors/Guerrières (Nomades'Langues) 625

Warszawski Ruch Homoseksualny (Warsaw Homosexual Movement) 714

Washington, D.C See Marches on Washington

Washington, George 1057

Wassersug, Richard J. 520

Wasteland (Sinclair) 1376

Al-wat·an wa-al-manfá fi tajribat almutah ·arírrāt jinsīyan (Aswat) 153-154

Wateke-El Jardín Cruz Blanca (Mexico) 201

Waters, Sarah 248

Watkins, Mary 946

Watney, Simon 680 711

Wats, William 1205

Watson, Hilbourne 1657

Watson, Patricia 960

Waugh, Thomas 1264

A Way of Love (Courage) 168

Wayar, Marlene 1654 1655

Wayne, John 1702

“Wazir al-Yaman wa-akhuhu” (short story) 1594

“We Demand” protest (1971) 298 1720-1724

“We Know Who We Are: Two Gay Men Declare War on Promiscuity” (article) 1476

We Live in Fear (film) 336

Weber, Bruce 1601
Weber, Edward C. 116
Weber, Philippe 1293
Webtoons, pornographic 1271
The Wedding Banquet (film) 1004 1609
Wedekind, Frank 1294
Weeding at Dawn (Madrone) 938
Weekend (film) 1398
Weeks, Jeffrey 1466 1552
Weerasethakul, Apichatpong 1399
Wei Wei 898
Weimar Republic (Germany)
  LGBT travelers to 1046
  Mädchen in Uniform depiction 983-985 nationalist criticism of 1124
Weinberger, Caspar 1060
Weininger, Otto 76-77 81
Weinstein, Michael 741
Weismantel, Mary 1078
Weiss, Margot 1388
Weiss, Meredith L. 753
Weiss, Peter 1664
Weisstein, Naomi 944
Wekker, Gloria 1386
Welby, Justin 321
Welcher unter euch ohne Sünde ist (Rüling) 1393
Welcome Europa (film) 1464
WelcomeOUT event 1051

Weldy, Ann 1303

The Well of Loneliness (Hall) 1724-1727 1725 banning of 1264
   controversy over 1414
   Krafft-Ebing, Richard von reference 1294
   rural queer themes 1398
   situational homosexuality 1504

Wenny Mei Li Xin Shi Jie (organization) 1631

Wertheim, Friedrich 824

“The West and the Orientalism of Sexuality” (Pagano) 585

West/East binaries
   African gender categories 595-598 691 903-904
   Bangladesh 1391
   biological essentialism 229
   blackmail 238
   Botswana activism 260 261
   China 420 898
   Christianity and same-sex acts 1359-1361
   collectivism vs. individualism 1706 coming out of the closet 376-377 394-397 780
   complementary and alternative medicine 1026-1028 environmental issues 489-491
   ethnopornography 509
   ethnopsychiatry 511-512
   historical sexes 671-675
   internationalization of Western LGBTQI identity politics 377 396 586 752 777-779 904-906
   Middle Eastern vs. Western activism 56-57 583 779-780 927 1032
   Orientalism in gay pornography and 1176
   Pakistan 1196
   Queen Boat Trials 1309 1310-1311
   queer theory approaches 1330-1332 1334 1335 1336
   Russian gay propaganda law 1400-1401 1403
   sex tourism in Asia 1438
   sexology development 98 1468 1470 1471
   sexual revolution 1480-1481
   Sharaf exploration of 1486-1490
   theater, queer 1579
   travel in the Middle East 1644-1649
Zuqaq al-Midaq exploration 1753

West-Eastern Divan program 177 178

West, Mae 1574

Westermarck, Edward 885

Western Union daddies, as term 1446

Westhale, July 957

Westheimer, Ruth 1475

Weston, Kath 1387 1388 1397

Weston, Mary (Mark) 156

Westphal, Carl Friedrich Otto 425 1291 1640

WeWah and BarCheeAmpe 1671

We’wha (Zuni two-spirit) 1670 1670

Whale, Robert 1082

Wharton, Henry Thornton 1410 1411

What Are You? (Shah) 126

“What Do Gay People Eat” (essay) 991

When Harry Met Sally (film) 1169

“When I Peruse the Conquer’d Fame” (poem) 1407-1408

When We Rise (television series) 1709

Where Would I Be Without You (album) 946

Wherry, Kenneth 922

“‘Wheyting Be Dat?’: The Treatment of Homosexuality in African Literature” (article) 953 955

Whig reforms (UK) 1162

While You Weren’t Looking (film) 340
Whipping Girl: A Transsexual Woman on Sexism and the Scapegoating of Femininity (Serano) 359

Whisgary, Rahiem 956

Whistler, James McNeill 33 34

Whitaker, Brian 633 1310

White, Byron 88

White, E. Frances 393

White, Edmund 375 1380 1475

White, Heather R. 1353

"A White Night" (Mew) 29

White, Patrick 174

White, Wally 1380

Whitehouse, Mary 170-171

Whitman, Walt birthplace 1106
  Garcia Lorca, Federico ode to 914-915 1125
  Order of Chaeronea and 1165 1166 1167
  Sacred Band of Thebes inspirations 1407-1408

Whittle, Stephen 662

WHO (World Health Organization) 120 369-370 729 1217

Wider Bridge (organization) 1245

Widodo, Joko 1719

Wieck, Dorothea 983

Wieringa, Saskia E. 696-697 904

Wikan, Unni 530

Wilchins, Riki Anne 1213

The Wild One (film) 1602
Wilde in sinophone culture 1727-1731

Wilde, Oscar 1732
- aesthetics of 1729-1730
- attributions to 894
- conviction of 1046 1412
- coverage of 1660
- domesticity arrangements 1313
- importance to Chinese culture 1727-1731
- influence on gay theater 1574
- international significance of trials 1731-1735 1732 1733
- Mediterranean travels 1046
- Middle Eastern travels 988 1173 1452
- Order of Chaeronea and 1167
- themes 26 28-29 33 33
- travels to Maghreb 986
- trial of 31-32 85 1122 1420 1731-1735

Wilde trials, international significance of 31-32 34 1731-1735 1732 1733

Wildeblood, Peter 1740 1741

Wilers, Geert 1245

Wilhelm II (kaiser) 1412 1660

Wilkinson, Louis 1167

Will and Grace (television series) 1312

Will, Gustav von (Tava) 619

Willhoite, Michael 252

William (prince of England) 1068

Williams, Donna 139

Williams-Haas, Mollena 215

Williams, John 1720

Williams, Kenneth 911

Williams, Linda 1209 1275

Williams, Raymond 1396
Williams, Tennessee 986 987 1574 1579
Williams, TK 620
Williams, Walter 990 1582
Williamson, Brian 857-858
Williamson, Cris 945 946
Williamson, Judith 1730
Willis, Ellen 1266
Wilson, Alex 1669-1670
Wilson, Doric 1575-1576
Wilson, E. O. 228
Wilson, Harold 1742
Wilson, Jean D. 518
Wilson, Phill 736
Wilson, Reginald 1202
Winckelmann, Johann Joachim 32 365
Windsor, Edith ("Edie") 450 450 451
Windsor, United States v. (US; 2013) 450 451 764
Wingate, Orde 1067
Winkte, as term 1670
Winsloe, Christa 983 1574
Winter, Carl 1741
Winter, Kate 945
Winter, Sam 145 1432 1433
Winterbourne, Hannah 1068
Wirriyamu (Sassine) 966
Wissenschaftlich-humanitäres Komitee (Scientific-Humanitarian Committee)
activism 400 791
formation of 373 824 1473 1551 1732
Rüling, Anna involvement 1392-1393
scholarship in sexology 1371

Witch Is Which (band) 946

Witchcraft/occult in Africa 287-289 842 1735-1739

Witchcraft, Oracles, and Magic among the Azande (Evans-Pritchard) 64

With/Out (performance art piece) 1578

Witkowski, Michal 376

Witnesses: Against Our Vanishing (exhibition) 622

Wittig, Monique 366-367 1250 1326-1327 1328

Wo Men Zhi Jian (Between Us) 1605

Wocai wocai wocaicaicai (television series) 1748

Wojnarowicz, David 619 738

Wolfe, Maxine 620

Wolfenden, John ("Jack") 1740 1741

The Wolfenden Report 1739-1743 1740
Canada influenced by 1720 decriminalization recommendation 1068 1163 1414 1481 implementation of recommendations 1662
influence of 296 297
publication of 1421

Wołoszyn, Janusz Z. 1079

Woman-identified woman, as term 935

“The Woman-Identified Woman” (manifesto) 919 921

A Woman of No Importance (Wilde) 1728

“The Woman Question” (Schreiner) 34
Woman under Socialism (Bebel) 400
The Woman Who Did (Grant) 30
Woman-woman marriage, in Africa 64 387 1014-1018 1014
Womanism and African Consciousness (Kolawole) 535
A Woman's Place (AWP) 937
WomanSound company 945
WomanSpirit (periodical) 488
Womanzone bookstore (Edinburgh) 250
Women See Lesbian women Trans women
Women Affair (film) 335
WOMEN 我們(exhibit) 132
Women of Sand and Myrrh (Shaykh) 1072 1075-1076
Women-only sound companies 945
Women soldiers See Female soldiers
Women who have sex with women (WSW) 689 693 696-697 See also Lesbian women
Women with Mustaches and Men without Beards: Gender and Sexual Anxieties of Iranian Modernity (Najmabadi) 1491 1634
Women's Barracks (Torres) 1302 1302
Women's liberation See Feminism
Women's Liberation and Lesbian Feminist Archive 102-103
Women's March (2017) 996
Women's music festivals 945
Womyn House (Meem organization) 1031
Womyn's music 944-945 See also The Lesbian music movement
Wonder Gay (cover group) 872 1572
Wong, Day 137 376
Wong, Joe 146
Wong, Martin 619 620
Wong, Yunmei 992
Wood, Charlotte Ann 157
Woodcock, Charles 1412
Woodhouse, Annie 427
Woods, Marianne 814-815
Woodul, Jennifer 945
Woolf, Virginia 934
World Bank 729 1129 1133
World Conference on Human Rights (1993) 771
World Congress (Keshet Ga'avah) 1375
World Congress of GLBT Jews 1375
World Council of Churches' Ecumenical HIV and AIDS Initiatives and Advocacy (EHAIA) 324 World Health Organization (WHO) 120 369-370 729 1217
World League of Sexual Reform 1473
World of Men: Lebanon (film) 1175 1176
World Organization of the Scout Movement (WOSM) 1418
World Professional Association for Transgender Health 146 1431 1643 1655
The World Unseen (film) 340
The World Unseen (Sarif) 958
World War I (1914–1918)
Australian masculinity ideals 1702
LGBTQ military service 1057-1058 1067
nationalist masculinity in Europe 1123-1124
occupation of Iran 1494
situational homosexuality 1504
treason concerns 1661

World War II (1939–1945) blackmail concerns 1413-1414
Finland involvement 1601
LGBTQ military service 1058 1067 1413 1708
nationalist masculinity in Europe 1124-1127 sexual revolution after 1478 1479
situational homosexuality 1504-1505
treason concerns 1661
urban queerness 1688-1689
Women's Barracks depiction 1302

See also Nazism

WorldPride events 1282 1284
Worley, Kristen 158
WOSM (World Organization of the Scout Movement) 1418
Woubi, as term 1616
Woubi chéri (film) 343 344-346 423 1616
Woubi International 1616
The Wound (film) 38 1528-1529 1530

Wrestling with God and Men: Homosexuality in the Jewish Tradition (Greenberg) 1372-1373

The Wretched of the Earth (Fanon) 512
Wright, Doug 1710 1712
Wright, Timothy 681

WSW (women who have sex with women) 689 693 696-697 See also Lesbian women
Wu Jiwen 1238
Wu, Judy Tzu-Chun 1706
Wurst, Conchita 524-525
X

X and Others v. Austria (2013) 18

x ending, in inclusive Spanish language 1651

X v. Austria (European Court of Human Rights; 2013) 796

X. v. Turkey (European Court of Human Rights; 2012) 792

X, Y and Z v. Minister voor Immigratie en Asiel (Court of Justice of the European Union; 2013) 1048 1050

Xaba, Makhosazana 955 956

Xavier, Jessica 1259

Xenophobia, homophobia combined with 1345 1351

Xenophon (ancient Greek figure) 1407

Xi Jinping 1600

Xiyan (film) 1609

Xianggang Caihong (Hong Kong Rainbow) 1605

Xianggang Shifenyi Hui (Hong Kong Ten Percent Club) 1605

xiasl.net (China) 1631

Xie, Jianshun 1431 1432

Xing Quan Hui (Civil Rights for Sexual Diversities) 1605

Xingbie Buming Xingdong Lianmeng (Alliance of Trans Action) 1607

Xingwana, Lulu 1527

Xinle, Cai 1728

XIXe siècle (journal) 1733

Xtra (periodical) 242

Xu, Zhimo 1728

Xue, Chen 1613
“Xunzao tianshi yishi de chibang” (short story) 1613

XXY (film) 354-355 836 1220 1399

Y

_Y si quieres saber de mi pasado_ (Vargas) 1699-1700
_Y sin embargo se mueven_ (play) 1223

Ya-ting, You 529

_The Yacoubian Building_ (al-Aswany) 805-809 806 1754

Yagoda, Genrikh Grigoryevich 1126

Yajima, Masami 100

Yam Kim-fai 1746-1747

Yamagishi, Ryōko 263

'Yan daudu
   in Nigeria 1152 roles 842 853
   as term 1614

Yan, Joe 992

Yan yiu, as term 1714-1715

Yanantin concept 1584-1585

Yang, Mu 1612

Yang, Zhouhan 1727

Yao (monstrous) 1748

Yao Niang Ba (organization) 1631

Yaoi (fan fiction and art) See Boys Love (yaoi) manga

Yarbro-Bejarano, Yvonne 1701

Yasami, Siamak 1019 1625

Yavoucko, Robert 966
Yayati (Khakhar) 124
Ye, Lingfeng 1728
Yeats, William Butler 34
Las Yeguas del Apocalipsis (performance art group) 1224-1225
Yeh, Emily T. 1598
Yekutiel (drag queen) 1454
Yellow Book 27 29
“Yentl the Yeshiva Boy” (short story) 1376
Yeros, Dimitris 308
Yes or No (film) 1145
Yesterday (Roodt) 684
Yiannopoulos, Milo 1245
YLP (Young Lords Party) 140 1296
Yo, la peor de todas (film) 1521-1522
Yogyakarta Principles (2007) 761 1343 1348
Yollada, Nok 870
The York Realist (play) 1399
Yosef, Raz 498
Yoshiya, Nobuko 1467
Yossi & Jagger (film) 78 1377
Yossi, as term 1616
You Can’t Please All (Khakhar) 124
“Young Faggot” (poem) 973-974
Young, Ian 305-306
Young Lords Party (YLP) 140 1296
Young Soul Rebels (Julien) 546
Young, Velma Nacella 1303
Young, Will 1259
Your Name Shall Be Tanga (Beyala) 967 970
"Your Silence Will Not Protect You" (short story) 957
Yourcenar, Marguerite 308
Yours Emotionally (film) 1399
Youssef, Khaled 657-660 659
Youths
  bachcheh-raqqas 1635
gayborhood lack of support for 1690
  Iran 1491-1492
  kathoey 871
  mummy-baby relationships 1015 1016 1505
  phone apps use 1232
  Pinhua baojian depiction 1237
  Russian gay propaganda law 1400-1403 1402
  same-sex bond friendships 1015-1016 1467
  sex education in schools 1477 social conditions 24-25
  Zimbabwe 1751
Youths, seeking out for sexual activity
  African occult beliefs 1736 1737
  ancient Greece 1405-1407 1502
  bacha baazi relationships 1385-1386
  colonial Brazil 1509
  early Christian times 1354-1355
  Ganymede story 364-365 364
  houseboys at resorts 1380-1381
  Iran 1491-1492 1492 1634
  medieval homoerotic text and images 1262 1364 medieval Jewish literary depictions 1370
  Mexico 377
  Middle East 114 810
  as penetrated partner 1094
  premodern Islamic world 1363-1364
prostitution in Denmark 1687
Sufi literature 1557 1558-1561
A Thousand and One Nights depictions 1594-1595
Zuqaq al-Midaq depiction 1754 1755 1756

Yu, Dafu 1727 1728
Yu, Hu 421

Yuan zhi wai (Hsuan) 1611 1612

Yue, Audrey
Asian archives 99 469
AsiaPacifiQueer conference 1330
sex tourism 1441
theater, queer 1573
urban queerness 1691

Yue, Daiyun 1727

Yuki to hoshi to tenshi to . . . (Takemiya) 263
Yuwai xiaoshuoji (Lu and Zuoren, eds.) 1727
Yuyachkani (performance art group) 1226

Yüzgün, Arslan 949

Z

Zabus, Chantal 952 953 955
Zachariah (son of Carion) 1354-1355
Zagreb Pride event 1280
Zahooq, as term 1319 1320
Zalem bala (film) 1625
Zam, Namgay 222

Zambia
Pentecostal nationalism in 1735
Section 377 legacies 1420 1421

Zami: A New Spelling of My Name (Lorde) 974
Zami, as term 974
ZAMI (collective) 1556
Zami (organization) 241
Zamil, as term 1320
Zamostny, Jeffrey 355
Zanan-e hakkeh (women who desire other women) 1634
Zanpush (cross-dressing male performer) 1635
Zanzibar, Islam and same-sex relations 854 855
Zap actions 919
Zapata, Emiliano 1035 1036 1037 1039
Zapata, Luis 1695-1697
Zapotec community (Mexico) 1108-1112 1111 1223
Zarandi, Mohammad Ali 1624
Zauner, Hans 1241
Zawaj bil ikrah (television show) 707
Zebrón, José Gregorio 1496
Ze'evi, Dror 948
Zeig, Sande 366-367
Zem, Roschdy 989
Zeman, Barbara 1358
Zeng, Jie 1729
Zetsuai (Ozaki) 266
Zevallos, Sergio 1226
Zhang, Everett Yuehong 1215
Zhang, Guorong (Leslie Cheung) 1747
Zhang, Hao'er 1730
Zhang, Jingsheng 1169 1468
Zhang, Yunjing (Jing Chang) 1747 1748
Zhang, Zhujun 1746
Zhanling shanghaiditie (performance art) 133
Zheng He 1743-1745 1743
Zheza music 1570
Zhongxing phenomenon 1745-1750 1748
Zhou Bichang (Bibi Zhou) 1747
Zhou, Liming 1729
Zhou, Xiaoyi 1728 1729
Zhou, Zuoren 1727
Zhu Di 1743-1744
Zhuoma de hunli (Tian) 1599
Zia-ul-Haq, Muhammad 1425-1426
Ziff-Davis Publishing 995
Ziga, Itziar 1274
Zihan, Loo 1105-1106 1578
Zimbabwe 1750-1753 1752
   anti-LGBTQI laws 1335
   asylum seeking 1343
   backlash against LGBTQ rights 1348
   HIV/AIDS activism 9
   precolonial same-sex practices 1750-1751
   queer literature 960
   Section 377 legacies 1420 1421
   slang terms 905
   ubuntu concept 1678
Zimet, Jaye 1305
Zina (adultery) 1365 1426
al-Zinzana (Fadl) 1490
Zionism See Anti-Semitism and Zionism
Znous 2 (digital art) 879-880 880
Zohdi, Yasmine 151
Zola, Émile 76
Zolov, Eric 1697
Zona Rosa (Mexico) 199 201-202
Zrazy (music group) 946
Zubillaga-Pow, Jun 1573
Zuleta, León 767 769
Zulu people 1016 1017
Zuma, Jacob 1527
Zumárraga, Juan de 820 820
Zumurrud (fictional character) 1206-1207 1207 1208 1209 1210
Zúñga Traña, Joel 1149
Zuni people
berdaches 1582
lhamana 1670
Zuqaq al-Midaq (Mahfouz) 1753 1757 1753